Laughter & Lust (Virgin) 1991 φ

What songs! What hair(line)! What shoes! Look Sharp! sounded as striking as its cover photo looked, and Joe Jackson was unduly anointed a member—alongside Graham Parker and Elvis Costello—of England's angry young troubadours club. (Ironically, Jackson was the first of the three to really sell records in America, largely due to the wry "Is She Really Going Out with Him?," which was a hit single.) Smart but minus Elvis' overt intellectualism or artiness, or Parker's great white soul man pose, Jackson's songs mixed cheek, edge and a self-deprecating wit that set him apart from his more serious peers. Maybe all the lyrics don't sound as clever now as they seemed back then, but stuff like "Happy Loving Couples" and "Pretty Girls" took the pulse of post-adolescent heebie-jeebies, and kicked a little butt, too.

Much of the material on the follow-up, I'm the Man, dates from/is an extension of Look Sharp!, though several songs up the bile quotient, notably "On Your Radio" and "Don't Wanna Be Like That." The revved-up lyrics are balanced by catchy high-speed pop-rock (as on the title tune and "Get That Girl") and that affecting approximation of genius, "It's Different for Girls." The LP may lack the crispness and consistent impact of its predecessor, but it's a strong and enduring platter.

That Jackson was seeking an alternative to the fast-paced rock'n'roll of his first two albums was signaled by The Harder They Come EP (a straight reggae reading of the Jimmy Cliff song, plus two Jackson originals) and then trumpeted in no uncertain terms by Beat Crazy, his final LP with his original tight-knit band. Jackson put it bluntly in the liner notes: "This album represents a desperate attempt to make some sense of Rock and Roll. Deep in our hearts, we knew it was doomed to failure. The question remains: Why did we try?" The attempt seems less desperate than just plain confused, and its failure makes the LP the least satisfying of his initial salvo.

With the Joe Jackson Band dissolved, Joe took a musical detour, recording Jumpin' Jive, a tribute to Louis Jordan: cool jazz vocals over mock big-band swing. Obviously enjoying himself (for once), Jackson romps his way through "Is You Is or Is You Ain't My Baby" and related gems from the Louis Jordan/Cab Calloway school of heppiness. Jackson's production is warm and loving, and though Jumpin' Jive was a clear respite from the official progress of his music, the album is enormous fun and holds up.

Night and Day proved to be Jackson's most successful outing since Look Sharp!, although the urban/Latin flavor bears not the slightest resemblance to the white-hot sound of his early days. The Latin rhythms seem somehow less honest even than the buoyant bop of Jumpin' Jive, yet Jackson is obviously sincere. The Real Men EP is "Real Man" from Night and Day plus three more from the LP with vocals in Spanish.

Jackson's next departure—an intended film soundtrack—proved to be something of an embarrassment.

Months after the Mike's Murder album (billed as music from the film) appeared, the James Bridges picture still hadn't, and rumors circulated over which problems were causing the delay; while the decision not to use Jackson's music was one of them, that could hardly have been the prime problem. Regardless, it's Jackson at his least assured, and the most notable item is "Memphis," whose organ line and rhythm are lifted straight from the Spencer Davis Group's "Gimme Some Lovin'."

Jackson survived that debacle to make Body and Soul, an ambitious attempt to simplify and repersonalize the recording process as much as possible. With a distant, light sound—quite in contrast to the stuffy closeness of most contemporary records—and '50s jazz stylings tinged by an ongoing affection for Latin music, the record has plenty of atmosphere, and contains some of his strongest, most mature songwriting. Unlike his previous time-tunnel trip, Body and Soul eschews period re-creation (except on the cover) in favor of a wistful ambience indicative of Jackson's distaste for much modern music.

The three-sided Big World was recorded live directly to a digital stereo master with a small band at a three-day New York concert engagement staged especially for that purpose in January 1986. With no post-production tinkering of any sort, the fifteen new songs—some about current world political affairs, others about societal issues—are reproduced on two discs as accurately as possible. Stylistically, Big World is a return to stripped-down, lightly seasoned jazzy rock. A little self-important (the rampantly multi-lingual booklet smacks of grandstanding) and creatively inconsistent, but an impressively ambitious effort.

Redolent with unrestrained pomposity, the ironically titled Will Power is an instrumental album that mixes Jackson's least interesting film-score composition style with the "overture for two pianos" which turned into the title track. The type-free cover and the inside photo of the suffering artist, sitting dejectedly alone in a huge studio, merely indicate the imagined depths of this trivial self-indulgence. While Jackson may be impressed by his ability to convince an orchestra to play his melodramatically panoramic music, it's unlikely anyone else will find this exercise especially rewarding.

The conceptually masterful live album is divided into four different creative eras; each side presents a different incarnation of the Joe Jackson Experience. Side One, recorded in Manchester and Holland in 1980, features material from the first three albums, played with his original backing trio. Side Two (1983), recorded with a keyboard-laden quintet in Sydney, Australia, is billed as "The Night and Day Tour" but contains only "Cancer" from that album. Instead, it draws further from the same three records, offering the second (this time a cappella) rendition of "Is She Really Going Out with Him?" on the LP. Side Three (1984), recorded in Sydney and Melbourne during the horn-heavy "Body and Soul Tour," again includes that song, only this time in an acoustic version; Side Four (1986) hails from Canada and Japan and features a straight electric rock quartet doing selections (including "Breaking Us in Two," "It's Different for Girls" and "Jumpin' Jive") from various albums.

Comparing Mike's Murder with Tucker shows that

Jackson learned not to make the same mistake twice. Although the latter picture was a commercial flop, it was a Francis Ford Coppola flop, and at least had some artistic raison d'être. To his credit, Jackson's music is of a piece with the project's high quality: a cinematic use of '40s-style jazz, with a spot of artistic license, allowing for a few anachronistic styles and production techniques. But it's deftly crafted, credible stuff—there's even an apparent nod to Thelonious Monk—that creates its moods well.

Blaze of Glory is a concept album that's not a concept album. You can imagine him saying, "On this concept album, every song can stand on its own," a self-defeating approach that virtually defies the realization of any overriding plan. Still, the idea—a rock'n'roller of Jackson's generation followed from frustrated childhood to chastened but wistful adulthood—is not so fancy that it really needs much elucidation. Indeed, the songs can stand alone, and most are unquestionably cogent and catchy (faves include "Nineteen Forever" and "The Human Touch"). In the process, Jackson answers the Beat Crazy question: rock may no longer be his message, but it still can be a swell medium. [jw/i/jg]

JACOBITES

See Nikki Sudden.

JAH LION

See Lee Perry.

JAM

In the City (Polydor) 1977 ●
 This Is the Modern World (Polydor) 1977 ●
 All Mod Cons (Polydor) 1978 ●
 Setting Sons (Polydor) 1979 ●
 Sound Affects (Polydor) 1980 ●
 The Jam EP (Polydor) 1982
 The Gift (Polydor) 1982 ●
 The Bitterest Pill EP (Polydor) 1982
 Beat Surrender EP (Polydor) 1982
 Dig the New Breed (Polydor) 1982 ●
 Snap! (Polydor) 1983
 All Mod Cons/Setting Sons [tape] (nr/Polydor) 1983
 Sound Affects/The Gift [tape] (nr/Polydor) 1983
 Compad Snap! [CD] (Polydor) 1984 ●
 The Peel Session (nr/Strange Fruit) 1990 ●

How ironic that the band from the class of '77 that seemed to stand least for the tenets of punk at the outset should wind up the one that remained truest to them over the long haul. The Jam's refusal to compromise their ideals and integrity during a six-year career tends to polarize reactions to them. In the end, once-common complaints about unoriginality and Paul Weller's lack of vocal prowess are overshadowed by their accomplishments as songwriters, musicians and commentators, but mostly by the Jam's living proof that a band's commercial success need not divorce it utterly from its fans or sense of purpose. The trio's parting at the end of 1982 can be looked at as symbolic of victory (a courageous decision not to become pointless dinosaurs in the UK, where they were virtually superstars) or failure (they were never able to achieve more than modest success in America, despite plenty of effort on the part of both the Jam and their label) or just as an indication that Weller's ever-changing moods had led him away from the Jam's rock'n'soul aesthetic towards more "stylish" pursuits. Regardless, the Jam left behind a recorded legacy as important as any the new wave produced.

Black mohair suits, smart white shirts, skinny ties, stylish razor-cut hair, Rickenbacker guitars—on In the City the Jam were the new mods, emerging from a sea of spiky-haired leather-and-chain-clad punks. They may have looked different, but their energy level gave no ground, as Weller's jagged, choppy double-tracked guitar led the attack over Bruce Foxton's busy, melodic bass lines and Rick Buckler's stiff-backed drumming. The songs themselves are as taut and well manicured as the group, but match the explosiveness and attitude of the punks easily enough to establish an indisputable kinship to bands like the Sex Pistols and Clash. (It was no surprise when the Pistols swiped the riff for "Holidays in the Sun" from Weller's "In the City.")

If the songs and playing of In the City are derivative—especially of The Who Sings My Generation and '60s Motown—there's no arguing that the Jam was speaking to a generation for whom it was all new. Also, the main points—youth regaining pop culture from the grasp of conservative people with old-fashioned ideas, the individual vs. the crowd—were well taken by the group's growing British following.

This Is the Modern World, recorded just months after In the City was released, is a cleaner-produced version of its predecessor, breaking little new ground. The songs themselves are hit-and-miss, with "The Modern World," "Standards" and "All Around the World" (a brilliant single added to the US version of the LP) the obvious standouts.

Since they had by then spawned dozens of neo-mod soundalikes, the Jam needed a change of direction, and on All Mod Cons, Weller rose to the challenge. Prior inconsistency is replaced by an album that explores new avenues with almost complete success, while never straying too far from the band's roots. Weller's writing showed him to have blossomed into a major-league tunesmith, as well as a lyricist possessing a keen eye for detail and a refreshing sense of the vagaries of his own position. While retaining a great deal of the Who influence, the Jam also began to incorporate other sources. (Especially Ray Davies, which resulted not only in a hit version of the Kinks' "David Watts" but also in the biting social commentary of "Mr. Clean.") "In the Crowd" gives Weller a chance to open up as a guitarist and proves that he's more than just a Townshend copyist. All Mod Cons is a brilliant record.

Setting Sons takes five songs from a scrapped concept album about three friends who meet after much of England has been destroyed by atomic war and combines them with four even bleaker tracks, then lightens up by ending the LP with a version of the uplifting "Heatwave." The album is the Jam's most somber—not that any of their records are big on humor—but it is also their most effective. Weller's songs stick, and the beauty of his melodies provides stark contrast to the blackness of his lyrical vision.

Perhaps as a conscious change from the heaviness of Setting Sons, Sound Affects is more danceable and, for the most part, less pointed, although songs like "That's Entertainment" are hardly cheerful. The rage is still there, but it's channeled into fiery playing and singing, loosening up somewhat on the lyrics.

The Jam EP—five songs previously released on singles—served mostly as an interim measure between LPs, but includes essential tracks—"Absolute Beginners," "Funeral Pyre"—as well as the Who's arcane "Disguises."

The Gift explores a lot of new territory on songs like "Trans-Global Express" and "Precious," where a strong funk/Latin rhythm fueled by loads of percussion is heavily in evidence. The album takes a lot of chances and doesn't always succeed; some of the rhythmic experiments sound forced, others fall victim to overly dense, ponderous production. The Gift has its moments—notably "Happy Together," "Ghosts" and the Motownish "Town Called Malice." It also offers some evidence as to why Weller may have felt the band had exhausted its possibilities.

The Bitterest Pill (named for an emotional song with one of Weller's best vocals) shows the band forging still further into the realm of R&B. Although not recorded as such, the five tracks form a cohesive work.

Beat Surrender, containing the Jam's last studio work together, was released as a British double-45 and an American 12-inch. The driving title track is absolutely smashing, and the four accompanying tracks are swell as well, including a lively rendition of Curtis Mayfield's "Move on Up." The record is additionally noteworthy for its audible indications of Weller's subsequent direction with the Style Council.

Dig the New Breed, issued after the band's split had been announced, is an honest, retrospective live album (complete with bum notes) recorded at gigs during various stages of the Jam's career—a powerful parting shot. Snap! is an awesome two-disc career compilation (including a remixed "Funeral Pyre" and a demo version of "That's Entertainment") which was later abridged and issued on CD as Compact Snap!

Recorded in April '77, The Peel Session contains versions of three songs from the group's debut album, plus the title track of the then-yet-to-be-released This Is the Modern World, that are barely distinguishable from the originals, save for the fact that these sound about a thousand times better. A worthwhile investment for real fans.

In the Jam's wake, Weller formed the Style Council with ex-Merton Parka keyboardist Mick Talbot. Foxton launched a short-lived solo career. Buckler formed Time (UK) with ex-Tom Robinson Band guitarist Danny Kustow and issued a handful of singles in the mid-'80s.

See also Bruce Foxton, Style Council. [ds/i]

JAMES

Village Fire EP (nr/Factory) 1985

Stutter (Blanco y Negro-Sire) 1986

Strip-mine (Blanco y Negro-Sire) 1988 •

One Man Clapping (nr/One Man-Rough Trade) 1989 •

Gold Mother (Fontana) 1990 ♪

Manchester's winsome and demure James proffer a folksy, intricate version of pop with top-notch percussion and vocals that range from baritone to falsetto, often in the same verse. Village Fire collects five tracks from the band's first two singles, presenting a diverse range: from folk enhanced with numerous layers of acoustic guitar to revved-up funk and keen-edged punk.

Stutter, produced by Lenny Kaye, proved to be a rather surprising first album for the quartet. Unlike the singles, the LP adheres to one particular style of music—loud semi-acoustic folk. Tim Booth's vocals lurch around poorly arranged songs that are not all that memorable; gaining focus has inadvertently obscured some of James' strengths. Potential for greatness exists in several tracks—the accelerating "Skullduggery," "So Many Ways," "Why So Close" (an amazing remix from Village Fire) and "Just Hip"—but the album fails to realize it.

Fortunately, Strip-mine sets things right. Crystalline production by Hugh Jones makes the most of the band's alluring and intelligent folk-pop. ("Charlie Dance," "Ya Ho" and "Stripmining" are highlights.) Gavan Whelan's uncommon around-the-beat drumming and Booth's imaginative vocals outline the songs, leaving guitarist Larry Gott (doubling on keyboards and flute) to delicately paint them in with bright colors. Where James dragged its heels on Stutter, the frequently delightful Strip-mine kicks them up in the air, as if an artistic weight had been lifted.

Booth's onstage emergence as a theatrical Morrissey wannabe ruins the live One Man Clapping, recorded in Bath at the end of 1988. While the other three, augmented by a keyboard player, rough up the songs (only two come from Strip-Mine; three are from Stutter) with cavalier enthusiasm, Booth puts on an insufferable demonstration that overwhelms the music's subtlety and underscores the pretentiousness of his lyrics. (The CD and cassette add a track.)

Marking a switch in Manchester style loyalties from the Smiths to house-pop, Gold Mother introduced the new James, a grandiosely dramatic seven-piece (Whelan is gone; the lineup now includes a trumpeter and violinist) playing long, instrumentally overloaded poetic rock epics. (Comparisons to the early Waterboys are not unwarranted.) Booth's lyrics have never been this self-important—preaching revolution in "Government Walls," damning religion in "God Only Knows," slagging off a woman in "How Was It for You" and enigmatically celebrating childbirth in the title track—but he winds up sounding foolish rather than fiery. Inspiral Carpets provide backing vocals on "Gold Mother." [ag/i]

BRIAN JAMES

See Damned, Lords of the New Church.

JAMS

See Justified Ancients of Mu Mu.

JANE'S ADDICTION

Janes Addiction (Triple X) 1987 •
Nothing's Shocking (Warner Bros.) 1988 •
Ritual de la Habitual (Warner Bros.) 1990 •

PSI COM

Worktape 1 [tape] (Right Brain) 1984
Psi-Com EP (Mohini) 1985

These obnoxious Los Angeles glam-punk poseurs recorded most of their debut album (pressed on clear vinyl) live, onstage at the Roxy in Hollywood. Perry

Farrell sings in an aggressive womanly warble as his three bandmates pound out competent but unoriginal post-'70s rock. "My Time" and the dramatic "Jane Says," both played with acoustic guitar, show the group capable of moderate musical achievement, but most of the record—especially "Sympathy" (for the Devil) and Lou Reed's "Rock 'n' Roll"—sounds like the work of an incompetent Aerosmith cover band. And Farrell's effete habit of interjecting the word "motherfucker" merely frosts the album's maggoty.

As guitarist David Navarro and the lumbering rhythm section work themselves into a dull sub-Led Zeppelin metallic stupor on the rambling Nothing's Shocking, Farrell's double-tracked screech delivers smugly self-obsessed lyrics—repeating favorite lines over and over—as if his idiotic free-form musings were somehow significant. A new version of "Jane Says" allows Farrell to give the two-chord song an even more mannered vocal performance; the rest of the amorously tuneless material runs either hot ("Had a Dad") or cool ("Summertime Rolls"), with a laughably crude funk-rhythm detour ("Idiots Rule"). Farrell's skillful front-cover sculpture of two nude women—joined at the shoulder and hip—with pierced nipples and their heads ablaze is the album's only effective piece of artistic creativity.

Pulling himself further into a private world of self-congratulatory decadence (the inclusion of a methadone bottle on the back cover's botanica shelf is bad news, whatever the intention), Farrell fills the absurd Ritual de la Habitual with pretentiously irrational ravings that, when they manage to coagulate into coherence, describe the joys of shoplifting ("Been Caught Stealing," the pathetic bleat of a spoiled rich asshole that inexplicably begins with barking dogs), masochism ("Ain't No Right"), his supposed solidarity with black people ("No One's Leaving") and a nebulous eleven-minute opus about a ménage à trois ("Three Days"). The band's swirling demi-metal—still limited by Navarro's inadequacy as a guitar hero—is loudly functional, but Farrell's expanding ego and detachment make the album unbearable. (Because of the front cover sculpture's graphic sexuality, Ritual was also released in an alternate sleeve that simply offers the text of the First Amendment.)

Although no one in the pre-Jane's Addiction Psi Com is identified by name, it's impossible to miss Farrell's unmistakable Siouxsie-like warble amid the swirling, atmospheric rock, a proficiently transparent imitation of the Banshees and Cure. After undergoing some lineup shifts, the group finally splintered when the guitarist and drummer became Hare Krishnas. Post-EP bassist Dino Paredes subsequently formed Red Temple Spirits. [i]

JAPAN

Adolescent Sex (Ariola-Hansa) 1978 •
Obscure Alternatives (Ariola-Hansa) 1978 •
Quiet Life (nr/Ariola-Hansa) 1979 (nr/Fame) 1982 •
Gentlemen Take Polaroids (nr/Virgin) 1980 •
Tin Drum (nr/Virgin) 1981 •
Assemblage (nr/Hansa) 1981 (nr/Fame) 1985
Japan (Virgin-Epic) 1982
Adolescent Sex/Obscure Alternatives [tape]
(nr/Ariola-Hansa) 1983

Oil on Canvas (nr/Virgin) 1983 •
Exorcising Ghosts (nr/Virgin) 1984 •
A Souvenir from Japan (nr/Ariola-Hansa) 1989 •

MICK KARN

Titles (nr/Virgin) 1982 (Blue Plate) 1990 •
Dreams of Reason Produce Monsters (nr/Virgin) 1987 •

JANSEN/BARBIERI

Worlds in a Small Room (nr/Virgin) 1986 •

DOLPHIN BROTHERS

Shining EP (nr/Virgin) 1987
Catch the Fall (nr/Virgin) 1987 •
Second Sight EP (nr/Virgin) 1987

RAIN TREE CROW

Rain Tree Crow [CD] (Virgin) 1991 •

In one of rock's most remarkable examples of bootstrapping, South London's Japan pulled themselves up from lowly beginnings as a ludicrously overdressed glam-punk-pose band who (badly) emulated the New York Dolls and Alice Cooper to finish, five years later, as one of England's most sophisticated art-rock outfits, earning the respect of their peers and branching out into such fields as sculpture and photography.

Adolescent Sex introduces Japan in all its guitar-rock misery, playing such Bowie-influenced tripe as "Wish You Were Black" with less style than a sense of urgency. Obscure Alternatives adds more keyboards but still relies on Rob Dean's buzzing guitars and David Sylvian's sneery vocals for its sound. (Ill-advised digressions into reggae and funk are strictly dilettante poses.) The songs are fairly unmelodic, the production nondescript. With a quick listen, you might mistake this for a junior-league Stones imitation.

Japan entered the modern world with Quiet Life. The choice of producer John Punter—who had worked with Roxy Music and Bryan Ferry—was significant, as the band's sights had shifted from gutter-glam to elegant decadence. A cover of the Velvet Underground's "All Tomorrow's Parties" allows Japan—and especially Sylvian, sporting a totally revised singing voice—to show off their new suave reserve, relying on sequencers, Mick Karn's proto-funk basswork and generally understated aplomb. Around this time, Japan also released a marvelous non-LP single of Smokey Robinson's "I Second That Emotion."

On the excellent Gentlemen Take Polaroids, Sylvian's debonair Ferryisms—more shyly quiet than dissipated—are met by Karn's astonishing fretless bass work, Richard Barbieri's wide-ranging keyboard work (incorporating Asian and other traditions) and Steve Jansen's inventive drumming. (Jansen is Sylvian's brother; their family name is Batt.) The technically exquisite and musically adventurous sound is loaded with atmosphere, yet displays a very light touch. Sylvian's songs are, however, very hard to hold, as many lack a backbone and waft along with little evident structure.

Tin Drum presents Japan at peak form, playing subtle creations with intricate rhythms and tightly controlled dynamics. Spare but strong drumming (abetted by Karn's rubbery bass) provides needed propulsion, and the breadth of influences—from Middle Eastern to funk—color the music a number of fascinating shades. Having almost totally escaped pop constraints, Japan's sound here—except for a few tunes (especially "Ghosts") that strongly resemble latter-day Roxy Music—is a willowy fabric of interwoven threads.

Assemblage is a collection of songs from the band's pre-Virgin period, including "Adolescent Sex," "Quiet Life," "I Second That Emotion" and "All Tomorrow's Parties." (The cassette version adds remixes, an extra studio track and three otherwise unreleased live recordings. Years later, the same album—expanded by two extra Obscure Alternatives tracks—was issued as A Souvenir from Japan.) In a new effort to interest America, Epic issued Japan, which is actually Tin Drum minus two tracks, plus three from Gentlemen Take Polaroids.

Oil on Canvas is a crystalline live set featuring Ippu-Do guitarist Masami Tsuchiya as an adjunct member. The two records offer a good cross-section of the band's repertoire, adding some previously unrecorded ambient doodling. When Japan's long-rumored dissolution finally came to pass, Virgin issued Exorcising Ghosts, a two-record anthology of their later work.

While the band still appeared to be an ongoing proposition, Karn (real name: Anthony Michaelides) recorded Titles, essentially a showcase for his proficient bass stylings and ability to play a multitude of woodwinds and keyboards. Featuring such guests as Jansen, Barbieri and Ricky Wilde (!), it's all very impressive but rather vague and pointless.

After Japan, Karn did lots of session work, formed the short-lived Dalis Car with Peter Murphy of Bauhaus and then made a second solo album. Dreams of Reason Produce Monsters, a collaboration with Jansen that features Sylvian's Ferryesque vocals on two songs, is another tastefully appointed, highly accomplished waste of time. Orchestral arrangements and a choir don't make the slow-moving instrumentals any more involving. Meanwhile, all the textural achievement buries the two exceedingly Japan-ese songs in the sonic wash.

After releasing an album under their own names, Jansen and Barbieri became the Dolphin Brothers; their guest-filled Catch the Fall, and the two EPs drawn from it, follow in Japan's delicate footsteps, but take a simpler, less distant path and stop to rock out a bit now and again. Between Jansen's singing (a weak imitation of his former bandmate's) and the duo's lackluster songwriting (the pretentious lyrics are a bigger problem than the vague melodies), Catch the Fall is a needless footnote to Japan's fine career.

After six years of scattered and sporadic collaborations, the four key members of Japan temporarily united to record a one-off album during 1989 and early '90, releasing it—after almost a year of titular consideration—under the name Rain Tree Crow. With the majority of the LP "written as a result of group improvisations" (a neat trick in eight studios spread across Europe), Rain Tree Crow is split almost evenly between soundscapes and more conventional "songs." Although employing some outside musicians (including Nelson and guitarist Phil Palmer), the album doesn't sound drastically different from any of their previous work together, but successfully revives Japan's late-period neo-tribal rhythms and vaguely Asian feel. Some of the looser instrumentals recall Sylvian's excesses in that realm, but the lovely "Blackwater" and "Cries and Whispers" inhabit ballad territory, while the oddly urgent neo-fusion of "Blackcrow Hits Shoe Shine City" breaks unfamiliar ground. Perfect for late-night ambience. [i/ja]

See also Illustrated Man, Ippu-Do, Peter Murphy, Ryuichi Sakamoto, David Sylvian.

JASON AND THE SCORCHERS

Reckless Country Soul EP (Praxis) 1982

Fervor EP (Praxis) 1983 (EMI America) 1984

Lost & Found (EMI America) 1985

Still Standing (EMI America) 1986 •

Thunder and Fire (A&M) 1989 •

In 1981, as the legend goes, Jason Ringenberg left his daddy's Illinois hog farm for the bright lights of Nashville and promptly stumbled upon guitarist Warner Hodges and bassist Jeff Johnson in a gutter. With drummer Perry Baggs, they became Jason and the Nashville Scorchers, and recorded a bunch of tunes on a 4-track during a drunken night in the studio. The resulting Reckless Country Soul EP, a 7-inch released by a local indie label, is rough-hewn and half-realized, but enough to help the band earn a rep as the best country-metal-thrash band in the state of Tennessee.

Rigorous touring and a rep for wild shows helped spread the Scorchers' noisy mutant gospel. They play tighter and nastier on the 12-inch Fervor, displaying Ringenberg's knack for clever songwriting. The band signed to a major label, dropped Nashville from their name, and saw their second EP reissued with the addition of a smoking version of Bob Dylan's "Absolutely Sweet Marie."

Lost & Found puts the Scorchers in the forefront of an ever-growing country-punk genre, only they've got the roots others lack: Hodges' folks toured with Johnny Cash, Baggs' dad sang gospel and Johnson was reared in the Blue Ridge Mountains. More than just a pedigree to brag about, the band's genuine hick beginnings make them a lot less inhibited and more apt to cross from cool to corny, punk to heavy metal without fretting much about it. There's great tension between Ringenberg's two sides—bible-quoting, straitlaced country boy and yelping, flailing, demon-possessed madman—and the cigarette-chomping, white-noise-mongering Hodges. On Lost & Found, Jason and the Scorchers burn like nothing since General Sherman's troops marched through Georgia.

Still Standing was produced by Tom Werman (Cheap Trick, Mötley Crüe, Poison), who captured the Scorchers' melodic power without overdoing it or pushing any obvious commercial concessions down their throats. The folksy "Good Things Come to Those Who Wait" and the equally optimistic "Crashin' Down" are as pretty, memorable and uplifting as anything they've done; "Shotgun Blues" and "Ghost Town" give Hodges plenty of encouragement to unleash his wildest electric dreams. A charging cover of "19th Nervous Breakdown" acknowledges the band's clear debt to the Stones and proves that Jason and the boys know just how to treat a piece of classic rock.

By the time the Scorchers delivered their long-come (and long-gone: they broke up soon afterwards) third album, the group was sporting a second guitarist and a new bassist. Rather than successfully integrating the group's stylistic impulses, Thunder and Fire divides them into reheated rockers that short the Scorchers' personality and semi-acoustic country numbers that seem out of place. With Jason's good-ol'-boy voice undercutting Hodges' raucous guitar fury (and vice versa), only "Bible and a Gun" (co-written by Steve Earle), Phil Ochs' propulsive "My Kingdom for a Car" and the bluesy "Away from You" mix up a truly potent blend. [ep/i]

JAYHAWKS

The Jayhawks (Bunkhouse) 1986

Blue Earth (Twin/Tone) 1989 •

Numerous young American bands have attempted to recapture the soulful spirit of country-rock as pioneered by Gram Parsons, but few have come as close to getting it right as the Jayhawks. Where similarly inclined combos have used the sound as little more than a stylistic affectation, this Minneapolis quartet captures Parson's sense of fatalistic moralism, remaining scrupulously faithful to their musical sources yet never seeming contrived—despite the fact that frontman Mark Olson's Midwestern drawl is often a dead ringer for GP's, and his songs cover similar emotional ground.

The Jayhawks is an auspicious debut; the band stakes out its derivative style with so much spirit that it almost sounds original. The playing (particularly guitarist Gary Louris) is clean and economical; the material is largely uptempo and lighthearted. The regretful "The Liquor Store Came First" gives a hint of the increased emotional depth to come.

Though it's largely a piecemeal assemblage of tracks recorded as demos by a then-unstable lineup, Blue Earth is a mature, cohesive work that certifies the Jayhawks' significance. Olson's material is more skillful and streamlined than before, and the band plays with a thoughtful restraint that intensifies the emotional gravity of such numbers as "Two Angels" and "Commonplace Streets," and the humor of "Red Firecracker" and "Dead End Angel." [hd]

JAZZ BUTCHER

A Bath in Bacon (nr/Glass) 1982 •

A Scandal in Bohemia (nr/Glass) 1984 •

The Gift of Music (nr/Glass) 1984 •

Sex and Travel (nr/Glass) 1985 •

Bloody Nonsense (Big Time) 1986

Big Questions (The Gift of Music Vol. 2) (nr/Glass) 1987 •

Fishcotheque (Creation-Relativity) 1988 •

Spooky (Can. Creation-Mercury) 1988 •

Big Planet Scarey Planet (Genius) 1989 •

Cult of the Basement (Rough Trade) 1990 •

Edward's Closet (nr/Creation) 1991 •

JAZZ BUTCHER AND HIS SIKKORSKIS FROM HELL

Hamburg (Ger. Rebel) 1985

Hard EP (nr/Glass) 1986

JAZZ BUTCHER VS. MAX EIDER

Conspiracy EP (nr/Glass) 1986

JAZZ BUTCHER CONSPIRACY

Distressed Gentlefolk (Big Time) 1986 •

MAX EIDER

The Best Kisser in the World (Big Time) 1987 •

In ten years, the Jazz Butcher has undergone more transformations than most bands do in several lifetimes. Led by the Jazz Butcher (aka Butch; in truth, Pat Fish) himself, it is, regardless of incarnation, his lyrical witticisms and humorous critiques around which the group's music revolves.

The debut LP, A Bath in Bacon, is for all intents and purposes a one-man show. Butch plays a startling array of instruments, from guitar to xylophone, and employs a legion of session musicians to help create an album that encompasses an awesome variety of styles. Good ideas abound in songs like "Love Zombie," "Sex Engine Thing" and "Gray Flannelette"; there's just some uncertainty as to where they're going.

The second album was recorded by a stable quartet that included ex-Bauhaus bassist David J. Almost exclusively in a folky pop-punk format, the songs are better-developed and reach logical conclusions. Among the gems are a hysterical anti-macho anthem "Real Men" ("Some things never change/Notice how they never sit together on buses?") and "Southern Mark Smith."

The Gift of Music is a collection of single sides, an excellent package that affirms the band's folk-punk commitment. Of special note is an early up-tempo version of "Southern Mark Smith" and the pop gospel "Rain."

Sex and Travel is the Jazz Butcher's crowning achievement. The eight near-perfect tracks run the gamut from funk to folk to country-western and punk. Butch's lyrics aim high; subject matter, more than anything else, determines the style of each song. "President Reagan's Birthday Present" addresses the problems of America, Russia and nuclear arms with a healthy chunk of dance funk. "Holiday" uses a typewriter backing track and cabaret stylings to make light of the staid British persona; the frantic adrenaline punk of "Red Pets" tackles preconceptions about Russians ("Everyone says they lift weights/Except for me, I think they're great"). All this, plus two great pop tunes: "Big Saturday" and "Only a Rumour." (One CD joins Sex and Travel with A Scandal in Bohemia.)

With a new bassist replacing David J (off to rejoin his old bandmates in Love and Rockets), the rechristened Jazz Butcher and His Sikkorskis from Hell issued the live Hamburg LP and an EP, Hard, which picks up where Sex and Travel left off, adding blues and merseybeat to the seemingly bottomless bag of musical tricks. Bloody Nonsense is an American collection that includes some of the above-mentioned tracks.

Leaving the rest of the band by the wayside, Butch and guitarist Max Eider then released a four-song 12-inch, Conspiracy. The best things on it are the title track, a clever play on rap music, and the hilarious homage "Peter Lorre."

With Butch and Max as the nucleus, a newly formed Jazz Butcher Conspiracy recorded Distressed Gentlefolk. A Jazz Butcher record by any other name, this album reveals the usual diversity—folk ("Still in the Kitchen"), funk ("Big Bad Thing"), country-western ("Falling in Love") and pop ("Angels," "Nothing Special")—as well as Butch's ever-incisive wit, which is in rare form on the track "Domestic Animal."

Shortly after Distressed Gentlefolk, Eider resigned his Butchship for a solo career. Best Kisser in the World is a beautifully romantic record consisting of soft rock ballads and jazzy torch songs. Max's vocals replicate Butch's almost exactly; only lyrical content provides a decisive difference. If the Jazz Butcher has a sane and serious alter-ego, Max Eider is he.

In 1988, a two-person Jazz Butcher (Butch and Kizzy O'Callaghan) released the fifth proper LP, Fishcotheque, proving the Butcher to be as resilient as he is prolific. Reorganization has had no effect whatsoever on Butch's abilities, and this record rivals Sex and Travel in its brilliance. "Next Move Sideways," "Living in a Village" and "Chickentown" are sterling.

Big Questions is an assortment of tracks (including "Groovin' in a Bus Lane," "Rebecca Wants Her Bike Back" and "Olof Palme") drawn from previous releases by the Jazz Butcher, Sikkorskis from Hell, Jazz Butcher vs. Max Eider and the Jazz Butcher Conspiracy. Limited quantities of the original pressing contained a live 7-inch EP.

As Butch insists in his liner notes, Spooky "is not an LP; it is a single and a radio session nailed together for your amusement." A smoky cover of the titular Classics IV hit and an extended version of Fishcotheque's silly chicken rap "The Best Way" highlight the new stuff, and the Montreal radio broadcast sounds quite all right.

By Big Planet Scarey Planet, Butch had acquired a fairly steady group of sidemen, losing not a morsel of his keen wit or musical individuality. He even reveals a renewed vitriolic vigor in "Bicycle Kid" (a hilarious tale of working-class juvenile delinquency) and "Do the Bubonic Plague" (a lethal dance craze). Sharply observant and masterfully executed, this is a record from one band that has well earned its reputation for eclecticism. Sheer entertainment.

Cult of the Basement opens with an instrumental that sounds like the Ventures performing at a Greek wedding. A Mediterranean refrain wafts through the rest of the LP, subtly linking the thirteen cuts into what is as close to a "concept" album as the Jazz Butcher is likely to make. (What the concept might be, however, is anyone's guess.) Nevertheless, on "The Onion Field" Butch manages to flawlessly replicate Nick Cave's stripped-down gothic atmospherics. And faced with song titles like "Daycare Nation" and "Turtle Bait" and a sweet lullaby called "Fertiliser," one can only smile and enjoy. If the wild psychedelic raveup of "Panic in Room 109" is totally incongruous, it's also perfectly in synch with the rest of this wonderful collection.

Edward's Closet is an unessential compilation containing "Spooky" and an assortment of album tracks from 1987-'90. [ag/db]

See also Love and Rockets.

JAZZY 5

See Afrika Bambaataa.

JAZZY JEFF

On Fire (Jive) 1985

The original Jazzy Jeff offers solid rap action with a strong, clear delivery, significantly cliché-reduced rhymes and a variety of socially responsible concerns on his debut album, On Fire. He warns about "King Heroin (Don't Mess with Heroin)," shows a real soft spot for "My Mother (Yes I Love Her)" and asks the DJ to "Mix So I Can Go Crazy" and "Rock It (Rock It)." Electric guitar, inventive percussion and clever mix gimmickry (by Bryan "Chuck" New and Phil Nicholas of the Willesden Dodgers) give this a fairly familiar sound, but Jazzy Jeff is an above-average rapper. [tr]

(D.J.) JAZZY JEFF & THE FRESH PRINCE

Rock the House (Word Up-Jive) 1987 + 1988 ●

He's the D.J., I'm the Rapper (Jive) 1988 ●

And in This Corner . . . (Jive) 1989 ●

Although both use the same handle, the same producer and are (were) both on the Jive label, the Jazzy Jeff (Townes) turntable master who is teamed up with Will Smith (aka the Fresh Prince, star of stage and sitcom) is entirely different from the earlier rapper named Jazzy Jeff. However it came to pass, the upshot is that these mega-successful clean-cut young men from Philadelphia—purveyors of mild-mannered middle-class rap—are the ones people know.

Amid routine boasts and human beat box exhibitions, Rock the House introduces the 17-year-old Smith's friendly singsong delivery and engagingly hapless persona on the PG-rated story, "Just One of Those Days" (an approach later developed by Young MC). The album's only similar track, "Girls Ain't Nothing but Trouble," is a gentle gender gripe that samples the I Dream of Jeannie theme and earns a rebuke from female rapper Ice Cream Tee elsewhere on the LP. (Rock the House's reissue replaces the original hit single version of "Girls" with an extended remix.)

Sensing the correct path to lasting fame and fortune, the duo and their associates consigned most of the traditional hip-hop on He's the D.J. (which sold several million copies) to a bonus disc of scratch tracks (plus a truly cruddy live performance from 1986). That left the main album to showcase their unabashed suburban prep-piedom and bubblegum stylings in lighthearted raps like "Parents Just Don't Understand" (a comic complaint about middle-class fashion oppression), "Charlie Mack—The First Out the Limo" and "A Nightmare on My Street," which weaves a personal tale around Freddy Krueger, complete with audio bites from A Nightmare on Elm Street.

Except for a couple of obligatory boasts and tributes, the dapper duo severed its vestigial ties to street-level rap (the closest the Fresh Prince—on his way to TV stardom—comes to sounding tough is an acknowledged joke) on the third album, turning instead to broadly accessible pop entertainment. With intricately arranged musical tracks surrounding the beat, And in This Corner . . . delivers a witty and winning collection of engaging stories in which the cocky rapper keeps getting clobbered—by a boxer ("I Think I Can Beat Mike Tyson"), a thief ("Who Stole My Car?"), a crooked travel agent ("Everything That Glitters (Ain't Always Gold)") and even the supernatural ("Then She Bit Me"). [i]

JEAN PAUL SARTRE EXPERIENCE

The Jean Paul Sartre Experience EP (NZ Flying Nun)

1986

Love Songs (NZ Flying Nun) 1987

Love Songs (Communion) 1988 ●

The Size of Food (Communion) 1989 ●

Mankind may be condemned to experience the limitations of its own will with nothing beyond nothingness staring down from the sky but, as long as a copy of a Jean Paul Sartre Experience record exists, there will always be something out there . . . for your stereo. There will be gentle and warm guitar chords, boy-next-door vocals and delicately produced melodies. The JPSE may be nothing more than a simple janglepop band but they're one of the globe's best.

Born in a suburb of Christchurch, New Zealand in 1984, the Jean Paul Sartre Experience paid for the recording of the first EP with a government grant, yet the sounds of their shoestring put slick megabudget crap to shame. On "Fish in the Sea," an ounce of water sloshes from one tiny cup to another as a tingling triangle plings delicately. A hand knocking on a block of wood punctuates "Walking Wild in Your Firetime" like a tom-tom in a hazy beatnik coffee house, as a soft voice sings "I've got weapons and I've got hope and I've got guns and I've got rope . . . and I don't know what I feel" before xylophone tangs out a repeat of the tune. The result is plain-wrap majesty: simple, uncluttered, satisfying.

Their quartet's second vinyl outing isn't as good: too many Love Songs sound the same. The album concentrates on song-craft rather than texture, making the lightweight nature of their genre very obvious. From the whisper-breath blues of "All the Way Down" through the sweet-soul-tinged "Let There Be Love" and on to the herky-jerky sparse funk of "Crap Rap," Sartre wind their way through eight songs about relationships and one staggering pop song about rain.

The US album of the same name is actually the first EP plus four of the tracks (six on the CD) from the original Love Songs. It would have been nice if the funk and wiggle-guitar of "Let That Good Thing Grow" could have been included in place of the slow, sleepy harmonies of "Grey Parade," but otherwise this US album is truly the best-of. Highly recommended.

The Size of Food is larger in scope, expanding upon the band's wild fluctuations between atmosphere, irritation and pure pop. The economical arrangements highlight the hazily wafting melodies that swirl around the basic rock format, creating remarkably different settings for the kaleidoscopic variety of the songs, from shimmering pop to hazy psychedelia and hypnotic ambience. Essential. [e/ja]

MARC JEFFREY/PLAYTIME

See Certain General.

JELLYBEAN

Wotupskil?! EP (EMI America) 1984

Just Visiting This Planet (Chrysalis) 1987 ●

Rocks the House! (Chrysalis) 1988 ●

Spillin' the Beans (Atlantic) 1991 ☐

New York mixer/producer (Madonna, Jocelyn Brown, Hall & Oates, etc.) John "Jellybean" Benitez stepped out under his own name for the first time on the five-song Wotupskil?!! mini-album. The only problem is he doesn't play or sing on it. Nor did he write any of the material. Benitez did, however, produce it, bringing together such powerful friends as Nile Rodgers, Madonna, John Robie and Dan Hartman to create one long instrumental and a batch of dance numbers. Best track: an otherwise unrecorded Madonna composition, "Sidewalk Talk."

Three years later, the Great Delegator returned to the creative world with a full-length hands-off album, Just Visiting This Planet. Besides producing and some arranging, just what did the diminutive doyen get saddled with this time? Drum programming on seven of the eight light and infectious dance songs, background vocals on three, synthesizers on two; he actually takes credit for writing one. As strange an approach as Jellybean takes, he certainly can't be faulted for assembling a spectacular cast and assigning the lead vocals to a talented trio: Adele Bertei, Elisa Fiorillo and Steven Danté. Leave your brain at the door and get down!

Following the credo that a mixer mixes, Jellybean then mixed himself up an extended compilation of songs from his two albums and released the results—including two versions of "The Real Thing" and six minutes of "Sidewalk Talk"—as Jellybean Rocks the House!

The all-new Spillin' the Beans introduces the latest trio of vocal debutantes; the CD has four bonus 12-inch mixes. [i]

See also Adele Bertei.

JELLYFISH

Bellybutton (Charisma) 1990 ♪

BEATNIK BEATCH

At the Zulu Pool (Industrial) 1987

Beatnik Beatch (Atlantic) 1988 ●

In one of the rare second chances afforded a band by the record industry, San Francisco drummer/singer Andy Sturmer and keyboardist Roger Manning (not the folkie) survived the failure of Beatnik Beatch (a forgettable pop-rock quartet whose one boring indie album—shorn of five tracks and bolstered by four better new songs for its retitled major-label reissue—makes half-baked attempts at wit while managing to sound like a younger Supertramp) to reinvent themselves as Jellyfish and fake their way into retro-'60s psychedelic success. Marketing is a wonderful thing, baby.

If not for the band's outrageous junk-store clothes and the album's spectacular art direction, it's unlikely many would have taken Bellybutton—an occasionally catchy but more often dull amalgam of pop songs blithely stitched together from bits of the Beatles (Abbey Road-era), Beach Boys, Cheap Trick and (most of all) Squeeze—as anything of stylistic note. Despite the presentation, the record isn't even faintly psychedelic; considered apart from the image, Bellybutton is too transparently derivative (and lacking inspiration) to merit any serious attention. [i]

JERRY'S KIDS

Is This My World (X-Claim) 1983 (Ger. Taangl-Funhouse) 1987 ●

Kill Kill Kill (Taangl) 1989 ●

VARIOUS ARTISTS

This Is Boston Not L.A. (Modern Method) 1982

Boston cranked up its loudest hardcore bellow in the early '80s with the likes of Gang Green, SS Decontrol, the F.U.'s and Jerry's Kids, one of the early pioneers of metal-meets-hardcore thrash. The Kids pummel with spearing guitars, grinding rhythms and hammering vocals.

Jerry's Kids first made their presence known in the seven minutes it took them to blast out six songs on the This Is Boston Not L.A. scene compilation. With shrieks of "help me!" and "let me out!," "Desperate" simulates a shackled soul struggling to break free, while "Pressure" slows and speeds to searing effect.

With guitarist Chris Doherty of the temporarily defunct Gang Green in the lineup (Kids drummer Brian Betzger joined Gang Green when Doherty restarted it), bassist Rick Jones replaced his brother Bryan on vocals for Is This My World, which reveals more complexity and packs more impact than the first set. (Their parents reportedly forbid Bryan to perform live after he broke his leg at a gig.) The virulent intensity of songs like "Cracks in the Wall," "No Time," "Lost" and "Is This My World" makes the album a hardcore classic.

After a couple of years off, a revised Jerry's Kids (still fronted by Rick Jones and guitarist Bob Cenci) returned in 1986, but didn't release anything new for several years. The new Kids harness some of the original blurring speed on solid crunchers like "Fire," "Bad Trip" and "Back Off," but there's a weightier demi-metal bottom to most of Kill Kill Kill. While the LP generally delivers tight, driving mature rock power, "Breathe and Fuck" trudges in relatively lead boots. Meanwhile, the pulsing "Satan's Toy" summons up a religious demon or two with subliminal speech and an evangelical preacher. (The CD includes both albums.)

See also Gang Green.

[mg]

JESTERS OF DESTINY

See Jeff Dahl Group.

JESUS AND MARY CHAIN

Just Like Honey EP (nr/Blanco y Negro) 1985

Psychocandy (Reprise) 1985 ●

Some Candy Talking EP (nr/Blanco y Negro) 1986

April Skies EP (nr/Blanco y Negro) 1987

Happy When It Rains EP (nr/Blanco y Negro) 1987

Darklands EP (nr/Blanco y Negro) 1987 ●

Darklands (Blanco y Negro-Warner Bros.) 1987 ●

Sidewalking EP (Blanco y Negro-Warner Bros.) 1988

Barbed Wire Kisses (Blanco y Negro-Warner Bros.) 1988 ●

Blues from a Gun EP (nr/Blanco y Negro) 1989 ●

Automatic (Blanco y Negro-Warner Bros.) 1989 ●

Head On EP (nr/Blanco y Negro) 1989 ●

Rollercoaster EP (nr/Blanco y Negro) 1990 ●

By blithely combining power-pop melodies with industrial-strength guitar noise and lowbrow lyrical perversity, the Jesus and Mary Chain—Glasgow brothers Jim and William Reid, bassist Douglas Hart and rotating drummers—created a sound that can't quite be described as new, but does stand miles apart from anything that's been done before. If nothing else, what the Reids dredged up from the Velvet Underground has inspired endless imitation.

Awash in feedback and fuzz, tunes and drones, wit and vulgarity, Psychocandy is the quintessentially tense, claustrophobic soundtrack to these pressurized, multiphasic times—easy listening for troubled teens. The band's three exceptional pre-LP singles ("Never Understand," "You Trip Me Up," "Just Like Honey") are only the most immediately striking of the fourteen cuts; such others as "Inside Me," "Cut Dead" and "Sowing Seeds" further illustrate the group's variety, imagination and ability to enthrall. (The American CD helpfully appends the post-LP single, "Some Candy Talking.")

Typical of the Reids' determined anti-conformism, Darklands all but eliminates the characteristic crazed sound of the first LP, leaving skeletal guitar-pop songs—menacingly restrained and drenched in echo—colored only occasionally with familiar washes of fuzz guitar. Displaying a notable mid-'60s Dylan influence (check the verses of "Deep One Perfect Morning") and delivering their best song yet, "Happy When It Rains," the album predictably put off fickle fans and critics disappointed by the stylistic regression. Nonetheless, "April Skies," "Down on Me," "Darklands," "Nine Million Rainy Days" and "Fall" ("I'm as dead as a Christmas tree . . .") stand proudly as exceptional and truly original pop fare for the '80s. (Incidentally, for a thoughtful if hyperbolic analysis of the band's early stages, read John Robertson's 1988 biography.)

One of J&M's fetishes is to release singles in as many different formats as possible. As a result, there are numerous 12-inch and 10-inch EPs, double-pack 7-inch singles and CD EPs (some of which are listed above) which add live tracks, acoustic demos, remixes, outtakes and other ephemera. A batch of those, with the addition of a cool T. Rexy new single, "Sidewalking," comprise Barbed Wire Kisses (B-sides and More): sixteen (twenty on the CD and cassette) arcane tales from the Chain's darkside. Not a cohesive album and far from consistently excellent, it offers a helpful recapitulation of what the group does in its spare time. Targets include the Beach Boys (the demented slaughter of "Kill Surf City" and a semi-reverent version of "Surfin USA") and Bo Diddley (a devolved rendition of "Who Do You Love" and, on the tape/CD, a similar-sounding tribute, "Bo Diddley Is Jesus"). Not a quick fix for fanatics lacking a complete collection, Barbed Wire Kisses merely points the direction in which the obscurities lie.

The devastating Dylanized T. Rexisms of "Blues from a Gun" (the 12-inch EP adds three non-LP tracks, two of which—including the killer surf dementia of "Penetration," unrelated to any other song by that name—also appear on the CD-3, rounded out with a lovely near-acoustic version of Smokey Robinson's "My Girl") previewed Automatic, a lazy but entertaining album the Reids recorded with no assistance other than a live drummer on one song. (The mindless synth-drums are one of the record's main problems.) No longer in search of—or shying away from—the ultimate guitar distortion, the Reids hold to a loud down-the-middle sound over which Jim can sing what have become fairly predictable lyrics. Still, their incisive pop sense makes "Blues from a Gun," the Lou Reedish

"Halfway to Crazy" and another irresistible single, "Head On," which sticks a venerable rock'n'roll riff into a song that seems to allow a bit of warped positivism into the band's perverse fantasies of self-degradation: "I'm taking myself to the dirty part of town/Where all my troubles can't be found." (The CD adds an acoustic/strings version of "Drop" sung by William and a pointless dance/noise instrumental, "Sunray.")

The CD-3 of the Head On EP (a three-song 12-inch) has a remix of the acoustic "Drop" (without the strings) and two non-LP tracks: "In the Black" and "Break Me Down." (The "Head On" 7-inch was issued in four different sleeves, with four different B-sides.)

Despite a concerted effort to ruin Leonard Cohen's "Tower of Song," the only good thing on the Rollercoaster EP is "Lowlife," a buzzing tune with a new (for the Chain) chord progression and loads of tremolo guitar noise; the by-the-numbers "Rollercoaster" has half a hook and way too much echo. [i]

See also John Moore and the Expressway, Primal Scream.

JESUS JONES

Liquidizer (nr/Food) 1989 (Food-SBK) 1990 ●
Live EP (Food-SBK) 1990 ☐
Right Here, Right Now EP (nr/Food) 1990 ●
Doubt (Food-SBK) 1991 ☐

Led by Drano-gargling vocalist/guitarist Jesus H. Jones (Mike Edwards), this scruffy English quintet that owes a major stylistic debt to Pop Will Eat Itself made quite an initial splash, playing busy, sample-heavy dance rock. Producer Craig Leon helps load the grooves of Liquidizer with constant activity: ringing telephones, sirens, meaty power chords, squealy feedback and insistent disco drum beats. That the album is—with one exception, a sluggish redo of Crazyhead's "I Don't Want That Kind of Love"—basically a set of variations on one brilliant song ("Move Mountains") shouldn't discourage potential disciples. Judicious CD track programming is recommended.

Live captures the band in Chicago, performing four songs from the debut (including, of course, "Move Mountains") and a new one, "Barry D. Is Next to Cleanliness," a profane sample-thon. The very vocal audience adds to the fun.

Doubt avoids the debut's repetitiveness, but it doesn't lack any of the hyperactive rhythms. Edwards (also the band's songwriter) apparently took criticisms of Liquidizer to heart, and endeavored to mix things up a bit. He sprinkles superb, shuffling dance rock ("International Bright Young Thing," "Right Here, Right Now") with slower, more thoughtful morsels (most notably the XTC-echoing "Welcome Back Victoria") and one exceptionally grating noise-fest ("Stripped"). The American edition contains one track ("Are You Satisfied") not included on the UK album. [db]

JESUS LIZARD

Pure EP (Touch and Go) 1989 ●
Head (Touch and Go) 1990 ●
Goat (Touch and Go) 1991 ●

Following Scratch Acid, bassist David Wm. Sims went off to play in Steve Albini's Rapeman and then rejoined singer (er . . .) David Yow in the Jesus Lizard, a Chicago-based group (originally using a drum machine but later incorporating a human skinbeater) co-produced by Albini. With exceptional guitar playing by Duane Denison, the barbed five-song Pure drifts towards the windy city's relentless indistro-drive without relinquishing any of Yow's ability to terrify. (And if you can't find a trace of Neil Sedaka in the carefully credited "Breaking Up Is Hard to Do" instrumental, you're not alone.)

Distorted vocals and masterfully controlled arrangements introduce new realms of dramatic power to the Jesus Lizard experience on the full-length Head. In "If You Had Lips" and "Wax eater," the group hangs sharp objects and crude lyrics from rising and falling riffs; lightening the instrumental assault in "Pastoral" squeezes maximum benefit from Yow's conscientiously off-key crooning; key changes in the instrumental "Tight 'n Shiny" cap off this impressive and abrasive sophistication program. (The Head CD also contains Pure.) [i]

See also Phantom 309, Rapeman, Scratch Acid.

JET BLACK BERRIES

Sundown on Venus (Pink Dust) 1984

Desperate Fires (Pink Dust) 1986

Animal Necessity (Restless) 1988

NEW MATH

They Walk Among You EP (415) 1982

Gardens (Brain Eater) 1984

Under their original New Math handle this ominously entertaining five-man psychedelic outfit from Rochester, New York is alternately dergelike and urgent on They Walk Among You, a five-song 12-inch that delivers ponderously intoned poetic lyrics over thick rock backing. Heavyweight bass and drums support reasonably normal guitar and pulsing organ for a complex blend of sounds that defies easy description. "Invocation" pays stately homage to the devil and would probably impress Roky Erickson; the magnificent title track recalls (if no one else does) Atomic Rooster's "Death Walks Behind You."

Gardens offers seven new imprecations and tales of madness. The music is grander, more open and less malevolent; New Math reins in the rhythmic power a wee bit and moves Mark Schwarz's organ drone and Kevin Patrick's lead vocals to the fore. The effect may not be the one desired, however, as the band sounds more accessible but less striking this way. Still, it's the work of a talented, unique group with sicko ideas.

Without undergoing any personnel changes, the quintet became the Jet Black Berries and issued Sundown on Venus, an offbeat concept album that almost carries off an attempt to meld two familiar cultural idioms, science-fiction and westerns. The music is polite California cowpunk (think Green on Red or Dream Syndicate, occasionally colored by faint synth noises); the lyrics describe showdowns between bad hombres and masked men in space suits. (A brief run-through of Ersel Hickey's obscure classic "Bluebirds" neither aids nor impedes the effort.) Unfortunately, the Berries don't bother to develop their imaginative notion musically, letting what might have been a fascinating record drift into mediocrity. (The cassette release adds six bonus tracks—also included as a one-sided disc in original pressings of the LP—of similar rock, a surprising slice of Gary Glitter singalong pop, the old group's dirge-pounded rock and even another version of "They Walk Among You.")

Produced with likable simplicity and directness, Desperate Fires is a taut album of western-leaning rock-pop that hardly resembles the group's early work, but makes a convincing case for the validity of this new direction. Patrick's voice suits the material; unassuming songs like "Kid Alaska," "The Flesh Element" and the rockabilly "Sweet Revenge" pack a wicked kick.

Animal Necessity continues the Berries' (now a sextet) appealing casual affair with musical styles of the American Southwest. Fans of Green on Red, Giant Sand and Naked Prey should especially appreciate the album's dusty melodies, snappy country drumming and roughly strummed electric guitars. Guitarist Gary Trainer and drummer Roy Stein (whose songwriting is developing nicely) both contribute plainspoken tunes with occasionally offbeat lyrics. [i]

JFA

Blatant Localism EP (Placebo) 1981 •

Valley of the Yakes (Placebo) 1983 •

JFA (Placebo) 1984 •

Mad Garden EP (Placebo) 1984 •

Live (Placebo) 1985 •

Nowhere Blossoms (Placebo) 1988 •

These Phoenix, Arizona skate-punks—the name was originally an acronym for Jodie Foster's Army—are major figures on the Southwest hardcore scene. Besides touring extensively and releasing lots of records, their Placebo label is the most active outlet in the area, and has issued discs by a number of cool underground bands.

Blatant Localism is a 7-inch whose six songs race along cohesively at warp speed with vocals that mostly defy comprehension. There's an eponymous number explaining the group's name, a relatively prolix exposition on "Beach Blanket Bong-Out" and a four-second display of counting. Valley of the Yakes stretches fifteen songs out to fill a 12-inch, slowing things down in spots, but not doing much to increase vocal articulation. Still, a crisp, well-played slice of hardcore with real drive and commitment, plus two great, normal-sounding, reverb-splattered surf-guitar instrumentals: "Walk Don't Run" and "Baja." (One CD contains both records.)

JFA exposes increased sophistication and wit, starting with a backwards snippet called "Deltitnu" and continuing by tempering the thrash with variety, understatement and other interesting digressions. In a fit of major cleverness, JFA crash the Ventures into the Dead Kennedys for "Pipetruck" and cover both David Bowie and George Clinton during the course of the album. (JFA's funky-butt turn on the latter's "Standin on the Verge" is nifty.) A bit unfocused, but much more than a simple hardcore record. Standout track: "The Day Walt Disney Died." (The CD also includes the Mad Garden EP that followed JFA.)

Mad Garden, a four-song 12-inch with a wrestling cover and a new bassist in the lineup, encompasses more-or-less straight speedrock plus one milder (non-surf) instrumental with singer Brian adding keyboards. The live album was recorded in 1984, at gigs in New York and Pittsburgh.

Adding acoustic guitar, more keyboards (piano/organ) and pacifistic lyrics, JFA (with old bassist Mike C. back in the fold) grew up on Nowhere Blossoms, an album of tight, occasionally pretty rock that rarely cruises anywhere near punk power. As excellent as the music is, the lower noise threshold leaves the rough, tune-shy vocals glaringly inadequate. (He does fine on a completely straight horn-based rendition of James Brown's "I Feel Good," however.) Proving they haven't outgrown their bratty sense of humor, JFA includes a complete (and great) rendition of the classic "Signifyin' Monkey" sung a cappella by some old man on a Chicago street corner. [i]

JIMMY K

See Johnny Thunders.

JING

See Shirts.

RICHARD JOBSON

The Ballad of Etiquette (nr/Cocteau) 1981
An Afternoon in Company (Bel. Crépuscule) 1982
Ten Thirty on a Summer Night (Bel. Crépuscule) 1983
The Right Man (Bel. Crépuscule) 1986
16 Years of Alcohol (Bel. Crépuscule) 1987
Badman (nr/Parlophone) 1988 •

ARMOURY SHOW

Waiting for the Floods (EMI America) 1985

It's nice to see musicians with the courage of their convictions. After turning the Skids into a joke with his absurd pretensions, Richard Jobson—on his way to a career as a television host—effetely pursued poetry and preciousness, allying himself with assorted artsy types. Meanwhile, his onetime bandmate Stuart Adamson got on with Big Country, turning the Skids' anthemic Scottishness into a salable guitar-rock commodity.

Released the same year as the Skids ended, Jobson's first solo album, The Ballad of Etiquette, was a collaboration with Virginia Astley, John McGeoch and someone named Josephine. The LP, released on Bill Nelson's Cocteau label, consists of the would-be poet's recitations over lovely music, some of it adapted from pieces by Debussy and Britten. Piano, clarinet, flute, sax and guitar provide a much more enticing component than Jobson's unpleasantly accented readings.

Alternating spoken passages and artless singing, and playing piano and guitar, Jobson (with such sitting-room associates as pianist Cecile Bruynoghe, reedman Steven Brown, Blaine Reininger, Astley and Durutti Columnist Vini Reilly) fills the two discs of The Right Man with the audio equivalent of an especially boring and pretentious Masterpiece Theatre. To be fair, the dramatic story ("Ten Thirty on a Summer Night") that fills Side Four is engrossing, and the music is lovely, but beware of ex-punks reciting lines like "In Aragon I lost a love/The Pyrenees so high above/To England hailed away from Spain/I promise you I am happy to be here again."

Issued as a record with an illustrated booklet containing exactly the same text, 16 Years of Alcohol is a spoken-word autobiographical memoir in seventeen parts, occasionally accompanied by glimmers of keyboard music. The writing is incisive and captivating, but the presentation is perplexing: it's not something anyone would listen to twice, and who would bother reading this were it not included with an album?

Amid all this serious art, Jobson took some time to join with Russell Webb (ex-Skids), John McGeoch and John Doyle (both ex-Magazine) to form the short-lived Armoury Show, a band whose resemblance to Big Country didn't escape notice. Waiting for the Floods is not a bad album, it's just a shame Jobson had to take such a long way 'round to get back to where he started.

See also Skids. [i]

JODY GRIND

One Man's Trash Is Another Man's Treasure (Safety Net-DB) 1990 •

The Jody Grind's debut album caught on with the college-rock audience, but just about the only style this Atlanta trio doesn't touch is rock'n'roll. Displaying the well-oiled versatility of a lounge act and a healthy reverence for schmaltz, the Jody Grind (unintentionally borrowing its name from a late-'60s British group) skips from Duke Ellington to country-western to flamenco to demented delta blues to Burt Bacharach and the Gershwins at the drop of a high hat. Evenly split between covers ("Peter Gunn," "Wishin' and Hopin'," "It Ain't Necessarily So") and originals like the hilariously morbid "Death of Zorba," One Man's Trash resembles a cabaret revue more than a cohesive album, but singer Kelly Hogan Murray's captivating melodramatics steady even the most outrageous stylistic takeoffs. (The CD adds one song.) [kss]

DAVID JOHANSEN

David Johansen (Blue Sky) 1978
In Style (Blue Sky) 1979
Here Comes the Night (Blue Sky) 1981
Live It Up (Blue Sky) 1982
Sweet Revenge (Passport) 1984 •
Crucial Music: The David Johansen Collection (CBS Special Products-Relativity) 1990 •

BUSTER POINDEXTER

Buster Poindexter (RCA) 1987 •
Buster Goes Berserk (RCA) 1989 •

Having escaped his magnificently sordid reputation as the decadent voice and face of the New York Dolls, singer David Johansen managed to earn himself a place in mainstream rock circles. While keeping a firm grip on the musical values that originally inspired the Dolls, Johansen crafted a uniquely urban style that suits his rough-throated singing as well as his Lower East Side personality.

David Jo's solo debut was a very successful launch, containing most of the songs for which he came to be known. "Funky but Chic," "Donna," "Frenchette" and "Cool Metro" (three of which were co-written by ex-bandmate Syl Sylvain) are played in grand post-CBGB fashion by some of the Bowery's best vets. Better than bar-band but decidedly unslick, David Johansen perfectly transforms an insolent punk into a rock'n'roll adult.

Without destroying his urban soul, In Style makes an effort to clean and dress up Johansen's sound. Adding synthesized strings and horns, attempting overambitious stylistic experiments and relying on decidedly sophomore-slump material, In Style's two good tracks ("She" and "Melody") are lost in the morass. The failure of In Style undoubtedly inspired the misdirected Here Comes the Night, an ill-conceived stab at making Johansen simultaneously into a heavy metal shouter and a sensitive, poetic artist. A lot of very talented people had their hands in this project, but weak songs and the lack of cohesion make it a disaster.

Fortunately, Live It Up put Johansen's career right back on course. With his longstanding reputation as a great performer and empirical evidence of a well-received live promotional-only record made for radio in 1978, it was a judicious tactic to cut a live album for regular release. Benefiting from carefully chosen classic tunes and Johansen's extraordinary skill as a song interpreter, Live It Up is a great party record by a great singer. Johansen comes alive!

Relieved of his CBS-affiliated record contract, Johansen concentrated on performing (appearing regularly in New York as his suave alter-ego, Buster Poindexter) for over a year before returning to the vinyl jungle with Sweet Revenge. Sharing the bulk of the songwriting and production with keyboard player Joe Delia and joined in a half-dozen studios by a large collection of sidemen, Johansen disconnects from the R&B rootsiness that, to some extent at least, had always characterized his work, replacing it with strong, synth-heavy rock that would be regrettable were it not for distinctive vocals and witty songwriting. Some of the record flops, but "Heard the News," complete with ersatz Spanish newscaster, blends Latin American political commentary with one of the catchiest melodies of his career. "King of Babylon" is a clever novelty item.

Crucial Music is a well-chosen, if rather skimpy, ten-track sampler drawn from the Blue Sky albums, with an unsurprising focus: six songs come off the first LP, although several are actually from the live record.

Johansen finally hit the big time when he allowed his part-time persona, adult jazz/blues smoothie Buster Poindexter (also the longtime name of his music publishing company), to take over his career. Aided by a New York club residency and regular television appearances (on Saturday Night Live), Buster's debut album with the horn-heavy non-rock Banshees of Blue (led by Joe Delia) did the trick. The generally lighthearted romp through cabaret and swing styles of the '30s and '40s recalls both Spike Jones and Cab Calloway, blending sweet nostalgia with gruff crooning. Given the inconsistent, scattershot program (a schmaltzy ballad, one terrible rocker, another cover of "House of the Rising Sun" done as a torch song, a few other misdirected duds), the choice of a sprightly pre-lambada soca number, "Hot Hot Hot," as a single was a stroke of genius: it did the chart trick and guaranteed Buster's continued existence.

Buster Goes Berserk more or less repeats its predecessor's formula, but with less quirkiness and more party-animal posturing. On the album's only two original tunes, Johansen attempts to bridge the gap between the Buster persona and his "real" self, but not enough to keep the album from sounding amiably redundant. [i/hd]

JOHN AND MARY

See 10,000 Maniacs.

EVAN JOHNS AND HIS H-BOMBS

Giddy Up Girl EP (Deco) 1980

Rollin' Through the Night (Alternative Tentacles) 1986

Evan Johns and the H-Bombs (Jungle) 1986

Bombs Away (Speedo-Rykodisc) 1989 •

Please Mr. Santa Claus [CD] (Rykodisc) 1990 •

Rocket Fuel Only! (Rykodisc) 1991 ♠

Jerry Lee Lewis worshiper (who claims to have blown his hero off the stage on a good night!) and certified lunatic of the geetar, Evan Johns simply personifies the most incendiary and rebellious elements of rock'n'roll. A teenaged Virginia hellion who apprenticed in the DC bar circuit under the legendary Danny Gatton, Johns formed the H-Bombs in 1979 and made the reelin' rockabilly 10-inch Giddy Up Girl in 1980. The four songs are roughly recorded, but blueprint the searing six-string mayhem that has marked Johns' best work.

It wasn't until a move to Austin, a stint with the LeRoi Brothers and a Grammy nomination for his featured participation in the Big Guitars from Texas Trash Twang and Thunder compilation LP that Johns' name began to spread across the land he'd already crisscrossed time and time again. Rollin' Through the Night, a 1982 session unreleased until Jello Biafra came across it four years later, is the pinnacle by which Johns—and any other purveyors of roots-surf-guitar-billy-boogie—must forever be measured. With second guitarist Mark Korpi's taut speed runs setting the pace, EJ provides fireworks galore on cuts like "Madhouse," "Sugar Cookie" and "Do the Dootz." Put this album on a 90-minute cassette with The Best of ZZ Top and drive till you die happy.

Released the same year, Evan Johns and the H-Bombs gathers three years of scattered sessions for a predictably less-focused set, highlighting Johns' love of Tex-Mex, blues and country, as well as head-stompin' rock.

The H-Bombs backed Eugene Chadbourne on the berserk, twisted Vermin of the Blues before making the relatively polished and consistently superb Bombs Away. Producer (and erstwhile Springsteen sideman) Gary Tallent manages to squeeze the band into a clear, vibrant framework without obliterating the trademark hog-wild spirit of Johns' best outings. The seasonal and primarily instrumental Please Mr. Santa Claus is a holiday postcard that features a polka, the fiddle-fueled "Little Cajun Drummer Boy," a raging "Telstar" and plenty of free-style pickin' throughout.

Rocket Fuel Only!, while allowing for the broad stylistic whims of its creator (like a surprising compassionate piano ballad, "Prove It to Each Other"), also rocks harder than anything since Rollin' Through the Night. "Juvenile Delinquent," "Boogie Disease" and "Little Scene Setter" are among the rip-it-up corkers that keep Evan Johns among rock'n'roll's guitar elite.

[sm]

See also Eugene Chadbourne, LeRoi Brothers.

HOLLY JOHNSON

See Frankie Goes to Hollywood.

LINTON KWESI JOHNSON

Forces of Victory (Mango) 1979 •

Bass Culture (Mango) 1980 •

LKJ in Dub (nr/Island) 1980

Making History (Mango) 1984

Reggae Greats (Mango) 1984 •

In Concert with the Dub Band (Shanachie) 1985 •

Tings an' Times (Shanachie) 1991 •

POET AND THE ROOTS

Dread Beat an' Blood (Heartbeat) 1978 (Front Line) 1990 •

Poet and social critic (as the name Poet and the Roots suggests) Linton Kwesi Johnson—born in Jamaica, raised in London—helped bridge the gap between reggae and punk, infusing the music with powerful political content and an urge for freedom rooted in his experience as a black man living in Brixton.

Dread Beat an' Blood was a call to arms, a dark commemoration of police harassment and social repression of blacks told in a forceful but strangely spiteless manner. Speaking his poems over absolutely flawless throbbing reggae, Johnson uses the patois of the streets to speak to his audience, calling for brotherhood and vigilance. The clean, supple, vibrant music and incisive, pointed words make it a powerful and memorable political statement. Highly recommended. (The 1990 reissue—no vinyl—contains two extra tracks.)

Forces of Victory continues Johnson's call to action. Again supported by feverish reggae, Johnson's voice gains greater range and expressiveness while his poetry speaks of dire truths, and sounds increasingly complex, compact and expert. Muscular, dramatic stuff.

Bass Culture expands Johnson's style, including more humor and even a shy, touching love song. The music is sparer and more coherent, and Dennis Bovell's co-production slickens the sound just enough to remove its rough edges. Johnson is no less determined on his political numbers, but it's nice to know there are other things on his mind as well.

LKJ in Dub is a tribute to Bovell's engineering talents; while it has little to do with the Linton Kwesi Johnson canon, it's an interesting and successful example of dub technique.

During a four-year sabbatical, Johnson worked as a journalist. He then reunited with Bovell for Making History, a "comeback" album as vital as any they had made together.

The two-disc In Concert documents Johnson's strength and onstage presence. Though hardly perfunctory (the performances are all first-rate), it's still a greatest-hits-live package, and shouldn't deter listeners from acquiring any or all of the studio LPs. Reggae Greats is a compilation.

Seven years after Making History, Johnson repeated the feat with the all-new Tings an' Times, an upbeat but stringently critical album that is at once traditional and modern. Backed by Bovell and a collection of ace players (including a violinist!), LKJ considers "Di Good Life" as well as "Di Anfinish Revalue-shan," attempting to make—as he discusses in the first track—"Sense outa Nansense." [sg/bk/i]

MATT JOHNSON

See The The.

JESSE JOHNSON'S REVUE

Jesse Johnson's Revue (A&M) 1985 •

JESSE JOHNSON

Shockadelica (A&M) 1986 •

Every Shade of Love (A&M) 1988 •

Former Time guitarist Johnson reckons himself another pretender to Prince's throne. His first solo album, Jesse Johnson's Revue, reeks of conscious imitation, from the chronic pink color scheme to the band's carefully shaped mustaches. The self-produced music likewise favors a mixture of his former band and Prince's Purple Rain; not unpleasant, occasionally catchy ("I Want My Girl"), but no threat to the reigning monarch.

Although Prince's influence is still evident on Shockadelica (check "A Better Way"), Johnson's obvious talent and stylistic dexterity diminishes the significance of such comparisons. The accomplishment of leading a ten-piece band (seven instrumentalists and two female vocalists) and ending up with clear, well-organized sound is impressive in and of itself. The LP features a funky duet with Sly Stone ("Crazy") and a diverse, appealing set of danceable songs with a surprising ending: Johnson sings a message of hope on the touching "Black in America," accompanied only by acoustic guitars, synthetic strings and a small chorus.

Dispensing with his band (a drummer, saxophonist and female vocalist are credited) for a harder-edged solo effort, Johnson uses Every Shade of Love to show off his Hendrix-influenced guitar work. The eight tracks revolve around skittish strumming as much as surging keyboards, and those tracks that dig bottomless holes with endless one-chord vamps lose listener interest in short order. The delightful title tune and "I'm Just Wanting You" are notable exceptions. [i]

See also Time.

DANIEL JOHNSTON

Songs of Pain [tape] (Stress) 1980

Don't Be Scared [tape] (Stress) 1982

The What of Whom [tape] (Stress) 1982

Yip/Jump Music [tape] (Stress) 1983 (Homestead) 1989

Hi, How Are You [tape] (Stress) 1983 (Homestead) 1988

Retired Boxer [tape] (Stress) 1984

Respect [tape] (Stress) 1985

Continued Story [tape] (Stress) 1985

Live at SXSW [tape] (Stress) 1990

1990 (Shimmy-Disc) 1990 •

JAD FAIR AND DANIEL JOHNSTON

Jad Fair and Daniel Johnston (50 Skidillion Watts) 1989 •

Troubled enough to be institutionalized and talented enough to be taken seriously, this West Virginian (who has lived since 1984 in Austin, Texas) has written and recorded—solo, in the most primitive lo-fi circumstances imaginable, accompanying his vulnerably boyish voice with piano and, on occasion, chord organ, guitar, even old jazz records—a vast and remarkable body of songs. Often disturbing, nearly pathetic, sometimes beautiful, Johnston's music is at once freakshow exploitation and fringe-weird genius, an uncomfortable but extraordinary mixture of art and madness. Although influential fans and national exposure on MTV's Cutting Edge show helped make Johnston a full-fledged cult figure in 1985, incarceration (at the end of '86 and again in '88) has made his "career" intermittent and unpredictable.

Johnston began his haphazard and bizarre musical trek by self-releasing a series of homemade tapes. Played simply but skillfully on piano, Songs of Pain—jolly-sounding outpourings of deep alienation ("Grievances," "Joy Without Pleasure," "Like a Monkey in a Zoo") and misbegotten romance ("An Idiot's End," "Urge"), as well as an expression of religious faith—is lucid and stunningly incisive, casually cogent and artistically invigorating. On the other hand, Don't Be Scared is inconsistent and disjointed, with really muddy sound, but there are some really good songs (like the Neil Young-y "Evening Stars"). As musically accomplished and clear as Songs of Pain but significantly more revealingly confessional, The What of Whom is quietly harrowing, a riveting collection that cuts to the quick, plaintive cries for help set in gracefully tender melodies accompanied by piano.

Johnston first reached vinyl with Homestead's 1988 reissue of Hi, How Are You. Despite the muffled sound and toy instruments, there's no mistaking the inspired wit and riveting honesty. "Big Business Monkey" attacks an employer with venom and clever rhymes; "I'll Never Marry," "Walking the Cow" and "She Called Pest Control" allude to romantic problems. While "Hey Joe" rewrites "Hey Jude," the anguished autobiographical complaints of "Keep Punching Joe" is ingeniously sung over a big-band swing record.

The two-record Yip/Jump Music is more consistent in sound and style, performed almost entirely on chord organ and less motivated by anger. The lyrics offer enthusiastic elegies to "The Beatles," "God" and "Casper the Friendly Ghost" while exploring personal issues in "Sorry Entertainer," "I Live for Love" and "I Remember Painfully," but the album's standout is "King Kong," an extended and erudite a cappella plot summary and analysis.

Continuing his tape-capades, Johnston next released Retired Boxer, an uneven but generally high-quality nine-song set that includes a reminiscence about Daniel by an unidentified acquaintance, a Christmas greeting and the moving "I'll Do Anything but Break Dance for Ya, Darling." Johnston's piano playing on this cassette is among his best ever.

Respect is a very strong effort, an eighteen-song extravaganza that contains the remorseful "An Angel Cry," a solemn cover of the once-goofy "A Little Bit of Soap," the winsomely winning "I Know What I Want" and the poorly recorded but sharply worded "Just Like a Widow." Besides "Go" and the laughably speeded-up "Fast Go," there's "Dream," a marvelous piece of spoken-word prose, a grimly offbeat interpretation of "Heartbreak Hotel" and much more. Brilliant.

Recorded as badly as possible, the electric Texas Instruments back Johnston on five Continued Story tracks (including a "Cadillac Ranch" parody entitled "Funeral Home"); Bill Anderson and Rick Morgan each contribute to a tune or two as well. Played on two guitars, "Ain't No Woman Gonna Make a George Jones Outta Me" is a left-field winner, as is Johnston's measured piano version of "I Saw Her Standing There," the rocking "Ghost of Our Love" and "Girls." There's more disposable nonsense than usual, but not enough to outweigh the good stuff. The bootleg-quality Live at SXSW (the title refers to the annual South by Southwest music-biz convention) finds Daniel and his acoustic guitar enthusiastically performing with strength and confidence at three Austin venues: an auditorium and two record stores. The delightful ten-song program includes "Casper," two versions each of "Silly Love" and "Do You Really Love Me."

Following a joint album with Jad Fair (who, in comparison to Johnston, seems about as weird as an insurance salesman), Daniel made 1990, which consists of four live tracks (from 1988) and a half-dozen professional studio recordings, one with instrumental assists from drummer Steve Shelley and guitarist Lee Ranaldo of Sonic Youth. (Producer Kramer plays on the magnificent "Some Things Last a Long Time," a bewitching song co-written with Fair.) Clear sound, well-recorded piano and a touch of echo on the vocals don't damage Johnston's basic virtues, but neither do they make these songs—most of which are strongly religious—any more widely palatable than they would have been on a two-dollar cassette. If the eccentricities of Johnston's damaged mind aren't an impediment to enjoyment, sound quality is certainly not an issue. [i]

See also Half Japanese, Texas Instruments.

FREEDY JOHNSTON

The Trouble Tree (Bar/None-Restless) 1990 •

With an artless, slightly strangled voice and melodic rock/country songs that show plenty of promise but could use a lot more development and meatier presentation than they receive here, Kansas-to-Hoboken singer/guitarist Johnston makes an indifferent debut on The Trouble Tree, produced by Chris Butler. Played at various volume levels (all without much color) by a rudimentary acoustic/electric trio, Johnston's naive, emotive writing conveys simple, painfully honest ideas with no hint of mystery. [i]

JOINED AT THE HEAD

See Controlled Bleeding.

JON & THE NIGHTRIDERS

Surf Beat '80 (Vox) 1980

Recorded Live at Hollywood's Famous Whisky A Go-Go (Vox) 1981

Splashback! EP (Invasion) 1982
Charge of the Nightriders (Enigma) 1983
Stampedel! (Norton) 1990

Although probably still in nursery school when guitar instrumentals filled the American record charts, twang-bar king John Blair and his three cohorts brilliantly re-create the innocence and excitement of that long-lost genre. With resplendent, ringing tones, vibrato and mountains of reverb, Surf Beat '80 pays homage with fourteen numbers, including a few soundalike originals and a selection of covers that proves the band's dedication to—and familiarity with—their forebears. All of the tracks sound the same, but that's the idea. Great!

The live LP reprises some of the studio record's items, but incorporates new material and spot-on renditions of additional classics like "Pipeline" and "Hawaii Five-O." Splashback!, produced by the legendary Shel Talmy (to no particular effect, other than perhaps spiritual), features a six-minute medley that touches on eleven instantly recognizable melodies in one seamless nostalgia romp. Charge of the Nightriders is a compilation.

Self-billed as "America's No. 9 Surfing Band," the unshakably orthodox Nightriders reclaimed their piece of the beach on the self-produced Stampedel!, another cleanly played, reverb-soaked collection of standards ("Wild Weekend"), originals ("Beneath the Reef," "Storm Dancer") and obscurities ("Minor Chaos," "The Breeze and I"), some goosed by George White's period sax work.

As if any further proof of scholarship in his chosen field were needed, Blair put down his guitar long enough to assemble The Illustrated Discography of Surf Music (1961-1965). [i]

GRACE JONES

Portfolio (Island) 1977 •
Fame (Island) 1978
Muse (Island) 1979
Warm Leatherette (Island) 1980 •
Nightclubbing (Island) 1981 •
Living My Life (Island) 1982 •
Island Life (Island) 1985 •
Slave to the Rhythm (Manhattan Island) 1985 •
Inside Story (Manhattan) 1986 •
Bulletproof Heart (Capitol) 1989 •

At the outset of her singing career, model-cum-actress Grace Jones was a musical product in the truest sense of the word, more or less invented by artist Jean-Paul Goude. When new wave became the dance-club staple around the turn of the decade, this glamorous disco diva sailed into the genre on an airbrush jetstream, performing slickly produced covers of mainstream modern material borrowed from Chrissie Hynde, Bryan Ferry et al., while mixing in a safe dose of thumped-up funk.

Warm Leatherette (named for the Normal's pioneering 1978 new wave electro single, which she has the guts and insight to cover) was the first Jones disc to embrace this formula; Nightclubbing followed suit, utilizing songs by Iggy and Sting. The balance of this LP features a slightly more fluid vocal style than the monotone that rules the previous album.

Living My Life shows Grace maturing, escaping the restrictive machinations that had controlled her. The material allows more personality to show through, and songs like "My Jamaican Guy" and "Nipple to the Bottle" show the Sly-and-Robbie reggae rhythm team to be more into the music at this point. Island Life recaps her career to that point, compiling such tracks as "La Vie en Rose," "Pull Up to the Bumper" and "Love Is the Drug," adding "Slave to the Rhythm," a new single taken from a subsequent album which was released almost immediately thereafter.

Some bizarre business dealings must have led to the one-off alliance of Island and Manhattan Records to jointly issue Slave to the Rhythm. Trevor Horn produced this outrageous, astonishing so-called biography, including inter-track recitations, recollections and interview bites and creating theatrically massive orchestrations. The songs—written by a collective of Horn, Bruce Woolley and others—aren't intrinsically strong or interesting, but the ZTT Big Beat Colossus does such a job filling the grooves with beats, strings, horns, vocals, keyboards and god knows what else that the material counts for relatively little. But by the same token, Grace's vocal contribution to this audio love fest seems disconcertingly expendable.

Returning to the real world for a relatively routine (but still Grace-ious) outing, Jones wrote Inside Story with Bruce Woolley and produced it with Nile Rodgers; her collaborators also played most of the LP's music. The lyrics contemplate such offbeat-going-on-dada topics as "Hollywood Liar," "Victor Should Have Been a Jazz Musician" and "Chan Hitchhikes to Shanghai," while the music dully retreats various familiar late-'80s high-tech sounds. Grace's voice is fine, but this is not one of her more invigorating records.

Continuing on a path back to dull rhythmic functionality, Jones attempts a surrender to the hit parade on Bulletproof Heart, employing David Cole and Robert Clivilles, the crass slicksters behind Seduction and C+C Music Factory, on three tracks. Her songwriting (in collaboration with co-producer Chris Stanley) has never been worse ("Crack Attack" sounds like the work of a gradeschooler ordered to write a poem against drugs); her awkward delivery only makes this bad scene worse. [jw/i]

HOWARD JONES

Human's Lib (Elektra) 1984 •
The 12-Inch Album (nr/WEA) 1984 •
Dream into Action (Elektra) 1985 •
Action Replay EP (Elektra) 1986
One to One (Elektra) 1986 •
Cross That Line (Elektra) 1989 •

Starting out as something of an '80s answer to early Marc Bolan, Howard Jones is a well-scrubbed ex-hippie embracing humanist principles and possessing acute pop sensibilities. Times being what they are, he doesn't play acoustic guitar with a bongo drummer on the side, he controls an array of sophisticated electronic keyboards, singing earnest, reflective lyrics of personal awareness and individualist philosophy. Human's Lib, produced mainly by Rupert Hine, boasts a few warm techno-pop standouts—"New Song," "Pearl in the Shell" and “What Is Love?”—which stop just short of over-perkiness or saccharine platitudes.

Dream into Action, which employs more outside musicians (horns, vocalists, a cellist) to vary the sound, serves up another dose of engaging nouveau-pop (“Things Can Only Get Better,” “Life in One Day,” “Like to Get to Know You Well”). The album does, unfortunately, contain an extremely duff howler, “Bounce Right Back.” The 12-Inch Album compiles six hits in their remixed forms.

Taking advantage of Jones’ massive American popularity, Elektra issued Action Replay, a collection of five alternate versions and remixes of songs from Dream into Action and other sources, plus the previously unreleased “Always Asking Questions.”

For One to One, producer Arif Mardin put Jones in the studio with a full complement of backup musicians, thereby focusing attention on him as writer/singer. The conservative cover portrait reflects an overall stylistic retrenchment: the once-colorful elf has become part of a mainstream adult pop machine. He hasn’t sold out—nothing about Jones was ever that outré to begin with—but the shift leaves the soul-inflected One to One noticeably short on twink and charm.

Jones attempts to engage his musical gears more aggressively on the heavyhearted Cross That Line and partially succeeds. Besides the familiar HoJo bounce of “Everlasting Love,” the mostly self-produced album stretches to encompass a solo piano piece, funky dance tunes with horns, a waltz played on Fairlight strings, new age ambience, a blast of raunchy electric guitar and other stylistic digressions. While the melancholy lyrics about a troubled relationship coming to a disappointing end give the record emotional gravity, the same seriousness prevents the music from reaching escape velocity. Impressive in its ambitious stylistic variety, Cross That Line is an aimless adventure with only a few gripping chapters. [i]

MARTI JONES

Unsophisticated Time (A&M) 1985

Match Game (A&M) 1986 •

Used Guitars (A&M) 1988 •

Any Kind of Lie (RCA) 1990 •

COLOR ME GONE

Color Me Gone EP (A&M) 1984

Color Me Gone’s one EP introduced a nice, reedy vocalist in guitar-playing Marti Jones; rich arrangements and clear production allowed her to draw everything out of the six agreeable songs. Without really holding to any one style, the Ohio quartet flirts with radio rock, neo-ethnic Americana, country (in that mode, the downcast “Hurtin’ You” is the best thing here) and ’60sish folk-rock, winding up pleasant but unmemorable.

Jones’ solo debut—brilliantly produced by future husband Don Dixon, who also plays most of the instruments on it—draws strength from a very astute selection of tunes. She covers songs by the dB’s, Bongos, Costello and Dixon in a clear voice on this delightfully unprepossessing album.

Match Game follows roughly the same pattern, adding songs by David Bowie (“Soul Love”), Marshall Crenshaw (“Whenever You’re on My Mind”) and Free (“Soon I Will Be Gone”) to the prior album’s returning writing collective. Given a comfortable setting by Dixon’s sparkling studio work, Marti shines on tracks played by such prestigious supporters as Crenshaw, Mitch Easter, Richard Barone, Gary Barnacle, Paul Carrack, T-Bone Burnett and Darlene Love.

Boding well for an autonomous future, Don’n’Marti co-wrote three songs for the third chapter in a by-now-familiar, but no less enjoyable, book. Used Guitars gets major contributions from Crenshaw and Janis Ian (!), adding songs by John Hiatt (“The Real One,” “If I Can Love Somebody”) and Graham Parker (“You Can’t Take Love for Granted”), plus instrumental assists by the Woods, Easter and the Uptown Horns. Ian’s “Ruby” stretches Jones into smoky piano balladry that’s a bit out of keeping with the sprightly pop elsewhere, but might be the key to long-overdue commercial success.

Any Kind of Lie raises the stakes in a tasteful but determined effort to make Marti a star. Using a stable band and only two outside writing submissions (Clive Gregson’s “Second Choice” and Loudon Wainwright’s “Old Friend”), Dixon loads the songs up with every time-tested trick in the pop-country-rock singer/songwriter manual, making for a carefully arranged record that tries to consolidate a wide range of successful stylistic referents, from Suzanne Vega to Linda Ronstadt to Bonnie Raitt. A fine album to be sure, but it’s unsettling to hear this down-home gal turned out in such cosmopolitan duds. [i]

See also Don Dixon.

STEVE JONES

Mercy (Gold Mountain-MCA) 1987 •

Fire and Gasoline (Gold Mountain-MCA) 1989 •

The ex-Pistol guitarist, known for his chunky chords and rough’n’randy attitude, caught followers off guard with Mercy, a solo debut that allows low-key, sentimental moments—like the title track, the hopelessly sappy “Love Letters” and others—to mingle with the rock numbers. Although Jones is no vocalist, he gamely sing-speaks his way through the record, assisted only by two drummers and a pair of keyboardists. “Drugs Suck” is a terrible track that reveals a healthy attitude; Mercy isn’t Jones’ best post-Pistols work, but it’s by no means his worst.

That onus falls on Fire and Gasoline. An unforgivable plodding replay of the Pistols’ “Did You No Wrong” shrieked by W. Axl Rose and Ian Astbury (also the album’s co-producer and songwriting collaborator) reduces Jones to auto-cannibalism; the rest of this serviceable but unnecessary record either emulates the Cult or settles into self-parody. Ironically, Cult guitarist Billy Duffy upstages Jones on “Get Ready” with an electrifying solo. [i]

See also Duran Duran, Iggy Pop, Professionals, Sex Pistols.

JONES VERY

See Articles of Faith.

JOO LZ

Never Never Land (nr/Abstract) 1985

Hex (nr/EMI) 1987 (nr/Anagram) 1990 •

Bold, beautiful and British, modern-day poet Joolz is one of a kind. Though her main arena is literature (publishing two fine books), she has made a number of records of considerable potency and vision. Following a couple of singles on which she was backed by Jah Wobble's funkisms, Never Never Land is an unaccompanied album of spoken-word poetry, delivered in a style that owes something to John Cooper Clarke. Joolz relays essential thoughts on the bewildering facets of small-town life in Bradford, captures the attitudes and vernacular of UK culture, celebrates love and freedom, and rages at injustice, hypocrisy and betrayal in pieces that are by turns observational, defiant, romantic, satirical and touching. The live closer—a passionate, anti-nuke call-to-arms (“Jerusalem”)—strikes a particularly fierce nerve.

The even better Hex adopts a more ambitious tack, with help from singer/guitarist Slade the Leveller and drummer Rob Heaton, both of New Model Army. (Joolz has managed the band and painted its record covers.) The pair provides a sympathetic musical backdrop for her resonant poems (some, like the upbeat “Protection,” cross the line to become actual songs). In particular, the moving “Requiem” is beautifully bittersweet; “House of Dreams” is nearly as good. Throughout, the diverse music is exemplary, from pulsing rock’n’roll and synthesizer tapestries to more atmospheric, soundtrack-like compositions. (The Anagram CD adds three single sides also done with New Model Army.) [gef]

See also New Model Army.

JOSEF K

The Only Fun in Town (nr/Postcard) 1981 (Bel. Play It Again Sam) 1990 ●

Heaven Sent EP (nr/Supreme Int'l Editions) 1987
Young and Stupid/Endless Soul (nr/Supreme Int'l Editions) 1987 (Bel. Play It Again Sam) 1990 ●

A leading light in Scotland's neo-pop revival, Josef K attempted an uneasy marriage of pop form and psychedelic sensibilities on a string of melancholic singles, all contained on their one original album. Singer Paul Haig is the only member identified by name, and his presence is certainly the strongest here. There is a fragility in Josef K's gentle but foreboding work, produced in darkest wall-of-molasses sound, that suggests an intensity of thought comparable to Joy Division's. (Some of Haig's subsequent solo work sounds a lot like New Order.) But the album—which was first recorded in 1980, scrapped and then redone with largely different material from scratch the following year—never reaches the level of animation found in the singles, and it was neither surprising nor inappropriate when the group broke up shortly after its release. Dank but intriguing.

Heaven Sent and Young and Stupid/Endless Soul are both posthumous affairs, consisting of singles, outtakes, demos and John Peel sessions. Ironically, these two records contain the band's best material. “Heaven Sent,” “Radio Drill Time” and “Heart of Song” are nothing short of pure pop brilliance, surprisingly unaffected by the passage of time. Josef K were the definitive Scottish neo-pop masters, and their legacy lives on in many of the groups currently emerging from that land. [sg/ag]

See also Paul Haig.

JOY DIVISION

An Ideal for Living EP (nr/Enigma) 1978 (nr/Anonymous) 1978

Unknown Pleasures (Factory) 1979 (Qwest) 1989 ●

Closer (Factory) 1980 (Qwest) 1989 ●

Still (nr/Factory) 1981 (Qwest) 1991 ●

The Peel Sessions EP (nr/Strange Fruit) 1986 ●

The Peel Sessions EP (nr/Strange Fruit) 1987 ●

Substance (Qwest) 1988 ●

The Peel Sessions Album (nr/Strange Fruit) 1990 ●

VARIOUS ARTISTS

Something About Joy Division (lt. Vox Pop) 1990

Emerging from the industrial desolation of Manchester and originally known as Warsaw, Joy Division expressed, in uncompromising terms, the angst of the great wrong place in which we live, and their updating/refinement of the oppressive weight of heavy metal music combined with singer Ian Curtis' tormented lyrics and Martin Hannett's crystalline production to make a qualitative leap onto totally original ground. The band came to an end when Curtis hung himself—hours before they were to leave on their first American tour, thus (though it may be cynical to say so) proving the strength of his convictions. The surviving trio, with one new member, continued, finding far greater commercial success as New Order.

Following the self-release of the 7-inch An Ideal for Living, a skillful but rather unexceptional quartet of Bowie-influenced guitar punk songs, Joy Division did tracks for a local compilation and then signed with the incipient Factory label. (Three of these early tracks, as well as other rarities, can be found on the Substance compilation.)

Unknown Pleasures contrasts the message of decay and bemused acceptance of life's paradoxes with the energy and excitement of a band set loose in a studio for the first time. The tension of originality constrained by inadequate instrumental skills—simple synthesizers and guitar set against the Peter Hook/Stephen Morris rhythm section's more obvious punk roots—gives the record a powerfully immediate air; Hannett glazes the chilling, despondent music (including the classic “She's Lost Control”) with a Teutonic sheen, fusing medium and message into a dark, holistic brilliance. The grim songs are punctuated by the sounds of ambulance sirens and breaking glass, picturing a world speeding towards incomprehensible chaos. Very highly recommended.

With group and producer gaining confidence and ambition, Closer sounds emptier and more distant, with occasional use of strangely distorted synthesizer and jagged shards of guitar, both played by Bernard Albrecht (aka Dicken aka Sumner). Meanwhile, a dislocated Curtis meanders through a world that has robbed him of joy and hope. From the blunt anomie of “Isolation” to the accusatory chorus of the martial-beat “A Means to an End” to the somber piano-based “The Eternal,” Curtis' commanding vocals dominate the record. On Closer, refinement of the Joy Division ethos produces a purgatory of sound and words. A stunning, deeply personal album.

More than a year after Curtis' suicide (in May 1980, immediately prior to the release of both Closer and the band's single best-known song, “Love Will Tear Us Apart”), Joy Division's outtakes were gathered (along with a few previously issued rarities) on one disc of the two-record Still. (The second record documents the group's final concert.) Besides four previously unissued tracks from the Unknown Pleasures sessions, Still contains a long, enthusiastic (but carefully controlled) rendition of the obviously influential Velvet Underground's "Sister Ray," also recorded live. One of the most notable aspects of the album's engrossing concert half is the inclusion of "Ceremony," a then-new song that would provide the bridge between Joy Division and New Order as the latter's first single. As a compilation, Still lacks the coherent intensity of the other two albums, but features a good representation of the various facets of Joy Division's intimate, desperate music.

Both of Joy Division's John Peel sessions (January 1979 and November 1979) were issued on four-song EPs and later compiled onto an album. Since both contain material the group had not yet recorded, these artifacts are of immense interest. The first previews "Transmission" and "She's Lost Control," while the second boasts a brilliant rendition of "Love Will Tear Us Apart" and a foretaste of "Twenty Four Hours."

Also of enormous historical value is the Substance CD (also available, in the UK, on DAT), which includes a seven-track "appendix" to the vinyl album's ten songs. This posthumous antidote to Joy Division's willful obscurity draws almost nothing from the band's two albums, instead focusing on singles, rarities and the band's early contributions to Factory and Fast label compilations. Although annoyingly unannotated, Substance offers both non-LP classics ("Transmission," "Love Will Tear Us Apart") and high-quality esoterica (like "Atmosphere," a gently oppressive number first issued on a French flexi-disc).

Although there aren't any household names on it (judging by the accented English, a lot of them may be Italian), the tribute album is quite wonderful, an imaginative (and refreshingly un-derivative) assortment of interpretations that preserve Joy Division's dark mood in settings that range from gentle piano ballads ("Love Will Tear Us Apart" performed by the Carnival of Fools) and mild acid-pop (Allison Run's "Ceremony") to the manic guitar storm of "Atmosphere" played by Hitchcock's Scream. The only thing missing is P.J. Proby's legendary version of "Love Will Tear Us Apart": "Why's the room so gol-darned cold?" [sg/i]

See also New Order.

BRUCE JOYNER

See Unknowns.

PHIL JUDD

See Swingers.

JULES AND THE POLAR BEARS

See Jules Shear.

JULUKA

See Johnny Clegg & Savuka.

SYLVIA JUNCOSA

See SWA, To Damascus.

JUNGLE BROTHERS

Straight Out the Jungle (Idlers-Warlock-Gee St.) 1988 •

Done by the Forces of Nature (Warner Bros.) 1989 •

Along with their friends De La Soul and A Tribe Called Quest, New York's Jungle Brothers helped liberate rap from the stereotype of the macho aggressor. Like the original JB—James Brown—these JB's are versatile, upbeat and relentlessly funky. Straight Out the Jungle boasts an abundance of loose, swinging jams, including the cheerfully lewd "Jimbrowski," social commentary inspired by Marvin Gaye's "What's Going On" and "I'll House You," an exuberant blend of hip-hop and house.

Done by the Forces of Nature vaults the Jungle Brothers into the major leagues with a heap of soulful energy and some of the warmest, most personable raps on the planet. Anybody who can resist the propulsive momentum of "Beyond This World" and "What 'U' Waitin' 4'?" probably didn't have a pulse to quicken. [jyl]

JUNKYARD

See Dag Nasty.

JUSTIFIED ANCIENTS OF MU MU

1987 (What the Fuck's Going On?) (nr/KLF Comm.) 1987

1987 The JAMS 45 Edits EP (nr/KLF Comm.) 1987

Who Killed the JAMS? (nr/KLF Comm.) 1988

Shag Times EP (nr/KLF Comm.) 1989 •

The History of the JAMS a.k.a. the Timelords (TVT) 1989 •

DISCO 2000

"I Gotta" (nr/KLF Comm.) 1987

"One Love Nation" (nr/KLF Comm.) 1988

"Uptight" (nr/KLF Comm.) 1989

KLF

The What Time Is Love Story (nr/KLF Comm.) 1990 •

Chill Out (nr/KLF Comm.) 1990 (Wax Trax!) 1991 •

The White Room (Arista) 1991 •

BILL DRUMMOND

The Man (nr/Creation) 1987 (Bar/None-Restless) 1989 •

ORB

A Huge Ever Growing Pulsating Brain That Rules from the Centre of the Ultraworld EP (nr/Wau! Mr Modo) 1989

Adventures Beyond the Ultraworld (Mercury) 1991 •

SPACE

Space (nr/Space-KLF Comm.) 1990 •

With synthesizers, sampling and the dominance of dance helping to pry the skeletal fingers of basic values—old-farty things like melody, lyrics and originality—from their traditional vise grip on popular music, the world is wide open for such high-concept jokers as Bill Drummond. Although America has largely been spared his mischievous machinations, the UK has been spared Drummond's lab, a proving ground for a series of colorful sonic marketing experiments, one of which topped the singles charts in 1988.

Born in Scotland but arriving in the music biz via the 1977 Liverpool scene, Drummond was a founding member of Big in Japan, launched the Zoo label with Dave Balfe and then became the manager of Echo and the Bunnymen and the Teardrop Explodes. (He was largely responsible for some of the more outlandish escapades of the former and was celebrated in song by Julian Cope of the latter.) Later, as an A&R man, he worked with Youth's wretched Brilliant, a mid-'80s group whose lasting cultural significance amounts to its inclusion of ex-Zodiac Mindwarp keyboardist/guitarist Jimmy Cauty, with whom Drummond concocted the Justified Ancients of Mu Mu (JAMS) and launched a label, Kopyright Liberation Front (KLF).

Rapping and shouting inspired nonsense in exaggerated Scottish accents over a diverse collection of stolen artifacts (from Queen to Led Zeppelin to Dave Brubeck), the JAMS—billing themselves as King Boy D and Rockman—pasted together the energetic 1987, a loopy dance album that isn't unlike a lot of sampled records, but proceeds from an entirely different cultural understanding. As the JAMS neglected to obtain any clearances, however, the LP was promptly sued out of circulation by Abba's attorneys. (After its commercial withdrawal and destruction, a re-edited 1987 EP—with all of the illicit borrowings unceremoniously deleted—was offered to consumers in exchange for their original copies of what had become, in a stroke, an unbelievably valuable collector's item.)

Who Killed the JAMS? offers more of the same post-hip-hop fun, pumping up Eurobeat with bites from your favorite records—Hendrix's "Foxy Lady," Sly Stone's "Dance to the Music," etc.—thrown in wholesale. At times using relevant sound bites to answer a spoken remark (as in Dickie Goodman cut-in records), the LP merrily pisses on itself but reveals a viciously self-serving and proto-racist outlook in "King Boy's Dream," a short rap delivered over an insane hacking-cough-and-finger-pop percussion track: "I ain't no B-boy/I hate that shit/Those golden chains and Def Jam hype." In other words, it's okay for me to copy the work (both conceptually and literally) of African-Americans, but don't mix me up with that culture.

The History of the JAMS expands the six-track Shag Times compilation by two items. Both versions contain three of the group's 1987 singles (the non-Beatlesque "All You Need Is Love," the Houstonized "Whitney Joins the JAMS" and the Petula Clark-based gospel "Downtown") plus "Don't Take Five (Take What You Want)" from the first LP and two cuts ("Candyman" and the Sly-stolen "Burn the Bastards," retitled "Burn the Beat" on the US record) from the second. To that, History adds "Porpoise Song" (a Donna Summer jam from Who Killed the JAMS?) and "Doctorin' the Tardis," a genuine (if inexplicable) UK summer-of-'88 chart-topper—the title and lyrics refer to the Doctor Who TV program—stitched together from glam-rock classics by Gary Glitter and the Sweet and released under the Timelords pseudonym. Typical of the duo's penchant for self-amusement, they celebrated their victory with a DIY book entitled The Manual (How to Have a Number One the Easy Way).

Abandoning one guise (but retaining Disco 2000, the entity responsible for an entertaining 1989 45 of Stevie Wonder's "Uptight" that sounds like Bananarama on a rap tip), Drummond and Cauty became the KLF and released—in numerous mixes—a fairly straightforward house record, "What Time Is Love?" Elevating what is barely a song to absurd heights, The What Time Is Love Story is ostensibly a collection of "cover versions and soundalikes." In the meantime, the KLF had already moved away from such thumping and kineticism and were claiming preeminence in the absurdly named ambient house field with Chill Out, a 50-minute snooze of slowly alternating organ chords over which Fleetwood Mac, radio news reports, Elvis Presley, a steel guitar (etc.) are gently laid. Sounding like nothing so much as an accidental recording of 1970 Pink Floyd sessions during which all the participants have either left or fallen asleep, it's a dull joke with no punchline, and lacks any trace of original musical merit.

Continuing to explore spacey trance music, Cauty formed the Orb, a side band with Alex Patterson, and began recording an Orb album. The duo managed to release one excellently titled crap EP before splitting; the disc (billed as "ambient house for the E generation") contains one endless side-long mixture of water noises and some incidental bits of Minnie Riperton's "Lovin' You" (damn, wish I still had my Tangerine Dream LPs!) and two shorter versions thereof, both with prominent drum beats. (After the Orb partnership ended, Cauty reportedly erased Patterson's tracks and finished the work-in-progress on his own, releasing it under the Space moniker.)

On a completely different note, Drummond's solo album is a tastefully understated country-rock collection of original songs with backing from, among others, nearly all of the Triffids and the Voice of the Beehive. Although the Man's vocals and melodic sense both fall somewhat short of good, his confidence and clever lyrical wit makes a good go of the sarcastic "Julian Cope Is Dead" (a very belated answer to Cope's "Bill Drummond Said"), "Ballad for a Sex God" and the pseudo-sappy autobiography of "I Believe in Rock & Roll." In addition, the exuberant "I'm the King of Joy" puts a Scottish accent to Jonathan Richman-like folk pop and winds up the album's easy highlight. [1]

See also Big in Japan, Julian Cope, Zodiac Mindwarp and the Love Reaction, Youth & Ben Watkins.

K K K K K K K

HENRY KAISER

Studio Solo (Metallanguage) 1981
 It's a Wonderful Life (Metallanguage) 1984
 Marrying for Money (Ger. Minor Music) 1986
 Devil in the Drain (SST) 1987
 Those Who Know History Are Doomed to Repeat It (SST) 1988 •

Re-Marrying for Money (SST) 1988 ◊
 Hope You Like Our New Direction (Reckless) 1991 •

HENRY KAISER BAND

Heart's Desire (Reckless) 1990 •

FRED FRITH & HENRY KAISER

With Friends Like These (Metallanguage) 1979
 Who Needs Enemies? (Metallanguage) 1983
 With Enemies Like These, Who Needs Friends? [CD] (SST) 1987 •

FRENCH, FRITH, KAISER, THOMPSON

Live, Love, Larf & Loaf (Rhino) 1987 •
 Invisible Means (Windham Hill) 1990 •

CRAZY BACKWARDS ALPHABET

Crazy Backwards Alphabet (SST) 1987

HENRY KAISER AND SERGEI KURIOKHIN

Popular Science (Rykodisc) 1989 ◊

If you're in the market for a brilliant postmodern guitar hero, you could do a whole lot worse than Henry Kaiser. This Bay Area diver/filmmaker/musician has appeared on more than 50 records since the early '70s, ranging from total improvisations to jazz to experimental and progressive rock. While augmenting his flawless techniques with a wide array of electronic effects, Kaiser has familiarized himself with the ethnic musics of Southeast Asia, India and Japan, yet recently cited Jerry Garcia as a personal guitar fave.

Studio Solo and It's a Wonderful Life are solo LPs that find Kaiser building dazzling architechtonic solos, from ghostly and ghastly textures to cartoonlike goofs to disjointed bluegrass, blues and jazz constructions. The key to Kaiser's strategy is never to play the same thing twice, making his records and solos endlessly listenable.

Kaiser adds a Synclavier to the mix on Devil in the Drain, allowing him to record impossible lines and create otherworldly textures. The title track is built around a hilarious text by children's writer Daniel Pinkwater.

Kaiser wails in a power-trio format on Re-Marrying for Money (an expanded reissue of the German Marrying for Money), where he's supported by Hilary (bass) and John (drums) Hanes (who were once the mainstays of Pearl Harbor and the Explosions), both subsequently of the Henry Kaiser Band. John Abercrombie, Bruce Anderson (of MX-80 Sound) and Glenn Phillips join them for a series of improvised electrified raveups (including Cream's "I'm So Glad").

Kaiser returns to his roots on Those Who Know History, which includes a side-long version of the Grateful Dead classic "Dark Star" (integrating other Dead hits) as well as "Ode to Billie Joe" and the theme from The Andy Griffith Show. But this record doesn't hold a candle to the Henry Kaiser Band's live gigs. A particularly exceptional night (actually, two) is documented on Heart's Desire, a program made up mainly of covers that stretch from the Band to Stockhausen. Bruce Anderson and original Dead keyboardist Tom Constanten help make this one of the greatest and hippest live bands you never heard. (The CD has fewer selections than the double album, but each contains some different renditions of the same songs.)

With Enemies Like These, Who Needs Friends? contains heretofore unreleased improvised live performances by Kaiser and former Henry Cow guitarist Fred Frith, along with some gems from their two previous duo albums. The two plonk, bang and drone around on guitars, keyboards, violin and a particularly volatile (electronic) set of Linndrums. Equally loose and difficult are the duets with Russian Synclavierist Sergei Kuriokhin on Popular Science. Kaiser gooses the Synclavier himself on this disc, which is divided pretty equally into duets and solo excursions.

Kaiser revisits '70s progressive rock on Crazy Backwards Alphabet, his not-entirely successful link-up with amazing drummer John French (formerly Drumbo of Captain Beefheart's Magic Band), the hockey-influenced Swedish drummer/vocalist Michael Maksymenko and ex-Dixie Dregs bassist Andy West. Gnarly instrumentals are unfortunately forced to share space with distracting vocals.

Live, Love, Larf & Loaf is a much more pleasant supergrouping in which Kaiser, French and Frith (on bass) are joined by British folk-rock guitar wiz Richard Thompson. The LP combines excellent post-Beefheart compositions by French with Thompson's acid-etched Anglo-mysticism and a remarkable Okinawan pop song, "Hai Sai Oji-San." This is eclecticism at its finest. Unfortunately, the second episode, Invisible Means, sounds incomplete, like a joke that doesn't come off. (Although, considering the releasing label, perhaps it did.) Far from unlistenable, with the odd magnificent moment, the record is just spotty. [rg]

See also Fred Frith.

HARRY KAKOULLI

See Squeeze.

BIG DADDY KANE

Long Live the Kane (Cold Chillin'-Warner Bros.) 1988 •
It's a Big Daddy Thing (Cold Chillin'-Reprise) 1989 •
Taste of Chocolate (Cold Chillin'-Reprise) 1990 •

A pivotal figure in one sphere of the mid-'80s rap scene, Brooklyn's Big Daddy Kane (Antonio Hardy) is the quintessential smooth operator, an influential party MC (and would-be '70s soul crooner) with a convincing hard-edged style and an inconsistent, occasionally dismal, lyrical outlook. Produced by Marley Marl, Long Live the Kane lists the gold-wearing ladykiller's many talents and achievements with more skill than wit and includes an entertaining goof with longtime associate Biz Markie as well as an ill-advised stab at singing ("The Day You're Mine"). Showing a taste for topicality, Kane delves into Muslim Afrocentricity in "Word to the Mother(land)" and paints a utopian fantasy (in "I'll Take You There") where crime, welfare and crack are unknown, but "fresh Gucci wear is only $5.99!"

Announcing "I Get the Job Done," Kane demonstrates his fiery power on the masterful It's a Big Daddy Thing. When he's not engaging in raw boasts and put-downs (some of which recycle rhymes from the first LP), Kane's raps attack racism and self-destruction, promote pride and celebrate the next generation (in the reggae-styled "Children R the Future"). The smug playboy jive of "On the Move" is easy to ignore, but the crude sex tales of "Pimpin' Ain't Easy" (complete with a gratuitous expression of anti-gay hatred) is a pernicious development in Kane's repertoire.

Taking advantage of stardom's perks, Kane built some inter-generational bridges on Taste of Chocolate. Barry White ("All of Me") and Rudy Ray Moore ("Big Daddy vs. Dolemite") guest on the mellow-sounding LP, an intelligently mature triumph which switches easily from sex-machine egotism and gauzy romantic soul to incisively astute and realistic street politics (like "Dance with the Devil" and the surprisingly poppy "Who Am I," co-written and rapped with Gamilah Shabazz). Typical of Kane's newly raised consciousness, "No Damn Good" sounds misogynist, but only disses women who don't respect themselves. [i]

MICK KARN

See Japan, Peter Murphy.

EDWARD KA-SPEL

See Legendary Pink Dots, Skinny Puppy.

KATRINA AND THE WAVES

Walking on Sunshine (Can. Atic) 1983
Katrina and the Waves 2 (Can. Atic) 1984
Katrina and the Waves (Capitol) 1985 •
Waves (Capitol) 1985 •
Break of Hearts (SBK) 1989 •

KIMBERLEY REW

The Bible of Bop (Press) 1982

WAVES

Shock Horror! (nr/Aftermath) 1983

Like ex-bandmate Robyn Hitchcock, Kimberley Rew survived the end of the Soft Boys to take further forays into melodious '60s folk-rock and psychedelia, as the eight tracks (seven previously released) on his 1982 solo release prove. Working with the dB's, ex-Soft Boys and a new group called the Waves, Rew doesn't pursue weirdness as avidly as Hitchcock does, but the singer/guitarist/keyboardist has a neat winner with The Bible of Bop.

Rew and the Waves subsequently became a fulltime proposition, a sympathetic and commercially potent outlet for his ace songwriting. The Anglo-American quartet's other major asset is singer/guitarist Katrina Leskanich, a Kansas native with a strong, flexible voice equally suited for full-tilt pop harmonies and belt-it-out rock'n'roll. The band melds a diverse collection of styles, personalities and ethnic backgrounds.

The low-budget Shock Horror! contains early versions of eight songs, only a few of which have since surfaced on the band's albums. "Strolling on Air," cut with a former bassist, is an especially rich find; the other tunes (except for an MC5-ish raver, "Atomic Rock'n'Roll") are typically engaging but not particularly well recorded. Interesting and certainly no embarrassment.

Walking on Sunshine contains such absolutely brilliant songs as "Going Down to Liverpool" (cleverly covered by the Bangles, who could spot a tune worth singing) and the infectious title track. Guarantee: hear this record once and you'll find yourself humming at least one track from it a week later. It flows magnificently from start to end, and subsumes individual accomplishments into a true group effort. A greatest hits album the first time out.

KATW 2 takes a harder-rocking bent, downplaying the tunefulness slightly to highlight jumping numbers like "She Likes to Groove," the nutty "Maniac House" and a powerful, Janis Joplin-like blues, "Cry for Me." Pointing up the band's only weakness, the lyrics to "Mexico" (written by bassist Vince de la Cruz) don't achieve much in the way of profundity; the soaring vocals and ethnic-flavored simplicity, however, make that a strictly academic problem. Other great tracks: "Red Wine and Whisky" and "The Game of Love." Not as glorious as the debut, but a boss record nonetheless.

Katrina and the Waves consists entirely of songs from the first two albums, but they've all been re-recorded or remixed. In most cases, it's an improvement, exposing untapped realms of both pop and power, but the second "Going Down to Liverpool" obliterates the atmosphere and the hooky melody of the original in an absurdly overheated arrangement. With that one caveat, Katrina and the Waves is otherwise a delight.

Evidencing mild signs of commercial selfconsciousness, Waves isn't as charming, although several of the tunes boast all the attributes that make the band so appealing. Foamy Hammond organ, prominent in spots, matches Leskanich's newly soul-ized singing to push the group towards a Stax sound. Although the songs (only two of them by Rew, previously the band's main writer) aren't as memorable, they're solid enough to make this a reasonably pleasing record.

Break of Hearts is a horrendously wrongheaded comeback bid that shows the Waves to be utterly oblivious to their own strengths. With the exceptions of the peppy Tex-Mex-style "Rock'n Roll Girl" and the Cheap Trickish pop-metal "Rock Myself to Sleep," it's bland, overprocessed commercial slop, with Katrina (who sports a metal-chick makeover on the album cover) shrilly belting over characterless backing tracks. And the Waves have no one but themselves to blame for this disaster, since they get the production credit.

See also Soft Boys. [i/hd]

KATYDIDS

Katyids (Reprise) 1990 •

As produced by Nick Lowe, this London quintet's fine debut mixes its pop metaphors and age sensibilities in generally delightful fashion. The perky adolescent songs ("Stop Start," "Heavy Weather Traffic," "Lights Out (Read My Lips)," "Dr. Rey") layer American-born Susie Hug's pretty voice (with harmonies by co-writer/guitarist Adam Seymour, a veteran jingle singer; the pair met at a Big Bam Boo session) into Bangesque allure over the band's tastefully brisk backing. When the group delves into more mature rock ("Miss Misery"), folk-rock ("Chains of Devotion") and country ("What Will the Angels Say?," its melody evidently cribbed from early Elvis Costello), however, she sings with less of an edge. [i]

IAN KEAREY + GERARD LANGLEY

See Blue Aeroplanes.

TOMMY KEENE

Strange Alliance (Avenue) 1982

Back Again (Try . . .) EP (Dolphin) 1984

Places That Are Gone EP (Dolphin) 1984

Songs from the Film (Geffen) 1986

Run Now EP (Geffen) 1986

Based on Happy Times (Geffen) 1989 •

As the jacket blurb on Strange Alliance attests, Keene's music does bear some superficial resemblance to the Only Ones and early U2, though without their depth or charisma. (Audible influences also include the Beatles and the Byrds.) The first album contains eight immediately likable, if melancholic, tunes, every one a winner. (A later pressing adds a subsequent single.) Keene's reedy voice, chiming, arpeggiated guitar chords and occasional piano make for a lightweight but appealing blend. On all of the records through Run Now, two of Keene's former bandmates from Washington, DC's Razz accompany him on bass and drums.

Back Again (Try . . .) offers two cool covers, recorded live at the Rat in Boston, and two studio originals. Roxy Music's "All I Want Is You"—why didn't anyone think of doing that sooner?—and the Stones' "When the Whip Comes Down" show Keene's rock-'n-roll abilities, while the title track and "Safe in the Light" are in more of a Tom Petty power pop vein, and quite striking at that. Places That Are Gone mixes five originals with Alex Chilton's "Hey! Little Child." All of the memorable melodies are underscored by strong vocal harmonies, yet the delivery retains a gutsy, even abrasive, edge.

Finally signed to a major label, Keene hooked up with producer Geoff Emerick (Badfinger, Split Enz, Nick Heyward) to make Songs from the Film, a further refinement of his virtues with occasionally more substantial lyrics. The standout is a different version of "Places That Are Gone," but the new compositions are good and sturdy in their own right. The sole non-original is a weirdly "normal" version of Lou Reed's "Kill Your Sons."

Run Now adds another enjoyable chapter to the Keene canon, despite the occasional unease in what he says and the way that he says it ("I Don't Feel Right at All") The closest to a dud is the commercial title track, which is not offensive, just inconsequential. (That number was produced by Bob Clearmountain; the rest was overseen by the team of T-Bone Burnett and Don Dixon.) The EP's closer is a good live version of "Kill Your Sons."

The growing tension and melancholy in Keene's lyrics belies the melodic power and contagiously confident sound of Based on Happy Times, an excellent, overcast album that alternately resembles Pleased to Meet Me-era Replacements and the darker side of Let's Active. Keene's songwriting (with some assistance from Jules Shear) has never been better; the playing and production (by bassist Joe Hardy, drummer John Hampton and Keene) is spot-on, except for the strings that intrude in several arrangements. Pete Buck guests on a pair of tunes, including the record's sole stinker: an unpleasantly bluesy cover of the Beach Boys' "Our Car Club." [jg/A]

KIRK KELLY

Go Man Go (SST) 1988 •

Affected enough to drop his g's but too self-conscious to omit the resulting apostrophes in his liner notes, earnest neo-folkie Kirk Kelly gives his Robert Zimmerman fixation (with a side order, on "Heroes of Tomorrow," of Phil Ochs) a full airing on Go Man Go. This solipsistic one-man (two, if you count producer Brian Ritchie's bass contribution to one song) acoustic album is so derivative of Bob Dylan (etc.) that maybe A.J. Weberman should consider rooting through Kelly's trash. [i]

PAUL KELLY AND THE DOTS

Talk (Aus. Mushroom) 1981

Manila (Aus. Mushroom) 1982

PAUL KELLY

Post (Aus. White Label) 1985

PAUL KELLY & THE MESSENGERS

Gossip (Aus. Mushroom) 1987 (A&M) 1987 •

Under the Sun (A&M) 1988 •

So Much Water So Close to Home (A&M) 1989 •

After releasing three Australian albums in the early '80s, Adelaide's Paul Kelly put together a quartet called the Coloured Girls (wisely billed as the Messengers in the US; the international dichotomy was later resolved by dumping the original moniker entirely). Originally a 24-song double album back home, Gossip arrived in America as a fifteen-track single disc (the CD has two more). In any case, the LP reveals Kelly to be an expressive if limited singer and an extraordinary songwriter, with an especially keen eye for lyrical detail and a wide-ranging catalogue of musical influences in his stylistic arsenal. Perhaps the best comparison is to early Graham Parker, although Kelly leans more towards folk, blues and some pop in place of Parker's preference for country and R&B. Gossip has plenty of local color, but the pain at the root of most of these songs is universal.

Under the Sun rocks a bit harder, though its production is equally lean and minimal. What stands out are the songs, beautifully realized stories put to record. Kelly's got the rare ability to introduce detailed characters and substantial scenarios in three minutes. Check out "To Her Door," "Don't Stand So Close to the Window" (or, for that matter, any track here) for proof. (Again, the US and Australian editions differ.)

Kelly recorded his next album in America, working with R.E.M. producer Scott Litt. So Much Water So Close to Home (the title comes from a Raymond Carver short story that Kelly condenses into the album's most chilling song) finds the singer/guitarist at his most subdued and thoughtful, although "Sweet Guy" and "No You" are two of his most vicious rockers yet. It's the first album he's done that's "produced" in any sense (he even allows a bit of reverb on some of his vocals), and also his least Australian, although "Pigeon/Jundamurra" is based on the true story of an Aboriginal freedom fighter. [ds]

KLARK KENT

See Stewart Copeland.

JACK KETCH AND THE CROWMEN

See Thee Mighty Caesars.

KID CREOLE AND THE COCONUTS

Off the Coast of Me (ZE) 1980
Fresh Fruit in Foreign Places (ZE-Sire) 1981
Wise Guy (ZE-Sire) 1982
Tropical Gangsters (nr/ZE-Island) 1982 ●
Doppelganger (ZE-Sire) 1983
Cre-Ole: The Best of Kid Creole and the Coconuts (nr/ZE-Island) 1984 + 1990 ●
In Praise of Older Women and Other Crimes (Sire) 1985
I, Too, Have Seen the Woods (Sire) 1987 ●
Private Waters in the Great Divide (Columbia) 1990 ◊

COCONUTS

Don't Take My Coconuts (EMI America) 1983

COATI MUNDI

The Former Twelve Year Old Genius (nr/Virgin) 1983
 In an interview, black Bronxite August "Kid Creole" Darnell—writer, singer, producer—once alluded to not being able to play reggae as well as Bob Marley or salsa as well as Tito Puente, but possibly being able to combine the two styles better than anyone else. Darnell's internationalist fusion was one of the freshest new sounds of the '80s, drawing together strains of Latin, reggae, calypso, disco, rap and rock into a unique sound. Add to his vision and smarts an amiable partner in "Sugar Coated" Andy Hernandez (aka Coati Mundi), the singing/dancing Coconuts and a medley of talented sidepeople, and you have one of the most formidable bands around.

Off the Coast of Me introduces Darnell and company's unusual sound (more Latin-tinged here than on later records). Although the material isn't strong enough to make this more than adequate, its uniqueness and danceability, along with the Kid's occasionally risqué wordplay, are enough to suggest the band's potential.

Launching a conceptual album trilogy, Fresh Fruit in Foreign Places stands as Kid Creole's tour de force, a musical odyssey in which the Kid and the Coconuts set off from New York in search of the elusive Mimi. The flavor of the music changes with each stop on the journey, providing a perfect setting for the band to display its mastery of intercontinental bop. Each cut is an adventure, and the album works as well as any rock concept LP. A major achievement.

After the perfect realization of Fresh Fruit, nearly anything would have been a letdown. Wise Guy (entitled Tropical Gangsters outside the US) follows the concept, but much more loosely. The material is far less adventurous, with Fresh Fruit's wonderful diversity toned down in favor of a straighter dance music approach. As a commercial move it worked, at least in Europe, where two tracks ("Stool Pigeon" and "I'm a Wonderful Thing, Baby") became hit singles and elevated Darnell to stardom.

Doppelganger is posited as the continuation of "the saga." In this installment, the Kid is cloned by King Nignat's evil scientist. The songs don't all move the story along in narrative fashion—they sound more like the disjunct score of a Broadway musical—but that's fine, since each stands as a marvelous example of Darnell's multifarious brilliance. Mixing '40s be-bop with Carib-beat, reggae, country, funk, salsa and something like highlife, the record sparkles with a cover of "If You Wanna Be Happy" (a 1966 American hit for the Jimmy Castor bunch as "Hey Leroy") as well as such original frolics as "The Lifeboat Party" and "Bongo Eddie's Lament." Sung partially in Spanish, "Survivors" laments the death of rockers from Frankie Lyman to Sid Vicious.

In Praise of Older Women, while less spectacular, is still another (ca)rousing success, a collection of wittily written, sublimely arranged, energetically performed songs. "Endicott" (cleverly verbose), "Caroline Was a Drop-Out" (a nasty character study), "Particul'y Int'rested" (exaggerated, showy torch song)—to name but three—all reflect the Kid's wonderful attitude and outlook. With Coati Mundi and the Coconuts, plus a stageful of sidemen, King ("self-appointed in Feb. this year") Creole demonstrates his stylistic transcendence by making every track different but identifiable; no longer a mere genre dabbler, he's developed the Kid Creole format.

On I, Too, Have Seen the Woods, Darnell seems to be treading water a bit within that format. Although he introduces female singer Haitia Fuller to share lead vocals with him, her overall impact is fairly negligible. As always, there are some very good tunes (especially "Dancin' at the Bains Douches" and "Call It a Day"); Darnell's words are typically clever and insightful. On the whole, though, the music seems less innovative, succumbing to repetition of previously charted lands. (Hernandez's "El Hijo" is a near carbon-copy of his 1980 dance hit "Me No Pop I.") Good, but hardly top-notch.

Showing tons more imagination and inspiration, Darnell bounced back to full artistic strength with the marvelously entertaining Private Waters in the Great Divide, a diverse party of singular wit and intelligence. While the lyrics of songs like "(No More) Casual Sex" and "He's Takin' the Rap" demonstrate an awareness of changing times, the music still comes in time-warped from a tropical dance-happy era somewhere around 1940; the only track that even acknowledges rap bends it all out of shape. (How many other hip dance records released in 1990 can claim such stylistic nonconformity?) There is a reggae-styled love song, however, a surf-pop harmony exhibition and "Lambada," the intent and irony of which is unclear. Mundi is only a minor player here (Darnell acknowledges his departure in the self-referential "Funky Audrey and the Coconut Rag," which Hernandez co-wrote), but the Coconuts are in full effect, providing a campy foil in such fizzy delights as "Laughing with Our Backs Against the Wall" and "Funky Audrey." Not a bad banana in this bunch.

The UK-only Cre-Ole compilation includes all the band's 1981-'83 British hits (and then some), with such classic Darnellisms as "Stool Pigeon," "I'm a Wonderful Thing, Baby" and "Annie, I'm Not Your Daddy," as well as "Me No Pop I."

The Coconuts' solo album, produced by Darnell to resemble a stage revue (complete with crowd sounds and stage introductions), is rife with innuendo and apparent interecine squabbling. Despite the billing, Darnell sings the introductory title track without the three ladies; the inclusion of "If I Only Had a Brain" (from Wizard of Oz) might be someone's idea of an editorial comment. Otherwise, it's a typically rich, clever dance-funk-Carib-salsa-tango stew, and the Coconuts' smooth harmony vocals are as appealing as ever.

Coati Mundi has done some odd musical projects in his time (including a production job for Germany's Palais Schaumburg!), and the singing vibraphone/keyboard player's solo album is no less idiosyncratic in lyrical outlook. In addition to the clever title reference to Stevie Wonder, the irrepressibly funny Hernandez also parodies "Grand Master Flush and the Fluffy Five" and "Kurtis Bluff" on the rap jape "Everybody's on an Ego Trip." While the album cleverly—and occasionally buoyantly—mixes soul, salsa and disco, it also suffers from Hernandez's simply trying too hard. [ds/i/jy]

KID FROST

Hispanic Causing Panic (Virgin) 1990 •

The Chicano hip-hop translation by Kid Frost (Arturo Molina Jr.) involves more than dropping Spanish. Although some of the tracks on Hispanic Causing Panic are nearly generic, the LA rapper brings his own positive cultural identity to such outstanding tracks as "La Raza," "Hold Your Own," "In the City" and "Homicide." Using a perilous bass-heavy sound and sparing percussion accents (with such added ingredients as sax, metal guitar and harmonica), Kid

Frost cuts a distinctive figure, making Hispanic not just a fine album, but a significant cultural development. [i]

KID 'N PLAY

2 Hype (Select) 1988 •

Kid 'n Play's Funhouse (Select) 1990 •

VARIOUS ARTISTS

House Party Soundtrack (Motown) 1990 •

Along with DJ Jazzy Jeff and the Fresh Prince, New York's Kid 'n Play are among the best of the lite rappers, middle-class performers whose pursuit of pop stardom doesn't preclude exciting grooves. Christopher Reid (Kid)—he of the towering fade—and Christopher Martin (Play) concentrate on shameless self-promotion, but brag with such frisky good humor that it's hard to object. And the quick interplay of these two wise guys simulates a live feel missing from much contemporary rap. 2 Hype features the snappy "Rollin' with Kid 'n Play" and "Undercover," a cheatin' morality tale guest-starring the Real Roxanne. Funhouse has the explosive "Energy," perhaps the guys' best yet, and the title track, also spotlighted in their delightful feature film House Party. The soundtrack includes boss tracks by Public Enemy ("Can't Do Nuttin' for Ya Man"), L.L. Cool J, Full Force and other fine folks. [ij]

STEVE KILBEY

See Church, Hex.

KILBURN AND THE HIGH ROADS

Handsome (nr/Dawn) 1975 (nr/Pye) 1977 (nr/Sequel) 1990 •

Wotabunch! (nr/Warner Bros.) 1978

Uprminster Kids (nr/PRT) 1983

Although new wave was still two years away, the London music scene of 1975 wasn't all Queen and the Rolling Stones; pub-rock bands were making fresh and exciting music, laying the groundwork for more radical outfits to follow. Some included musicians whose skills came in very handy when the dam broke in 1977; Kilburn and the High Roads, named after a highway sign, included Ian Dury, saxman Davey Payne (a future Blockhead) and Keith Lucas, who changed his name to Nick Cash and helped found the group 999. During a commercially frustrating career that lasted from 1970 to 1976, the Kilburns were cult-popular and influential. Their records serve as neat reminders of a wonderful band.

An album cut in 1974 was shelved due to record company politics; the band's debut was in fact their second recording. (That first LP, Wotabunch!, was dredged up and finally released once Dury's solo career took off.) The subsequently recorded Handsome contains much of the same material (co-written by Dury with pianist Russell Hardy) that the group had used the first time. Got that?

Handsome is musically low-key, featuring Dury's clever Cockney wordplay and a bit of high-powered blowing from Payne, but it leans overly towards understatement, touching on rockin' '50s styles and dapper '40s lounge subtlety to make it a generally debonair record not above some raving. Upminster Kids is a reissue of Handsome with several tracks deleted. [i] See also Ian Dury, 999.

KILKENNY CATS

Hands Down (Coyote-Twin/Tone) 1986
Hammer EP (Texas Hotel) 1988

The ascendancy of R.E.M. created a major band boom in Athens, Georgia, but some of the resulting combos would have been best left within the privacy of the members' imaginations. Kilkenny Cats, for example, put their R.E.M. influences to good use on the A-side of a 1984 single, "Attractive Figure," where singer Tom Cheek's highly derivative mumbling was interspersed with a buzzy guitar melody. Hands Down attempted to incorporate a metal feel, but the quintet's two guitars are about as thick as paper; the bigger problem is that Cheek seems to be laboring under the art-hippie assumption that a bunch of unconnected images strung together makes a song. Even the album's prettiest moment, "Morning Song," is simply R.E.M.'s "Gardening at Night" twelve hours later. The six-song Hammer EP, performed by a one-guitarist quartet, is marginally less tedious. [kss]

KILLDOZER

Intellectuals Are the Shoeshine Boys of the Ruling Elite (Bone Air) 1984 (Bone Air-Touch and Go) 1989 •
Snakeboy (Touch and Go) 1985 •
Burl EP (Touch and Go) 1986
Little Baby Buntin' (Touch and Go) 1987 •
12 Point Buck (Touch and Go) 1988 •
For Ladies Only (Touch and Go) 1989 + 1990 •

This Madison, Wisconsin trio would have you believe that they're truly moonshine-swalling, small mammal-torturing dudes who do a whole lot more than just kiss their cousins—and they back it up with one of the most twisted (not to mention influential) sounds since the days of field recording. Imagine the most primitive country blues you've heard impaled on shards of Birthday Party distortion. Sure, they're hicks from the wrong side of the tracks—in one of the few American burgs to have fallen under Socialist rule this half-century. The resultant (uneasy) mix of brawn and brains makes Killdozer as likely to quote Ed Gein as Voltaire—and do both with a smirk.

Intellectuals owes quite a bit to the shadowy swamp tales of Creedence Clearwater Revival (more than just the cover of "Run Through the Jungle"); singer/bassist Michael Gerald's spookily incisive, virulent invective is riveting. When he's picking at his own psychic scabs (as on "A Man's Gotta Be a Man to Be a Man"), it's hard not to shudder with empathy. When he's tugging at someone else's, though, the desire to slap him is overwhelming. Fortunately, the former situation prevails by a large measure. Key line: "If there's one thing in this world I cannot understand, it's that there's so many things I cannot understand."

Snakeboy all but bursts with those things. In an abdomen-emptying growl midway between Howlin'

Wolf and Leonard Cohen, Gerald bellows tense monologues from radically diverse points of view; children being torn away from dead mothers give way to swagging sex prowlers (like the, er, protagonist or "King of Sex"). The album's crawling trek through the lives of folks who could never have been contenders (and know it) is reminiscent of prime Cave, but the ever-present danger of seeming overwrought is neatly avoided by secreting a laugh—in this case a parodic version of Neil Young's "Cinnamon Girl"—in some dark corner. On Burl, which is otherwise loaded with electro-shock folk songs all about murder, deception and plagues in the best pre-Woody Guthrie tradition, the gut-buster is, coincidentally, again a cover (Jessi Colter's "I'm Not Lisa").

Little Baby Buntin' (which might as well be subtitled More Songs About Building Collapses and Castration) travels much the same terrain, only at much slower speed. That's a plus, because Killdozer is more effective when lumbering along slowly enough to make novices check the power supply. With Bill Hobson's fractured guitar barrages bisecting Gerald's fat, anaconda-like basslines, 12 Point Buck is the best sounding Killdozer record. The shtick, however, has seen better days.

Issued as a boxed set of singles before being reincarnated as an LP, For Ladies Only collects Killdozer's agribusiness/performance-art interpretations of a passel of Have a Nice Day-quality (if not exactly era) Top 40 hits (including "American Pie" and "Hush") in much the same way a thoughtless child would collect butterflies—swooping down and pinning their flapping wings, allowing the hapless victims to tear themselves apart. Versions of "Funk #49" (James Gang), "Good Lovin' Gone Bad" (Bad Company) and even "One Tin Soldier" (from Billy Jack) are neither pisstakes nor homages; these guys don't hate or love the songs, they simply act as though they'd written 'em. Intellectuals and Snakeboy are packaged on one CD; Buntin' and 12 Point Buck are on another. [dss]

KILLDOZER 85

See Sharky's Machine.

KILLING JOKE

Almost Red EP (nr/Malicious Damage) 1979 (nr/Island)
1981 (EG) 1990 •
Killing Joke (EG) 1980 •
what's THIS for...! (EG) 1981 •
Revelations (Malicious Damage-EG) 1982 •
Birds of a Feather EP (Malicious Damage-EG) 1982
"Ha" EP (Malicious Damage-EG) 1982
Fire Dances (EG) 1983 •
Night Time (EG) 1985 •
Brighter Than a Thousand Suns (EG-Virgin) 1986 •
Outside the Gate (EG) 1988 •
The Courtald Talks (Invisible) 1989
An Incomplete Collection (EG) 1990 •
Extremities, Dirt & Various Repressed Emotions (Noise Int'l-RCA) 1990 •

London's Killing Joke are practitioners of intellectual dance-thrash-rock with a penchant for apocalypse.

Originally something like Birthday Party but more restrained and rhythmic, singer/keyboardsist Jaz Coleman, bassist Youth (Martin Glover), guitarist Geordie and drummer Paul Ferguson launched the tumultuous group on its voyage through intense, angry records of striking strength and fringe weirdness.

Killing Joke is an imaginative interface between heavy metal and new wave. With a few synthesizer incursions, the music fields a basic guitar/bass/drums attack, filtered through distortion and tone modulation. Pounding and pulsating at breakneck speed with occasional funk or reggae overtones, the songs ("Wardance," "Tomorrow's World," "Bloodsport") are coldly compelling doomsday anthems.

what's THIS for . . . ! brings funk to ambient music, implying feeling sublimated in a chaotic world. The retreat from empathy and communication doesn't prevent inventive guitar work that hides steady, rhythmic alterations against repetitious, thumping drums—the postmodern dance. (The first two albums were later paired on a double-play cassette.)

Revelations returns to the brutal stride of Killing Joke, racing atonally towards total collapse, social and otherwise. Conny Plank's co-production hinders the sound, trying to normalize the enchanting wrongness of the group. Perhaps expecting the end of the world, Coleman and Geordie vanished to Iceland before the album was released and worked with bands there, notably Theyr.

Birds of a Feather, the first release after the band's traumatic reorganization, showcases a more accessible Killing Joke, less shrill and more tuneful, yet retaining all of the manic depression. The 10-inch "Ha" was recorded live in Toronto, proving that this is a trend, not a fluke. Both boast excellent production by Plank and the band. (A cassette joining "Ha" and Fire Dances was later issued.)

Fire Dances continues in this manner, but with further sonic refinement. "Rejuvenation," "Frenzy" and "Feast of Blaze" all rank with Killing Joke's very best; Fire Dances is a frighteningly solid album. After a sabbatical of nearly two years, Night Time was released in 1985. Still concentrating on sharpening their overbearing presence by incorporating some space amidst the fury, it contains "Love Like Blood," their catchiest number (and biggest UK hit single) yet.

Following another two-year layoff, Killing Joke returned in 1987 with Brighter Than a Thousand Suns, toning down the trademark guitar thunder in favor of synths, a big dancefloor beat and more of the melodicism explored on "Love Like Blood." Fans of the easy nihilism of their earlier efforts will have to be patient and attentive for this one. "Sanity" is a great single; several other cuts are just as good. Although more palatable than ever, the album still packs too much of a wallop to warrant any real sell-out accusations.

The same cannot be said for the abominable Outside the Gate, an obvious attempt at slick commerciality and the Joke's only disposable joke. Gaudy keyboard arrangements swamp the atypically anemic guitar, energy is non-existent and Coleman's lyrical frothings on bombast like "America" seem forced. The band wisely broke up.

When Killing Joke reformed over a year later, there was renewed resolve to recapture the old formula. New drummer Martin Atkins (PIL/Brian Brain/Ministry) provided a visceral shot in the arm, and a 1989 US tour proved they could still write and play new songs as arresting and aggressive as the early classics.

Released on Atkins' label, The Courtald Talks is a lecture given by Jaz and Geordie, a spoken-word aside while the next studio album was gestating. Bassist Paul Raven, who'd replaced Youth after Revelations, re-joined just in time for Extremities, Dirt & Various Repressed Emotions, a whopper of a comeback. Easily one of Killing Joke's finest LPs, it has all the intoxicating intensity and righteous fury absent from Outside the Gate, mated with a modern, Ministry-like feel. The throbbing juggernaut "Money Is Not Our God" and scalding pound of "The Beautiful Dead" are only the tip of a tightly composed musical iceberg, primed by Atkins' powerful drum work and Geordie's scorchingly obtuse chording.

An Incomplete Collection is a boxed set of Killing Joke, what's THIS for . . . !, Revelations, Fire Dances and Night Time. [sg/dgs/gef]

See also Youth & Ben Watkins.

KING

Steps in Time (Epic) 1984

Bitter Sweet (Epic) 1985 •

The 12" Tape [tape] (nr/CBS) 1986

PAUL KING

Joy (Epic) 1987 •

From the ashes of promising rock-ska band the Reluctant Stereotypes, Coventry singer Paul King decided to go for the gold ring with a crass chart-gear quartet he thoughtfully named after himself. Launched in 1983, the colorfully uniformed King (the group) served a noxious, unmelodic pseudo-funk concoction that got an inexplicably favorable response: "Love & Pride" and "Won't You Hold My Hand Now" became hits. Produced (and drummed on) by Richard James Burgess, Steps in Time is filled with alarmingly stupid lyrics, fickle stylistic dabbling, arena-rock attributes and art-school pretensions. Awful.

Bitter Sweet is precisely more of the same. (In fact, the American edition includes "Won't You Hold My Hand Now" for the second time!) Ex-Member Adrian Lillywhite plays the drums, resulting in some improvement in that area, but King (the singer)'s overbearing, tuneless vocals still dominate the band's unpleasant sound. The best thing about this LP is its lyric sheet, which offers no end of unintended giggles. (The 1986 cassette EP collects the 12-inch mixes of King's five best-known singles.)

King's solo career began with Joy, an all-American mock-white-soul album masterminded by one of the acknowledged titans of that dubious genre, Dan Hartman. Dispensing with glam-pop gimmickry, Hartman produced the record with commercial savvy, giving prominent roles to the Uptown Horns and session singers. King wisely curbs his past excesses and gets by on what he has: a mediocre but well-controlled sub-Paul Young voice. The songs are nothing, but at least they're not annoying. [i]

See also Reluctant Stereotypes.

DEE DEE KING

See Ramones.

KING BLANK

See Folk Devils.

KING CRIMSON

Discipline (Warner Bros.) 1981 •

Beat (Warner Bros.) 1982 •

Three of a Perfect Pair (Warner Bros.) 1984 •

The Compact King Crimson (EG) 1987 •

Centered around guitarist extraordinaire Robert Fripp, King Crimson was a seminal band of our time. Formed originally in 1969, the band had, from the outset, pivotal influence on both heavy metal and art-rock. The ever-principled Fripp refused to let Crimson become a dinosaur and broke up the band in 1974, retreating from the tour-album-tour grind to do solo and session work as a self-styled "mobile compact unit." One of his endeavors, the dance-rock oriented League of Gentlemen, spurred Fripp to reincarnate King Crimson at the start of the 1980s. Consisting of guitarist/vocalist Adrian Belew, Chapman Stick/bassist Tony Levin and drummer Bill Bruford (the only pre-split vet other than Fripp), the current (at least recent) Crimson is a cutting-edge patchwork of modern influences: dance music, art-rock, mysticism, minimalism.

Discipline introduces the new cast of characters and displays their attempt at cerebral dance rock; Fripp is at least as interested in touching the mind as the heart. Not really songs, these pieces are unfolding musical sculptures, played with precision and rare imagination, a mostly successful synthesis of ambition, simplicity and Kraftwerkian clarity.

Beat achieves Fripp's long-sought union of mind, soul and body, centering around the anniversary of Jack Kerouac's On the Road. An ode to the beat generation, the album elucidates Crimson's past and purpose, melding Frippertronic tape techniques in equal partnership with Belew's manic physicality. Picking up foreign rhythms and electronic overdubs, the players push their instruments into a new form, akin to fusion and art-rock, but miles beyond either, and beyond description as well.

Three of a Perfect Pair is the most disjunct album in recent memory, from a band that prided itself on carefully matched contradictions. The Left Side sports four of Adrian Belew's poorer songs and a self-derivative instrumental; the flip is nearly all-instrumental, nearly free-form, nearly brilliant. As a bonus, the LP ends with "Larks' Tongues in Aspic Part III," the last in a distinguished series of rhythmically skewed tours de force. Apparently the Frippressive "discipline" that forged the critically acclaimed pop/art synthesis of the first two latter-day Crimson albums is not a permanent condition.

The Compact King Crimson mixes tracks by the group's final incarnation and items from the original band's earliest albums. [sg/mf]

See also Adrian Belew, Robert Fripp, Fripp & Eno.

KING KURT

Ooh Wallah Wallah (nr/Stiff) 1983

Road to Rack & Ruin (Ralph) 1985

Second Album (nr/Stiff) 1986

Last Will and Testicle (GWR-Restless) 1988

Live and Rockin' (nr/Link) 1989

Destination Demoland (nr/Link) 1990

This bunch of British goofballs (originally known as Rockin' Kurt and the Sour Krauts) picks up where novelty songs like "Stranded in the Jungle" and "Alley Oop" left off. They mix big-band R&B-flavored rockabilly with a crazed, comic book mentality and lots of drums. Dave Edmunds produced the boisterous debut LP, which raucously proffers such non-classics as "Bo Diddley Goes East" and "Destination Zulu Land." A bit too formulaic for mega-fun, but a good smirky laugh nonetheless.

KK's Second Album, known semi-officially as Big Cock (thanks to the monstrous rooster on the cover), is great, a wildly out-of-control ride through a half-dozen areas of lighthearted rock'n'roll fun. Side One kicks off with an energetic, distinguished version of Eddie Cochran's "Nervous Breakdown" and ends with an uncredited voice that sounds suspiciously like Nigel Planer (Neil of The Young Ones) lost in a jazzy novelty number called "Billy." "Horatio" recalls the mimitable Tenpole Tudor; "Pumpin' Pistons" leers like a drunk in a strip joint; the horrific thought of there being a "Momma Kurt" is enough to power this greasy R&B number along. (The disc was released in both black and red vinyl; the tape has two extra tunes.)

Road to Rack & Ruin is an American mini-album culled from tracks on the first LP plus a couple that wound up on the second; Live and Rockin' is a concert document from Japan. [1]

KING MISSILE (DOG FLY RELIGION)

Fluting on the Hump (Shimmy-Disc) 1987 •

They (Shimmy-Disc) 1988 •

KING MISSILE

Mystical Shit (Shimmy-Disc) 1990 •

The Way to Salvation (Atlantic) 1991 ♠

DOGBOWL

Tit! (An Opera) (Shimmy-Disc) 1989

Cyclops Nuclear Submarine Captain (Shimmy-Disc) 1991

JOHN S. HALL & KRAMER

Real Men (Shimmy-Disc) 1991 •

Underappreciated and understated metaphysical comedy music comes in strange forms. This is one of them. With words by singer John S. Hall and music by guitarist Dogbowl, beefed up by Kramer's production and auxiliary musicianship, New York's King Missile (Dog Fly Religion) produced two uneven yet insinuating records of bellicose nubbins concerning the secret guilts and torments of modern lowlife scum. On the original band's two albums, Hall's black humor meshes nicely with Dogbowl's more romantic inclinations; when the latter departed, he took the parenthetical portion of the moniker with him. (Both LPs are contained on a single cassette; the They CD adds two bonus tracks to the basic 20-song menu.)

Post-partum, Dogbowl cranked out Tit! (An Opera), an ambitiously skanky (although decidedly non-operatic) collection of scratchy, wistful love ditties that ooze by on a tide of guitar, cello, organ and Hawaiian lap steel. Kramer produced and performs on Tit!, but not on Mystical Shit, where Hall steps to the fore, joined by frequent Bongwater guitarist Dave Rick and When People Were Shorter multi-instrumentalist Chris Xefos. The revamped King Missile sounds more focused than before, with the humor coming off as concisely rather than jokey. And Hall has a new-found penchant for monologuist material such as "Gary & Melissa" (detailing a couple's sexual explorations) and "Jesus Was Way Cool." (The Tit! cassette contains seven bonus tracks; the Mystical Shit CD contains Fluting on the Hump.) [rg]

KING SNAKE ROOST

From Barbarism to Christian Manhood (Aus. Aberrant)

1987 (Aberrant-Amphetamine Reptile) 1989

Things That Play Themselves (Aus. Aberrant) 1988

(Aberrant-Amphetamine Reptile) 1989

Ground into the Dirt (Aberrant-Amphetamine Reptile)

1990 •

GRONG GRONG

Grong Grong (Alternative Tentacles) 1985

Delta blues, as interpreted by disaffected urban bookworms, has to be post-punk's most over-explored, under-realized vein. Partly because they harbor no fantasies about bein' down in the swamp, moonshine bottle in hand, and partly because they go after riffs like a pit bull after a mailman, Sydney, Australia's King Snake Roost waste no time in making believers out of casual listeners.

On the 1987 debut, the fat, wriggling basslines of Michael Raymond (since departed) are impaled on rusty skeins of Charles Tolnay's thug-jazz guitar. A feverish disc indeed. The follow-up leans more towards the modern world, with nods to pre-Modern Dance Ubu (in the bleating "Fred") and a long-overdue tribute to the Legendary Stardust Cowboy ("The Ledge Does Vegas"). About the only misstep was not corralin' the Ledge for a guest shot.

Recorded Stateside with dairyland production legend Butch Vig, Ground into the Dirt proffers a sound at once burlier and more graceful, not unlike Killdozer fused with Funkadelic. Even with all four members sharing writing chores, there's a frightening degree of singleminded aberrance—from singer Peter Hill's bizarre haikus ("I Am Hog" in its entirety: "Call me hog. I am hog. Curly tail. I am hog.") to bassist David Quinn's malevolent, Burroughs-like cut-ups ("Travel Was a Meat Thing") Start here and work backwards.

Tolnay previously led Grong Grong, where his fine abstract-expressionist guitar mist was subordinate to a series of overly pious Birthday Party eulogies like "Poor Herb" and "Louise the Fly." Too bad. [dss]

KINGS OF WYOMING

Kings of Wyoming (Community 3) 1989

Comely if amateurish, this New York trio led by Community 3 prexy/producer Albert Garzon (guitar, piano, vocals, production) plays gentle folk-pop that goes one for eight on the group's brief album. Singing lead (with Garzon's harmonies adding a warm undercurrent) on "Janelle," bassist Cathy Crane's pretty high voice focuses the rudimentary arrangement and covers the un-exceptional playing. The remaining tracks, however, suffer to varying degrees from her uncertain pitch and/or Garzon's plain voice. [i]

KING SWAMP

King Swamp (nr/Virgin) 1988 (Virgin) 1989 •

Wiseblood (Virgin) 1990 ◊

Here's a sad tale of promise quickly squandered. Featuring bass-ace-turned-top-producer Dave Allen (Gang of Four, Shriekback) and fronted by wailin' Walter Wray, King Swamp debuted with a brawny, exciting set of anthemic rockers like "Man Behind the Gun," "Is This Love?" and "Year Zero." If the potential for arena-rock bombast seems high, King Swamp is too much fun to worry about it. By Wiseblood, however, all of the worst tendencies in the band (reduced from a quintet to a trio, still starring Allen) come to the fore. Undistinguished, crass material would be tiring enough, but Wray bellows with the obnoxious panache of Roger Daltrey at his most operatic. Sad. [jy]

See also Shriekback.

KING TEE

Act a Fool (Capitol) 1988 •

At Your Own Risk (Capitol) 1990 •

The detailed playboy's-night-out tale, set over a pair of sampled guitar chords and a James Brown shout, that opens Compton rapper King Tee's first LP pretty much pegs the lifestyle to a (sorry) T. Nothing else on Act a Fool—which includes an informal rank session, "Baggin' on Moms," an influenza sound-effects joke called "I Got a Cold" and a serious ode to "Guitar Playin'"—comes close, but producer D.J. Pooh makes his mark with tracks that are effectively spare and musical.

Tee wastes most of the harder-sounding At Your Own Risk alternately vamping and rambling through loose, barely structured rhymes that go nowhere slowly. (People with nothing to say probably shouldn't make rap records.) When he finally fixes on a subject, it's screwin' his friend's wife (in "Skanless"). Besides the impressive commentary of "Time to Get Out," a serious and well-stated message to gang members and black youth, the album's only original idea is "Diss You," a boring rap that makes its bed on the Stones' "Miss You." ("Do Your Thing," meanwhile, bites "Satisfaction" as an unnamed Valley dude praises Tee for "crossing over into rock'n'roll, man!") At your own risk. [i]

KEVN KINNEY

See Drivin' n' Cryin'.

RICHARD H. KIRK

See Cabaret Voltaire.

KITCHENS OF DISTINCTION

Elephantine EP (nr/One Little Indian) 1989 •

Love Is Hell (nr/One Little Indian) 1989 (One Little Indian-Rough Trade) 1990 •

Strange Free World (One Little Indian-A&M) 1991 ◊

On its first album, this London trio plays seriously dramatic, intensely human music dominated by Julian Swales' delayed, swirling, lost-in-space guitar. It cascades from every direction, an otherworldly out-of-body experience. While the material is first-rate (see "Prize" and "The 3rd Time We Opened the Capsule," as well as the sparkling "In a Cave"), it's that guitar—seemingly five guitars in one—that probes new depths, twinkling, glistening, ravishing. One doesn't so much listen to such a dreamy, echoing, caressing LP as absorb it; from start to finish, Love Is Hell flows like syrup on pancakes. The US CD and cassette tack on the earlier UK "Elephantine" single and its three B-sides. [r]

KLF

See Justified Ancients of Mu Mu.

KMFDM

What Do You Know, Deutschland (Ger. Skysaw) 1986 •
 Don't Blow Your Top (Wax Trax!) 1988 •
 UAIÖE (Wax Trax!) 1989 •
 Naïve (Wax Trax!) 1990 •

This Hamburg quartet (later a trio) began by providing soundtracks for friends' performance art in Paris, and their music has maintained a certain pan-European cinematic quality ever since. Often tagged as an industrial band, KMFDM (whose acronym is most frequently explained as Kein Mitleid Für Die Mehrheit, which translates as "no pity for the majority") do indeed produce dark, throbbing post-modern noise. But they also toy with heavy metal, disco and hip-hop—often within the same song.

Their debut album gathers up early singles under the title of its strongest track. A grim dance beat interspersed with samples concerning US foreign policy—"America is here to stay," the German audience is told—the cut displays KMFDM's political awareness and fondness for found sound, although the sampling would ease its way out of the group's music along with the disappearance of its only British-born member. Other numbers are reminiscent of the The in sheer intensity; a few sparse dance tracks fill out the program.

Hauling in Adrian Sherwood to produce most of Don't Blow Your Top yielded obvious results: a simpler, slower and more stripped-down record, verging on dub as much as on harsh rock. Most of the relatively spare tracks push the synthesized rhythms right up front, adding electronic accents, occasional vocals and found-sound ephemera almost as afterthoughts. With the arched eyebrow of dubious tourists visiting America for the first time, "What a Race" satirically samples sports commentators; the frequent use of TV bites preserves the same sense of cultural bewilderment.

UAIÖE finds KMFDM embracing rap to excellent effect on cuts like "Ganja Rock" and "Murder," the latter an exemplary marriage of industrial and hip-hop. Elsewhere, the group either rocks out like metal maniacs, or just hammers home an intensive dance beat: what UAIÖE lacks in cohesion it makes up for in inspiration.

Following two aggressive singles—the morbid "Virus" and the excellent guitar-driven "Godlike," a different version of which appears on the CD—Naïve adds female singers for the title track's warped disco, funk riffs for "Piggybank" and a wider use of German vocals. KMFDM's most accomplished release to date, Naïve benefits from full sound and attention to the beat. [tf]

KNITTERS

See X.

KNOX

See U.K. Subs, Vibrators.

CHRIS KNOX

See Tall Dwarfs.

RONALD KOAL AND THE TRILLIONAIRES

Ronald Koal and the Trillionaires (No Other) 1982

DRAGSTERS

Stoked (Great Jones) 1989 •

RONALD KOAL BAND

White Light (Watertown) 1991 •

On their 1982 album, the Trillionaires—a semi-modern Ohio rock quintet—come on like a kitschy Suburbs. Koal has one of those melodramatic Anthony Newley-type voices, but doesn't sound selfconscious about it; the songs are cinematic and campy, with subject matter like "Check the Attic" and "Beast in the Cellar." The '60sish "(Theme from) Girl World" achieves the same B-movie effect without words.

Years later, two of the Trillionaires (not including Koal) resurfaced in New York's Dragsters, a quartet dedicated to twang-and-sax beach instrumentals but open to the occasional vocal by guitarist Todd Novak. Stoked soaks in the exact same cars-sun-surf-film nostalgia as every other album by bands that pray to Dick Dale and Duane Eddy, but the harmony-filled Beach Boys sound of "Waikiki" and P.F. Sloan's "Anywhere the Girls Are" wisely add a musical dimension that prevents the surrounding tracks from sliding into twistable tedium. [i]

KOMMUNITY FK

The Vision and the Voice (Independent Project) 1983

Close One Sad Eye (Independent Project) 1985

SATIVA LUVBOX

No Sleep for the Evil (Splatco) 1989

Kommunity FK arose from the LA avant-garde gloom scene with a sound somewhere between Joy Division, Christian Death and Savage Republic. The Vision and the Voice is an excellent album, starting with its Boschian cover art depicting naked figures cavorting and fornicating around a giant red penis. Patrick Mata's clear, soaring vocals nicely match his minimalist guitar work. The trio isn't afraid to try different ideas—from primitive art-punk with ominous synthesizer effects through dense, doomy punk noise and blur-thrash to neo-industrial experiments resembling a milder Neubauten. Gripping, lurking bass comes to the fore on "Unknown to You" and the circular, rhythmic "We Will Not Fall"

The band split and reformed repeatedly, keeping Mata and drummer Matt Chaikin as the only constants. One stable stretch in 1984 allowed the creation of the similarly satisfying Close One Sad Eye, released late in '85. The rough, punk/industrial edges had been smoothed out to a Comsat Angels/Tuxedomoon sheen, and the Joy Division influence (especially on the dramatic drone of "Junkies" and the "Love Will Tear Us Apart"-ish "Trollops") is noticeably greater. A full-time keyboardist integrates synth into the compositions, and Mata's vocals are far more theatrical and dynamic. The haunting "Something Inside Me Has Died" is not only the standout track on the LP, but one of the finest gothic anthems by any American group (In 1990, both albums were scheduled to be issued on CD by Dali/Chameleon.)

Mata spent the latter half of the '80s alternating between England, where he formed bands with bassists Cam Campbell (of Andi Sex-Gang notoriety) and Eddie Branch (ex-UK Decay/Furyo), and Los Angeles, where he continued to shuffle ineffectual KFK lineups and work with other groups, but Sativa Luvbox is the only project of his to actually result in a record so far.

[gef]

KONK

Konk Party EP (nr/Rough Trade) 1982 (Celluloid) 1983 •
Yo (nr/ Crépuscule-Island) 1983 •
Konk Jams (Dog Brothers) 1988 •

Slick and supple New York big-band funk: Konk's seven-piece lineup includes three horn players and a vocalist who doubles on conga drum. The sound leans Latinward, with scads of percussion and sharp arrangements, plus some subtle dub effects thrown in for good measure. Clocking in at over 23 minutes, the four songs on the Konk Party EP are indeed for partying, and best heard on a mammoth boombox

Konk laid low for a while, resurfacing with the inclusion of "Love Attack" on the soundtrack (and album) of Bright Lights, Big City. (Konk had in a sense launched its film career several years earlier when trumpet player Richard Edson—who had been the original drummer in Sonic Youth—started acting in pictures like Stranger Than Paradise and Platoon.)

Konk Jams is a collection of extended remixes (some with vocals) that downplay the funk and the brass for a powerful reliance on rhythm and amusing audio gimmickry. [i]

KOOL G RAP & DJ POLO

Road to the Riches (Cold Chillin'-Warner Bros.) 1989 •
Wanted: Dead or Alive (Cold Chillin'-Warner Bros.) 1990 •

Produced and co-written by Marley Marl, Road to the Riches is a perfectly adequate but hardly distinguished-sounding vehicle for New York rhymer Kool G (Nathaniel Wilson). Unfortunately, the young MC's routine raps about women, words and wealth—delivered with an in-your-face lisp—defuse the tracks' potential.

Like a lot of young hustlers hustled into debuts they weren't prepared for, Kool G made a much more impressive showing on his stronger second go-round. The LP leads off on a powerful note with the memorably grim reality check of "Streets of New York," an insinuating, mellow groove with a hip sax'n'piano arrangement. What follows is a violent police drama ("Wanted, Dead or Alive") produced at high anxiety by Eric B, and an entertaining all-star anti-racism jam with Big Daddy Kane and Biz Markie. But the LP isn't all dope: the rough language and crude promises of "Talk Like Sex" and "Death Wish" are vile, some of the tracks are conceptually weak and G's speech impediment undercuts his delivery [i]

KOOL MOE DEE

Kool Moe Dee (Rooftop-Jive) 1986 •
How Ya Like Me Now (Rooftop-Jive) 1987 •
Knowledge Is King (Jive-RCA) 1989 •
African Pride EP (Jive) 1990 •
Funke, Funke Wisdom (Jive) 1991 •

Using a stone-cold serious tone that does not encourage disagreement, popular New York rapper Kool Moe Dee (Mohandas Dewese), a former third of the Treacherous Three, puts his positive social messages plus the usual braggadocio to medium-weight rhythm tracks, many of them enhanced by loping synth-bass lines, electronic horns and other musical ingredients. The versatile vocalist's records earn their mainstream appeal by tempering the music and taking a firm stand against violence and sexual irresponsibility.

The first album's "Go See the Doctor" offers a slangy but detailed warning about venereal disease, "Little Jon" characterizes a young hoodlum as a loser not a hero; "Monster Crack" warns kids against messing with drugs.

How Ya Like Me Now experiments with one-chord funk vamps instead of mere beats, and quotes James Brown, Paul Simon and others. But the raps aren't as captivating as before, and the cuts tend to drag. "No Respect," recited to an adaptation of Aretha's "Respect," tells a powerful cautionary tale of a street hustler's downfall and joins the self-serving title tune as a highlight.

Back in control with another masterful blend of uplifting rhymes, inventive music and no-nonsense delivery, Moe Dee pushes his don't-steal-it/earn-it philosophy in the appealing Knowledge Is King, announcing "I Go to Work" over a dramatic brassy film noir track, defending his bachelorhood in "They Want Money," prizing intelligent women in "All Night Long" and promoting education the title track. "Pump Your Fist" wraps up the album in a wide-ranging discussion of racism, history and contemporary urban life.

The African Pride 12-inch contains three mixes of "God Made Me Funky," a remix of "Knowledge Is King" and two other tracks. [i]

PETER KOPPEL

See Church.

KRAFTWERK

Kraftwerk 1 (Ger. Philips) 1971
Kraftwerk 2 (Ger. Philips) 1972
Kraftwerk (nr/Vertigo) 1972
Ralf and Florian (Vertigo) 1973
Autobahn (Vertigo) 1974 (Warner Bros.) 1984 (Elektra)
1988 ●
Radio Activity (Capitol) 1975 ●
Exceller 8 (nr/Vertigo) 1975
Trans-Europe Express (Capitol) 1977 ●
The Man Machine (Capitol) 1978 ●
Elektro Kinetik (nr/Vertigo) 1981
Computer World (Warner Bros.) 1981 (Elektra) 1988 ●
Techno Pop EP (nr/EMI) 1983
Electric Cafe (Warner Bros.) 1986 (Elektra) 1988 ●
The Mix (Elektra) 1991 ●

Kraftwerk (German for “power station”) began in the electronic metal trend that erupted in Germany in the early 1970s. Although quiet in recent years, the four-piece synthesizer group showed amazing resiliency for more than fifteen years, tightening its electro-pop formula to fit smoothly into art-rock and, later, disco. Kraftwerk essentially created the sonic blueprint from which the British new romantic and techno-pop movements arose, and provided the essential technology for much of hip-hop.

Autobahn is built around an epic version of the title track, a bizarre hit single that broke the band as a commercial property in numerous countries. Enchanting in its simplicity, hypnotic in its construction, the song introduces the repetition typical of all Kraftwerk music, but the record’s other pieces are less inspired synthesizer noodling.

Radio Activity coincided with a change of image that sliced away beards and hair and converted Kraftwerk from aging hippies into modern sonic engineers; greater use of repetition and purposeful self-limitation is evident, though there is no breakthrough.

The robotic Trans-Europe Express placed mechanistic aspects of the music up front, in a brilliant epiphany of style. Rhythms and themes recur throughout, with little emotion expressed in the vocals; lyrics emphasize the dehumanization suggested by the production and delivery. Recommended.

The Man Machine further builds on the developments of Trans-Europe Express, with the one humanizing effect—background music—yielding to Star Wars noises. More work with manipulated vocals—especially on the title track and “We Are the Robots”—takes the automaton stance to the limit. Despite the science fiction themes and heavy musical repetition, the album has inventive, catchy compositions and an eerie warmth. Highly recommended.

Computer World broke years of silence, bringing Kraftwerk into a world that had largely embraced and vindicated their social and musical visions. Technically advanced machinery yields sharper, brighter music, but otherwise Kraftwerk haven’t tampered with their style, except to shift their thematic content from science-fiction to industrial documentary. Excellent synthesizer pop.

The musics Kraftwerk helped launch—British post-rock industrial sounds and rhythm-is-everything dance grooves—come full circle on Side One of the long-awaited Electric Cafe. The virtually interchangeable “Technopop” and “Musique Non-Stop” take sparse, simple, unvarying percussion tracks and add bits of treated vocals, synthetic noises and quasi-instrumental effects. On the reverse are three straightforward (albeit numbingly repetitive) songs that use actual melodies, singing and lyrics. While the second side is certainly listenable, even Kraftwerk fans will find this brief album disappointingly short on ideas and content.

There are German-language versions of many, if not all, of Kraftwerk’s albums. There have also been several compilations released in the UK. In 1988, the group signed with Elektra, which reissued some of their catalogue. The Mix is a drastically remixed best-of.

[sg/i]

KRAMER

See Carney-Hild-Kramer, Half Japanese, King Missile (Dog Fly Religion).

WAYNE KRAMER

See Mick Farren, MC5, Johnny Thunders.

DAGMAR KRAUSE

See Henry Cow.

KRAUT

An Adjustment to Society (Cabbage) 1983
Whetting the Scythe (Cabbage) 1984
Night of Rage (New Red Archives) 1989
The Movie [CD] (New Red Archives) 1990 ●

GUTTERBOY

Gutterboy (DGC) 1990 ●

One of New York’s most deserving punk legends, Kraut made their live debut opening for the Clash in 1981 and went on to play a big part in the city’s burgeoning hardcore scene. On its first album, the quartet throws off awesomely dense but distinct slabs of post-Pistols/Clash guitar chords while galloping along at a good clip. Although genuine ex-Pistol Steve Jones played guitar on three songs (“Onward,” “Sell Out” and “Kill for Cash”), the spotlight remains firmly fixed on Doug Holland, one of punk’s best-ever string smashers. The urban reality/armageddon lyrics are only a bit above the usual monosyllabic protest, but no matter. (Jones also performed with the band on occasion, and a version of the Pistols’ “Bodies” appears on the Kraut live compilation, Night of Rage.)

Whetting the Scythe, a brief nine-song album, finds Kraut abandoning punk for tasteful demi-metal, using doubled guitar leads and charging, articulated power at more moderate tempos. It’s a partially successful variant, easier to follow than hyperdrive punk. Kraut has the chops, the intelligence and (occasionally) the songs to make something really unique.

After doing some unfinished sessions, Holland left to become a Cro-Mag and was replaced by Chris Smith (ex-Battalion of Saints). The new lineup completed three of those hard-rock items in ’85, but Smith drowned and Kraut threw in the towel. Singer Davy Gunner and drummer Johnny Feedback (under the names Dito and Johnny Koncz) went on to form Gutterboy. The Movie, a 27-track CD, combines the three previously unreleased tracks with both studio albums in their entirety.

An attempt to glorify punk ruggedness as stylish tough-guy sexuality (undershirt chic!), Gutterboy is a remarkably contrived quartet produced to sound like a street-level cross between Bruce Springsteen and U2. With Dito getting outside songwriting assists (probably on lyrics, which are well-suited to the group's mission), the material is obvious but entertaining; the foursome's playing is as exciting and credible as their carefully manicured looks. [jg/i]

See also Cro-Mags.

LENNY KRAVITZ

Let Love Rule (Virgin) 1989 •

Mama Said (Virgin) 1991 ◊

Like some musical castaway wandering back into civilization two decades after Woodstock, this young do-it-yourselfer, who was barely born when the flower-power hippie/soul era of his imaginings ended, sings drippy idealistic songs about love and harmony to simple feel-good music that rolls baroque Beatle pop, Joe Cocker gospel and Sly Stone soul—all with Billy Preston's effusiveness—into a mock nostalgic trip for those too young to have any actual memories. A reasonably good singer who plays guitar, drums and keyboards on the vintage-sounding Let Love Rule, Kravitz is emotionally insufferable, whether testifying to the uncontrollable joys of love ("I Built This Garden for Us"), whipping up a fraternal frenzy in the title track or delivering an obnoxiously effete condemnation of racism ("Mr. Cab Driver"). [i]

KRYST THE CONQUEROR

See Misfits.

K-SOLO

See EPMD.

ED KUEPPER

See Laughing Clowns, Saints.

KUKL

See Sugarcubes.

SERGEI KURIOKHIN

See Henry Kaiser.

KURSAAL FLYERS

Chocs Away (nr/UK) 1975

The Great Artiste (nr/UK) 1975

Golden Mile (nr/CBS) 1976

Five Live Kursaal! (nr/CBS) 1977

In for a Spin: The Best of the Kursaal Flyers (nr/Edsel) 1985 •

A Former Tour de Force Is Forced to Tour (nr/Waterfront) 1988 •

This seminal pub-rock outfit is more of interest for what the individuals did after the group split than for the band's own recordings. Drummer Will Birch went on to found the Records (with guitarist John Wicks, briefly a Kursaal at the end of the band's first go-round) and produce records for various people. Graeme Douglas, whom Wicks replaced, joined Eddie and the Hot Rods, and wrote their best songs.

The Kursaal's first two LPs are thinly produced countryish rock'n'roll, bolstered considerably by Birch's witty lyrics. The Great Artiste does contain what may be the earliest recorded cover of a Nick Lowe composition, "Television," later done to better effect by Dave Edmunds.

With Mike Batt producing, the group tried something completely different on Golden Mile, an eclectic musical travelogue through rock'n'roll's root styles from swing to Spector to ska to '60s pop-rock. The album is a little-known treasure, similar in concept to the Turtles' equally ignored and enjoyable Battle of the Bands.

By the time of Five Live, the Kursaal had almost totally weeded out their country strain and, showing the influence of the punk revolution going on around them, got into music with a more driving beat. The band's last hurrah, the "Television Generation" single, is great, proof positive that the band had seen the new light. What else could they do but break up?

And what else could they do after releasing In for a Spin—a best-of featuring nine cuts from the first three albums, "Television Generation" and five unreleased tracks (including one later recorded by Birch's next group, the Records)—but reunite for another album?

Tour de Force—an all-new studio album by the reformed group—sounds like a record the Kursaal might have made in 1978 had they stayed together. With only a song titled "Pre-Madonna" as a token gesture to topicality, the LP melds all the best elements of what the group initially had to offer. Good to see that ten years haven't affected these guys a bit, or dulled Birch's way with words; he remains one of the most disarmingly clever lyricists this side of Nick Lowe. [ds]

See also Eddie and the Hot Rods, Records.

DAVE KUSWORTH

See Nikki Sudden.

FELA ANIKULAPO KUTI

Fela's London Scene (nr/EMI) 1970

Fela Ransome-Kuti and Africa '70 with Ginger Baker:

Livel (Signpost) 1972 •

Gentlemen (nr/Creole) 1979

Everything Scatter (nr/Creole) 1979

Black-President (Capitol) 1981

Original Sufferhead (Capitol) 1982

Army Arrangement (Remix) (Celluloid) 1985 •

Shuffling and Shmiling (Celluloid) 1985 •

Army Arrangement (Celluloid) 1985 •

No Agreement (Celluloid) 1985

Upside Down (Celluloid) 1986 •

2,000 Black (Celluloid) 1986

Mr. Follow Follow (Celluloid) 1986

Volume One and Two (Celluloid) 1987

Teacher Don't Teach Me Nonsense (Mercury) 1987 •

Overtake Don Overtake Overtake (Shanachie) 1990 ◊

The Best of Fela (Oceana-Celluloid) 1990 •

FELA AND AFRIKA 70

Shakara (nr/EMI) 1972

Zombie (Mercury) 1977 (Celluloid) 1985 •

FELA ANIKULAPO KUTI AND EGYPT 80

Live in Amsterdam (Capitol) 1984

Beats of No Nation (Shanachie) 1989 •

FELA ANIKULAPO KUTI AND ROY AYERS

Music of Many Colours (Celluloid) 1986 •

One of the world's true musical revolutionaries, Fela Ransome-Kuti's life and work embody most of the contradictions inherent in any major collusion of Western and African styles of thought and art. Born in Lagos, Nigeria in 1938 to an affluent Christian family and educated in London, Fela was just another minor highlife bandleader until he received funk's call via Sierra Leonean James Brown-imitator Geraldo Pino in 1966. By weaving funk rhythms into highlife, Fela developed Afrobeat, a mesmerizingly potent style he has spent years refining.

Most of Fela's recorded pieces take up to an entire side of an LP, beginning slowly, with a lengthy electric piano and/or saxophone introduction (Fela plays both instruments) before breaking into exuberant horn fanfares, followed by call-and-response vocals between Fela and chorus and interlocking polyrhythmic percussion patterns.

During a 1968 Los Angeles stint with his group Koola Lobitas, Fela was introduced to American black radical politics. Fela's stock rose considerably when EMI released Fela's London Scene in 1970, leading to a friendship and collaboration with ex-Cream drummer Ginger Baker. (Their Live! album provides a fairly tame example.) Nigerian authorities tormented the bandleader after his triumphant return from London in the early '70s, for as Fela's fame grew, so did his influence. (Fortunately, Kuti's name translates as "He who emanates greatness, who has death inside his quiver and who cannot be killed by human entity.") Castigatory songs about government corruption (on Black-President's "I.T.T. (International Thief Thief),") military fascism ("Zombie," on the album of the same name) and national apathy ("Army Arrangement," ditto), sung by a rich marijuana smoker with a couple of dozen wives who isolated himself in a concrete fortress called the Shrine, challenged the local authorities in a manner they couldn't ignore.

Since 1974, Fela has been arrested several times for various crimes; during a particularly vigorous 1981 crackdown, a beating by soldiers left him temporarily incapable of playing saxophone. His most recent incarceration came in 1984, on the eve of his first major American tour. Arrested on a trumped-up money-smuggling rap, he was released from his five-year sentence after two years, thanks to intercession by Amnesty International.

Celluloid began re-releasing some of Fela's many records in 1985. Upside Down dates from 1976; No Agreement from 1977. But the most controversial of these was Bill Laswell's remix of Army Arrangement, on which he added tracks by keyboardist Bernie Worrell, drummer Sly Dunbar and talking drummer Aiyb Dieng. This reportedly displeased Fela greatly, and one need only compare the remix with the rough yet stirring original to understand why. Roy Ayers joins Fela on Music of Many Colors (originally released on Phonodisk in 1980), eliciting the vibraphonist's meatiest playing ever. Zombie is one of the classics of the Celluloid batch.

PolyGram cashed in on Fela's successful and long-delayed 1987 American tour by releasing one of his hits from the show, Teacher Don't Teach Me Nonsense. The wild master hadn't lost his chops. Beats of No Nation is a fine example of vintage Fela, while O.D.O.O. is simply spectacular. With compact disc technology catching up to Fela's long-form Afrobeat creations, the two half-hour compositions that comprise the disc provide ample room for ensemble workouts, saxophone solos, high guitar stepping, polyrhythmic noodling and call-and-response groovulation. Indeed, Fela even reprises his classic "Zombie" in the middle of the title track. [rg]

KWAMÉ FEATURING A NEW BEGINNING

The Boy Genius (Atlantic) 1989 •

KWAMÉ AND A NEW BEGINNING

A Day in the Life: A Pokadelick Adventure (Atlantic) 1990 •

With one foot in the old school (courtesy of producer Hurby "Luv Bug" Azor) and an easy feel for daisy-age soul-pop, this bright young New York rapper—whose middle-class values aren't so different from the overtly Afrocentric Native Tongue crew—brings a neat nerdy element to his first album. On The Boy Genius, Kwamé (Holland) comes off as the love-struck overachiever next door, a goodnatured and upbeat rhymer with inventive ideas, lightweight beats and easy charm.

A Day in the Life is even better, a colorful and musically diverse self-willed world of polka-dots in the freewheeling "Bone Age." Although posited as a concept album about the high-schooler's quotidian existence, the record largely relies on phone messages to connect some of the oh-so-vaguely related autobiographical tales and boasts. If A Day in the Life isn't all it's cracked up to be, Kwamé's youthful exuberance and imaginative tracks still make it uncommonly entertaining. [pn]

LACH

Contender (Gold Castle) 1991 ◊

As a pivotal figure in getting the New York anti-folk scene up and running, singer/guitarist/pianist Lach was evidently too busy being an impresario to make a record until most of his friends had taken their vinyl shots. Contender has no problem dispensing with acoustic guitar formalism; as produced by Tom Goodkind of the Washington Squares, the album employs a nimble rhythm section and mild electric backing, giving the central acoustic strums a rich and strong setting. ("Hard Time" and "Steven Said" break on through to overt rock.) Lach hasn't got much of a voice, and his tunes don't exactly send you home humming, but he's an enthusiastic character who brings more imagination to faux-folk than many of his better known peers. Best song: "The Edie Effect," a wry attack on Warholian poseurs. [i]

LADYSMITH BLACK MAMBAZO

Induku Zethu (Shanachie) 1984 ●
Ulwandle Olungwele (Shanachie) 1985 ●
Inala (Shanachie) 1986 ●
Shaka Zulu (Warner Bros.) 1987 ●
Umathombo Wamanzi (Shanachie) 1988 ●
Journey of Dreams (Warner Bros.) 1988 ●
Two Worlds One Heart (Warner Bros.) 1990 ●
Classic Tracks (Shanachie) 1990 ◊

Led by Joseph Shabalala—who formed the ten-man group almost 30 years ago and has been recording with it for two decades—Ladysmith Black Mambazo is one of South Africa's most popular ensembles. For sheer vocal ecstasy, few organizations can equal its lush, comforting and sophisticated choral harmonies sung in the open mbube style. Simultaneously sorrowful and optimistic, the music originated in South African dormitories housing immigrant workers who'd left their townships and families for employment in the area's diamond and gold mines.

Mbube is characterized by a cappella harmonies and short phrases, either sung in unison or against an overlapping call-and-response pattern. Reflecting on matters both familial and spiritual, the music is tied closely to the group's Zulu culture. They generally sing in Zulu; the occasional English-language songs are a pleasant shock.

Noted ethno-music appropriator Paul Simon got wind of Ladysmith Black Mambazo and, despite the African National Congress' cultural boycott of South Africa, recorded part of Graceland with them in Johannesburg and London. (He also featured the group on two subsequent tours and produced Shaka Zulu.) All that American attention led to the group's remarkable commercial exploitation by 7-Up, which adapted "Beautiful Rain" from that album for a TV spot.

On Umathombo Wamanzi, Mambazo changes its strategy slightly, emphasizing ensemble work rather than call-and-response structures or a leader singing over backing voices; this accentuates their irregular punctuations and stop-start rhythms. As with previous records, it provides an almost overwhelming atmosphere of emotional power and grace. The unadorned human voice has rarely sounded so godlike.

Shabalala and Mambazo pay tribute to Paul Simon, Miriam Makeba, Hugh Masekela and god (although not exactly in that order) on Journey of Dreams, ending the record with a lovely gentle rendition (in English) of "Amazing Grace" that features Simon.

Taking the regrettably inevitable step into fusion, Mambazo recorded some of Two Worlds One Heart with musical backing. At the mixture's mildest point, Mambazo sings the handsome "Rejoice" over traditional instruments with no harm done. But Shabalala's duet with American gospel star Marvin Winans (which employs synthesizers) is an incongruity next to the group's unaccompanied efforts, and the funk track co-written and co-produced by George Clinton makes it sound as if Mambazo were merely sampled into the mix—an undesirable effect considering whose album it is.

Although consistent enough to sound like it was recorded in one go, Classic Tracks is a compilation of tracks from the group's first two dozen or so albums. As annoying as the lack of annotation may be, there's no faulting the music, which is unfailingly magical. [rg/i]

LAIBACH

Through the Occupied Netherlands [tape] (Hol. Staal) 1984

Laibach (Yugoslavian Skuc) 1985

Rekapitulation 1980-84 (Ger. Walter Ulbricht) 1985 ●

Nova Akropola (nr/Cherry Red) 1985 (Wax Trax!) 1986 ●

Baptism (Ger. Walter Ulbricht) 1986 ●

Opus Dei (Mute-Wax Trax!) 1987 ●

Panorama/Die Liebe EP (Wax Trax!) 1987

Let It Be (Mute-Enigma) 1988 ●

Sympathy for the Devil EP (Mute-Restless) 1988 ●

Macbeth (Mute-Restless) 1990 ●

Formed in 1979 in Ljubljana, the capital of the Yugoslavian republic of Slovenia, Laibach (the city's German name) set out to revitalize Slovenian culture and create a mythic persona through careful manipulation of the group's image. As much theater as music, Laibach often used to appear in the uniforms of the Nazis who occupied Ljubljana during WW II, and has made a point, on record, of highlighting the connection between Western rock and capitalism.

The double-album boxed-set Rekapitulation summarizes Laibach's first four years of recording and contains some of the band's most innovative material: strange mixtures of rock, jazz, disco and ambience with occasional Wagnerian overtones. Sieved through an Eastern European consciousness, this combination provides unique flavors, ranging from astonishing beauty to totalitarian menace.

Though released in 1985, most of the material on Laibach was recorded years earlier and is also contained on Rekapitulation. The poorly recorded Through Occupied Europe offers two live performances, adding little to the studio versions of material also found on Rekapitulation.

By the time Laibach recorded Nova Akropola, the band had picked up a following in Western Europe and received a lot of attention in the music press. Nova Akropola is a more sophisticated undertaking than earlier efforts, furthering the group's music and concept. Wagnerian horns sound over the surging beats of science fiction armies, while singer Milan Fras growls lyrics in a gravely basso. Two songs use nationalistic speeches by Marshal Tito as lyrics; while the intent is ironic, not the faintest smile is discernible.

Baptism, a second double set, is the soundtrack to a play done with the theater branch of the New Slovenian Art movement, of which Laibach is a part. The album uses tape loops, beats, horns and chants and is far more atmospheric than the group's more pop-oriented work. With the exception of half a side that sounds to be an "appropriation" of an old, scratchy opera record, this is excellent, innovative music.

Four of Baptism's shorter, livelier tracks are appended to the CD of Opus Dei, at the time, Laibach's poppiest and most conceptually ambitious record. It contains fascist-tinged covers of Queen's "One Vision" and the Eurodisco hit "Life Is Life," sung in German with the Eurodisco horns and a marching beat. (Panorama/Die Liebe is a 12-inch containing two tracks from Nova Akropola and two other items.)

Laibach has always maintained that Western pop music is nothing more than capitalism, that rock stars should be viewed as successful businessmen and that concerts are akin to political rallies for canned rebellion. After Opus Dei, the group took the logical—albeit radical—step of attacking pop icons by parodying them. Laibach's version of Let It Be (an LP the group considers the Beatles' worst) realizes the entire album (minus the title track) as melodramatic drinking and fighting songs, with horns, synthesized strings and military beats. The female choir version of "Across the Universe," deadpan with faint Slovenian accents and tinkling harpsichord, is at once hilarious, chilling and beautiful. The similarly conceived Sympathy for the Devil locks onto that one song, reinterpreting it six times (which is at least two too many), as disco, rock, acid house, etc., including one merciless send-up of its pretensions to evil.

Perhaps realizing that they had painted their pop efforts into a corner, Laibach's next release was an amazing soundtrack to New Slovenian Art's version of Macbeth. Combining the better attributes of Baptism with a sense of restraint and atmosphere not heard since the early days, Macbeth is one of their best albums yet.

[s]

LA MUERTE

And the Mystery Goes On EP (Bel. Soundwork) 1985

Peep Show EP (Bel. Soundwork) 1986

Every Soul by Sin Oppressed (nr/Big Disk) 1987

Scorpio Rising EP (Bel. Sex Wax) 1988

Death Race 2000 (Play It Again Sam) 1989 •

Experiment in Terror (Bel. Play It Again Sam) 1990

Kustom Kar Competition (Play It Again Sam-Caroline)

1991 •

In the wake of the Birthday Party came a worldwide wave of psychoswampably rockers who took that band's manic-depressive bluesrock and turned it into a music genre. Belgium's La Muerte was one of those bands. With growling, howling French and English vocals, stop/start frenzy and a guitar that at times does nothing more than squeal with feedback shavings, And the Mystery Goes On out-Parties the Birthday Party, delivering a four-song gothic dose of angst and aggression. The entire lyrics of the fierce "Massacre" are "whoaaaah" and "suffering," voiced in a deviled frenzy of a howl over a hard-crunched drum pound and feedback shivers of guitar; the outstanding "Blues, Heaven or Hell" veers from tense to burning through a dark, crawling labyrinth.

There's not much difference between Mystery and the five-song Peep Show. The latter contains a swamp-beat re-arrangement of Syd Barrett's "Lucifer Sam" that squiggles with warped guitar, tweets off into space-rock territory and climaxes with a feedback crescendo; there's also a phone sex tape, "Blues, Heaven or Hell" and two new BP-styled tracks.

Every Soul by Sin Oppressed finds La Muerte capable of far greater intricacy, incorporating harmonica, acoustic guitar and a more slowly woven web of tension in "The Rope's Around Your Neck" and "Mannish Boy." "So Bad" crosses into psychobilly, while "You're Not an Angel" continues their parallel development with Nick Cave's work, sounding like a companion piece to "From Her to Eternity."

The four tracks on Scorpio Rising take four different directions. The title tune introduces sampling and dialogue cut-ups in a collage of air raid control room talk, newscasts, TV/movie bites and laugh boxes, all slathered over a slowly shifting base of feedback. The percussion in "Lost My Mind" sounds like a bullet doing a tap-dance; the monster growl screams could pass for demonic possession at your next exorcism. "Shoot in Your Back" (which also turns up on Death Race 2000) continues to reflect Cave's influence, while "Hellfire" is a foray into a loud psychedelia.

La Muerte's first American release, Death Race 2000, has harder and sparser percussion; guitar chords are grungier, even metallic at times. The faintly post-industrial production style occasionally obscures the Cave/BP influence, but the monster scream hasn't changed a bit. Imagine away the beat on "Ecoute Cette Priere," and you've got the same dark bluesy undulations as ever.

[e]

LANDLORDS

See Happy Flowers.

ANITA LANE

See Nick Cave.

MARK LANEGAN

See Screaming Trees.

CLIVE LANGER AND THE BOXES

I Want the Whole World EP (nr/Radar) 1979

Splash (nr/F-Beat) 1980

Hope, Honour, Love (nr/Demon) 1988

The big disappointment of Clive Langer's solo career is that he doesn't give it top priority. Presumably freed from financial pressures by co-producing numerous hit records for Madness, Dexys and others, the talented singer/guitarist—judging by his lack of "product"—seems to take only passing interest in making records of his own.

As chief songwriter for the late Deaf School, Langer successfully mated the music hall tradition with highly melodic rock'n'roll, topped off with anxious lyrics about modern-day pressures—i.e., a cross between the Kinks and Roxy Music. His solo works are more personal, and lean decidedly to the Ray Davies school, partly because Langer's weary singing has a similar charm.

The five tunes on I Want the Whole World are nearly perfect vignettes of anger, tenderness and regret, performed with casual ingenuousness. Though less effective, Splash has its moments, including the charming "Had a Nice Night" and the embarrassingly abject "Splash (A Tear Goes Rolling Down)." Elvis Costello produced two of the tracks.

Hope, Honour, Love summarizes the album and the EP, adding "Even Though" from a subsequent single. Clive Langer seems like a guy you wouldn't mind inviting to your house for dinner. [jy]

See also Deaf School.

GERARD LANGLEY + IAN KEAREY

See Blue Aeroplanes.

LAQUAN

Notes of a Native Son (4th & B'way) 1990 ●

With a live band and backing singers on every track, this precocious Los Angeles teenager's debut album (produced by Bell Biv DeVoe studio associates Richard Wolf and Bret Mazur) has the panoramic sound of big-league soul, an exceptionally posh musical setting for real hip-hop. Looking beyond that stylistic innovation, Laquan's an extremely articulate rapper who goes easy on the clichés and slang to deliver a serious god-praising black-pride message with grace and dignity—but he has too little style to fully electrify the handsome grooves. [i]

LARD

The Power of Lard EP (Alternative Tentacles) 1988 ●

The Last Temptation of Reid (Alternative Tentacles) 1990 ●

Jello Biafra brings his voice, record label and sense of humor to the Lard party; guitarist Al Jourgensen and bassist Paul Barker (both of Ministry) whip up a batch of pounding semi-industrialized rock with drummer Jeff Ward. A casual and exciting bit of supergrouping, The Power of Lard (a three-song 12-inch) demonstrates the fun potential in this seemingly unlikely alliance.

The excellent full-length album (no duplication) standardizes the Lard concept, resolving itself into a more-or-less even mix of the Dead Kennedys and Ministry. (And is thus equally recommendable to fans of both.) Loopy topical lyrics lighten the driving music's dominance-and-submission power; a martial-beat cover of "They're Coming to Take Me Away" merrily confirms the project's open-ended aesthetic. [i]

See also Jello Biafra, Dead Kennedys, Ministry, Revolting Cocks.

LA'S

The La's (nr/Go! Discs) 1990 (Go! Discs-London) 1991 ●

One of the few new British pop groups to evince the influence of '60s beat, rather than psychedelia or punk, this distinctive Liverpool quartet—which favors acoustic guitars and folk harmonies but delivers taut electric rock as well—echoes groups like the Hollies, Searchers and Beatles on its fine debut album, produced by Steve Lillywhite. Singer Lee Mavers writes profoundly tuneful songs with thoughtful words and sings them with a skilled mixture of pop allure ("There She Goes" is a falsetto gem) and pub-band sturdiness ("Failure" is an odd bit of garage punk). Beyond melodic assets, the La's—who, to their credit, never employ contemporary dance beats here—make good use of rhythm as well. "Liberty Ship" has the seafaring tempo to match its lyrical metaphor, while "Way Out" pairs a measured drum/rhythm guitar beat with double-time lead figures and "Freedom Song" uses the oompah swing of a Kurt Weill number. Very impressive. [i]

LAST

L.A. Explosion! (Bompl) 1979

Fade to Black EP (Bompl) 1982

Painting Smiles on a Dead Man (Fr. Lolita) 1983

Confession (SST) 1988 ●

Awakening (SST) 1989 ●

Although heavily indebted to the sounds of the '60s (they touch freely on surf-rock, psychedelia, folk-rock, etc.) Los Angeles' Last—formed in 1976 and led by three Nolte brothers—play with modern-day punk intensity. L.A. Explosion! is a near-perfect debut, marred only by flat production. The performances are stunning, with Vitus Mataré's authentic Vox/Farfisa organ riffs adding color to the melodic guitar leads and Joe Nolte's distinctive vocals. Every track holds up, especially the hypnotic rocker "She Don't Know Why I'm Here" and a surf-inspired ode to lost youth, "Every Summer Day."

The 12-inch Fade to Black EP shows that the Last are indeed a group worth taking seriously. The four tracks are darker and moodier, yet the melodies are so enticing it's a crime this stuff can't find a commercial opening.

Amidst personnel changes, and facing an uncertain future, the Last released a French-only second album. Painting Smiles on a Dead Man is another winner, moving the organ up front and showcasing vocals that are at once more confident and demanding. Although one of Los Angeles' most gifted groups, the Last split up in 1985.

A new Last—Joe and Mike Nolte, plus three newcomers—resurfaced unexpectedly in 1988 with a neat album produced by All leader Bill Stevenson. (David Nolte—now in Wednesday Week—had been in a very early version of the Descendents, Stevenson's group.) Energized '60s power pop remains the Last's stock in trade, and they've lost none of their pep or melodiousness. The Noltes' new songs have a resigned, cynical edge ("And They Laugh," "Going Gone," "Everywhere You Turn"), but the music belies that with ringing Byrdsy guitars, mild keyboards and appealing harmonies.

Again produced by Stevenson, Awakening makes no stylistic changes in composition but benefits from a toughened attack. Giving clear play to the band's dual affinities for punk and paisley pop, the crisply tuneful album ranges from souped-up covers of the Beatles ("She Loves You") and the Shirelles ("Baby It's Your") to a great ballad/rocker "You," the Farfisa-heavy pop of "Book of Life" and the intense "Garden Grow," punctuated by Dave Nazworthy's furious snare rolls. (Both Mataré and David Nolte make cameo appearances.)

Footnotes: Alex Gibson designed the sleeve of a 1978 Last single. Mataré has become a well-known LA record producer (Divine Weeks, Angst, Leaving Trains, etc.) and co-founded Trotsky Icepick. Drummer Dave Nazworthy splits his time between the Last and the Chemical People. In 1988, the Last ended a curious habit of not playing outside California, an isolationist (lazy?) policy that had been in force for fourteen years.

[cpl/i/jr]

See also All, Chemical People, Trotsky Icepick.

BILL LASWELL

Baselines (Celluloid-Elektra-Musician) 1983 •

Hear No Evil (Venture-Virgin) 1988 •

PRAXIS

Praxis EP (Celluloid) 1984

Erstwhile Material mainman Laswell released his first solo album right around the time people began to realize that his talents extend beyond excellent bass playing into the conceptual stratosphere. Baselines' gut-bucket funk foundation and experienced experimentalism provide a convincing résumé for his subsequent work as producer to the stars (Mick Jagger, Yellowman, Herbie Hancock, Motörhead, Afrika Bambaataa, etc.). Guests here include fellow Materialists Michael Beinhorn (a frequent co-writer on the LP) and Martin Bisi, percussionist Ronald Shannon Jackson, the ubiquitous Fred Frith and avant-noisemaster extraordinaire David Moss.

Following group albums with Massacre and duo recordings with John Zorn and bass saxist Peter Brotzmann (as well as Praxis, a bass-and-drum-machine outing that unites the avant-garde Laswell with the hip-hop Laswell in an admirable experiment that doesn't quite jell), Laswell essayed another disc under his own name in 1988. Joined by violinist Shankar, guitarist Nicky Skopelitis and a small group of equally sophisticated players, he wrote and produced Hear No Evil, an album of hauntingly beautiful instrumentals with resonances of exotic cultures adding depth to the simple compositions. Lovely. [mf/i/gk]

See also Golden Palominos, Material.

LAUGHING CLOWNS

Laughing Clowns EP (Aus. Missing Link) 1979

Sometimes ... the Fire Dance EP (Aus. Prince Melon) 1980

3 EP (Aus. Prince Melon) 1981

Mr. Uddich Schmuddich Goes to Town (Aus. Prince Melon) 1982

Laughing Clowns (nr/Red Flame) 1982

Laughter Around the Table (nr/Red Flame) 1983

Law of Nature (nr/Hot) 1984

History of Rock n' Roll Volume One (Aus. Hot) 1985

Ghosts of an Ideal Wife (Aus. Hot) 1985

ED KUEPPER

Electrical Storm (Aus. Hot) 1986

Rooms of the Magnificent (nr/Hot) 1987

Not a Soul Around EP (nr/Hot) 1987

Everybody's Got To (Aus. True Tone) 1988 (True Tone-Capitol) 1989 •

Happy as Hell EP (Aus. True Tone) 1989

TODAY WONDER

Today Wonder (Ger. Rattlesnake) 1990 •

After the Saints broke up in 1978 (and before Chris Bailey started the group up again) guitarist/songwriter Ed Kuepper returned to Sydney to form a band with a couple of early Saints alumni. The resulting quintet, dubbed the Laughing Clowns, included sax and electric piano and was topped off with Kuepper's odd voice: he's a slightly lower-pitched, nasal and nastier Robert Smith, limited in range, but a commanding presence.

The Clowns' strange but remarkably bracing debut EP features piano that both meshes its timbral resonance with Kuepper's guitar chording and co-states the melodies with the sax, as well as—at one point—providing an unnervingly calm anchor while the drums run wild. The romantic and musical clichés of supper-club/movie jazz go berserk in an astonishingly eloquent yet intense statement of disillusionment and frustration.

Oddly enough, the manic energy and tunefulness seemed to dissipate—over the course of two additional EPs—in favor of despair, ennui, cynicism (or just sarcasm?) and decidedly less lustrous music, in both text and texture. The addition of a trumpeter on 3 does provide a spark, only to be neutralized by satirically discordant riffing. By this point, the moments of musical anarchy seem less passionate than perverse.

On Mr. Uddich Schmuddich Goes to Town, a shift in the lineup brought in a new saxman and bassist (playing acoustic stand-up) and dropped the pianist. The tracks are more succinct, and the overall impression is that of consolidation and retrenchment.

The Red Flame Laughing Clowns is a compilation that includes both Prince Melon EPs plus three tracks from the album.

By Laughter Around the Table, the Clowns' sound had coalesced into something resembling the Cure gone avant-jazz. The sax playing states melody lines and provides some credible solos, but the overall effect, with one exception, is too willfully abrasive and reaches beyond its musical grasp, especially the drumming.

The arrangements on Law of Nature continue to step on Kuepper's melodies—they're never harmonically brought out to their fullest. Also, the occasional awkwardness or disjointedness of his bitter lyrics is unintentionally emphasized by this kind of non-production, a frustrating undercutting of Kuepper's compositional efforts.

By the time they cut History of Rock n' Roll Volume One, though, all the gears meshed. The Clowns turn out music perversely unillustrative of the title, but with its own dark force and rich, occasionally abrasive textures: swaggering, punching horns, sedate, melodic piano, scratchy, tinny guitar and sliding, stretching acoustic bass, all underpinned by frenetic but authoritative drums. Bravo!

Unfortunately, that apotheosis didn't last. Ghosts is more controlled than Law of Nature, clarity-wise as well as compositionally, but as before it's awkward, the lapses of the drums and sax seem unnecessarily (if unintentionally) overemphasized. The songs seem to be making gestures in the direction of more "normal" structure and style without any commitment to that (or any other) direction.

Gone solo, Kuepper grasped some key elements of the later Clowns sound (notably the use of horns to voice songs' signature riffs) but otherwise opted to skin it back to much more conventional and accessible folk-rock on Electrical Storm. Rooms of the Magnificent took this to another level, displaying much musical variety, even within the same number: "Show Pony" is a quiet, folkish tune which adds horns, which gives way to "Suzie Q"-ish riffing that becomes a coda nearly as long as the song, as guitars and piano flail away like the end of "Layla" gone angry. "Also Sprach the King of Euro-Disco" mates a faintly "Zarathustroid" chord sequence, a James Bondish guitar lick, cool female backing voices, and a killer horn riff.

All of this supports lyrics which twist clichés, making them sardonic (or flat-out bizarre) via voice-tone, juxtaposition or both. The album should have gotten him more attention in America, and it did: Capitol picked up Everybody's Got To, although nothing came of it, commercially speaking. Too bad—it's a further refinement of the distinctively blended arrangements of the previous two albums: intelligent, infectious rock-'n-roll that, without being at all avant, sounds like nobody else. (Not a Soul Around takes its title track from Everybody's Got To, adding two from Rooms and the title track of Electric Storm.)

With his career going absolutely nowhere, Kuepper dropped everyone in his band except drummer Mark Dawson, became Today Wonder and cut an acoustic folk LP that includes "If I Were a Carpenter." Has he lost it? Well, no. "Carpenter" ain't so hot, but most of the rest (including treatments of two other chestnuts, "I'd Rather Be the Devil" and "Hey Gyp") is. It's impressive to hear how full acoustic guitars, drums, a cardboard box and a little echo can sound; Kuepper's voice (in a slightly lower register here) is even better than before. Inspirational love song opening: "I've designs on you that come from dirty books." [jg]

See also Saints.

LAUGHING HYENAS

Come Down to the Merry Go Round EP (Touch and Go) 1987

You Can't Pray a Lie (Touch and Go) 1989 •

Life of Crime (Touch and Go) 1990 •

While three-fourths of this Ann Arbor, Michigan group lays down routine post-punk rock with steady, measured beats (Jim Kimball is a fine drummer) and serious guitar aggression by Larissa Strickland, frontman John Brannon unleashes intelligently irascible/creepy lyrics in a merciless animal shriek that will have you instinctively swallowing to check if your throat hurts

The six-song 12-inch EP, produced (as were the next two records) by Butch Vig, lays out the Hyenas' basic plan, but there isn't enough equilibrium between the understated music and the overdone vocals to be convincing. Bits work, but Brannon's full-throttle efforts leave his bandmates in the dust.

You Can't Pray a Lie gets the balance right. Strickland's charged contributions (it sounds like she's been listening to her Rapeman records) give the singer a high-intensity run for his money. Ironically, while the challenge inspires Brannon to greater feats of frenzy, his roars—mixed to a nearly equal footing with the music—become easier to endure, if not exactly enjoy.

Continuing to organize its four-wheel drive into real forward motion, the Laughing Hyenas lash out with unified vehemence on Life of Crime, honoring the spiritual memory of those legendary Ann Arbor forefathers, the Stooges. While the music heats up, Brannon cools down a bit here and there, showing signs that he could yet become an effective rock growler rather than a fringe-weird screamer. (Both eight-song albums are contained on a single CD.) [i]

PETER LAUGHNER

Peter Laughner (Koolie) 1982

ROCKET FROM THE TOMBS

Life Stinks (Jack Slack) 1990

As chronicler of—and prime mover in—the groundbreaking Cleveland underground scene of the early '70s, Peter Laughner (who died in 1977) galvanized one of the most disparate collections of musicians imaginable into a potent and influential (if ultimately short-lived) force. While crediting his prescience, his eulogists all too often ignore the sheer quality of Laughner's own original musical talent. Though Lou Reed was his major influence (particularly as a vocalist), Laughner's work can scarcely be narrowcast as simply tributary. The post-humous album (gleaned from demos and a brace of live shows) reveals a folkier side; nods to Ramblin' Jack Elliott (on "Rag Baby") and Richard Thompson (the melancholy "Baudelaire") don't obscure the true, life-affirming essence of an original.

Rocket from the Tombs, alternately "led" by Laughner, David Thomas (later of Pere Ubu) and/or Stiv Bators (then merely the ex-lead singer of Youngstown glitter-bozos Mother Goose), kept the flames of Detroit stun-rock raging through the early '70s. Life Stinks, culled from a local radio broadcast, showcases the band at its best, melding searing shock guitar (by Laughner and Gene O'Connor, who later copped the nom de punque Cheetah Chrome) with spaced-out Germanic doodle on tracks like "30 Seconds Over Tokyo," "Life Stinks" (both Laughner compositions that would grace the Ubu catalogue) and "Ain't It Fun" (a future Dead Boys staple). The lovingly, exhaustively annotated set (which comes with a bonus 7-inch featuring "Transfusion" co-written by Laughner and his ex-wife, Cleveland poet/musician Charlotte Pressler) also includes a bevy of lesser-known tracks that attest to the band's intuitive futurism. Anyone attempting to divine the roots of punk will certainly have their rod set awhirl here. [dss]

See also Dead Boys, Pere Ubu.

CYNDI LAUPER

She's So Unusual (Portrait) 1984 •

True Colors (Portrait) 1986 •

A Night to Remember (Epic) 1989 •

She's So Unusual certainly didn't sound like a multi-platinum record on first listen, but that just goes to show you. Originally recognized as the only memorable member of New York's unlamented Blue Angel, Lauper's big voice grew to scarifying proportions under the sympathetic production of Rick Chertoff, supported by the able playing of Eric Bazilian and Rob Hyman, leaders of Philadelphia's then-obscure Hooters. Lauper's songwriting was just getting started, so the album draws on outside material—a potentially disastrous minefield—which proved superb, from the Brains' "Money Changes Everything" (much better in Lauper's live 45 version than on the album's somewhat turgid rendition) to Prince's unforgettable "When You Were Mine" and, of course, Robert Hazard's "Girls Just Want to Have Fun." With talent, easy confidence and self-deflating humor, the colorful Lauper won countless hearts, injecting warmth and graciousness into the mega-pop world.

Two years later, the inevitable letdown of True Colors is fairly serious as Lauper, who co-produced and co-wrote most of the material, takes bad spills on both fronts. While "Maybe He'll Know" and "True Colors" are wholeheartedly wonderful, "Change of Heart" and a cover of Marvin Gaye's "What's Going On" are sabotaged by overzealousness (especially the bombastic drumming) on the former and blandness on the latter. Considering what a unique and remarkable singer Lauper is, the squandering of her gifts on this uninspired, halfbaked throwaway is tragic.

Seemingly with nowhere to go but up, Lauper then made—after a lengthy delay during which the record was advertised in Billboard as Kindred Spirit—a record that is even worse. Reeking of commercial trepidation, A Night to Remember showcases a no-two-the-same set of vocal guises in service of mediocre, often bizarre material by various hits-for-hire songwriters. "My First Night Without You" recaptures some of Lauper's brassy allure, but an artist whose initial popularity sprang from her charmingly casual aplomb shouldn't sound this anxious. Scratchy snippets of imitation Appalachian folk, coy novelties ("Like a Cat," "Insecurious"), a Joan Armatrading soundalike, a melodramatic Spectorish torch song—it's all here, and none of it works. [i]

See also Blue Angel.

LAVA HAY

Lava Hay (Network-Polydor) 1990 ◊

On its American debut, this Toronto duo sounds like half the Bangles. Steve Berlin's hack-in-a-coffee-house rock production (lose the flute, guys) lays too heavy a burden on Michèle Gould and Suzanne Little, who write nice but unspectacular folk-pop romances and sing them with liquid, uplifting harmonies. Lava Hay is certainly talented, but Lava Hay doesn't have the magic (or even the hooks) to be anything more than a passing warm breeze. [i]

LAWNDALE

Beyond Barbecue (SST) 1986

Sasquatch Rock (SST) 1987 •

As part of an effort to change its image and expand its scope beyond the confines of punk, SST signed this surf-guitar quartet from Lawndale (the Southern California town where the label is based) and released two albums of winning twang. Staking a claim on '60s West Coast beach instrumentals, Lawndale plays original compositions (plus occasional offbeat borrowings, like "Interstellar Caravan," credited to Pink Floyd and Duke Ellington) with unaffected enthusiasm and spunk. The only indication of the band's '80s orientation is song titles like "The Story of Vanna White," "The Days of Pup & Taco," "March of the Melted Army Men" and "Sasquatch Rock."

The second album has a less-specific period feel and exchanges Mosrite clarity for ambitious clutter (adding fuzzbox, harmonica and even a fleeting "Robert Plant vocal" on "Take Five," which quotes "Whole Lotta Love"), but both promise a refreshing dip into delightful, if well-charted, waters. [i]

LAWSON SQUARE INFIRMARY

See Triffids.

LAZY COWGIRLS

Lazy Cowgirls (Restless) 1985

Tapping the Source (Bompl) 1987

Third Time's The Charm (Aus. Grown Up Wrong) 1988

Radio Cowgirl (Sympathy for the Record Industry) 1989

How It Looks: How It Is (Sympathy for the Record Industry) 1990

By the time a pair of ne'er-do-well Hoosier punks rechristened themselves Axl and Izzy and headed west to the promised land, the core of Vincennes, Indiana's Lazy Cowgirls had already blazed that trail, absorbing many of the same substances (both aurally and otherwise) while retaining the ingrained grittiness and knee-jerk bad attitude that marks 'em as true punks. The quartet's self-titled debut is a near-perfect crystallization of everything that was right about pre-Anglomaniac punk: the Dictators' fuck-'em-if-they-can't-take-a-joke mentality, the Dolls' loving R&B butchery and (most importantly) the Ramones' strum und bang "subtlety." On the first Cowgirls album, "Time" and "Drugs" are especially Brudda-like in their eloquently monosyllabic exploration of said subjects.

Realizing that a repeat performance might brand them as nostalgists, combined with a bit of bonding with speed-poet auteur Chris D., the Cowgirls were pushed to create their masterwork—the amphetaminized Tapping the Source. The bitterness that lurks just beneath Allen Clark's hyperspeed Sandy Nelson beats makes songs like "Heartache" and "Goddamn Bottle" (perhaps the finest cry-in-your-suds punk tune ever) truly affecting. This no-hope factory-town blues just can't be learned; the Cowgirls are steeped in it.

Third Time's the Charm (which features a side-splitting side-long interview with the band) is a bit flat but, even when the music veers towards standard hardcore structures, there's layers of subtext (about only the most pressing subjects, of course: liquor, cheating' and the Christianization of Larry Flynt).

Radio Cowgirl, which documents one of the band's legendary excessive live sets (minus the sorely missed visual aspect of the diminutive and balding dervish frontman Pat Todd), boasts chafing-at-the-bit covers of the Saints' "Know Your Product" and the Ramones' "Carbona Not Glue." It's also notable as the first release on Sympathy for the Record Industry, a prolific label that repeatedly attests to the huge impact Todd and company have had on their city's punk scene.

Alleged to be the band's swansong, How It Looks never downshifts from overdrive, but the wheels are often left spinning. Generic blitzkrieg bops like "Teenage Frankenstein" and "Sex Kittens Compare Scratches" are conceptually hackneyed and musically shopworn. Then again, Todd's sneering delivery alone can carry hate missives like the title track and the very Pagans-like "D.I.E. in Indiana." If they've indeed ridden into the smog-shrouded sunset for the last time, the Lazy Cowgirls have left quite a legacy—and staked a pretty secure claim to being the Last True Punk Rock Band. [dss]

LEAD INTO GOLD

See Ministry.

LEAGUE OF CRAFTY GUITARISTS

See Robert Fripp.

LEAGUE OF GENTLEMEN

See Robert Fripp.

LEAGUE UNLIMITED ORCHESTRA

See Human League.

PAUL LEARY

See Butthole Surfers.

LEAVING TRAINS

Well Down Blue Highway (Bemisbrain-Enigma) 1984

Kill Tunes (SST) 1986 •

Fuck (SST) 1987 •

Transportational D. Vices (SST) 1989 •

Sleeping Underwater Survivors (SST) 1991 •

Co-produced by Rain Parader David Roback and featuring a guest drummer from Gun Club and a keyboard player from Green on Red, Well Down Blue Highway makes it clear that Leaving Trains, a Pacific Palisades trio, is well-connected in the California new-rock/folk/blues community. Unlike many new bands, they don't sound like R.E.M. and are neither psychedelic, country nor otherwise '60s-derived, which makes Well Down Blue Highway individual, but hard to characterize. Falling James' introspective songs and unaffected, clumsy vocals form the basis of the sound and personality, eschewing complexity, hooks and smoothness in favor of dry, blunt rock'n'roll.

With Kill Tunes, the Trains opt for a bopping punk edge. The LP is particularly inspired by the early Saints ("Private Affair" from Eternally Yours is covered) and manages to continuously shift gears, from shit-kicking 4/4 like "She's Looking at You" and "Black" to lighter ballads ("Light Rain" and "Kinette"), with an appropriate mixture of humor ("A Drunker Version of You" is a blast), anger, sadness and restlessness.

Fuck debuts a new lineup with Falling James (Moreland) as the quartet's only holdover and is even more of a slam-bang affair. The songs come in one-minute blasts like "How Can I Explode?"—no frills, just start 'em up and let 'er rip. Fuck's overall manic tone makes it half the album Kill Tunes is, but so long as you can get mounted on this wild bronco, it's an exciting ride. Afterwards, the LP winds up with a nine-and-a-half-minute dirge called "What the President Meant to Say," offering listeners plenty of time to recuperate.

Transportational D. Vices is so similar that it might as well be titled Fuck II. Again characterized by blink-and-you'll-miss-'em 4/4 blowouts and James' spontaneous-they-must-be-one-take vocals, the Trains nevertheless integrate a bluesy skanker ("Dude the Cat") and two driving, cool rockers ("Any Old Time" and "You're Never Gonna Love Me Anymore") that would do Kill Tunes justice. There's also a striking rendition of the Urinals' (later known as 100 Flowers) anti-pop obscurity, "Black Hole." Fun from start to finish.

One of America's most reliable, simple, high-octane rock'n'roll bands with chops, attitude and commitment to chaos, Leaving Trains released a new album, Sleeping Underwater Survivors, in early '91 and reportedly have another LP in the can. Stay tuned. [i/jr]

KEITH LEBLANC

See Tackhead.

JACK LEE

See Nerves.

TIM LEE

See Windbreakers.

LEGAL WEAPON

No Sorrow EP (Arsenal) 1981 (Triple X) 1991 •
Death of Innocence (Arsenal) 1982 (Triple X) 1991 •
Four Weapon (Arsenal) 1982 (Triple X) 1991 •
Interior Hearts (Arsenal) 1986 (Triple X) 1991 •
Life Sentence to Love (MCA) 1988

No Sorrow—five slices of catchy rock in an early X/Avengers mode—documents the earliest version of his Southern California punk outfit, when it contained bassist Patricia Morrison, late of the Bags. With Morrison headed off to a more visible career with Gun Club and Sisters of Mercy, however, Death of Innocence catapulted Legal Weapon into greatness, and is one of the last decade's most underrated punk albums. From start to finish it goes all-out, song after darkly astringent song. Brian Hansen's loud, Ramones-meet-Stones guitar riffs mesh with dynamic rhythm playing; Kat Arthur possesses a wonderfully sensual whiskey voice, like a hardcore Janis Joplin. From galvanizing rockers like "Daddy's Gone Mad," "Waiting in Line," "War Babies" and a redone "No Sorrow" to the anti-incest drama of "Don't Pretend" and the superb, disillusioned title track, the material is tightly arranged and powerful, replete with gritty hooks and complex, semi-metallic twists. Members of the Adolescents help out on bass and rhythm guitar.

Wasting no time, Legal Weapon quickly whipped out the nearly-as-amazing Your Weapon, packaged in an elaborate fold-out poster. While not quite as consistent, it has basically the same sound as its predecessor, but with meatier production and a solid, fulltime rhythm section. Arthur once again pushes the material—especially the epic ballad "Only Lost Today" and the bluesy-punk anthem, "Equalizer"—to compelling heights. On "The Stare," the raw mix of lust and vulnerability in her voice is a revelation.

Legal Weapon signed to a major label around 1984 and began recording an album. But the project fizzled and Interior Hearts—a likable but disappointing LP, with thin sound and more of a country/blues flavor (again, like then-current X)—appeared on their own label instead.

That record is a gem compared to Life Sentence to Love, which totally blows. Having finally done the big time deal, Legal Weapon serve up a keyboard-laden cross between Heart and the Cult over which Arthur tries to emote. Re-recorded versions of "Interior Hearts" and "Tears of Steel" from the previous album are not improvements; the old spark and power are nowhere to be found. A life sentence to oblivion is more like it. [gef]

See also Gun Club, Sisters of Mercy.

LEGENDARY PINK DOTS

Chemical Playschool [tape] (nr/Mirrodot) 1981
Kleine Krieg [tape] (nr/Mirrodot) 1981
Brighter Now (Bel. Terminal Kaleidoscope-Play It Again Sam) 1982 •
Curse (Bel. Terminal Kaleidoscope-Play It Again Sam) 1983 •

Faces in the Fire (Bel. Terminal Kaleidoscope-Play It Again Sam) 1984 •
The Tower (Bel. Terminal Kaleidoscope-Play It Again Sam) 1984 •
Greeting 9 (It. Materiali Sonori) 1984
The Lovers (Hol. Ding Dong) 1985
Asylum (Bel. Play It Again Sam) 1985 •
Curious Guy EP (Bel. Play It Again Sam) 1986
Island of Jewels (Bel. Play It Again Sam) 1987 •
Stone Circles: A Legendary Pink Dots Anthology (Play It Again Sam) 1987 •
Any Day Now (Play It Again Sam) 1987 •
The Golden Age (Play It Again Sam) 1988 •
Legendary Pink Box (Bel. Play It Again Sam) 1989
The Crushed Velvet Apocalypse (Play It Again Sam) 1990 •
The Maria Dimension (Play It Again Sam-Caroline) 1991 •

EDWARD KA-SPEL

Laugh China Doll (Hol. Torso) 1984 (nr/Play It Again Sam) 1989 •
Eyes! China Doll (Hol. Scarface) 1985
Cheyck, China Doll (Hol. Torso) 1986
Perhaps We'll Only See a Thin Blue Line (nr/Play It Again Sam) 1989

TEAR GARDEN

Tired Eyes Slowly Burning (Can. Netwerk) 1987
(Netwerk-Capitol) 1990 •

Formed in London around 1980, the Legendary Pink Dots relocated to Amsterdam in the middle of the decade, using that city as the basis for an enormously productive and diverse career that—despite clear cryptopop accessibility amid occasionally excessive psychedelic exotica—has remained well below commercial radar. Proceeding out of a hodgepodge of gloomy/fringey/hippie antecedents—Joy Division, Syd Barrett, Faust, etc.—but adding a classical sensibility, inviolated mythology, found-sound sampling weirdness, plus all sorts of stylistic cross-mingling and experimentation, Edward Ka-Spel (vocals, lyrics, keyboards), Phil Knights (aka The Silver Man; keyboards) and a shifting collection of associates have turned the Legendary Pink Dots into an open-ended adventure. Although certainly prone to enigmatic risk-taking, the enormously resourceful LPD is a mellifluous and dynamically restrained proposition: this is one dip into the rock netherworld that won't send you running for cover. The lyrics, however—a disturbing onslaught of doom, violence and apocalypse—are a different story.

After years of Europe-only releases, the Dots issued the Stone Circles compilation, an introductory essay of selected album tracks and one new track. With the ice thus melted, all of the group's subsequent albums have been issued Stateside (save for the limited-edition Legendary Pink Box set: three albums' worth of rarities, unreleased items, alternate versions and compilation contributions).

Opening with a majestic church organ that suddenly goes all wobbly, Any Day Now is a lovely album of songs with strong (dare it be said—catchy?) melodies and a blend of electro-pop and classical arrangements. Ka-Spel's preternaturally calm multi-tracked singing helps focus the diverse instrumentation, which includes violin, horns and harmonium; real-world sound effects add a strong dramatic element.

Lyricaly, The Golden Age is a concept drama about a psychopath stalking his former lover, a model (?) who taunts him from the TV screen and magazine pages. The chilly and suavely spare continental music—imagine a desiccated version of the Pet Shop Boys—does little to distract from Ka-Spel's nearly dissolute delivery, which wavers in and out of Gary Numanesque melodrama. Elegantly, deceptively powerful.

Several tracks on The Crushed Velvet Apocalypse—a pleasant but creatively anemic outing—interrupt scenes of pastoral musical beauty with musique concrète noises; “The Green Gang” runs sitar/tabla meanderings into twittering flutes and winds up building a quietly disturbing skein of motorway noise. “The Death of Jack the Ripper”—an artfully lurid, slow-paced horror tale accompanied by the electronic sound of water dripping—comes as a grisly jolt on an album that begins with “I Love You in Your Tragic Beauty,” an affectingly sad acoustic-guitar-plus-accordion pop song that strongly suggests the TV Personalities, and ends with the offbeat but enticing “New Tomorrow.”

The Dots expend more effort on The Maria Dimension, a highly imaginative but relatively straightforward (for this decidedly bent group) and consistently engrossing collection that romps ambitiously—and, more often than not, successfully—through colorful '60sish psychedelia, electronics, disconcerting sound effects and baroque pop. A most entertaining and stimulating trip.

Besides making a handful of solo albums, the prolific Ka-Spel collaborated with members of Skinny Puppy on the Tear Garden album. [i]

See also Skinny Puppy.

RAY LEMA

See Stewart Copeland.

LEMONHEADS

Laughing All the Way to the Cleaners EP (Muh-Bag) 1986

Hate Your Friends (Taangl) 1987

Creator (Taangl) 1988

Create Your Friends [CD] (Taangl) 1989 •

Lick (Taangl) 1989 •

Lovey (Atlantic) 1990 •

Favorite Spanish Dishes EP [CD] (Atlantic) 1991 •

Boston's Lemonheads must have great record collections. Throughout a five-year (and counting) career fraught with lineup upheavals, the core (until 1990) of bassist Jesse Peretz and guitarists/singers/drummers Evan Dando and Ben Deily seemed able to absorb loads of nugget rocks (punk-, hard-, even folk-) and toss off nugget after nugget of pure pop.

The brief introductory 7-inch contains four raw and restless poppy punk songs, three of which eventually turned up on later albums. With tuneless hardcore tantrums, noisy guitar raunch and pristine power pop, Hate Your Friends is a jarring and frustrating debut LP whose jewels (“Second Chance,” “Don't Tell Yourself It's OK,” “Uhhh” and the remarkable Saints soundalike “Fed Up”) luckily manage to outweigh the dross.

As the young quartet continued to do its growing up in public, Creator has more ambitious arrangements, and the influence of such bands as Mission of Burma and the dB's can be sensed in songs like “Clang Bang Clang” (later redone, on Lovey, as “Left for Dead”) and “Take Her Down.” Unfortunately, a couple of pretty numbers are marred by wretched Hallmark-card sentiments. One neat surprise: a fairly reverent cover of Kiss' old “Plaster Caster.” (Both albums were later combined on the Create Your Friends CD.)

In 1989, the same year Dando served as the Blake Babies' bassist, the Lemonheads gained some notoriety with a bracing, off-the-cuff version of Suzanne Vega's “Luka.” That track (and, on the CD, an effective electrified stab at Patsy Cline's “Strange”) highlight the schizophrenic Lick, which counters almost every clever move (like the appropriation of the All in the Family theme on “7 Powers”) with a misguided dead end (like the trite “Anyway”).

(The Lemonheads had a 1990 UK hit with another cover version, Mike Nesmith's “Different Drum.” That track, and its two Dando-penned B-sides, were later issued Stateside on Favorite Spanish Dishes, a five-song CD with tributes to the Misfits and New Kids on the Block.)

With the departure of Deily, Dando—for years the group's creative force and chief songwriter—stepped to the fore. While the move to a major label thankfully did nothing to undercut the Lemonheads, Dando's sensitive side is very much in evidence on Lovey. The R.E.M.-ish “Half the Time,” BÖC-ish “(The) Door” and Gram Parsons' “Brass Buttons” reveal a punk kid almost all grown up, with no qualms about expressing his perhaps unfashionable faves/influences. Dando's lyrical preoccupations may seem a little strange at times: he quotes (and discusses) Charlie Manson on “Ballarat,” offers an ode to pot on the wah-wah workout “Li'l Seed” and embraces true mundanity in “Stove,” a song about getting rid of one. The sole Lemonhead remaining after a post-LP split, Dando reportedly performed much of Lovey himself. If so, that's quite an achievement, as it's a fine, varied collection. [db]

See also Blake Babies.

LEN BRIGHT COMBO

See Wreckless Eric.

LEONARDS

The Leonards (Rock Ranch) 1988

Considering the mediocrities that constantly get signed out of the Hollywood club scene, it's amazing that a band like the Leonards can deliver a red-hot seven-cut indie album like this and still be ignored by the majors. The Leonards contains nothing but searing, sneering garage rock'n'roll—'60s in construction, '80s in energy. The band has no pose to sell, just good tunes executed with verve and skill. Guess that explains it. [ds]

LEOPARDS

Kansas City Slickers (Moon) 1977

Magic Still Exists (Vox) 1988

On first listen, you'd swear that the 1977 indie album from Kansas City, Kansas is Muswell Hillbillies—era Kinks—and on second and third listen, as well. This talented foursome not only perfectly re-creates the Kinks' classic sound (complete with a spot-on Ray Davies vocal impression by main Leopard Dennis Pash), they also turn out originals that subtly rewrite various Kinks tunes without ever resorting to obvious lifts. Genius.

By the time the Leopards got around to releasing another album more than a decade later, the Kinks had a lower profile than ever, which makes Magic Still Exists a most welcome arrival. On its opening track, the hyper "Block Party," the band threatens to stake out a style of its own; after that, Pash and friends get back to business, sounding as wonderfully Kinky as ever. Here's hoping they do it again in 1999. [i/hd]

LEROI BROTHERS

Check This Action (Jungle) 1983 (nr/Demon) 1984
Forget About the Danger Think of the Fun EP (Columbia) 1984

Lucky Lucky Me (Profile) 1985
Protection from Enemies (nr/Demon) 1985
Open All Night (Profile) 1986 •
Viva Leroi (Fr. New Rose) 1989 •

BALLAD SHAMBLES

Ballad Shambles EP (Skyclad) 1988

HAND OF GLORY

Far from Kith and Kin (Skyclad) 1990 •
Here Be Serpents (Skreamin' Skull-Skyclad) 1991 •

It goes without saying that no one in Austin, Texas' LeRoi Brothers is named LeRoi. Debuting on the unpretentious Check This Action as a trio (singer/guitarists Steve Doerr and Don Leady and drummer Mike Buck) plus a guest bassist, the LeRois set to rocking without ado, reeling off energetically unreconstructed rock'n'roll/R&B covers (plus a few originals that don't slow down the party one bit) in an unmistakable Southwestern accent. Nothing fancy at all, just solidly American music given a sweaty workout.

Adding singer Joe Doerr and a permanent bassist, and recutting "Ain't I'm a Dog" (dig that syntax!) from the first LP, the LeRois entered the big leagues with six greasy slices of fun, Forget About the Danger. Burning with the hellfire spirit of Jerry Lee Lewis (only lacking his pumping piano), songs like "Treat Her Right" and "D.W.I." state the band's case with conviction and maximum excitement.

With Evan Johns replacing guitarist Don Leady (who went on to form the Tail Gators), Lucky Lucky Me is even better—a full menu of high-energy tunes played for keeps. "Fight Fire with Fire," the zydeco-tinged "The Back Door" and a quick history lesson, "Elvis in the Army," are among the highlights. (Protection from Enemies is the same album with an alternate title, cover and song sequence.)

The following year, a four-man lineup (Joe Doerr is gone; Johns has returned to his own career, replaced by Rick Rawls) led by Steve Doerr and Mike Buck whipped off the seemingly effortless Open All Night, a splendid slice of tasty archetypal Texas R&B that shimmies and howls with understated eloquence from start to finish. (Actually, "Ballad of the LeRoi Brothers," the mock-serious cowboy ballad which closes the album, isn't that great.) Fans of Dave Edmunds are strongly advised not to miss this one.

Dispensing with the traditional electric grit, Viva Leroi finds the quartet in a slower and gentler mood (read duller) than usual, playing Buddy Holly-styled Texas pop, Doug Sahm-speed rock, country and a little lightweight N'Orleans gumbo with so little pep and zest that it sounds as if someone's baby might be asleep in the next room. (When new bassist Speedy Sparks sings a song that complains about music being too loud, you know things have gone very wrong.) The record gets interesting (not exciting, mind you) when the idioms bump into each other, as in "Mambo Leroi," which feeds Rawls' Nashville-styled picking into Doerr's pumping accordion, but otherwise this is pretty tepid.

Joe Doerr's Ballad Shambles is a similar (but less rootsy or stylish) quartet. Although hot guitarist Michael Maye (ex-H-Bombs) is the band's main songwriter, the 12-inch EP—which is okay, but no big deal—contains two Joe Doerr tunes and one by his brother Steve. Following that band, Joe formed the far superior Hand of Glory, a diverse and exciting quartet which includes guitarist Bill Anderson (a B.S. holdover) and bassist Tim Swingle (ex-Doctor's Mob). Mixing up cowboy rock, blues, Doorsy atmospherics and more with confidence and creativity, Hand of Glory is a strikingly potent band. Rey Washam (ex-Scratch Acid/Rapeman) is the drummer and co-producer on the fine Here Be Serpents. [i]

See also Evan Johns and His H-Bombs.

LET'S ACTIVE

Afoot EP (IRS) 1983 •
Cypress (IRS) 1984 •
Big Plans for Everybody (IRS) 1986 •
Every Dog Has His Day (IRS) 1988 •

Cursed by chronic cuteness, North Carolina's Let's Active is probably the most misunderstood of the South's new pop bands. Though dogged by a rosy-cheeked nicest-guys-of-wimp-pop image, they can be downright moody. Led by wunderkind producer/multi-instrumentalist Mitch Easter, the trio began in 1981, but emerged nationally in the wake of R.E.M., whose first two discs Easter co-produced in his now-fabled Drive-In garage studio. Joining that band's label, Let's Active released a six-song EP, Afoot, bringing new meaning to such overused pop adjectives as crisp, bright and ringing. All the songs, even those with melancholy lyrics, emerged hook-filled, boppy and ultra-hummable.

But things were not as they seemed. Although perceived as the engineer of the now-sound-of-today in American guitar pop, Easter's own tastes were running towards the electronic gadgetry of techno-rock. Also, his two original partners—bassist Faye Hunter and drummer Sara Romweber—were viewed as sidepeople, notwithstanding Easter's egalitarian efforts to counter that impression. In real life, the trio were not just simple, cheerful popsters. Both Easter's love of "sounds" and the band's inner conflicts were explored on Cypress, making it deeper and more enduring, though not as immediately winning as Afoot. Denser, rambling textural pieces—some wistful, even angry—came to the fore. Few records sound so multi-dimensional, and Let's Active has, for that reason, been tagged psychedelic—they make sounds you can almost touch. (In 1989, IRS released a single CD of Afoot plus Cypress.)

Both Romweber and Hunter subsequently left the band. Easter did shows with other players (including Windbreaker Tim Lee), recording Big Plans for Everybody piecemeal with four people, including Hunter and two permanent associates: Angie Carlson (the future Mrs. Easter; guitar, keyboards) and Eric Marshall (drums). Far less twinky and hardly cute, Big Plans is disturbingly downcast, a doleful version of pop music that isn't about sad things, but still leaves you feeling that way. The album connects emotionally, with offbeat songs that really make an impression.

Adding bassist John Heames and a few dBs of electric power, Every Dog Has His Day effectively combines Easter's homey studio approach with co-producer John Leckie's chartworthy British experience. From the blazing-guitars title track and the stomping romance of "Sweepstakes Winner" to the overtly Beatlesque "Mr. Fool," the best songs (most of them on Side One; "I Feel Funny" dominates the flip) are classic Easter: unsettled emotional lyrics and eccentric pop melodies that have him straining on vocal tiptoes to reach the hard bits. [ep/i]

See also Snatches of Pink, Sneakers, Windbreakers.

KEITH LEVENE

2011—Back Too Black EP (Iridescence) 1987

Keith Levene's Violent Opposition EP (Taangl) 1987

Keith Levene's Violent Opposition (Taangl) 1989 [CD]

(Rykodisc) 1989 •

Best known for his five-year stint in Public Image Ltd. (ending in 1983 when he was wiped off the finished mix of This Is What You Want, resulting in his dubiously legal release of an alternate edition, Commercial Zone), guitarist Levene was also an original member of the Clash, but left after a handful of gigs. He also played with Ken Lockie in Cowboys International.

As a solo artist, Levene hasn't done much recording in recent years, but his meager output has managed to create an involved little discography anyway. The first EP consists of simple instrumentals—played on guitar, bass, Fairlight and rhythm machines—in reggae, funk and industrial veins. The four-song second EP, with members of the Red Hot Chili Peppers, Fishbone and Thelouious Monster supporting, contains another dub instrumental (with sax) as well as a pointless copycat version of Hendrix's "If 6 Was 9" (which Rykodisc issued on a 3-inch CD).

The confusingly titled 1989 album (released simultaneously on tape and vinyl by Taangl and on CD by Ryko) combines the two EPs, adding a trivial ska cover and a razor-edge version of John Lennon's "Cold Turkey." [i]

See also Public Image Ltd., Jah Wobble.

LEVI AND THE ROCKATS

See Rockats.

GRAHAM LEWIS

See Dome, Wire.

LIFE IN A BLENDER

Welcome to the Jelly Days (Fake Doom) 1988

A textbook example of contemporary New Jersey college pop, Life in a Blender brings ample musical (not vocal) skills to witty material on its friendly and lightweight album, nicely produced by ex-Waitress Chris Butler. Don Ralph's nerdy singing (and the occasional embarrassingly adolescent sex lyric) gives the enterprise a certain humility it doesn't really need; his five band-mates' economically neat playing (especially Jon Gregg's crisp guitar work) is hardly ivory tower stuff. On those tracks where Ralph hits his stride and gets a good grip on the melody, Welcome to the Jelly Days is quite enjoyable; the annoyingly amateurish episodes undercut the pleasure but don't ruin the record. [i]

LIGHTNING

Lightning Strike (RCA) 1988 •

If you've worn out your early Clash records and still can't get enough of the fiery mid-speed sound of '78 Anglpunk, try this enthusiastically derivative London quintet for a good second-hand dose of intelligent and tuneful rock. Adding echoes of various new wave legends, updated lyrics, skillful playing and a bit of hip-hop iconography, Lightning succeeds in reliving a great era with conviction and credibility. The CD adds one track. [i]

LIGHTNING SEEDS

Cloudcuckooland (nr/Ghetto) 1989 (MCA) 1990 •

Rock criticism isn't the only refuge for failed musicians: many successful record producers harbor dreams of making their mark on the other side of the studio glass as well. Starting in the '70s, Ian Broudie played guitar in various pivotal Liverpool bands (Big in Japan, Opium Eaters, Original Mirrors) before becoming a prosperous knob-twiddler with Echo and the Bunnymen, the Fall, Icicle Works, etc. In this new phase of his career, Broudie is the Lightning Seeds, crafting likable, occasionally spectacular (e.g., "Pure") pop songs with finely modulated arrangements that use new instruments to honor old values. Cloudcuckooland's slick amalgam of familiar styles (the obvious borrowings aren't enough to be annoying) can turn a bit glib, but Broudie's artlessly adequate voice (like Neil Tennant's, but with more melody and less attitude) puts an end to that, making the record's tone as friendly as a puppy. (The CD and cassette add "Frenzy.") [i]

See also Big in Japan, Original Mirrors.

LILACS

See Green.

LILAC TIME

The Lilac Time (nr/Swordfish) 1987 (Mercury) 1988 •

Paradise Circus (Fontana) 1989 •

& Love for All (Fontana) 1990 ♢

Abandoning his solo career and discarding the Tin Tin moniker once and for all, Birmingham singer/songwriter Stephen Duffy formed a band with his brother Nick and a rhythm section. Although the group's idiom is rustic folk-pop rather than catchy dance music, the unfailingly delightful Lilac Time displays the same perfectionist craftsmanship Duffy brought to his solo work.

The Lilac Time is an unprepossessing gem, a collection of jaunty love songs, small-town contemplations and skeptical bits of philosophy brought to life with simple delicacy on acoustic guitar, mandolin, piano, harmonica and beautiful harmonies. (The two CD bonus tracks are "Railway Bazaar" and the elegiac "Gone for a Burton," about the late actor.)

A country-western influence complicates Duffy's romantic songwriting on Paradise Circus, an attractive but less glorious album that fits the same folksy instrumentation (plus accordion) into fuller, smoother arrangements with horn and string accents. Highlights: "American Eyes," "If the Stars Shine Tonight" and "The Girl Who Waves at Trains."

Half-produced by Andy Partridge (Duffy collaborated with John Leckie on the rest), & Love for All brings XTC's involuted art-rock arranging style to bear on Duffy's far less intricate tunes. Although electrifying the Lilac Time (the LP uses plenty of piano played by Billy Bragg sidewoman Cara Tivey and acoustic guitar, but Partridge's tracks rock at about the same level as Skylarking) is an iffy proposition, songs like "Fields," the nostalgic "All for Love & Love for All" (which incorporates the Beatles in both lyrics and music), "The Laundry" and the brilliantly XTC-ish "It'll End in Tears (I Won't Cry)" work out fine. But that leaves the less dynamic performances sounding flat. Sometimes you just can't win. [i]

See also Stephen Duffy.

LIME SPIDERS

Slave Girl EP (Big Time) 1985

Weirdo Libido EP (Aus. Virgin) 1987

The Cave Comes Alive! (Virgin) 1987 •

Headcleaner (Aus. Virgin) 1988 •

Volatile (Caroline) 1988 •

Beethoven's Fist (nr/Fun After All) 1990 •

The excellent retro-rock that fills the Lime Spiders' aptly titled Cave Comes Alive! album gleefully plunders various '60s punk vaults. Rather than imitating any specific genre, this quartet from Sydney, Australia synthesizes an original version of that musical era with searing guitars, Tony Bambach's exceptional bass work, occasional churning organ, raveup drumming and Mick Blood's hardy singing. Sketchy but unaffected production allows the group to color their songs (plus a swell cover of Cream's "NSU" and a couple of more obscure non-originals) in different shades of black leather, day-glo green and deep purple.

Slave Girl is a compilation of the band's first two Australian 45s: a 1983 double 7-inch and "Slave Girl"/"Beyond the Fringe." Headcleaner is a sixteen-track compilation.

The Spiders' second album is well played but miserably plain, utterly lacking The Cave's colorful personality. With dumb lyrics and pedestrian hard-rock that is less inspired by the past than mired in it, Volatile does have a few stick-to-your-ribs tunes ("The Other Side of You," the CD-only "Jagged Edge"), but is otherwise old-fashioned in the worst possible way. A needless dance mix of the dismal title track is among the three CD bonuses. [tr]

ERIK LINDGREN

See Birdsongs of the Mesozoic, Space Negroes.

ARTO LINDSAY/AMBITIOUS LOVERS

Envy (Editions EG) 1984 •

AMBITIOUS LOVERS

Greed (Virgin) 1988 •

Lust (Elektra) 1991 •

PETER SCHERER/ARTO LINDSAY

Pretty Ugly [CD] (Bel. Made to Measure) 1990 •

Lindsay, an American who grew up in Brazil, came to New York in the mid-'70s intent on becoming an artist. Only later did he adopt music as his medium and develop a unique percussive style of singing and playing guitar—generally around the beat, seldom on it—and no melodies, thank you. His guitar is untuned; his voice strains to deliver its quota of sounds. (Lindsay's two main vocal influences are James Brown and the sound of people screwing.) In assembling the Ambitious Lovers, Lindsay balances the electronic expertise of Peter Scherer with Brazilian percussionists and injects himself as the catalyst, with help from Mark Miller of the Toy Killers.

On Envy, Lindsay and five Lovers recapitulate his career—the tight, anti-melodic structures of DNA, the charging funk-noise of the Golden Palominos—yet deliver something new as well. "Let's Be Adult" is an unabashed dancefloor move and, on "Dora," Lindsay turns crooner, caressing a soulful melody anyone could hum. The catch is that it's in Portuguese—oh, that Arto! Lindsay's words are tantalizingly oblique, but there's nothing oblique about his record's lusty cry for recognition.

The Ambitious Lovers then settled down to a duo of Lindsay and keyboardist Scherer, although John Zorn, Vernon Reid, Naná Vasconcelos and others make contributions to Greed. Still frequently spattered with nutty noises, the album is surprisingly accessible; Arto's singing (again in English and Portuguese) rarely requires listener indulgence. So if "King" contains some impressive chicken squawk guitar and a houseful of Latin percussion instruments, the song itself is reasonably mainstream. Whether Greed is viewed as a commercial compromise or a more subtly subversive undertaking than the first LP, the mixture of normalcy and extremism gives it fascinating dynamic tension.

Pretty Ugly consists of ballet and theater commissions Scherer and Lindsay undertook between the first two Ambitious Lovers LPs. Mostly instrumental, the disc offers a tonic to those who deemed Greed too mainstream. This sonic feast, including the 26-minute title cut, brims with jarring sounds and rhythms but it coheres just as well—and as unexpectedly—as late DNA material.

Still reflecting a strong Brazilian influence, the Lovers' next album, Lust, ventures even further into commercial realms than Greed, eschewing the short, quirky song fragments that were dotted among the more accessible numbers on the previous album and going for an overall smoother feel. The group remains artistically uncompromised, however; one might say that Scherer and Lindsay are as merse as they wanna be. And as funky, too: the group's cover of Jorge Ben's classic "Umbabarauma" is an irresistible dancefloor workout. Lust has enough of that unique Lindsay guitar squeal to keep the old-timers interested, but traditionalists might be disappointed that Arto's turning into an out-and-out crooner—and a damn good one at that. His lyrics, almost exclusively dealing with romance and sexuality, remain as peculiarly trenchant as ever—in that department, he's a postmodern Cole Porter. With all that going for it, plus the always innovative and intriguing sonic textures Scherer so effortlessly weaves, Lust is another solid and dazzling work in the Ambitious Lovers' canon. But what happens when they run out of deadly sins? [mf/i/gk]

See also DNA, Golden Palominos, Lounge Lizards, Love of Life Orchestra.

LIQUID LIQUID

Liquid Liquid EP (99) 1981

Successive Reflexes EP (99) 1981

Optimo EP (99) 1983

Along with labelmates ESG, Liquid Liquid exemplified the minimalist funk movement that swept New York's music underground in 1981. The band's impressive five-song debut (one side recorded live) fuses metal-phones with congas, marimba and other percussive gadgetry to create hypnotic urban-tribal funk. Except for the vocals, that goal is realized. Successive Reflexes also works, although full-scale production values alter the previously skeletal sound.

Optimo—four more songs on another 12-inch—continues the rhythmic intensity, and is specially notable for "Cavern," an insidious and lengthy bass/drums groove that was later adopted as the musical basis for Grandmaster Flash & Melle Mel's "White Lines (Don't Don't Do It)." [gf/i]

LIVE SKULL

Live Skull EP (Massive) 1984 •

Bringing Home the Bait (Homestead) 1985

Cloud One (Homestead) 1986

Don't Get Any on You (Homestead) 1987

Dusted (Homestead) 1987 •

Snuffer EP (Caroline) 1988 •

Positraction (Caroline) 1989 •

Droning and dragging rusty guitar streaks and deep stormy basslines as dark as bus exhaust, Live Skull combine great grating sheets of guitar shimmer with deliberately monotonous vocals to create swirling intense tunes that you couldn't hum if a loaded gun were aimed at your head. As part of the same New York avant-noisy scene that spawned Sonic Youth, Lydia Lunch and the Swans, Live Skull records come complete with creepy lyrics, circular melodies and nod-out drum beats designed to lull you into their macabre world.

The quartet plays slow, grinding hypno-rock on Live Skull; there are vocals buried in the mix but you won't notice them much. The relentless wash of semi-organized guitar noise is clearly the band's focal point. The promising Bringing Home the Bait features livelier tempos; some tracks move along at a good tear. Guitar textures vary from an atonal din to Killing Joke-style ringing quasi-metal; parts of "Skin Job" sound exactly like Hüsker Dü. Newly prominent vocals, whether by bassist Marnie Greenholz or guitarists Mark C. and Tom Paine, are all appropriately snarly.

Recorded by the same lineup (as usual, working with producer Martin Bisi), Cloud One is quite similar to Bringing Home the Bait, although a temperate mood, increasing tightness and undercurrents of mutant pop melody (in the title track, for instance) hold the promise of more widely accessible artistic realms in the group's future.

The live Live Skull album, Don't Get Any on You, was recorded at CBGB in New York at the end of 1986 and contains brutal dominance-and-feedback renditions of "Skin Job" and "Sparky" (from Bait), "I'll Break You" and "The Loved One" (from Cloud One), several previews of the upcoming Dusted (including "Debbie's Headache") and Curtis Mayfield's "Pusherman" (Live Skull had previously issued their studio version of the song on a 12-inch single) and others. The cassette adds "Brains Big Enough," a live track recorded "somewhere in Europe."

Bostonian Thalia Zedek—who had previously exercised her rant'n'roll vocals in Uzzi and, before that, Dangerous Birds—joined Live Skull in time for Dusted. With her tuneless intensity giving the band a solid kick back towards anarchic clamor, the album returns to deliberate noise storms, now with the added benefit of maddeningly repetitive singing. Make no mistake: Zedek's the perfect sparkplug for Live Skull, but one really has to be in a certain frame of mind (or on a loud subway train) to appreciate such baleful cacophony. (The CD and cassette add a bonus track.)

Zedek's stylistic integration into the group's music is much better on Snuffer. (All six songs possess one-word titles like "Was," "Step" and "Straw.") Besides sinking her deep into the mix along with the other loud instruments, the effectively textured record benefits from a variety of tempos and the complex, interwoven guitar figures. Far more listenable than Dusted, Snuffer focuses the band's power enough to give it impact.

Sonda Andersson (ex-Rat At Rat R) replaced Greenholz on Positraction, an occasionally excessive but generally likable song-oriented record that strips back the noise to reveal succinct and dynamic rock with atmosphere and distortion. Mark C. and Tom Paine have become extremely adept at building interconnected guitar lines, and Zedek's strength has been channeled, at least part of the way, into emotional expression of such hardhearted sentiments as "Anger is a crowbar that you must learn to fight for." The material isn't especially noteworthy but, as an indication that Live Skull is willing to come into the sonic open, Positraction is a most welcome development. (The CD appends Snuffer.)

See also Of Cabbages and Kings. [e/dgs/i]

LIVE WIRE

Pick It Up (A&M) 1979

No Fright (A&M) 1980

Changes Made (A&M) 1981

After Advertising's demise, guitarist/producer Simon Boswell joined singer/guitarist Mike Edwards' talented London pub band. Live Wire had already released Pick It Up (which resembles Kilburn and the High Roads, or early Dire Straits without the flashy guitar work) when Boswell arrived. Replacing a guitarist named Chris Cutler (not the Henry Cow drummer), he also became the quartet's producer, introducing a slicker, more commercial sound. No Fright has no stylistic connection with Boswell's previous band, but it's a worthy companion to other modest pub-veteran documents.

Boswell wields far more audible influence on the charmingly popped-up Changes Made, eclipsing Edwards' Knopfleresque rock songs with his own delightful "Don't Look Now" and the collaborative "Child's Eye," which suggest a gutsier version of the Records.

See also Advertising.

[i]

LIVING COLOUR

Vivid (Epic) 1988 •

Time's Up (Epic) 1990 •

Biscuits EP (Epic) 1991 •

Led by guitarist and chief composer Vernon Reid (also a music critic and co-founder of the Black Rock Coalition, a New York organization of African-American bands), Living Colour promises more than it delivers on Vivid. Because the quartet doesn't match stupid preconceptions about the kind of music people of color should and shouldn't play, the record raised many a bigoted eyebrow. But such issues aside, this is fairly routine hard-rock, loudly produced by Ed Stasium. (Ironically, one of the LP's few funky moments is contained in a version of Talking Heads' "Memories Can't Wait.") But if Vivid is lacking in the catchy tune/riff department, at least the topical lyrics are substantial ("Cult of Personality," "Open Letter (To a Landlord)"), occasionally using ironic humor to make a point ("No I'm not gonna rob/beat/rape you, so why you want to give me that funny vibe?"). Reid's guitar cuts loose just once (très flash, though); Mick Jagger's guest production of two tracks makes no audible difference.

With a two-million seller and a tour opening for the Stones behind them, Living Colour (again working with Stasium) made Time's Up from a position of considerable strength. When Reid vents his spleen on the coronation of Elvis Presley (in "Elvis Is Dead"), he can now get Little Richard in to add his thoughts on the subject. Ambitiously throwing jazzy designs into occasionally thrashy blitzkriegs, the guitarist has plenty of room to peel off dizzying riffs (but no way to avoid speedrock's usual hollowness). In addition, the album has a stronger Afrocentric consciousness than the first, most bluntly in "Pride" ("Don't ask me why I play this music/It's my culture, so naturally I use it"). But the band has more (or less) to say on Time's Up: the catchy "Type" offers terminology rather than philosophy, "New Jack Theme" is a nonjudgmental observation and the funky "Under Cover of Darkness" (written by singer Corey Glover) is personal, not political.

At this point, armed with talent and fame, Living Colour seems poised between merely recycling a standard musical form as a vehicle for addressing African-American concerns and pioneering a new style built on the members' rich cross-cultural awareness. If the band can make that transition, the next Living Colour album could be a major event.

[j/g/i]

L.L. COOL J

Radio (Def Jam-Columbia) 1985 •

Bigger and Deffer (Def Jam-Columbia) 1987 •

Walking with a Panther (Def Jam-Columbia) 1989 •

Mama Said Knock You Out (Def Jam-Columbia) 1990 •

Following his electrifying appearance in Krush Groove (the film that essentially chronicles the birth of the Def Jam label and the launch of the Fat Boys), New York rapper L(adies) L(ove) Cool J(ames Todd Smith) released Radio, a great full-length album ("reduced by Rick Rubin") that promptly went gold. From the monster boombox on the cover to grooves like "I Can't Live Without My Radio" and "You Can't Dance," L.L. touches all the right cultural totems, delivering his sharp-tongued lines with adolescent urgency and a deliciously snotty attitude. The rhythm tracks are stripped-down and aggressive; raps on familiar subjects sidestep clichés and are clever enough to warrant repeated listening.

The double-platinum success of L.L.'s second album (billed as BAD) proves that Rubin is unnecessary to his continuing popularity. Released in clean and dirty versions, Bigger and Deffer draws on redoubtable innovation to diversify itself out of the basic rap mold. L.L. waxes nostalgic on "Go Cut Creator Go" (which uses Chuck Berry guitar edits), and "The Do Wop," an imaginative '50s/'80s hybrid. "I Need Love" is a touchingly romantic ballad with smoothly melodic instrumental backing; "Ahh, Let's Get III" makes considerable use of a backing chorus to set off the rapid-fire rhymes. Meanwhile, back at the same-old-thing ranch, "I'm Bad" picks up on a piece of "The Theme from Shaft," "Kanday" touches on classic James Brown and "Get Down" throws the kitchen sink into the hyperactive mix.

While L.L. the producer comes through with inventive tracks (who else could get away with using the Cheers theme?) on Walking with a Panther, L.L. the rapper is treading water. Granted, his boasts, romantic entreaties and dynamic delivery put most MCs in the ground, but "Jingling Baby," "I'm That Type of Guy" and "Big Ole Butt"—standard sentiments given above-average settings—are pretty much all there is to recommend this lightweight album.

Cars and girls still dominate L.L.'s world on Mama Said Knock You Out, but a harder sound (courtesy of producer Marley Marl) and a more aggressive attitude put back some of the intensity and personality that were in short supply the last time out. Besides revisiting his old neighborhood ("Farmers Blvd.") and doing a remix of "Jingling Baby," L.L. describes his ideal woman ("Around the Way Girl"), works his come-on charm ("Mr. Good Bar"), shows off his mobile home ("The Boomin' System") and delivers a standard-issue positive message ("The Power of God"). Except for an annoying habit of repeating phrases over and over (as on the powerful title track), the smooth seducer uses his best moves to get the job done.

[i]

BILL LLOYD

Feeling the Elephant (Throbbing Lobster) 1987 (DB)

1990 •

Although best known as half of the country duo Foster & Lloyd (whose hip sensibilities are reflected in albums with titles like Faster & Louder), singer/guitarist Bill Lloyd started out as a power-popper. This lovely album consists of song demos he recorded in Nashville between 1983 and 1986. Even fans of F&L's exuberant Everly Brothers-influenced grooves will be unprepared for the rich sounds within: Lloyd displays a heavy Alex Chilton influence as he serves up lush melodies embellished by crisp guitars, topped with sardonic vocals you'd swear were lifted from a Big Star or dB's album. Highlights: the woozy psychedelia of "Everything's Closing Down," the melancholy "Lisa Anne" ("I've got a hole in my life the size of your apartment") and "All at Once You Unzipped," a vicious rocker. Country's gain was clearly rock'n'roll's loss. (The two editions have completely different artwork; the second is remastered.) [jy]

RICHARD LLOYD

Alchemy (Elektra) 1979

Field of Fire (Mistlur-Moving Target) 1985 •

Real Time (Celluloid) 1987 •

The former Television guitarist's first solo album is a gem. Assisted by assorted New York scene veterans, Lloyd spins a beautiful, understated web that proves him to be a successful songwriter, a limited but engaging vocalist and a relaxed team player who never hogs the spotlight. The material (especially the wonderful title track and a brilliant ballad, "Misty Eyes") pursues the melodic, sensitive side of late-period Television, ceding all the rough edges and manic intensity to Tom Verlaine.

Six years and several lifetimes later, Lloyd returned from oblivion with an all-new album, recorded in Stockholm with local musicians and first released by a Swedish label. Field of Fire is another direct hit: loud, energetic rock with sturdy melodies, intelligent lyrics and confident playing. In spots, Lloyd's singing is too raw-throated to be pleasant, but the material holds up regardless, and the fine guitar work is a fair trade-off. Field of Fire bears no resemblance whatsoever to Alchemy, but is just as enjoyable.

Lloyd recorded the live Real Time album in the comfort of TV's old haunt, CBGB, with a bass/drums/guitar trio. The song selection draws from both solo records, adding a few new numbers—adapting the resultant diversity without incident—and dredging up "Fire Engine" for a bracing opening salvo. Clear production highlights Lloyd's upbeat and articulate singing as well as the thoughtful and passionate guitar work. (With the inclusion of three extra songs at the end, the CD runs almost an hour.) [i]

See also Television.

ROBERT LLOYD

See Nightingales.

HUW LLOYD-LANGTON

See Hawkwind.

LMNOP

LMNOP [tape] (Baby Sue) 1982 + 1984

LMNOP LMNOP [tape] (Baby Sue) 1984

LMNO3 [tape] (Baby Sue) 1985

Elemen Opee Elpee (Baby Sue) 1986

Pony [tape] (Baby Sue) 1988 (Fr. New Rose) 1988

Numbles (Fr. New Rose) 1989 •

One-man Atlanta power pop auteur Stephen Fieviet (aka Don W. Seven) is LMNOP, although the drummer of a performing lineup did help on Elemen Opee Elpee. (Two non-participants are also pictured for confusion's sake.) The ambitious twinkster, who also draws and publishes a quarterly Baby Sue magazine and numerous pamphlets, writes stupendous melodies with substantial lyrics and sturdy hooks, and loads up the perky arrangements with rich guitar tracks, adorable vocal harmonies and febrile invention. Except for an occasional descent into corny puns or gratuitous vulgarity (LMNO3's "Sitting on Uranus" scores in both departments), LMNOP/Fieviet offers quintessential alternative pop packed with intelligence and enthusiasm.

The first cassette offers early versions of songs (e.g., "Breakfast Cereal," "Hide in Fiction's Hands," "Sandwich Time for the Smaller Children") Fieviet re-recorded for inclusion on Elemen Opee Elpee and Pony. Despite rudimentary sound quality (drums especially suffer), it's a fine starting point.

Following two more cassette albums, LMNOP finally reached vinyl. The unfailingly perky Elemen Opee Elpee contains charming and provocative contemplations on mendacity ("Please Believe Me"), conformity ("The Big Ride"), world peace ("Breakfast Cereal") and the study of anthropology ("Comparative [sic] Analysis"), all sparked by crisp production and flawless playing. Anyone fond of Shoes, Advertising, Milk'n'Cookies, Sneakers, Three O'Clock, etc. should find the record a most agreeable treat.

Leading off with the brilliant "Idea," the Pony tape (issued on vinyl only in France) contains such idiosyncratic outpourings as "Suggestion for Rock Culture in the 90s" and "Automobile History." Not all the songs are of the same quality as on the first vinyl album, but fans won't be disappointed.

LMNOP's darker side (no secret to readers of the deeply disconcerting Baby Sue) surfaces in the lyrics of the excellent Numbles, whose perky melodies and simple guitar-rock arrangements sound as jolly as ever. As Fieviet's delightful voice leads the way, you may find yourself humming to such provocative lines as "You're getting headaches so much of the time/Your memory has run dry and darkness is all you feel" or "How can you take what you've heard and reverse?/I never thought bad could get worse." With nine of the best tracks from Pony and Elemen Opee Elpee added as a bonus, the Numbles CD is an essential LMNOP purchase. [i]

LODGE

See John Greaves.

LORA LOGIC

See Essential Logic.

LONE JUSTICE

Lone Justice (Geffen) 1985 •

Shelter (Geffen) 1986 •

MARIA MCKEE

Maria McKee (Geffen) 1989 •

It isn't that Lone Justice's first album is bad (it's not), but the ballyhoo that preceded the LA quartet's debut raised expectations that these frisky countryfied rock tunes (Linda Ronstadt on speed, perhaps, or Dolly Parton backed by the Blasters) couldn't possibly satisfy. Maria McKee is an impressive young singer—an energetic, throaty powerhouse with a Southern twang and a slight Patsy Cline catch—and the band is solid enough, but Lone Justice, produced by Jimmy Iovine, doesn't come anywhere near extraordinary. Chief songwriter McKee's "A Good Heart," ridden to the top of the British charts in late 1985 by Fergal Sharkey, is far more memorable than anything she penned for her own first record.

Little Steven (a guest on the first album) co-produced Shelter with Iovine and Lone Justice, helping the almost-entirely overhauled group (here a loud, vibrant sextet with ex-Patti Smith Grouper Bruce Brody on keyboards) to nail down a dynamic sound that's something like the articulate passion of an old Van Morrison record, pumped up by McKee's gospelly fervor and walloping modern drums. Van Zandt also co-wrote some of the songs, which are far more subtle than before. The first album's religious content is supplanted here by heartfelt emotions about love, faith and morality. Without burying her beliefs, McKee universalizes them in ways that don't require listeners to share anything beyond humanity and sensitivity.

On her solo debut, McKee's voice and songwriting have matured and strengthened, and she sings out like she's got one night onstage in a two-bit bar to prove herself. Unfortunately, Mitchell Froom's production is overbearing, and the endless parade of guest musicians (Richard Thompson, guitarist Marc Ribot, Waterboys fiddler Steve Wickham, drummer Jim Keltner) eventually drains some of the album's personality. Still, "Panic Beach" and "Am I the Only One (Who's Ever Felt This Way?)" are vivid narratives told with literary precision, and when McKee revs into a twangy stomp (like the CD-only "Drinkin' in My Sunday Dress") she's pretty darn irresistible. [i/kss]

See also X.

LONESOME VAL

See Fear of Strangers.

ROY LONEY AND THE PHANTOM MOVERS

Out After Dark (Solid Smoke) 1979
Phantom Tracks (Solid Smoke) 1980
Contents Under Pressure (War Bride) 1981
Having a Rock'n'Roll Party (War Bride) 1982
Fast & Loose (Double Dare) 1983
The Scientific Bombs Away!!! (Aus. Aim) 1988
(Norton) 1989

Singer/guitarist Roy Loney assembled the Phantom Movers after splitting from the Flamin' Groovies in 1975. While the Groovies without Loney turned to mersybeat, Byrds covers and other '60s soundalikes, Out After Dark finds him rekindling the pure American rock'n'roll spirit that originally inspired the band. Abetted by two ex-Groovies (drummer Danny Mihm and guitarist James Ferrell), Loney excels at straightforward, unsophisticated party music made strictly for fun.

Phantom Tracks consists of smokin' live tracks and new studio cuts that aren't terribly different from the material on Out After Dark. The only change worth noting is that about half of the Phantom Tracks are out-and-out rockabilly; Out After Dark, while rooted in rockabilly, is contemporary-sounding rock'n'roll.

Contents Under Pressure, recorded after both Mihm and Ferrell had left (the former to launch the similarly unreconstructed Kingsnakes in Europe), goes off in a number of directions: Yardbirds-type raveups, rockabilly, ska, heavy metal and even corporate mush. A total failure.

As the name implies, Having a Rock'n'Roll Party is a return to what Loney does best, and the results are a big improvement over the previous outing. The band even dips into the Groovies' catalogue for "Gonna Rock Tonight" and "Dr. Boogie." Also released in France, Fast & Loose features various lineups (Mihm is back) and includes a version of the Groovies' "Teenage Head."

After another long absence, Loney returned in 1988 with his best record yet, The Scientific Bombs Away!!!. What stands out in this jolt of pure manic rock'n'roll is the uniformly strong material and performances, from the hiccupped neo-rockabilly of "Bad News Travels Fast," "Bip Bop Boom" and "Boy, Man!" to the modern rock'n'roll of "Ruin Your Shoes," "Your Best Friend's Number" and "Nobody." There's even c-razy novelty numbers like "Here Comes Curly" and "Nervous Slim," the latter omitted from the album's American release. Not for normals, to be sure, these songs will make you laugh while they rock the socks off your feet. [ds]

See also Flamin' Groovies.

LONGHOUSE

See John Greaves.

LONG RYDERS

10-5-60 EP (PVC) 1983 •
Native Sons (Frontier) 1984 •
State of Our Union (Island) 1985
Two Fisted Tales (Island) 1987 •
Metallic B.O. [tape] (Long Ryders Fan Club) 1989 [CD]
(nr/Overground) 1990 ◊

TOM STEVENS

Points of View EP (Pulse) 1982

Born in the South but assembled in California, the Long Ryders (who broke up around the end of 1987) color mild '60s revivalism with country stylings (steel guitar, autoharp, mandolin, etc.) on the five-song 10-5-60 EP, produced by Earle Mankey. Pleasant but too easygoing to be earthshaking, Kentucky native Sid Griffin (vocals, assorted stringed instruments) and his three bandmates took care of that business on Native Sons, a stirring dose of memorable and unpretentious country-rock that incorporates Highway 61 Dylan, paisley pop, Kingston Trio balladry and wild rock'n'roll. A guest vocal appearance by Gene Clark legitimizes the Long Ryders' spiritual update of the Byrds' pioneering hybrid. (Griffin made a specific literary statement on behalf of his roots in 1985, when he edited/wrote a biography of Gram Parsons.)

State of Our Union is a big disappointment, an occasionally corny collection of weak melodies, inane lyrics and misguided arrangements. The Ryders seem to have been fooled by their own image. "Looking for Lewis and Clark" is sung in a pathetically bad monotone; other tunes that attempt to align the band with American populist sentiment are only slightly better. Produced in England by Will Birch, it sounds good in spots, but heavyhandedness is clearly no asset.

The Long Ryders found solid footing again with the less selfconscious Two Fisted Tales, an enjoyable album nicely produced in a variety of appealing styles by Ed Stasium. The writing is back up to snuff and the natural-sounding presentation makes the group's ethical culture far more palatable. One-song studio visits each by the Bangles and David Hidalgo of Los Lobos are unobtrusive but unneeded—these boys can handle the job nicely by themselves.

Metallic B.O., a spirited cassette-only hodgepodge of live covers, interview snippets and general fooling around, was assembled posthumously by the Long Ryders' fan club (and subsequently issued in abbreviated CD form by a British label). With energetically sloppy renditions of tunes by everybody from Dylan to Public Image Ltd. (not to mention a dandy version of Michael Jackson's "Billie Jean"), it's a fine epitaph, outlining the Ryders' historical pedigree and distilling the punky edge that rarely made it onto their studio recordings.

On his early solo EP, bassist Tom Stevens (joined by two sidemen) plays guitar and sings half a dozen original melodic pop songs that wouldn't fit the band's format but are quite appealing on their own. [i/hd]

See also Danny & Dusty.

LOOP

- 16 Dreams EP (nr/Head) 1987
- Spinning EP (nr/Head) 1987
- Heaven's End (nr/Head) 1987 •
- Collision EP (nr/Chapter 22) 1988
- The World in Your Eyes (nr/Head) 1988
- Fade Out (nr/Chapter 22) 1988 (Rough Trade) 1989 •
- Eternal—The Singles 1988 (nr/Chapter 22) 1989
- A Gilded Eternity (Beggars Banquet-RCA) 1990 •

Frequently likened to Spacemen 3 for their aggressive approach to trance creation, Croydon's Loop create pulsating, nearly impenetrable pieces that are often lunkheaded in their maximal approach to minimalism. (Imagine all the "NO"s trumpeted on the sleeve of Metal Machine Music—panning, phasing, instruments—replaced by "MORE PLEASE!" and you'll begin to get the drift.) But more often, the shadowy quartet is just plain dogged in its pursuit of The Holy Riff; locating said icon, Loop clamps down hard, wielding minor chords like marrow forks, greedily digging out sustenance with all the insane energy of the Stooges, tempered by the fanatical symmetry of German experimenters like Can and Faust.

The germ of that fusion is evident on Loop's first two EPs. Setting the tone, the rudimentary drumming of Bex (the wife of group leader Robert, who like the rest of the band, goes to great pains to hide his surname—in this case, it's Hampson) brings back fond memories of Teenage Jesus and the Jerks' Bradley Field. (The contents of those two discs, plus an enveloping, drugged-out version of Suicide's "Rocket USA," were repackaged as The World in Your Eyes.) Collision cut back on the cocooning tendencies; Loop covers the Pop Group's lurching "Thief of Fire," adding brass knuckles to the original's sinewy threat. Released a bit too close to the band's similarly titled album for comfort, Eternal is a pairing of Collision and "Black Sun," a late-'88 single.

A few lineup changes (and plenty of new effects boxes) later, Loop unleashed the head-nodder's paradise of Heaven's End, a mini-album unsettling enough to suit those who keep their noses in the ether and feet planted firmly in the gutter. Fade Out heightens the menace a notch. With Robert's husky whisper mixed low, songs like "Black Sun" and "This Is Where You End" would sound like odes to Baal even if they were about girls on the beach.

A Gilded Eternity seems like the apex of Loop's trance-essential meditation phase. cursory listens might leave the impression that not much actually happens in any of these lengthy songs, but concentration reveals catalytic conversions aplenty—from ambient violence to Detroit-drawn thrash. Given the maelstrom they cut a swath through, enervating tests of dub technique are fascinating, perhaps pointing the band in a less static (but no less hypnotic) direction. [dss]

LOOT!

See Human League.

LORDS OF THE NEW CHURCH

- Lords of the New Church (IRS) 1982 •
- Is Nothing Sacred? (IRS) 1983 •
- The Method to Our Madness (IRS) 1984 •
- Killer Lords (IRS) 1985
- Live at the Spit (nr/Illegal) 1988

BRIAN JAMES

Brian James (Fr. New Rose) 1990 •

Formed by ex-Dead Boy Stiv Bator (following a solo turn and the developmental Wanderers, which must be where he temporarily parked the "s" from his surname) with ex-Damned/Tanz der Youth guitarist Brian James, ex-Sham 69/Wanderers bassist Dave Tregunna and ex-Barracudas drummer Nick Turner, the Lords emerged with a fully realized debut album that draws on their individual and collective strengths. Dense and powerful, with Bator's sneering whine setting the tone and attitude, the Lords combine '60s punk with '80s apocalypics to create an original sound that updates the Stooges for a post-punk world. Only a few awful, indulgent lyrics (one song attempts a tribute to the New York Dolls by merely stringing song titles together) detract from the record's intense dark power. Highlights: "New Church," "Russian Roulette," "Open Your Eyes." Cool cover: Balloon Farm's "Question of Temperature."

Live at the Spit is a 1982 Boston radio broadcast from the band's first American tour. Sounding more like friendly punks than nascent goth-rockers, the quartet delivers basic live versions of nearly the entire first album, punctuated by Stiv's crudely didactic stage patter. Curious how long ago 1982 was? By way of introducing "Russian Roulette," Stiv announces "The other day we played a really strange game. We passed around six girls and one of them had the clap."

In place of the first LP's claustrophobic, murky production, Is Nothing Sacred? substitutes a livelier, crisper swirl; keyboards and horns contrast the band's throaty roar. Thus armed, the Lords unfortunately ran out of material after the first song. Following the excellent "Dance with Me," the album rolls straight down the songwriting slope, stopping off only briefly to ram through the Grass Roots' venerable "Live for Today" to no audible end. As a soundtrack for a gothic punk horror movie, the Lords' second album gets the ambience right, but that's all.

The third outing hits a fair compromise, modulating both the volume and the velocity to lighten the mood and cut the stylishness. As a result, The Method to Our Madness resembles a cross between Raw Power and Rebel Yell. It's the band's least distinctive—but most popular-sounding—record, with "Murder Style," "Method to My Madness" (featuring a funny spoken interjection by IRS owner Miles Copeland) and a pretty ballad, "When Blood Runs Cold," to recommend it. By sacrificing their mystery and danger, the Lords of the New Church are revealed as nice guys after all.

The Killer Lords compilation includes not only remixes of essential album tracks but a hysterically nasty mugging of Madonna's "Like a Virgin," a solid and straight reading of John Fogerty's "Hey Tonight," and ex-Advert Tim Smith's duff but amusing "Lord's Prayer."

Putting the Lords on ice in the mid-'80s, James wound up back in the Damned for a spell and then released his first (!) solo album—a miserably pedestrian hard-rock LP (à la Steve Jones' post-Professionals efforts) with only occasional evidence of James' past adventures, if not achievements—in 1990. That same year, it was reported that Bators was forming a band with Dee Dee Ramone and ex-Godfathers guitarist Kris Dollimore. Before anything could come of that alliance, however, Bators was struck by a car in Paris in June '90 and died of his injuries. [i]

See also Stiv Bators.

LORRIES

See Red Lorry Yellow Lorry.

LOS LOBOS

... and a time to dance (Slash) 1983
 How Will the Wolf Survive? (Slash-Warner Bros.) 1984 •
 By the Light of the Moon (Slash-Warner Bros.) 1987 •
 La Pistola y el Corazón (Slash-Warner Bros.) 1988 •
 The Neighborhood (Slash-Warner Bros.) 1990 •

VARIOUS ARTISTS

La Bamba (Slash-Warner Bros.) 1987 •

Lacking serious competition and buoyed by the enormous success of La Bamba, Los Lobos are the Mexican-American rock band; it wouldn't matter if there were contenders for that honor, however—these four East Los Angelenos (plus ex-Blaster saxman Steve Berlin, who joined in time for the second Slash record) are peerless masters of their music and a whole lot more. They smoothly incorporate vastly divergent styles—early rock'n'roll, jazz, rockabilly, noriteño, blues, R&B, Tex-Mex folk music—into a colorful patchwork. The group had self-released an album (Just Another Band from East L.A.) in the late '70s, but only came to national attention when the seven-song and a time to dance appeared in '83. From a sharp cover of Ritchie Valens' "Come On, Let's Go" to the infectious, accordion-powered "Let's Say Goodnight," singer/guitarist David Hidalgo leads a spicy romp (in two languages) back and forth across musical borders few can traverse with such ease.

How Will the Wolf Survive? is an occasionally more serious venture, delving into heavy blues ("Don't Worry Baby") and tender social commentary ("Will the Wolf Survive?," subsequently a country hit for Waylon Jennings) as well as finding time for a jolly square dance ("Corrida #1") and an airy instrumental ("Lil' King of Everything"). Hidalgo's plaintive tenor and the group's subtlety and skill make the album immediately likable; depth and variety ensure its enduring pleasure.

Poised on the brink of major stardom, Los Lobos stopped to make a limp mainstream album, By the Light of the Moon. Under the usually reliable production direction of T-Bone Burnett, the maturing band sheds its richly complex musical personality for a hodgepodge of assimilationist easy-listening crap and ill-advised stylistic dilettantism. "Prenda del Alma," a traditional Spanish ballad, seems horribly out of place; the gritty "Shakin' Shakin' Shakes," co-written by T-Bone and guitarist Cesar Rosas, belongs on a Blasters record; "Set Me Free (Rosa Lee)" is a brassy mess with synth drums. Only "My Baby's Gone," a fine Chicago blues, suggests life in the grooves, but it's not enough to salvage the record.

The obvious choice to re-create the music for La Bamba, a moronic bio-pic about Ritchie Valens' brief life and career, Los Lobos faithfully and enthusiastically recorded the highlights of his slim repertoire and vaulted into the pop stratosphere. The skidillion-selling La Bamba soundtrack album contains their renditions of "La Bamba," "Come On, Let's Go," "We Belong Together," "Donna," and four more; Brian Setzer (aping Eddie Cochran) and Marshall Crenshaw (finally succumbing to the temptation to play Buddy Holly) each contribute a track as well.

After that massive success, Los Lobos (consigning Berlin to a minimal role) returned to far more substantial music, and a different sort of nostalgia, by making a consciously uncommercial (at least for the American pop audience) acoustic album in Spanish. Recorded and mixed in five days, the brief La Pistola y el Corazón wraps the band's warm and enthusiastic embrace around traditional Mexican canciones and suitable originals. Except for Hidalgo's sickly violin playing on the instrumental "(Sonajas) Mañanitas Michoacanas," La Pistola is as delightful to hear as it must have been therapeutic to record.

Thusly recharged, Los Lobos made an about face and wanged out The Neighborhood, an amazingly varied and great rock'n'roll record free of any Latin flavor whatsoever. Aided by John Hiatt, Levon Helm and Jim Keltner, the quintet laces into a blistering boogie snake

("I Walk Alone"), a swampy Little Feat-styled rocker ("Down on the Riverbed"), a pulsing Chicago blues co-written by the legendary Willie Dixon ("I Can't Understand"), a twisting oldie (Jimmy McCracklin's "Georgia Slop") and a twisting original ("Jenny's Got a Pony"). They also downshift effectively for semi-acoustic love songs ("Emily," "Take My Hand"), a tender lullaby ("Little John of God") and a visit to Johnny Cash country ("Deep Dark Hole"). Exciting, evocative and highly satisfying. [i]

LOUNGE LIZARDS

The Lounge Lizards (EG) 1981 •
 Live from the Drunken Boat (Europa) 1983
 Live 79/81 [tape] (ROIR) 1985 [CD] (Fr. Danceteria) 1990 φ
 Big Heart Live in Tokyo (Island) 1986
 No Pain for Cakes (Island) 1987 •
 Voice of Chunk (Jap. Agharta) 1989 (Verabra) 1989 φ

TEO MACERO/LONDON PHILHARMONIC ORCHESTRA/LOUNGE LIZARDS

Fusion (Europa) 1984
EVAN LURIE
 Happy? Here? Now? (Bel. Crépuscule) 1985
 Pieces for Bandoneon (Bel. Crépuscule) 1989 •
 Selling Water by the Side of the River (Island) 1990 φ

JOHN LURIE

Stranger Than Paradise (Enigma) 1986 •
 Down by Law (Intuition-Capitol) 1988 •
 Mystery Train (RCA) 1989 •

Despite some interesting personnel in their initial lineup and a memorable debut album, New York's Lounge Lizards will never be remembered as anything more than an interesting footnote in rock's history. This has less to do with the "fake jazz" label they took for themselves than with the purely social nature of their rock connection: they played jazz-as-exotica to a hip downtown rock-club audience.

Nonetheless, The Lounge Lizards remains a minor masterpiece for the way it remains true to its Monk-derived jazz (including two covers of Thelonious Sphere himself) by subverting it still further with Arto Lindsay's atonal guitar playing. Whatever Lindsay may lack as a conventional guitarist, he makes up with an innate rhythmic savvy that never fails to entertain and engage. Ex-Feelies drummer Anton Fier, as a rock player learning the jazz ropes, approaches his kit a bit cerebrally, but ironic detachment was never far from the Lizards' agenda. Saxman John Lurie's compositions here turn out to have been his best, alternating a loving, melodic lilt with film noirish exhilaration.

By the time of Live from the Drunken Boat, the Lurie brothers (John and pianist Evan) were playing with a different and less interesting band; the results are slight and forgettable. (Lindsay and Fier went on to lead myriad projects, including, respectively and most notably, the Ambitious Lovers and the Golden Palominos.)

The Lizards joined their producer, Teo Macero (veteran producer/arranger of many a distinguished jazz record), as he indulged his post-romantic orchestral fantasies with the London Philharmonic on Fusion, an uninteresting '50s "third stream" symphonic jazz composition.

The Live 79/81 cassette (later issued on CD as well) features sharp performances from New York (including their first gig), Cleveland, London and Berlin. The core of the debut lineup (the Luries, Fier and bassist Steve Piccolo) remains intact, but two other guitarists besides Lindsay divvy up the tracks. Nine originals, plus covers of Thelonious Monk's "Epitaphy" and Earle Hagen's classic "Harlem Nocturne."

John Lurie went on to star in and score Jim Jarmusch's film Stranger Than Paradise, the album of which devotes a side to an unrelated Lurie dance piece called "The Resurrection of Albert Ayler." His next multi-media collaboration with Jarmusch was Down by Law: Lurie co-starred in the picture and composed the score. Down by Law contains his soundtrack music for that film—played by most of the Lounge Lizards and even alumnus Lindsay—as well as music done for a Betty Gordon film entitled Variety. Although he didn't appear in the movie, Lurie also composed music for Jarmusch's next picture, Mystery Train, the soundtrack LP of which is largely made up of appropriate vintage rock'n'roll and R&B numbers.

Evan's first solo piano album, Happy? Here? Now?, exhibits an introspective sensitivity not always prevalent in the ensemble's work, but that's not to say it's any less stimulating or intense. While "Tesla's Pigeons" has the power and fury of a piano version of Stravinsky as performed by Birdsongs of the Mesozoic, "Suite from Punch" has such a diversity of feeling, it could easily be the accompaniment to a silent film.

In mid-'86, a new incarnation of the Lounge Lizards—the Luries bolstered by another saxophonist (Roy Nathanson) and a trombonist (Curtis Fowlkes), plus a rhythm section and guitarist Marc Ribot—signed to Island. While the one-show Live in Tokyo continues in the Lizards' almost-jazz tradition, the in-studio No Pain for Cakes opens up their frame of reference to include influences like Erik Satie and Kurt Weill. And the group breaks the word barrier with John Lurie's distinctive voice on "Bob and Nico" and the anecdotal "Where Were You."

The most novel aspect of Voice of Chunk is non-musical: the album was sold by mail-order only. The multi-part compositions are surprisingly humorless, and sound at least as indebted to early-'70s "progressive" rock as to jazz, fake or otherwise. The band's swaggering vocal chorus on Evan Lurie's jaunty "Tarantella" doesn't quite right the emotional balance.

"Tarantella" also turns up, sans vocals, on Evan's own Selling Water by the Side of the River. His group features Jill Jaffe's violin and Alfredo Pedernera's bandoneon (button accordion), lending quite an ocean-voyage-salon air to the tango-tinted tunes. The dark, wistful modalities and harmonies make the album more compelling than a mere exercise in good neighbor policy. [mf/dgs/rs/si]

See also Golden Palominos, Arto Lindsay, Marc Ribot.

BUDDY LOVE

See Alan Milman Sect.

MONIE LOVE

Down to Earth (Eternal-Warner Bros.) 1990 •

Having made spotlight-grabbing cameos with Queen Latifah, De La Soul, the Jungle Brothers and Fine Young Cannibals, this unaccented London-born rapper (Simone Johnson) leapfrogged to the top echelons of female MCs with a brilliant album of her own. Down to Earth follows Latifah's example in mixing up soul, hip-hop and house in a tumult of musical variety all bound together by staunchly independent—and charmingly blunt—feminist lyrics. Love's prickly charisma and sharp wit fills "Monie in the Middle" (an insidiously catchy putdown tale of high school romance and one of three tracks produced by FYC's Andy Cox and David Steele) and the autobiographical "Don't Funk wid the Mo."

One of Love's main topics is the mistreatment of women, and quite a few tracks—"Pups Lickin' Bone," "It's a Shame (My Sister)," "R U Single," "I Do as I Please" and "Just Don't Give a Damn"—are powerful assertions of women's rights and the need for self-respect in a hostile environment. Except for an over-the-top attack on pork ("Swiney Swiney") and the irritable tone that occasionally creeps into Monie's sing-song delivery (the repeated "move, damn it!" command of "Ring My Bell" really grates), Down to Earth is a spectacular debut. (The British vinyl release initially included a bonus EP of additional material.) [i]

LOVE AND ROCKETS

Seventh Dream of Teenage Heaven (nr/Beggars Banquet)

1985 (Beggars Banquet-RCA) 1988 •

Express (Beggars Banquet-Big Time) 1986 •

Earth-Sun-Moon (Beggars Banquet-Big Time) 1987 •

Love and Rockets (Beggars Banquet-RCA) 1989 •

DAVID J

Etiquette of Violence (nr/Situation Two) 1983 •

Crocodile Tears and the Velvet Cosh (nr/Glass) 1985 •

David J on Glass (nr/Glass) 1986 •

Songs from Another Season (Beggars Banquet-RCA) 1990 •

DANIEL ASH

Coming Down (Beggars Banquet-RCA) 1991 •

From near oblivion to solid stardom, Love and Rockets is the group that refused to die. Named after the Hernandez brothers' underground comic, Love and Rockets reunited three-fourths of Bauhaus, which had broken up in 1983. First, drummer Kevin Haskins joined guitarist Daniel Ash's side-project-turned-serious Tones on Tail, which folded a year later. Then, David J—following his stint with the Jazz Butcher—joined them in an aborted attempt to reform Bauhaus. When that was kiboshed by Peter Murphy, the three transmuted into Love and Rockets, with Ash and J splitting the vocals and songwriting.

Murphy's absence allows his three former bandmates to avoid any trace of his poseur pretensions on Seventh Dream of Teenage Heaven, an odd, unnervingly varied album. There's folk-rock, funk, ominous rock and a number that resembles the Moody Blues crossed with Bow Wow Wow—a huge, boomy drum sound smothered in close harmony vocals and what sounds to be a mellotron "Saudade," a similar (albeit instrumental) piece, blends aspects of New Order and the Dream Academy. The faintly Beatlesque, pretty "Haunted When the Minutes Drag" suggests an '80s take on Donovan in a droney acoustic mode. Neat record—wonder what it all means. (The British CD adds three tracks.) The belated American issue adds "Inside the Outside" and a remix of "Dog-End of a Day Gone By." In Canada, the record includes a version of the Temptations' "Ball of Confusion" and several other remixes.

There's less stylistic dilettantism on the fine Express, although disparate variety is still among the trio's hallmarks. To wit, "All in My Mind" appears on one side as evanescent folk-rock and on the other as a dirgey sigh with echoed snare drum accents. "Kundalini Express" updates the old train gambit with modern ideas; "Yin and Yang the Flower Pot Man" puts another Moody Bluesy melody to a galloping beat; "Love Me" has dubwise backing and whispered vocals. Love and Rockets seem to be charting out their terrain ever more clearly, concentrating on genres that work for them. (The US edition adds "Ball of Confusion.")

After two good records, Love and Rockets began lurching this way and that as Ash and J began asserting themselves individually, writing and singing their own lyrics in rarely intersecting styles. The self-produced Earth-Sun-Moon is an enigmatic bummer, a dull and often murky digression that buries its few promising ideas in echo and overdubbed guitar tracks. Ash comes up with flaky lyrics and flaky stylistic ideas; J's work is less weird, but no more effective. (He's responsible for the album's funniest track: the Jethro Tull parody "No New Tale to Tell.") Earth-Sun-Moon has the earmarks of a record cut reluctantly and/or without benefit of ideas. A shame. (The CD adds a "slow version" of the LP's lead-off track, "Mirror People.")

Those who bought Love and Rockets on the strength of its coolly atmospheric Top 20 single (the faintly '50sish "So Alive") may have been surprised by the rest of the bizarre distortion-heavy album. Ash has obviously been listening to a lot of Jesus and Mary Chain records (check out "No Big Deal" and "Motorcycle"); J seems to be entranced by the magic of vocal processing and string arrangements. Track by track, Love and Rockets is flimsy fun; considering it as some unified artistic effort, however, is utterly impossible.

David J's first solo record is an indulgent one-man affair with lots of acoustic guitar, a little electronic percussion and occasional keyboards; while some of the songs have amusingly cinematic lyrics ("Joe Orton's Wedding," "With the Indians Permanent"), the music is trivial and the presentation underwhelming. Crocodile Tears is much better, an enjoyable singer-songwriter collection with simply effective and varied arrangements (acoustic guitar, string bass, occasional drums, sax accents) and well-developed songs with good melodies and substantial lyrics that strain the limits of poetic unpretentiousness but more often wind up involving than off-putting. Not all of it works, but the title track is fine and a self-examination entitled "Too Clever by Half" is thoughtfully perceptive. "Stop This City" paints an urban landscape with care and precision; with guest flute by the Jazz Butcher, the fantasy romance of the mildly Dylanesque "Justine" is a treat.

Elsewhere, however, the influence of Zim overpowers J's good sense.

David J on Glass is a messy and eclectic collection of little merit. The lyrics are ill-considered and overdone; the uneven material includes inferior examples of the previous LP's faux-folk ("The Conjurers Hand"), effective rockers ("The Promised Land"), an atrocious piano-and-strings homage to Kurt Weill ("This Vicious Cabaret"), a Clock DVA cover ("4 Hours") and a solo acoustic demo of "Crocodile Tears and the Velvet Cosh."

The band kept him busy for several years, and J didn't make another solo album until 1990. Songs from Another Season follows nicely from Crocodile Tears with accomplished and attractive light folky pop somewhere around Lloyd Cole or the Waterboys. With sax and Max (Eider, ex-Jazz Butcher) helping out, this is an enjoyable and—in light of L&R's gross unpredictability—reassuringly low-key album.

Coming Down, Ash's solo debut, takes off in a bunch of different directions—from sedate cocktail swing to low-key salsa (!) to somber atmospherics to jittering dance noise—most fairly understated, several reflecting the Reidian thrall in which he lately seems to be gripped. Joined by singer Natacha Atlas and Haskins (doing a lot of the drum programming), Ash comes off as flaky as his band, with effective originals ("Coming Down Fast" and the pseudo-Velvet "Not So Fast" could easily be L&R tracks) and such bizarre detours as a nearly subliminal "Day Tripper" cover. [i]

See also Bauhaus, Tones on Tail.

LOVE CLUB

Lime Twigs and Treachery (Popular Metaphysics-MCA)

1990 φ

A skilled diva with a closetful of unappetizing voices, Deborah Borchers is the raison d'être for this San Francisco quartet, which delivers her theatrical adventures and the pretentious lyrics as an updated variation on new romantic dance-rock. While Borchers' diversity suggests Danielle Dax or Nina Hagen, what little appeal her strident dramatics hold is drowned out by the band's overheated guitar arrangements. Ambitious but confused, Love Club possess substantial skills, but no idea how to make a record for anyone but themselves. [pn]

LOVELIES

See Bush Tetras.

DAMIEN LOVELOCK

See Celibate Rifles.

LOVE OF LIFE ORCHESTRA

Extended Niceties EP (Infidelity) 1980

Geneva (Infidelity) 1980

Love of Life Orchestra was created by Peter Gordon (sax, keyboards, composition) and David Van Tieghem, a talented, smart-aleck avant-garde percussionist with ties to new music composer Steve Reich. Both have gone on to greater fame as elder statesmen of the downtown music scene in New York, but these early works stand as an important developmental chapter.

Extended Niceties debuted L&R's avant-disco in fine form. "Beginning of the Heartbreak"/"Don't, Don't" is quite powerful, pushed along by a vividly colored piano and the distinctive, kinetic rhythm guitars of guests Arto Lindsay and David Byrne.

Geneva succumbs to blandness as Lindsay and Byrne are supplanted by less-inspired fulltimers and Gordon attempts to spread his clichéd writing over a longplayer. Exceptions: "Revolution Is Personal" and "Lament," which offers the rarity of a truly interesting drum solo. [mf]

See also David Van Tieghem.

LOVE TRACTOR

Love Tractor (DB) 1982

Around the Bend (DB) 1983

Til the Cows Come Home EP (DB-Landslide) 1984

Wheel of Pleasure (nr/Armageddon) 1985

Double Play [tape] (DB) 1986

This Ain't No Outerspace Ship (Big Time) 1987 •

Themes from Venus (DB) 1989 •

Athens, Georgia's Love Tractor started out playing instrumental rock'n'roll, with reference points in the non-vocal golden rock era of two decades ago. Unlike the Raybeats, they're not so style-conscious, so you get far fewer sly references to the Ventures and other camp heroes, and more outright flirtation with fusion and cocktail lounge muzaks. Though the material is inconsistent, Love Tractor never lacks poise.

The quartet exhibits new polish on Around the Bend, seeking to avoid stagnation by adding vocals on a few tracks. Not very memorable ones, though. The diverting 'Til the Cows Come Home EP fails to answer questions about Tractor's future path, since it's a compilation of odds and ends. Wheel of Pleasure is likewise a sampler of the group's work, assembled for the English market. (In 1986, Love Tractor and Around the Bend were joined on one cassette and issued as Double Play.)

Produced (and played on) by ex-Raybeat Pat Irwin, Outerspace Ship sees the lads plunging wholeheartedly into vocals, with chirpy singing (led by guitarist Michael Richmond) that's a natural extension of their twinkly guitars. Breezy rockers like "Beate Boots" and "Cartoon Kiddies" are charming enough, but such ephemera ultimately seems like a dubious achievement. When it's done, you'll feel like you've pigged out on cotton candy. Weird cover: a semi-funky take on the Gap Band's "Party Train."

Featuring a typically crisp Mitch Easter production job, Themes from Venus continues in the direction of Outerspace, with even more sunny, forgettable vocals. Richmond resembles a less nutty Robyn Hitchcock (not that we needed one) this time. The lightweight instrumental "Nova Express" inspires fond memories of the band's early days, when Love Tractor was more distinctive. The CD adds two. [jy]

LENE LOVICH

Stateless (Stiff-Epic) 1979 •

Flex (Stiff-Epic) 1980 •

New Toy EP (Stiff-Epic) 1981
No-Man's-Land (Stiff-Epic) 1982
The Stiff Years: Volume One (nr/Great Expectations)
1990
March (Pathfinder) 1990 ◊

Lene Lovich helped pave the way for female vocalists to use as many vocal eccentricities as their male counterparts, to be unafraid to play a solo instrument (Lovich's is sax), and—as important as anything else—to feel free to adopt and project personae that are obviously feminine yet not socially stereotyped.

During her erratic and sporadic career, the Detroit native has made a batch of good tracks, but has yet to deliver an entire satisfying LP. This seems to stem from the fact that she and husband-guitarist-songwriting partner Les Chappell are not exactly prolific; even with choice selection of other people's material (including songs given to her expressly by Thomas Dolby and Fingerprinth's Jimme O'Neill) she has released only four full albums in twelve years.

Stateless, her debut LP, sports a pair of great singles: "Lucky Number" and "Say When." But despite her distinctive chirp'n'yodel vocals, the keyboard-dominated arrangements and the blend of great old American pop-rock with spooky occult and Balkan overtones, she needed more consistent material. Better production also might have helped; the US version has a reshuffled song order, a different cover and a much-needed remix.

Flex has a more modern studio sound and uses synthesizers, adding more varied vocal colors (and emphasizing the distinctive deep male backing voices). The songs are more consistent, yet the standouts, original and otherwise, don't quite match those on Stateless. The expansion of Lovich's religio-mystical worldview partially compensates.

New Toy, a foretaste of No-Man's-Land, is a single expanded to EP length; only the title track is truly worthy of any attention. Surprisingly, although two of the songs appear in slightly altered versions on the subsequent LP, "New Toy" itself doesn't. Lacking it, No-Man's-Land is another half-good LP, with Lovich's appropriation of "It's You, Only You" (from Holland's Meteors) again demonstrating her ability to bring out melody and create her own airy, eerie atmosphere.

The long-awaited March is a mixed blessing, but it's a welcome arrival all the same. While only "Wonderland" (the single) really jumps out, most of the album is pretty enjoyable. For every mannerism that seems a bit too cutesy or affected, there's another couple of moves that'll make you sit up straight in admiration. (One exception is "Shadow Walk," on which Chappell's grave enunciations of the title sound dangerously like frog croaks—or belches.) But for a spot of bass and percussion, Lovich and Chappell wrote, produced and played it all themselves. [jg]

NICK LOWE

Jesus of Cool (nr/Radar) 1978 (nr/Demon) 1989 •
Pure Pop for Now People (Columbia) 1978 •
Labour of Lust (Columbia) 1979 •
Nick the Knife (Columbia) 1982 •
The Abominable Showman (Columbia) 1983 •

16 All-Time Lowes (nr/Demon) 1984 •
Nicks Knack (nr/Demon) 1986 •
Pinker and Prouder Than Previous (Columbia) 1988 •
Basher: The Best of Nick Lowe (Columbia) 1989 •
Party of One (Reprise) 1990 •

NICK LOWE AND HIS COWBOY OUTFIT

Nick Lowe and His Cowboy Outfit (Columbia) 1984 •
The Rose of England (Columbia) 1985 •

Once a teen dream with London-area pop group Kipington Lodge then a pub-rocker with Brinsley Schwarz, Nick Lowe burst into new wave as a pop mastermind who could give you anything you wanted, and to heck with social significance. The cover of his first solo album graphically displays his kaleidoscopic versatility in six different poses/personae, all fairly sleazy. Lowe's tunes, though, are invariably well crafted, charming (within a '60s pop context) and off-beat enough to hold attention.

For its US release, the wildly diverse Jesus of Cool was retitled Pure Pop for Now People by corporate wimps (a copout that continued on the 1990 Columbia CD). Besides a well-scrambled track order, Pure Pop substitutes the smooth "They Called It Rock" for Jesus' stompy "Shake and Pop" (in fact, the same song with a different arrangement) and adds "Rollers Show," a parodic tribute to the Bay City Rollers. The US album also inserts Lowe's studio recording of "Heart of the City" (the B-side of Stiff's first-ever release) in place of the searing live version on the British record. (The same live recording, but with a Dave Edmunds vocal replacing Lowe's, appears on Edmunds' Tracks on Wax 4.)

Labour of Lust is a calmer collection, sticking mostly to medium-tempo rockers played by the dependable Rockpile (Lowe, Edmunds, drummer Terry Williams and guitarist Billy Bremner). Instead of stylistic variety, Lowe concentrates on love songs, both silly ("Switch Board Susan," "American Squirm") and sincere ("Without Love," "You Make Me"). The album also contains his first (and so far only) US hit single, "Cruel to Be Kind."

Following Labour of Lust, Lowe put his solo career on hold to assist Edmunds and play in Rockpile. He resumed with Nick the Knife, not surprisingly filled with more foot-tapping love songs. His emotional palette had broadened to include unhappy ("My Heart Hurts," "Too Many Teardrops," "Raining Raining") as well as happy ("Queen of Sheba," "Couldn't Love You (Any More Than I Do)") subject matter. And of course there are the obvious musical/lyrical borrowings Lowe-watchers enjoy getting incensed about.

The Abominable Showman is fast out of the starting gate with "We Want Action" and "Raging Eyes." After that, Lowe turns surprisingly serious on tracks like "Time Wounds All Heels" and "Wish You Were Here." The album closes on a curious (for Lowe) note: "How Do You Talk to an Angel" even has strings.

He returned to form on Nick Lowe and His Cowboy Outfit (which actually features almost the same band as on the preceding album). Once again, Nick essays a variety of pop styles, from Tex-Mex ("Half a Boy and Half a Man") to '50s instrumental ("Awesome"). Don't take the LP title too seriously; on a good day, Lowe takes nothing seriously.

Maintaining the same lineup but cobbling together a far better set of tunes, Lowe made The Rose of England with a lot more evident effort. While the variety is impressive, the lack of consistent quality mainly comes down to specific songs. Winners: Costello's "Indoor Fireworks" (predating its appearance on King of America), John Hiatt's "She Don't Love Nobody" and Lowe's own "Lucky Dog," "The Rose of England" and "(Hope to God) I'm Right." A new treatment of "I Knew the Bride," produced by and performed with Huey Lewis and band, is unsettlingly anxious but reasonably entertaining; a few other items are throwaways or sappy ballads. Overall, however, The Rose of England offers some of the deepest, most reassuring music Lowe's done in ages.

16 All-Time Lowes is a compilation of his early solo work, from "So It Goes" and "Heart of the City" through "When I Write the Book." Of special interest: precise musician credits for each track. Statisticians (and those who feel Lowe's quality level has been steadily waning) should note that almost half of these songs appeared on his first album. Nicks Knack is a complementary collection of another sixteen tracks, including Rockpile's "Now and Always," a rare B-side ("Basing Street") and a balanced selection of mostly second-string material from Lowe's pre-Cowboy Outfit albums. While the American release of the 25 (or 27)-song Basher—the third Lowe anthology to date—is understandable since the first two never came out in the States, its British issue (with track differences in all three formats) is utterly inexplicable. Nitpickers' treat: the American sleeve inadvertently refers to the first album as Jesus of Cool.

Pinker and Prouder Than Previous was recorded in pieces during 1986 and '87 in London and Texas, with a host of old friends, including Paul Carrack, Terry Williams, Martin Belmont and John Hiatt. (Lowe had been instrumental in Hiatt's 1987 "comeback" album, Bring the Family.) He even made up with Edmunds, who produced one song. Reclaiming the straightforward one-take-sound R&B/pop magic he has imparted to many protégés, Lowe comes out pub-rocking here, positively glowing with casual aplomb. Besides the familiar helpings of spicy rock'n'roll and smooth pop, he dishes out a bit of greasy roadhouse R&B, some maudlin but touching balladeering, even spots of cajun and demi-reggae, without a hint of self-consciousness or effort. (Echoes of Rockpile are everywhere.) Minor criticisms: the sequencing doesn't really work, the abrupt fades are disconcerting and a few of the tunes (like Graham Parker's "Black Lincoln Continental") don't rate.

After a solo tour with Elvis Costello, Lowe followed his friend to a new label, and got Edmunds to produce Party of One, a likable but shallow return to simple songs and flash-free presentation. Carrack, Edmunds, Ry Cooder and Jim Keltner give standard-issue Loweisms like "You Got the Look I Like" and "Who Was That Man" their easygoing all, picking up more or less where Rockpile left off. Had Basher expended a bit more effort in the songwriting stage, the conducive atmosphere provided here would have made Party of One as good as fans wanted it to be. Instead, there's only the brilliant "(I Want to Build a) Jumbo Ark," the quietly soulful "What's Shakin' on the Hill" and the lyrically clever "All Men Are Liars" to demonstrate Lowe's ability to find new pearls in such old oysters. [si/i]

See also Dave Edmunds, Rockpile.

IAN LOWERY GROUP

See Folk Devils.

LOWLIFE

Rain EP (nr/Nightshift) 1985

Permanent Sleep (nr/Nightshift) 1986

Diminuendo (nr/Nightshift) 1987

Swirl, It Swings EP (nr/Nightshift) 1987

From a Scream to a Whisper (nr/Nightshift) 1989

Godhead (nr/Nightshift) 1989

After leaving the Cocteau Twins in 1983, bassist Will Heggie formed this quartet and continued playing atmospheric Scottish indie-pop, albeit in a somewhat darker hue. The Rain EP sets ringing, occasionally clashing guitars and echoey deadpan vocals into long, rhythmically charged songs (some in a minor key) whose deep and dramatic vocals (by Craig Loretson) contain a solemn trace of Joy Division.

Permanent Sleep delves deeper into instrumental and vocal textures, with layers of strummed and picked guitar and slippery bass chords (shades of New Order) dominating the sound. Despite Lowlife's concentration on ambience, the affecting "Wild Swan" is a lovely song, punctuated by repeated guitar triplets fluttering overhead.

The aptly titled and excellent Diminuendo reduces Lowlife's volume by stripping the arrangements of their thickening ingredients, leaving only the bass, simple drums and frugal bits of guitar and keyboards to support the increasingly ambitious and musical vocals. (The octave-jumping falsetto in "Big Uncle Ugliness" and commanding power of "Licking One's Eyes" are indicative of his expanding stylistic range.) While opening up the sound does wonders for some songs (including "From Side to Side," "Wonders Will Never Cease" and "Tongue Tied and Twisted," which really sounds like a New Order track), the results can also be too dreamy, leaving tracks lusterless.

The four disappointing new songs on Swirl, It Swings sound like outtakes from Diminuendo, only with feeble drumming and grandiose vocals. Named for a phrase scratched into one of Diminuendo's run-off grooves, From a Scream to a Whisper is a 1985-'88 compilation containing most of the 1987 EP plus several tracks from each of the three prior records.

Succumbing to the excesses of Loretson's newly dramatized vocal style, Godhead also marks a partial return to the early records' busy instrumentation. While understandably moving to erase the New Order comparisons, the misnamed Godhead lacks the emotional drive that sparks all of Lowlife's other albums and winds up labored and dull, a collection of unaffectionate songs that plod—even at brisk tempos. [i]

LOW MAX

Low Max EP (Ger. Glitterhouse) 1988 (Skyklad) 1989

Spitzbube (Ger. Houses in Motion) 1990 (Skyklad) 1991 •

Singer/guitarist Ricky Gelb—younger brother of Giant Sand man Howe Gelb (who drew the front cover of Low Max—leads this Tucson, Arizona group, playing dryly dramatic Southwestern rock in the wake of bands like Green on Red and True West. Low Max's six-song debut has a few rough spots (like pitch and tunings) that need work, but it gets enough juice from Gelb's affecting vocals and sturdy songs (not to mention Johnny Macarchick's energetic guitar strivings) to make its mark.

Rolling more acoustic guitar into the mix, Spitzbube has a loose, folky feel—a bit Dylanesque in spots—that doesn't always encourage Gelb's best singing or Macarchick's most purposeful playing. Still, the rambly and reflective songs make their points with plenty of personality. Dan Stuart of Green on Red guest-sings on "You Used My Name"; Howe Gelb plays keyboards on "Don't Know Why." [i]

LOW MEATO

Low Meato (Ger. Pigs Ear) 1989

If there's a way to offend even the hardest sexual sensibilities, this talented but tasteless New York trio knows it. Bassist Felix Sebacious and guitarist Thruster H.W. share the humorous vocals on such blatant indelicacies as "Ben Wa Balls," "Penis Power" and "Easy Girl" (turning responsibly serious on "AIDS Hymn," which consists of one repeated line—"Stop fucking around/Find the cure for AIDS"), while playing skin-tight power rock with punk, glam-pop, Cheap Trick and metal overtones. If their lyrics weren't so conscientiously offensive, Low Meato would be totally cool. [i]

LUBRICATED GOAT

Lubricated Goat Plays the Devil's Music (Aus. Black Eye)

1987 (Amphetamine Reptile) 1989

Paddock of Love (Aus. Black Eye) 1988 (Amphetamine Reptile) 1989

Schadenfreude EP (Aus. Black Eye) 1989

Psychedelicatessen (Amphetamine Reptile) 1990 •

Some of the crudest sounds from Australia's belly have been belched up by Lubricated Goat, a band which features two former members of Salamander Jim. Since getting underway in early '86, Goatees have slipped in and out and back in again, though the groans, gristle and guttural grunts of Stu Spasm (as well as the backdrop of bleating horns and discordant guitars) have held steady.

Despite ten-cent production and an organization level that makes playtime in kindergarten seem like a crack marching band, The Devil's Music offers the Goat's most inventive montage of styles and instrumentation; beneath the recurring sodomite/fatality themes and Spasm's occasional possessed rants smolders a weird core of blues and jazz inspiration. "Goats and the Men Who Ride Them," one of several instrumentals, could serve as a striptease for strangling hyenas; over-looking the titles, other vocal-less tracks that could be film scores include "Frotting with Ennio" (a disturbed children's movie, perhaps), "Nervequake" (slapstick) and "Anal Injury" (silent comedy).

Paddock of Love emits similar primal sentiments (with an emphasis on cannibalism), but at less obtuse angles. The Goat forfeits the spontaneity and creativity of the first album in favor of cohesion. Still, there are plenty of fun-filled moments of tightly wound psychotic gumbo. "Funeral on a Spit," "Promised Land" and "He Moves in Mysterious Ways."

The Schadenfreude EP winds and meanders in dissembled repetition, lacking humor and direction, though the accelerator motion and skidding distortion of "Magumbo Head" does briefly relieve the monotony.

The guitar-rock sound may hardly reflect it, but the Goat on Psychedelicatessen includes sampler wrangler Lachlan McLeod (also ex-Salamander); Spasm and longtime drummer Martin Bland both take credit for synths as well. (The lineup is completed by a guitar/sax player.) Abandoning the overt dementia of previous records, Spasm here relaxes into a more integrated, spoken pitch, and the tightened-up band drives the songs along with brain-driller riffs, as on the seaisick humor of "Stroke," the insidious crawl of "Spoil the Atmosphere" and the flat-out instrumental mania of "Never Know What Hit You." [mg]

See also Beasts of Bourbon.

LUDICHRIST

Off the Board [tape] (CBGB) 1986

Immaculate Deception (Combat Core) 1986

Powertrip (Combat) 1988

SCATTERBRAIN

Here Comes Trouble (In-Effekt) 1990 •

New York's Ludichrist takes a mix-and-match approach to hardcore and speed metal on its first studio album, Immaculate Deception. Singer Tommy Christ keeps pace easily as the skillful band abruptly shifts gears from storming punk to careening rock in topical (frequently irreligious) tunes like "Big Business," "God Is Everywhere," "Tylenol," "Mengele" and a tuneless speeding rendition of "Last Train to Clarksville." (Agnostic Fronters, Crumbsuckers and others guest.)

Christ and guitarist Glenn Cummings are the only holdovers from the first album on Powertrip, a competently generic thrash-metal assault whose best feature is its sporadically inventive lyrics. Dispensing with the theological references, the quintet comes up with a science-fiction defense of rock'n'roll ("Zad") and various complaints about workaday life.

Chucking the problematic band name and sonic orthodoxy, Christ, Cummings and guitarist Paul Nieder got themselves a new rhythm section and escaped the metal ghetto by becoming Scatterbrain. A well-rounded program with deftly modulated rhythms and carefully controlled stun strength, Here Comes Trouble touches up the Beastie Boys ("Earache My Eye" is a bratty gang rap), the Chili Peppers ("That's That" runs a popping bass line under horns and chanted vocals) and Mozart (Nieder does a classic Brian May overdub job on "Sonata #3"), kicking ass with humor ("Don't Call Me Dude") as well as seriousness ("Goodbye Freedom, Hello Mom"). Power plus invention makes Scatterbrain a bright band. [i]

LUNACHICKS

Lunachicks EP (nr/Blast First-Mute) 1989 •

Babysitters on Acid (nr/Blast First) 1990 •

Stepping into the garbage-rock wrestling ring with a four-song EP (issued on two 7-inch singles in a gatefold sleeve; the CD came later), New York's five Lunachicks strut their overdrive guitar noise in such witless sloptunes as "Sugar Luv," "Jan Brady" and "Makin' It (With Other Species)." The thrashy music's not half bad, but Theo Kogan's vocals—at best she resembles comedian Judy Tenuta channeling the devil—are terrible.

The album reprises those three songs and adds nine more crudities (like "Octopussy" and the mild novelty fun of "Babysitters on Acid") in the same vein. Producer Wharton Tiers wisely sharpens up the instrumental assault in the direction of old MC5 and sinks the improved Kogan halfway into the mix, but the Lunachicks can't seem to make up their mind if they want to be the Plasmatics, the Ramones or Killer ("Teenage Enema Nurses in Bondage") Pussy. [1]

LYDIA LUNCH

Queen of Siam (ZE) 1980 (Widowspeak) 1985 •
 13.13 (Ruby) 1982 (Widowspeak) 1988 •
 The Agony Is the Ecstasy EP (nr/4AD) 1982
 In Limbo EP (nr/Doublevision) 1984 (Widowspeak) 1986
 The Uncensored Lydia Lunch [tape] (Widowspeak) 1985 φ
 Hysterie (nr/Widowspeak) 1986 (CD Presents) 1986 •
 Honeymoon in Red (Widowspeak) 1987 •
 Drowning in Limbo [CD] (Widowspeak) 1989 •
 Oral Fixation (Widowspeak) 1989 •

LYDIA LUNCH/MICHAEL GIRA

Hard Rock [tape] (Ecstatic Peace) 1984

LYDIA LUNCH AND LUCY HAMILTON

The Drowning of Lucy Hamilton EP (Widowspeak) 1985

CLINT RUIN/LYDIA LUNCH

Stinkfist EP (Widowspeak) 1988 •

LYDIA LUNCH/THURSTON MOORE

The Crumb EP (Widowspeak) 1988 •

HARRY CREWS

Naked in Garden Hills (Widowspeak) 1989 •

Lydia Lunch's career since deep-sixing Teenage Jesus and the Jerks has been an unpredictable path governed by boredom, sarcasm, romance, perversity and whatever musicians or collaborators are convenient at the time. Queen of Siam proves, at the very least, that she can do more than just scream (although her version of the Classics IV hit, "Spooky," shows she ain't exactly Beverly Sills, either). Half of the album consists of muted, somber variations on her Teenage Jesus fear-and-suffering dirges, but the real surprises are songs like "Lady Scarface," in which the big band arrangements (by Flinstones-theme composer Billy Ver Planck) turn Lunch's wry asides into a Billie Holiday nightmare.

On the heels of Queen of Siam's release, Lunch formed 8 Eyed Spy with ex-Contortions bassist George Scott, ex-Jerk Jim Sclavunos on drums, guitarist Michael Paumgardhen and saxophonist/guitarist Pat Irwin, who had worked on Lunch's solo album. The lifespan of the group set a pattern for Lydia's ventures:

assemble a band, work with it for a while, disband it when she got "bored"; six months later some vinyl would appear. (One conglomeration, an alleged blues abortion called the Devil Dogs, didn't last long enough to be documented.)

13.13, concocted with a trio of ex-Weirdos, was hypothetically an attempt at new psychedelia; actually it revived the grind-and-caterwaul of Teenage Jesus as filtered through Metal Box-era PiL, all deviant guitar and rolling rhythms. Like her previous stuff, it manages to be simultaneously fascinating and annoying.

Lunch hung out in Europe for a while with Nick Cave and the Birthday Party, a sympathetic association reflected in a number of recordings. The Agony Is the Ecstasy (a record she splits with the Party) captures an impromptu London gig featuring Banshees bassist Steve Severin on feedback guitar and is easily one of the most extreme Lunches to date. On the other hand, a 12-inch single done with Party guitarist Rowland S. Howard of "Some Velvet Morning" (an old Lee Hazelwood song—Nancy Sinatra has been a longtime touchstone for Lydia) recalls the softer moments of Queen of Siam.

In Limbo is a six-track disc with an all-star supporting crew that includes Thurston Moore of Sonic Youth and former Contortion/Bush Tetra Pat Place. With snail's-pace tempos, Moore's shards of acid, harsh guitar and Lunch's trademark ululations, it's typically rough going, but recommended for anyone who has trouble contending with an entire album's worth of her clamor.

The Drowning of Lucy Hamilton is the soundtrack to a film (The Right Side of My Brain) starring Jim (Foetus) Thirlwell and Henry Rollins. Lucy Hamilton herself is actually Lydia's collaborator on the record, which consists of eerie instrumentals orchestrated with piano, honking bass clarinet (both played by Hamilton) and guitars that sound like they're being played with ice picks and hedge clippers. Something rather different for Lunch, and less like background music than most soundtracks. Drowning in Limbo, as might be surmised, is the CD pairing of that record with In Limbo.

Having successfully launched the Widowspeak label, Lunch used it to release Hysterie, an ambitious ten-year two-disc career-spanning compilation, starting with Teenage Jesus, recapitulating 8 Eyed Spy and the little-known Beirut Slump, and winding up with three recent collaborations (Die Haut, a pre-These Immortal Souls group and something called Sort Sol).

Honeymoon in Red was recorded with members of the Birthday Party, Thurston Moore and Genevieve McGuckin (now in These Immortal Souls) in 1982 and '83, and was originally going to be a Birthday Party album. When that band split up, the record was shelved. After several years' worth of tinkering, it was finally remixed by Clint (Foetus) Ruin and released on Lydia's label. (The only BPers whose names appear on the record are Rowland Howard and the late Tracy Pew; Nick Cave and Harvey are credited pseudonymously.) Lunch and the Party are/were obvious soulmates, but her input here is too often predominant; her penchant for slow tempos dilutes the band's brutal strength. Not a great album by any means, but of definite interest to fans of those involved. The CD adds "This Velvet Morning" from the Lunch/Howard single.

Although her world view hasn't changed, Stinkfist—a collaboration with Clint Ruin—could be the first joint effort she doesn't dominate; most of the EP's tracks are primarily instrumental, as Foetus speeds things along with a thunder-drum/noise guitar assault akin to his solo work. But even these two can't make this much noise without a little help; guests include ex-Red Hot Chili Pepper Cliff Martinez and ex-X D.J. Bonebrake pounding on things. Lots of noise and energy but nothing new, especially for the already Foetusized

The Crumb EP is credited to Lunch, Thurston Moore and the Honeymoon in Red Orchestra, which consists of Lunch, Moore, Thirlwell and Howard. It's not on your local soft-rock station's playlist, nor is it perfect for the office. Moore shares vocals, and the sound is a fairly predictable, semi-defined sonic crunch. (The Crumb is included on the Stinkfist CD.)

In recent years, Lunch has occasionally foregone musical accompaniment entirely and chosen to share her muse via the spoken word. The Uncensored tape is in this format, as are Hard Rock (done with lead Swan Michael Gira) and Oral Fixation. The last-named captures a full-length solo rap at the Detroit Institute of Art from January 1988. As venomous as her song lyrics can get, this format allows her to take a giant step further. Sometimes clever, frequently condescending and always relentless, she spits out her observations about sex, death, middle class values, etc. with plenty of nihilistic passion, but never offers any reference point: everything in the world just plain sucks. Lunch never runs out of things to say, but as a speaker she is less an original artist than a type. The Oral Fixation CD also includes The Uncensored.

Harry Crews is a Southern novelist and professor whose name and work supply the inspiration for a band Lunch formed with Sonic Youth bassist Kim Gordon and a drummer. (The trio toured Europe in September '88.) Naked in Garden Hills, recorded live in London and Vienna, is not unlike previous Sonic Lunches, but with quicker tempos than Lydia's usual and a bit more noise than either might employ without this symbiotic provocation. "The Gospel Singer" is especially interesting, with a hard bluesy backing to almost rapped vocals.

Besides her recording career, Lunch has appeared in underground films and collaborated with Exene Cervenka (of X) on a book of poetry. Throughout, she continues to project the most negative charisma since Johnny Rotten. [rnp/dgs]

See also Birthday Party, 8 Eyed Spy, Einstürzende Neubauten, Foetus Inc., No Trend, Teenage Jesus and the Jerks.

EVAN, JOHN LURIE

See Lounge Lizards.

LURKERS

Fulham Fallout (nr/Beggars Banquet) 1978 •
 God's Lonely Men (nr/Beggars Banquet) 1979
 Greatest Hit: Last Will and Testament (nr/Beggars Banquet) 1980 •

Final Vinyl EP (nr/Clay) 1983
 Wild Times Again (Ger. Weserlabel) 1988
 King of the Mountain (nr/Link) 1989
 Live and Loud!! (nr/Link) 1989
 This Dirty Town (nr/Clay) 1990

PETE STRIDE/JOHN PLAIN

New Guitars in Town (nr/Beggars Banquet) 1980

Despite the occasional glimmer of greatness, the Lurkers were never much more than a lightweight, second-string suburban London punk band, playing simple numbers in a plodding manner over repetitive drum figures. The tantalizing bits suggested a much better band lurking (sorry) inside; the post-split record by southpaw guitarist Pete Stride and part-time Lurker Honest John Plain (otherwise in the Boys) proves that the group was not without talent, but simply lacked the ability to express itself successfully.

Fulham Fallout has the advantage of crystal-clear sound (thanks to producer Mick Glossop) and a few impressive songs ("Ain't Got a Clue," "Shadow"), but suffers from tedium and general punky cloddishness. God's Lonely Men seems to employ only one beat; the overbearing rhythm section's dense, muffled pounding gives the record an air of mock metal. Two poppier tracks hint at better things ahead musically, but time had run out for the Lurkers.

Greatest Hit gathers up twelve numbers from the two LPs and adds a half-dozen single sides. Surprisingly enough, it's much better than either of the preceding albums, and has enough fun tunes to make it a worthwhile investment in low-brow punk. Not essential, but good enough.

The relationship between the Boys and the Lurkers began sometime before the latter broke up—guitarist Honest John Plain appears on two of the Greatest Hit tracks, including one called "New Guitar in Town"—so it took only a melding of the two bands to provide backing for the collaborative effort by Stride and Plain. New Guitars in Town starts off with a Spectroesque version of Sonny Bono's "Laugh at Me" (also recorded by Mott the Hoople) and gets better from there. Rather than a flashy collection of solos as the title suggests, the two stringleaders show off their singing and songwriting more than guitar pyrotechnics, which remain decidedly in the background. All in all, a delicious collection of rollicking pop-rock, played with spit and spirit.

After a short non-existence, Stride, bassist Nigel Moore and drummer Dan Tozer reformed the Lurkers with a different singer and began releasing new singles in an old punk style. This Dirty Town (named for the reincarnated quartet's 1982 debut) collects up—for better and worse—all of the band's tracks (A's, B's and EP) from this era, demonstrating both a shameless connection to slowed-down Clash/Pistols punk and a little stylistic progress (note the keyboards and dub mixing on "Lets Dance Now"). As ever, the Lurkers rise above their chosen genre, but not enough to escape it.

In early 1989, again swapping singers (this time for Arturo Bassick, who had been the Lurkers' bassist at one early point), the Lurkers cut the crisply melodic King of the Mountain, an ace mini-album that compares very favorably to vintage Ramones. Judging by "Barbara Blue" and the weirdly topical "Going Monkee Again (Hey Hey Hey),” the third time may be lucky for the Lurkers. The live album, recorded later in '89, is also loads of casual fun, energetically recapitulating the band's career in nineteen merry selections, from “Ain't Got a Clue” to “Barbara Blue.” [i]

See also Boys.

LUSH

Scar EP (nr/4AD) 1989 ●

Mad Love EP (nr/4AD) 1990 ●

Gala (4AD-Reprise) 1990 ●

Bowing with the six-song Scar, this winsome young London noise-pop quartet combines guitarist Miki Berenyi's wispy voice with wanton semi-freakout playing. Although some songs are not as tuneful as they might be (Lush stands well left of the Primitives), memorable items like the thick “Scarlet” and the float-away “Etheriel”—both co-written by Berenyi and guitarist Emma Anderson—arrange the band's basic components with naive ingenuity.

Cocteau Twin Robin Guthrie produced the four-song Mad Love, giving the band a more intricately textured sound (turning up the distorted rhythm guitars, for one thing) that only half suits Lush's skills and style. While Berenyi makes the most of “De-Luxe” and “Thought-forms” (on which she sounds like Kirsty MacColl fronting the Cocteau's), Chris Acland's busy drumming isn't a beneficial contribution.

Besides compiling the EPs in their entirety, Gala adds two more Guthrie collaborations (a nifty cover of Abba's obscure “Hey Hey Helen” and a much lighter second version of “Scarlet”), plus three subsequent tracks produced by Tim Friese-Greene, who mistakenly divides Lush's music into distinct segments of guitar craziness and overly restrained pop orderliness. [i]

LUXURIA

See Howard Devoto.

LYRES

The Lyres EP (Ace of Hearts) 1981

On Fyre (Ace of Hearts) 1984 ●

Someone Who'll Treat You Right Now EP (Fr. New Rose) 1985

The Box Set (Fr. New Rose) 1986

Lyres Lyres (Ace of Hearts) 1986 ●

Live at Cantones! (Pryct) 1987

A Promise Is a Promise (Ace of Hearts) 1988 ●

Live (Sp. Impossible) 1989

Live 1983: Let's Have a Party!! (Pryct) 1989

After the demise of DMZ—one of Boston's most exciting retro-rock-punk bands—singer/organist Jeff “Mono Mann” Conolly assembled the Lyres to play authentic '60s garage music in the '80s. Once an imitator of his heroes, Conolly's talent and devotion made him nearly their equal, and the Lyres' four-song debut (a 12-inch EP also known as Buried Alive, after its lead track) showcases a tough, spirited brand of rock'n'roll that sets the standard to which all other contemporary nostalgic grungophiles must be compared.

On Fyre is simply the genre's apotheosis, an articulate explosion of colorful organ playing, surging guitars and precisely inexact singing. Drawing on just the right selection of songwriters (Ray and Dave Davies each get tapped once; another esoteric cover revives a song originally recorded by ex-Beatle drummer Pete Best) and adding his own brilliant creations (especially the urgent “Help You Ann,” powered by phenomenal tremolo guitar), Conolly leads the Lyres on a nostalgic trip that is utterly relevant to the here and now. The CD, issued several years later, adds eight bonus tunes.

(The Lyres' French label, which had already issued the band's debut EP and album, put out a four-song 12-inch in 1985 and then repackaged all three items in a limited-edition hot-pink box the following year.)

A few moments into the excellent Lyres Lyres, Conolly quotes the riff from the Grass Roots' “Let's Live for Today” in “Not Looking Back.” There aren't any further citations of that caliber, but the entire record rocks with a mixture of Animalized R&B, touching and melodic barrelhouse pop and raving old-style punk. Danny McCormack's guitar work is spectacular; Conolly's voice has never sounded better. Among the covers this time are a pair by veteran Dutch rocker Wally Tax, an idol of Conolly's; other selections may be even less familiar to loyal Casey Kasem fans.

Live at Cantones! is a compilation of live cuts (dating from 1979-'81) that suffers from inconsistent, often inadequate, sound quality but has such cool tunes as “Let's Talk About Girls,” “She Pays the Rent” and—of course—“Louie Louie.” Let's Have a Party!! is much better, a single live-in-the-studio radio broadcast from March 1983. Conolly is in fine form, singing and organizing the Lyres through an informal history of '50s and '60s garage rock, from Elvis Presley/Wanda Jackson's “Let's Have a Party” to the Human Beinz's “Nobody but Me.” Although still far from exemplary audio fidelity (and slightly out of tune in spots), this is a fine showing by the very best.

Never the most prolific group, the Lyres let two years elapse before releasing a third studio album. Just prior to A Promise Is a Promise, recorded by the Lyres' thirteenth incarnation (according to Pete Frame's detailed family tree on the gatefold), a three-song 12-inch surfaced, containing “Here's a Heart,” a neat merseybeat oldie featuring Stiv Bators, and “Touch,” recorded in Holland with Tax. Both of those appear on the flatly recorded LP, which marks a real departure for the group. “Every Man for Himself” flirts with funk; “Feel Good” is a soulful rocker with a vocal that resembles Percy Faith; “Worried About Nothing” has the rueful tone of acoustic Neil Young. Dispensing with most of the dated stylization for about as modern a sound as a group with prominent Vox organ can get, the energy-spewing album drags in spots but blasts off in others. The CD and cassette add seven uneven live tracks. Clearly captured in a Dutch radio studio, the Lyres sound a lot like the Small Faces on “She Pays the Rent” and the LP's “She's Got Eyes That Tell Lies”; five additional tracks (including “Help You Ann”), however, come from some other concert source and are pretty crappy. (Collectors note: the Canadian vinyl edition has the extra material on a bonus disc and uses the US back cover on the front.) [cpl/i]

See also DMZ, Barrance Whitfield and the Savages.

M M M M M M

M

New York*London*Paris*Munich (Sire) 1979
 The Official Secrets Act (Sire) 1980
 Famous Last Words (Sire) 1982
 High Life Music EP (nr/Swahili-Albion) 1983
 Boogie with a Suitcase (nr/Freestyle) 1989 •
 Walking on the Water (nr/Fuego) 1989 •

M (Robin Scott) may stand in Top 40 history as a glorious one-hit wonder but, oh, what a hit! Easily the highlight of his first LP, "Pop Muzik" combines the moronic appeal of a brilliant semi-electronic novelty record with the sturdy danceability of a hot disco mix. Give this Englishman (with assists by Wally Badarou and Julian Scott) credit for partially paving the way for hip-hop and modern electro-pop in one fell swoop. Other cuts on the LP, such as "Cowboys and Indians" and "That's the Way the Money Goes," are just as silly but less immediate, leaving the listener free to observe how much Scott can sing like Bowie.

He shifted gears on The Official Secrets Act, playing superficial foolishness against an underlying current of fear; "Join the Party," "Working for the Corporation," "Your Country Needs You" and "Official Secrets" conjure up murky images of a threatening world. Scott clearly derives pleasure from inventing unexpected melodies and bending his tunes with quirky production touches.

Scott confirmed his status as a doodler on Famous Last Words: no two tunes are alike. Everything's a little odd, but never unpleasantly so. In short, this third LP possesses only the limited value of cleverness in a vacuum. One longs for less calculation, and references beyond the studio.

In 1981, Scott collaborated on an album with Yellow Magic Orchestra keyboardist Ryuichi Sakamoto. In 1989, "Pop Muzik" was re-released as a CD single to, in Scott's words, "celebrate ten years of obscurity."

See also Ryuichi Sakamoto. [jy]

SIPHO MABUSE

Sipho Mabuse (Virgin) 1987 •
 Chant of the Marching (Earthworks-Virgin) 1989 •

British new wave pioneer Martin Rushent co-produced and remixed veteran Soweto singer/drummer Mabuse's first American album, recorded in both Johannesburg and London. Mabuse sings mostly in English on the strongly westernized songs, which blend African percussion styles and sounds with rock guitar, popping fretless bass, funk horns and other dance-ready attributes. "Shikisha" and "Ti Nyanga (African Doctor)" both feature backing by a female vocal group and are the most colorfully appealing tracks here; "Burn Out" (previously issued in the US as a 12-inch from a 1985 import LP), with no African character whatever, is just plain terrible.

The sunny Chant of the Marching, recorded in Brussels, is an uplifting mainstream album with fewer commercial concessions than its predecessor. (The American-soul styled "Celebration" sounds like a sincere embrace rather than a forced attempt to imitate.) Over a blend of spirited backup singers, neat hornwork (by Hugh Masekela and others) and percussion (used in more of a musical than rhythmic role), Mabuse confidently sings his forthright (bilingual) lyrics about the townships, Mandela and resistance in a handsome, almost unaccented voice. Minam Makeba duets with Mabuse on one song. [i]

KIRSTY MACCOLL

Desperate Character (nr/Polydor) 1981
 Kite (nr/Virgin) 1989 (Charisma) 1990 •
 Free World EP (nr/Virgin) 1989 •
 Days EP (nr/Virgin) 1989 •
 Don't Come the Cowboy with Me Sonny Jim! EP (nr/Virgin) 1990 •
 Electric Landlady (Charisma) 1991 •

Daughter of the late folk-music giant Ewan MacColl, singer/songwriter Kirsty cut a great two-sided 45 for Stiff ("They Don't Know"—later an international hit for Tracey Ullman—b/w "Turn My Motor On") that went nowhere, but she scored two years later on the UK charts with the twangy "There's a Guy Works Down the Chip Shop Swears He's Elvis" (included in two versions on Desperate Character). For MacColl's first album, ace sidemen Billy Bremner, Lew Lewis and Gavin Povey helped her whip up a lively rock-country-pop stew that could be a female-led Rockpile. Nary a bad track in the bunch.

A second LP (recorded around '82 with bassist Pino Palladino) was completed but rejected by her label and went unreleased. In 1984, MacColl married producer Steve Lillywhite (whom she met at the sessions for Simple Minds' Sparkle in the Rain) and they collaborated on a single of Billy Bragg's "A New England," drastically overhauling the spare tune into a hitbound pop extravaganza.

In 1989, MacColl interrupted her successful career as a backing vocalist (her extensive credits include both the Pogues and the Rolling Stones) to make the Lillywhite-produced Kite, a mature and substantial contrast of sweet sounds and strong words. Writing sturdy, wisely provocative songs on her own and with the album's two main guitarists—Johnny Marr (ex-Smiths) and Pete Glenister (ex-Hitmen)—MacColl mixes a variety of full-bodied pop styles with some country ("Don't Come the Cowboy with Me Sonny Jim!"), adding a film noir story sung in French, a pair of wonderful covers (the Kinks' "Days" and the Smiths' "You Just Haven't Earned It Yet Baby") and pointed attacks on both Margaret Thatcher and shallow pop stars. Alluring layers of marvelous vocals and MacColl's colorful no-nonsense personality make Kite an utter delight.

In the UK, where the album's "Complaine pour Ste. Catherine" and "You Just Haven't Earned It Yet Baby" were CD-only bonus tracks, those songs also surfaced on the four-song CD-3s of, respectively, Don't Come the Cowboy with Me Sonny Jim! and Free World. The Days EP contains three non-LP tracks, including a handsome rendition of the old country standard "Please Help Me I'm Falling." [i]

See also Pogues.

ANDY MACKAY

See Explorers, Roxy Music.

MADBALL

See Agnostic Front.

MADNESS

One Step Beyond ... (Sire) 1979 •
Work Rest & Play EP (nr/Stiff) 1980
Absolutely (Sire) 1980 •
7 (nr/Stiff) 1981 (nr/Virgin) 1988 •
Complete Madness (nr/Stiff) 1982 (nr/Virgin) 1986 •
Madness Present the Rise and Fall (nr/Stiff) 1982
(nr/Virgin) 1988 •
Madness (Geffen) 1983
Keep Moving (Geffen) 1984 •
Mad Not Mad (Geffen) 1985 •
Utter Madness (nr/Zarjazz) 1986 •
The Peel Sessions EP (nr/Strange Fruit) 1986 •

THE MADNESS

The Madness (nr/Virgin) 1988 •
I Pronounce You EP (nr/Virgin) 1988 •

NUTTY BOYS

Crunch! (nr/Street Link) 1990 •

The world needs more bands like Madness. One of the original London perpetrators of the ska revival, they grew from a silly novelty group into full-scale international superstars, beloved by seemingly everyone in Europe, from tot to pensioner. Though diversity in contemporary music is generally laudable, the factionalism it sometimes engenders isn't; Madness' ability to appeal to different audiences suggests that pop needn't always polarize listeners into incompatible camps.

Produced by Clive Langer and Alan Winstanley, Madness' records tend to sound the same, which testifies more to their lighthearted, bubbly style of execution than any actual uniformity of material. The band's inspirations originally came (less later on) primarily from ska and the music hall—i.e., sing-along music—though you're likely to find classic rock'n'roll, Arabic overtones, utterly insipid jokes, easy-listening pop, incisive observations on society (not unlike Ray Davies) and just about everything else.

Highlights of One Step Beyond include the titular instrumental, "Night Boat to Cairo," "Chipmunks Are Go!" and Prince Buster's "Madness." (The subsequent Work Rest & Play 7-inch EP has four cuts, including "Night Boat.") Absolutely features the giddy "Baggy Trousers" and "Return of the Los Palmas 7." 7 contains "Grey Day," an uncharacteristically somber ballad, and "The Opium Eaters," a tinkly movie-music instrumental.

Complete Madness is highly recommended because it collects the band's many hits, but in reality any Madness LP guarantees lively and—dare it be said?—wholesome fun.

Displaying added maturity and creative breadth, The Rise and Fall is another fine crowd-pleaser, with such likable fare as "Tomorrow's Just Another Day" and "Our House," a virtual sociology primer on English family life.

The nutty boys finally did themselves a favor and signed in the US with Geffen Records, who managed to scare up a hit single for the band in the form of "Our House." That track is also included on Madness, a compilation of previously released UK tracks dating back to 1979. (Madness contains about half of The Rise and Fall in addition to oldies like "Night Boat to Cairo" and the tender "It Must Be Love.") Good stuff.

What followed was a period of tumult: Madness left Stiff, keyboardist Mike Barson left Madness and the band set up their own Zarjazz label. Keep Moving, their final LP as a septet, offers a full platter of typically tuneful, thoughtful, lightweight pop songs covering familiar ground, musically and lyrically. "Wings of a Dove" incorporates a gospel choir; "Michael Came" uses a cute pop-culture gimmick to sell an otherwise weak number. The growing vocal skills of Carl Smyth (aka Chas Smash) and Graham (Suggs) McPherson have made them the band's most recognizable trait; the others' seemingly effortless playing is easy to take for granted.

Although it has its moments, Mad Not Mad is an uneasy, odd record, sounding a bit like Bryan Ferry in more than one spot ("Yesterday's Men," "Coldest Day"), offering a quizzical look at America ("Uncle Sam") and covering Scritti Politti's beautiful "Sweetest Girl" with little élan. With Barson gone, keyboards are played by Steve Nieve and Roy Davies; a lot of guest musicians add strings, horns and backing vocals. Not unpleasant, but unsettlingly out of the Madness mainstream.

Having achieved far more success in eight years than these north Londoners ever imagined, Madness announced its breakup in September 1986. But late '87 brought the return of a slimmed-down band rechristened The Madness and early '88 saw the release of a self-titled new album. Further than ever from their ska roots, the semi-reunited group (McPherson, Chris Foreman, Lee Thompson and Carl Smyth, with help from, among others, Specials leader Jerry Dammers and Attractions Nieve and Bruce Thomas) comes up with low-key, almost dour adult techno-pop that, like Mad Not Mad, gains in force with repeat listenings. The CD includes four extra tracks.

Following the dismal failure of The Madness (it spent one week in the British Top 100), Foreman (guitars, keyboards, programming) and Thompson (sax and, after a fashion, vocals) alone had the stamina to continue. The duo adopted Madness' old nickname, the Nutty Boys, and made a new album on their own. The self-produced Crunch! upholds the old group's standards of pop craftsmanship, returning to ska beats (not the full 2 Tone environment) with only slightly less imagination and a bit more casual aplomb. (The CD adds two.)

Following the original Madness' breakup, another compilation appeared. Utter Madness contains all of the band's UK hits ("Wings of a Dove," "Our House," "Michael Caine") from 1982 to 1986. The CD adds "Seven Year Scratch (Hits Megamix)." The John Peel EP dates from the first year of Madness, 1979.

[jy/i/hd]

MADONNA

Madonna (Sire) 1983 ●

Like a Virgin (Sire) 1985 ●

True Blue (Sire) 1986 ●

Who's That Girl (Sire) 1987 ●

You Can Dance (Sire) 1987 ●

Like a Prayer (Sire) 1989 ●

I'm Breathless (Sire) 1990 ●

The Immaculate Collection (Sire) 1990 ●

Forget for a moment, if you can, all the personality, press and image that attends these albums and consider their contents. The first (reissued in the UK with an alternate cover as The First Album) consolidates simpleminded singles ("Lucky Star," "Borderline," "Holiday") and five other lengthy numbers for a bouncy program of dance music that owes a lot to the remnants of disco. The album is a bit slick; Madonna's lack of a discernible style keeps it from being a creatively significant debut. Three producers (Reggie Lucas, Jellybean Benitez and Mark Kamins) give her different sonic settings, but in every case the beat and the voice—alternately soulful and coquettish—are the focal points.

Like a Virgin (a British reissue adds the alluring "Into the Groove," recorded for the soundtrack of Madonna the Actor's film debut, Desperately Seeking Susan) is a far more impressive affair, a full-blown self-invention that covers all the bases and made Ms. Ciccone a culture-rending global star. Nile Rodgers' outrageous production packs the songs with hooks and gimmicks, finishing each off with a fine sonic shine. "Material Girl," "Like a Virgin," "Over and Over," "Dress You Up" and others all served to build her character, fill dancefloors and remain in pop fans' memories indefinitely. (Incidentally, Madonna the Songwriter was barely involved in composing the tunes: the dreaded Billy Steinberg/Tom Kelly hook factory, for instance, whipped up the image-building "Like a Virgin" all by themselves.) Regardless of opinions about Madonna the Star, Like a Virgin is a first-rate record.

True Blue, on the other hand, isn't very good at all. Mega-successful, yes, but the clichéd electro-dance production (Madonna, Patrick Leonard and Stephen Bray) and half-baked songwriting keep it from serious creative contention. Madonna sings up a storm, but her dedication to musical variety makes for hit-or-miss records, and True Blue rarely connects. Only "Open Your Heart," with an unforgettably hooky chorus, the atmospheric "Live to Tell," on which she resembles Joni Mitchell, and the corny '50s-like title track are any good. Maudlin rubbish ("Papa Don't Preach"), mindless dancearama ("Where's the Party") and an embarrassingly amateurish cinematic salute ("White Heat") are among the album's missteps.

Who's That Girl, although virtually billed as such, isn't a Madonna album. The soundtrack of her best-forgotten 1987 film contains tracks by Coati Mundi, Scritti Politti, Club Nouveau and others; Madonna contributes a quartet of new tunes, although only the delightful "Who's That Girl" is worth hearing.

Flexing her dance-club muscles, Madonna then issued You Can Dance, a career-spanning retrospective of various producers' mundane remixes. "Holiday," "Everybody," "Physical Attraction," "Over and Over," "Into the Groove" and "Where's the Party" all get the treatment; the record also contains "Spotlight," a previously unissued throwaway. The CD adds three more remixes for a full program of moving and (into the) grooving.

Fully anointed as the decade's biggest and most influential female pop star, Madonna demonstrated her ability to craft flawless and hollow product on Like a Prayer, an album/event pretentious enough to be bathed in the scent of church incense and conscientious enough to include serious information about AIDS on a small insert. Musically, the record (written and produced by Madonna in collaboration with, individually, Patrick Leonard, Prince and Stephen Bray) has something for everybody, especially dancers: high drama ("Like a Prayer"), pseudo-Motown ("Express Yourself") and bouncy '50s pop ("Cherish"). But while Madonna is busy cashing in with those catchy hits (and a Prince tune, "Love Song," that never gets off the ground), she also devotes much of the record to personal exorcisms that would be stronger if her voice bore even a trace of conviction. The grand ballad "Promise to Try" is a farewell to her late mother; "Oh Father" offers a lot of blame and a bit of forgiveness to her dad; "Till Death Do Us Part" is a bitter kiss-off to her ex-husband. Enigmatically, the album's closing track, "Act of Contrition," is a wild psychedelic joke that conflates religion and squalling guitar noise to no appreciable effect.

That I'm Breathless (subtitled "Music from and Inspired by the Film Dick Tracy") is a bad record probably goes without saying, but it's still a surprise to hear how grotesque the results of Madonna's theatrical aspirations are. Using a frighteningly closefit of unsuitable voices (leave Carmen Miranda alone!), Madonna sings three of the great Stephen Sondheim's worst toss-offs and a bunch of inept genre imitations, culminating in a smugly crude spanking number, "Hanky Panky." The record's only notable track, "Vogue," is just an empty shell of a song, style sans substance. Madonna may have the power to do anything she cares to, but this record demonstrates that she doesn't have the talent to get away with it. (In the next test of her abilities, Madonna wound up 1990 with the controversial "Justify My Love" single/video/sample.)

While omitting such huge charters as "Dress You Up" and "True Blue," The Immaculate Collection rounds up fifteen of Madonna's smashes, from 1983's "Holiday" through 1990's "Vogue," adding two new tunes: "Justify My Love" and "Rescue Me." [i]

MAD PROFESSOR

See Lee Perry, Ruts.

MAGAZINE

Real Life (Virgin) 1978 (Blue Plate) 1991 •
Secondhand Daylight (Virgin) 1979 (Blue Plate) 1991 •
The Correct Use of Soap (Virgin) 1980 (Blue Plate)
1991 •
Sweetheart Contract EP (nr/Virgin) 1980
Play. (IRS) 1980 •
Magic, Murder and the Weather (IRS) 1981 •
After the Fact. (nr/Virgin) 1982 (IRS) 1982 •
Rays & Hail 1978–1981 [CD] (Virgin) 1987 •
Scree: Rarities 1978–1981 [CD] (nr/Virgin) 1990 (Blue Plate) 1991 •

Singer/writer Howard Devoto left the Buzzcocks in an effort to move beyond punk and power pop and take rock music to new levels of complexity and sophistication without losing the recently regained energy of the form. To this end, he formed Magazine with then-unknowns John McGeoch (guitar/sax), Barry Adamson (bass), Dave Formula (keyboards) and drummer Martin Jackson (replaced after just one LP). They advanced a music of many styles and moods with lyrics full of obfuscation and a lush, many-faceted sound, still maintaining the rudimentary passion au courant in the music of 1978. Devoto disbanded Magazine in 1981 to pursue a solo career.

Produced by John Leckie, Real Life sports an eerie Grand Guignol sound throughout its nine punchy pop tunes, including the Devoto/Shelley-composed hit, "Shot by Both Sides." Adamson's driving bass and Formula's electronics dominate the presentation, while Devoto paints a deranged world of betrayal and suspicion, mixing urban alienation with such material as Tibetan mysticism and the Kennedy assassination. But beneath the dark veneer is humor and top-notch music.

Secondhand Daylight, produced by Colin Thurston, benefits from the change in drummers—John Doyle's style is more fluid and less chunky than his predecessor. Devoto's simplified lyrics focus on insurmountable emotional distances between people, aurally realized with dislocated, keyboard-heavy music.

The Correct Use of Soap is more upbeat, returning to Real Life's popness (without the manic depression), and shows Magazine to be a mature and cohesive band. The mix adds an element of funk, and Devoto reveals a Costello-like flair for playful lyrics. The album includes some of Magazine's best songs, including "Sweetheart Contract," "Philadelphia" and "A Song from Under the Floorboards." Highly recommended. (The subsequent 12-inch appendixes three 1980 live performances from Manchester—including "Shot by Both Sides" and "Twenty Years Ago"—to the title track.)

Play. records a 1980 Australian concert, but a great performance is marred by production that distances Devoto's vocals from the music. Although guitarist Robin Simon, John McGeoch's replacement, fails to integrate fully, the band is relaxed and in control, and the album continues in Soap's joyously sardonic vein. "Give Me Everything" and "Twenty Years Ago," both otherwise non-LP, are included.

Magic, Murder and the Weather is controlled by Dave Formula's keyboards, with Devoto taking a turn for the grotesque, as on the casual ditty called "The Honeymoon Killers." The prevalent moods are sarcasm and resignation, making Devoto's decision to break up the band almost simultaneously with the record's release no great surprise.

The posthumous After the Fact. collection was released in two drastically different forms, with only five tracks in common. The British edition (green cover) contains an obvious trio of singles and seven album tracks—a nice retrospective, but nothing extraordinary. The American version (red cover) contains B-sides ("My Mind Ain't So Open," a 1978 item incorrectly noted as having been released in 1977, "Goldfinger," "I Love You, You Big Dummy," "TV Baby" and "The Book") as well as some of the same album extractions. Rays & Hail, a CD-only retrospective which almost completely absorbs the prior UK compilation, draws on all of the band's albums, adding the original single version of "Shot by Both Sides." In a final stroke that makes every last bit of Magazine's catalogue widely available, Scree—a carefully annotated collection of B-sides (and non-LP A-sides) that repeats ten songs from the American After the Fact. and complements Rays & Hail—was released. [sg/i]

See also Barry Adamson, Buzzcocks, Nick Cave and the Bad Seeds, Howard Devoto, Richard Jobson, Visage.

MAGNOLIAS

Concrete Pillbox (Twin/Tone) 1986
For Rent (Twin/Tone) 1988 •
Dime Store Dream (Twin/Tone) 1989 •

TOADSTOOL

The Sun Highway (Twin/Tone) 1990

Like a Frankenstein monster assembled to synthesize the sounds of Minneapolis, this young quartet spews back aspects of their hometown's Replacements, Soul Asylum and Hüsker Dü with gusto on Concrete Pillbox, which they co-produced with Grant Hart. (Note the familiar drum sound.) Some of weedy singer/rhythm guitarist John Freeman's songs show real melodic and structural promise; a bit of power pop (and a faint Cheap Trick influence) emerges in the group's aggressive playing.

Replacements soundman Monty Wilkes co-produced For Rent, a looser, better-developed collection that features a new bassist and a snare-happy mix. Roaring out of the starting gate with "Walk a Circle," "Glory Hop" and "Goodbye for Now," the Mags shed imitation (save an abiding Buzzcocks influence) for a loud, textured personality they can call their own. Over catchy riffs that put a nifty twist into the hard-driving songs, Freeman's voice registers aggression in both hoarse rage and quiet poise. A very promising sophomore LP.

Recording the inconclusive Dime Store Dream in Prince's Paisley Park Studios didn't make the Magnolias funky, but it did give them a raging guitar sound. A busy new drummer and producer Jim Rondinelli's overheated mix interfere with the group's small-scale charm, but some cool songs ("Flowin' Thru," "Don't See That Girl," the pseudo-Replacements "Coming on Too Strong.” “In My Nightmare”) do cut through. While Freeman’s singing gives the album its reassuring consistency, bits of vocal syncopation add an intriguing new dimension.

Concrete Pillbox bassist John Joyce later formed Toadstool with guitarist Brad White and a drummer. Co-produced by Dave Piner of Soul Asylum, The Sun Highway is a promising but underdeveloped debut that frequently obscures great lyrics and intriguing ideas (the jazz horns and folk forays, f’rinstance) in an amorphous blur of loose’n’noisy post-punk. [i]

FRED MAHER

See Material, Robert Quine.

MALCOLM’S INTERVIEW

See God’s Little Monkeys.

MALLET-HEAD

Mallet-Head (Old Nick-Frontier) 1988 •

Yeah Yeah Yeah (Frontier-BMG) 1990 •

Leaving Boston skatepunks Gang Green to their stylistic waffle, guitarist Chuck Stilphen and his bass-wielding brother Glen took a decisive step across the metal line and formed Mallet-Head with singer Morgan Keating and a drummer. Buoyed by Chuck’s effective production and the occasionally clever lyrics (“It Was a Blasphemy, Was It a Blast for You?”), Mallet-Head is crisp and economical speed metal that makes its entrance with a brief dub reggae instrumental. (The cassette adds two bonus tracks.)

Changing drummers, Mallet-Head slowed the pace and thickened up the instrumental tone to become bullshitless Cult-like hard-rockers on the solidly enjoyable Yeah Yeah Yeah. Keating’s commanding vocals fit the part, and Stilphen’s guitar work is strictly ’70s raunch, not ’80s hot-finger blur. Packing memorable melody hooks into straightforward numbers like “One Good Reason” and “Rolling Thunder,” the quartet captures the old bands’ surging spirit as much as their exciting sound. I wonder if they know “Nantucket Sleighride” . . . [i]

See also Gang Green.

STEPHEN MALLINDER

See Cabaret Voltaire.

MANITOBA’S WILD KINGDOM

... And You? (Popular Metaphysics-MCA) 1990 •

Where the Dictators shouldered heavy metal as a means to commercialize their punky pop, Wild Kingdom—reuniting that legendary New York band’s vocalist Handsome Dick Manitoba, songwriter/bassist Andy Shernoff and super-guitarist Ross the Boss (a genuine metal star in his post-Dics career with Manowar)—does exactly the opposite. Injecting wit, economy, intelligence and classic pop structure into heavyweight rock power, the brief but utterly satisfying . . . And You? is metal for those allergic to the form and a substantial post-punk treat for those partial to attitude-heavy Velvet Underground acolytes. Reviving the Dictators’ old “New York, New York” and adding nine equally potent new tunes (many taking a chillingly older’n’wiser cautionary approach to drug-abuse and other self-indulgence), the LP is a fun-filled blast of riffs and roars that rocks like crazy, a credible continuation of the Dictators’ ethos in a contempo setting. [i]

See also Dictators.

MAN-KA-ZAM

See Alan Milman Sect.

EARLE MANKEY

Real World EP (Happy Hermit) 1985

Between studio stints with Dream 6 and his brother Jim’s Concrete Blonde, ex-Sparks guitarist-turned-producer Earle Mankey—who launched his solo career with a nifty 1978 single (“Mau Mau” b/w “Crazy”) and an overlapping 1981 EP—issued the six-song Real World. Johnette N. “designed” the cover (the art is an adorable primitive portrait of the artist by his son) and, along with brother Jim, “yells” on one track. “Bigger Than Life” has tongue-in-cheek Nick Lowe charm and harmonies Brian Wilson might enjoy; otherwise Real World passes by quickly and uneventfully. [i]

See also Sparks.

BARBARA MANNING

Lately I Keep Scissors (Heyday) 1988 •

One Perfect Green Blanket EP (Heyday) 1991 •

WORLD OF POOH

Land of Thirst (NufSed) 1989

On her solo debut, Lately I Keep Scissors, SF Bay Area singer/songwriter Barbara Manning—once bassist/vocalist in Chico’s under-recorded 28th Day—produces starkly pretty folk-pop (“Never Park,” “Scissors”) and grungier rock (“Make It Go Away,” “Something You’ve Got”) with help from members of various San Francisco combos (Flying Color, Donner Party, Cat Heads). The album’s deceptively simple music (with Ms. M. contributing cello, guitar and bass to the effort) is an apt reflection of Manning’s unpretentiously personal songwriting, an uneasy balance of calm and tumult. (But what does one make of a musical fan letter to “Mark E. Smith & Brix”?) The album’s CD version includes a stack of bonus tracks, which were also released separately on vinyl as One Perfect Green Blanket.

The World of Pooh has Manning playing bass and sharing vocal and songwriting duties with guitarist Brandan Kearney (a drummer rounds out the lineup). The music on Land of Thirst is considerably nastier than on Manning’s solo record, but both writers’ material—including a rougher-edged remake of “Scissors”—is well-crafted enough that the approach works. [hd]

ROGER MANNING

Roger Manning (SST) 1988 •

The problem with most of New York’s “anti-folk” acousticians is that they can’t shake Bob Dylan out of their Woody Guthrie fantasies. Wrapping themselves in the poverty and left-wing politics of classic troubadours, their rock roots make them selfconscious, overly aware and ambitious: stylemongering stars-in-training rather than hard-traveling truth-is-its-own-reward balladeers. That's not to say the genre hasn't unearthed talented artists and worthwhile records, merely that the price of honesty has gone up over the years.

On his engaging first album, Manning strums a simple guitar and sings intelligent, occasionally annoying, lyrics in a weedy tenor. While covering all the obligatory self-referential scene bases (Michelle Shocked, Cindy Lee Berryhill and Woody Guthrie all get name-checks), he spends a lot of time rambling ("The Hitchhikers' Blues," "The Airport Blues," "The Sicilian Train Blues") and singing about women. So what else is new? More interesting than entertaining, Roger Manning offers a clear lesson in the neo-folk form's strengths and contradictions. [i]

MANO NEGRA

Putas Fever (Virgin) 1990 •

Reasonably but incompletely described as the French Pogues, the zany eight-man Mano Negra throw together a frenzied ragout of multinationalism on Putas Fever, a record—sung in English, Spanish, French and Arabic—in which rock, funk, reggae, folk, flamenco, zouk, salsa, gospel, jazz and numerous other pan-cultural idioms collide in an exhilarating rush of hyperkinetic merriment. Forget the boring Gipsy Kings—Mano Negra is a band Jerry Lewis fans can really understand! With lyrics that are just as conventional as the music, guitarist/singer Manu Chao's well-crafted songs switch settings—continents, even—as if it were the most natural thing for them to do. Hearing the album for the first time is to enter a dizzying carousel of colorful sounds that are impossible to grasp; becoming intimate with Putas Fever is to really feel its indescribable pleasures. [i]

MAN SIZED ACTION

Claustrophobia (Reflex) 1983

Five Story Garage (Reflex) 1984

To be the coolest band in Minneapolis nowadays you need a little more vision and talent than the gallant Man Sized Action could muster. But to be a cool band anywhere, all you need is this unpretentious lot's commitment to a few good ideas. Man Sized Action opened up punk structures with distorted, ringing guitar, some off-kilter rhythms and emotionally sung lyrics. Like Hüsker Dü, they applied a neanderthal, propulsive attack to fundamentally poppy songs.

The lo-fi Claustrophobia, produced by Hüsker Düde Bob Mould, sets up powerful grooves, but never escapes its murky dynamic. Particularly on "My Life," Tippy's singing wall of guitar and Kelly Linehan's supporting bass hint at the band's ability to create beautifully textured sounds without sacrificing power or bracing crudeness.

Five Story Garage adds better production, better songs and a second guitarist. The quintet generates a surge of momentum that threatens to explode its punky pop hooks, making the album fast, powerful and surprisingly accessible. [j]

ZEKE MANYIKA

See Orange Juice.

PHIL MANZANERA

Diamond Head (Atco) 1975 (EG) 1990 •

K-Scope (EG-Polydor) 1978 (EG) 1982 •

Primitive Guitars (Editions EG) 1982 •

Guitarissimo 75–82 (EG) 1987 •

Southern Cross (nr/Expression) 1990 •

QUIET SUN

Mainstream (Antilles) 1975

PHIL MANZANERA/801

801 Live (EG-Polydor) 1976 (EG) 1982 •

Listen Now (nr/Polydor) 1977 (EG) 1982 •

WETTON/MANZANERA

Wetton/Manzanera (Geffen) 1987

Although not quite the founding guitarist in Roxy Music, Phil Manzanera was one of its three enduring pillars, and his radical instrumental approaches were as much a part of the band's early stylistic groundbreaking as Bryan Ferry's equally unprecedented vocals.

Before joining Roxy (as sound mixer; he took over on guitar in early '72), the debonair Briton who was raised in Latin America spent a couple of years in Quiet Sun, a progressive outfit that had broken up but reformed temporarily in 1975 to cut a debut album. Mainstream is a jazzy, Soft Machine-like outing enlivened by Manzanera's distortion-crazed solos and slices of other bizarreness (thanks, in part, to Eno's participation) cutting through the sophisticated instrumental arrangements. Best song title: "Mummy was an asteroid, daddy was a small non-stick kitchen utensil." The following year, drummer Charles Hayward went on to form This Heat.

Prior to the Quiet Sun reunion, Manzanera stepped out of Roxy for his pleasurable solo debut, the look-what-I-can-do Diamond Head. Joining him on this exploration of diverse styles are Roxy cohorts (Eno, Paul Thompson, Andy Mackay, John Wetton, Eddie Jobson), Quiet Sun (the whole group on one track) and the redoubtable Robert Wyatt, who sings lead—in Spanish—on "Frontera." Manzanera scarcely opens his mouth on the half-instrumental record, leaving Eno the mic for the wonderful "Big Day" and "Miss Shapiro," both of which strongly resemble Here Come the Warm Jets.

Manzanera's next significant side project (neglecting, of course, his contributions to records by Nico, Eno, Ferry, John Cale, Mackay, Split Enz and others) was 801. Originally assembled to play a handful of concerts during a period of Roxy inactivity in 1976, the first 801 consisted of Manzanera, Eno, Quiet Sun bassist Bill MacCormick, drummer Simon Phillips and two others. Recorded in London, 801 Live draws material from Diamond Head, Here Come the Warm Jets and Mainstream, adding the Beatles' "Tomorrow Never Knows" and the Kinks' "You Really Got Me." A spectacular example of cross-culturalization that should be of serious interest to Roxy fans.

Two years later, a studio album, employing almost the entire performing cast and then some, returned 801 to life. Listen Now consists of new Manzanera compositions and is actually not unlike a solo record, but his partnership with MacCormick justifies the group designation. Unfortunately, much of the record is conservative and dull, an overly smooth and sophisticated collection (maybe it's Kevin Godley's influence) that rarely ignites. The long pieces—mostly vocalized by Simon Ainley and a collection of backup singers—are radio-ready but barely sentient.

During another Roxy hiatus, Manzanera created the livelier solo-billed K-Scope in collaboration with many of 801's players. Clever lyrics sung by Tim Finn (ex-Split Enz) and saxes by Mel Collins (ex-King Crimson) are matched by Manzanera's invigorated (and invigorating) guitar work and Phillips' kinetic drumming. There's calm restraint (like "Cuban Crisis" and the endless "Walking Through Heaven's Door") amid the rock drive and dance-happy energy, but that contrast only gives the delightful record even deeper appeal.

To celebrate his tenth anniversary as a professional musician, Manzanera released Primitive Guitars, a solo instrumental album that shows numerous sides of his virtuosity. Guided by chronological and geographical themes that defy instant comprehension, the album stretches the sound of guitar all over the map (much of it to Latin lands) in a challenging zigzag of styles and approaches. Except for one bass part, Phil plays everything on the LP, which suffers not a jot by the isolation. As a fascinating self-defined retrospective of Manzanera's musical development, Primitive Guitars may be lost on some of his followers, while certainly connecting with others.

The lengthy (over 54 minutes on vinyl!) Guitarissimo "collocation" organizes tracks from Manzanera's solo records and both 801 outings into four thematic sections. Careful annotation and thoughtful sequencing make up for the compromised sonic quality, but the CD (with four bonus tracks) is an altogether better value.

Proving that even unassailably tasteful artists can take a dive, Manzanera made an unfortunate album with onetime bandmate John Wetton, following the latter's superstar sojourn in Asia. Wetton/Manzanera is depressing commercial tripe seemingly geared to relaunch Wetton's career from Asia's coattails. Strangely, "Keep on Loving Yourself" is about self-respect, something this project pointedly lacks.

Manzanera's Latin heritage gets strong play on Southern Cross, a record with a lot of taste and seasoning but no strong flavor. Surrounding a glitzy guitar-and-horns rendition of "Guantamera" (ably sung by Ana Maria Velez, one of the album's three lead vocalists; Tim Finn is another), the original material is bland, with political-minded lyrics ("Dr Fidel," "A Million Reasons Why") that are too clumsy and vague to make any point. In fact, the most eloquent track on the album is the dreamy and steamy titular instrumental, performed by Manzanera and Brazilian percussionist Basco De Olivera. [i]

See also Explorers, Roxy Music, This Heat.

THOMAS MAPFUMO AND THE ACID BAND

The Chimurenga Singles 1976–1980 (Shanachie) 1984 •

THOMAS MAPFUMO AND THE BLACKS UNLIMITED

Gwindingwi Rine Shumba (nr/Earthworks) 1980 + 1986

Ndangariro EP (nr/Earthworks) 1983 (Carthage) 1984 •

Mabasa (nr/Earthworks) 1984

Mr. Music (nr/Earthworks) 1985

Chimurenga for Justice (Shanachie) 1986

Corruption (Mango) 1989 •

Chamunorwa (Mango) 1991 •

From nightclub singer to political firebrand, Thomas Mapfumo's career has elevated him to near-sainthood in his native Zimbabwe. The Chimurenga Singles, recorded with the Acid (as in bitter) Band, carries an interesting disclaimer: "The quality of these tracks leaves much to be desired, but remember they were made under war conditions." Influenced by Voice of Zimbabwe radio broadcasts, Mapfumo participated in the country's liberation struggle, and was jailed for his troubles. The singles deal in political innuendo and are sung in the native Shona language. The sound is rushed, as if time were of the essence; as the cymbals hyper-ventilate and the guitars skitter along (in plinking imitation of the thumb piano), Mapfumo sings serious and subtle songs of revolution.

Some of the six long tracks on Ndangariro (which postdate the material compiled on The Chimurenga Singles and Zimbabwe's independence) resemble Mapfumo's early work, but others foretell his calmer artistic future. His later recordings are more languid and even include some love songs. The grooves are lazier, but the guitar retains a rapid-fire hunt-and-peck quality. The wonderful Chimurenga for Justice, for instance, blends a surprisingly uninflected loping reggae beat with a peppy African sound and even an American soul-influenced approach on half a dozen richly performed songs about struggle and praise. Trumpets and two female vocalists provide sweet counterpoint to Mapfumo's husky singing.

Delivered with the same heavenly allure by pretty backing vocals, crisp horns and gently rolling tempos, the songs on Corruption grapple with troubles aplenty. The English-language title track chants "something for something/nothing for nothing" in criticizing the misuse of power; "Shabeen" chastises men led astray by alcohol and hookers; "Kupera Kwevhanu" concerns the travails endured by Mozambique. Were more of the lyrics in English, accepting the stark contrast of content and presentation might be more challenging; as it stands, however, basking in the sounds of Mapfumo's marvelous music is no chore at all. [rg/i]

MARC AND THE MAMBAS

See Marc Almond.

MARCH VIOLETS

Religious as Hell EP (nr/Merciful Release) 1982

Natural History (nr/Rebirth) 1984

Electric Shades (Relativity) 1985

The March Violets began in 1981 as one of Leeds' four famous drum machine bands, alongside the Sisters of Mercy, Three Johns and Red Lorry Yellow Lorry. The Violets favored stark, primitive rhythm-box beats (as did the others), overlaid by Loz Elliott's heavy bass throb and Tom Ashton's inventively droning guitar (reminiscent of Magazine's John McGeoch). What set this quartet apart was the unique interplay (à la X or the Airplane) between the two complementary lead vocalists—big, bearded Simon Denbigh and enigmatic Rosie Garland. His dark, commanding intonations intertwined with her eerie soprano wailing, imbuing the simplistic material with a strident, almost dissonant mystery.

Before a schism with Andrew Eldritch led the Violets to start their own Rebirth label, they were on the Sisters' label, Merciful Release, starting with Religious as Hell, an establishing 7-inch. Natural History collects the band's early work, including the EP (save for the odd "Bon Bon Babies"), three follow-up 45s (the brilliant "Grooving in Green," "Crow Baby" and the insistent '84 dancefloor hit, "Snake Dance") and such rarities as the searing "Radiant Boys" (copping the riff from the Cure's "Object") and mesmerizing "Under-tow." Though not a discrete album, Natural History flows magnificently.

By "Snake Dance," Garland had departed, replaced by the more upbeat Cleo Murray. The lineup held for the subsequent "Walk into the Sun" but, as 1985 dawned, Denbigh was squeezed out of the band (he immediately formed Batfish Boys). The first post-Denbigh 45 (the misnamed "Deep") laid bare the Violets' weakened condition. Electric Shades, the band's second compilation album, assembles the entire contents of the three later singles: "Snake Dance," "Walk into the Sun" and "Deep." With the dissipation of the band's intensity, Cleo's thin, pretty lead vocals simply don't carry the new material. The Violets continued to surrender to conventionality, obtaining a real drummer and crassly exploiting Cleo's beauty. After contributing two items (including an amazingly catchy rendition of the Rolling Stones' "Miss Amanda Jones") to 1987's Some Kind of Wonderful soundtrack, the March Violets faded away. [gef]

See also Batfish Boys.

A.C. MARIAS

One of Our Girls (Has Gone Missing) (Mute-Restless) 1989 •

When not working behind the camera as a successful video clip director, Angela Conway steps up to the mic and assumes the identity of cool chanteuse A.C. Marias. On her quietly atmospheric records, she receives writing and production assistance from Wire guitarist Bruce Gilbert, as well as former Fad Gadget sideman-turned-bigtime-producer John Fryer. The somnolent first side of One of Our Girls—a sheer pastel curtain of arty guitar figures, light synth strains, and dry, wispy vocals that never quite achieves song-ness—floats by uneventfully. Fortunately, the rest of the record has more structural starch, and Marias' dance through an evanescent field of gentle art-rock has moments of real allure. [i]

MARINE GIRLS

Beach Party (nr/Whaam!) 1981 (nr/Cherry Red) 1987 •
Lazy Ways (nr/Cherry Red) 1983 •

Except for flashes of vocal strength ("He Got the Girl" is pretty impressive) from future Everything but the Girl woman Tracey Thorn, the Marine Girls' minimalist debut—released on the TV Personalities' label—is a sorry attempt at writing and performing off-beat romantic pop. Between Thorn's hapless guitar playing—supported by bits of percussion, Jane Fox's marginally better bass work and occasional seagull sounds—and the quartet's two inept singers (one of whom, Alice Fox, would go on to form Grab Grab the Haddock), Beach Party is a winceable soiree worth missing.

Produced by Stuart Moxham (Young Marble Giants/Gist), Lazy Ways is a lot better, although still not a complete treat. Besides an overall improvement in song-writing, Thorn's jazzy playing is vastly improved. With the first album's most egregious tune-mangler gone, Jane Fox's uneven singing has become the trio's weakest link, and she dooms a good chunk of the album to the wrong side of competence. (Lazy Ways and Beach Party were later combined on a single cassette and CD.) [i]

See also Everything but the Girl, Grab Grab the Haddock.

MARLEY MARL

In Control Volume 1 (Cold Chillin'-Warner Bros.) 1988 •

As many mainstream rappers—from Heavy D. and Biz Markie to Big Daddy Kane and Roxanne Shanté—already know, having producer Marley Marl (also a New York radio DJ) in control means great backing tracks. Keeping his own voice off the mic, Marl's album is a collection of collaborations with various MCs, including all of the above, M.C. Shan, the up-and-coming Master Ace and others. For all its diversity, In Control gives too much play to second-string rhymers, leaving the LP's few highlights (such as the Biz twiggling Barry Manilow in "We Write the Songs" and Shanté playing cute word games in "Wack It") adrift in a sea of verbal boreplay. [i]

BOB MARLEY & THE WAILERS

Natty Dread (Island) 1975 (Tuff Gong) 1990 •
Live! (Island) 1975 (Tuff Gong) 1990 •
Rastaman Vibration (Island) 1976 (Tuff Gong) 1990 •
Exodus (Island) 1977 (Tuff Gong) 1990 •
Kaya (Island) 1978 (Tuff Gong) 1990 •
Babylon by Bus (Island) 1978 (Tuff Gong) 1990 •
Survival (Island) 1979 (Tuff Gong) 1990 •
Uprising (Island) 1980 (Tuff Gong) 1990 •
Confrontation (Island) 1983 (Tuff Gong) 1990 •
Legend: The Best of Bob Marley and the Wailers (Island) 1984 (Tuff Gong) 1990 •
Rebel Music (Island) 1986 (Tuff Gong) 1990 •
Talkin' Blues (Tuff Gong) 1991 •

WAILERS

Catch a Fire (Island) 1973 (Tuff Gong) 1990 •
Burnin' (Island) 1973 (Tuff Gong) 1990 •

It is safe to say that the world would be a very different—and vastly poorer—place were it not for Bob Marley. Carrying the homegrown sounds of a small Caribbean island to Europe, Africa and America, he is directly responsible for a rhythm and a style that has moved millions and influenced every form of popular music for the past two decades. By exploding Eurocentric myths about the vitality and value of cultures beyond the borders of Britain and the US, he encouraged widespread cultural curiosity, as well as sparking the rediscovery of their heritage by countless people of color. And by building his art on a platform of esoteric religious faith and progressive Third World politics, Marley demonstrated a rare degree of defiance and courage for a global celebrity, and that has made him an enduring political/cultural hero to many.

In the early '60s, the Wailin' Wailers—basically Marley, Neville Livingstone (aka Bunny Wailer) and Peter MacKintosh (later Tosh)—were Jamaica's leading ska band, taking their cues from American R&B as much as an indigenous form called mento. (The group's early work can be heard on numerous anthologies, including 1990's The Birth of a Legend.) They disbanded in 1966, and Marley moved to Delaware, but returned home in 1967, reunited the old group and began fitting together the pieces of what would come to be known as reggae: a rhythmic style that was then gaining popularity in Jamaica, belief in Ras Tafari and its attendant effects (marijuana use, dreadlocks, language, politics, etc.) and a bottom-heavy production sound learned from producer Lee Perry and his studio's mighty rhythm section (bassist Aston "Family Man" Barrett and his drummer brother Carlton, both of whom became Wailers).

By the early '70s, the reggae revolution was in full swing in Jamaica, and the timely interest of Island Records was all it took to introduce this local phenomenon to the rest of the world. While awfully mild-sounding now, Catch a Fire (originally issued in a gimmicky flip-top cigarette lighter sleeve) delivered a stunning blast of warm tropical air and eloquent political reality amid the giddy glam-rock of 1972 England. "Concrete Jungle" and "Stir It Up" (an international hit for Johnny Nash around the same time) proved Marley to be an extremely gifted songwriter; Tosh's "400 Years" showed that there was more to the quintet than its charismatic lead singer. (Besides changing the cover art, later editions of the album began crediting it to Bob Marley and the Wailers.)

Released the same year, Burnin'—the final record by the original lineup—has a funkier sound and two genuine classics: "Get Up, Stand Up" and "I Shot the Sheriff." As watered down as his interpretation of the song is, Eric Clapton's 1974 hit cover of the latter actually helped bring reggae to the attention of those who hadn't yet met the real thing.

With Tosh and Wailer gone, Marley brought in guitarist Al Anderson, a keyboard player and a female backing trio (the I-Threes: Judy Mowatt, Rita Marley and Marcia Griffiths) to make Natty Dread. Completely in charge and growing in confidence, Marley demonstrates the diversity in his music and the seriousness of his message with such memorable songs as the tender "No Woman, No Cry," "Revolution" and "Lively Up Yourself," an old Wailers' tune given an updated arrangement.

Recorded onstage in London in July 1975, Live! (aka Live at the Lyceum) draws six of its seven numbers from the preceding two albums, thereby summarizing and expanding upon his international career to that point. More so than in their studio versions, the songs ring with emotional power in these concert renditions, allowing listeners to join Marley in his life-affirming celebration.

Although not released until 1991, Talkin' Blues contains intriguing rarities from this era: seven live tracks from a 1973 California radio broadcast (with Tosh but not Livingstone on hand), a second version of "I Shot the Sheriff" from the London gigs recorded for Live! and three outtakes from the Natty Dread sessions. While gratuitous, the brief interview bites that alternate with these extraordinary performances are not particularly disruptive to the record's flow.

Stylistically, Rastaman Vibration builds on Live at the Lyceum's loose-limbed atmosphere. A ten-person group lays down bubbling riddims covering reggaecentricity ("Positive Vibration," "Roots, Rock, Reggae") and pointed demands for justice ("Johnny Was" and "War," its lyrics taken from a 1968 speech by Ras Tafari himself, Haile Selassie).

Marley's first release after being wounded in a December 1976 assassination attempt is a handsomely delivered but firmly stated outpouring of politics and religion. Although Exodus offers upbeat optimism in "Jamming," "One Love/People Get Ready" and the title track, it also contains imprecations against "Guiltiness" and "The Heathen." Still capable of bringing things down to an individual level, "Waiting in Vain" is one of Marley's most touching love songs. Besides making good use of horns, the Wailers benefit here from an adjusted lineup that includes guitarist Junior (Julian) Marvin.

A lyric in the first song on the understated but enticing Kaya aptly describes the record: "We're taking it easy/We taking it slow." At the outset, the lighter sounds and personal lyrics that fill the sunny grooves skirt the big issues for joyful celebrations ("Kaya") and gentle romance ("Is This Love"). But the mood slides straight downhill, from "She's Gone" to "Cnsis," culminating in the fatalistic spiritualism of "Time Will Tell."

The Wailers' 1978 tour was chronicled in Babylon by Bus, a double live album (originally released in a nifty die-cut sleeve) recorded at various European venues. Another flawless Island-spanning recap of hits given new resonance onstage, the program includes elongated renditions of "Positive Vibration," "Stir It Up," "Jamming," "Is This Love?" and many more.

Al Anderson, who had returned to the group in time for Babylon by Bus, again shares leads with Marvin on Survival, a politically significant album in which Marley dedicates himself to Third World solidarity. "Africa Unite," "Zimbabwe," "One Drop" and "Top Rankin'" all preach an international message and reflect Marley's growing stature.

The last album Marley recorded before his death in 1981, caps his career by touching on many diverse elements with his most profoundly beautiful music. From the hauntingly political lament of "Redemption Song" to the irresistible surge of "Could You Be Loved" and the praises of "Forever Loving Jah," Uprising comes straight from Marley's soul.

The posthumous Confrontation—which contains the excellent and pointed "Buffalo Soldier" and other worthwhile tracks without quite adding up to a real album—is in fact an uneven collection of outtakes and tracks that had not previously been released outside of Jamaica.

Legend is an unassailable one-disc compilation of the best-loved tracks from Marley's Island catalogue; Rebel Music attends to the political side of his oeuvre, both celebrating and ghettoizing it.

A complete discography of the Wailers would include countless other compilations of various eras, solo albums by Wailer, Tosh (who, like Carlton Barrett, was murdered in 1987) and others, as well as releases by the alumni who began using the Wailers name again in the late '80s. [i]

See also Alpha Blondy, Judy Mowatt.

ZIGGY MARLEY AND THE MELODY MAKERS

See Melody Makers.

PAUL MAROTTA

Ajiti-Prop Piano [Do Speak] 1983

STYRENES

Girl Crazy (Mustard) 1982

HUDSON-STYRENE

A Monster and the Devil (Tinnitus) 1989

On his solo album, Marotta—a very early leading light in the Cleveland underground scene with such bands as the Poli Styrene Jass Band, which also contained future Pere Ubuites Anton Fier and Jim Jones—plays acoustic piano in a thickly overlapping, improvised mesh of ambient sound that can be considered either as serious avant-garde music or a hypnotic drone for trancing out. The two long pieces, much like Glenn Branca's work on guitars, go nowhere, but do something aurally seductive while getting there.

As a fascinating retrospective of a weird old band, the Styrenes' album (Marotta produced, co-wrote, sings and plays piano, guitar and bass with longtime cohort guitarist Jamie Kirmek and others) is worth seeking out for its odd combination of styles and sounds. Best of all, it contains the crazed 1975 "Drano in Your Veins," one of America's first independent-label new wave records.

Marotta wrote and organized the brassy noir jazz/rock for A Monster and the Devil, providing a textured and kinetic bed for vocalist Mike Hudson (of Cleveland's legendary Pagans) to rhythmically riff seedy hard-edged stories about drug abusers and assorted losers. Hudson's casual conviction and Marotta's inventive instrumentation gives the mix of words and music a dramatic energy that's utterly riveting. Recommended to fans of Bukowski and Selby. [i]

MARS

The Mars EP (Infidelity) 1980

78 (Widowspeak) 1986

VARIOUS ARTISTS

No New York (Antilles) 1978

John Gavanti (Hyrax) 1981

"Your hair on cars/your arms detach/your eyes fly by/your torso in wax." With those immortal words Mars caterwauled into the hearts of noise lovers everywhere, marking the quartet's four-song appearance on No New York with an absolutely total lack of musical ability. (All the other bands on the Eno-produced compilation contained at least one member who could play in the traditional sense.) A bunch of New York art types who formed a band when that was considered a cool New York art type thing to do, Mars was pretty impressive if for nothing else than singleness of purpose. Often sounding like a screeching subway car driven by a jabbering, convulsive castrato, Mars' constantly reviled stance made the rest of No New York's I-hate-sex crowd seem like a bunch of rank sensualists by comparison. Arto Lindsay recorded a 1978 CBGB set that comprises the 1980 12-inch EP; a few years later, Jim (Foetus) Thirlwell compiled and remixed the No New York tracks, all but one song from the EP and the group's single. The resultant 78 is all the Mars you need.

Around the turn of the decade, Mars leader Sumner Crane corralled a bunch of cohorts (including DNA drummer Ikue Mori) and recorded John Gavanti, a no wave adaptation of—get this—Don Giovanni. Some have called this the most unlistenable record ever made, and that's a fine invitation indeed. [gk]

CARL MARSH

See Shriekback.

MARTHA AND THE MUFFINS

Metro Music (Virgin Int'l) 1980

Trance and Dance (nr/DinDisc) 1980

This Is the Ice Age (nr/DinDisc) 1981

Danseparc (RCA) 1982

Faraway in Time [CD] (nr/Virgin) 1988 •

M + M

Mystery Walk (RCA) 1984

The World Is a Ball (Can. Current) 1985

Martha and the Muffins were originally clever amateurs who had fun fooling around with music in Toronto. However, the subtly catchy "Echo Beach" made them chart stars in the UK and brought their days of leisure to an abrupt halt. A minor miracle of this slick age, Metro Music captures a mild-mannered, unpretentious group at its most charming, before stress and self-consciousness took their toll. Vocalist Martha Johnson has a sometimes awkward but always personable style of singing on "Echo Beach," "Indecision" and "Paint by Number Heart"; it's as if she walked into a studio to tell what happened to her that day rather than to perform. Sax player Andy Haas adds jazzier, more exotic flavorings (à la Roxy Music's Andy Mackay), while a confident rhythm section preserves the hard foundation. Some might call Metro Music wimpy, but a more sensitive observer would judge it the result of introverts trying to rock, and—on their own terms—succeeding handsily.

The more mature Trance and Dance treads less appealing waters. The title track and "Was Ezo" retain the haunting quality of "Echo Beach," but other songs seem a little glib and too willing to be cute. Martha and the Muffins sound as if they're having less fun than before; second vocalist Martha Lady (composer of "Was Ezo") left the group after this LP.

The band painted itself into a corner with This Is the Ice Age. "Women Around the World at Work," a catchy stab at mainstream pop-singledom, lacks the innocence that was their strong point. Much of the LP suffers from arid artiness—they're too cool for pop but can't settle comfortably into another groove. Sax player Andy Haas left after this LP.

Thus reduced to a quartet, Martha and the Muffins ventured down funky Broadway on Danseparc, adding a throbbing beat to the blend. As a detour, the title track is fine, and the guest sax provides a bit of continuity, but in other spots, Johnson's self-important singing grates and Mark Gane's overdrive guitar can't overcome the repetitious, overbearing pounding. The tunes that have a jazzy pop sensibility are good, but the battle between humming and bumping is clearly lost to the forces of motion. On a positive note, the album ends with a beautifully textured languid instrumental, "Whatever Happened to Radio Valve Road?"

Mystery Walk presents the penultimately reductive group of Martha and Mark—billed as M+M—paradoxically playing prosaic social-conscience funk on "Black Stations/White Stations" and rediscovering delicate, attractive melodicism (best exemplified by "Cooling the Medium"). Throughout, the record mixes a less-aggressive intellectual dancefloor sound and enticingly atmospheric, jazz-tinged pop. An excellent return to form.

Unfortunately, the competent but aimless World Is a Ball provides a rather chilly denouement to the band's career, emphasizing the portentousness of the Muffins' less-memorable work with nary a trace of the playfulness that made the original band fun. Only on the dancey "Song in My Head" do Johnson and Gane lighten up enough for the music to live up to the album's title.

A substantial sampler but by no means a definitive retrospective, the CD-only Faraway in Time compilation contains the entire Metro Music album plus selected tracks from Trance and Dance and This Is the Ice Age. [jy/i/hd]

See also Crash Vegas.

MARTINI RANCH

Holy Cow (Sire) 1988 •

California musician Andrew Todd and Texas-born actor/filmmaker Bill Paxton (director of Barnes & Barnes' classic "Fish Heads" video) comprise Martini Ranch, a wickedly inventive, visually oriented pop-culture nuthouse of a band based in Los Angeles. Holy Cow variously resembles the B-52's (whose Cindy Wilson guests here), Devo (Mark Mothersbaugh and Alan Myers contribute vocally and instrumentally; Bob Casale produced one song) and Oingo Boingo. Judge Reinhold whistles on one tune; Bud Cort vocalizes on another. Kinetic, silly, intelligent and infectious. [i]

MARY MY HOPE

Museum (Silvertone-RCA) 1989 •

Suicide Kings EP (Silvertone-RCA) 1989 •

On the flawed and unfocused Museum, Atlanta's Mary My Hope simply tried to do and be too much, as shades of the Beatles, Doors, Pink Floyd, Bauhaus, R.E.M. and U2 flit through the overly ambitious songs, resulting in two killer tracks ("Suicide King" and "Communion"), several near-misses and several clunkers. Producer Hugh Jones does little to help untangle this intriguing but frustrating mess, which is not entirely unlike R.E.M.'s Fables of the Reconstruction—another album made by a quartet of Georgia boys out of their element in the UK.

Oddly, the five-song Suicide Kings shreds Museum and would have made a staggering debut. The album's two best cuts are combined with one shimmering new song and powerfully live "No remix no overdubs so it goes" renditions of two of the album's near-misses. It sheds a whole new light on the band, who produced the three new tracks themselves, thank you very much.

Vocalist James Vincent Hall left in 1990; Mary My Hope is carrying on with a replacement. [ja]

MARY'S DANISH

There Goes the Wondertruck... (Chameleon) 1989 •
Experience (Chameleon) 1990 ◊

Inspired by fellow Los Angelenos X, this spunky sextet—which includes ex-Three O'Clock guitarist Louis Gutierrez in a subordinate role—takes tart, twangy vocal harmonies and sets 'em to a tough beat. Mary's Danish isn't nearly as demanding, however—shouters Julie Ritter and Gretchen Seager don't strive for the desperate intensity that came so easily to Exene and John Doe, while high-powered numbers like "Blue Stockings" and "Don't Crash the Car Tonight" have the accessibility of classic pop, something X always found elusive. Wondertruck has these and other cool cuts, including "Can I Have a Smoke, Dude?" and "Mary Had a Bar."

The spirited but mostly superfluous Experience features six live songs (five from the LP), plus a chaotic Dave Jerden-produced studio cover of Hendrix's "Foxy Lady," complete with grating horn section (!?!). [jy]

MASSACRE

See Fred Frith, Material.

MASTER ACE

Take a Look Around (Cold Chillin'-Reprise) 1990 •

Decent enough to single out an 8th-grade English teacher as a positive influence, Brooklyn rapper Master Ace uses a set of fine Marley Marl tracks to deliver an optimistic uplift-the-race middle-class message on his highly impressive debut. Educational without being didactic, the imaginative young MC runs down a new program that shrugs off crass materialism and self-indulgent boasting without sounding sappy. Take a Look Around mixes things up effectively, partying with a better-known labelmate on "Me and the Biz" while innovatively adopting a fictional persona to convey a powerful sense of African-American despair in "The Other Side of Town" and ruing the B-boy errors of his youth in "Movin' On." With talent to spare, Master Ace is a man to watch. [i]

MASTERS OF CEREMONY

See Brand Nubian.

MASTERS OF REALITY

Masters of Reality (Def American) 1988 (Delicious Vinyl) 1990 •

Hailing from Syracuse, New York, this unapologetically nonphotogenic quintet, led by singer/guitarist Chris Goss, kicked around NYC for some time before catching the metallic ears of producer-guru and Def American honcho Rick Rubin. The result? One of the heaviest, most inventive hard rock records of the '80s, a heady amalgam of dripping Cream-style blues-blasting, mystical (and occasionally drug-related) lyrics and Zeppelinesque whomp. Among the album's many highlights is "The Candy Song," a crunching slab of riff-rock that showcases Goss' unusually smooth and supple pipes. Unfortunately, the Poison-fed MTV generation didn't get with this startling alternative.

In an unusual move, two powerful fans—Matt Dike and Michael Ross—decided the album needed a second shot, and arranged to reissue it (with an altered running order and one new track, "Doralдина's Prophecies," replacing "Sleep Walkin'," now CD-only) on their label, Delicious Vinyl. Meanwhile, the group underwent a notable lineup change, replacing axeman Tim Harrington with prolific producer-guitarist Daniel Rey and drummer Vinnie Ludovico with legendary Samuel Beckett lookalike Ginger Baker. [db]

See also Shrapnel.

JAMES MASTRO

See Bongos.

MATCHING MOLE

See Robert Wyatt.

MATERIAL

Temporary Music 1 EP (Zu) 1979 (nr/Red Music) 1979
Temporary Music 2 EP (nr/Red Music) 1981
Temporary Music (Fr. Celluloid) 1981 •
American Songs EP (Hol. Red Music) 1981
Busting Out EP (ZE-Island) 1981
Memory Serves (Celluloid-Elektra-Musician) 1981 •
One Down (Celluloid-Elektra) 1982 •
Red Tracks (Red) 1986
Seven Souls (Virgin) 1989 •

MASSACRE

Killing Time (OAO-Celluloid) 1982 •

NICKY SKOPELITIS

Next to Nothing [CD] (Venture-Virgin) 1989 •

Originally formed to back David Allen when the erstwhile Gong leader first toured the US, Material began as a small core of New York-based musicians around which an endless string of interesting one-shot gigging and recording bands formed. Bassist/producer Bill Laswell alone continues to use the Material name, but the original triumvirate with Michael Beinhorn (synthesizer, tapes, vocals) and Fred Maher (drums) made a virtue of eclecticism, effectively blending funk, rock, experimentalism and jazz into a subtle, credible fusion music all their own.

Not that they managed it right away. Temporary Music 1, produced by Giorgio Gomelsky, shows a promising progressive-rock band toying with funk and quickly miring itself in extraneous noise. But the funk-rock fusion takes hold on the sequel, as Stockhausen (figuratively) meets Moroder, and that approach didn't let them down thereafter. The Temporary Music album reissues the two EPs on one disc, as does Red Tracks

American Songs, which features an intriguing appearance by guitarist Robert Quine on two new items, is just interesting enough not to be expendable.

Memory Serves is Material's most jazz-tinged album, with its complement of prominent jazz players on cut after relentless cut. Guitarist Fred Frith is also featured, starting an intermittently ongoing alliance. The procession of textures is dazzling, the funk cuts like a knife and the hornwork is disciplined within tight structures. As "black" classical and dance music refined with a rock sensibility, Memory Serves is a highly original crossover.

One Down extends the experiment to urban pop music with almost equal success, aided by Nile Rodgers, Nona Hendryx, Frith, Oliver Lake and many others. However, it lacks the edge of Memory Serves, and Maher's departure is probably the reason. Saxophonist Archie Shepp, black-power spokesman and angry young man of '60s jazz, puts in a politically interesting but musically low-key appearance on Hugh Hopper's "Memories."

In 1982, Laswell, Maher and Frith combined as Massacre, a radical power trio. The distinctively skewed melodies of Killing Time's composed half—mostly on the first side, a brilliant procession of techniques and ideas—bear the Frith hallmark. Propelled by the virtuoso rhythm section, Frith plays with unprecedented urgency—no cold celebration here. The improvisations are tough and sinewy too, benefiting from Frith's experience in Henry Cow. Highlights: the bouncy title cut and "Corridor," a manic exercise in machine-gun feedback.

By the late '80s, with Beinhorn and Maher long gone (both to producing, although Maher plays with Scritti Politti and has drummed on plenty of records, most memorably Lou Reed's New York), there was no longer any discernible difference between Material and Laswell solo. Still, after the commercial failure of Laswell's not-new-age-but-an-incredible-simulation-of-it Hear No Evil (which probably flopped because it betrayed more active intelligence than its target audience wants to know about), he adopted the Material name for Seven Souls, a great record that's as much a masterpiece of sheer calculation as it is art. (Laswell is nothing if not an extremely canny operator.)

Having worked with William S. Burroughs on Laurie Anderson's Mister Heartbreak, Laswell here has the author read from his novel The Western Lands over tracks that span a wide area of world music turf, mixed with licks and samples deployed with Laswell's usual taste, innovation and economy. The percussion, courtesy of Sly Dunbar and Aiyb Dieng, is consistently brilliant. At times the music is restive, creating very delicate atmospheres, Burroughs' voice and text add appropriate notes of doom. That aside, Seven Souls is clearly designed to be new age music for hipsters.

Around the same time as Seven Souls, guitarist Skopelitis—a longtime Laswell crony who has joined the bassist on most of the projects he's undertaken since 1982, including all of the Golden Palominos records—released his first solo LP, Next to Nothing. With Laswell, Ginger Baker (drums), Fred Frith (violin), Simon Shaheen (violin, oud) and Dieng (percussion), it's similar in texture to Seven Souls, albeit without the spoken-word content. Along with that record and Baker's excellent, Laswell-produced Middle Passage, Next to Nothing forms something of a triptych, and an exemplary one at that. [mf/gk]

See also Afrika Bambaataa, Fred Frith, Golden Palominos, Nona Hendryx, Bill Laswell, Robert Quine, Scritti Politti.

MATERIAL ISSUE

Material Issue EP (Big Block-Landmind) 1987
International Pop Overthrow (Mercury) 1991 •

Fans of early Cheap Trick, Tom Petty and Big Star were known to weep tears of joy upon first hearing Material Issue's independently released debut EP (a six-song 12-inch), co-produced with Jeff Murphy of Shoes. Centered around the talents of vocalist/songwriter/guitarist Jim Ellison (a brief, early member of Green), the Chicago trio was playing unashamed Beatle/Byrdsy power pop when it was decidedly unfashionable, and each of the six songs is its own distinct three-minute thrill.

Material Issue continued to record with Murphy, completing International Pop Overthrow before signing to a major label. One of the best power pop albums in recent memory, this gem contains no less than four songs with girls' names in the titles. Although Ellison's occasional inclination towards quantity over quality makes some of the fourteen tracks less memorable than others, "Valerie Loves Me," "Renee Remains the Same," "This Far Before" and "Very First Lie" are should-be singles of the first order. And this is only album number one. [ja]

MAX Q

See INXS.

MAZZY STAR

See Opal.

SCOTT MCCAUGHEY

See Young Fresh Fellows.

MCCCLUSKEY BROTHERS

See Bluebells.

IAN MCCULLOCH

See Echo & the Bunnymen.

MC5

Kick Out the Jams (Elektra) 1969 + 1983
Back in the USA (Atlantic) 1970
High Time (Atlantic) 1971
Babes in Arms [tape] (ROIR) 1983 [CD] (Fr. Danceteria) 1990 ◊
Do It (Fr. Revenge) 1987 •
Live Detroit 68/69 (Fr. Revenge) 1988 •

Formed in and around John Sinclair's White Panther Party, the Motor City 5's enduring relevance lies less in the Detroit quintet's music (the in-concert Kick Out the Jams sounds closer to early-'70s heavy metal than anything else) and more in the political attitudes behind that music; "Kick Out the Jams" and "Motor City Is Burning" are obvious harbingers of "Anarchy in the UK." Unfortunately for the 5, their utopian beliefs didn't translate to vinyl with the intensity of, say, the first Clash album. Led by Rob Tyner's rabble-rousing vocals and the twin guitar assault of Wayne Kramer and Fred "Sonic" Smith, Kick Out the Jams has plenty of high-energy rock, with science-fiction noise ("Rocket Reducer No. 62") and "Starship," co-credited to Sun Ra) thrown in for class. But would the revolution be recorded by Elektra?

Evidently not. The next MC5 album, produced by Jon Landau (prior to his more financially rewarding alliance with Bruce Springsteen), finds them downplaying the rabble-rousing in favor of claustrophobically taut and blisteringly electric sub-three-minute odes to "High School," "Teenage Lust" and "Shakin' Street" ("where all the kids meet"). The LP also contains performances of "Tutti Frutti" and the Chuck Berry title cut, with its refrain of "I'm so glad I'm living in the USA." Sarcasm? A timely return to the roots? Probably both. At least the concise songs are easier to like than the first LP's hippie-era sprawl.

Having lost their audience between the first two albums, the MC5 felt free to put down the best playing of their recording career on the totally ignored High Time. Song lengths are back up, but the band stretches out comfortably on "Sister Anne," "Over and Over" and the jazzy "Skunk (Sonicly Speaking)." Did the MC5's circular saga prove the invincibility of pure pop? In any case, their records and legend remain an oft-cited influence on the nose-thumbing irreverence and chaotic energy of punk groups.

Babes in Arms is a belated appendix to the band's catalogue. It consists of early 45 sides done for indie labels, alternate takes and remixes (some scarcely different from the originals) from the three original albums, plus one otherwise unreleased cut.

Like the Stooges and other groups, numerous live concert albums of the MC5 have been issued. Amid a rash of obvious bootlegs, the two French releases at least appear to be legal issues. Do It is a muddy sounding radio broadcast from '71 well-played renditions of eight songs, including "19th Nervous Breakdown," "Tutti Frutti" and John Lee Hooker's "Motor City Is Burning" alongside "Kick Out the Jams" and "Looking at You." But beware of the utterly unlistenable pink-vinyl Live Detroit, an inaudible mush of muffled noise. [si/i]

See also Mick Farren, New Order, Patti Smith, Sonic's Rendezvous Band, Johnny Thunders, Was (Not Was).

M.C. HAMMER

Feel My Power (Bustin') 1987
Let's Get It Started (Capitol) 1988 •
Please Hammer Don't Hurt 'Em (Capitol) 1990 •

The Oakland rapper with the soul of an ad man, M.C. Hammer dominated the record charts in 1990 with his second album. (Actually his second-and-a-half: the self-released Feel My Power was given four new tracks and reissued as Let's Get It Started.) Far less talented as a musician (his dancing skills are exceptional) than he is as a salesman, Hammer's primary influence would appear to be Madison Avenue. His records use familiar songs to establish audience rapport, adding on simple, repeated catch phrases that people can easily remember when it comes time to make consumer decisions. It was only a matter of weeks before the title of the ubiquitous "U Can't Touch This" (to the music of Rick James' "Superfreak") entered the vernacular. Still, it's hard to give critical credence to a mediocre MC who pretty much borrows classical songs whole, tacks on a modern beat and substitutes his own clumsy vocals. Unless we're talking the art of the deal, Hammer's no artist.

Besides duffing up BB King, P-Funk, Rick James and Queen, Let's Get It Started has the moderately exciting "They Put Me in the Mix" and a lot of boring boasts. Please Hammer takes commercial advantage of Prince ("Pray," "She's Soft and Wet"), Marvin Gaye ("Help the Children"), the Chi-Lites ("Have You Seen Her") and others. Beyond the intrinsic worthlessness of Hammer's own records, his crossover success—which helped make rap the dominant sound entering the '90s—opened the door to an even shallower purveyor of recycled rhyming, Vanilla Ice. What's next? [i]

KRIS MCKAY

See Wild Seeds.

MARIA MCKEE

See Lone Justice.

MALCOLM McLAREN

Duck Rock (Island) 1983 •

D'ya Like Scratchin' EP (Island) 1984

Fans (Island) 1984 •

Swamp Thing (Island) 1985

MALCOLM McLAREN AND THE BOOTZILLA ORCHESTRA

Waltz Darling (Epic) 1989 •

MALCOLM McLAREN PRESENTS THE WORLD FAMOUS SUPREME TEAM SHOW

Round the Outsidel Round the Outsidel (Virgin) 1990 ◊

Besides being an imperialistic cultural plunderer (a non-judgmental designation), Malcolm McLaren is one of rock's true visionaries. His role in the formation and promotion of the Sex Pistols has been construed as everything from inspired instigator to Machiavellian manipulator, and his solo career has been as righteously criticized as it's been influential. The ever-provocative McLaren tends to bring out the moral indignation in people.

It's hard to say just what McLaren does as an artist. He's more an assembler than a creator, piecing together artifacts from various musical cultures in such a way that, at the end of the day, his own input seems invisible. And yet his perspective as hip outsider has continued to provide a link between his Anglo-American audience and Third World forms. If McLaren's a musical tourist, these records are his home movies.

Duck Rock, produced by Trevor Horn and featuring the rapping World's [sic] Famous Supreme Team, is a vanguard album in the new music/rap crossover movement. (The Keith Haring artwork is equally au courant.)

It offers vignettes of hip-hop, Appalachian music (McLaren shows no real racial preference in his thievery), African music and merengue. Instead of assimilating the forms and reconstructing them, McLaren puts his actual source material on vinyl (and then his name to it). The most striking cut, "Buffalo Gals," sets a square dance call over a hip-hop scratch track. D'ya Like Scratchin' plucks three songs from the album and funks with the mix, adding two versions of a new tune as well.

Never one to stand still, McLaren succeeds against all odds in combining hip-hop with opera on Fans. As unlikely a synthesis as this is, McLaren mainly uses opera for its recitative form and story lines (namely Carmen, Madam Butterfly and Turandot) and, damn it, the thing works more often than not.

The aptly named Swamp Thing is a murky and bizarre creature grown during various sessions between '82 and '84. The title track perverts "Wild Thing" into a nightmarish but enjoyable mess "Duck Rock Cheer" is so unlike the original that you'd never connect the two, save for minor overlapping of mix components; "Duck Rockers/Promises" sounds only slightly more familiar. "Buffalo Love" has even less to do with "Buffalo Gals," offering instead a smooth disco creation breathily sung by an unidentified woman. "B.I. Bikki" combines McLarenize exercise exhortations with opera and all sorts of extraneous rubbish; "Eiffel Tower" turns the old Bow Wow Wow song inside out to interesting effect. As aggravating as he often is, McLaren's work is invariably fascinating and provocative.

McLaren foists another demented but entertaining musical hybrid on the world in Waltz Darling. Hooking muscular rock-funk—starring Bootsie Collins and Jeff Beck—together with a classical orchestral, McLaren comes up with what, at times, resembles an electrified version of Gilbert and Sullivan. He tops this weird blend off with a variety of female vocalists (the artist himself speaks lyrics on a couple of numbers), swanky dance lyrics and up-to-date production techniques. Unfortunately, the record wanders casually around its concept—too many tracks are merely standard dance-club fare with lush flourishes, hardly a novelty—but the instrumental "House of the Blue Danube" and "Algernon's Simply Awfully Good at Algebra," co-written by Dave Stewart, are pretty amusing.

Tempted by yet another stylistic fad he could attempt to corrupt, McLaren reunited with the World Famous Supreme Team—his hip-hop compadres on Duck Rock—and threw together a hip-house stew sampling (intellectually, not electronically) both Shakespeare and opera for a dance record whose bizarre conception is designed to be easily overlooked in the appropriate environment. (I mean, really, who cares if the chant over a techno-dance groove is "Diva opera house" rather than "Love to love you baby"?) Perhaps angling for greater historical recognition (or just recycling an asset whose time hasn't yet passed), McLaren includes an updated remix of "Buffalo Gals." [j/l/i]

See also Bow Wow Wow, New York Dolls, Sex Pistols.

MC LYTE

Lyte as a Rock (First Priority Music-Atlantic) 1988 •

Eyes on This (First Priority Music-Atlantic) 1989 •

This sassy young rapper from Brooklyn—no-nonsense star of hip-hop's burgeoning distaff side—waxes funny, moral and toughly self-reliant on the musically inventive and entertaining Lyte as a Rock. Not only is her assessment of the sexual battlefield a refreshing change of pace, the chip on Lyte's shoulder yields hysterical and vicious putdowns. Aided by sharp production, minor appropriations from Ray Charles, Helen Reddy and the Four Seasons, Lyte fills her first LP with a number of strong cuts, like the introductory "Lyte vs. Vanna White" and the hit "I Cram to Understand U."

In one of the most intriguing cross-cultural moments of 1988, Lyte appeared in the video for Sinéad O'Connor's "I Want Your (Hands on Me)." Unfortunately, Eyes on This doesn't show any such imagination: Lyte revisits the same 'hood as her debut, in good-sounding but tired expressions of singleminded self-obsession and rhyming supremacy like "I Am the Lyte" (produced by future Brand Nubian Grand Puba Maxwell, who also collaborated on "Funky Song"), "Slave 2 the Rhythm" and "Throwin' Words at U." The album's only flight of fancy is "Cappucino," an intriguing but undeveloped visit to the afterlife. [i/tr]

See also Audio Two.

MC 900 FT JESUS WITH DJ ZERO

MC 900 Ft Jesus with DJ Zero EP (Can. Network) 1989 •
Hell with the Lid Off (Network-IRS) 1990 •

With his long legs firmly straddling danceable hip-hop and found-sound industrialism, Dallas' MC 900 Ft Jesus (Mark Griffin) uses beats, samples and scratches to support his distorted (non-rap) narratives that proceed ironically from a supermarket tabloid view of life and religion. While using far too many sound bites from Public Enemy, the rudimentary EP previews the album's "Too Bad" and "Shut Up," joining them with a pair of retitled remixes.

Since the basic format is too uninvolved to sustain an entire LP, Hell with the Lid Off makes a greater stylistic effort, embracing funk ("Truth Is Out of Style"), warm soul ("Spaceman") and pulsing techno-beat ("UFO's Are Real"). Although diverting in small doses (more suited for club play), MC 900 Ft Jesus makes shaggy dog music—colorfully convoluted but lacking a punchline. [i]

M.C. SHAN

Down by Law (Cold Chillin'-Warner Bros.) 1987
Born to Be Wild (Cold Chillin'-Warner Bros.) 1988 •
Play It Again, Shan (Cold Chillin'-Warner Bros.) 1990 •

Unstylish but top-notch, Queens free-styler Shawn Moltke supposedly got his career break in 1983 when the future chairman of Cold Chillin' caught him attempting to steal his car. (Having Marley Marl for a cousin probably helped a little, too.) With Marl's minimalist production and Shan's dynamic B-boy raps, the fine Down by Law includes an amateurish pre-LP single, "The Bridge" (about the Queensbridge housing project), as well as the anti-crack "Jane, Stop This Crazy Thing!" and the classic bad-girl story of "Project 'ho."

Leading off the ambitiously sampled Born to Be Wild with "I Pioneered This" (actually, he tempers the claim in the lyrics), Shan doesn't cope very well with sonic competition, coming through best on the relatively spare cuts, like the historical "They Used to Do It Out in the Park" and the autobiographical "Back to the Basics" ("One day when me and Marley Marl was playing in a ditch/We made this jam that we knew was slamming/Someday it would make us rich"). Answering John Kay in the title track is a neat idea that fails; the sax line running through "Words of a Freestyle" effectively draws attention away from the words.

Moving out from under Marl's production umbrella, Shan swapped his Kangol hat and Puma sweats for a swanky white suit and an adult outlook on the moderately dull Play It Again. In good-sounding tracks that seem to go on forever, Shan attacks police injustice ("Time for Us to Defend Ourselves"), expounds on musical theory ("It Ain't a Hip Hop Record"), disses dope pushers with help from Richard Pryor ("Death Was Quite a Surprise"), quotes Fats Waller ("It Don't Mean a Thing") and even sings one ("I Want to Thank You"). [i]

MC TUNES

See 808 State.

MDC

Millions of Dead Cops (R Radical) 1982 •
Multi-Death Corporation EP (R Radical) 1983
Smoke Signals (R Radical) 1986
Millions of Damn Christians: This Blood's for You (R Radical-Boner) 1987 •
More Dead Cops 1981-1987 (R Radical-Boner) 1988 •
Metal Devil Cokes (Boner) 1989 •
Elvis-In the Rheinland (Ger. Destiny) 1989 •

Originally launched in Austin, Texas around 1980, this explosive political hardcore quartet (aka Multi-Death Corporation, Millions of Dead Children and Millions of Damn Christians) has long been based in San Francisco. Precise breakneck rock makes Millions of Dead Cops a powerful means by which to deliver messages like "John Wayne Was a Nazi" (originally recorded and released on 45 when MDC was known as the Stains) and "I Hate Work." Best title: "Corporate Deathburger." After the first pressing sold out, the LP was remastered and reissued, ultimately joining More Dead Cops on CD.

Smoke Signals offers a more mature lyrical stance and challenging post-hardcore arrangements, which organize thrash sounds into a tightly structured musical framework. New arrival Gordon Fraser's throaty guitar and the deft rhythm section set the scene for Dave Dictor's clearly enunciated soapbox announcements like "No More Cops," "South Africa Is Free," "Missile Destroyed Civilization" and the vegetarian "Country Squawk." Turning to cultural concerns, MDC also offers the flavorful "Tofutti," the sarcastic "Skateboards to Hell" and "King of Thrash." An exceptionally good record.

Turning non-'core, This Blood's for You starts out as an attack on religion, but quickly broadens the free-fire zone to include merciless indictments of Reagan ("Bye Bye Ronnie," "Guns for Nicaragua," "Who's the Terrorist Now"), bureaucrats ("Henry Kissmyassinger," Cream's "Politician"), agricultural imperialism ("Chock Full of Shit"), intolerant punks ("S.K.I.N.H.E.A.D.") and junkies ("Your Death Wish Is Sick"). The music is likewise expansive: MDC uses acoustic guitar, melody, guitar solos and other good things. A fine development from a deeply committed and talented quartet.

More Dead Cops 1981-1987 is a rarities retrospective, including both sides of the band's debut single ("John Wayne Was a Nazi" b/w "Born to Die"), the four-song Multi-Death Corporation EP, the three-song Chicken Squawk EP, two compilation tracks (including "Pay to Come Along," an attack on the Bad Brains) and two unreleased covers ("Born Under a Bad Sign" and "Spanish Castle Magic") from '87.

Despite one simple acoustic number ("Acid Reindeer") and a country stomp ("Ain't It Funny"), Metal Devil Cokes returns MDC's thrash power, with excellent playing and production. New guitarist Eric Calhoun contributes effectively to the tight electric roar, but Dictator's delivery and the band's humorous polemics are still the primary element in MDC's personality. Actually, the radical content here is significantly toned down, with songs like "I'm a Knucklehead" and "White Men in Suits" (not to mention a straight punk cover of "Love Potion No. 9") that avoid any specific finger-pointing or protesting. The complete cooking instructions for "Tofu Spaghetti" make for one funny song, while a new use for nursery rhymes ("Three Blind Mice") and the revised lyrics of "Deep in the Heart of (Racist Amerikkka)" prove that political rock doesn't have to be grim or boring.

Elvis-In the Rheinland, recorded live in Berlin in November 1988, finds the quartet ripping through a great-sounding 24-song career retrospective, plus a restrained rendition of Michelle Shocked's "Fogtown" (a song which they also play on her second album). [i]

See also Michelle Shocked.

MEAT BEAT MANIFESTO

Storm the Studio (Wax Trax!) 1989 •

Armed Audio Warfare (Wax Trax!) 1990 •

99% (Play It Again Sam-Mute-Elektra) 1990 ◊

Much has been made of the fact that two members of Meat Beat Manifesto—dancer/choreographer Marcus Adams and costume/set designer Craig Morrison—have no musical input. But the group's commitment to the visual aspect of its stage presentation shouldn't create the impression that the audio side can't stand up on its own. In fact, the sounds (produced mainly by Jack Dangers with Jonny Stephens) have consistently merged hip-hop rhythms with industrial overtones and a myriad of samples to devastating effect.

A series of UK 12-inches put Meat Beat Manifesto on the map, only to have a fire at the group's London headquarters destroy its debut album. (A collection of early mixes and unreleased tracks later emerged as the frequently rewarding Armed Audio Warfare.)

Four 12-inch tracks were then disassembled and (to borrow a title) re-animated in four different versions apiece for the double album Storm the Studio. Meat Beat stretch the concept of the remix further than most, and few of the tracks on this violent sonic assault sound like any of the others. Taking the groundbreaking electronic grooves of Throbbing Gristle and Cabaret Voltaire as their base, toughening them up enormously and occasionally adding vitriolic stream-of-consciousness raps makes for uneasy but rewarding listening.

With 99%, Meat Beat readjusted their focus, maintaining the industrial aspect but tidying things up and making use of house grooves. Very little of the musical content (apart from Dangers' raps) is actually recorded by the group, but the enormous range of sampled voices, TV themes and pop cuttings lead to a bizarre and fascinating clash of styles on instrumentals like "Hello Teenage America" and "Hallucination Generation." [tf]

MEATMEN

Blood Sausage EP (Touch and Go) 1982

Crippled Children Suck EP (Touch and Go) 1982

We're the Meatmen ... and You Suck! (Touch and Go) 1983

War of the Superbikes (Homestead) 1985 •

Rock'n'Roll Juggernaut (Caroline) 1986

We're the Meatmen ... and You Still Suck!!! (Caroline) 1989

Crippled Children Suck (Touch and Go) 1990

Stud Powercock: The Touch and Go Years [CD] (Touch and Go) 1991 •

TESCO VEE

Dutch Hercules EP (Touch and Go) 1984

Obnoxious, crude, offensive, blasphemous, tiresome and funny—the Meatmen are one band you'd never be able to explain to your parents (or even the vast majority of your peers). The rude punk parodists from Michigan heard on the infamous Blood Sausage and Crippled Children Suck 7-inches stomped on the sensitive issues of society with a coarseness that makes dead baby jokes seem like church fare. If there were some reference points—something the Meatmen did care about—the gratuitous and tedious irreverence might have had some real shock value.

We're the Meatmen ... and You Suck! (initially pressed on white vinyl) runs aground in a sea of unoriginality. The puerile forays into morbidity ("One Down Three to Go," about the Beatles), homophobia ("Tooling for Anus"), misogyny ("I'm Glad I'm Not a Girl") and racism ("Blow Me Jah") are too familiar and predictable to be outrageous. A little more wit would have made the Meatmen a more engaging (if despicable) cartoon. One side of the album is live; the other is a reissue/remix of Blood Sausage.

The original Meatmen dissolved when singer/schoolteacher Tesco Vee moved to Washington DC, but his resulting itchiness bore fruit in the form of a solo record. Aided by guitarists Lyle Preslar and Brian Baker of Minor Threat (both of whom subsequently helped Vee form a new, improved Meatmen) and produced by Minor Threat's Ian MacKaye, Dutch Hercules stands on more solid musical ground. Apparently mellowing with age, Vee limits the objects of his attacks to lesbians, blacks, post-punkers and rock stars. The satire works better because he offers himself as an object of parody. The only useless cut is a side-long disco perversion ("Crapper's Delight").

With the new five-jerk lineup, War of the Superbikes focuses and refines the Meatmen's miserable charm, retooling the punk onslaught into a strong, sharp-edged rock sound and presenting a mixed material grill, from utterly inoffensiveness (the great title track and "Abba God and Me") to typical juvenalia (the flamencoed "Kisses in the Sunset," "Cadaver Class" and a cover of the Pagans' "What's This Shit Called Love," which opens as a demented Elvis parody). Just what the doctor ordered! Bonus: spoken-word tripe hidden at the end of each side.

James Cooper replaced Baker (off to start Dag Nasty) on Rock'n'Roll Juggernaut, leaving the Meatmen a musically undistinguished rock machine, playing tight but plain guitar raunch. Amid bursts of worthless comedy shtick, Vee's lyrics keep the faith, leering salaciously while attacking foreigners ("French People Suck," "Dichstrudel"), American proles ("True Grit") and health nuts ("Nature Boy") with the unenthusiastic knee-jerk bravado of morons yelling out car windows at women to impress their friends. Yawn.

We're the Meatmen . . . and You Still Suck!!!, recorded at two dates on the '88 farewell tour, finds the crew raging through songs from every previous platter and the Vee EP, plus an exuberant Sweet ("Rebel Rowser" [sic] cover). The funniest item—besides Tesco's between-song raps—is "Camel Jockeys Suck," completing the "Suck" trilogy (all set to the same tune). On the debit side, final guitarist Stuart Casson's generic metallicisms are simply no match for Baker's fantastic lead work, thus the Superbikes songs—the heart of the set—are a step down from the studio versions. (It's a shame that with all the live Meatmen material left to posterity, the superior '85 gig lineup remains undocumented.)

The Crippled Children Suck album contains the entire Crippled Children EP, a Blood Sausage outtake, a fair set of '81 demos, one live track from '82 (the notorious, never-before-released "TSOL Are Sissies") and three live cuts from '84 (the updated "Becoming a Gay Man" is a must-hear). Stud Powercock, as its subtitle makes clear, collects every track on the Touch and Go releases (even Dutch Hercules and this new compilation) on one CD, making it a definitive retrospective of the band's original Midwest existence.

See also Dag Nasty, Minor Threat. [j]/i/gef]

MEAT PUPPETS

In a Car EP (World Imitation) 1981 (SST) 1985 •
Meat Puppets (Thermidor-SST) 1982 •
Meat Puppets II (SST) 1983 •
Up on the Sun (SST) 1985 •
Out My Way EP (SST) 1986 •
Mirage (SST) 1987 •
Huevos (SST) 1987 •
Monsters (SST) 1989 •
No Strings Attached (SST) 1990 •

This Phoenix, Arizona trio has made a career out of defying expectations. The two Kirkwood brothers, Curt (guitar/vocals) and Cris (bass/vocals), along with drummer Derrick Bostrom, made their debut with In a Car, a locally released 7-inch—five songs in five minutes—of shrieking thrash-punk and unrealized avant-guitar ambitions. The Puppets' first album (a full-length disc that spins at 45 rpm) similarly mixes intriguing instrumental experimentation—and, significantly, a bit of restrained country—into sloppy blurs of noisy punk-rock.

On Meat Puppets II, however, they made the first of many shifts—into radical country-punk. The album offers a startlingly strong set of stylistic contrasts—loud and soft, fast and slow—all supporting moving, poetic lyrics. The songs are melodic and memorable; Curt's high'n'lonesome singing is made even more effective by its uninhibited shoddiness. One of the best albums ever to blend Joe Strummer with Hank Williams, Meat Puppets II avoids clichés of any sort in its brilliant evocation of the wide open world of the Southwest. Make no mistake—this is not a hardcore album with some corny twang, it's a fully realized work in a unique hybrid style.

Up on the Sun removes the Puppets further from punk, but doesn't adequately replace the rock'n'roll energy. Curt's growing mastery of delicate guitar weaves—an Arizona answer to Jerry Garcia, perhaps—provides the Puppets' new focus; the hoedown coda of "Enchanted Pork Fist" owes as much to modern jazz as cowboy rock. The title track is a lovely, contemplative folk song with an airy vocal and a skipping guitar riff that repeats throughout. In a lighter moment, Curt and Cris whistle their way through "Maiden's Milk"; waxing serious, "Creator" offers a poetic contemplation on god and nature.

The Puppets sound far more involved and enthused on the superior six-track Out My Way, again quite unlike anything in their prior repertoire. An utterly crazed raveup of "Good Golly Miss Molly" merely caps off an ineffable, diverse collection of occasionally funky, occasionally psychedelic, occasionally country-fied rock tunes.

Mirage harks back to the sonic translucence of Up on the Sun, forcing Bostrom's muscular drumming to find a way to maintain its reserve while kicking up a subtle storm. Curt's intricate finger-picking and plectrum work leads the relaxed stroll on "Mirage," "Leaves," "Get on Down" and "I Am a Machine." The bluegrass-styled "Confusion Fog" shows a different side of the Pups, as does the rocking "Liquefied," an incongruous souvenir of the band's early sound with acid-trip lyrics and distorted rhythm guitar. The only discordant ingredient on this technically accomplished record is Curt's uncertain, often cringeably tuneless singing.

As legend has it, the genesis of Huevos began with a magazine interview in which Curt announced his adoration of ZZ Top guitarist Billy Gibbons. Gibbons' reply sent Kirkwood into a writing frenzy, and the album—which begins with the Top soundalike "Paradise"—was recorded in one marathon 72-hour stretch. The mildly commercialized sound (read: rhythm guitar, sweet melodies and a thick Les Paul tone) led hardline fans to call it a sellout, but that's hardly the case. In this generally upbeat outing, the only discouraging words can be heard in "Dry Rain" and the self-deprecating "I Can't Be Counted On." Otherwise, Curt celebrates "Fruit," "Sexy Music" and even "Bad Love." Except for the out-there-with-the-cacti vocals, Huevos is quite fine.

Saving most of his liquid lead runs for showy instrumental passages, Curt again plays a lot of rhythm guitar on Monsters, a heavier, more traditional-minded rock album than usual. Beyond “Attacked by Monsters,” however, the colorless and repetitive songs aren’t very appealing, and the sound—which alternates between the band’s late-’80s clarity and a murky sonic swamp—doesn’t do much for them. (Ironically, the vocals here are fairly presentable.) Not among the Puppets’ best.

The generously endowed No Strings Attached recapitulates the Meat Puppets’ career to date with two dozen chronological selections—from the first EP through Monsters. [i]

MEGADETH

Killing Is My Business ... and Business Is Good! (Combat) 1985 •

Peace Sells ... but Who’s Buying? (Combat-Capitol) 1986 •

So Far, So Good ... So What! (Capitol) 1988 •

Rust in Peace (Combat-Capitol) 1990 •

After leaving Metallica, guitarist/songwriter Dave Mustaine formed Megadeth to better realize his vision of a band that would play a faster, louder and more intricate brand of metal with far more realistic and relevant lyrics (when you can make them out) than the usual metal macho bravado.

The quartet’s first album meets most of those goals. The precise, complex (but clearly articulated) hyper-speed guitar power almost sails into jazz waters; Mustaine’s rock vocals dispense with typical tremulous screeching for listenable roughness. Only the lyrics are business as usual: even an overhaul of “These Boots Are Made for Walking” adds vulgarity to maximize headbanger appeal. Other songs—about death, sex and religion—wittlessly tread well-worn ground. Still, Megadeth’s galloping high-tech sound (check “Rattlehead” and “Mechanix”)—soon to influence numerous young rock/metal bands—is clearly taking shape.

Peace Sells continues Megadeth’s macabre assault on the senses. Like a metal version of Dante’s Inferno, the LP offers various visions of hell on earth—murder, adultery, alienation, imprisonment and (d)evil cults. Quite frankly, the music’s scarier than the lyrics, since Mustaine’s strangled vocals are barely audible in the mix; the music, on the other hand, hurtles forward with undeniable and relentless power. Oldsters will be left stunned by the incredible version of Willie Dixon’s (via Beck and Stewart) “I Ain’t Superstitious,” rewritten in trademark Megadeth style.

Recorded with a new guitarist and drummer, So Far, So Good ... So What! includes a tribute to Metallica’s late bassist Cliff Burton (“In My Darkest Hour”), a driving-while-drunk song (“502”), an instrumental that starts acoustic before hitting typical Mega-drive (“Into the Lungs of Hell”), an unnecessary (and lyrically inaccurate) cover of “Anarchy in the UK” with ex-Pistol Steve Jones in tow and the obligatory PMRC putdown (“Hook in Mouth”). Though Mustaine’s vocals are improving and the new guys fit in fine, it’s a bit of a letdown after Peace Sells.

After a layoff prompted by Mustaine’s growing drug dependence (and subsequent abatement thereof), plus more conflict within the band, Rust in Peace was recorded with yet another new guitarist and drummer. The change is for the better, especially Nick Menza’s supple drumming, which elevates the band to a new plateau, on which they swing (!) as never before. It’s also the group’s best album sonically, even if Mustaine’s lyrics (nearly all about war or his former habit) and his still-improving-but-not-quite-there vocals could both use a dose of clarity at times. Musically, though, Megadeth’s at the top of its game right now. [ds]

See also Metallica.

MEKONS

The Quality of Mercy Is Not Strnen (nr/Virgin) 1979 (Blue Plate) 1990 •

Devils Rats and Piggies a Special Message from Godzilla (nr/Red Rhino) 1980

It Falleth Like Gentle Rain from Heaven—The Mekons Story (nr/CNT Productions) 1982

The English Dancing Master EP (nr/CNT Productions) 1983

Fear and Whiskey (nr/Sin) 1985

Crime and Punishment EP (nr/Sin) 1986

The Edge of the World (nr/Sin) 1986

Slightly South of the Border EP (nr/Sin) 1986

Honky Tonkin’ (Sin-Twin/Tone) 1987

New York [tape] (ROIR) 1987 [CD] (ROIR-Important) 1990 ◊

So Good It Hurts (Twin/Tone) 1988 •

Original Sin [CD] (Twin/Tone) 1989 •

Dream and Lie of ... EP (nr/Blast First) 1989 •

The Mekons Rock’n’Roll (Twin/Tone-A&M) 1989 •

F.U.N. ’90 EP (Twin/Tone-A&M) 1990 ◊

The Curse of the Mekons (nr/Blast First) 1991 •

SALLY TIMMS AND THE DRIFTING COWGIRLS

This House Is a House of Trouble EP (nr/T.I.M.) 1987

Butcher’s Boy EP (nr/T.I.M.) 1987

Somebody’s Rocking My Dreamboat (nr/T.I.M.) 1988

VARIOUS ARTISTS

Fast Product—Mutant Pop (PVC) 1980

Til Things Are Brighter ... (Red Rhino-Fundamental) 1988 •

Although formed in the punk era, and—like another Leeds band of similar vintage, the Gang of Four—originally known for abrasive guitar funk more concerned with content and politics than commercial niceties or style, the Mekons (not to be confused with the Manchester Mekon, a minor class-of-’77 outfit) covered a lot of ground in the ’80s, and have grown into one of the most venerable and entertaining post-punk institutions. Ring-led by singer/guitarist/producer/etc. Jon Langford (also one of the Three Johns, and a major force/influence in underground and indie-rock circles), the Mekons have held true to the same precepts they started with, but have wisely moved with the times in a number of significant ways.

The first album—a major landmark erected by one of the few late-’70s British bands that didn’t want to be either the Sex Pistols or the Clash—suffers from the screamed vocals, which obscure both the music and the left-wing lyrics: minimalism is one thing, but rank amateurism another. (The CD reissue adds a half-dozen single sides from ’79 and ’80.)

On the second album (more commonly known as The Mekons), the group moves into danceable synthpop, with protest lyrics attacking bourgeois culture, the army and hollow lives. The Mekons Story is a retrospective album of old tracks and outtakes, punctuated by inter-track narration. Ending the first chapter in a long story, the Mekons ceased performing in 1981 and cut back on recording work after that 1982 release, although a core trio of Langford, guitarist Tom Greenhalgh and bassist/guitarist Kevin Lycett kept the band in occasional vinyl circulation.

A large new incarnation returned the Mekons to prominence and much international critical adulation in 1985 with Fear and Whiskey, a ragged album with sturdily memorable tunes that mix equal parts of electrified rustic country dance music and cow-rock. Fiddle, piano and harmonica join the guitars and drums for a sound that is reasonably comparable to a less loopy, more rocking version of John Otway. Sin's label design mimics Sun's; the sounds are likewise Americanized and, characteristically for the new Mekons, a cover of Hank Williams' "Lost Highway" closes the LP on an appropriate note. Nothing (well, only some things, perhaps) could be further from the Mekons' early noise days. Crime and Punishment offers four songs (including the Robyn Hitchcock-like "Chop That Child in Half" and Merle Haggard's "Deep End") from a John Peel session.

Following the four-song 10-inch Slightly South of the Border, Honky Tonkin' (named for the Hank Williams lyric quoted on the back cover) finds a cast of dozens (actually one dozen) working its way stylistically towards the Pogues' drunkenly revisionist folk-fundamentalism. A case of the sillies ("Sympathy for the Mekons") competes with responsible topicality (a remake of the band's old "Trimdon Grange Explosion," "Kidnapped," "If They Hang You," which eulogizes Dashiell Hammett for refusing to name names at the HUAC hearings) and conspicuous literacy ("Hole in the Ground," "Charlie Cake Park"). The notes for each song cite relevant books, movies or artworks for those undaunted by intellectualism. The generally appealing music, a well-organized wash of fiddles, accordion, guitars and simple drums, makes few demands but keeps the folksy standards high.

US tours by the octet in 1986 and 1987 yielded the live tracks (and assorted audio ephemera, like commentary on various subjects by band members) compiled on New York. The material is mostly drawn from recent albums, although a version of the Band's "The Shape I'm In" and a handful of otherwise unreleased items are also included. Motley but charming, it's a casually enlightening trek.

So Good It Hurts has its share of fiddle tunes but also expands the band's stylistic repertoire to embrace reggae, straight rock and calypso. The results suggest certain portions of the Clash's later career, as well as the Boomtown Rats and other musical adventurers. The slickest, most accessible album in the Mekons' long career, it holds fast to a politely delivered but tough-minded political consciousness (Richard Nixon is mentioned in more than one song), pausing to include the Stones' "Heart of Stone." Although unsettling in its normalcy, So Good It Hurts is a stimulating new chapter in this unfinished saga.

Original Sin is a remastered CD of Fear and Whiskey plus the whole Slightly South EP, three-quarters of Crime and Punishment and one song each from The English Dancing Master and Edge of the World. A handy sampler of the band's mid-'80s work.

The Mekons Rock'n'Roll is an unexpected development at this stage of the game: a punk-rock concept album filled with eloquence and passion. The subject, as announced in the title, is here in all its sordid glory, from lines about "Eric Burdon stunned in Mississippi on the Animals' U.S. tour" (from "Amnesia") to a dig at Bono ("the Dublin messiah scattering crumbs," in "Blow Your Tuneless Trumpet") and the grim morality tale of "Cocaine Lil." It's a tough, dark album that includes five of the best songs the band has ever written, plus some half-baked ideas mired in mud and feedback. (Released as "a preview of Rock'n'Roll," the four-song Dream and Lie of . . . EP is of interest only for "Heaven and Back," one of the two tracks (the other is "Ring o' Roses") left off the album's American edition.)

The Curse of the Mekons is another leap forward for the band, extending the worldbeat forays of So Good It Hurts, the surprising techno-dance experiments of F.U.N. '90 (a four-song response to acid-house that covers songs by the Band and Kevin Coyne and includes a track co-written with Lester Bangs) and the attack of Rock'n'Roll into the group's most melodic collection to date. Among the highlights are two numbers sung by the bell-toned Timms: the eerie "German for Secrets" and a straight cover of "Wild and Blue" by Nashville star John Anderson. The sound is all over the place, from the Stony-Cajun hook of the title song to the metallic anthem "Authority" to the plodding reggae of "100%," complete with banjo, accordion and mariachi horns. Elsewhere, dubby psychedelia, drum machines, treated vocals, sound effects and spacey synths add colorful scenery to this bizarre sonic odyssey.

Sometime lead singer Sally Timms' solo releases distance her impressively from the Mekons camp (although she's backed by three members of the band on the album). "Horses" and the countryish "Chained to the Anchor of Love" on Somebody's Rocking My Dreamboat could be stray Mekons tracks, but the rest stakes out very different ground, a more mainstream, electronic-based rock over which her cool, clear voice soars. Occasionally clunky but worth seeking out. The title track of the three-song This House is a duet with Marc Almond, while the four-song Butcher's Boy includes a version of "Long Black Veil."

'Til Things Are Brighter is an uneven AIDS-benefit album of Johnny Cash covers, with the Mekons backing folks like Almond, Michelle Shocked, Pete Shelley, Stephen Mallinder of Cabaret Voltaire and sometime Mekon/Notting Hillbilly Brendan Croker. The Mekons themselves do "Folsom Prison Blues" and Timms contributes "Cry, Cry Cry." [gf/i/ws]

See also Three Johns.

MELLOW MAN ACE

Escape from Havana (Capitol) 1989 •

Despite clever production by the Dust Brothers, Def Jef and others, most of this romantic LA rapper's first album—even with the novelty of four tracks in Spanish ("Rap Guanaco," "Mas Pingon," "En la Casa," "En-quentren Amor")—is by-the-numbers dull. But when he drops a clever bilingual rap over Santana's "Evil Ways" (in the delightful "Mentiroso"), running suspicious rhymes around a deceitful girlfriend. Ace (alongside Kid Frost) suggests the unique possibilities of Latin-American hip-hop, both in terms of rhymes and music. [i]

MELODIC ENERGY COMMISSION

See Hawkwind.

MS. MELODIE

See Boogie Down Productions

MELODY MAKERS

Play the Game Right (EMI) 1985 •

ZIGGY MARLEY AND THE MELODY MAKERS

Hey World! (EMI) 1986 •

Conscious Party (Virgin) 1988 •

Time Has Come: The Best of Ziggy Marley and the

Melody Makers (EMI Manhattan) 1988 •

One Bright Day (Virgin) 1989 •

Jahmekya (Virgin) 1991 ◊

While still in their teens, Ziggy (David) Marley and the Melody Makers reached a level of international stardom known by very few other reggae acts. This is partly due to genes—Ziggy resembles his late father and, more significantly, sounds uncannily like him. Such instant identification has enabled the group (which includes three other Marley progeny) to easily step into the commercial vacuum left by the elder Marley's death.

The Grammy-nominated Play the Game Right, which utilizes a traditional Wailers-like sound—complete with horns—and includes a song ("Children Playing in the Streets") the elder Marley had written for them, is attractive and surprisingly accomplished in light of the group's tender years.

The wonderful Hey World! shows the Melody Makers coming into their own, bending delightfully light reggae grooves to new stylistic ends. "Give a Little Love" is a soulful party track, "Lord We a Come" has an amazing gospelly African folk feel; Ziggy's vocals in "Police Brutality" stick on good funk grunts for emphasis.

Released several months after Conscious Party (the group's first album for a new label), the Time Has Come compilation (hardly a best-of, but that's the record biz for you) selects five numbers from each of the band's two EMI albums, adding a pair of 1984 tracks.

Symbolically and literally, the Melody Makers represent reggae's new generation. Conscious Party bears this out, from its aura of optimism (in songs like "Tomorrow People," "New Love" and "We Propose") to its thoroughly modern sound. Produced by Talking Heads Chris Frantz and Tina Weymouth, and featuring a superb crew of international backup musicians, the record is smart and professional—like the Heads and more consistent than either Tom Tom Club LP. If the kids' songwriting doesn't compare with Dad's, it's at least competent and promising. The LP isn't at all rootsy, but it's fresh, appealing and sincere: reggae for the Benetton generation.

Ziggy's talents really blossomed on One Bright Day, which he co-produced with Frantz, Weymouth and Glenn Rosenstein. Downplaying Rasta culture even more than before, the freedom-minded album uses the band's catchiest songs to promote the power and universality of music. With explicit lyrics and stylistic demonstrations, the Melody Makers express their solidarity with the South African struggle as well as black culture in America and elsewhere. Although reggae purists have all but disavowed the group, "Black My Story (Not History)," "One Bright Day" and "Look Who's Dancing" are nearly magical in their delightful blending of slick dance pop and roots rock. [bk/i]

MELVINS

Gluey Porch Treatments (Alchemy) 1987 •

Ozma (Boner) 1989 •

Bullhead (Boner) 1991 •

Formed in Aberdeen, Washington, this trio led by Buzz Osborne (guitar, vocals) pounds out an unpredictable, unsteady, confusing sort of metal, an ominously heavy Black Sabbath rumble—without the screechy vocals, guitar solos or dumb-ass lyrics. Songs stop and start, bash and crash on Gluey Porch Treatments, an album of measured, careening noise in which uneven, unexpected tempo changes make dancing absolutely out of the question.

With longtime bassist Matt Lukin opting to stay in Washington and join Mudhoney, the Melvins relocated to San Francisco in 1988 and got themselves a new bassist named Lori. Better production makes Ozma a more consistently listenable longplayer, although such maximum heaviosity without any of the related trappings probably inhibits the Melvins' appeal among headbangers of either persuasion. Ozma's main strength lies in Osborne's tortured lyrics, and his ability to turn such disjointed nihilistic poetry into songs. (The cassette includes an extra song; the CD includes Gluey Porch Treatments.) [icm/i]

See also Mudhoney.

MEMBERS

At the Chelsea Nightclub (Virgin Int'l) 1979 (Blue Plate) 1991 •

1980—The Choice Is Yours (nr/Virgin) 1980 (Blue Plate) 1991 •

Radio EP (Arista) 1982

Uprhythm, Downbeat (Arista) 1982

Going West (nr/Albion) 1983

At the Chelsea Nightclub finds the Members using punk as a jumping-off point, but that doesn't tell the whole musical story. Incipient instrumental smarts and simple tunes nailed down by infectious, above-average riffs countered the rough-edged delivery and Nicky Tesco's one-o'-the-lads vocals. The themes—mainly variations on the suburban kid in the city getting streetwise fast—are framed in mischievous yet endearing (even corny) humor. The album's added bonus is that it contains one of the first, and even now best, white punk ventures into reggae (including, on the US pressing, the subsequent "Offshore Banking Business" single). Thoroughly entertaining.

The second album, however, signaled the advent of a downswing from which the band never really recovered. The material seems thin—a cover of ex-Pink Fairy Larry Wallis' "Police Car" is far and away the most memorable track—and any spark and grit the band might have mustered is sterilized by Rupert Hine's production. (The first LP was produced by Steve, the brother of the Members' drummer, Adrian Lillywhite.)

Working with Martin Rushent, the Members' comeback—after a layoff which some mistook for a breakup—sounded for real, first on the teaser EP (one extra track on the US version) and then more substantially on Uprhythm, Downbeat. Besides the crisp, full sound, the quintet had grown to a septet with a pair of horns, and the music integrated funk and rap in addition to reggae. No longer humorous, lyrics instead alternate social critiques/rallying cries with personal traumas, at which they prove less adept, but the music is more powerful and danceable than ever. Inspired touch: reggaefication of Kraftwerk's "The Model." (Uprhythm, Downbeat was later released in the UK as Going West. The cassette version has extra tracks.) [jg]

See also King.

MEMBRANES

- Muscles EP (nr/Rondelet) 1982
- Pin Stripe Hype EP (nr/Rondelet) 1982
- Crack House EP (nr/Criminal Damage) 1983
- Death to Trad Rock EP (nr/Criminal Damage) 1985
- The Gift of Life (nr/Creation) 1985
- Giant (nr/Constrictor) 1986
- Everything's Brilliant EP (nr/In Tape) 1986
- Songs of Love and Fury (Homestead) 1986
- Time-Warp 1991 (Long Live Trad Rock) EP (Homestead) 1987
- Back Catalogue: Peter Sellers Versus the Virgin Mary (nr/Vinyl Drip) 1987
- Kiss Ass Godhead (Homestead) 1988
- To Slay the Rock Pig (nr/Vinyl Drip) 1989 •

Stalwarts of the British independent scene, Blackpool's Membranes have essayed numerous styles with countless lineups. They began as a quirky, not-too-loud quartet, playing simple tunes with offbeat lyrics and melodica for unexpected coloration. Back Catalogue, issued on the band's own Vinyl Drip label, reprises fifteen early efforts, including a rare 1980 flexi-disc, the contents of two four-song EPs (the 12-inch Muscles, Pin Stripe Hype) and three re-recordings of the same material. The six-song Crack House, done as a bass/guitar/drums trio, finds the Membranes nearing their creative peak, shooting out jagged, tense jazz-tinged punk—ugly, abrasive, ambitious and gripping—as well as more accessible drone rock.

Death to Trad Rock builds the guitar chaos to an unnerving plateau on four lengthy songs that also feature bassist John Robb's manic vocals and, on "Myths and Legends," a guest violinist. With Robb switching over to guitar, however, The Gift of Life sails right over the edge in a tumult of screaming, banging and incoherent music. The goofy "I Am Fisheye" chant offers a briefly amusing alternative, but this seemingly tossed-off album deserves tossing. Jon (Three Johns/Mekons) Langford adds guitar on the title track; a saxophonist only adds to the din. Giant is a compilation.

Produced by Langford, the "Everything's Brilliant" 12-inch (two versions plus three B-sides) returns the Membranes to the realm of responsible musicmaking, moving a clear, gothic drum sound and give-a-shit sloppy vocals to the fore and relegating guitars to a subsidiary role at non-distorto volume levels. Songs of Love and Fury, with another new bassist and Nick Brown (a guest contributor soon to become a permanent member) adding guitar and violin, takes a further step backwards, almost eliminating electric guitars entirely. Not that far in sound from the band's earliest work, songs like "Kennedy '63," "Day My Universe Changed" and "Phoney T.V. Repairman" mix a flat, trippy '60s approach with the lyrical attitude of Mark E. Smith. A little hard to fathom at first, Love and Fury—the band's first US release—reveals itself gradually to be one of the Membranes' best records.

Time-Warp is entirely different, a highly produced and carefully performed collection of six folk-rock originals that sound like something the Animals might have done after "Sky Pilot." Synthesizers, drum programs and sound effects add to the bewildering fray. Robb's vocals are reverbed and mixed into a semblance of melodiousness; while not a great record, it certainly is an unexpected one. Incidentally, artist Simon Clegg deserves kudos for his unfailingly brilliant artwork on all of the Membranes' covers and sleeves.

Steve Albini co-produced Kiss Ass Godhead with the Membranes; songs like "Bulbous Love Child," "Long Live the Hooligan!" and "Cheap Male Aggression" are as chaotically loud and abrasive as one could reasonably expect from such a dangerous combination.

Sticking to the loose and rugged, the Membranes made To Slay the Rock Pig with producer Steve Mack, pouring typically grouchy and unselfconsciously outrageous (and remorselessly misspelled) lyrics like "A Missive from Couch Potatoe Command," "Tuff Veggie Agro" and "Life, Death and the Scarey Bits Inbetween" into a poorly mixed cauldron of guitar, bass and drums. Not a good place to first meet the Membranes, but a conducive enough environment to maintain an ongoing relationship. [i]

MEN & VOLTS

- Rhythms & Blues EP (Eat) 1982
- *Hootersville (Eat) 1983
- Tramps in Bloom (Fr. New Rose) 1984 (Iridescence) 1985
- The Mule (Shimmy-Disc) 1987 •
- Stay in Touch (Shimmy-Disc) 1989 •
- Cheer Up (50 Skidillion Watts) 1990 •

With the arcane musical instincts of Captain Beefheart and the dada poetic mindset of Tom Waits, the well-educated Men & Volts (based in the Boston area, although mainstay/lyricist David Greenberger lives in upstate NY) debuted with the challenging and bizarre Rhythms & Blues. Employing horns and difficult tempos, the quartet offers the same four songs—including "Rotten Truth," a disturbing number superficially about cats—pressed on both sides.

Hootersville* (the cover is a map detail; the asterisk marks a locale) is a very full album bursting with unpredictable music that veers from complex and noisy to charmingly rustic and even pastoral. The lyrics on songs like "Pickwick Papers," "Big Ball of String" and "No Shower No Shave" similarly traverse a wide range of topics and are often amusingly absurdist. Stimulating and entertaining.

Dropping the brass and revealing a new folk-based orientation, Tramps in Bloom keeps the guitar-built music rudimentary, allowing simply witty paeans to "New York," "Someone Else's Money" and "The History of the Moon" to speak for themselves. At times sounding like the Band, elsewhere resembling the Grateful Dead, Men & Volts make no effort to dress up their artless songs, and it's just as well. Remaining offhandedly unprofessional (not unaccomplished) is no mean feat.

Sounding even more like the Dead, The Mule has cloudy sound (so much for direct mastering to metal), noticeably more ambitious arrangements (although nothing you'd call fancy) and serious, sensitive evocations of loneliness ("Records Go 'Round"), aging ("You and Me, Pushin' Up Daisies") and several intriguing characters ("The Loveless," "One Holiday Too Many"). Not a spectacular record, but one with old-fashioned attributes that won't leave you wondering where to park your brain. The Mule was later included on the CD and cassette of the band's next album. [i]

MENTAL AS ANYTHING

Mental as Anything Play at Your Party EP (Aus. Regular) 1978

Get Wet (Aus. Regular) 1979

Mental as Anything (nr/Regular-Virgin) 1980

Espresso Bongo (Aus. Regular) 1980

Cats and Dogs (Aus. Regular) 1981

If You Leave Me, Can I Come Too? (A&M) 1982

Creatures of Leisure (Oz-A&M) 1983

Fundamental (Columbia) 1986 •

Mouth to Mouth (Columbia) 1988 •

Cyclone Raymond (Columbia) 1989 •

MARTIN PLAZA

Plaza Suite (Aus. CBS) 1986

A kind of Australian Rockpile with a case of the vaudeville giggles, Sydney's Mental as Anything first surfaced Down Under in 1978 with an EP containing a sly, skiffle-like drinking song called "The Nips Are Getting Bigger" (featured on Get Wet, Mental as Anything—the equivalent UK release—and the US debut If You Leave Me) which accurately summarizes their pub-rock earthiness and randy humor. Get Wet is certainly a good-natured introduction to a band unafraid to write a love song to a foreign country based on travel ads ("Egypt") or pitch a cheesy instrumental bit with Sam the Sham organ as a "Possible Theme for a Future TV Drama Series."

Combining a song from Get Wet and the best of the Australian-only Cats and Dogs, the Anglo-American compilation If You Leave Me, Can I Come Too? is more of the same—the band's (un)usual mix of cheek and underlying lyrical sincerity captured in the poignant "Mr. Normal" drawl of singer/guitarist Martin Plaza. The album also features a track produced by Elvis Costello ("I Didn't Mean to Be Mean") in which the rest of the band—guitarist Reg Mombassa, organist Greedy Smith, bassist Peter O'Doherty and drummer Wayne Delisle—work up a good Attractions-like head of steam.

Creatures of Leisure reveals an overwhelmingly downcast band, singing wistful lyrics about romantic discord ("Bitter to Swallow," "Float Away") and a general lack of gumption ("Nothing's Going Right Today," "Spirit Got Lost"). Even the music is depressed, playing in the same countryish style with barely a trace of enthusiasm. These boys are down, and can't help but lay their burden down in the grooves. Without wallowing in self-pity or indulging in any overt declarations of misery, Creatures of Leisure is an enormously sad record.

A much better frame of mind prevails on Fundamental. Songs like "I Just Wanna Be Happy" and "Live It Up" offer optimistic lyrics about getting past hard times and bad feelings. Other subjects temper that attitude: in "Hold On," O'Doherty admits a case of the guilts about a ladyfriend, while Plaza marvels about public transportation in "Bus Ride." As produced by Richard Gottehrer, the Mentals' music has hit a certain stride that discourages zaniness (a shame), but their sound—still an Australian answer to Nick Lowe—is never less than bouncily appealing.

The emotional barometer holds steady on Mouth to Mouth, another Gottehrer production. Employing plain and pleasant music that could use a bit of a recharge, Plaza delivers harsh words to an ex in "Don't Tell Me Now" and "Thinking Out Loud"; Smith welcomes an old friend in "My Door Is Always Open to You" and offers a hopeful suggestion (in the very Nick Lowe-ish "Let's Go to Paradise"). O'Doherty expresses his pleasure about an ongoing relationship in "I'm Glad." There isn't an unlikely moment anywhere on the record, but the Mentals seem in danger of drifting into musical senility unless they find some collective personality and start showing a little more enthusiasm.

Some people just don't heed the warning signs of encroaching blandness. Cyclone Raymond is completely boring, a collection of tepid love songs that couldn't possibly please anyone other than a soft-rock radio programmer anxious to fill air time with anything inoffensively presentable. O'Doherty's chugging "Baby You're Wild" and the Everlyesque "Love Comes Running" show faint glimmers of life (if not wit), something which can't even be said of a rote Chuck Berry exercise reclaimed from the Young Einstein soundtrack.

Using a lot of modern-sounding electronic keyboards and saxophone in addition to guitars, Plaza's solo album has adequate energy, a few dance rhythms and a shortage of substantial, memorable material. And covering "Concrete and Clay" (following some sort of titular theme, two of Plaza Suite's originals are entitled "Bats and Balls" and "Chalk and Cheese") in synth strings does nothing to improve a bad situation. [df/i]

MEN THEY COULDN'T HANG

Night of a Thousand Candles (nr/Imp-Demon) 1985 •

Greenback Dollar EP (nr/Demon) 1986

How Green Is the Valley (nr/MCA) 1986 •

Waiting for Bonaparte (nr/Magnet) 1988 •

Silvertown (Silvertone) 1989 •

The Domino Club (Silvertone) 1990 •

This English quintet acquired its name when original bassist Shanne Bradley nicked it from her former Nips bandmate, Shane MacGowan, who had it in mind for his own combo—which instead became the Pogues. Playing whistles, mandolin, bouzouki (with guests adding fiddle, accordion, etc.), the Men sail a musical sea that is not that far removed from the early work of their better-known contemporaries. Pogue Philip Chevron produced part of Night of a Thousand Candles, which includes “The Green Fields of France” (written by Australian folk singer Eric Bogle, also covered by the Pogues). Despite the similarities (is it merely coincidence that both bands formed with female bassists who didn’t stay long?), the Men They Couldn’t Hang have nonetheless carved out a distinctive, rocking identity all their own, with dual lead vocals and original songs (mostly by singer Phil “Swill” Odgers and guitarist Paul Simmonds) that combine folky humanism and an earthy working-class sensibility.

The basic approach hasn’t varied much over the years. Night of a Thousand Candles (the six songs on the Greenback Dollar 12-inch, including the titular Hoyt Axton classic and “Rawhide,” are appended to the CD and cassette editions) displays the band at its pub-bred rootsiest, racing through tunes with uninhibited enthusiasm. From there, the band filled out its delivery and improved its songwriting, reached a pinnacle of sorts on the smoothly realized Silvertown, a rich folk-rock brew of topical numbers about actress Frances Farmer (“Lobotomy Gets ‘em Home!”), capitalist paternalism (“Company Town”) and the Channel tunnel (“Rain, Steam & Speed”), with a woebegone tale of European travel (“A Place in the Sun”) and similarly romantic adventures.

Produced by Pat Collier, The Domino Club is a bit too slick for its own good, with inconsistent material (Simmonds is the main contributor) and plain, uninspired performances. [hd/i]

See also Pogues.

MEN WITHOUT HATS

Folk of the 80’s EP (Can. Trend) 1980 (Stiff) 1981
 The Safety Dance (nr/Statik) 1982 •
 Rhythm of Youth (Backstreet-MCA) 1982 •
 Folk of the 80’s (Part III) (MCA) 1984 •
 Pop Goes the World (Mercury) 1987 •
 The Adventures of Women & Men Without Hate in the 21st Century (Mercury) 1989 •

From an almost-unknown Stiff EP to a million-selling debut album, Montreal’s Men Without Hats made their incredible one-step ascent without drastically revising their sound. Although Folk of the 80’s is somewhat rudimentary, Ivan Doroshuk’s remarkably obnoxious singing is already in full flower, and the songs display his characteristically skewed lyrical perceptions and aggressively bouncy tunes.

Reprising the EP’s “Antarctica” while adding an unlikely and aggravating hit single (“The Safety Dance”) and the eminently likable “I Got the Message,” Rhythm of Youth—roughly the same record as The Safety Dance—is slicker but otherwise pretty similar to the band’s first release in every aspect save sales volume. Ivan’s yelping and theatrical bellowing cries out for the swift application of duct tape to his mouth; still, the band’s earnest individuality makes the album hard to truly dislike. The 1984 follow-up leaves the formula unchanged; songs like “Where Do the Boys Go?” and “Messiahs Die Young” are sprightly and entertaining. But other parts drag mercilessly as Ivan’s inflated self-image is delivered pompously to vinyl.

Chastened by the second album’s commercial disappointment, Ivan took a lengthy powder, returning three years later with the best single of his career, “Pop Goes the World,” done for the soundtrack of Date with an Angel. Unfortunately, the rest of what surrounds that insidious techno-pop ditty on Pop Goes the World is only pleasantly dull. But give the group—now an artificial quartet of Ivan, his brother Stefan “in the guise of Johnny the guitarist,” a bassist named Jenny and non-corporeal drummer J. Bonhomme—the odd guest of the week award for getting Jethro Tull leader Ian Anderson to add a spot of flute to one song.

Yawn went the world, but that didn’t stop the Doroshuks from returning two years later with another modestly appealing album. None of the brothers’ diverse originals on 21st Century are as insidiously clever as Abba’s “S.O.S.” (which they cover here), but Ivan’s toned-down singing (on one quiet love song he threatens to turn into Leonard Cohen) and well-crafted, lyrically intriguing numbers about romance, the environment, sexism, the rock’n’roll game do make some of the material fetching. The record ends with “21st Century Safety Dance,” a throbbing demi-industrial instrumental with assorted audio snippets (of the relevant King Crimson and MWH songs, a child’s voice, TV news, etc.) thrown in. [i]

MERCURY REV

See Flaming Lips.

MERCY SEAT

See Violent Femmes.

MERTON PARKAS

Face in the Crowd (nr/Beggars Banquet) 1979 •
 The Singles EP (nr/Beggars Banquet) 1983

If the Merton Parkas had called their LP Just Another Face in the Neo-Mod Crowd, no review of it would be needed. This utterly unmemorable group had nondescript vocals, tame playing (guitar and piano so polite as to be biteless even at high volume) and dull songs (a cover of “Tears of a Clown” not excepted). They do deserve two points for the name, a pun combining the band’s London neighborhood and the essential outer garment of Mod garb. Ha, ha. The group finally earned posthumous notoriety when keyboardist Mick Talbot became Paul Weller’s partner in the Style Council. [jg]

See also Dexy’s Midnight Runners, Style Council.

METALLICA

Kill ‘Em All (Megaforce) 1983 (Elektra) 1987 •
 Ride the Lightning (Megaforce) 1984 (Megaforce-Elektra)
 1984 •
 Whiplash EP (Megaforce) 1985
 Master of Puppets (Elektra) 1986 •
 The $5.98 E.P. Garage Days Re-Visited EP (Elektra)
 1987 •
 ... And Justice for All (Elektra) 1988 •
 The Good, the Bad and the Live (nr/Vertigo) 1990

One of the most important and influential new rock bands to emerge in the 1980s, California's uncompromising Metallica rose from humble origins to influence the attitudes of a generation, its bone-crunching grooves and punkish fuck-that-shit ideology providing the backdrop to contemporary teenage wasteland.

Formed in 1981 by Danish drummer/tennis pro Lars Ulrich and skatepunk guitarist James Hetfield, the band originally included guitarist Dave Mustaine, who split to form Megadeth just days before Kill 'Em All was recorded in mid-'83. Combining Ulrich's love for Euro-metal (everything from Motorhead to Jethro Tull) with Hetfield's Misfits worship, the album shrugged off many of metal's traditional sonic clichés, retaining only the power, velocity and blazing guitars. Bracingly unusual (although hardly radical), tracks like "The Four Horsemen" show off lead guitarist Kirk Hammett's technical prowess as well as the mighty Cliff Burton/Lars Ulrich rhythm section (The 1987 reissue adds a bruising pair of then-obscure metal covers—dubbed "Garage Days Revisited"—from the European B-side of "Creeping Death.")

Ride the Lightning found the band's sound taking on a life of its own. Hetfield's lyrics and strained vocals had scarcely improved, but the pulverizing crunch-grooves—most effective on the awesome "For Whom the Bell Tolls"—unleash primal instincts and are essential lessons in the science of the riff. The limited production and weaker songs detract but don't keep this album from milestone status.

The Whiplash EP includes a "neck-brace" remix of the title track and two live cuts.

Releasing its trump card at the ideal moment turned Metallica into superstars almost overnight. Despite mainstream radio's general boycott of uncommercial metal, Master of Puppets, universally acknowledged as the band's creative peak, roared into the Top 30 on the strength of constant touring and a rabid underground buzz. Multi-tracked harmony solos, tautly controlled rhythms and simple vocal arrangements make songs about insanity ("Welcome Home (Sanitarium)" and "The Things That Should Not Be"), the futility of war ("Disposable Heroes") and cocaine addiction ("Master of Puppets") burn white-hot with excitement.

Metallica's future was cast in doubt in September 1986 when a bus crash in Sweden killed Burton. But they recruited new bassist Jason Newsted and returned in late '87 with The $5.98 E.P. Garage Days Revisited, an intriguingly conceived package of five cover versions recorded casually in LA during rehearsal jams. The bands favored with Metallicization include Budgie, Killing Joke and the Misfits. Despite the fascinating selection, however, the hurried execution and "not very" production reduce everything to soundalike dullness.

After beginning sessions for its fourth LP with Guns n' Roses producer Mike Clink, the band recalled the producer of its prior two albums and completed the sprawling . . . And Justice for All way behind schedule. The album that finally emerged runs over 65 minutes, which, considering the contents, is about 25 too many. An ultra-dry mix and endless directionless riffage make it cold and static; although "Blackened" and "Dyers Eve" are relatively brief (i.e., less than seven minutes) blasts of speed, and the chilling "One" (bascally a third rewrite of Ride the Lightning's "Fade to Black") yielded an unlikely hit single, metal's most underground band had become perilously bloated

A limited edition boxed set of six 12-inches, The Good, the Bad and the Live, reconfigures almost all of Metallica's singles and non-LP material: along with six new live cuts, it includes most of the Whiplash EP and both Garage Days collections, plus the Budgie and DiamondHead covers from the B-side of "Harvester of Sorrow." [i/rj/ja]

See also Megadeth.

METAL MIKE

See Angry Samoans.

M.I.A./GENOCIDE

Last Rites for M.I.A. and Genocide (Smoke 7) 1981

M.I.A.

Murder in a Foreign Place (Alternative Tentacles) 1984

Notes from the Underground (National Trust) 1985

After the Fact (Flipside) 1987

Although Las Vegas may be an entertainment capital, its gambling tourists typically prefer Wayne Newton or Bill Cosby to the Sex Pistols. As a result, Vegas' only great punk band gave up before their career could get off the ground. Were it not for their half of a post-humous release, the prematurely titled Last Rites, M.I.A. would have remained an unknown, gifted punk band. Last Rites sold well, especially after its outstanding opener, "Tell Me Why" (not the Beatles' tune), was included on American Youth Report, an excellent West Coast punk/hardcore compilation. Finding themselves wanted, M.I.A. reunited for good, relocating to the more supportive Southern California punk community.

Last Rites contains a side each by M.I.A. and New Jersey's Genocide. (The less said about them the better.) Although M.I.A. come across as naive, uncomplicated, almost willfully unimaginative 1-2-3-4-off-we-go punk, the record drips with the excitement that many such records of that time had. The roaring guitar sounds like a Marshall amp on twelve and the hooks are as instant as oatmeal—just add steaming water. Mike Conley's singing is unusually clear, easy to decipher and pop-melodic. The subject of "Gas Crisis" may be out of date, but on the pulverizing two-chord verse of "I Hate Hippies," Conley's ironic tongue is so far in his cheek it's almost coming out his ear: "Cause they're dumb/I'm smart/They're weak/I'm strong/I'm right/And they're fucking wrong." Hilarious!

The songs on Murder in a Foreign Place aren't overly political; the music resembles early Brit-punk (Generation X, Sham 69) in spots. By tempering fierce enthusiasm with clear organization (although the mix buries Conley), relatively leisurely tempos and musical coherence, M.I.A. rises well above the crowd.

The much-improved Notes from the Underground leaves hardcore behind for a pretty fair Damned/TSOL-influenced punk LP with occasional acoustic guitar and even sax (on an anti-apartheid song). The hooks are occasionally a little too obvious, but "Another Day," "Write Myself a Letter" and "Shadows of My Life" are first-rate punk-pop. Nick Adams' wall of guitar dominates each of the ten tracks.

After the Fact is one of the best US punk records of the late '80s, mostly because it mixes in many post-punk influences and innovates where other punks cling to tradition. The two guitars rarely play similar parts, there are dynamics and mood settings, contemplative sound ("Whisper in the Wind") and even a Killing Jokey tribal backbeat ("When It's Over"). The production on After the Fact is far superior to M.I.A.'s past efforts, with real bottom, kick, drive and guts. Just check out the cover of "California Dreaming" or the effortless "Edge of Forever" for proof that punk can be a fresh aural pleasure, even at this late date.

M.I.A. ultimately paid the same price that the original TSOL and Effigies did when they went against the grain and tried to take punk to its next step: they split up in early 1988. [jr]

See also Big Drill Car.

MICKY AND THE MILKSHAKES

See Pop Rivits.

MICRODISNEY

Everybody's Fantastic (nr/Rough Trade) 1983
We Hate You South African Bastards! EP (nr/Rough Trade) 1984
Microdisney in the World EP (nr/Rough Trade) 1985
The Clock Comes Down the Stairs (Big Time) 1985
Crooked Mile (Virgin) 1986 ●
39 Minutes (nr/Virgin) 1988 ●
Gale Force Wind EP (nr/Virgin) 1988 ●
The Peel Sessions Album (nr/Strange Fruit) 1989 ●

FATIMA MANSIONS

Against Nature (nr/Kitchenware) 1989
Viva Dead Ponies (nr/Kitchenware) 1990
(Radioactive-MCA) 1991 ●

SEAN O'HAGAN

High Llamas (nr/Demon) 1990 ●

Originally a duo from Cork, Ireland, Microdisney combine heavily orchestrated smooth pop with potent songwriting. A sublimely seductive paradox, the music goes down easy but invariably returns to haunt the intellect. After moving to London and recruiting three more members, Cathal Coughlan (vocals/lyrics) and Sean O'Hagan (guitar/music) recorded Everybody's Fantastic, thirteen gently atmospheric songs that touch the heart and the mind with resonant guitar and Coughlan's passionate brogue. Starkly romantic ("Dolly," "I'll Be a Gentleman") and ardently political ("Come on Over and Cry," "Before the Famine"), the record commands attention.

Virtually nonexistent commercial response to their first LP prompted the release of We Hate You South African Bastards!, a mini-album compilation of early singles and demos recorded as a duo that assured Microdisney's survival while making an unequivocal statement against apartheid. Their next release was a four-song 12-inch of new material, In the World.

The Clock Comes Down the Stairs suffers from improved production: Coughlan's vocals, curiously relieved of their Irish accent, are set deep within a mix of overwhelming instrumentation. "Birthday Girl,"

"Horse Overboard" and "Past" are pleasant enough, but verge on a generic sound. Gone are Coughlan's heartfelt protests and O'Hagan's sharp melodic chords, making this complacent background muzak—a far cry from the compelling impact of We Hate You. (The tape has five extra songs.)

The drawbacks so prevalent on The Clock Comes Down the Stairs reassert themselves on Crooked Mile. Lenny Kaye's lush production renders this LP as nothing more than a collection of languid, dismissible pop symphonies. One exception, however, is the passionate "Give Me All of Your Clothes"—the first possible sign that Microdisney may be getting just a bit tired of churning out useless fodder.

39 Minutes, which actually clocks in at just under 38, restores the group's sense of purpose, balancing the slick production of recent efforts with a slightly more aggressive attack and Coughlan's sharpest lyrics in ages. While songs like "Singer's Hampstead Home," "Ambulance for One" and "Gale Force Wind" promised much for Microdisney's future, 39 Minutes proved to be the band's last hurrah.

On the two albums by his new group, the Fatima Mansions (of which he appears to be the only actual member), Coughlan tosses aside polite notions of mainstream pop music in favor of a staggeringly eclectic, uncompromisingly leftist mélange of airy melodicism and frenzied house-inspired dance noise. His conceptual range is particularly impressive on the epic Viva Dead Ponies, whose imposing sound palette shouldn't distract from such inspired compositions as "White Knuckle Express" and "Look What I Stole for Us, Darling."

O'Hagan's solo disc is a tasteful and tuneful singer-songwriter effort; short on surprises but long on low-key pleasure. [ag/hd]

MICRONOTZ

See Mortal Micronotz.

MIDNIGHT OIL

Midnight Oil (Aus. Powderworks) 1978 (Columbia) 1990 ●
Head Injuries (Aus. Powderworks) 1979 (Columbia) 1990 ●
Bird Noises EP (Aus. Powderworks) 1980 (Columbia) 1990 ●
Place Without a Postcard (Aus. CBS) 1981 (Columbia) 1990 ●
10,9,8,7,6,5,4,3,2,1 (Columbia) 1983 ●
Red Sails in the Sunset (Columbia) 1985 ●
Species Decreases EP (Aus. CBS) 1985 (Columbia) 1990 ●
Diesel and Dust (Columbia) 1987 ●
Blue Sky Mining (Columbia) 1990 ●

A quintet that originally found a following in the rowdy surf crowd frequenting Sydney-area bars, Australia's Midnight Oil went on to become an international phenomenon, and its music grew far beyond its hard-rock roots. But that categorization never quite fit in the first place; hearing their watershed 10,9,8,7,6,5,4,3,2,1 and then reviewing their previous output, the natural query of "how did they make that leap" becomes "what took them so long?"

Oil's iconoclasm is the primary answer. Lead singer Peter Garrett both symbolizes and embodies it: well over six feet tall and bald as a cue ball, he gave up a law career to sing rock'n'roll. His angst/anger-ridden vocals have nothing in common with the standard styles of hard-rock singers, nor do the band's lyrics (chiefly by drummer Rob Hirst) share any of the genre's fixation on refined love themes. The songs are frequently political, yet just as often are couched in extremely personal terms, be they about romance (rarely), self-doubt, hopes and fears and so on. And despite its share of semi-normal hard-rock, complete with blistering guitar solos, the eponymous debut album also includes strange notions about chord progressions and arrangements that would eventually flower: "Dust" is a bluesy riff stated on two basses an octave apart, backed by organ and drums.

No doubt the Oils' insistence on intra-band democracy and doing things their own way was why they refused a major-league deal for five years. Unfortunately, that also meant a lack of money for studio experimentation, and most of their independent-label work sounds like demos, lacking the firm command of a proper producer.

It may also have retarded the band in working out the complexities of songs and arrangements, including adapting the music to odd lyrical meter (or vice versa). Head Injuries makes some progress on that front, and the songwriting—still largely done by various teams in the group—seems to have matured. A clutch of songs are able to transcend the limitations of their presentation, assisted by Garrett's impassioned vocals and the group's overall intensity. What at first seem to be arranging gaffes eventually take on an air of almost integral idiosyncrasy. The four-song Bird Noises EP continues that development and also features an anomalous but delightful Shadows-like instrumental, "Wedding Cake Island." (The 1990 reissues of Oil's early records and the 1985 EP are all CD/cassette; no domestic vinyl exists.)

Place Without a Postcard should've been a brilliant breakthrough; instead, it's muscle-bound, all worked up and uncertain where to go first. The few simple strokes are the most effective—in fact, "Someone Else to Blame" is a crackler—but most of it's at war with itself. Also, the sound achieved with veteran producer Glyn Johns in England is demo-thin. But the experimentation yielded valuable lessons, and James Moginie, the group's most prolific composer, also began to jell his distinctive guitar sound, as well as creatively exploring keyboards. The stage was set for the group's international introduction.

The strong political views expressed on 10,9,8,7,6,5,4,3,2,1 may have been a sticking point outside the band's homeland, but they're frequently more personally expressed than, say, the Clash's and, when not, they're more articulate. Increased use of synthesizer handsomely complements the quintet's most cohesive songwriting and arranging; while no two tracks are more than vaguely similar, they're all completely unified. Some credit must also go to Nick Launay (co-producer, with the band), who obtained a crisp, if slightly odd, sound. Although much of Side Two is more thoughtful and less visceral than Side One, overall the album is a masterpiece, from the desperate hopefulness of "Outside World" to the controlled hysteria/rifferama of "Only the Strong" to the danceable fist-shaker, "Power and the Passion."

On Red Sails in the Sunset (again with Launay), the Oils indulge in too much experimentation at once (though more successfully than Place Without a Postcard). The LP opens with two relatively simple tracks, "When the Generals Talk" (more clichéd than the band's usual political statements, but a stirring mix of hard rock and—new for the Oils—funk) and "Best of Both Worlds," one of their best straight-ahead rockers ever. From there on, excessive musical complexity, plus some topics that are simply beyond the ken of non-Australians, make it heavy going. Some tracks (notably "Sleep" and "Minutes to Midnight") do unfold eventually, but others remain steadfastly impenetrable.

Evidently inspired by the 40th anniversary of the bombing of Hiroshima, Midnight Oil recorded Species Deceases, four survival-of-humanity tracks cut virtually live in the studio (co-produced by Francois Kervorkian). Solid and heartfelt, but no lyrical or musical revelations.

Diesel and Dust doesn't reach the highs of 10,9,8, but it is consistently powerful and compelling. The production (the band with Warne Livesey) is snappier than ever, and the passion for the issues comes across loud and clear. Actually, the passion comes through regardless of the issues; few Americans who made "Beds Are Burning" the Oils' first US hit single had any idea it was about Aboriginal land rights. Diesel is a consolidation of strengths, and isn't even beyond a bit of recycling, but the results can be impressive (as on "Bullroarer," which partially reprocesses Red Sails' "Sleep"). And it's hard to fault such dandy goods as "The Dead Heart," sung from an Aborigine's point of view.

Blue Sky Mining continues the disappointing trend of decreasing musical inspiration. It's like Species Deceases with more production (Livesey and the Oils again); not without its fine points, and occasionally as lyrically on-the-mark as ever (e.g., the title track), but the melodies, most of the messages and the general excitement level just aren't the band's best. If the Oils weren't so eminently capable of greatness, an album this good would seem quite impressive. [jg]

MIGHTY CAESARS

See Thee Mighty Caesars.

MIGHTY LEMON DROPS

Happy Head (Sire) 1986 •

Out of Hand (Sire) 1987 •

Janice Long Session EP (nr/Nighttracks-Strange Fruit) 1987

World Without End (Sire-Reprise) 1988 •

Fall Down (Like the Rain) EP (nr/Blue Guitar) 1988 •

Laughter (Sire-Reprise) 1989 •

Sound... (Sire-Reprise) 1991 ◊

Imagine the neo-psychedelia of early Echo & the Bunnymen played with a jangling Rickenbacker as the lead instrument and a less mannered (and less interesting) vocalist and you're on your way to sussing the sound of Happy Head. That's not to take anything away from the intensity and dynamic mood shifts the Midlands-bred quartet (initially known as the Sherbert Monsters) can achieve, but it's hard to hear the album without making the connection. That said, there's at least a side's worth of first-rate songs here, and the uncluttered, stripped-down approach is distinctive enough to recommend it to anyone who likes this sort of thing.

Out of Hand, an eight-cut hodgepodge comprising energetic but unrevelatory live versions of three of Happy Head's better songs and some new studio cuts that add string synthesizers and Eastern flavoring (shades of the Bunnymen, circa "The Cutter"!) to the brew, is for fans only. It has the feel of "product" put out to coincide with a tour or something. (The Happy Head CD also contains Out of Hand.)

Produced by Tim Palmer, World Without End shows the group matured beyond obvious comparisons. The sound is fuller and warmer than before, the arrangements more sophisticated; if not riveting, singer Paul Marsh at least sounds confident. The only downside is the loss of some of Happy Head's manic energy. The CD adds "Shine"; the subsequent EP draws its title track from the album.

With the departure of bassist Tony Linehan (co-writer of all the group's material) during the recording of Laughter (he appears on two cuts), guitarist David Newton—who founded the band after leaving the Wild Flowers—became the group's lone songwriter. Judging from Laughter, he's up to the task, since the material here is among the band's best—shimmering guitar pop with stick-to-you choruses. The Lemon Drops experiment with more complex vocal arrangements to good effect, but it's Newton's guitar work that really shines—he manages to say something different on each song, while staying true to the band's tight ensemble sound. Superb. (The CD adds "Rumbletrain?," a British B-side.) [ds]

See also Wild Flowers.

MIGHTY MOFOS

See Hypstrz.

MIGHTY SQUIRRELS

See Young Fresh Fellows.

MIGHTY WAH!

See Wah!.

MILKSHAKES

See Pop Rivits.

DANIEL MILLER

See Silicon Teens.

ROGER MILLER

No Man Is Hurting Me (Ace of Hearts) 1986
The Big Industry (Ace of Hearts) 1987 + 1988
Oh, guitars, etc . . . (Forced Exposure) 1988
Roger Miller Presents Xyly! and A Woman in Half (New Alliance) 1991 •

NO MAN IS ROGER MILLER

Win! Instantly! (SST) 1989 •

NO MAN/NO MAN'S BAND

Damage the Enemy (New Alliance) 1989

NO MAN

Whamon Express (SST) 1990 •

As Boston's preeminent new wave sonic experimenter, Roger Miller (guitar, piano, vocals) led Mission of Burma and, later, Birdsongs of the Mesozoic, provocative groups that tested various musical possibilities from a progressive rock-derived context. Beginning with the Maximum Electric Piano examinations of No Man Is Hurting Me's second side, Miller's solo career has been equally exploratory. The five pieces (all instrumental, save for a dramatic reading of Lewis Carroll's Jabberwocky) apply Frippertronic tape-loop technique to a prepared (with things like clips, bolts and combs put on the strings) keyboard, generating fascinating ambient textures and pulsing rhythms from a single performance. The remainder of the album is formless and flakier, stretching from a delightful clarinet-damage rock rendition of the other Roger Miller's "King of the Road" to haphazard kinetic noodling on assorted instruments.

The Big Industry ambitiously incorporates Maximum Electric Piano into vocal music, underpinning semi-melodic art-tunes like "Portrait of a Mechanical Dog" and an atonal free-for-all cover of Jimi Hendrix's "Manic Depression" with intriguing contrivances that blend noise (hammers, sampled egg beater, etc.) and music in a challenging tension of nice and rough. Occasionally off-putting but more frequently impressive.

Miller's home-brew album of guitar experiments, Oh, guitars, etc . . ., uses avant-garde compositional tricks, improvisation, conceptual gimmicks (like a nine-minute feedback symphony), tape manipulations ("The Fun World Reductions" is merely an old Burma recording run at extremely high speed) and noises. More irritating than significant, this is an audio scratch pad with few worthwhile notes.

The far more accessible Win! Instantly! (recorded with chord bassist Russ Smith) productively returns Miller (aka No Man) to song form. Although Win!'s din can get awfully loud, clearly defined structures that allow plenty of room for Miller's unique keyboard approach and strange percussion samples invigorate this fine record. Operating on numerous sonic levels at once, songs like "Renegades," "No Man's Landing" and Burma's "This Is Not a Photograph" resemble a collaboration between XTC and Test Dept. under the direction of Brian Eno.

The No Man (Miller alone on vocals and guitar, with sampled rhythm accompaniment) side of Damage the Enemy is wonderful, an energetic and well-sung set of textured rock tunes with crazy noises. The No Man's Band (a keyboardless improv trio with Smith and a percussionist) side takes more listener effort, although the occasionally humorous pieces (the found-implement noises suggest Spike Jones rather than any contemporary artistes) are a far cry from the ear-pinning misery of other unplanned ensembles. (And Miller's trumpet work is a revelation.)

Proceeding from the previous LP's No Man efforts, Whamon Express is a surprisingly straightforward guitar-plus-keyboards rock/pop record with the usual sonic ephemera reduced to a mere industrial accent. Joined by a singing percussionist, Miller redoes "Red Ants IV" (from No Man Is Hurting Me) on guitar and the brief "You S.O.B." (from Oh.), covers "The Man Who Sold the World" without incident and antes up nine good-to-great new originals, some of which could easily pass for Burma tunes. [i]

See also Birdsongs of the Mesozoic, Mission of Burma.

ALAN MILMAN SECT

EP (Britz) 1977

MAN-KA-ZAM

EP (Britz) 1978

BUDDY LOVE

Buddy Love (Davco) 1983

DUCK AND THE PONDS

Lost World (nr/Big Beat) 1988

Shifting musical styles the way some people change addresses, singer/songwriter Alan Milman first surfaced on New York's Long Island in 1977, with a 7-inch EP of tossed-off punk-rock jokes. Dropping the beat-era name for the modernized Man-ka-zam handle, Milman and guitarist Doug Khazzam returned a year later with another 7-inch: four derivative new wave tunes (including "Spunkathon" and "Surf Rhapsody"). That was Milman's last vinyl for a while.

Opting for a lower-profile role as a songwriter, co-producer and backing vocalist, Milman let the pseudonymous Buddy Love (Khazzam, using a name borrowed from Jerry Lewis' Nutty Professor alter-ego) sing lead and play guitar on the exceptional Buddy Love, a charming and memorable pop/rock collection that knowingly mines a wide variety of sources, from '50s rockabilly to '60s Britbeat to '70s glam. Besides covering Gary Glitter ("Rock n' Roll"), Gene Vincent ("Who Slapped John?") and Buddy Holly ("Rave On") with straightforward skill, the quartet delivers sparkling pop originals like the ultra-catchy "Liar," "Why Can't We Make Believe We're in Love?" and "Dead Ringer." Virtually unknown, but great.

Five years later, Milman popped up in the garage-rocking Duck and the Ponds, where his tuneless shout (not for nothing is he billed as Howlin' Alan Milman) suits such generic stompers as "Wanna Ruin Ya" and "Wild About You." The noisy and echo-laden Lost World isn't bad (in fact, the poppish "Wrong" and "On the Corner Again" are pretty neat), but—other than having convinced a British tabloid of their kidnapping by space aliens, who ostensibly helped write the album's songs—the trio hasn't got any distinguishing characteristics. [i]

TED MILTON

See Blurt.

ZODIAC MINDWARP AND THE LOVE REACTION

High Priest of Love (nr/Food) 1986 ●

Tattooed Beat Messiah (Vertigo) 1988 ●

Perhaps hoping to repeat the career feat of ex-Smash Hits editor-cum-Pet Shop Boy Neil Tennant, onetime Flexipop! magazine art director Mark Manning adopted the grungelicious psychedelic motor-thug persona of Zodiac Mindwarp, concocted a ridiculous story about being from another planet, assembled a backing band with names like Slam Thunderhide, Trash D Garbage and Cobalt Stargazer, and set about to test the gullibility of the pop world with a great single called "Prime Mover." Brilliantly produced by Liverpool coolsters Dave Balfe (ex-Teardrop Explodes) and future KLF/JAMS mastermind Bill Drummond, the band's sole US LP, Tattooed Beat Messiah, crosses AC/DC with T. Rex: a back-straightening, breath-taking guitar assault, intentionally low-brow wiseacre lyrics and chanted choruses that demand enthusiastic attention. The melodic headbanging metal power could give Motörhead, Judas Priest or Van Halen a youthful run for their money; one can savor the selfconscious stupidity of songs like "Backseat Education" and "Let's Break the Law" either as sophisticated parody or the real thing. After leaving the Love Reaction, bassist Kid Chaos (aka Haggis) played in the Cult. [i]

See also Cult, Justified Ancients of Mu Mu.

MINIMAL COMPACT

Minimal Compact EP (Bel. Crammed Discs) 1981

One by One (Bel. Crammed Discs) 1983

Deadly Weapons (Bel. Crammed Discs) 1984 ●

The Next One Is Real EP (Crammed Discs-Wax Trax!) 1984 ●

Raging Souls (Bel. Crammed Discs) 1986 ●

Lowlands Flight (Bel. Made to Measure) 1987 ●

The Figure One Cuts (Bel. Crammed Discs) 1987 ●

One Plus One by One [CD] (Bel. Crammed Discs) 1988 ●

Live (Bel. Crammed Discs) 1988 ●

Not so much a rock band as a pan-cultural chamber ensemble with rock instrumentation, the members of Minimal Compact are (mostly) Israelis who didn't see much of a future in their homeland, emigrated to France and signed with Belgium's Crammed Discs. Their music is tasteful and intelligent but avoids selfconscious artiness, and they've worked with some connoisseur favorites: Tuxedomoon's Peter Principle, Wire's Colin Newman (who's married to the group's Malka Spigel) and John Fryer (who's worked with the Cocteau Twins) have all produced them. They served as Newman's backup band on his Commercial Suicide LP; some of their sleeves were designed by Eno collaborator Russell Mills. Minimal Compact's records consistently display an ability to switch gears between atmospheric, British-style art-rock, Middle Eastern-flavored folk and Beatlesque pop, while also retaining the ability to rock out with a danceable beat.

Minimal Compact's first (and, so far, only) American release was an expanded EP. The Next One Is Real contains five songs (including two mixes of the title track) and is a relatively commercial effort, containing hard funk played masterfully by a band whose usual approach is considerably gentler. Both Lowlands Flight (part of Crammed's Made to Measure series, written in part for a Dutch dance troupe) and The Figure One Cuts show quieter moments and greater versatility; those familiar with Commercial Suicide will recognize the guitar textures and delicate arrangements that gave that LP its unique sound. Minimal Compact may be very refined and mature, but they're never boring. [dgs]

MINISTRY

Cold Life EP (Wax Trax!) 1981
With Sympathy (Arista) 1983 •
Work for Love (nr/Arista) 1983
'Twitch' (Sire) 1986 + 1990 •
Twelve Inch Singles 1981-1984 (Wax Trax!) 1987 ♢
The Land of Rape and Honey (Sire) 1988 •
The Mind Is a Terrible Thing to Taste (Sire) 1989 •
In Case You Didn't Feel Like Showing Up (Live) EP (Sire) 1990 ♢

LEAD INTO GOLD

Age of Reason (Wax Trax!) 1990 •

Although Cuban-born singer/writer/producer/key-board player Alain Jourgensen launched Chicago's Ministry as an obnoxiously collegiate modern-dance alliance, he didn't leave it there, and wound up at the epicenter of an extremist cult of industrial noisemakers, madly ripping up rock's floorboards with an intensity rarely heard outside of nuclear test sites. But it took a while to get from point A to point B.

Ministry debuted in 1981 with an EP built around the cloddish "Cold Life." (That song and "Cold Life Dub" both appear, along with three other long tracks and their remixes, on the half-good/half-bad developmental Twelve Inch Singles compilation.) Signing to a major label, the group—here consisting of Alain Jourgensen and drummer Stephen George, with session guests—made the similar-sounding With Sympathy, co-produced by Ian Taylor and Psychedelic Fur Vince Ely. (The British edition, Work for Love, resequences the record and replaces one track.) A sophomoric dose of yuppie-funk, the LP is filled with brutish singing and scanty, derivative ideas stretched by numbing repetition beyond any reasonable limits of listenability. Most heinously, "I Wanted to Tell Her" (a finished version of the Cold Life EP's vocal-less "Primental") chants the title lyric like a litany, as does "Work for Love," which adds moronic lyrics to the numbing two-chord vamp.

Fortunately, that was the end of Ministry's polite attempts at dance-floor accessibility. Produced by Adrian Sherwood, "Twitch" is a far different beast, and the first steps into a murky swamp that subsumes Jourgensen's distorted, nearly spoken vocals within a pounding electronic rhythm onslaught, with found-sound tape bits and barrages of scratch-mix noise effects. Although much of this unsuccessful experiment throbs along dully, with haphazard intersections of good new ideas and bad old ideas, the militaristic "All Day Remix" (an inter-album single that appears in a better mix on Twelve Inch) offers a cogent demonstration of the direction Jourgensen is headed.

Ministry's arrival in The Land of Rape and Honey is heralded by "Stigmata," a queasy synth riff and a blood-curdling shriek. Co-produced by Jourgensen (in the guise of Hypo Luxa) and his lone bandmate, bassist/keyboardist Paul Barker (aka Hermes Pan), the album steps off the ledge of rock convention for an unnervingly powerful sonic assault. Thundering drums (by guest Minister William Rieflin) underpin distorted layers of guitars, keyboards, tapes and effects, with Jourgensen's deranged vocals frantically competing to be heard. Hard to understand, but impossible to ignore, The Land of Rape and Honey is an efficiently ferocious and frightening comment on the modern world.

The Mind Is a Terrible Thing to Taste—on which Jourgensen began listing his given name as Alien—compresses that explosive energy into a tightly wound punk-influenced guitar attack that threatens to skitter off the turntable. Such focus leaves the album a bit less chaotically unpredictable than its predecessor, but no less obsessive in its diabolical power. When Jourgensen chants the title of "Breathe" over and over in a commanding roar, obedience seems like the safest course. Chris Connelly (of Fini Tribe and the Revolting Cocks, one of Ministry's many side projects) sings lead on "Cannibal Song" and "Never Believe."

Six songs with a running time exceeding 40 minutes, the live EP is a speaker-shredding souvenir of Ministry's '89-'90 North American tour, a memorable extravaganza that saw as many as nine musicians—including Martin (Brian Bran) Atkins and Skinny Puppy's Nivek Ogre—onstage at a time. Storming through a devastating précis of the two previous LPs, this incarnation of Ministry is a punishing beast, thrashing in incomprehensible fury to a runaway plectriveder beat. Brutally oppressive but irresistibly fascinating.

Lead into Gold is Paul Barker's solo project, a need-less opportunity for him to write, perform and sing his own material electronically, with only a guest guitarist chucking in chords here and there. Wrapped in a nifty embossed cover, Age of Reason puts grimly pretentious lyrics (a random couplet: "Covered in mud for glory/Belies our sense of fun") to plodding songs which Barker sings in an artless voice. The Eno-oriented "Faster Than Light" (also available on a three-song 12-inch entitled Chicks & Speed: Futurism) is the closest thing to a real song you'd want to hear twice.

See also Lard, Pailhead, Revolting Cocks. [i]

MINISTRY OF LOVE

See Red Temple Spirits.

MINK DEVILLE

Mink DeVille (Capitol) 1977 •
Return to Magenta (Capitol) 1978
Le Chat Bleu (Capitol) 1980
Coup de Grâce (Atlantic) 1981
Savoir Faire (Capitol) 1981 •
Where Angels Fear to Tread (Atlantic) 1983
Sportin' Life (Atlantic) 1985 •
Cabretta (nr/Razor) 1987

WILLY DEVILLE

Miracle (A&M) 1987 •
Victory Mixture (Orleans) 1990 •

Around 1976-'77, Willy DeVille and pals could, on a good night, be the coolest cats on the New York underground scene, despite occasional stylistic side-tracking. After being "discovered," producer Jack Nitzsche got them on the lean, tough R&B beam for a first LP that sweats and smokes through and through as a classic of such fully and lovingly assimilated music should.

Unfortunately, Return to Magenta is more of the same but less; on the first LP, the cover of Moon Martin's "Cadillac Walk" was one of many highlights, but here Martin's inferior "Rolene" is pretty much it. Le Chat Bleu's arrival was welcome mainly because it ended Willy's prolonged absence from recording, but it confirmed that stagnation had set in. The band was, by then, a couple of Minks plus sessionmen; it seemed Willy was looking to become the soul crooner of his dreams without providing the songs to fuel ours (despite some collaborative songwriting with Doc Pomus, hitsmith for Joe Turner, Dion, the Drifters, etc.). Savoir Faire collects tracks from those three albums.

Evidence that DeVille had lost touch with the trash/sleaze aesthetic (not to mention Louie X. Erlanger's lowdown guitar) is even plainer on Coup de Grâce. Despite a new, young band and a reunion with Nitzsche (Mink saxist Steve Douglas had produced the third LP), the magic is still largely absent. Tracks like "Maybe Tomorrow" offer traces of the old bite almost as a concession.

Where Angels Fear to Tread, produced by the hit-making team of Ron and Howard Albert (who ruined a Gang of Four album that same year), is a fine record of new DeVille originals, starting with the soulful and sweet "Each Word's a Beat of My Heart." This uncluttered and uncomplicated tribute to DeVille's forebears—Sam Cooke, Phil Spector, the Drifters, Joe Tex, James Brown—also includes forays into Spanish Harlem and other wondrously nostalgic tune warps. DeVille's songwriting and singing have returned to top strength, and the record burns with sincerity and warmth. Simply, elegantly excellent.

Sportin' Life maintains those standards with a set of brand-new oldies that effortlessly transport you back to the era of sweet soul music. "Something Beautiful Dying" (note the Righteous Brothers reference) is tenderly melancholic; "Little by Little" tries barrelhouse rockabilly; "Italian Shoes" is classic bad dude strutting. Apt production and a sharp backing band make this first rate.

Inexplicably selected to write and sing the theme song for The Princess Bride, DeVille astonishingly earned an Academy Award nomination for "Storybook Love," the schmaltzy cut that ends Miracle. While the pale and inconsistent record is nowhere near Willy's best work, his seasoned voice is as strong and colorful as ever. The snappy "Angel Eyes," romantic "Night-falls" and Van Morrison's "Could You Would You?" are among the album's merits. Mark Knopfler, who played all the guitar here, produced the LP cleanly but without color, forgetting the smoky ambience essential to DeVille's music.

Victory Mixture finds Willy living in the Big Easy, making music with Dr. John, Allen Toussaint and other local legends. [jg/i]

See also Fast Floyd and the Famous Firebirds.

LIZA MINNELLI

See Pet Shop Boys.

MINNY POPS

Drastic Measures, Drastic Movement (Hol. Plurex) 1979 + 1982

Sparks in a Dark Room (Bel. Factory Benelux) 1982

SMALTS

Werktitels EP (Hol. Plurex) 1982

POSTE RESTANTE

Poste Restante (Hol. Plurex) 1983

Even in 1979, Minny Pops didn't seem drastic in the purest sense but rather deliberately, almost clinically extreme. The Dutch foursome's most salient characteristic on record is dissonance, even sheer noise—valid artistic devices in the proper hands, but it takes vision and inspiration, of which the Pops seem to possess little. Whether they're having a go at industrial clang or setting pop clichés and oldies in jarringly alien musical contexts, even their best comes up short of what others (e.g., Throbbing Gristle, Half Japanese) have achieved in the same area. No doubt they've applied themselves diligently to make this music, but the net result lacks spark and invention. Minny Pops' first LP, released on the band's Plurex label, Holland's most important and active indie, was reissued in 1982 with the addition of a bonus 45.

Glimmerings of something better flicker on the Smalts EP. The syncopated percussion and keyboards/synth noises, including an arresting accordion/harmonium-type sound, are like a soundtrack in search of a movie, but effective within its limits. Smalts was, in fact, two members of Minny Pops exploring new avenues in preparation for creating the musical setting for a stage production entitled Poste Restante. The resulting LP of that name involved the whole band, plus others; although they didn't write all the material, Minny Pops perform everything except some vocals (mostly declaimed, not sung). Out of context, and entirely in Dutch, whatever meaning it has is limited to the vaguely unified feel and the knowledge that it's ostensibly a drama about travel. [jg]

MINOR THREAT

Minor Threat EP (Dischord) 1981

In My Eyes EP (Dischord) 1981

Out of Step (Dischord) 1983

Minor Threat (Dischord) 1984

Complete [CD] (Dischord) 1988 •

EMBRACE

Embrace (Dischord) 1987

TEEN IDLES

Minor Disturbance EP (Dischord) 1981

VARIOUS ARTISTS

Four Old 7"s on a 12" (Dischord) 1985

As the seminal hardcore band of our nation's capital, Minor Threat played fast, impassioned music that defined the genre while never succumbing to its shortcomings. The quartet had both a sense of melody and a sense of purpose. "Straight Edge" was among the first hardcore songs to call for abstinence from drugs and booze, and the band's self-titled theme song acknowledged both the aspirations and realities of political punk rock.

The posthumous Minor Threat compiles the band's two initial 7-inch EPs, released on the group's own label. The twelve selections effectively define the city's hardcore sound, with a powerhouse adrenalized rush and Ian MacKaye's explosive and articulate vocals. "Filler," "I Don't Wanna Hear It" and "Minor Threat" are some of the classics of the genre; if you haven't heard them, you have never—repeat, never—heard hardcore. One of the most intense, ungodly-force-of-technology records ever launched.

Out of Step, the group's only true LP, shows Minor Threat coming out of adolescence and slowing down to merely quick tempos where they have more room to move. If less a direct rush than the early EPs, the trade-off is a good one: dynamics and crashing hooks come to the fore, replacing the old burn with a punk musicianship up there with only the Ruts (a prime influence) for crack precision. Out of Step is a whale of an LP, one that made their ensuing demise (the pressures of being the most revered and hardline message-oriented hardcore band taking its toll) that much more of a tragedy. Not surprisingly, nothing has come close to matching their ability, drive and emotional level since. (Complete compiles the band's entire recorded career into one handy CD. Look no further!)

Sometime after Minor Threat's 1983 breakup, MacKaye joined forces with the three musicians from another recently disbanded DC hardcore band, Faith (ironically, Faith's singer was Alex MacKaye, so he was effectively replacing his younger brother!), to form Embrace. After a brief existence, Embrace also disappeared seemingly without a trace. A 1987 LP of their 1985 recordings was released, making it apparent that the group should have stuck around a bit longer. If not equal to Minor Threat's one-of-a-kind sonic excellence, Embrace are strong and muscular, an effective backdrop for MacKaye's lead vocals. The confrontational lyricist rages through "Money" and "No More Pain" like a hellfire preacher, condemning a corrupt and greedy culture. Overenunciating, shouting, cajoling and screaming at the top of his lungs, this is an impressive performance by a seemingly possessed man, transforming an okay mid-tempo punk LP into a great one.

MacKaye subsequently reunited with Minor Threat drummer Jeff Nelson for one terrific single as Egg Hunt and then formed Fugazi with old Rites of Spring leader Guy Picciotto. (He also records occasionally with Ministry's Al Jourgensen as Pailhead.) Nelson joined up with Senator Flux for a while; bassist-cum-guitarist Brian Baker (ex-Government Issue) spent time in the Meatmen and Dag Nasty and can now be found in the metallic Junkyard.

The Teen Idles were MacKaye and Nelson's original group, prior to Minor Threat. Minor Disturbance, also a 7-inch EP, was the very first Dischord release, and served as a blueprint for the DC hardcore scene. Interestingly, MacKaye doesn't sing lead (he was the bassist and main songwriter) on these seven songs of typical punk-teen ennui and self-determination (plus one inaudible live cut). Structurally, the music is basic punk on its way to becoming hardcore, dominated by singer Nathan Strejcek's (later of Youth Brigade) youthful blare and MacKaye's catchy bass riffs. The lyrics to "Deadhead" ("Driving that train high on cocaine/The music is really lousy, the fans are a pain/Troubles behind, troubles ahead/The only good deadhead is one that's dead") are as funny today as when the teenaged MacKaye wrote them. Minor Disturbance was later reissued on the Four Old 7"s album with other Dischord EPs by S.O.A., Youth Brigade and Government Issue. [jL/jr/gef]

See also Dag Nasty, Fugazi, Government Issue, Meatmen, Misfits, Pailhead.

MINUTEMEN

- Paranoid Time EP (SST) 1980 •
- The Punch Line (SST) 1981
- Bean-Spill EP (Thermidor) 1982
- What Makes a Man Start Fires? (SST) 1983
- Buzz or Howl Under the Influence of Heat (SST) 1983
- Double Nickels on the Dime (SST) 1984 •
- The Politics of Time (New Alliance) 1984
- Tour-Spiel EP (Reflex) 1985
- ... Just a Minute Men (Virgin Vinyl) 1985
- My First Bells 1980-1983 [tape] (SST) 1985
- Project: Mersh EP (SST) 1985
- 3-Way Tie (for Last) (SST) 1985 •
- Ballot Result (SST) 1987 •
- Post-Mersh, Vol. 1 [CD] (SST) 1987 •
- Post-Mersh, Vol. 2 [CD] (SST) 1987 •
- Post-Mersh, Vol. 3 [CD] (SST) 1989 •

MINUTEFLAG

MinuteFlag EP (SST) 1986

San Pedro, California's greatest musical export clearly understood the concept of brevity. The trio's albums and EPs pack an astonishing number of songs, most of which (on the early releases, at least) clock in at under a minute. In that brief time, they took apart rock, jazz and funk and put the pieces back together in a jagged collage. Although the Minutemen refused to write verses and choruses, based on their belief that rock 'n' roll as we know it is a lethargic dinosaur, each of their songs is a satisfying composition.

The Minutemen saga began in 1980 as a four-piece called the Reactionaries that played regular-length songs. Later that year, they slimmed down (numerically speaking) and adopted their new name and radical modus operandi. They stuck to that twisted idea of dada with a groove until the end, and with one out-of-chronology exception, their records kept getting more ambitious and better.

The 7-inch Paranoid Time EP offers dogmatic politics redeemed by idiosyncratic Wire-type songs. Kicked along by drummer George Hurley, each abbreviated blurt of rhythm serves as a backdrop for the rants of bassist Mike Watt and guitarist D. Boon. The best is the apocalyptic "Paranoid Chant," in which Boon screams, "I don't even worry about crime anymore."

The Punch Line is more complex, musically and lyrically. The band loosens up with more funk, off-kilter rhythms and enigmatic twists in which songs seem to fall apart but don't quite. As proof of the musicians' seriousness, the 12-inch 45 includes an insert entitled Fundamentals of Design, which waxes philosophic about "The Order of Harmony," "The Order of Balance" and "The Order of Rhythm." Actually, the record is evidence enough, as it reveals three imaginative musicians capable of playing music that holds together without a center. A subsequent 7-inch, Bean-Spill, contains five songs (total running time: six minutes) and a vulgar genitalia drawing by Raymond Pettibone on the label, over the legend "(We need the money)."

What Makes a Man Start Fires? throws jazz and blues elements into the blender, and features the Minutemen's first semi-dramatic song ending—that is, the first on which they do something other than just stop playing. The songs tend towards near-epic length—only one of eighteen is under a minute. On this album, the Minutemen show their instrumental depth, shifting effortlessly from one fragmentary clash of styles to another. On the trio's most poetic record, the eight-song Buzz or Howl, they don't try to make the pieces add up, crafting the loosest improvisations over which Boon and (on one song) Watt scream their lyrics.

Double Nickels on the Dime slaps 45 numbers onto four sides of vinyl. The unifying concept is driving in a car, but the record is really held together by the band's unflagging commitment to idiosyncrasy. The quirky songs are about Michael Jackson, Minutemen history, WW III and virtually everything else under the sun. Each is different and somehow good. With this much room to work, the Minutemen don't attempt to bludgeon listeners with lyrics, and deliver terse gems like "If we heard mortar shells we'd cuss more in our songs and cut down the guitar solos."

As if their abundant output left unjustifiable gaps, the trio issued The Politics of Time, a collection of unused tracks that vary widely in recording and performance quality. The 7-inch Tour-Spiel—drawn from a live-in-the-studio performance done for a Tucson radio broadcast—offers the trio's takes on Van Halen ("Ain't Talkin' 'Bout Love"), Blue Öyster Cult ("The Red & the Black"), Creedence ("Green River") and the Meat Puppets ("Lost"). Like all of the group's records no matter what shape they take, this sounds above all like the Minutemen. (In a weird footnote, the Arizona DJ who organized the 1984 session took umbrage at its appearance on Tour-Spiel and released the entire broadcast as Just a Minute Men, defending his dubious action in the album's self-righteous liner notes.)

My First Bells is a retrospective cassette: 62 cuts, including the group's first two albums and EPs, plus singles and compilation contributions from the same era. Essential.

Project: Mersh (the title is a sardonic reference to commercialism—"I got it! We'll have them write hit songs," says Boon's cover painting) consists of six lengthy tracks, including Watt's autobiographical "Tour-Spiel" as well as the endlessly looped, psychedelized "More Spiel" and a cover of Steppenwolf's "Hey Lawdy Mama." Half employ guest trumpet; one even has synth. Typically brilliant and intelligent? Yes. Better presented and more accessible? Somewhat. A compromise of any sort? Hardly. A fine record.

Taking time out from both bands' busy schedules, the Minutemen and Black Flag recorded a one-day-studio-party EP in March 1985 under the spliced name of Minuteflag. In an odd tontune, the participants reportedly agreed not to issue the results until at least one of the bands had broken up. They could have waited: the four rambling song-jams are long on bonhomie but short on cohesion. Minuteflag is an ill-advised outing that was undoubtedly fun to record but unwise to release.

3-Way Tie (for Last) ironically appeared the same week (in December 1985) Boon's tragic death in an Arizona car crash ended the Minutemen. Indicating now-moot artistic independence or divergence, the sides are marked "D." and "Mike." Boon's collection combines three of his tunes (including the gripping Vietnam veteran tribute, "The Price of Paradise," and a Nicaragua protest, "The Big Stick") with straight readings of the Meat Puppets' "Lost" (again) and John Fogerty's "Have You Ever Seen the Rain," plus a composition by Watt and then-Black Flag bassist Kira. Watt's more diverse ten-track side has two by Boon, a spoken word piece named "Spoken Word Piece," four more co-written with Kira, Roky Erickson's "Bermuda" and another killer take on the Cult's "The Red & the Black."

The Minutemen had included a mail-in ballot with 3-Way Tie, offering fans the opportunity to select their favorite songs for inclusion on a planned triple-live set. The idea was to do all of the selections in concert for the mooted album, provisionally titled Three Dudes, Six Sides, Half Studio, Half Live. Despite Boon's death, the votes were tabulated and the Ballot Result was assembled from extant material and released anyway. Drawing on various radio broadcasts, audience and board performance tapes, studio outtakes and rehearsals (with three LP tracks serving as needed ringers), the two discs bulge with almost three dozen representations of the group's best-loved material. The audio quality varies, but the trio's vitality and invention never waver. A fine epilogue.

With the exception of Double Nickels and the unauthorized live album, the three Post-Mersh CDs contain the Minutemen's entire oeuvre up through Project Mersh. Vol. 1 combines The Punch Line and What Makes a Man Start Fires. The second volume pairs Buzz or Howl and Project Mersh. Collecting the rest, Vol. 3 has Paranoid Time, 1981's three-song "Joy" single, Bean-Spill, The Politics of Time and Tour-Spiel.

Following Boon's death, Watt and Hurley formed FIREHOSE with singer/guitarist Ed Crawford, a Minutemen fan who badgered them into starting a new group. [j/i]

See also Dos, FIREHOSE, Saccharine Trust.

MIRACLE LEGION

A Simple Thing [tape] (Incas) 1984
The Backyard EP (Incas) 1984 (Rough Trade) 1987
Surprise Surprise Surprise (Rough Trade) 1987
Glad (Rough Trade) 1988
Me and Mr. Ray (Rough Trade) 1989 •

Criticized for their uncanny resemblance to R.E.M., Connecticut's Miracle Legion cannot be so easily dismissed as rote imitators. There's no denying the obvious similarities (vocals and guitar); thanks to musical creativity, however, Miracle Legion manages to stake out their own territory.

Savvy production techniques and aggressive playing make The Backyard a landmark. Mark Mulcahy's whining vocals tend to grate after a few listens, but not enough to sully the sheer brilliance of the title track, "Stephen Are You There," "Closer to the Wall" and “Butterflies” Surprise Surprise Surprise lacks the honest abandon of The Backyard, an essential ingredient to Miracle Legion’s appeal. In spite of improved musicianship and vocals, it’s a disappointment.

The new studio work on Glad (a side of the LP was recorded live in New York with a one-song guest appearance by the entirety of Pere Ubu!) is a welcome relief from the restraint of Surprise. The three songs literally bristle with renewed heartfelt emotion, and the formerly enigmatic lyrics now conjure up a vast array of crystalline images on “A Heart Disease Called Love” and “Hey, Lucky.”

Down to a duo, Miracle Legion returned with the bittersweet Me and Mr. Ray. By now Mulcahy and guitarist Ray Neal have honed their music into a warm, deep folk-rock. Like the late Byrds, it’s akin to old-time acoustic country in spirit more than sound. There’s nothing ironic or post-modern or even rocking here, just sad, lovely melodies and words that seem to carry the weight of humanity. Even the upbeat love songs (“You’re the One Lee” and “Even Better”) are tinged with doubt and loss. This is an album that grows on the listener slowly and nourishes the soul. [ag/ws]

MIRACLE ROOM

Miracle Room [tape] (Miracle Room) 1988

Miracle Room EP (Bar/None-Restless) 1990

Jazzy, rocky improv groups with homemade instruments were a dime a dozen in New York in 1988, but Miracle Room muscled most of the others aside with refreshing energy, wit, melody and try-anything attitude. The group’s cassette debut, recorded live in both its birthplace (Austin) and adopted home (New York) was quite a revelation, as guitarist Stephen Marsh chants or bullhorns funny, enigmatic lyrics over Hendrix feedback squalls and rhythms that can only be described as tribal. (One delay-soaked track from the tape, “Open Heart,” later appeared on the first Live at the Knitting Factory compilation.)

The trio (later a quartet) puts on a live show that is nearly as entertaining visually as sonically. They take circular saws to large metal appliances and pound the hell out of 55-gallon drums, like a jollier, funkier Einstürzende Neubauten loose in Pee-wee’s Playhouse. Miracle Room’s first studio attempt, a four-track 12-inch, suffers a bit from strained seriousness, but the band’s way with a clanging groove is intact on “These Are My Friends.” Meanwhile, the eerie “Untitled” sounds like Music for Films played backwards in a wind-tunnel with several species of small furry animals. [ws]

MIRACLE WORKERS

Miracle Workers EP (Moxie) 1983

1000 Micrograms of the Miracle Workers EP (Sounds Interesting) 1984

Inside Out (Vox) 1985

Live at the Forum (Ger. Glitterhouse) 1988

Overdose (Ger. Love’s Simple Dreams) 1988 •

Primary Domain (Ger. Glitterhouse) 1989

Moxie’s Revenge (Get Hip) 1990 •

Roll Out the Red Carpet (Triple X) 1991 •

As the Pacific Northwest entry in garage-rock’s second coming, Portland, Oregon’s Miracle Workers looked no further than their own backyard for initial inspiration. Rather than the more psychedelic meanderings of their peers, the original five-piece lineup stomped and snarled through layers of fuzz much like local deities the Sonics and the Wailers. Both of the Miracle Workers’ early EPs boast a heartening percentage of originals—not a majority, mind you, but they were playing to an audience that considered the use of strings manufactured after ’66 heretical—that easily outstrip the group’s covers in both songwriting and energy. Tracks from each (as well as a slew of previously unreleased treasures) are collected on Moxie’s Revenge.

A little more reserved on its 1985 full-length bow, the quintet still scores big, keeping the songs short, the guitars distorted and Gerry Mohr’s snotty adolescent blurt mixed high. Voxx supremo Greg Shaw’s production, while not state-of-the-art (even by these standards) is more sympathetic than their earlier, lower-budget efforts.

As the ’80s drew to a close, the Miracle Workers stepped outside their garage (minus a member), checked their watches not once but twice and stepped firmly forward . . . into the ’70s. Overdose (recorded in Berlin, though the band is now based in LA) is just that: a sensory overload of attitude-laden rock somewhere between early Flamin Groovies (whose “Teenage Head” gets a speedy snarl-through) and the MCS (who are no doubt curious as to why no one asked permission to borrow “Kick Out the Jams” for the feral “Rock’n’Roll Revolution in the Streets Part 2”). Guitarist Matt Rogers’ judicious use of feedback augments the new material much more effectively; Mohr’s grown some as well. Live at the Forum scrapes away what little veneer of subtlety finds its way into the group’s studio work; the Iggy/Stooges’ atmosphere is so overpowering you can practically smell the peanut butter! A little time-warped, perhaps, but just plain warped enough to be worth hearing. [dss]

MISFITS

Bullet EP (Plan 9) 1978

Beware EP (nr/Cherry Red) 1979

Walk Among Us (Ruby) 1982 + 1988 •

Evilive EP (Plan 9) 1982

Earth A.D./Wolfsblood (Plan 9) 1983

Earth A.D./Die Die My Darling [tape] (Plan 9) 1984

Legacy of Brutality (Plan 9-Caroline) 1985 •

Misfits (Plan 9-Caroline) 1986 •

Evilive (Plan 9-Caroline) 1987

SAMHAIN

Initium (Plan 9) 1984 (Plan 9-Caroline) 1986 •

Unholy Passion EP (Plan 9) 1985 (Plan 9-Caroline) 1986 •

November-Coming-Fire (Plan 9-Caroline) 1986 •

Final Descent (Plan 9-Caroline) 1990 •

KRYST THE CONQUEROR

Deliver Us from Evil EP (Cyclopean) 1989 •

Although considered part of the hardcore scene, New Jersey’s Misfits date back to the first CBGB and London punk surge. Drawing their sound from the Ramones and the Damned, and their look from horror movies and Kiss, the Misfits began by releasing a string of 7-inches on their Plan 9 label. Two of these—the superb Bullet EP and the subsequent “Horror Business” single—are compiled on the English Beware EP (along with the legendary melodic outtake “Last Caress”) and epitomize what made the Misfits great: a combination of hooky power-chording, weird horrific lyrics and singer Glenn Danzig’s distinctive basso roar. (For a musical genre in which tone and articulation don’t count for much, Danzig’s power and control are awesome.)

After years as a strictly underground force, the Misfits seized on hardcore and grafted horror-punk onto slam-thrash. As a result, Walk Among Us practically wallows in psychotronic shock imagery, imbuing many of the band’s anthems—including “Astro Zombies,” “Skulls,” “Vampira” and “Mommy, Can I Go Out and Kill Tonight?”—with a new-found intensity and larger-than-life touch of evil. Years of solid songwriting effort paid off, making this classic album as strong as it is consistent. (As a posthumous Misfits cult grew to gigantic proportions during the later half of the decade, goaded by the avid endorsement of bands like Metallica, Walk Among Us became one of punk’s most feverishly sought-after albums.)

The Evilive 7-inch EP (later expanded and reissued as a full-length album) catches the Misfits on rare good 1981 nights in New York and San Francisco, playing material drawn mostly from Walk Among Us. One cut includes guest vocals by Henry Rollins.

Earth A.D./Wolfsblood is an unfortunate step in the wrong direction—a misguided attempt to conform to hardcore convention. California’s legendary Spot produced; while his monochromatic technique served other groups well, it negated many of the Misfits’ strengths. Danzig’s voice is downplayed, and the faster, stuffer beat robs the songs of their innate tunefulness. Good tracks like “Blood Feast” and “Green Hell” aside (the latter, along with “Last Caress,” was covered by Metallica on Garage Days Re-Visited), Earth A.D. remains a disappointing finale. (A later German edition adds the terrific “Die Die My Darling”, an American cassette issue appends that single and its two B-sides.)

Legacy of Brutality is a posthumous collection of outtakes and alternate versions, a good chunk of them from the ’78 session that produced Bullet. It also contains a band take on “Who Killed Marilyn,” Danzig’s 1981 solo debut. Though uneven at points, Legacy does preserve some of the Misfits’ finest moments, such as “Angelfuck” and “She.” Originally CD-only, then reissued on vinyl and cassette, Misfits is a 20-cut retrospective that includes remixes, alternate takes and one jarring edit that cuts out the second half of “Teenagers from Mars”/“Children in Heat.”

After the Misfits ended, Danzig wasted no time in forming Samhain with drummer-turned-bassist Eerie Von. Initium took a few smart steps back to the singer’s punk roots, mixing in some metal and gloom rock influences and using far more mature and disturbing horror lyrics. This wholly enjoyable LP offers a memorable selection of material, including the band’s invigorating signature tune (“Samhain”), a choppy arrangement of “Horror Business” (every Samhain release featured an updated “Fits tune) and “Archangel” (originally written for the Damned’s Dave Vanian). As the residue of an early lineup, Lyle Preslar (ex-Minor Threat) adds some sparse guitar, but the LP is basically Danzig’s affair.

The Unholy Passion EP, a token gothic record, would have succeeded if not for the abysmal production. Still, the dark urgency of the pulsing title track, “Moribund” and “The Hungry End”—laced with new guitarist Pete “Damien” Marshall’s droning leads—is hard to resist. (Initium’s CD and tape release include a remix of Unholy Passion’s five tracks and the previously unreleased “Misery Tomb.”)

The transitional November-Come-Fire has some of Samhain’s most intriguingly arranged songs, most notably the atmospheric ballad “To Walk the Night.” The heavier, more metallic music (exemplified by the crunching “Mother of Mercy”) and lyrical development (the horror angle is out, pagan religion is in) helped pave Samhain’s evolution into Danzig. Final Descent ties up the loose ends from this period, combining a splendid five-song session from ’87 with Danzig guitarist John Christ (the hypnotic, rolling “Lords of the Left Hand” is the highlight of these previously unreleased cuts) and what sounds like the same set of Unholy Passion remixes to reach album length.

In an attempt to exploit their cult fame among the thrash generation, surnameless ex-Misfit brothers Jerry (bass) and Doyle (guitar), always the band’s live alb-tross, formed a dopey metal act, Kryst the Conqueror. On Deliver Us from Evil, a self-released five-song EP, the brothers are aided by an anonymous singer and Skid Row guitarist Dave Sabo. [mp/dgs/gf]

See also Danzig, Undead.

MISSING FOUNDATION

Missing Foundation (Purge/Sound League) 1987

(Restless) 1990 ●

1933 (Purge/Sound League) 1988 (Restless) 1990 ●

Demise (Humanity) 1989 (Restless) 1990 ●

Ignore the White Culture (Restless) 1990 †

Notorious for a highly visible graffiti campaign (the upturned martini glass logo, accompanied by cryptic sloganeering), violently destructive confrontational live appearances and a television newscaster who accused them of fomenting a 1988 riot in Tompkins Square Park, New York’s mysterious Missing Foundation has also made records that preach what the anarchist band practices.

Cacophonous and incoherent, Missing Foundation has near-random bits of guitar and bass amid the garbage din of junkyard thrashing. Quite unlike the industrial orchestrations of early Test Dept., Missing Foundation doesn’t whack at things in any discernible pattern. They simply pound whatever’s handy to create chunks of screaming noise-vérité, capture some of it on tape and slap on a title. (In that department, at least, they’re pretty traditional.)

There’s a shred more structure to the tracks on 1933, but the LP still amounts to the kind of sonic brutality sentient people try to avoid, rather than consume. (I mean, honestly, when was the last time you turned off the stereo and opened your window so you could enjoy the sound of jack hammers and garbage trucks more clearly?) Demise opens with the chaotic sounds of a riot in progress and includes relative restraint (hissed, rather than shrieked, vocals; room between the clangs), live concert recordings and, for the first time, a comprehensible bit of prose ("Surround the White House!" in "Pistol Archive").

Ignore the White Culture makes some minor accommodations with the real world, printing the harsh lyrics (the use of any lyrics at all is a big step here) and reducing the magnitude and the randomness of the din to a sort of atmospheric accompaniment for Peter Dinklage's apocalyptic pronouncements. A few tracks actually resemble music, but just barely. [i]

MISSING PERSONS

Missing Persons EP (Capitol) 1982
Spring Session M (Capitol) 1982
Rhyme & Reason (Capitol) 1984
Color in Your Life (Capitol) 1986
The Best of Missing Persons (Capitol) 1987 •

DALE

Riot in English (Paisley Park) 1988 •

Notwithstanding singer Dale Bozzio's outrageous auto-sexploitation and the overall commercial-record-industry-hype packaging that permeated the group, Missing Persons were one positive manifestation of the '80s accommodation between new and old in rock. Designed to shift product but retaining high musical standards and an adventurous outlook, Missing Persons fell between genres, simultaneously offending and intriguing intelligent sensibilities.

Originally built on the core of Bozzio, her then husband—drummer/keyboardist Terry (once a Zappa employee and a member of would-be supergroup U.K.)—plus ex-Zappa guitarist Warren Cuccurullo, Missing Persons changed their name from U.S. Drag and were given a boost by producer Ken Scott who recorded and released their debut EP; it became a hit when picked up by Capitol. In the latter form, it contained both "Words" and "Destination Unknown," idiosyncratic songs that also turned up on the first LP.

Spring Session M (an anagram of the band's name) is slick, clever modern rock, using synthesizers and guitars in a hybrid style that came to be very familiar in the '80s. What sets Missing Persons apart from other state-of-the-arters, however, is Bozzio's non-clichéd singing—tough/smart with a bemused, occasionally philosophical outlook, and a characteristic hiccup hitch that recalls Lene Lovich's early vocal gymnastics. Especially impressive for a debut album, Bozzio's voice exudes confidence to spare and enough personality to invest the band's novel tunes with an appropriate attitude as required.

Continue to suspend your disbelief for a few lines more: although it takes a while to become accustomed, Rhyme & Reason is an equally fine record. The lyrics of "Give," in what weirdly became a minor pop music trend, amount to an ethical exhortation to selflessness, attached to dynamic rock backing. Elsewhere, "Right Now" and "Surrender Your Heart" address romance with a little sensitivity, attractive melodies and sophisticated, full-blooded instrumentation. Bozzio sings with less affectation but consistent skill and subtlety. At its worst, the album offers appealing vacuity. Ignore the trappings and enjoy the music.

Bernard Edwards produced Color in Your Life, pumping up the volume with horns and funk rhythms on the Motown-based "Flash of Love" and "I Can't Think About Dancin'." one of the few rock songs ever to use the word "pretentious." Elsewhere, the dancebeat of "Boy I Say to You" sells this once-provocative band extremely short. While the inviting title track could fit on any of the band's albums, the cloying keyboards and messy arrangements here compete with Bozzio's vocals to no one's benefit. The misconceived stylistic overhaul proved a total disaster; despite a couple of worthwhile tunes, this LP is a must to avoid.

With that, Missing Persons split up, something Dale and Terry had already done. Capitol issued a comprehensive retrospective, Cuccurullo joined Duran Duran and Dale signed on the dotted line with Prince's label. Her first solo record is a joint project with producer Robert Brookins, who wrote most of the songs and played drums and keyboards on a lot of them. Although Prince's instrumental sound permeates the LP, it is nowhere so evident as on his contribution, "So Strong." The commercial dance music on Riot in English plays up the flexibility of Dale's voice, but the pre-fab cookie-cutter material and arrangements come as quite a disappointment after the stylistic invention of her former group.

Since Missing Persons, bassist/keyboardist Patrick O'Hearn (another Zappa alumnus and member of the 1980 Group 87 with Mark Isham and Terry Bozzio) has been making nicely textured instrumental albums for Private Music. [i]

See also Duran Duran.

MISSION (UK)

Gods Own Medicine (Mercury) 1986 •
The First Chapter (Mercury) 1987 •
Children (Mercury) 1988 •
Beyond the Pale EP (nr/Mercury) 1988 •
Carved in Sand (Mercury) 1990 •
Grains of Sand (Mercury) 1990 •

Leeds natives Wayne Hussey (guitar, vox) and Craig Adams (bass) left the gothic Sisters of Mercy (Hussey had also been in Dead or Alive) to form their own group, the Mission. (The American "UK" was appended because a Philadelphia R&B band was already using the name.) Joined by ex-Red Lorry Yellow Lorry drummer Mick Brown and a guitarist drafted from Artery, the group planted one foot in the British neo-hippie camp and another in the land of pompous goth-metal stupidity.

The dull and insipid guitar/keyboard/string bombast of Gods Own Medicine proceeds from a horrible amalgam of Led Zeppelin, Yes and Echo & the Bunnymen. Several tracks were huge British hits, but listening to the LP fails to reveal any exceptional qualities "Garden of Delight" or "Stay with Me" might have that would explain their popularity. Hussey's ponderous and toneless intonation ruins the songs' scant intrinsic merit; thick-sounding production (by Tim Palmer and the band) finishes the job. The CD has two extra cuts.

As if anyone cared, an odds-and-ends collection was issued to bring listeners up to date with non-LP items. The First Chapter, which is actually less of an audio trial than Gods Own Medicine, presents the Mission's debut 45, "Serpents Kiss," as well as an extended remix of "Garden of Delight" and unwarranted covers—"Tomorrow Never Knows" (Beatles), "Wishing Well” (Free), “Dancing Barefoot” (Patti Smith) and “Like a Hurricane” (Neil Young)—that only point up the band’s songwriting incapacity. Despite the borrowed title, “Over the Hills and Far Away” is an original.

John Paul Jones evidently didn’t hold that bit of pilferage against the Mission: he produced the semi-listenable Children. Hussey’s pseudo-poetic lyrics are pure middle-brow malarkey and his singing is still a problem, but the measured music benefits from the organization and air of Jones’ firm dynamic grip, economically applied guitar lines and occasionally neat fripperies, like the sitar on “Beyond the Pale.” Although not recommended, not altogether horrible. The Beyond the Pale EP surrounds Children’s lead-off song with “Love Me to Death” from Gods Own Medicine and a couple of non-LP tracks.

With Led Zep out of the Mission’s system, the group reenlisted Tim Palmer to produce Carved in Sand, which doesn’t sound very different from its predecessor. Hussey’s melodramatic voice, precious/dumb lyrics—although the portrait of child abuse in “Amelia” is an exception, “Grapes of Wrath” piles on the heartland clichés and the iteration of beliefs in “Lovely” merely inverts John Lennon’s “God”—and the band’s unimaginative music (another use of sitar?) weigh down the meandering, incoherent effort. The one flash of life—a striking guitar riff that opens “Hungry as the Hunter”—is quickly buried in a swirling sea of pompous noise.

Other than “Hands Across the Ocean,” a fine new track (gulp—did I say that?) produced by Andy Partridge of XTC, Grains of Sand consists of outtakes, covers, B-sides and a remix from Carved in Sand. As big a thrill as this release may be to Missionaries, drivel like “Mercenary” could easily have remained in the can. And why record a lovely song like the Kinks’ “Mr. Pleasant” if you’re only going to sound obnoxiously condescending about it? [i]

See also Dead or Alive, Sisters of Mercy.

MISSION OF BURMA

Signals, Calls, and Marches EP (Ace of Hearts) 1981

VS. (Ace of Hearts) 1982

The Horrible Truth About Burma (Ace of Hearts) 1985

Mission of Burma EP (Taangl) 1987 •

Forget (Taangl) 1987 •

Mission of Burma [CD] (Rykodisc) 1988 •

Lei There Be Burma (Hol. Taangl-Emergo) 1990 •

During its existence, Boston’s Mission of Burma was one of the most important American bands surviving outside the major-label record industry. Their thrilling and challenging vocal rock is both intellectually and emotionally engaging. Staking out bracing post-pop guitar turf with hard edges and sharp corners, Burma’s records never leave melody or structure behind; they just meander around it sometimes.

The debut EP has two sides (musically speaking): aggressive/strident in some spots, inviting/attractive elsewhere. Standing out among the six tracks is one tremendous song, “That’s When I Reach for My Revolver,” as well as a powerful but pretty instrumental, “All World Cowboy Romance.”

VS. is more unremittingly intense, a loud, vibrant assault that never becomes unpleasant. While the lineup

(guitar, bass, drums, tape manipulation) doesn’t inherently stake out any original stylistic ground, Burma never proffers clichés; every track has individual character. On first listen, these records sound very British; on further investigation, they’re all American

Because of hearing problems caused by the astonishingly loud band, guitarist Roger Miller left Burma, turned to piano and devoted himself to Birdsongs of the Mesozoic, taking time out to make solo records as well. Tapeman Martin Swope joined him in Birdsongs. Drummer Peter Prescott formed Volcano Suns who, as the pseudonymous Din, have also backed Dredd Foole on two albums.

On record, at least, the Mission of Burma saga was far from over. The posthumous Horrible Truth compiles live performances from four US cities on the band’s final (1983) tour. Besides a merciless rendition of the Stooges’ “1970” and nine dynamic minutes of Pere Ubu’s “Heart of Darkness,” the album offers eight originals in several stylistic veins. Some of the tracks are intense and captivating, while others are sloppy, lacking the focused punch of their best work.

The all-fun Mission of Burma EP consists of five loud studio cuts, produced by either Lou Giordano or Peter Dayton between ’79 and ’82. (Two songs overlap the live LP.) “Peking Spring” is an obsessive dark mantra with cool choral chanting; the title track builds a powerful drone over a bewildering drum pattern; “Dumbbells,” although not much of a song, has an amazing overdriven guitar sound. (The cassette and CD both contain five bonus cuts.)

Forget is an unannotated (but the inclusion of 1980’s “Forget” suggests the vintage) album of previously unreleased songs, given basic studio treatment (rehearsals?). Obviously not the band’s premier material nor ideal recording circumstances, the loud and muscular songs seem undeveloped, samey. The most exciting moments are breaks in which Miller and Swope work their rowdy magic. Fans won’t be disappointed—these are by no means trivial scraps—but the preceding EP seems to have contained the band’s best outtakes.

The 80-minute-plus CD-only compilation entitled Mission of Burma consists of Signals, Calls, and Marches and VS. in their entirety, plus two tracks from Horrible Truth, two single sides (“Academy Fight Song” and “OK/No Way”) and two previously unreleased items. For another listen to the band’s ephemera, the two-record Lei There Be Burma reissues Forget and the eponymous Taang! EP in its expanded form, adding alternate (but not very different) takes of “This Is Not a Photograph” from the 1981 EP and “Einstein’s Day” from VS. [i]

See also Birdsongs of the Mesozoic, Dredd Foole and the Din, Roger Miller, Space Negros, Volcano Suns.

MR. PARTRIDGE

See XTC.

MR. T EXPERIENCE

Everybody’s Entitled to Their Own Opinion (Disorder) 1986

Night Shift at the Thrill Factory (Rough Trade) 1988

Big Black Bugs Bleed Blue Blood (Rough Trade) 1989
Making Things with Light (Lookout!) 1990

On the face of things, little has changed for the Mr. T Experience over the years. They switched bass players midway. Otherwise, the two guitars, bass and drums lineup has steadfastly blared punk rock peppered with wit and melody for five solid years of minimal financial reward and maximal rock'n'roll respect. The self-released Everybody's Entitled to Their Own Opinion gained the Berkeley, California band immediate notoriety for its careening take on the Monkees' "Pleasant Valley Sunday" and the singalong cult classics "Danny Partridge" (commemorating Bonaduce's cocaine bust) and "I'm in Love with Paula Pierce" (a lustful ode to the Pandoras' lead sex-slave). Although overlooked in the excitement, the album also contains some terrific songs of pain, anger and confusion ("Sheep," "Disconnection," "Scientific").

Night Shift at the Thrill Factory, produced by Celibate Rifle Kent Steedman, sticks to the same formula, with Herman's Hermits' "No Milk Today" getting the full-on treatment, an over-the-top surf instrumental ("Skatin' Cows"), manic slabs of sarcastic hilarity like "Velveeta" and "What Is Punk?" (a fantasy about the group appearing on Donahue) and an incredible rapid-fire philosophical essay, "The History of the Concept of the Soul."

The seven-song Big Black Bugs Bleed Blue Blood toys ambiguously with the band's Ramones fixation ("End of the Ramones"), pays tribute to Berkeley's all-ages punk palace "Gilman Street" and tears up Sesame Street with "Up and Down" (also covered by Donner Party). The long, touching slice-of-life "Song About a Girl Who Went Shopping" showcases main songwriter Dr. Frank's observant eye (name one other song that details the purchase of a Lurkers single!) and storytelling sense.

Producer Kevin Army (who has recorded all of the band's efforts but Night Shift) deserves credit for the success of Making Things with Light, as it is the most powerful-sounding Mr. T disc yet, with strong material to match. (Amazingly, half of the album was recorded as demos.) Frank and co-conspirator Jon von (guitar, vocals) again celebrate girls—good, bad and sad—somehow working way in thermodynamics, Latin benedictions, sturm und drang and Rachel Sweet's "What's in the Cuckoo Clock." Genius. [sm]

M + M

See Martha and the Muffins.

MOCK TURTLES

Turtle Soup (nr/Imaginary) 1990 (Relativity) 1991 •
87-90 (nr/Imaginary) 1991 •

Having appeared on nearly every Imaginary tribute LP, offering their interpretations of songs by Beefheart, Barrett, Hendrix, the Byrds, Kinks and others, Manchester's otherwise little-known Mock Turtles defy all reasonable expectations on their debut album by performing original material in a semi-consistent style. Not that the quintet isn't entirely derivative of numerous '60s/'70s art-pop icons, but it's reassuring to see them expend a little creative effort for a change. When not indulging in obvious affectations, Turtle Soup is an above-average retro album: polite guitar/keyboards arrangements of nicely melodic tunes sung with attractive softness, all bathed in a light psychedelic glow. The second LP is a compilation of the Mock Turtles' EPs and tributes. [i]

MODERN ENGLISH

Mesh & Lace (nr/4AD) 1981
After the Snow (Sire) 1982 •
Life in the Gladhouse EP (nr/4AD) 1982
Gathering Dust EP (nr/4AD) 1983
Ricochet Days (Sire) 1984
Stop Start (Sire) 1986
Pillow Lips (TVT) 1990 •

Colchester's Modern English (originally formed as the Lepers) undertook a drastic change of direction after its debut, an oppressively pretentious load of monotonous droning and shouting by a precious art band. After the Snow, on the other hand, is a flawed but rewarding batch of hard-edged, melodic dance songs, a style to which the group subsequently adhered. Instead of the muddy production that favored only the drummer on Mesh & Lace, the second record has both sparkling sound and overtly normal musical intentions. If nothing else on After the Snow is as striking as the wonderful "I Melt with You," it's still a fine album. (Besides the After the Snow track for which it's titled, the four-song Life in the Gladhouse 12-inch contains three non-LP songs.)

Ricochet Days, an attempt to reconcile the band's abiding commitment to free artistic expression with the lure of growing American stardom, is rather equivocal, offering several finely wrought slices of catchiness ("Hands Across the Sea," "Rainbow's End") as well as slightly more obscure efforts. Greater intricacy nicely tints all the material; pristine production by longstanding collaborator Hugh Jones adds to their appeal. Still, Modern English remains precariously perched on a fence between making a musical statement and aiming for commercial easy street. That decision can't be postponed indefinitely.

With the release of Stop Start, it's obvious which way Modern English is leaning. It may be a bit early to write them off as boring has-been sell-outs, but they're not headed anywhere particularly challenging. Bad sign: the refrain of "Ink and Paper," co-written by erstwhile Rubinoos (!) Tommy Dunbar, is too reminiscent of "Born to Run" to be a coincidence. With nowhere left to turn, the group sat out the remainder of the decade.

An inferior new version of "I Melt with You" is the red radio carpet on which Pillow Lips returns Modern English (three-fourths of the Stop Start lineup) to action—as if anyone had noticed their absence. The diverse record contains some easy-to-like bounce-pop ("Beauty," "Care About You") but other tracks either drift along listlessly (like the enervated title tune) or sag under clichéd lyrics ("Life's Rich Tapestry"—now there's a novel idea) and equally unimaginative melodies.

The five non-LP tracks from Modern English's pre-pop era ('80-'81) gathered on the 12-inch Gathering Dust are atmospheric, dense, aggressive and abrasive.

See also This Mortal Coil. [i]

MODERN LOVERS

See Jonaihan Richman and the Modern Lovers.

MOFUNGO

Elementary Particles EP (Living Legends) 1980
End of the World [tape] (Mofungo) 1982
Out of Line (Zoar) 1983
Frederick Douglass (Coyote-Twin/Tone) 1985
Messenger Dogs of the Gods (Lost-Twin/Tone) 1986
End of the World, Part 2 (Lost-Twin/Tone) 1987
Bugged (SST) 1988 •
Work (SST) 1989 •

Mofungo's frayed vocals, twitchy rhythms and snarling saxes are an acquired taste but, on Out of Line, the quartet—formed from the ashes of New York no wavers Blinding Headache—does an excellent job of preventing discordance from descending to chaos. The urgent attack of "Wage Slave," "FBI Informer (He Sold His Soul)" and others never lacks the credibility that eludes many fancier bands. Hard on the nerves, though.

Frederick Douglass furthers Mofungo's drive into annoyingly random sounds and pointedly political lyrics. Willie Klein's guitars and producer Elliott Sharp's occasional sax contributions wander off in the most haphazard directions; the rhythm section isn't exactly session-level tight, but at least bassist Robert Sietsema and alternating drummers Phil Dray and Chris Nelson keep a semblance of the beat going between them. Unlistenable.

Dray's departure (and vocalist Heather Drake's temporary arrival) prior to Messenger Dogs of the Gods was accompanied, evidently, by a total sonic rethink, leaving Mofungo a rhythmically loaded, occasionally jagged, folk-rock group. Sharp, now a full bandmember, still blows wall-rattling sax and triples on guitar and keyboards. Palatable, even pretty in spots, the album includes such American classics as "Big Rock Candy Mountain" and Woody Guthrie's "Deportee" alongside original instrumentals and topical songs like "Johnny Didn't Come Marching Home," "The Typist's Plea" and "George Washington Carver/Sojourner Truth." Humorous but estimably well intentioned.

While the uncommon blend of folk, jazz and rock on End of the World, Part 2 shows steps in the right direction (Sharp finally seems to be bowing to the chromatic scale here), Mofungo's lyrics are getting so didactic that they require a helpful paragraph of footnotes (about aircraft, a remark made by Baby Doc Duvalier, etc.) on the back cover. The varied and intricate music is a lot better than the wavery sub-Tom Verlaine vocals, but this album is still only for intelligent listeners with the patience to survive the band's unpolished and prickly exterior.

With dated lyrics about Judge Bork and Oliver North, and a Sietsema essay explaining such irrelevancies as the band's fear of aluminum and annoyance (now there's a gutsy political stance) at Cardinal O'Connor, Bugged is still Mofungo's most appealing and accessible record, a tuneful and tight set of real songs built more on collective chord progressions than anarchic instrumental assemblies. Actually, when Sharp wraps his lips around a reed and sets off for the moon at the start of Face 2, the momentary chaos is bracing but welcome amid the pleasant rock and old-time folk surroundings.

Work thankfully omits the monograph, but that's the best thing about this lyrically conceptual collection of labor songs. In a total rejection of Bugged's listener-friendliness, Work returns to unmelodic noise mode with lunging hunks of discontinuity, pointless rhythm shifts, atonal vocals and cacophonous bits of sonic ephemera running roughshod through the tracks. Although covers of Sonny Boy Williamson, Blind Alfred Reed and the Minutemen provide brief oases of musical reason, Work is a chore to avoid. [JY/i]

See also Elliott Sharp, The Scene Is Now.

MOMUS

Circus Maximus (nr/él-Cherry Red) 1986 •
Nicky EP (nr/él-Cherry Red) 1986 •
The Poison Boyfriend (nr/Creation) 1987
Tender Pervert (nr/Creation) 1988 •
Don't Stop the Night (nr/Creation) 1989 •
Monsters of Love—Singles 1985-90 (nr/Creation) 1990 •

On first listen, the early recordings of Briton Nicholas Currie (aka Momus) suggest some sort of unholy alliance between Donovan and Morrissey. Both literate and literary, Currie is an erudite singer/songwriter of striking originality who merges European music-hall tradition with more conventional new-agey folk and synth disco; call it "fop" music. Like Woody Allen, Currie is obsessed with sex and death and, on record, gives these preoccupations clever, deadpan twists.

The cover of Circus Maximus depicts Currie as the Roman soldier St. Sebastian, eight arrows piercing his body. Inside, the majority of songs riff on Biblical themes, with titles like "The Lesson of Sodom (According to Lot)" and "King Solomon's Song and Mine." But far from being Christian contemporary, this is compelling secular pop with enticing narratives, sung by a young man with a remarkably soothing voice. Acoustic guitar predominates, accented by snatches of violin, flute, even harpsichord—all of which serves to make the initially daunting, wordy songs extremely palatable.

The momentum of Circus Maximus was interrupted by Nicky, a three-song Jacques Brel tribute which features the agonizingly maudlin "Don't Leave" and "See a Friend in Tears," a spare-sounding soporific that would seem more at home on a This Mortal Coil album. (This EP is included on the CD of Circus Maximus.)

On The Poison Boyfriend, Currie dispenses with the religious imagery and enlists a backup band, while taking a less studied approach to consistently ace material. His bayonet wit is most apparent on the comically torchy "Sex for the Disabled"; even Barry White's not safe as Currie delivers a horny faux-soul sex rap with everything but the heavy breathing.

Tender Pervert is a more synthetic-sounding disc that relies heavily on sequencers and other gewgaws in addition to the lightly strummed guitars. Luckily, the technology fails to overpower the songs, which are among Currie's sexiest, funniest and most human. In between toying with New Order-like disco and electronic R&B, he constructs a couple of wrenching acoustic ballads (including the great "Right Hand Heart") that would likely turn the most hardened non-romantic into a quivering tower of jello.

Inexplicably including a remake of "Right Hand Heart" that unsuccessfully attempts to turn the song into a Fat Albert-style (!) rap track, the weird Don't Stop the Night is an unsubtle indulgence with wretched Eurodisco production that drains the lifeblood from fairly interesting, sexually explicit songs. Some are spared, however, including "The Guitar Lesson," a peculiar, gauzy bit of jailbait erotica. In all, a surprisingly wrong-headed experiment, much of which would've sounded stale a decade earlier.

Creation wisely followed up this disc with a singles retrospective that's obviously the perfect starting place for those wishing to immerse themselves in Momus' adventurous oeuvre. (The title track of the previous LP appears here in a startlingly different—and infinitely more listenable—form, as "Ballad of the Barrel Organist.") Although impatient listeners may find much of this mellow to the point of catatonia, the elegant songcraft reveals a true poet at work. [db]

MONKS OF DOOM

See Camper Van Beethoven, Ophelias.

MONOCHROME SET

Strange Boutique (DinDisc) 1980 •
 Love Zombies (nr/DinDisc) 1980 •
 Eligible Bachelors (nr/Cherry Red) 1982
 Volume, Contrast, Brilliance (nr/Cherry Red) 1983
 Jacob's Ladder EP (nr/Blanco y Negro) 1985
 The Lost Weekend (nr/Blanco y Negro) 1985
 Fin (nr/él-Cherry Red) 1986
 Colour Transmission [CD] (Virgin) 1988 •
 Westminster Affair (nr/él-Cherry Red) 1988 •
 Dante's Casino (nr/Vinyl Japan) 1990 •

Beginning with a series of arty rock singles, this amusingly suave and sarcastic London quartet fronted by Bid (vocals), Lester Square (guitar) and Andy Warren (bass)—all of whom had played with Adam Ant in obscure early bands—took a sharp sardonic swing towards lightweight pop when they reached album format. Aided by producer Bob Sargeant on keyboards, the Set mixes uncommon source material (polkas, etc.) into cabaret material (à la Village Green Kinks) on Strange Boutique. Fortunately, the highly controlled results are untainted by seriousness; even without much to say, the arch Set says it well.

Love Zombies expands the cabaret stylings while limiting the bizarre material, producing a smoother and more accessible sound. The melodies are stronger, and Bid's vocals are brought up to spotlight lyrics that take sharp, light jabs at emotional traps and social mores.

With a new drummer in the lineup, Eligible Bachelors strips the music down to essential elements—clean, bouncy melodies and gently satirical verse, performed with deceptive facility. Songs like "March of the Eligible Bachelors," "The Jet Set Junta" and "The Great Barrier Riff" typify the band's wittily intelligent verse.

Another lineup revision ensued, making Bid and bassist Warren the only remaining original members. Leading off with the suave pop of "Jacob's Ladder," The Lost Weekend has such a light touch that it threatens to float away. Nostalgic recollections from the '30s,

'50s and '60s color most of the songs, variously suggesting "When I'm 64" crossed with recent XTC and a bikini beach movie soundtrack. Clever and entertaining, although only the second side is truly compelling.

Volume, Contrast, Brilliance compiles early singles and significant album tracks. Fin is a compilation of live recordings dating from 1979 to 1985. Although presented as a supposed French film soundtrack, the strangely compiled Westminster Affair (with four repeats from Volume, Contrast, Brilliance) actually contains half of Eligible Bachelors, a song from The Lost Weekend and some singles; the CD appends four more. Colour Transmission is a straight one-disc repackage of Strange Boutique plus Love Zombies.

Augmented by a keyboard-playing second guitarist, the original core trio reunited around the end of the decade and recorded the all-new Dante's Casino with a guest drummer. Still sounding very much like XTC's upper-class city cousins, the Monochrome Set picks up the reins of attractive pop oddity with ease, filling the LP with such typically airy and clever charmers as "Bella Morte," "Hate Male" and "House of God," which bizarrely borrows a melody from Slade's "Gudby t'Jane" and sets it to an acid-house beat. [sg/i]

MONSOON

Third Eye (nr/Mobile Suit Corp.) 1983 (nr/Great Expectations) 1989 •

SHEILA CHANDRA

Out on My Own (nr/Indipop) 1984 •

Monsoon was a left-field pop concept, but one that worked marvelously. British producer/songwriter/instrumentalists Steve Coe and Martin Smith create (with some outside assistance, mostly on percussion) raga-rock along the lines of George Harrison's Beatle excursions ("Within You, Without You," especially), which Anglo-Indian actress Sheila Chandra delivers in a very lovely voice. The alternately languid and kinetic songs (English lyrics and pop structures, hybrid instrumentation)—"Wings of the Dawn (Prem Kavita)" and "Shakti (The Meaning of Within)" are two highlights—meld intriguing sounds to memorable melodies, making Third Eye a wondrous, if gimmicky, pop achievement.

Following Monsoon's lone album, Chandra continued working with Coe and Smith as a solo artist. While the trio's formula is not all that different, Out on My Own is a bit of a disappointment, upping the songs' pop structures and ambient possibilities, consigning the previously strong Indian character to an accent rather than an element of its style. The title track is quite nice and only the miserable "All You Want Is More" and the recited "Unchanged Malady" fall below pleasant, but the rest is rarely invigorating or memorable.

Chandra released additional albums, all of which were recently made available on CD by a Swedish label. [i]

MOODISTS

Engine Shudder (nr/Red Flame) 1983
 Thirsty's Calling (nr/Red Flame) 1984
 Double Life EP (nr/Red Flame) 1985

DAVE GRANNEY WITH THE CORAL SNAKES

At His Stone Beach EP (nr/Fire) 1988 •

DAVE GRANNEY WITH THE WHITE BUFFALOS

My Life on the Plains (Fire) 1989 •

Codine EP (Fire) 1990 •

Originally from Australia, the Moodists are graduates of the thump 'n' grind school of gothic punk. Combining dense metallic bass and razor-sharp guitar riffs with singer Dave Granney's demonic growl, the band is capable of a most unholy din. Although dark and ominous, the music can at times be surprisingly melodic.

The seven-song Engine Shudder is not the Moodists at their most effective. The tracks are devoid of coherence and slip readily into redundancy. Only "Gone Dead" hints at a promising future, thanks to Granney's layered vocals and Chris Walsh's bass work.

Thirsty's Calling is a remarkable improvement. The addition of a second discordant guitar and judicious production makes this music for nightmares. Setting vocals and guitars further back in the mix, the rhythm section comes into its own on "That's Frankie's Negative" and the standout, "Machine Machine." Grimly primal, this music breathes life into pop's forbidding alter-ego, a region where many dare to tread and few prove this successful.

The Moodists' reign of terror continues on the six-song EP. Bass and voice are up-front this time, giving the tracks full-bodied menace. "Double Life," "Six Dead Birds" and "Can't Lose Her" are wonderfully desperate songs and by far the Moodists' best to date. Following the EP, the band underwent personnel and label changes, returning in '86 with the "Justice and Money Too" single—light, bluesy pop augmented with strings and piano. They may have lost their venom, but not the ability to craft stunning tunes.

Like the band's late work, Granney's post-Moodists output ditches the aggression and concentrates on tasteful, literate songcraft. At His Stone Beach finds Granney (backed by a group that includes ex-Orange Juice/Aztec Camera guitarist Malcolm Ross and Moodists drummer Clare Moore) making the most of his limited but expressive voice on four impressively crafted new tunes.

My Life on the Plains is a resounding fulfillment of the promise hinted at on the preceding EP (the contents of which are included as bonus tracks on the album's CD). The fascination with frontier Americana suggested by the cover motif is reflected in haunting originals like "I'll Set the Scene" and "Robert Ford on the Stage," as well as thoughtful reworkings of songs by Gene Clark, Gram Parsons and Fred Neil. There's also a spooky version of "The Streets of Laredo." With a new combo that reunites the Moodists' rhythm section, the music is supple and textured, providing a perfect vehicle for Granney's increasingly accomplished writing and singing.

The Codine EP is five tracks from a live-in-the-studio Australian radio broadcast—the Buffy Sainte-Marie title tune, the trad folk standard "Jack of Diamonds" and three from Granney's solo records. With My Life on the Plains' pianist traded in for a pedal-steel player, it's a worthy addendum to the album.

[ag/hd]

JOHN MOORE AND THE EXPRESSWAY

Expressway Rising (Polydor) 1989 •

JOHN MOORE

Distortion (nr/Polydor) 1990 (Polydor) 1991 •

Singer/guitarist John Moore briefly drummed (and played guitar) in the Jesus and Mary Chain, but that experience—other than some familiar beats and occasional bolts of noisy guitar—barely informs his inexplicably overlooked solo debut, a dandy one-man-band project. Solid pop songwriting skills (some of his tunes reuse classic chord progressions to good effect) combined with a surprising Billy Idolish voice and charged but simple rock arrangements make for memorable tunes like "Friends," "Back to Stay," the Ramonesy "Good Times" and the shoulda-been-a-hit "Something About You Girl." The album's unfinished demo-like sound is part of its unassuming charm. (The CD and cassette have two bonus tracks, including the loudly countryfied "Live from Death Row.")

With producer Andy Wallace and a batch of sidemen (including horns and, on "Soul for Rent," strings), Moore turns all-pro on his slick and slightly serious second album which, other than the vocals, scarcely resembles Expressway Rising at all. Beyond suggesting that Distortion (at least some parts of it) is a record Billy Idol would be proud of if he weren't so lost in his own superstar hype, it's hard to tell what Moore's up to, as the unstylized rock—interrupted by minor artistic pretenses—doesn't seem headed anywhere. There's likable stuff here (like "Mean Streak," "Put Up or Shut Up") and plenty of contrast (from the gentle "Summer Song" to the mega-noisy "Heart of Darkness"), but Distortion sacrifices too much of Moore's earthy appeal in a concerted push for commercial credibility. The CD's highlight is a seven-minute bonus of "On Broadway," which gives spoken-word/found-sound drama to an effective treatment of the Drifters' soul classic. [i]

R. STEVIE MOORE

Phonography (Vital) 1976 (HP Music) 1978

Four from Phonography (HP Music) 1978

Stance EP (HP Music) 1978

Delicate Tension (HP Music) 1978

Everything You Always Wanted to Know About R. Stevie

Moore but Were Afraid to Ask (Fr. New Rose) 1984

What's the Point?! (Cuneiform) 1984

Verve (nr/Hamster) 1985

Glad Music (Fr. New Rose) 1986

R. Stevie Moore (1952-1998) (nr/Cordelia) 1987

Teenage Spectacular (Fr. New Rose) 1987

Warning: R. Stevie Moore (Fr. New Rose) 1988

Has-Beens and Never-Weres (nr/Heliotope) 1990

GreatestHits [CD] (Fr. Fan Club) 1990 •

The son of a top Nashville session bassist, R. Stevie Moore began doing his own one-man home recordings in the early '70s. Over the course of years spent perfecting his technical and conceptual skills, Moore's individualistic, wry pop and musique concrète excursions have developed into an awesome—and seemingly bottomless—world of talent just waiting to be unleashed on the masses. In recent years, Moore (now living in New Jersey) has self-released dozens of cassettes of his work via mail order; the two 1984 albums partly draw their contents from those tapes. Suffice to say, if you like what you hear on the discs, there's plenty more of equal quality where that came from.

Phonography (issued twice with different artwork) consists of his very early efforts, done between 1974 and 1976. Some of it is fairly rudimentary, but the Bonzo Dog Band-like "Goodbye Piano" displays Moore's incipient brilliance, and a massed-guitars rendition of the Andy Griffith Show theme is classic.

Stance is a three-song 12-inch, running time around fifteen minutes. Recorded in '76 and '77, top-to-bottom improvement is obvious, from the moody, mostly instrumental "Ist or Mas"—an interpretation of awakening (theme for a ballet perhaps?)—to "Manufacturers," a rollicking jazzy rocker.

Delicate Tension is excellent: great songs of astonishing variety, all tied together by his idiosyncratic, gentle perceptions of life and smooth, versatile voice. There are hints of Zappa, Rundgren, Townshend, McCartney and countless others; Moore's limitations, if indeed he has any, have yet to be encountered.

Moore's tape club's issue is staggering in sheer volume, variety and consistency of quality. (His catalogue includes well over 150 titles!) More like eclectic radio shows than straight collections of music, he includes anything and everything on the tapes, and they collectively provide an in-depth self-portrait of a truly prodigious talent.

Everything You Always Wanted to Know is a two-record compilation of tracks—with historical liner notes (in English) purportedly by Robert Christgau—sampling a decade's worth of discs and tapes with originals, covers ("Mama Weer All Crazee Now," "Chantilly Lace"), strange experiments and sublime successes. Although disjointed in spite of Moore's skillful efforts to compile it in some rational fashion, the album provides proof positive of the man's remarkable gift to do virtually any type of music and do it extremely well.

More concise and better conceived, the American one-disc What's the Point?!! provides an ideal introduction to Moore, with such gems as "Part of the Problem," "Puttin' Up the Groceries," "Bloody Knuckles" and "World's Fair." (The last three also appear on Everything.)

Released by a small UK label, the erratic but gem-strewn Verve compilation (early-'80s tracks—including an in-concert live recording from '83—chosen by the artist) quickly became a rarity; Glad Music, a proper studio album recorded in late 1985, reprises "Part of the Problem" and adds a dozen more examples of Moore at the top of his creative powers. There's real C&W played with mock-seriousness ("I Love You So Much It Hurts"), an unnervingly precise synth-flavored version of the Association's "Along Comes Mary" and witty, hand-clapping rock'n'roll ("Shakin' in the Sixties"). Delightful!

(1952-19??) is yet another career-spanning compilation, this one a hodgepodge assembly of 21 tracks from as early as 1973 and as late as 1986, with stops along the way for "Delicate Tension," "Goodbye Piano" and "Satisfaction." Some of the items are tossed-off fragments, others excellent achievements with full-fledged arrangements in a wide variety of styles. The punky "Jesus Rocks" ('78) and the reflectively acoustic "Back in Time" ('86) are among the album's previously unvinylized treasures.

Teenage Spectacular includes covers of Dr. Hook ("The Cover of 'Rolling Stone,'" half of it performed a cappella) and Dr. Dylan (the anti-boxing classic "Who Killed Davey Moore?") given an ironically upbeat folk reading) amidst the original pop musings, witty balladeering and brief mind-altering tape experiments ("Non Sequitur I-V"). The simple musical constructions on guitars, keyboards and drums reveal traces of Moore's many influences—from the Beatles to Todd Rundgren to the Bonzo Dog Band to XTC and back again—and huge chunks of his monumental creative grasp. "On the Spot" is satiric big band bar-room sleaze in the key of G sharp; "Blues for Cathy Taylor" is a delightful love song of a different sort; "Baby on Board" castigates childless drivers with those yellow stickers on their car windows.

A collection of recent ('86-'87) home and studio productions, Warning includes remakes of several RSM oldies (e.g., "Manufacturers") as well as a rendition of the Beatles' "Getting Better." Has-Beens and Never-Weres samples a decade of Moore music, beginning in the mid-'70s and including a tribute to the Residents, "What's the Point?" (not from the album of the that name) and a song entitled "Bonus Track (LP Only)."

Building on Everything You Always Wanted to Know, the CD-only Greatesthits is a monumental 24-track retrospective of Moore's most appealing pop originals ("Why Can't I Write a Hit?," "Debbie," "U R True") and covers ("Chantilly Lace," "Along Comes Mary," "Cover of 'Rolling Stone'")—a perfect introduction to his wonderful world. The American record industry's failure to recognize and promote the unique gifts of this giant talent is a case of criminal neglect.

[i]

ANTHONY MORE

Pieces from the Cloudland Ballroom (Ger. Polydor) 1971

Secrets of the Blue Bag (Ger. Polydor) 1972

Reed, Whistle and Sticks (Ger. Polydor) 1972

Out (nr/Virgin) 1976

Flying Doesn't Help (nr/Quango) 1979

World Service (nr/Do It) 1981

The Only Choice (nr/Parlophone) 1984

Anthony More (né Moore) was a founding member of progressive trio Slapp Happy in the early '70s; following that band's merger with Henry Cow and subsequent dissolution, More went his own way, continuing his solo career at erratic intervals. Although he hasn't released a record under his own name since 1984 (he does pop up as a producer now and again, especially in and around the Golden Palominos camp), More's last three releases are stunning. As an artist, he's a highly idiosyncratic innovator who combines art and rock into a far-reaching, weird and wonderful set of styles, from the atonal to the hook-laden. More imparts all his songs with a nonconformist's perspective that defies easy comprehension.

Flying Doesn't Help displays More's melodic stance, with such beautiful and haunting creations as "Judy Get Down" and "Lucia"; his wit surfaces in sardonic pieces like "Caught Being in Love" and "Girl It's Your Time." Building dense sonic forests filled with jagged splinters and dry, incongruously delicate vocals, the results fall somewhere between Peter Gabriel, John Cale, David Bowie and Kevin Ayers. An extraordinary record that reveals itself a little further each time it's played.

World Service (which, unlike Flying, offers musician credits) takes a decidedly less attractive route, better displaying the anti-music aspect of More's work; dour singing and bitter lyrics make it a challenging record that's as brilliant but not as easily enjoyed as the first. "Broke'n Idle," despite glum intent, contains the record's strongest melody. In contrast, "Fat Fly" is unrelentingly bleak; the light relief is provided by atonal background guitar. World Service isn't unpleasant; rather, it explores different ground with the same caustic eye and inventive mind.

With ex-Fingerprutz guitarist Jimmie O'Neill in tow and Dagmar Krause providing backing vocals, More lightens the mood considerably on The Only Choice. He incorporates African rhythms on a few cuts, found sounds on others, and presents a lyrical mix of wry observations on ills of the modern world ("Industrial Drums," "Find One Voice") plus fascinating outlooks on communication and relationships (and not simply romantic ones). The often-understated music is consistently likable but a bit less invigorating than his best. Nonetheless, More's varied talents, craft and incisiveness combine to make it a rewarding album. [1]

See also Peter Blegvad, Henry Cow.

MORELLS

Shake and Push (Borrowed) 1982 (East Side Digital) 1990 •

SKELETONS

Rockin' Bones (nr/Next Big Thing) 1987
In the Flesh! (nr/Next Big Thing) 1988 [CD] (nr/Demon) 1990 •

How's this for an intriguing assortment of musicians: a middle-aged couple (he, once of Arthur "Sweet Soul Music" Conley's band, on bass and guitar; she on keyboards; both sing), a phenomenal guitarist who'd be stiff competition for Dave Edmunds and Brian Setzer if he were based in a city larger than Springfield, Missouri and—on occasional sax—a fellow whose main occupation is producing unconventional country star Boxcar Willie. Guitarist D. Clinton Thompson and bassist Lou Whitney (producer of the first Del-Lords LP) have been together in a variety of lineups; the former's superb "Driving Guitars" 45 rescued a swell Ventures tune from obscurity. In the Skeletons and Original Symptoms, the pair has mined the vaults of rock, R&B and country arcana for some ought-to-have-been classics and the inspiration to pen their own instant winners.

The Morells can easily slay most revivalist bands, and Shake and Push proves it with a casualness that's all the more ingratiating. A dozen bars into the second track, if you ain't slobbering on the LP jacket wondering where you're gonna find a dee-luxe greasburger place like "Red's," then you just ain't American. (The 1990 reissue adds two outtakes from the original album sessions and in-depth liner notes by Dave Fricke.)

The Skeletons consist of Thompson and Whitney

with a different drummer and keyboard player. Rockin' Bones compiles the entire contents of the band's original three pre-Morells singles (from '79-'80), adding three tunes cut after the Skeletons were revived in the mid-'80s. The album, which is simply delightful from start to finish, takes an automotive angle, with Whitney's flawless "Trans Am" and covers like "Gas Money" and the instrumental "B/Gas Accord." If Johnny Otis' "Crazy Country Hop" and Whitney's Presleyesque "Tell Her I'm Gone" break the topical mold, they do nothing to interrupt the magical mood.

Adding a second keyboard player, the Skeletons made an all-new (recording-wise, that is) album, reducing the overt nostalgia in favor of a more integrated old-fashioned sound that brings a wider collection of influences into the studio. But forward progress for such a backwards-looking band isn't such a swell idea. Besides covers of Sonny Bono's "Laugh at Me" and the Flying Burrito Brothers' "Older Guys," In the Flesh! contains one of the Del-Lords' lesser creations ("I Play the Drums"), the sappy "For Every Heart" and a brief "Take Me Out to the Ball Game." The playing's great and the spirit never falters, but this accomplished collection doesn't have enough of what makes Rockin' Bones so downright upright. The Demon CD contains both Skeletons LPs in their entirety. [jg/1]

SCOTT MORGAN BAND

See Sonic's Rendezvous Band.

GIORGIO MORODER & PHILIP OAKEY

See Human League.

MORRISSEY

Viva Hate (Sire-Reprise) 1988 •
Bona Drag (Sire-Reprise) 1990 ♣
Kill Uncle (Sire-Reprise) 1991 ♣

Having killed off the much beloved Smiths, Morrissey carried the hopes of countless fans into his solo career, but rewarded them with Viva Hate, a bland album that provides striking proof of how special and irreplaceable his partnership with Johnny Marr was. Joined by guitarist Vini Reilly (Durutti Column) and bassist/co-writer Stephen Street (producer of some Smiths records) as well as a drummer and string section, Morrissey brings his usual lyrical angst and wobbly singsong to the project, but the colorless music offers nothing beyond smoothly orchestrated static. The minimally arranged and epic-length "Late Night, Maudlin Street" is the closest thing to a good track, but it's too simple by half. "Suedehead" attempts to mimic the Smiths with moderate self-conscious success, but little inherent creativity. Viva Hate drops Morrissey from masterful pop star to bland solo artist in one easy step. The tape and CD add "Hairdresser on Fire."

Like his former band, Morrissey releases singles as frequently as other pop stars make hotel reservations; in the two album-less years following Viva Hate, he produced enough new tracks to necessitate the Bona Drag A's and B's compilation. Repeating two tracks ("Suedehead" and "Everyday Is Like Sunday") that were 45s taken from the previous LP, Bona Drag adds the fruits of Morrissey's work with Clive Langer and Alan Winstanley (the Madness-inflected "Piccadilly Palare," the danceably dense "November Spawned a Monster," the bluesy "Yes, I Am Blind") as well as Street productions like the absolutely ace "Interesting Drug" (on which Morrissey and Kirsty MacColl harmonize over music played by all the ex-Smiths save Marr) and the lushly orchestrated "Hairdresser on Fire." By and large, this fine collection puts Morrissey back on track, with varied music that supports his unique lyrical vision as well as the Smiths ever did.

Morrissey evidently liked the Langer/Winstanley tracks enough to have them produce all of Kill Uncle. Although the unnervingly posh commercial presentation boldly takes Morrissey places he's never been before (leading off with the hideously mainstream "Our Frank" and the string-laden "Asian Rut" seems like a tactical goof), his songwriting collaboration with Mark Nevin (the ex-Fairground Attraction guitarist also plays on the LP) seems to have finally solved the Marr problem; Kill Uncle contains some of Morrissey's best songs ever. ("Driving Your Girlfriend Home," "Sing Your Life" and "King Leer" are highlights.) For their part, Langer and Winstanley leave enough idiosyncrasies amid the radio-ready fabrications to make this surprising-sounding record a subtle and substantial success. [i]

See also Smiths.

MORTAL MICRONOTZ

The Mortal Micronotz (Fresh Sounds) 1982

Live Recording of the Video Soundtrack EP (Fresh Sounds) 1984

MICRONOTZ

Smash! (Fresh Sounds) 1983

The Beast That Devoured Itself (Fresh Sounds) 1985

40 Fingers (Homestead) 1986

This quartet—teenagers at the outset, their minds filled with the world—must have felt constricted in the confines of Lawrence, Kansas. The sound on the Mortal Micronotz album is a little tinny, but these guys have your standard '70s Ameri-punk moves down cold—sort of a sub-Dead Boys, but tighter. Dean Lubensky is actually an okay singer, making the adolescent alienation lyrics sound more believable than they read. He also handles lyrics given to the band by homeboy William S. Burroughs with similar aplomb. Added treat: a good noisy version of "Let It All Hang Out," which the Hombres first released when these guys were still in diapers.

Their name truncated and Burroughs nowhere in sight, the Micronotz show no sign of losing any of their rock'n'roll energy on Smash!, a 45 rpm album that includes Iggy's "I Got a Right" plus seven originals. Lubensky's vocals are mighty rough, John Harper's guitar playing pretty swift and the song subjects a bit more mature; a convincing record with a personality (of sorts) all its own. Production could have been a lot clearer, though.

The band's next release (under the old name) was a 7-inch EP containing five live renditions. Lubensky then left and was replaced by Jay Hauptli in time for The Beast That Devoured Itself, another raggedly entertaining punked-out collection that generally rises above all of the genre's typical limitations.

The bracingly good 40 Fingers is a triumphant stylistic distillation, a powerful and varied dose of mature post-thrash intelligence that in spots resembles Hüsker Dü. Without losing any of their adolescent strength, the Micronotz play better than ever, and Hauptli's coarse vocals have gained a melodic validity, vastly improved by Harper's harmonies. (At times they sound a tad like the Ramones.) A cover of Simon & Garfunkel's "Scarborough Fair" serves as a showcase for the band's newfound abilities. [jg/i]

MOTHER LOVE BONE

Shine EP (Stardog-PolyGram) 1989 •

Apple (Polydor) 1990 φ

With one pair of Green River refugees off to form Mudhoney, another two ex-members of that seminal Seattle crew—guitarist Stone Gossard and bassist Jess Ament—launched their own hoary '70s hard-rock band, Mother Love Bone. With another guitarist, a drummer and singer Andrew Wood (formerly of Malfunkshun), MLB made its debut on Shine, an EP whose five songs shrug off both common tendencies—Zeppelin and motorsludge—of the New Pacific Northwest in favor of a crisp rip that favors Free, Aerosmith and other blues-based bands of the very early '70s. Rather than wallowing in wah-wah and stun volume, the quintet demonstrates noteworthy songwriting facility, the wisdom to tone things down and open the sound up, and a real three-dimensionality to the presentation.

With a major-label deal and an extremely promising future, Wood died of an overdose in March '90, casting an enormous pall over the release of the band's completed first album. Produced by Terry Date, Apple focuses all of Mother Love Bone's assets into a potent rock rush, making it everything a Guns n' Roses LP should be—but with better vocals and worse guitar.

See also Temple of the Dog. [i]

MARK MOTHERSBAUGH

See Devo.

MOTOR BOYS MOTOR

Motor Boys Motor (nr/Albion) 1982

Strange sense of humor: the cover and enclosed poster is a freak-show photo of a black man's face with lots of little snakes coming out of his mouth. The four-some (two guitars, bass, drums) do a song called "Here Comes the Flintstones." They should have done the show's actual theme—this ditty ain't happening. Nothing much here is, despite the energetic punk-cum-boogie musical mode and Beefheartian overtones. Interesting, but doesn't come near justifying its existence. (Half of MBM later organized the Screaming Blue Messiahs and put a song called "I Wanna Be a Flintstone" on their second album.) [jg]

See also Screaming Blue Messiahs.

MOTORCYCLE BOY

See Shop Assistants.

MOTÖRHEAD

Motörhead (nr/Chiswick) 1977 (nr/Big Beat) 1978 (Roadracer Revisited) 1990 ●
Overkill (nr/Bronze) 1979 (Profile) 1988 ●
Bomber (nr/Bronze) 1979 (Profile) 1988 ●
On Parole (nr/Liberty) 1979 (nr/Fame) 1982 (EMI America) 1987 ●
Motörhead EP (nr/Big Beat) 1980
The Golden Years EP (nr/Bronze) 1980
Ace of Spades (Mercury) 1980 (Profile) 1988 ●
No Sleep 'til Hammersmith (Mercury) 1981 (Profile) 1988 ●
Iron Fist (Mercury) 1982 (Roadracer Revisited) 1990 ●
Stand by Your Man EP (nr/Bronze) 1982
What's Words Worth? (nr/Big Beat) 1983
Another Perfect Day (Mercury) 1983 ●
No Remorse (Bronze) 1984 (Roadracer Revisited) 1990 ●
Anthology (nr/Raw Power) 1985 ●
Born to Lose (nr/Dojo) 1985
Orgasmatron (GWR-Profile) 1986 ●
Rock 'n' Roll (GWR-Profile) 1987 ●
EP [CD] (nr/Special Edition) 1988 ●
Another Perfect Day/Overkill (nr/Castle Comm.) 1988 ●
No Sleep at All (GWR-Enigma) 1988 ●
Blitzkrieg on Birmingham '77 (nr/Receiver) 1989 ●
Dirty Love (nr/Receiver) 1989 ●
The Best of & the Rest of Motörhead Live (nr/Action Replay) 1990 φ
Welcome to the Bear Trap (nr/Castle Comm.) 1990 ●
Bomber/Ace of Spades (nr/Castle Comm.) 1990 ●
Lock Up Your Daughters (nr/Receiver) 1990 ●
The Birthday Party (GWR-Enigma) 1990 φ
From the Vaults (nr/Sequel) 1990 ●
1916 (WTG) 1991 ●
Meltdown (nr/Castle Comm.) 1991 ●

MOTÖRHEAD AND GIRLSCHOOL

St. Valentine's Day Massacre EP (nr/Bronze) 1980

VARIOUS ARTISTS

Eat the Rich (Filmtrex-GWR) 1987

WURZEL

Bess EP (nr/GWR) 1987

PHILTHY PHIL AND FAST EDDIE

Naughty Old Santa's Christmas Classics (nr/Receiver) 1989

The early pigeonholing of Motörhead as punks may have stemmed from their loud'n'fast playing, their leather jackets, engagements opening for the Damned and their early releases on a UK indie label, but then, as now, the band was engaged in its own hard-rockin' rebellion—slashing guitar, flailing drums and Lemmy playing bass like a lead and rhythm instrument, singing as though he were in the process of being strangled. Inspired moronism? You bet, just like "Louie, Louie," which the band covered for a minor hit in 1978!

Motörhead's very existence opposed the safe, sterile, flabby ritual "heavy music" had become (not to mention the rest of what had been passing for rock-'n'-roll), and refigured the new wave of rawer British metal bands (Iron Maiden, Saxon et al.) in the early '80s, not to mention the thrash bands of recent years. All told, Motörhead's primal urgency clearly recalled their spiritual forebears: the Amboy Dukes/Bob Seger System/MCS Detroit axis.

After being fired from Hawkwind, bassist Ian "Lemmy" Kilmister hooked up with two ex-Pink Fairies (also Hawkwind chums): Larry Wallis and Lucas Fox. Producer Dave Edmunds allegedly fled their recording session, covering his ears; Fox was dumped and his replacement, Phil "Philthy Animal" Taylor, overdubbed some of the drum parts. UA let Motörhead's contract expire, and didn't see fit to release the results until 1980 (as On Parole). In any case, Lemmy sought to beef up the sound by bringing in guitarist "Fast" Eddie Clarke (like Jimi Hendrix, a former employee of Curtis Knight), at which point Wallis took a powder.

In their second attempt at a debut album, Speedy Keen (ex-Thunderclap Newman), who'd mis-mixed the Heartbreakers' L.A.M.F. LP, successfully captured Motörhead's sturm und klang. Cut after cut, it's phenomenal: remakes of Hawkwind's "Motörhead" and "Lost Johnny" (the latter co-written by Mick Farren), "White Line Fever," "Iron Horse/Born to Lose" and more, all with a force and fury unequalled until the 1981 live LP. A 1980 12-inch of outtakes from those Chiswick sessions features Wallis' "On Parole," Motörhead's "Beer Drinkers & Hell Raisers" and oldies by John Mayall and ZZ Top. (The belated American reissue of Motörhead appends the entire four-song EP as well as the band's first B-side, the Pink Fairies' "City Kids.") Released in '83, the live What's Words Worth? revealed the band in an early '78 show—uneven, although some of the cover tunes, like "Leavin' Here" and "Train Kept a-Rollin'" strike some pretty good sparks.

Moving from Chiswick to Bronze, and from Keen to ex-Stones producer Jimmy Miller, the trio put out a trio of solid LPs, each with its own merits and classic cuts. Overkill's title track, "Stay Clean" and that ultimate putdown, "No Class," are balanced by the atypically slow, deliberate "Capricorn." Bomber has its title track and "Dead Men Tell No Tales" as highlights. Ace of Spades also has a great title track and "(We Are) The Road Crew." Vic Maile produced the last of those LPs, achieving more sonic fullness and texture than Miller had, though Overkill's material is the best of the three.

In a collaboration alternately referred to as Motorschool and Headgirl, Motörhead and labelmates Girlschool ganged up on the 1959 Johnny Kidd & the Pirates hit "Please Don't Touch" (with a flipside containing each group murdering a fave song by the other, the single was packaged on 7-inch and 10-inch as the St. Valentine's Day Massacre EP) and had a hit. Then the live No Sleep went into the UK album charts at number one: Maile's super production job balances ambience and clarity. It was all any Motörfan could've asked.

Fast Eddie ran the console for Iron Fist, with the help of engineer Will Reid Dick. The results are relatively lackluster, in material as well as sound. (The 1990 reissue adds "Remember Me, I'm Gone.") Eddie was not happy with the direction of the band, and while the others were busy combining with the Plasmatics as they had with Girlschool (less successful artistically and commercially, on Tammy Wynette's "Stand by Your Man"), he decided to split and form the bluesy, Zep-ish Fastway. Ex-Thin Lizzy guitarist Brian Robertson immediately replaced him. Another Perfect Day was a good change of pace. Considering how unsuited Robertson figured to be, it works surprisingly well. But it just wasn't Motörhead, and after a tour-shortening illness, he left.

No sooner was he replaced by two unknowns, Phil Campbell and Mick "Wurzel" Burston, than Taylor decided he wanted out, too. In stepped Pete Gill (ex-Saxon, and before that the Glitter Band, as in Gary!). The next release, No Remorse, was no stopgap, though. They didn't get the rights to the Chiswick tracks, but otherwise the two-record set is a model best-of collection: a wise, balanced choice of LP and EP cuts, non-LP single sides, four smokin' new numbers, annotation (and commentary by Lemmy) on all tracks, complete lyrics, a smart, detailed band history (by Kerrang!'s Malcolm Dome) and some cute pics. It does include "Please Don't Touch," "Louie, Louie," "Leaving Here" (the best version of the five the band has cut over the years, from the snappy Golden Years live EP) and that instant classic, "Killed by Death." ("If you squeeze my lizard, I'll put my snake on you.") Sheer Shakespeare in a Chevy. (The 1990 American CD omits "Louie, Louie," "Leaving Here" and the original liner notes, but the cassette has two tracks entitled "Under the Knife" from the initial Wurzel/Campbell sessions.)

The next year, Raw Power licensed enough tracks from Bronze to make up a second two-LP retrospective, Anthology, suitable for those whose only previous purchase was No Remorse (although five tracks do overlap). Born to Lose is a substantial compilation of tracks from On Parole and Motörhead, plus alternate takes of "White Line Fever" and "Leaving Here" that had been issued only as part of a Stiff boxed set.

Orgasmatron was produced by Bill Laswell with Jason Corsaro. Laswell's involvement got lots of critics to pay attention, and they got to hear a decent Motörhead record—including classic "Doctor Rock"—but hardly their best. On the LP's opener ("Deaf Forever") and closer ("Orgasmatron") the sound is a striking juggernaut but, generally, it seems a bit sonically squashed.

The very next LP, Rock 'n' Roll, produced by the band and Guy Bidmead (who'd engineered Orgasmatron), has more sonic depth, a bit of slide guitar and backing-vocal harmonies! Also Phil Taylor, who had a change of heart and was allowed to step back in after Gill departed. Better than Orgasmatron, though not quite top-notch, it also includes "Eat the Rich," done for the film of the same name in which Lemmy has—gasp!—an acting role. (Aside from the title tune, the soundtrack LP consists of previously released material plus non-Motörhead scoring.)

Wurzel's EP is not bad: a "Sleepwalk"-esque instrumental, a Jeff Beck-ish hyper-waltz and a couple of Motörhead Jr.-type numbers.

Next, some reassessment and watershedding. No Sleep at All (live at a Finnish festival) combines top-notch playing and crappy sound, especially compared to the much hotter Hammersmith. That's sonically, though, not performance-wise. Campbell and Wurzel outplay Clarke on their version of "Ace of Spades," and their much-longer "Overkill" brims with pyrotechnics. On the rest (all post-Clarke material), it's doubly a shame the sound is muffled, since these takes out-rock almost every studio version (not true of Hammersmith). The CD adds two cuts.

Blitzkrieg on Birmingham (early '77, pretty raw) and Lock Up Your Daughters (mid-'77, much smarter) are live LPs of virtually the same vintage and material as What's Words Worth? (early '78). Welcome to the Bear Trap is a double-LP's worth of Bronze tracks, mainly the same as previously compiled.

Dirty Love consists of Ace of Spades rehearsal tapes. The rough versions of six tracks (one not even listed on the cover or the disc label!), plus a B-side of the same vintage, offer little creative insight; of four rejected/unfinished numbers (for which Clarke—source of the tapes—claims sole writing credit), only one is worthy of notice.

The Birthday Party—an album Motörhead tried to block the release of no less than three times—is the soundtrack of the band's 1985 tenth anniversary concert video. The sound is crisper than on the other live LPs, but you can't hear any bass drum, which makes Pete Gill sound even worse (compared to Philthy) than he actually is. Plus, some of the songs are played too fast, which further undercuts him. A few tracks are quite good and the twin guitars smoke throughout, but Clarke's shadow looms large, as eleven of the twelve songs date from his tenure (five from Ace alone). The CD adds three, one a show-closing "Motörhead" with past and present bandmembers onstage.

From the Vaults is an unessential but good collection for fans who only have the albums: all four (live) tracks of the Golden Years EP (okay); assorted B-sides (mostly quite good); "Bomber" by Girlschool from the St. Valentine's EP; "Masterplan" by Motörhead, "No Class" by the Plasmatics and "Stand by Your Man" by Wendy O. and Lemmy from the notorious '82 maxi-single (amusing); and a fun, Quo-ish cut by the Young & Moody Band (Quo roadie Bob Young and ex-Whitesnake guitarist Mick Moody, plus Lemmy, Cozy Powell and—yes—the Nolan Sisters).

The all-new 1916 album was more than worth the long wait. For once able to take time and care in the studio, and armed with their best set of songs since Ace (or even Overkill), Motörhead delivers an aggressive firestorm (check "The One to Sing the Blues") with the huge and harsh sound the band always needed but never previously achieved—kudos to producers Pete Solley and (for three tracks) Ed Stasium. Unexpected stylistic variations abound: a weird and sophisticated soundscape ("Nightmare/The Dreamtime"); Motörmetal à la Chuck Berry ("Going to Brazil"); a tongue-in-cheek boogie-paeon to Los Angeles ("Angel City"); a 1:25 tribute to the Ramones ("Ramones"); a ballad blending slamming chords and churning solos with vocal harmonies, synth-strings and credible romantic (!) lyrics ("Love Me Forever"). Lemmy quietly closes the LP with "1916," sung from the perspective of a young soldier dying in WW I. The startling diversity and mastery of this album brings Motörhead to a new level.

Meltdown is an excellent, well-balanced boxed set (three CDs or five LPs) compilation that includes a solid selection from the band's live and studio albums. [jg]

See also Mick Farren, Hawkwind, Social Deviants.

MOTORS

Motors 1 (Virgin) 1977 (Blue Plate) 1991 •
Approved by the Motors (Virgin) 1978 (Blue Plate)
1991 •

Tenement Steps (Virgin) 1980
Greatest Hit (nr/Virgin) 1981

NICK GARVEY

Blue Skies (nr/Virgin) 1982

Formed by two ex-members of Ducks Deluxe (singers/songwriters/multi-instrumentalists Andy McMaster and Nick Garvey) plus two younger pub vets (Bram Tchaikovsky and Ricky Slaughter), the Motors seemed like a hit machine from the outset. On record, they made grandiose rock-pop—wide-screen, brilliantly arranged and energetically performed—drawing on their longtime experience and solid talents.

Motors 1, produced by future metal maven Robert John Lange, is a fresh, exciting record, solidly rooted in electric guitars but light-years more subtle and three-dimensional than the rock'n'roll retreads the band's members had been playing prior to the Motors. While the six-minute "Dancing the Night Away" is an engrossing and muscular lead-off track, nothing else that follows it on the album is quite as striking. Approved By is a better effort, containing the fruits of the Motors' attack on the singles chart ("Airport" and "Forget About You" both went Top 20 in the UK) and exhibiting all of the band's strengths: catchy melodies, inventive arrangements and exciting, energetic use of rock instrumentation.

The Motors effectively disbanded after the second album. Garvey and McMaster continued working together using the group name, eventually engaging Jimmy Iovine to produce their next album in New York. Tenement Steps, the unfortunate result of far too much time spent in the studio, is an appalling, overblown mess, reeking of self-indulgence and artistic confusion. The chorus of the best-known track, "Love and Loneliness," sounds exactly like Steve Stills' "Love the One You're With"—and that's as good as the record gets.

Greatest Hit has all of the above-mentioned songs as well as the rest of the Motors' best work. Neophytes would do well to start (and end) here.

On his solo album, guitarist/bassist/producer Garvey demonstrates the versatility of his voice (clear tenor, hoarse baritone, agile falsetto). But he's even more adroit at the mixing console, able to whip up tuneful, ringing Spector/Springsteen pop melodrama and make lush, spacious pop-rock out of the riff from "Willie and the Hand Jive." He also throws a curve or two, like the clever, 10cc-ish "(Think) Tough" or the semi-parodic Squeeze-cum-Bowie of "Skin." But even the support by members of the Motors/Tyla/Bram Tchaikovsky axis and his own genuine likability can't save this record when Garvey descends into schlocky, banal romanticism. [i/jg]

See also Ducks Deluxe, Bram Tchaikovsky.

BOB MOULD

Workbook (Virgin) 1989 •
Black Sheets of Rain (Virgin) 1990 •

The miserable implosion of Hüsker Dü left guitarist/singer Bob Mould embittered and saddened, but buoyed by the promise of a new beginning. Launching his solo career, Mould confounded audience expectations by choosing not to paint his unhappiness in walls of guitar fury. Instead, he delivered the haunted majesty of Workbook, a largely acoustic account of his emotional condition that uses soaring melodies and richly harmonic vocal and instrumental textures to maturely convey the subtleties and depth of his mood. Bookended by a pastoral instrumental and a paint-peeling feedback frenzy, Mould shrugs off any imagined stylistic restrictions and—backed by drummer Anton Fier (Golden Palominos et al.), bassist Tony Maimone (Pere Ubu) and cellist Jane Scarpantoni (Tiny Lights)—crafts beautiful documents of profound passion that both sigh and roar with equal sensitivity. Highlights: "See a Little Light," "Wishing Well," "Poison Years" and "Dreaming, I Am."

The ex-punk took a lot of predictable flak for going soft, and moved back into the noise tunnel for his second album, the subject of which is a different personal loss: the heartbreaking end of a love affair. As deeply felt as it might be for Mould (the scathing lyrics attest to that), Black Sheets of Rain has less power and poignancy—not in the clunky material, the generally unmodulated performances or the strange-sounding production, which suppresses the vocals, squishes the crudely overlaid roar of guitars into a thin blur and makes Fier's busy drumming the focus of the mix. Besides sounding like they're all playing in different studios, Mould, Fier and Maimone wrestle too many of the songs into the same neo-Dü shape. "It's Too Late" has a great pop melody but lyrics that actually mention the word "fluorocarbons." Otherwise, a few hard-hitting songs ("Disappointed," "Stop Your Crying" and "Out of Your Life") that connect intermittently and the touching acoustic melancholy of "The Last Night" help prevent the disappointing Black Sheets of Rain from being a total washout. [i]

See also Hüsker Dü.

MOVEMENT EX

Movement Ex (Columbia) 1990 •

Armed with the myopic self-confidence of flaming youth and the unfamiliar language of a sectarian religious cult, Lord Mustafa Hasan Ma'd, the lyrical/rapping half of LA's teenaged Movement Ex (DJ King Born Khaaliq provides the backing tracks, which are complex, heavy with effective samples and really exciting, if overloaded with high-pitched scratches), runs down the obscure look-what-you-made-us-do Five-Percent Nation of Islam perspective on a litany of serious subjects (global politics, guns, ecology, history, sexually transmitted diseases, drugs, etc.). The duo's album sounds great—the fully modern Movement Ex is unquestionably talented—but the militant anti-white fingerpointing, conspiracy theories and other dubious assertions make it impossible not to choose up sides on intellectual, rather than artistic, grounds. Fascinating if not exactly fun, Movement Ex presents listeners with a grave political and cultural challenge. [i]

MOVING TARGETS

Burning in Water (Taangl) 1986 •
Brave Noise (Taangl) 1989 •

Moving Targets came blasting out of a Boston scene at a time when most Boston hardcore and punk outfits were going metal. The big guitar detonations were actually closer to Squirrel Bait and, to a lesser extent, Hüsker Dü, with more precise control than those bands ever attempted. Burning in Water is a gaping piece of power-trio battery, an intense wall-of-sound fireball married to rapid (not thrash) tempos, developed melodies and the sort of kick associated with, say, early D.O.A. What the record lacks in variety, it makes up for with convincing material and relentless determination.

The band's future looked grim after guitarist/singer Ken Chambers enlisted in Bullet LaVolta, but he has managed to split his time between the two groups and was present when Moving Targets (sporting a new bassist) reappeared three years later with the equally formidable Brave Noise. While the pace is still fast, the songs have been slowed down just enough to allow the trio to flex an even heavier strong-arm sound. The songwriting may not be as consistent, but Chambers' guitar playing is even more pulverizing, using dim-and-flare dynamics to set up—and knock down—listeners. (Both records are on one CD.) [jr]

See also Bullet LaVolta.

JUDY MOWATT

Black Woman (Island) 1980 (Shanachie) 1983 ●

Only a Woman (Shanachie) 1982 ●

Working Wonders (Shanachie) 1985 ●

Love Is Overdue (Shanachie) 1987 ●

Partly because Rastafarianism is intrinsically patriarchal, the number of important women reggae performers can still be counted in single digits. Singing behind Bob Marley, the I-Threes (Marcia Griffiths, Rita Marley and Judy Mowatt) were, for a long time, the only visible female presence in roots music. While they've all enjoyed successful solo careers, Mowatt has made the most significant strides, writing and producing her own material.

On Black Woman, she covers three Wailers songs and dedicates an original to Marley. The album amply displays her talents as a composer as well as performer, and brought her international acclaim. The quiet militancy of Only a Woman is offset by an engaging vocal style—strong and clean—that recalls American R&B. By the time Working Wonders was released, she was being called the queen of reggae by the press. Featuring a variety of producers and material, the LP suffers from its crossover efforts, but Mowatt's singing is more assured than ever.

By contrast, Love Is Overdue is nearly ruined by Mowatt's attempt to reach the mainstream. Produced by TSOP alumnus Dexter Wansel, Side One's first four tracks (including covers of "Try a Little Tenderness" and UB40's "Sing Our Own Song") are lightweight pop-soul, bland and forgettable. Luckily, Mowatt salvages the rest of the LP by singing, writing and producing the sprightly reggae she does best. [bk]

ALISON MOYET

Alf (Columbia) 1984 ●

Raindancing (Columbia) 1987 ●

Alf/Raindancing [CD] (nr/CBS) 1988 ●

Hoodoo (Columbia) 1991 ●

Alison Moyet's soulful vocals were the best thing about Yazoo (Yaz in the States), her odd but successful partnership with ex-Depeche Moder Vince Clarke. He went on to form Erasure; she launched a commercially rewarding mainstream solo career. On Alf, her amazing pipes are supported by smooth synth-and-drums dance music created by full-service producers Tony Swain and Steve Jolley, who co-wrote the material and played on it as well. Moyet's consistently great singing and her producers' impersonal backing leave songwriting the only variable, and that's unfortunately what it is. Other than "All Cried Out," the coyly tasteless "Love Resurrection" and Lamont Dozier's magnificent "Invisible," there aren't many tunes in the winning column. What made Yazoo work was great writing; judging by Alf, maybe Moyet's symbiotic partnership with Clarke wasn't such a weird idea after all.

Producer Jimmy Iovine stayed out of the other aspects of the creative process on Raindancing, leaving Moyet to take greater responsibility for the material. Although sincere enough, her lyrics about romantic challenges don't amount to much; the mostly collaborative music is plain but sturdy, allowing Moyet's rich voice to do the work. Standouts are "Glorious Love," "Is This Love?" and Floy Joy's wonderful "Weak in the Presence of Beauty." The low point is the stifflingly schmaltzy "Sleep Like Breathing" [i]

See also Yazoo.

MUD BOY & THE NEUTRONS

See Panther Burns.

MUDHONEY

Superfuzz Bigmuff EP (Sub Pop) 1988 ●

Mudhoney (Sub Pop) 1989 ●

Boiled Beef & Rotting Teeth EP [CD] (nr/Sub Pop-Tupelo) 1990 ●

Every Good Boy Deserves Fudge (Sub Pop) 1991 ●

Alongside Soundgarden, Seattle's Mudhoney are kings of the Pacific noise-west frontier, playing unceremonious, nonspecific '70s-based hard rock with an '80s attitude. Formed by ex-members of Green River (singer Mark Arm and original guitarist Steve Turner) and the Melvins (bassist Matt Lukin) and their respective distortion pedals, the quartet made a loud but colorless debut on the six-song Superfuzz Bigmuff, getting up a good, semi-tight head of steam (including loads of wah-wah, slide and feedback) but—with the partial exception of the frantically sung "In 'n' Out of Grace"—not finding any effective stylistic application for it.

Thanks to terse, cut-to-the-chase songs, Mudhoney offers a punkier view of the band, a roaring garagey behemoth that, in spots, owes quite a bit to Blue Cheer (circa "Summertime Blues"—check "Get into Yours" for details) and rolls out a good number (like "You Got It") now and again. Over the course of an entire album, however, Mudhoney hasn't got the songwriting substance to justify its noise. Neither strictly derivative nor in any sense original, Mudhoney is merely a generic mediocrity.

Assembled for the overseas market, Boiled Beef & Rotting Teeth contains a 1988 compilation LP contribution and two singles—five songs in all, including an alternate version of Mudhoney's “You Got It (Keep It Outta My Face).” [i]

See also Green River, Melvins.

MUNCHENER FREIHEIT

Umsteiger (Ger. CBS) 1982

Licht (Ger. CBS) 1983

Herzschlag Einer Stadt (Ger. CBS) 1984

Von Anfang An (Ger. CBS) 1986

Traumziel (Ger. CBS) 1986

FREIHEIT

Romancing in the Dark (Ger. CBS) 1987

Fantasy (nr/CBS) 1988 (WTG) 1989 •

Kissed You in the Rain EP (nr/CBS) 1989 •

Munchener Freiheit (Munich Freedom) started as a two-guitar quartet on Umsteiger (Transfer). Displaying a definite knack for power pop with exceedingly good Beatlesque harmonies, they also go in for some tracks with slightly eccentric arrangements. At points they reach genuine offbeatness, fitting for a band led by an ex-member of fringe space rockers Amon Duül II, namely singing guitarist Stefan Zauner. It's a bit of an unsatisfying mix, but the high points are, well, kind of like eating Ring Dings: empty calories, but awfully tasty. (Despite Zauner's Anglo-pop voice, the record's all in German, including a version of Dylan's “It's All Over Now, Baby Blue.”)

They subsequently jettisoned the musical weirdness altogether. On Licht, with Zauner moving over to keyboards, the overall sound is more commercial and pop-oriented. That it comes shrink-wrapped with a combination sweat-band/visor (!) should suggest the record's intended appeal. Again, there's the same kind of swell pop-rock, but some veers dangerously close to pap.

By Herzschlag Einer Stadt, possibly the group's best album, the lineup had stabilized as a quintet with two keyboardists including Zauner, by then primarily the singer (and, teamed with guitarist Aron Strobel, chief songwriter). He'd also been the producer, with former bassist Freddie Erdmann but, starting with Herzschlag, the records were overseen by Armand Volker. This proved to be a formula for success—the quintet are now quite big pop stars—but the slickness that went into it became increasingly annoying. (Here, it's just insidiously ingratiating.)

Von Anfang An (From the Beginning On) conveniently summed up Munchener Freiheit's output for their hit parade fans, with non-LP single tracks and the most commercial (not necessarily the best) of the previous LPs, including live, alternate and remixed versions. Traumziel has a surprisingly mature sound and, while some of it lapses into blandness, the rest is enjoyable ear candy. Curiously dropping the first half of their name, Freiheit issued Traumziel in an English-language version, Romancing in the Dark, with three remakes from previous LPs slotted in. Traumziel actually hangs together better, and understanding the lyrics hardly makes a big difference.

By Fantasie, the gradual stylistic modernization (adding in dance-rock elements and so on) had counterbalanced most of the original charm—even of Zauner's voice. The record still has worthwhile moments, but it's mostly dull. For international consumption, the lyrics were translated into English (or, as on at least some of the tracks, rewritten). “Keeping the Dream Alive” (a softer, fluffier, longer version of “So Lang' Man Traume Noch Leben Kann”) leads off the LP, instead of ending it. Yawn. [jg]

COATI MUNDI

See Kid Creole and the Coconuts.

PETER MURPHY

Should the World Fail to Fall Apart (nr/Beggars Banquet) 1986 •

Love Hysteria (Beggars Banquet-RCA) 1988 •

Deep (Beggars Banquet-RCA) 1990 •

DALIS CAR

The Waking Hour (nr/Paradox-Beggars Banquet) 1984 •

After leaving Bauhaus, singer Peter Murphy joined Mick Karn (ex-Japan) and a no-name drummer to form Dalis Car, whose one album mixed Japan's sensuous sound with Bauhaus' obsequious lyrical constructs. As a mellifluous noise, The Waking Hour is fine, if a bit heavy on the bass; dig any deeper, however, and what you get is a hollow attempt to create art without any redeeming artistry.

Moving on to a solo career, Murphy made his debut with Should the World Fail to Fall Apart. Guitarist/keyboard player Howard Hughes co-wrote and co-produced this dreamy, mildly experimental effort that makes good use of modest understatement. If Murphy could remove the melodrama from his delivery, a lot of the songs might have been quite nice. But even at low volume and languorous tempo, he can't shake the old goth theatrics out of his voice. He almost pulls it off in “Canvas Beauty,” an appealing wash of fretless bass and synthetic horns, but winds up doing a frightening vocal imitation of mid-period Moody Blues. And that's as good as it gets. Covering Magazine's “The Light Pours Out of Me” and Pere Ubu's “Final Solution” probably seemed like good, culturally resonant ideas at the time, but the awkward results are far from impressive.

Keyboardist Paul Statham co-wrote Love Hysteria, an album on which Murphy's commanding baritone contrasts with brittle, airy music built on a dual fixation with Lodger-era Bowie and the group Japan. (At its most commercial, however, the record resembles the Fixx.) Regardless of stylistic intent, the pompous pseudo-babble lyrics and keyboardist/guitarist Simon Rogers' horrible production (the sound has almost no bottom) makes this of interest only to implacable Bauhaus fanatics.

Having covered “Funtime” (from The Idiot) on Love Hysteria, Murphy added an ominous Iggy Pop impression to his colorful repertoire on Deep. Using the same crowd—Statham, Rogers, bassist Eddie Branch, guitarist Peter Bonas—as the previous album, Murphy shifted into simple dance-rock, extrapolating what Bowie might sound like fronting, say, Modern English. Actually, Deep isn't bad—multi-tracking the vocals and swamping them in thick pop instrumentation softens

Murphy's voice (whose control has clearly improved) to the point of easy listening. Where Deep sinks in in the songwriting: amid the few nicely rounded melodies are dead serious songs with titles like "The Line Between the Devil's Teeth (And That Which Cannot Be Repeat!)" and "Marlene Dietrich's Favourite Poem." (One bonus track on the CD and cassette.) [i]

See also Bauhaus.

MURPHY'S LAW

Murphy's Law (Rock Hotel-Profile) 1986

Back with a Bong! (Profile) 1989 ●

These popular skate punks from Astoria, Queens take a wisely unserious approach to thrash on their fine debut album. The quartet varies the tempos every which way—the LP only intermittently utilizes hardcore burn velocity—holding fast to a rollicking punk spirit without conforming to its stylistic regulations. The clearly produced record's title track has a winning "arf-arf" chorus; "Sit Home & Rot" addresses the urgent topic of couch potatodom without apology; other numbers ratify such essential life functions as "Crucial Bar-B-Q," "Fun" and "Beer." Throughout, the violent energy, good playing and Jimmy Gestapo's spirited vocals make Murphy's Law (on green vinyl no less) a near-brilliant mistake.

Back with a Bong! repeats the feat, adding simple horn charts to songs about eating, drinking, dental health, buying/smoking dope and patriotism. (Does this actually make youth culture sense?) The mixture of brass and thrash is more surprising than effective—except on a clumsy stab at ska, where the combination sounds awful—but the quartet's refusal to leave punk alone just might lead somewhere amazing one of these days. (Judging by "Bong," reggae is not their wisest path.) [i]

PAULINE MURRAY

See Penetration.

JUNIOR MURVIN

Police and Thieves (Mango) 1977

Not to be confused with Wailers guitarist Junior Marvin, Murvin is the possessor of a fabulous falsetto. (In the late '60s he did reggae covers of Curtis Mayfield tunes and was known as Junior Soul.) In 1976, after some success writing for others, he teamed with legendary producer Lee Perry and delivered "Police and Thieves," an instant classic with phenomenal impact in both Jamaica and England (it came as a timely remark on increased racial tensions in both nations). As an added intercultural bonus, the song's appropriately rebellious lyrics offered the Clash a convenient way to make an early reggae statement on their first LP.

Murvin's original is worth every bit of applause it's gotten. The cool, understated presentation contradicts the mood of the lyrics, but lends them an underlying tension unattainable by histrionics (which, by contrast, gives extra weight to the more dramatic middle eight). As for the rest of the album, other than the excellent, more groove-minded "Roots Train," it's a swell voice and righteous riddims buoying plain songs. Murvin never did really capitalize on his big success. [jg]

See also Lee Perry.

MUSIC REVELATION ENSEMBLE

See James Blood Ulmer.

MUSSOLINI HEADKICK

Themes for Violent Retribution (World Domination-Wax Trax!) 1989 ●

Blood on the Flag (World Domination-Caroline) 1990 ●

Those generally intimidated by industrialists' relentless amelodic pounding may find this Belgian-American group's debut easier to face: the most off-putting thing about Themes for Violent Retribution is the (anti-fascist) cover's swastika. While this part-time party starring Luc Van Acker (of Revolting Cocks) and singer/keyboard manipulator John Butcher (of King Butcher) does employ the form's standard tools—stern beats, found sounds and distorted chants—MH keeps things reasonably musical with an undercurrent of techno-conservatism and, on Side B, actual songs with verses, choruses and rough melodies.

The harsher Blood on the Flag, again produced by Van Acker, delves more deeply into the punishing power of electronic percussion and chaotic noise, as Butcher angrily shouts his military-minded political lyrics in topical songs like "Kabul," "Homeland" and "War Drum." With the exception of two near-songs ("Cracking Up" and "Holy War"), the shards of musical intelligence here crop up only as accents, playing a similar role to the audio vérité sound bites. [i]

See also Revolting Cocks, Luc Van Acker.

MUTABARUKA

Check It (Alligator) 1983

Outcry (Shanachie) 1984 ●

The Mystery Unfolds (Shanachie) 1986 ●

Any Which Way ... Freedom (Shanachie) 1989 ●

Blakk wi Blak ... K ... K ... (Shanachie) 1991 ●

VARIOUS ARTISTS

Word Soun' 'ave Power (Heartbeat) 1983

Dub Poets Dub (Heartbeat) 1983

As a dub poet, Mutabaruka (born in Jamaica as Allan Hope) inevitably inspires comparisons to Linton Kwesi Johnson, but where LKJ's poems are often ironic and his delivery knife sharp, Mutabaruka's work is more direct, thick with dread. Unlike Dennis Bovell's gorgeous formal arrangements on Johnson's LPs, Mutabaruka is more spontaneous. His poems dictate the musical direction—the rhythms jerk the band along. Suffice to say both artists derive from the same traditions of Jamaican poetry and music; if you like one, chances are you'll like the other.

Mutabaruka's first two albums are equally strong. Check It, a bold debut, contains three early singles: "Naw Give Up," "Everytime I Hear de Soun'" and "Hard Time Loving." Outcry continues the poet's verbal attack, while showing the influence of his dramatic concert appearances. (He performs in manacles.) Music and lyrics sound more linked than on the prior LP, and the band seems to be working with the poet rather than just backing him up.

On his third release, The Mystery Unfolds, Mutabaruka's lyrics are presented in a variety of musical settings. The LP is assured and versatile, an ambitious mixed bag with a cappella tracks, full-scale arrangements, audio effects and special guest vocalists (including Marcia Griffiths and Ini Kamose). While widening the performer's range, The Mystery Unfolds broadened his appeal as well. Indeed, "Dis Poem" enjoyed some popularity in NYC dance clubs, sampled in with house music.

"By the ballot or the bullet, by the Bible or the gun, any which way freedom must come!" On Any Which Way . . . Freedom, the revolutionary dub poet returns, stronger and more outspoken than ever; humor, anger and love mingle with political analysis as the music and words twist, turn, jump and soar to create message music for listening, dancing and serious contemplation. The title track samples My Fair Lady's "I Could Have Danced All Night," while "Revenge" employs South African mbaqanga music.

Mutabaruka has also produced other West Indian poets, with two significant compilations (Word Sou'ave Power and Woman Talk) to his credit. The first also spawned the excellent Dub Poets Dub, a companion LP of instrumental tracks. [bk/aw]

MX-80 SOUND

EP (BRBQ) 1976 (Gulcher) 1977

Hard Attack (nr/Island) 1977

Out of the Tunnel (Ralph) 1980

Crowd Control (Ralph) 1981

MX-80

Existential Lover [tape] (Quadruped) 1987

Das Love Boat (A&R) 1990

BRUCE ANDERSON

Brutality I . . . America/Iran [tape] (Quadruped) 1987

Brutality II . . . Israel/Palestine [tape] (Quadruped) 1988

O-TYPE

O-Type [tape] (Quadruped) 1986

Darling [tape] (Quadruped) 1988

GIZZARDS

Unicorn [tape] (Quadruped) 1985

Humdinger [tape] (Quadruped) 1986

Sgt. Peppersteak [tape] (Quadruped) 1988

Where Good Friends Meet EP (Quadruped) 1989

This weird post-metal art band originally from Bloomington, Indiana (from the same scene that spawned the goofy Gizmos) centers their sound around Bruce Anderson's slashing, trebly guitar riffing and Rich Stim's deadpan, often indecipherable, mumble. As a five-piece (with two drummers), they twice released a 7-inch EP (subtitled "Hard Pop from the Hoosiers") on local labels, impressing Island Records enough to sign them. But the resulting Hard Attack never came out in the States and attracted little attention aside from some critical raves. A move to San Francisco (shedding one drummer in the process) brought them to the attention of that city's Ralph Records, home of the Residents and other offbeat types.

Out of the Tunnel may well be MX-80's high-tide mark, particularly on the concurrent single, "Someday We'll Be King" b/w "White Night"; on these two sides, their formula of convoluted, breakneck melodies, cross-fed musical genres and Anderson's white-hot soloing nears critical mass.

Crowd Control doesn't quite reach the same lofty heights. With more strict adherence to "metal" (in the Blue Öyster Cult sense) form, the songs here merely replace much of the white-hot intensity of Tunnel with volume. The results range from epiphany ("Obsession: Devotion" and "Face of the Earth") to nails-against-chalkboard (like a take on the theme from Brian DePalma's Sisters). A litigation-enforced five-year hiatus followed; while the band never technically split (note the plethora of pseudonymous releases), they did a pretty convincing disappearing act. When the curtain lifted again, a chopped and channeled leaner MX-80 was revealed.

Existential Lover is a step back from overkill's precipice; a biting and nasty artifact that simmers constantly with the psychotic abandon that spewed irregularly from earlier efforts. The filmic bent is still there on "Monster from Japan" and "Orson," and Stim's deadpan drawl recalls a non-homogenized Stan Ridgway in its seamy travel guide monotone. A real edge-of-your-seat listen.

Das Love Boat (perhaps the first all-instrumental album to sport a parental advisory) is an exhaustively complete retrospective, encompassing material from all the band's releases, plus early ('75-'78) live tracks. The package is topped off with a brace of newly recorded jazzy efforts, the best of which is the rasping title track.

Anderson's solo tapes are essential for those with a passion for volume-intensive but fluid guitar improv; imagine a cross between Sonny Sharrock and a bad-mood Robert Fripp. The first tape borrows a few MX-80 themes, but expands on them enough that you'll barely notice. Israel: Palestine is a touch harsher and more claustrophobic in tone. Bracing stuff.

O-Type was the moniker Anderson and MX-80's extraordinary bassist Dale Sophiea used to create theme music for a Ralph film (the theme to which crops up on Das Love Boat) and sporadically revived to churn out doom-laden, Germanic power-rock that's not all that far removed from an axe-wielding Suicide—especially Anderson's impassioned vocals. Darling is the pick of that litter. The Gizzards (identified as "the weak, separated Siamese twins of three MX-80 members"—geddit?) offer a few more laffs, though not nearly as many as Sgt. Peppersteak's title would suggest. Over the course of these releases, the mood has become decidedly more bleak (and MX-80-ish), peaking with Peppersteak's martial, creepy "Straight Line" and "Trailer Park."

Members of MX-80 also back Stim's singing wife, Angel Corpus-Christi, on her releases, discs that meld Patti Smith-poesy with fringey no wave. If ever a band realized the potential of pre-punk "underground" noise rock, MX-80 is it. [mp/dss]

MY BLOODY VALENTINE

This Is Your Bloody Valentine EP (nr/Tycoon) 1985 (Ger.

Dossier) 1988

Geek EP (nr/Fever) 1986

The New Record by My Bloody Valentine EP
(nr/Kaleidoscope Sound) 1986
Sunny Sundae Smile EP (nr/Lazy) 1987
Strawberry Wine EP (nr/Lazy) 1987
Ecstasy EP (nr/Lazy) 1987
My Bloody Valentine Isn't Anything (Creation-Relativity)
1988 •
Feed Me with Your Kiss EP (nr/Creation) 1988
You Made Me Realise EP (nr/Creation) 1988
Ecstasy and Strawberry Wine [CD] (nr/Lazy) 1989 •
Glider EP (nr/Creation) 1989 (Sire) 1990 •
Tremolo (nr/Creation) 1990 (Sire-Warner Bros.) 1991 •

Formed in Dublin in 1983, the dauntingly prolific My Bloody Valentine quickly became a cornerstone of a loose, largely media-built coalition of independent-label bands playing aggressive (and aggressively opaque) pop music that stood in direct opposition to both "rockism" and the twee bedsit romanticism of the pallid anti-rockists.

The first recordings capture a band in step with the times, but perhaps a bit too eager to get into the studio. This Is Your Bloody Valentine (recorded, incidentally, in Berlin) displays graveyard roots, style-hopping from campy (almost Batcave) Doors-isms like "The Love Gang" and "Don't Cramp My Style" to the Cramps to funereal spelunking in Nick's Cave. The only thing missing is originality. Geek is pretty much a carbon copy, largely because of David Conway's basso profundo (occasionally ridiculous) croon, but The New Record uses a broader palette: the breathy "Lovelee Sweet Darlene" is outright childlike in its innocence.

By this time, My Bloody Valentine had begun construction on a wall of sound/noise (depending on your perspective) that's often likened to the Jesus and Mary Chain's. But where the Reids sequester themselves in a forbidding cage of hardened steel, MBV beckon from behind a glistening, almost transparent curtain of the thinnest gold leaf. This approach became all the more tantalizing when Conway left after Sunny Sundae Smile (notable for the silliest song ever about blow-up-doll love) and took most of the stormclouds with him. Strawberry Wine retreats almost completely from gloom, as the quartet instead immerses itself in West Coast psychedelia (Arthur Lee looms large over the wispy melody of "Can I Touch You?").

Ecstasy (paired on CD with Strawberry Wine) ups the dissonance factor a bit, and by relegating the shared vocals of new member Bilinda Butcher and Kevin Shields (both also play guitar) to the status of just another instrument, simultaneously increases the level of mystery—appropriate, considering the general Creation-band tendency to elevate sound qua sound over individual songs. There are certainly some of the latter on the band's first bona fide longplayer, Isn't Anything. Most, it seems, revolve around, er, non-mainstream sexuality (check out "Cigarette in Your Bed"—only on the British edition—for some strange kicks); all ride waves of languid "glide guitar" (the band's phrase) to almost narcotic effect. Trivia buffs should note My Bloody Valentine's appropriation of Public Enemy's "Security of the First World" riff—a full two years before Madonna's "Justify My Love."

Perhaps as a byproduct of a less hectic schedule, Feed Me and You Made Me Realise (not its real name: the four-song 12-inch that features that tune actually has no title) are at once as resolute and disparate as any consecutive releases in the band's considerable catalogue: the Butcher-sung tracks throb with subdued thriller soundtrack tension, while "You Made Me Realise" strips down to skeletal riff-rock basics for an X-like hootenanny.

Glider, on the other hand, is a wholehearted embrace of stasis, not at all a bad thing, given the band's extraordinary ability to arrive without travelling. The best track, "Soon," all but entirely dispenses with frills like choruses and chord progressions, opting instead for seven minutes of mesmerizing swells and contractions. [dss]

MY DAD IS DEAD

My Dad Is Dead... and He's Not Gonna Take It Anymore (St. Valentine) 1986 (Ger. Houses in Motion) 1990

Peace, Love and Murder (Birth) 1987
Let's Skip the Details (Homestead) 1988 •
The Best Defense (Homestead) 1989
The Taller You Are, the Shorter You Get (Homestead)
1989 •
Shine EP (Scat) 1990

Under his open-to-misinterpretation nom de disc My Dad Is Dead, Cleveland singer/writer/one-man-band Mark Edwards makes music whose appeal lies largely in its matter-of-fact handling of deep personal traumas. As comforting as they are harrowing, Edwards' records have grown steadily in fluency and confidence.

My Dad Is Dead, most of whose songs were indeed inspired by the loss of Edwards' father, is a compelling, hypnotic debut that ranges from thrashy aggression ("Black Cloud") to supple melodicism ("Talk to the Weatherman") to industrial gloom ("Say Goodbye"). The unifying thread is the downbeat lyrics; the sole weak link is Edwards' flat singing, which improved on subsequent releases.

Peace, Love and Murder and Let's Skip the Details show considerable growth, both lyrically and musically. The instrumental attack has greater bite, and the latter disc finds Edwards applying subtler melodic devices (on tracks like "Lay Down the Law" and "Boiling Over") without sacrificing the music's original tension. The Best Defense is an assemblage of tracks from an unreleased EP, outtakes from Let's Skip the Details and some 4-track home recordings; though not as essential as its predecessor, it has some fine moments, including three surprisingly harmonious instrumentals.

The Taller You Are, the Shorter You Get (a double LP) is simultaneously Edwards' most ambitious effort and his most accessible. The expanded format allows for some longer experimental tracks, most of which work out quite nicely; there's even an almost-danceable instrumental, "Meep Meep." Elsewhere, Edwards veers relatively close to the musical mainstream (hard rock on "Too Far Gone," acoustic folk-rock on "Nothing Special") with considerable success. His lyrics, meanwhile, have grown less morose and more philosophical, and he sings them with new-found expressiveness.

Shine is a double 7-inch recorded with the rhythm section of Cleveland's Prison Shake: four new songs and four rocked-up remakes of previously released material. [hd]

MY LIFE WITH THE THRILL KILL KULT

I See Good Spirits and I See Bad Spirits (Wax Trax!)
1988 •

Kooler Than Jesus (Wax Trax!) 1990 ◊

Confessions of a Knife ... (Wax Trax!) 1990 •

There's house music, and then there's Amityville Horror music. But this pseudonymous conglomerate of sample masters and programmers—Groovy Mann (Frank Nardiello, vocals), Buzz McCoy (Marston Daley, keyboards/bass) and Buck Ryder (Thomas Lockyear, keyboards/percussion)—wasn't so great at saying get out! right off the bat. On Good Spirits, dialogue samples (mostly dealing with that pop icon, Satan) and silly vocals aside, Thrill Kill Kult veers between sounding like a stripped-down Tangerine Dream and an overtly discofied . . . Tangerine Dream. Which is not to say it's a bad record.

Kooler Than Jesus, named for a 1989 12-inch single, is a CD/cassette compilation of the group's non-LP work to date.

Confessions of a Knife synthesizes the dance smarts of "Kooler Than Jesus" with the first album's sample-happy excesses. To boot, there are touches of metal and world music and constant evocations of bad trips and gory scares. Perfect background music for an evening of acid, speed and Herschell Gordon Lewis movies. [gk]

MYRNA

See Human Switchboard.

N N N N N N

NAKED PREY

Naked Prey (Down There-Enigma) 1984
Under the Blue Marlin (Frontier) 1986
40 Miles from Nowhere (Frontier) 1987
Kill the Messenger (Fundamental) 1990 •

Van Christian was at one time Green on Red's drummer; back home in Tucson, Arizona, he switched to vocals and guitar and formed Naked Prey. The quartet plays rough-edged country rock with similarities to Green on Red (as well as Dream Syndicate and others in the California/Arizona axis). Although the seven-song debut's powerful sound is strictly modern, some of David Seger's sociopathic guitar solos recall acid-drenched summer of love shows at the Fillmore. An unassuming, occasionally exciting record.

With a new drummer, label and producer (Paul B. Cutler), Naked Prey revved up their folk-distorto-rock on Under the Blue Marlin. Christian's colorful singing and Seger's guitar work remain the group's virtues, as Prey's songs don't make much of an impression. (A Stooges cover is both helpful and indicative of the band's own failings.)

The same problem plagues the thematically linked 40 Miles from Nowhere: despite killer guitar (including slide) and relentless energy, unimaginative melodies and lyrics derail the effort. (Christian's deteriorating voice is another trouble spot.) Still, a pair of covers—Jagger/Richards' "Silver Train" and a funereal version of "Wichita Lineman" (get the drift?)—proves what these boys might do with substantial material. Kill the Messenger is a live album recorded in Tucson in 1988.

[i]

NAKED RAYGUN

Basement Screams EP (Ruthless) 1983
Throb Throb (Homestead) 1985 •
All Rise (Homestead) 1986 •
Jettison (Caroline) 1988 •
Understand? (Caroline) 1989 •
Raygun ... Naked Raygun (Caroline) 1990 •

PEGBOY

Three-Chord Monte EP (1/4 Stick-Touch and Go) 1990

Chicago's Naked Raygun is one of the encouraging new punk bands that bloomed in the Midwest long after thrash had apparently isolated the punk aesthetic in its own circumscribed ghetto, where it would never again challenge the musical values of regular folk. Lump the longer-running Raygun in with Hüsker Dü, Man Sized Action, Big Black and Breaking Circus and you'll be oversimplifying, but you'll have your finger on an early-'80s movement of sorts. All of these bands expanded the boundaries and cast aside some of the trappings of punk to bring it back into contact with the mainstream. If none of them ever attained huge success, all at least appealed to adventurous people who don't have mo-hawks

Naked Raygun (like most of the other bands mentioned) has an unabashed love for the naïve arty experimentation of Wire and the Buzzcocks. Basement Screams is a hodgepodge of underproduced, underconceived songs with a lot of Misfits-type paramilitary chanting; energetic and articulate but not directly compelling. Throb Throb's songs are much better, its drive more urgent and John Haggerty's piercing guitar lines a sonically expansive, sharp force. Even at low volume, the album is loud. The best track, "I Don't Know," is a grippingly melodic art-punk anthem that turns on singer/plumber Jeff Pezzati's anti-idol wail, "What poor gods we do make." A potent, impressive album.

All Rise keeps up the all-out assault level, with dynamic co-production by Iain Burgess making the guitars roar with speaker-shredding distortion. Pezzati's subtly vindictive lyrics (e.g., "Mr. Gridlock" and "The Strip") voice their critiques in an oblique, ironic fashion generally outside the capabilities of punk auteurs. All Rise may be a bit short on melodies (something hinted at in "Knock Me Down"), but Raygun is obviously getting better all the time.

Raygun continue to achieve excellence on their third LP, Jettison. Quite different from previous releases, the music's considerably slower speed (only the most notable change) gives almost breathtaking impact to the already forceful sound. "Hammer Head," "Soldier's Requiem," "When the Walls Come Down" and the utterly brilliant "Walk in Cold" are staggering in their intensity. The CD adds four songs: three live cuts and "Vanilla Blue," originally issued as a single.

Understand? finds the band at peak power, delivering its best collection of songs to date. Continuing a trend begun on Jettison, all four members contribute more or less equally to the songwriting, resulting in a compelling array of martial chants and supercharged rockers. With one exception (the overtly geopolitical "Hips Swingin'"), the lyrics all stick to the theme of personal politics as filtered through macho adventure comics.

John Haggerty then left to form Pegboy, creating a void in the band which new guitarist Bill Stephens doesn't adequately fill on Raygun . . . Naked Raygun. A disappointing album full of pretentious cyberpunk lyrics and half-baked ideas (isn't it a little late for skateboard songs?), some cuts add insult to injury with muddy, almost demo-quality production. Stephens lacks the chops to step into Haggerty's combat boots, but he is the author of the disc's best song, "The Promise," an aggressive shot of melodic punk that does the band's class of '77 forebears proud. Though hardly a total disaster, Raygun is a definite misstep from a band that has done much better.

As for Haggerty's new endeavor, Raygun's loss is Pegboy's gain. On the introductory 12-inch, Haggerty, his drummer brother Joe and a couple of ex-Bhopal Stiffs race through four blistering doses of melodic punk reminiscent of, well, Naked Raygun and Bhopal Stiffs. A nice job, but the goopy, introspective lyrics could use some work. [j/l/ag/db]

NAPALM DEATH

Scum (nr/Earache) 1987 •
From Enslavement to Obliteration (nr/Earache) 1988 •
The Peel Sessions EP (nr/Strange Fruit) 1989 •
Napalm Death EP (nr/Rise Above) 1989
Mentally Murdered EP (nr/Earache) 1989 •
Harmony Corruption (Earache-Combat) 1990 •
The Peel Sessions (Strange Fruit-Dutch East India) 1991 ◊
Mass-Appeal Madness EP (Earache-Combat) 1991 •

NAPALM DEATH/S.O.B.

EP (Jap. Sound of Burial) 1989

PAINKILLER

The Guts of a Virgin (Earache-Combat) 1991 •

Just as they missed the boat with rap, the champions of "alternative" music refused to acknowledge a new alternative several years later when it arose from the English hinterlands in the form of grindcore, a virulent mutation of the most extreme elements of hardcore, metal and industrial. This blurred sonic cesspool just might be the death of traditional music: in its purest form, grind's 5-to-90-second blasts of time-defying beats, hyper-distorted guitars and unintelligible growls and shrieks contain no verses, choruses or anything nice at all, just exploding bites of encapsulated hate and rage.

Formed around 1981, vaguely in line with the British hardcore and Crass-related tribes, Napalm Death made its vinyl debut on the third Bullshit Detector sampler. Crass' influence is clear in both Scum's structureless metal-core blur and its cover art. Although the album's 28 tracks were recorded in two sessions eight months apart (with different lineups, to boot: guitarist Justin Broadrick left after the first to form Head of David and, later, Godflesh; he was replaced by Bill Steer of Carcass), the songs are indistinguishable to all but the most carefully attuned ears; Lee Dornan's larynx-shredding nightmares of a contaminated world explode on impact with the sonic holocaust. Several tracks are under five seconds; "You Suffer (But Why?)" actually reaches the one-second mark.

Grindcore quickly outgrew its "extreme hardcore" parentage in virtually every category except intelligibility. From Enslavement to Obliteration lengthens the songs but maintains a superhuman intensity level, with a distinct early-Swans influence adding an even more sadistic twist. The scathing lyrics attack a mind-boggling array of topics. ("Cock Rock Alienation" quotes Rudimentary Peni and contains the priceless lines, "Who cares if they've got no brains/Give us tits and tools/We love it when you feed us shit.") First pressings came with a five-song bonus EP; Scum and four from the EP are included on the 54-track From Enslavement CD.

Enslavement rallied the likeminded bands that had arisen in England, Europe and Japan into a full-fledged international grind movement. John Zorn championed the band Stateside, forming a Napalm-ish "jazzcore" outfit called Naked City with Boredoms vocalist Yamatsuko Eye. (Zorn and Napalm drummer Mick Harris later recorded the Painkiller album, The Guts of a Virgin, with Bill Laswell.)

The Mentally Murdered EP presents a more articulate (yet no less savage) sound, its advanced and better-structured songs suggesting a promising new direction, putting a thrash metal tinge where its predecessor's industrial accent had been. Napalm Death is a hopelessly rare 7-inch recorded live on the band's European tour in November '88; the apparently titleless Japanese EP offers six rough but otherwise unissued tracks plus a half-dozen cuts by a local outfit. Cut in '87 and '88, The Peel Sessions crams a total of 26 songs (including several rarities) into a mind-melting 21 minutes: an awesomely brutal listening experience.

In mid-'89, vocalist Lee Dornan and guitarist Bill Steer left. Dornan went on to form Cathedral, positively the slowest, lowest-tuned band ever; Steer opted to concentrate fulltime on Carcass. Napalm Death's remaining half quickly recruited vocalist Barney Greenway (ex-Benediction) and two new guitarists, thrash metalers who helped remake Napalm in their own style: first-class, but no longer innovative. Harmony Corruption concentrates the metallic elements of Mentally Murdered; lightning-fast drums, buzzsaw riffs and Greenway's wolfman vocals push the band firmly into Slayer territory. Initial British vinyl copies came with a live LP that includes an awesome cover of Godflesh's "Avalanche Master Song." The British CD adds a bonus studio cut and the entire Mentally Murdered EP (also available on its own CD); the American CD only includes the studio track, "Hiding Behind."

Mass-Appeal Madness, a raw-in-the-studio rapid-fire romp through two new cuts and new versions of two older songs, finds the band in much looser form than on Harmony Corruption and promisingly suggests a return to their trademark sound, high-pitched screams and all. The American edition adds two non-LP tracks of Harmony Corruption vintage, as well as the Mentally Murdered EP. [ja]

See also Carcass, Godflesh, Head of David.

NAZ NOMAD & THE NIGHTMARES

See Damned.

NEATS

The monkey's head in the corner of the room. (Ace of Hearts) 1982

Neats (Ace of Hearts) 1983

Crash at Crush (Coyote-Twin/Tone) 1987

Blues End Blue (Coyote-Twin/Tone) 1989 •

Boston's Neats started out playing unselfconscious nouveau folk-rock. Sidestepping nostalgia, the quartet's simple, low-key style would sound perfect in the discothèque scene of some '60s Sunset Strip teen-scene movie, but there is also something clearly modern in the straightforward guitar/bass/drums blend Eric Martin's dramatic voice gives the seven tunes on the 1982 Monkey's Head mini-album their strength. Although the material is serviceable, none of it is striking, a really memorable number would have made this a great debut.

Neats sports an extraordinary white and black pop/op-art cover and nine new tunes, but little evidence of development other than the addition of organ (which makes them resemble a droning California paisley neo-psychedelic band). The album has good, dense sound and solidly mesmerizing, if rushed, playing, but lacks the exemplary songs (or even findable melodies) to give it shape or form.

With the lineup intact but for a new bassist, the Neats that returned to vinyl four years later were a much different proposition. Led by the song "Big Loud Sound" and a raunchy remake of "Monkey's Head," the pounding big-beat swamp-rock comes as a shock from this once modestly amplified group. Raspy guitar distortion (intentional and otherwise—shitty production adds to the fuzziness) dominates, as Martin gallantly vies for attention over Phil Caruso's thick six-string roar. While bluesy passages suggest a cross between Creedence and old Gun Club, other cuts take an above-ground rock'n'roll approach. (Throughout, Terry Hanley recalls the Cramps with mongoloid tom-tom drumming.) Crash at Crush doesn't quite work, but it's a promising enough experiment.

Blues End Blue (originally announced as Dig Deeper) refines the Neats' gonzo approach with bracing power and reasonably clear sound. Shifting between measured R&B and charging rock'n'roll (nothing too swampy this time), the Neats take standard bar-band conventions and crank them up to eleven, steering clear of California-band metalisms or mainstream rock success by keeping things raw-sounding and checking any potential bombast at the studio door. The songs aren't all strong enough to handle such rough treatment, and the relentless blare gets wearing—the piano-led power ballad, "Time Is a Lie," arrives to provide contrast a track or two late—but, in small doses, Blues End Blue is a blast. [i]

NECESSARIES

Big Sky (nr/Sire) 1981

Event Horizon (nr/Sire) 1982

These two albums are almost the same; the original release was withdrawn, given a partial overhaul, a new title and a relaunch. Although the band was from New York, and included ex-Modern Lover bassist Ernie Brooks, both LPs are UK-only. (Chris Spedding was a member, but had split by the time of these recordings.)

The Necessaries' high-power pop puts the best attributes of rock (crazed, distorted guitars, loud drums) to the service of melodious, intelligent songwriting. Like the early Motors or Records, the Necessaries start with catchy, solid tunes and then give 'em full electric treatment. Rough but sensitive, Big Sky/Event Horizon is an impressive outing from a criminally neglected band.

Brooks went on to play with numerous bands around New York; keyboardist Arthur Russell became a radically original new music cellist; singer/guitarist Ed

Tomney wound up in Rage to Live; drummer Jesse Chamberlain (ex-Red Crayola) worked with Spedding and others. [i]

See also Rage to Live.

NECROS

Necros EP (Dischord-Touch and Go) 1981

Conquest for Death (Touch and Go) 1983

Tangled Up (Restless) 1987 •

Live or Else (Medusa) 1989 ♠

NECROS/WHITE FLAG

Jail Jello EP (Gasotanka) 1986

This Ohio punk quartet's crunching thrash metal is devastating—and not just in its speed and power, although those qualities are present in brutal abundance. The tough part about listening to the Necros is the awkward, ungainly chord sequences they drag you through. As soon as they gather a head of steam, the band dives into a deliberate tune-defeating change for the mosh section. But the harsh result keeps a fresh edge on the energy, preventing the thrash from blurring into generic noise. Although Conquest for Death is pigeonhole hardcore, the Necros have enough creative verve and imagination to make it exciting. (The earlier EP—nine surprisingly clear-sounding pre-hardcore punk slices on a 7-inch 45—shows a young early lineup, including Touch and Go's Corey Rusk on bass, to be starting out with a commitment to song structure and careful playing.)

Tangled Up comes wrapped in a spiffy Big Daddy Roth cover painting of Rat Fink; the Necros (only two original members remain) temper their hardcore instincts for bristling, burly guitar rock—an easily accessible and likable punk sound. There are still a few obligatory mosh parts so skins know where to change their mode of dance, but, for the most part, songs blaze straight through without a breather. Stalwart Barry Henssler sings routine lyrics in a strong and listenable voice against the answering refrains as Andy Wendler's power chords sizzle with distortion in a frenzy of well-focused energy. (Credit the band and their manager for the noteworthy production.)

The joint EP with White Flag contains three songs by each, recorded in support of Dead Kennedys leader Jello Biafra during his censorship-related legal troubles. [i]

NEGATIVE TREND

See Flipper.

NEGATIVLAND

Negativland (Seeland) 1980

Points (Seeland) 1981

A Big 10-8 Place (Seeland) 1983

Jamcon '84 [tape] (Seeland) 1984

Escape from Noise (SST) 1987 •

Helter Stupid (SST) 1989 •

Pastor Dick [tape] SST 1989

The Weatherman [tape] (SST) 1989

One member of California's Negativland works in a day-care center; another writes computer programs. That pretty well sums up the group's conceptual spectrum. Negativland raids the sonic junkyards of suburban culture to create disjointed, pointedly inorganic aural sculptures that seem to start where John Cage left off. They frequently juice up the found sounds with keyboards and percussion, but that only serves to emphasize the tenuous nature of that crazy stuff we like to call pop music.

Negativland, each copy of which is uniquely and attractively packaged with a different kind of wallpaper, isn't really music and it isn't merely sound effects. Lots of different things blip by, while voices allude to subjects that one never really gets a grip on. Evocative yet very elusive.

Points adds more music to the mix. Beginning in rather a childish mood, it turns increasingly darker and more despairing, finally fading out into a monotonous industrial hum.

A Big 10-8 Place is a musical exploration of the band's Contra Costa County home (just over the hills from Berkeley). As much a loving tribute as a scathing indictment of suburbia's soulless façade, the record is a richly detailed, remarkably complex combination of the inorganic (electronics and industrial atmospherics) and the human (voices discuss whatever)

Escape from Noise attempts to answer a musical question—"Is there any escape from noise?"—and parody a perfect pop product. Amid a wide variety of sonic constructions and actual songs, you'll find "Christianity Is Stupid" (allegedly the impetus for Minnesota teenager David Brom's familicide), a little girl with hiccups singing "Over the Rainbow," and calculatedly negligible guest appearances by Jello Biafra, Jerry Garcia, the Residents, Fred Frith and Mark Mothersbaugh.

A weird practical joke involving the aforementioned murder becomes the convoluted source material for the side-long title track on Helter Stupid, the band's disturbing masterpiece about media manipulation.

Negativland has also released a series of cassettes culled from the band's ongoing weekly free-form radio show, Over the Edge. Pastor Dick offers absolution on a budget, while The Weatherman tries to drag listeners out of their closets. Innovative and loose—the way radio oughta be. [rg]

NEGAZIONE

... Lo Spirito Continua ... (Mordam) 1986

You want to hear hardcore blurted in Italian by a singer named Zazzo? This quartet from Turin has the crashing sound of high-speed American punk down cold, and lyrics like "Non sprecare parole e sorrisi per me/lo conosco già la fine del libro" (which, judging by the English translation provided, are surprisingly articulate for the genre). Hey, it works for opera. . . . [i]

LES NEGRESSES VERTES

Mlah (Sire-Warner Bros.) 1989 •

Impossible to categorize (forget that Gallic Pogues nonsense), this bizarre eight-man group indulges the typically French fascination for exoticism without giving up any native ground. The instrumentation on Mlah—mostly acoustic guitars, accordion, horns, Spanish-and-African flavored percussion—is in the tradition of Parisian buskers, but the sound isn't. Heady, invigorating and often dark, it's perfect existentialist-basement-café music for the more worldbeat minded, while some of the songs tend to be arch, others (like "Orane") evoke wonderful, one-of-a-kind moods and images. [gk]

NEIGHBORHOODS

Fire Is Coming (Mustang) 1984

... the high hard one ... (Restless) 1986

Reptile Men (Emergo) 1987

Hoodwinked (Emergo) 1990 •

The Neighborhoods (Third Stone-Atlantic) 1991 •

This veteran Boston trio's appeal is immediate: they sound good. Nothing fancy or intricate, just good tunes, good vocals, good rock'n'roll drive and feel. Leader David Minehan (guitars, singing, songs) ain't exactly a lyrical Einstein, but he's no stoop either.

The group started out playing strong power pop (a 1980 single, "Prettiest Girl," remains a local classic) in the wake of British neo-mods. The eight-song Fire Is Coming is a get-your-feet-wet proposition, relative to the albums; a likable pointer to the future. The production is a bit thin, but you can tell what the horns on the very first track (ambitious idea) were meant to sound like. The cover of "If I Had a Hammer" was a great idea, enthusiastically (if unimaginatively) executed.

The first two full-length LPs show maturation, both are full of instantly memorable tunes, though the earlier outing still has some sincere but clichéd lyrics. The production on high hard one is plain but crisp; Reptile Men's sound is fuller and punchier. The Who influence (the EP's horns were a hint) is more early Who on hard one, middle Who on Reptile Men (the silly part is the use of "Tommy" and "Pure and Easy" as song titles, but the rest reflects an unslavish Who's Next influence). Solid rock'n'roll.

The trio virtually goes arena-rock on Hoodwinked (later revised and reissued as The Neighborhoods), coproduced by Aerosmith guitarist Brad Whitford. But the 'Hoods avoid the posturing and overstatement that normally goes with the territory, and the songs are consistently decent. (Notable exceptions: Minehan's paean to Evel Knievel and a pointless rehash of Cheap Trick's "Southern Girls," minus piano and the panache.) Unfortunately, the band's identity has all but vanished into this punchy yet slick conventionality. [jg]

BILL NELSON

Northern Dream (nr/Smile) 1971 (nr/Butt) 1981

Quit Dreaming and Get on the Beam (nr/Mercury) 1981

(nr/Cocteau) 1985 (Cocteau-Enigma) 1989 •

Sounding the Ritual Echo (nr/Mercury) 1981 (nr/Cocteau) 1985 (Cocteau-Enigma) 1989 •

Das Kabinett (The Cabinet of Dr. Caligari) (nr/Cocteau) 1981 •

The Love That Whirls (Diary of a Thinking Heart) (PVC) 1982 (Cocteau-Enigma) 1989 •

La Belle et la Bête (PVC) 1982

Flaming Desire and Other Passions EP (PVC) 1982

Chimera EP (nr/Mercury) 1983 (nr/Cocteau) 1987 •

Savage Gestures for Charms Sake (nr/Cocteau) 1983 (Cocteau-Enigma) 1989 •

Vistamix (Portrait) 1984 [CD] (Epic) 1991 •

Trial by Intimacy (The Book of Splendours) (nr/Cocteau) 1984

A Catalogue of Obsessions (nr/Cocteau) 1984 (Cocteau-Enigma) 1989 •

The Summer of God's Piano (nr/Cocteau) 1984 (Cocteau-Enigma) 1989 •

2fold Aspect of Everything (nr/Cocteau) 1984 (Cocteau-Enigma) 1989 •

Das Kabinett/La Belle et la Bête (nr/Cocteau) 1985 (Cocteau-Enigma) 1989 •

Getting the Holy Ghost Across (nr/Portrait) 1986 •

On a Blue Wing (Portrait) 1986

Chamber of Dreams (nr/Cocteau) 1986 (Cocteau-Enigma) 1989 •

Map of Dreams (nr/Cocteau) 1987 (Cocteau-Enigma) 1989 •

Chance Encounters in the Garden of Lights (nr/Cocteau) 1987 (Cocteau-Enigma) 1988 •

Life in Your Hands EP (nr/Cocteau) 1988 •

The Strangest Things Sampler (Cocteau-Enigma) 1989 •
Pavillions of the Heart and Soul (Cocteau-Enigma) 1989 •

Simplex (Cocteau-Enigma) 1989 •

Duplex (nr/Cocteau) 1989 •

Demonstrations of Affection (nr/Cocteau) 1989 •

Luminous (nr/Imaginary) 1991 •

BILL NELSON'S RED NOISE

Sound-on-Sound (Harvest) 1979 (Cocteau-Enigma) 1985 •

Revolt into Style EP (nr/Cocteau) 1983

BILL NELSON'S ORCHESTRA ARCANA

Iconography (nr/Cocteau) 1986 (Cocteau-Enigma) 1989 •

Optimism (Cocteau-Enigma) 1988 •

From hippie folk singer to awesome rock guitarist to high-tech art-adventurer to unstoppable instrumental noodler, Bill Nelson's musical career, now spanning two decades, has consistently shown style, character and exemplary attention to quality—as well as unrestrained indulgent excess. Beginning with a homemade solo album released by a local Yorkshire record store through a six-album stint leading the hard-rocking but intelligent Be-Bop Deluxe then the short-lived experimental Red Noise and finally as a wholly independent solo act (again), Nelson has made lots of brilliant music, and has also worked with some of the most interesting purveyors of modern sounds, producing and playing on numerous records.

Northern Dream is a lovely amateur work, mixing some electric lead guitar with a melodic folk sense—sort of early Neil Young with an English accent. Very impressive, given the circumstances, and not without genuine merit. Northern Dream led to the glam-inflected Be-Bop Deluxe and a major-label contract; that band succumbed to audience expectations and business problems, becoming an unfortunate symbol of guitar showboating and retarded creative development.

Nelson launched Red Noise after the dissolution of Be-Bop, which had forced him into the confining role of guitar pyrotechnician. Retaining Be-Bop's keyboard player but outlating guitar solos, Nelson attacked the future with gusto, drawing together lyrical modernism and subtly infiltrated synthetic sounds. Only the songs are the weak link—despite good ideas, some are half-formed and not up to his usual standards. Sound-on-Sound has its moments, but is essentially a work in progress.

Also in progress during Red Noise's brief existence was Nelson's solo work. Although not issued until 1981, Quit Dreaming and Get on the Beam was recorded, piecemeal, at various times and places in early 1979. Unaccompanied save for his brother Ian on sax (and all of Red Noise on one cut), Nelson relieved the self-consciousness of Red Noise's technocracy with more varied subjects and styles. There are more keyboards, but his avoidance of guitar is less forced, and there's even an old-fashioned solo on one number. Although a little disjointed, Quit Dreaming is a mature record of real substance and style. Included in the first ten thousand copies was a bonus LP, Sounding the Ritual Echo (Atmospheres for Dreaming), which consists of synthesizer/tape instrumental fragments; interesting if unfocused. The fifteen pieces sound like audio sketches for later works.

Das Kabinett (The Cabinet of Doctor Caligari) was written and recorded as the score for a stage presentation by the Yorkshire Actors Company. Released on Nelson's own label, the record consists of eighteen instrumental pieces, each designed to accompany a particular scene in the story. Although musically stunning, it's a hard concept for rock fans used to song structure (and words) to grasp.

The Love That Whirls—which also included a bonus record, La Belle et la Bête (Beauty and the Beast), the score for another dramatic production by the same company—was Nelson's finest work to that point. Preponderantly synthesized and showcasing great songs, it finds him dabbling in a variety of styles—Oriental, techno-pop, dance rock, artsy—all with confidence and success. His most accessible work outside of Be-Bop, it was Nelson's long-overdue breakthrough, opening many eyes and ears to his talents. (Das Kabinett and La Belle et la Bête were reissued in 1985 as a double-album set and in '89 as a single CD or cassette.)

The 12-inch Flaming Desire EP consists of an extended version of the title song (an LP track) and five leftovers from the Love That Whirls sessions, some also available on UK 45s.

Chimera is an important release, documenting Nelson's acknowledged influence by Japan's Yellow Magic Orchestra, most notably drummer Yukihiro Takahashi, who plays on four of the six tracks. Also joining the previously hermetic artist is (the group) Japan's bassist, Mick Karn, and others, invigorating dynamic tracks like "Acceleration" and "Glow World." Again playing a lot of guitar, Nelson is in fine form, singing better than ever and writing strong, fascinating songs in a number of different modes. (All of Chimera wound up on the American Vistamix, joined by four prior creations, including "Flaming Desire" and "Empire of the Senses.")

Nelson's next major new album was Getting the Holy Ghost Across (revised, resequenced and issued in the US as On a Blue Wing), ten fully produced numbers ranging in length from under one minute to nearly nine. The sound is vintage Nelson—percolating rhythms, layered synths and guitars, Iain Denby's prominent bass, passionately cool vocals—and the songs are warmly accessible, with tasteful lyrics and likable melodies; the wiggly synths and hornwork on "Heart and Soul" even forge a faint link to funk. Nelson's song-writing no longer explores new ground, but he continues to mine the same field with success. Perhaps to mark the time since Be-Bop, "The Hidden Flame" throws a fiery guitar solo amid the keyboards.

Savage Gestures for Charms Sake is a lovely but unessential collection of one-man studio instrumentals. The sumptuously packaged Trial by Intimacy is a boxed set containing four individually titled records (The Summer of God's Piano, also released on its own, A Catalogue of Obsessions, Pavillions of the Heart and Soul, Chamber of Dreams), all previously unreleased solo instrumentals: ambient pieces, improvisations, experiments, incidental mood music and odds and ends. Over time, all four of the albums saw individual release, at least on tape and compact disc.

The 2fold Aspect of Everything is a two-disc (Eaux d'Artifice and Confessions of a Four-Track Mind) compilation of obscurities: B-sides, remixes, demos and other non-LP matter.

Although Orchestra Arcana is still a strictly one-man Nelson project, the specific idea is to weave doody instrumentals around found-sound spoken-word matter (or vice versa). Iconography and the dance-beat Optimism are both fine in their way, but their existence suggests that Bill's been spending too much time watching old movies on the tube.

Created as the soundtrack for a 1987 British television series (talk about finding the right man for a job!), Map of Dreams is a collection of cogent pieces that mix ambience and rhythm into nicely affecting soundscapes that are vaguely scientific in tone.

Nelson made another monumental addition to his canon in 1988 with Chance Encounters in the Garden of Lights, a huge set of meditative instrumentals on two discs, The Book of Inward Conversation and The Angel at the Western Window: 41 short pieces in all. You want more? Get the cassette (49 selections) or the jumbo double CD (63 items!).

The deluge continues. For a modest review of Nelson's activities since 1979, The Strangest Things dips into the solo records, Red Noise and Orchestra Arcana. Something of a best-of package, Duplex contains one disc of vocal recordings (things like "Acceleration," "Do You Dream in Colour," "Contemplation," etc.) and a platter of instrumentals that includes a few previously unreleased items. Demonstrations of Affection is a box containing four CDs and a T-shirt. [1]

See also A Flock of Seagulls, Ippu-Do, Skids, Yukihiro Takahashi.

NENA

Nena (Ger. CBS) 1983

? (Fragezeichen) (Ger. CBS) 1984 •

99 Luftballons (Epic) 1984 •

It's All in the Game (Epic) 1985

STRIPES

The Stripes (Ger. CBS) 1980

German pop sensation Nena hit it big internationally in 1984 with the nuclear protest of "99 Luftballons." Boasting the attractive voice of Gabriela "Nena"

Kerner and a jolly modern sound, the Berlin group's catchy songs tend towards bubblegum simplicity, but are undeniably engaging, whether sung in English or German. Nena, the band's monolingual homeland debut, contains "99 Luftballons" as well as the equally wonderful "Nur Geträumt" and "Leuchtturm" ("Lighthouse"), all melodic and bouncy hits that mix rock strength with pure pop arrangements. However, the record is inconsistent, and has a lot of draggy songs that don't make any lasting impression.

While it still presents a few sprightly pop delights ("Rette Mich," the Abba-esque "Küss Mich Wach"), Nena's second album (whose parenthetical title means, reasonably enough, Question Mark) moves the band closer to universal easy-listening mush and sub-Blondie demi-disco. (David Sanborn blows some treacly sax on two songs; the pseudo-Africanisms of "Das Land der Elefanten" make Toto's efforts in this department seem almost credible.)

The band's first Anglo-American release, 99 Luftballons, was stitched together half-and-half from the two German LPs. Nena provided "99 Red Balloons" (as well as the German-language original), "Leuchtturm," "Kino" (a song about the movies) and "Nur Geträumt," smoothly converted into "Just a Dream." The second album contributed "Rette Mich," "? (Fragezeichen)," "Das Land der Elefanten," "Unerkannt Durchs Märchenland," "Ich Häng' an Dir" and "Lass Mich Dein Pirat Sein," the last two translated into English as "Hangin' on You" and "Let Me Be Your Pirate."

Although no serious stylistic changes were made in the interim, It's All in the Game (sung entirely in English, translated by Canada's Lisa Dalbello, who also does backing vocals on the record) is fairly irrelevant, lacking any great songs that would enliven this forgettable collection. Sanborn makes another guest appearance; the record's general resemblance to mid-period Abba—five years after the fact—may explain why it was Nena's last. (Not for nothing is the final song entitled "Auf Wiedersehen.")

Kerner's pre-Nena band, Stripes, played post-Blondie rock of the most rudimentary variety. The Stripes tells virtually the same joke thirteen times with only minor variations—notwithstanding the two American-written tunes, one by Hall and Oates, no less.

[i/jg]

NEON JUDGEMENT

1981–1984 (Hol. Scarface) 1985

MBIH! EP (Bel. Anything But) 1985

Mafu Cage (Bel. Play It Again Sam) 1986 •

First Judgements (Bel. Play It Again Sam) 1987 •

Horny as Hell (Play It Again Sam) 1987 •

General Pain & Major Disease (Play It Again Sam) 1989 •

Blood & Thunder (Play It Again Sam) 1989 •

The Insult (Bel. Play It Again Sam) 1990

Another beneficiary of the Brussels-to-Chicago pipeline, this durable Belgian electro/industrial band made its trans-Atlantic debut with Horny as Hell, a mechanical-sounding drone of cold rhythms, warm keyboards, barbed guitars and chanted English vocals. Although sex—overeager rather than crude—runs through the entire album, the unappealing music is strictly geared for robot nookie.

General Pain & Major Disease, a refresher course in early Neon Judgement, compiles singles from the very beginning (the live “Factory Walk”) up through the present (a 12-inch version of Horny as Hell’s “Miss Brown”). The non-chronological retrospective reveals Neon Judgement as having begun as an aseptically rhythmized electro-thud product of British new wave synthesists—from the grim Joy Division school and the dopey Gary Numan pop-hook division. While later tracks introduce noise effects and more accomplished instrumentation, the band’s unadventurous essence has remained pretty consistent.

The trio brings ambitious new elements (like chipmunky disco vocals and a harmonica player!) into play on Blood & Thunder, but the metronomic music is too monotonous for the effort to make any significant difference. Clear, occasionally interesting English lyrics are a help, but the numbness of songs built on one note and an unvarying tempo is just too big an obstacle to overcome with irrelevant window dressing. [i]

NERVES

Nerves EP (Nerves) 1976

The Nerves (Fr. Offence) 1986

JACK LEE

Jack Lee’s Greatest Hits Vol. 1 (Maiden America) 1981

The Nerves were seminal new wave power-popsters, a fertile California trio of drummer Paul Collins, bassist Peter Case and guitarist Jack Lee. All three sang and wrote cool songs, recycling ’60s AM radio fare with the awareness, energy and excitement of the punk underground’s earliest stirrings. Lee turned out concise and catchy heartbreak tunes like “Hanging on the Telephone”; Case leaned to garagey merseybeat rockers like “When You Find Out”; Collins split the difference, penning ambitious melodic rockers like “Working Too Hard.” All three of those songs appeared on the self-released 7-inch EP, and again on the musically impressive retrospective, an affordable and convenient compilation of the Nerves’ hopelessly rare records.

Going their own ways in ’78, Collins formed the Beat (and promptly re-recorded “Working Too Hard”) and Case launched the Plimsouls. That left Lee to bask alone in the glory and riches of Blondie’s (British) hit with his “Hanging on the Telephone.” A few years later, in the hopes of parlaying that big score into a solid songwriting career, Lee released a musical résumé of his best work, including four Nerves-era numbers. (Those early tunes are, for the most part, better than the later efforts showcased here.) Case, Collins, the Rubber City Rebels (who had recorded a great cover of his “Paper Dolls”) and others provide rocking instrumental and vocal support, but Lee never again reached the big-time. Don’t wait up for Vol. 2. [i]

See also Beat, Peter Case, Plimsouls.

NEUROTICS

See Newtown Neurotics.

NEW AGE STEPPERS

New Age Steppers (nr/On-U Sound) 1980 (nr/Statik) 1982

Action Battlefield (nr/On-U Sound-Statik) 1981

Crucial 90 [tape] (nr/Statik) 1981

Threat to Creation (nr/Cherry Red) 1981

Foundation Steppers (nr/On-U Sound) 1983

Victory Horns (nr/On-U Sound) 1983

DUB SYNDICATE

One Way System [tape] (ROIR) 1983

Tunes from the Missing Channel (On-U Sound) 1985

Pounding System (On-U Sound) 1988

Classic Selection Vol. 1 [CD] (On-U Sound) 1989 •

Strike the Balance (nr/On-U Sound) 1990 •

British producer Adrian Sherwood is the only constant in the New Age Steppers, an ever-changing jam session that has included members of the Slits, Public Image, Rip Rig + Panic, Raincoats and the Pop Group. The records are a wild melting pot of synthesized post-rock and reggae, transmuted through dub studio techniques. In practical terms, that amounts to variations on a theme or, more accurately, a rhythm. Everything is built on top of a slow, steady reggae pulse, but what’s heaped on varies from electronic no wave noise to pretty, melodic singing. It’s weird, but occasionally very nice, and consistently unpredictable.

New Age Steppers varies widely, from entrancing to repulsive, with lots of synthesizer babble and over-long dub mixes. A few of the songs stand out, but it’s an effect they’re reaching for, not hit singles, so you take the whole package, not bits and pieces. Intriguing, if not entirely successful.

Action Battlefield (repackaged, along with the first LP, on the cassette-only Crucial 90) is much better—more organized and song-oriented. Ari of the Slits sings lead on all the tracks; her voice, while not exactly pleasant, adds a comforting personality and continuity. Not as weird or chaotic as its predecessor, Action Battlefield is strange but appealing.

Which is not true of Threat to Creation, recorded jointly with reggae band Creation Rebel. The LP has almost no vocals, little structure and no discernible direction. When it doesn’t consist of understated meanderings, it’s self-indulgent art-noise that could please only the most indiscriminate fan. Keith Levine [sic] performs half of the guitar chores.

Between that chapter of his career and the widespread launch of the more generally known Tackhead, Sherwood ran/produced the loosely constituted Dub Syndicate. The ad hoc cast on the One Way System compilation cassette includes members of Aswad, Roots Radics and Creation Rebel; the languid, instrumental reggae is more repetitive and unnaturally elongated than invigorating. Tunes from the Missing Channel, released on Sherwood’s own On-U Sound label, has Levine and others providing fodder for his wild studio assemblies. [i]

See also Tackhead.

NEW CHRISTS

Detritus EP (What Goes On) 1987

Divine Rites (Aus. Citadel) 1988

Distemper (Aus. Citadel) 1989 •

ROB YOUNGER AND THE RIFLES

Rob and the Rifles EP [Ger. Compassion Explosion!] 1989

Rob Younger, who cut his teeth in Australia's seminal pre-Pistols punk combo Radio Birdman, is probably more responsible than anyone (aside, perhaps, from Iggy himself) for promulgating the aggro-heavy Stoogian feel that imbues so many Down Underground bands. With his Sydney-based New Christs, Younger has continued to serve notice as to who, exactly, are the punks and who is the godfather.

Detritus culls four tracks from the band's second and third singles. (The first, a 1981 threat entitled "Face a New God," remains uncompiled.) Considering the lack of lineup consistency (no fewer than three axemen—Screaming Tribesman Chris Mazuak [sic], Celibate Rifle Kent Steedman and Lime Spider Richard Jakimyszyn—take turns cranking it to eleven), there's a magnificently undiluted attitude in both the Dee-troit non-stops ("No Next Time," "Sun God") and the less mannered brooders ("Born Out of Time"). Divine Rites, also assembled from 7-inch tracks, boasts a solidified cast, including the underrated ex-Barracudas bassist Jim Dickson, and an exponentially less derivative palette. While there are some lighter moments (the mutant surf ditty "You'll Never Catch My Wave" isn't all that far from the Hoodoo Gurus), Younger's developing a bitter, morbid vision not unlike Fear-era John Cale. The triad of "Dropping Like Flies," "Addiction" and "Dead Girl" makes for a particularly harrowing close.

The sudden mid-screech start of "No Way on Earth" sets the dark, brooding tone for Distemper, and the apocalyptic tone carries through the crashing "There's No Time," the piano-drizzled "Burning of Rome" and the discordant fairground wheeze "Circus of Sour"—making the disc nothing short of a 40-minute call to emotional jihad.

Recorded live in Germany, the four-song Rob and the Rifles EP sees both Younger and the (Celibate) Rifles in peak form, with Steedman wrenching some lovingly crazed leads from the bones of such chestnuts as "She's So Fine" and "Shakin' All Over." The fit is surprisingly hi, considering the dubious origins; Younger's limber yowl is far looser than the studio environment had previously allowed. Rockin'! [dss]

See also Celibate Rifles, Radio Birdman.

NEW DUNCAN IMPERIALS

See Service.

NEW FAST AUTOMATIC DAFFODILS

Pigeonhole (nr/Play It Again Sam) 1990 (Mute) 1991 •

From Manchester, with attitude: the New FADs' percussible dance-groove songs may share little with that city's retro-pop ravers (the quartet owes more to Manchester's late-'70s funk scene), but willful insufferability (a 1989 12-inch was entitled Music Is Shit; the band's lyrics are pretentious nonsense) makes them just as big a pain in the ass. Waffling between serious old-fashioned bass-driven dance rock (à la Konk or Liquid Liquid) diminished by lousy sub-

John Cale vocals and meandering bits that could charitably be explained as experiments, Pigeonhole squanders the FADs' solid and effective rhythmic drive on a hill of arty beans. [i]

COLIN NEWMAN

A-Z (nr/Beggars Banquet) 1980 •

provisionally entitled the singing fish (nr/4AD) 1981 •

Not to (nr/4AD) 1982 •

Commercial Suicide (Crammed Discs-Enigma) 1986 •

It Seems (Crammed Discs-Restless) 1988 •

A-Z was actually meant to be Wire's fourth album, but the band's record company didn't see it that way. So it became a Newman solo LP, demonstrating that he was indeed the prime creative force in the group, but also suggesting that perhaps ex-partners Lewis and Gilbert might have stemmed the excesses of producer Mike Thorne, who (as he'd done with Wire) both runs the console and adds keyboards. On A-Z, he helps create spacious, sensuous soundscapes, but often overcrowds them with keyboards. Newman delivers his oblique lyrics with a strangely detached urgency; the overall effect at times suggests being drugged and locked in a room with an inquisitor shouting senseless questions. A-Z's triumph is that it shows how even simple pop-rock devices can be rearranged and/or modified to devastating effect. (The CD adds five tracks.)

Newman experiments on the singing fish by building up textures and melodies with an interesting assortment of instruments (all played and produced by him) in a dozen different ways ("Fish 1," etc.). It isn't the tuneless or monotonous "art" you'd expect from this sort of no-vocals venture either—it's thinking man's muzak which, unlike ambient Eno-isms, doesn't dissipate before your ears upon careful attention. Newman is at once more clinical and more playful than ever before.

Not to is a return to the instrumental format of A-Z, with a significant change: Thorne is absent. Wire drummer Robert Gotobed and Desmond Simmons remain (with Simmons' guitar/arranging role expanding) and Simon Gillham picks up the bass, giving it an identity of its own. Wire and A-Z leftovers are interspersed between newer songs, and the feeling suggests what post-Pink Flag Wire might have been without Thorne: minimalist threads rather than sheets of sound; thorny, sometimes atonal, dissonant and rhythmically disjointed, but somehow more personally engaging. Newman himself seems vulnerable—bitter, wistful, showing less lyrical self-assurance, like Ray Davies' art-rock cousin. (In 1988, UK 4AD issued a CD containing both Not to and the singing fish, adding a bonus CD single to initial quantities.)

That vulnerability is again exposed on Commercial Suicide. ("I'm still here, waiting for mercy," he sings.) As potent a creator as Newman is, he seems to function best with outside creative input and tension in the situation. That's ideally been provided by Lewis and Gilbert and, to lesser extents, Thorne and Simmons. Malka Spiegel (Newman's wife) and Sean Bonnar of Minimal Compact individually co-wrote four of the nine tracks, which aren't quite up to snuff. It's more than worthwhile—quiet, thoughtful, delicate, artistic, melancholic, hopeful—but lacks the edge that makes Newman so effective in the reformed Wire, even on that group's dreamy A Bell Is a Cup.

It Seems is by the same crew, plus engineer/musician/co-producer Gilles Martin, with guest appearances by Gotobed and several horn and reed players. The fuller, more expressive arrangements and general honing of focus suggest they've gotten to know each other better, and it is a distinct improvement. Much of the LP is as conventional and "normal" (in terms of musical and lyrical structure) as Newman's ever been, and as pretty. It still could be more consistent and, although Bonnar and Spigel between them co-write half the ten tracks, the best two are by Newman alone. If you like his other work, you won't want to miss either of these recent discs. [jg]

See also Minimal Compact, Wire.

NEW MATH

See Jet Black Berries.

NEW MODEL ARMY

Vengeance (nr/Abstract) 1984
No Rest for the Wicked (Capitol) 1985 •
Better Than Them EP (nr/EMI) 1985
The Ghost of Cain (Capitol) 1986 •
New Model Army (Capitol) 1987
Vengeance/The Independent Story (nr/Abstract) 1987 (JCI) 1988 φ
Radio Sessions 83-84 (nr/Abstract) 1988 •
Thunder and Consolation (Capitol) 1989 •
Impurity (nr/EMI) 1990 • /

A trio vigorously lauded by supporters as the new Clash, New Model Army are long on principle and maintain a fervent, unyielding political stance. Taking their primary inspiration from early punk roots (though less abrasive and more melodic), NMA breathe life into the genre, providing a most effective medium for singer/guitarist Slade the Leveller (Justin Sullivan) to deliver his charged messages. The eight angry, vehement cuts on Vengeance rely equally on Stuart Morrow's acrobatic bass lines and Slade's accusatory Cockney rants. Although the intensity wanes towards the end, it's an arresting debut.

Morrow left prior to the release of No Rest for the Wicked. Despite his presence on it, the LP lacks the determined ferocity of its predecessor. Some potentially great songs ("My Country," "Grandmother's Footsteps," "No Rest") are forceful enough to have belonged on Vengeance; other tracks swap enthusiasm for overindulgence and suffer as a result. "Better Than Them," a surprising acoustic foray, meanders interminably; the preachy "Shot 18" is simply ridiculous. Without appropriate musical backing, Slade's harsh protests lose their impact, leaning dangerously towards hollow sloganeering.

The Better Than Them EP—a double-pack 45 of the LP track plus three new items—ventures deeper into acoustic territory and shows the Army at ease in these surroundings, but sacrifices the remainder of their vitality in the process. The new songs have the heartfelt honesty that was becoming questionable on No Rest for the Wicked.

The Ghost of Cain presents a revitalized (remobilized?) New Model Army, due in large part to the international success of the protectionist single "51st State," which the album contains. Stabilizing as a three-piece unit has refueled the fires of the group's convictions, and this is a most welcome return to form. New Model Army is a stay-the-course sidestep, with three studio tracks ("White Coats" is the standout) and four live cuts ("51st State" is most notable).

Adding a palpable sense of urgency to already strong songs, Radio Sessions '83-'84 provides energetic alternate versions of twelve NMA faves crisply captured live on the radio. Vengeance/The Independent Story appends eight early single sides and a pair of radio takes to the band's first LP. A must for completists, the disc puts the spotlight on Morrow's driving lead bass, which at times suggests the early Cure.

A mere decade after forming, New Model Army finally released its masterpiece, Thunder and Consolation. The guidance of mainstream producer Tom Dowd on a half-dozen tracks and the occasional presence of a violin have done nothing to quell the fury of these electric-folk heroes. In fact, Dowd's sumptuous touches on the epic "Green and Grey" add immeasurable drama to Slade's passionate, opaque lyricism. The songs, on the whole, are the most personal the band has ever recorded—especially the searing "Inheritance," on which Slade manages to not sound foolish chanting a bitter message to his parents over a stark drum track. The CD adds five songs, including New Model Army's three studio tracks and the haunting, heartfelt "Nothing Touches."

On Impurity, NMA retains the previous LP's expressive fiddle, but drops its cinematic grandeur, returning instead to the unadorned precision and economy of earlier releases. With new bassist Peter Nelson (ex-Brotherhood of Lizards) in tow, the Army metes out a few of its more forthright football-style chants ("Lust for Power," "Get Me Out") and some gentler moments ("Space," "Marrakesh") that strike like a gruffer Billy Bragg. The guys even exhibit an admirable levelheadedness on the sharp, direct "Bury the Hatchet," which offers a neat response to the themes of retribution that made The Ghost of Cain too much like a vigilante's call to arms. All in all, Impurity exemplifies a fervent, trend-bucking band that has remained true to its original goals. [ag/db]

See also Joolz.

NEW MUSIK

Straight Lines EP (Epic) 1980
From A to B (nr/GTO) 1980
Anywhere (nr/GTO) 1981
Sanctuary (Epic) 1981
Warp (nr/Epic) 1982

New Musik's Tony Mansfield (writer, producer, vocalist, keyboardist, guitarist) has never been overly enamored of trendy trappings of music or image, which is why his band, never fashionable, had only minor UK hits. (As a freelance producer, however, Mansfield has had no such trouble.) Nonetheless, in attempting to recast and/or rediscover pop-rock through modern technology, New Musik helped launch the style as a commercial force in America, where its debut single, "Straight Lines"—predating Gary Numan's US hit with "Cars"—nearly crossed over from the dance clubs to the mass market as an import. (The 10-inch EP also includes its follow-up and both B-sides.)

New Musik's full but spacious sound is immediately appealing: vocals, acoustic guitars, synths and other keyboards ply melodious ditties impeccably deployed and ingeniously enhanced at the mixing console. What's most telling about this new musik is that it's sensuous but not sensual, energetic but not violent, calling up a sort of bittersweet, melancholic feeling, but never redolent of the gloom-doom syndrome. Which makes the band either a breath of fresh air or an overly polite and sterile waste of time.

Yet, surprisingly enough, the lyrics are almost all about loneliness, alienation and humanity's inability to cope with the modern world—but worded simply, and exclusively in terms of ideals (safety, identity, luxury), abstractions (lines, numbers, motion) and/or metaphors (often to do with the ocean and travel). Though hardly immortal poesy, when put in context by the music, core phrases can be most evocative.

From A to B contains three strong singles (one, "This World of Water," is brilliant) unmatched by those on Anywhere, but otherwise there's little difference in quality or style between the two. Sanctuary takes the best of both, making it a near-apotheosis of ear candy. Warp, however, sounds transitional. Band involvement in the studio had apparently increased, adding a new rhythmic component with no effective niche. More acute (and pessimistic) lyrics are accompanied by a paucity of new melodic ideas.

Mansfield's subsequent life as a pop producer yielded hits for Naked Eyes, the B-52's, Captain Sensible and others. [jg]

NEW ORDER

Movement (Factory) 1981 •

1981–1982 EP (Factory) 1982

Power, Corruption and Lies (Factory) 1983 (Qwest) 1985 •

Low-life (Qwest) 1985 •

Brotherhood (Qwest) 1986 •

The Peel Sessions EP (nr/Strange Fruit) 1986 •

Substance (Qwest) 1987 •

The Peel Sessions EP (nr/Strange Fruit) 1987 •

Technique (Qwest) 1989 •

The Peel Sessions Album (nr/Strange Fruit) 1990 •

VARIOUS ARTISTS

Salvation! (Giant) 1988 •

REVENGE

One True Passion (Capitol) 1990 •

ELECTRONIC

Electronic (Warner Bros.) 1991 ◊

Following the bizarre 1980 death of Ian Curtis and the remarkable success of "Love Will Tear Us Apart," guitarist/singer Bernard Sumner and the two other remaining members of Joy Division transmuted into New Order, adding guitar/synth player Gillian Gilbert before recording Movement. Largely accomplishing what Joy Division set out to do, New Order has sold millions of records and earned boundless critical enthusiasm playing a heady and uncompromising mix of dreamy meanderings and unforgettable techno-dance music, taking off from that memorable swan song, alleviating some of Curtis' lyrical suffering while retaining the depth and unique musical personality he outlined.

Movement, produced by Martin Hannett, wisely sidesteps the Joy Division comparisons by downplaying the vocals and emphasizing electronics; it may lack the former band's sheer sharpness of vision, but maintains a fascination with decay and paradox, showcasing excellent guitar and synthesizer work.

The 1981–1982 EP consists of five songs taken from British 45s, and presents New Order's pop-styled work, especially the magnificent "Temptation" and "Procession." Coincidentally, New Order was already showing remarkable facility for making uncommon—but highly popular—singles, issuing a huge UK smash, "Blue Monday." (Long unavailable on album, the song was later added to the cassette version of Power, Corruption and Lies. In 1988, the song was newly remixed and successfully reissued on 12-inch in America.)

New Order's second album is a masterpiece, from the cryptic (but decipherable if you work hard at it) artwork to the eight lengthy tracks of state-of-the-creative-art electronic dance music. Blending moody strains of pseudo-strings with seemingly misplaced guitar bits and coldly kinetic rhythms, plus artless but engaging vocals and syncopated effects, deceptively simple tracks like "Age of Consent" and "Leave Me Alone" convey intense sensations that you can't easily shake. An emotionally and physically moving record by one of the era's most important bands. The CD adds two tracks.

Oddly enough, New Order was formally introduced to America through the auspices of Quincy Jones, whose Qwest label put out Low-life and reissued Power, Corruption and Lies. One of the finest LPs of 1985, Low-life starts out with an ironic folk-form ballad, "Love Vigilantes," that is utterly unlike anything the band has ever tried but scores brilliantly. "The Perfect Kiss" is very poppy, with lush synth strains and perfectly inappropriate froglike (!) sound effects. The other six tracks are almost as appealing, tentatively exploring other stylistic areas without abandoning the essence of New Order's format.

The lightheaded and seemingly half-hearted Brotherhood retreads the characteristic sound of Low-life but largely lacks the first-rate songwriting that gives purpose and significance to the proficient synthesizer/guitar musical machine. Only "Weirdo," the downcast "All Day Long" and the magnificent "Bizarre Love Triangle" intertwine the delicately rising and falling electro-beat tides with melodies that fix themselves firmly in your head; the rest shimmer with the same near-folk veneer but are just not as memorable.

Fashioning their own version of a career retrospective, the enigmatic and retiring quartet gathered six years' worth of 12-inch singles (some appearing in special new mixes) on two vinyl discs under the title Substance. If one needs a reminder of New Order's unique genius, this album (also available on DAT) has it all: "Blue Monday," "Perfect Kiss," "Shellshock," "Confusion," "Bizarre Love Triangle" and seven more. (The double-CD issue boasts a dozen B-sides as a bonus and extremely harsh sound as a problem.)

Along with "Touched by the Hand of God" (also on the "Blue Monday 1988" remix 12-inch), New Order contributed four instrumentals ("Salvation Theme" is quite nice) to the soundtrack album of Salvation!, Beth B's scathing satire about televangelism in which Exene Cervenka made her dramatic film debut.

Technique, New Order's first new album in more than two years, contains a sonic postcard from Ibiza, the Spanish island where the momentary dance-music fad known as Balearic beat flashed amid the first flowerings of acid house. While half of the songs go the crazy rhythms route (synthetic bongos pitter-patter throughout "Round & Round"; the thundering "Fine Time" throws electronic sheep into the mix; with blips and percussive blasts, the powerful "Mr. Disco" hammers a beat into a dreamy song), other numbers mine the group's pop side. In "All the Way," Sumner encourages self-reliance over a tart blend of acoustic guitars and Peter Hook's thrusting bass; the ripping electric leads and martial drumming that cut through "Run" leave the summery tune sounding like Donovan fronting the Jesus and Mary Chain. Adding new ingredients to a familiar recipe makes Technique most effective. (Also available on DAT.)

New Order then retreated into solo projects. Sumner and guitarist Johnny Marr, initially in collaboration with Pet Shop Boy Neil Tennant, formed Electronic, issuing a single in 1990 and an album in mid-'91. Electronic is a strange melding of styles, an entertaining electro-pop dance record with guitar, blipping sequencers and a strong Tennant vocal/keyboards influence. (He sings two cuts.) With Marr's creative role not strikingly evident, Electronic sounds like New Order—complete with Sumner's distinctive voice and rhythmic patterns—on holiday in a parallel universe controlled by the Pet Shop Boys.

For his part, Hook assembled a trio called Revenge and whipped out the wretched One True Passion. (The title apparently refers to buxom leather-clad women.) Restyling New Order's formula with a thicker, warmer sound and second-rate vocals, the oversexed Revenge could almost be a tribute band, if not an especially good one. New Order's flimsy lyrics are one thing, but Hook's macho black leather bluster is aggressively dumb. "Kiss the chrome/Why am I alone?" Gee, I can't imagine.

New Order's first Peel Sessions 12-inch (the initial release in the UK series) was recorded in June 1982 and contains four songs; the second hails from January 1981. Both are combined on the 1990 LP. [sg/i]

See also Paul Haig, Joy Division.

NEW ORDER

The New Order (Fr. Isadora) 1977

NEW RACE

The First and the Last (nr/Statik) 1983 •

DESTROY ALL MONSTERS/ SONIC'S RENDEZVOUS BAND

Ron Asheton/Sonic's Rendezvous Band (Fr. Revenge) 1987

Early American punk fanzines had little to write about, which is probably why New Order (the first/American one) got a lot of press. But just because the group featured Ron Asheton (ex-Stooges guitarist), Scott Thurston (ex-Stooges keyboardist and future Motel) and Dennis Thompson (ex-MC5 drummer) didn't mean its music had to be worthwhile. The New Order is full of misplaced guitar breaks, heavy metal sludge and little or no passion. Some things look great on paper, but on vinyl this one stinks.

New Race, a 1981 one-Australian-tour aggregate of Asheton, Thompson and three former members of seminal Sydney punk band Radio Birdman (including guitarist Deniz Tek—who grew up in Ann Arbor, Michigan—and singer Rob Younger), fares a lot better on The First and the Last, an album recorded live and then improved in the studio by an added guitarist on two numbers and a backing vocalist on three. Production, sound and playing are all real good (except for the intros and the applause, you may not think it's a concert album at all) and the energy level is impressive. The material includes the MC5's "Looking at You" (given a blistering seven-minutes-plus raveup), several Birdman tracks and one (ugh!) topical number, "November 22, 1963," written by Asheton and Niagara, his singing bandmate in Destroy All Monsters. The First and the Last, while not an essential historic document, remains a powerfully charged rock'n'roll album with some searing moments.

The joint album melds four songs originally issued by Ron Asheton's band, Destroy All Monsters, on singles around 1978-9 with a side of ex-MC5er Fred Sonic Smith's band, which includes ex-Stooge drummer Scott Asheton. [cpl/i]

See also MC5, Radio Birdman, Sonic's Rendezvous Band, Stooges.

NEWS FROM BABEL

See Henry Cow.

NEWTOWN NEUROTICS

Beggars Can Be Choosers (nr/Razor) 1983

NEUROTICS

Repercussions (nr/Jungle) 1986

Is Your Washroom Breeding Bolsheviks (nr/Jungle) 1988

Never Thought EP (nr/Jungle) 1988

45 Revolutions a Minute: Singles 1979-1984 (nr/Jungle) 1990

NEUROTICS ET AL.

Kickstarting a Backfiring Nation (nr/Jungle) 1987

The Newtown Neurotics began in the late '70s in Harlow (just north of London) as a brave trio who still thought punk could be something other than a spent force. Singer/guitarist Steve Drewett must have been inspired by early punk's willingness to discuss politics, as his socialist-flavored lyrics—never overbearing—have been grouped with those of Easterhouse, Billy Bragg, Three Johns and Housemartins.

For rockin' humdingers influenced by a synthesis of everything cool in early punk—Ramones to the Clash to mid-period Undertones—Beggars Can Be Choosers is a blast from the past, punk with extraordinary get-up-and-go that's both fun-sounding and sharp-edged. Drewett's social commentary is at its best, from the "sexual double standards" in "No Respect" to his version of the Members' "Solitary Confinement," redone with a clever twist as "Living with Unemployment." Punk-reggae is even handled competently on "Newtown People."

By '86, the Neurotics had dropped their Newtown and had come up with a different sound. The (mostly) moderate tempos, restrained guitar and other refinements (such as the addition of blaring Stax horns) on the engaging Repercussions showed the Neurotics could broaden their appeal without changing their message. "This Fragile Life" condemns the Falklands War through the story of a young woman widowed by it; "Fanatical Sects" takes the piss out of religious extremists. But the bulk of the record concerns the families of striking miners, to whom the LP is dedicated.

Is Your Washroom Breeding Bolsheviks continues this progress. The rock-soul-mod hybrid has advanced to a point where the Neurotics sometimes sound like a Motown group, with more wild brass and keyboards. (Ex-Member Chris Payne chips in.) "An Inch Away," a breathless number about women victimized by domestic violence, shows that Drewett can still pair sadness and hard-pop with great success; "Local News" proves they can also crank up the attack on demand.

The brilliant-sounding Kickstarting a Backfiring Nation was recorded live—with no overdubs—in the studio before an audience. Selections draw from the first two LPs, plus the Flamin Groovies' "Shake Some Action" redone as "Take Strike Action," again for the miners. The record also contains poetic contributions, recorded live the same evening, by Atilla the Stockbroker, the Big J, Porky the Poet and Peter Campbell. Their rants identify them as offspring of John Cooper Clarke; the subject matter is entirely commensurate with the Neurotics' and fills out this fine package. (The LP was released on a joint cassette with Repercussions.)

The Never Thought 12-inch contains five live tracks on the flipside.

The group soldiered on bravely until October '88 when bassist Colin Dredd developed pleurisy and had to quit. The Neurotics got a friend to play bass, and did a string of three-hour farewell shows, performing every song they'd ever released! 45 Revolutions a Minute: Singles 1979-1984 compiles the group's 45s (A- and B-sides), none of which had previously appeared on album. These tracks are among the band's most humorous (e.g., "Where Are You When I Need You," an ode to a disappearing penis; "Licensing Hours," a dig at Britain's pub curfew) and most angrily political ("Kick Out the Tories," "Mindless Violence," "When the Oil Runs Out"). Although one single is omitted—"Blitzkneg Bob" (with original lyrics about bombing raids) and its two flip sides, a remake of an earlier track and another Ramones cover—45 Revolutions substitutes two previously unissued outtakes. An excellent collection. As the sleeve notes, "File under good pop on bad budgets."

Drewett and Mac have since formed the Unstoppable Beat, mating the Neurotics' guitar pulse with more reggae and African flavors. [jr]

NEW YORK DOLLS

New York Dolls (Mercury) 1973 •
In Too Much Too Soon (Mercury) 1974 •

New York Dolls (Mercury) 1977
Lipstick Killers [tape] (ROIR) 1981 [CD] (ROIR-Important) 1990 †

Red Patent Leather (Fr. Fan Club) 1984 •
Best of the New York Dolls (nr/Mercury) 1985
Night of the Living Dolls (Mercury) 1986
Personality Crisis EP (nr/Kamera) 1986

DAVID & SYLVAIN

Tokyo Dolls Live! (Fr. Fan Club) 1986

THE ORIGINAL PISTOLS/NEW YORK DOLLS

After the Storm (nr/Receiver) 1985 •

The New York Dolls had the style, attitude, rawness and audacity to reinterpret the notion of punk as it had existed in the '60s and to create a decidedly '70s over-the-edge new reality prior to punk. Although they made only two proper albums and were a meaningless relic by the time the Sex Pistols played their first gig, the Dolls singlehandedly began the local New York scene that later spawned the Ramones, Blondie, Television, Talking Heads and others. A classic case of the whole being greater than the sum of its parts, the Dolls were much more than just a band. Their audiences emulated them and formed groups. Detractors' venom inspired countless teenage rebels. Their signing to a major label set an example of commercial feasibility; their subsequent failure to shift product turned the record industry anti-punk for years.

After building a reputation on seedy late-night New York stages, the Dolls' awful magnetism netted them a label contract. Todd Rundgren took the production reins, and delivered a great-sounding document with all the chaos intact. A genuine rock classic, New York Dolls contains "Personality Crisis," "Looking for a Kiss," "Trash," and other wondrous slices of gutter poetry punctuated by David Jo Hansen's slangy howl and Johnny Thunders' sneering guitar. No home should be without one.

The legendary Shadow Morton produced the second album; though the results don't match Rundgren's, the Dolls come roaring through nonetheless. There are fewer originals, but the songs they covered have never been the same. "Stranded in the Jungle," "Showdown," "Bad Detective" and "Don't Start Me Talking," reflecting the band's live repertoire at the time, affirm the Dolls' R&B roots.

Thunders and (with a newly spelled surname) Johansen (and, for a while, guitarist Syl Sylvain) proceeded in opposite directions and had polar but equally noted solo careers; bassist Artie Kane and drummer Jerry Nolan went through various local bands before disappearing entirely. In 1977, Mercury repackaged both original Dolls albums together with new artwork and liner notes by Tony Parsons.

Except for the appearance of original drummer Billy Murcia (whose overdose death in London, noted in Bowie's "Time," considerably helped build the Dolls' legend), the cassette-only collection of 1972 demos released as Lipstick Killers is of archival value only, underscoring the enormity of Rundgren's accomplishment on the first record.

More archaeology: Red Patent Leather captures the fading Dolls on a New York stage in 1975 during a brief era when a pre-Pistols Malcolm McLaren managed them. The set includes a bunch of otherwise unvinylized numbers (e.g., "Daddy Rolling Stone," "Something Else," "Pirate Love") but is not exactly a peak performance. The Johansen/Sylvain record, recorded a few months later in Tokyo on a post-breakup contractual obligations tour, is a bootleg-quality live album by the remains of the band (Thunders and Kane are absent; Tony Machine is on Nolan's stool). Strangely, the cover design of this blue-vinyl item makes an unabashed bid to be mistaken for a David Sylvian release.

Indicative of the Dolls' enduring relevance to young people, both English and American Mercury issued compilation albums in the '80s. Night of the Living Dolls manages to uncover a heretofore unreleased take of Shadow Morton's "Give Her a Great Big Kiss," a tune the Dolls used to play. The Dolls' side of After the Storm contains killer '72 demos (not the ones on Lipstick Killers) of "Personality Crisis," "Looking for a Kiss," "Bad Girl" and "Subway Train." [i]

See also Heartbreakers, David Johansen, Sylvain Sylvain, Johnny Thunders.

NICE STRONG ARM

Reality Bath (Homestead) 1987
 Mind Furnace (Homestead) 1988 •
 Cloud Machine EP (Homestead) 1989
 Stress City (Homestead) 1990 •

Originally from the Austin scene that spawned such kindred spirits as the Butthole Surfers and Scratch Acid, this NYC trio crafts a so(m)ber mixture of Brit gloom (Joy Division, Bauhaus) and New York guitar screech (Sonic Youth, Swans). While its work has been spotty, Nice Strong Arm has never been less than intriguing.

Initially distinguished by a propulsive two-drummer lineup (only captured on the first LP), NSA's debut is shot through with an art-rock sensibility that cushions the entropic din. From guitarist Kevin Thomson and bassist Jason Asnes' brooding vocals to the grim, almost directionless songs, the record is all about hurt and despair. "Date of Birth" and "Minds Lie" have bite, but a more focused look into the abyss would be welcome. (The Reality Bath cassette adds a bonus track.)

Mind Furnace is a far more subdued effort, angst-ridden and often beautiful. The intricate song structures (that don't grab immediately but reward upon further examination) and downbeat lyrics detailing domestic decay comprise the bulk of a record that always seems on the verge of bursting through its self-imposed restraints. Highlights: the gripping "Swingset" and frightening "Faucet Head."

Cloud Machine pairs two new studio tracks (including a bright, metallic funk instrumental called "Cop Show") with two songs cut live at CBGB. Stress City is an extremely forceful (read: LOUD) and rhythmically sophisticated record that fairly approximates what Nice Strong Arm can do live. The songs' excessive verbiage does, upon closer inspection, resemble bad collegiate poetry, but the requisite dank imagery colors such skewed funk as "Desert Beauty Bloom" and "Neighborhood Voyeur." The stirring sound of collapse. [db]

NICO

Chelsea Girl (Verve) 1967 •
 The Marble Index (Elektra) 1969 •
 Desertshore (Reprise) 1971
 The End ... (Island) 1974
 Drama of Exile (nr/Aura) 1981 (Ger.Line) 1988
 Do or Die! Nico—in Europe—1982 Diary [tape] (ROIR) 1982
 The Blue Angel (nr/Aura) 1985 •
 Behind the Iron Curtain (nr/Dojo) 1986 •
 Live in Tokyo (nr/Dojo) 1986 •
 Live Heroes (Performance) 1986 •
 The Peel Sessions EP (nr/Strange Fruit) 1988 •
 Hanging Gardens (Restless) 1990 ♪

NICO + THE FACTION

Camera Obscura (Beggars Banquet-PVC) 1985 •

KEVIN AYERS—JOHN CALE—ENO—NICO

June 1, 1974 (Island) 1974 •

A fashion model and bit player in Fellini's La Dolce Vita, the German-born Nico (Christa Paffgen) was plunged into the maelstrom of rock when Andy Warhol introduced her to the Velvet Underground, which she then joined. Chelsea Girl, her maiden voyage on a solo musical career, is of interest mainly for its links to the band Nico had just left. Five songs were written (but not recorded) by Velvet Undergrounders; three others were written or co-written by a very young Jackson Browne. The material, however, is sabotaged by tepid arrangements and weak production. Highlight: the hypnotic "It Was a Pleasure Then," on which Nico's sepulchral voice is accompanied only by feedback guitar, undoubtedly played by Lou Reed.

The Marble Index was a substantial improvement. Arranger John Cale took Nico's disturbing poetry and set it to even more disturbing music; the result is one of the scariest records ever made. Unlike Chelsea Girl, in which Nico tried to adapt to an outmoded chanteuse tradition, The Marble Index blasts her off to her own universe. Regardless of whether more credit is due her or Cale, the album is powerfully effective.

The Nico-Cale collaboration continued on Desertshore. Here the disjunctive imagery is set to slightly less gothic arrangements than before, proving Nico's chanting (she doesn't "sing" any more than she writes "songs") can be as chilling a capella as it is accompanied by a horror-movie soundtrack. (The Peel Sessions EP dates from early '71.)

Three years later, she and Cale turned up with Roxy Music guitarist Phil Manzanera and Brian Eno on synthesizer for The End . . . The title track is the Doors epic, which Nico had also just previously recorded on the all-star June 1, 1974 album. With one exception, the rest of The End is original material, putting the emphasis on Nico's voice and eerie, foot-pumped harmonium rather than on distracting sound effects. The exception, "Das Lied der Deutschen" (or "Deutschland über Alles"), is enough to make you run out and buy war bonds.

After a lengthy recording hiatus, Nico re-emerged without Cale but with a conventional rock band on Drama of Exile. This jarring blend hurts everyone involved; adding insult to injury, bassist/producer Philippe Quilichini filters Nico's voice for a tinny effect.

Her psychotic writing is still fascinating, and certainly preferable to aimless versions of Lou Reed's "Waiting for the Man" and David Bowie's "Heroes."

Joined by two sidemen and Cale as producer, Nico made the odd but exciting Camera Obscura in 1985. This modernization program includes both the nearly vocal-less title track's meandering semi-random improvisation and an attractively somber version of "My Funny Valentine," with stops in between for fascinating blends of Nico's unique singing and post-noise industrial music. Camera Obscura raises Nico's artistic average this decade to a respectable 50 percent.

Do or Die!, recorded live throughout Europe with various bands (including the Blue Orchids) backing her, is a lengthy sampler of Nico's work minus the production flourishes of her studio albums. The fascinating and innately bizarre Live Heroes mini-album draws on some of the same shows—adding two tracks done with the Invisible Girls—for "My Funny Valentine," "Heroes" and five others. Another concert set, the two-LP Iron Curtain was recorded in 1985 in Warsaw, Budapest and Prague with a band that included Eric Random. The Blue Angel is a retrospective compilation of solo and Velvet Underground material.

Nico died in July 1988 on the island of Ibiza, suffering a cerebral hemorrhage in a bicycle spill. The posthumous Hanging Gardens contains her last recordings—six powerfully somber progressions, tastefully produced and evocatively sung—as well as two heretofore unreleased 1982 tracks (the full-blown "Vegas" and the spare "The Line") and Drama of Exile's version of "I'm Waiting for the Man." [si/i]

See also Velvet Underground.

STEVE NIEVE

Theme Music from Outline of a Hairdo EP (nr/F-Beat) 1980

Keyboard Jungle (nr/Demon) 1983 •
Playboy (nr/Demon) 1987

Keyboardist Steve Nieve first stepped out of Elvis Costello's Attractions for a 7-inch EP of four brief, relatively straightforward piano (plus tasteful electronic accents) instrumentals, ostensibly (but not really) drawn from a film soundtrack. If not for titles like "Sparrow Crap" and "Page 1 of a Dead Girl's Diary," no one would blindly attribute these efforts with a rock musician. Likewise, Keyboard Jungle is a cute set of miniatures crafted at the keyboard of a Steinway: fake film and classical music, none of it taken (or given) particularly seriously. Quite agreeable.

The cover of Playboy shows Nieve, dressed to the nines, looking a bit like Bryan Ferry; the solo acoustic piano record mixes suave originals with uniquely conceived versions of standards, just like Ferry's first solo efforts. The maternal in receipt here of Nieve's straightforward (and, therefore, hysterically funny) cocktail-lounge treatment includes Sting's derivative and trivial "Russians," Bowie's overwrought "Life on Mars," 10cc's weepy "I'm Not in Love" and the Specials' nearly tuneless "Ghost Town." (X and Wham! also get their comeuppance in Nieve's graceful hands.) The eleven other short pieces display the artist's wit, compositional talent and instrumental agility. [jy/h]

See also Elvis Costello.

NIGHTINGALES

The Nightingales EP (nr/Cherry Red) 1982

Pigs on Purpose (nr/Cherry Red) 1982

Hysterics (nr/Ink-Red Flame) 1983

The Crunch EP (nr/Vindaloo) 1984

Just a Job (nr/Vindaloo) 1984

In the Good Old Country Way (nr/Vindaloo) 1986

The Peel Sessions EP (nr/Strange Fruit) 1988

ROBERT LLOYD

Me and My Mouth (nr/Virgin) 1990 •

Treble guitar scrubs and busy drumming, both at a hyper pace, support Robert Lloyd's snide, self-mocking, self-pitying, annoyed, despairing, sarcastically scathing and generally intelligent (if not always intelligible) tirades. (Dry wit, too.) The boy from Birmingham has a lot of mind to give the world a piece of (Prior to the Nightingales, Lloyd led the late-'70s punk Prefects; he later organized the Vindaloo label.)

On the Nightingales' first EP, the melodies are memorably minimal, and the playing seems just a touch out of control. Pigs on Purpose shows a bit more instrumental skill (despite bad mastering) and an increased variety of tempos and textures. The Fall would seem to be a major influence, not only in the abrasive, paradoxically unobtrusive guitar work but Lloyd's singing/ranting, which owes something to Mark E. Smith's vocal and lyrical style.

Hysterics marks a label change and much improved production; tone colors are expanded with the use of banjo, trombone and viola. The Nightingales also demonstrate a greater assortment of styles: bass parts borrowed from reggae, an inside-out Bo Diddley beat on "Ponces All" and a flirtation with country-western in "The Happy Medium." The Crunch features the contrast of tightly controlled chaos and some of Lloyd's more melodic vocals. Released during a period of numerous personnel shifts (they were briefly a sextet), the Nightingales manage to avoid sounding transitional; there's plenty of drive and power on these tracks. Highly recommended.

In the Good Old Country Way wisely isn't an attempt to make a straightforward country album. Many bands lacking a real identity might make such an error, but the 'Gales are able to embellish their own sound with country and bluegrass elements. Lyrics are more smart-ass than ever (see "Part Time Moral England" and "I Spit in Your Gravy"); the playing gets downright hot on "The Headache Collector." Highly recommended, even—or maybe especially—for those who hate country-western.

Just a Job is a compilation of The Crunch, non-LP singles and a track from Hysterics.

Busy running Vindaloo, Lloyd took four years after the Nightingales' demise to release his solo debut on another label. Me and My Mouth is a far cry from any Mark E. Smith comparisons; producer Craig Leon (who worked on the Fall's Extricate) gives the LP such a huge, glossy sound that it could pass for a Todd Rundgren job. If all of the songs were as strong as "Cheap as Sin" or "Something Nice," the disc could survive, but this simply isn't the right setting for Lloyd's talents. While he glibly shifts gears between R&B and C&W in completely pedestrian fashion, the production shines it all up so much that it might as well be ska and be-bop. Guests include Attractions Steve Nieve and Pete Thomas along with ex-Aztec Camera/Smiths guitarist Craig Gannon, but to little avail. "The Part of the Anchor," recorded in 1987 for a John Peel session, is easily the highlight—the only cut to approach the raw urgency of the 'Gales or Lloyd's lyrical potential. Better luck next time. [jg/dgs]

NIHILISTICS

Nihilistics EP (Visionary) 1982

Nihilistics (Brain Eater) 1983

Bad ... Dirty ... Hate (Visionary) 1989

Fuck the Human Race (Visionary) 1990

Nihilistics are a stupid, obnoxious hardcore band from Long Island, New York. Their lyrics are predictable banalities and their attitudinizing is irritating. That's the bad news. The good news is that the Nihilistics album is pretty good (even if the preceding live-song 7-inch is much better). However full of it their ideas may be, the band members at least believe in them, and advance them with all the passion of the errantly self-righteous. Emotional commitment does count for something, even if that commitment is to a redo like "Take it from me man . . . fuck the human race" People hate hardcore precisely for stuff like his, but the Nihilistics go far enough to almost make it work.

After a five-year hiatus, the original lineup scraped off the cobwebs and exhumed the band's corpse, ready to pour some corrosive spit from the original punk bucket on the positive 'core and straight-edge generation. The message on Bad . . . Dirty . . . Hate (as opposed to good clean fun) is that life and people suck. In a few cases, singer Ron Rancid manages to tweeze a slender path between sincerely deranged hatred and absurdly grotesque humor; meanwhile, guitarist Ajax Lemanski slices through the dun on "Story Box" and "Punisher." Returning more to the age of punk rather than hardcore, the Nihilistics keep the emphasis on attitude and hybrid tempos, not speed and tightness. "Sub-liminal," "Big Fun" and "The Good Life" all prove the band's competent musicianship while promoting its demented viewpoint.

Besides the grungy "Sorry Hairy Tail" and the rockabilly bass-lined "Vexation," Fuck the Human Race (stickered in stores as Feed the Human Race) includes between-song antics like Rancid's crank calls to a morgue (his day job). Not as generally gripping as the previous LP, but still entertaining. [jl/mg]

NILS

Sell Out Young! EP (Can. Psyche Industry) 1985

The Nils EP (Can. Siegfried) 1986

The Nils (Rock Hotel-Profile) 1987 •

Inspired into existence by the Sex Pistols, this young Montreal guitar quartet, led by brothers Alex and Carlos Soria, plays energetic and competent punkergized rock with rich vocals on their Chris Spedding-produced debut album. (Ivan Doroschuk of Men Without Hats financed and produced the first Canadian EP; the second was actually recorded earlier but went unreleased until 1986.

The Nils is only a semi-official title, the record is also known as The Red EP.)

The Nils album has the same kind of fearless commercial sensibility and melodic intuition as 1978 Generation X or 1987 Soul Asylum: songs like "When the Love Puts on a Sad Face," "Bandito Callin'" and the Hüsker Dü-like "Young Man in Transit" don't reach those bands' heights but show just as much effort and ingenuous spirit. [i]

NINE BELOW ZERO

Live at the Marquee (nr/A&M) 1980

Don't Point Your Finger (A&M) 1981

Third Degree (nr/A&M) 1982

Live at the Venue (nr/Receiver) 1989 •

The underrated Nine Below Zero started out as a cautious but promising London R&B cover band but progressed to fresh, confident originals by the time they broke up in 1982. Releasing a live album as a debut is a mite unusual, but Live at the Marquee clearly captures NBZ's early tightness and enthusiasm. The material—mostly such old tunes as the Four Tops' "I Can't Help Myself" and Sam the Sham's "Woolly Bully"—get powerful readings here. Don't Point Your Finger, produced by old pro Glyn Johns, is a transitional album. Though the majority of songs are originals, most written by singer/guitarist Dennis Greaves, they sound authentically old.

Nine Below Zero updated its sound on Third Degree with wonderful results. Greaves successfully cross-cuts his beloved R&B roots with elements of traditional rock-'n-roll, pop and even a touch of reggae ("Easy Street SE 17"), all infused with a healthy shot of punky energy ("Eleven Plus Eleven," "Tearful Eye," "True Love Is a Crime" and the terrific "Wipe Away Your Kiss").

The second live album, released nearly a decade after it was recorded, is fast, hard and taut, with Mark Feltham's harp playing providing a strong blast of Chicago blues in the band's originals and solid covers of "I've Got My Mojo Working," "Keep on Knocking," "Homework" and "Just a Little Bit." The set isn't very different from the one on the first album, but this music is more than durable enough to withstand repeated use.

See also Truth.

[ks/i]

NINE INCH NAILS

Pretty Hate Machine (TVT) 1989 •

Cleveland singer/synthetic noise wiz Trent Reznor is yet another tortured soul with a whole lexicon of Excedrin headache beats stored on floppy disc. As Nine Inch Nails, this junior industrialist takes out his anxiety and despair on the rest of the world. But while the tracks are springier and less stringent than on other likeminded hammer parties, the vocals carry very little in terms of threat. Reznor is talented, though, and many instrumental segments on Pretty Hate Machine (co-produced with, variously, Flood, Adrian Sherwood, John Fryer and Keith LeBlanc) are intriguing indeed. If he wasn't trying so hard to sound like Skinny Puppy and Ministry, he could make really effective records of his own.

[gk]

999

999 (nr/UA) 1978 (Fr. Fan Club) 1987 •
Separates (nr/UA) 1978 (Fr. Fan Club) 1987
High Energy Plan (PVC) 1979
The Biggest Prize in Sport (Polydor) 1980
The Biggest Tour in Sport EP (Polydor) 1980
Singles Album (nr/UA) 1980
Concrete (Polydor) 1981
13th Floor Madness (nr/Albion) 1983
Greatest Hits (nr/Albion) 1984
Face to Face (nr/Labritain) 1985
In Case of Emergency (nr/Dojo) 1986
Lust Power and Money (nr/ABC) 1987 •
Live and Loud!! (nr/Link) 1989
The Cellblock Tapes (nr/Link) 1990

Despite a large recorded output and an avoidance of typecasting, London's 999 never amounted to anything more than an undistinguished and dispensable band of moderate ability. Various posing as mutant bubblegum, rocky art-school cleverness, hard R&B rock and quirky pop, 999's problem has always been a lack of adequate talent to invest their music with real originality; to be fair, they have managed a few good sides along the way and also deserve credit for endurance and persistence.

999 introduced the band, dressed in kicky, colorful clothes and working with pop producer Andy Arthurs, yet it's not a pop album. The music is harmless but charmless, although the vocals are occasionally winning, as on "Me and My Desire" and the whiny "Emergency." The CD adds three bonus tracks.

For their second effort, 999 enlisted soon-to-be-a-superstar producer Martin Rushent, and Separates does have a lot more going for it. The band's playing is harder and tighter, with better focus, although the semi-hit "Homicide" benefits more from a clever arrangement than intrinsic quality. Other good tunes include the taut "Feelin' Alright with the Crew" and an all-out rocker, "High Energy Plan." Still minor, but improving. (High Energy Plan is an American revision, with two tracks deleted and two 45 cuts added.)

The Biggest Prize in Sport teamed 999 (temporarily a five-piece, having added a second drummer to aid the injured Pablo Labritain) with producer Vic Maile, resulting in a disc that is trebly and lifeless, except for the poppy title track, which sounds like a Cockney Ramones.

Hoping to stir up some domestic interest, 999's American record company issued a six-song mini-album, The Biggest Tour in Sport, recorded live in 1980 in the States. The sound's good and hot; selections include "Homicide," "Emergency" and "Feelin' Alright with the Crew."

Not to be outdone, their English label whipped up a collection—in chronological order—of 999's singles, starting with "I'm Alive" (1977) and running through "Waiting" (1978), including both sides of each—fifteen tracks in all. If you need to find out about 999, Singles Album is the record to have, containing all their essential (i.e., good) material.

Concrete could almost be mistaken for an Inmates record, thanks to two pointless covers ("Li'l Red Riding Hood," "Fortune Teller") and a mundane, characterless guitar-rock sound.

13th Floor Madness was slagged off in the press as soft disco, but the self-released Face to Face is a pleasant surprise, offering melodic rock with a certain charm (despite occasional gaffes and lapses of wit). The band's original lineup, still together after all these years, is not exactly getting better by leaps and bounds, but the songs here are their most likable in a long time—a few could even be characterized as memorable—and bits of invention keep them moving along.

Following another compilation (In Case of Emergency), 999 released Lust Power and Money, an all-new live-in-London album recorded in April 1987. The band's lineup is essentially intact (only the bassist is new); the program includes the ancient ("Hit Me," "Homicide," "Feelin' Alright with the Crew") and the relatively recent ("White Trash" and "Lust Power and Money"). The performance is dull but the sound is good. (One hopes there was more audience present than what's audible.)

As hard as it might be to believe that an audience exists for such a thing, The Cellblock Tapes is an out-of-the-vaults album containing eight vintage live tracks and seven old demos. [i]

See also Kilburn and the High Roads.

NINE POUND HAMMER

The Mud, the Blood, and the Beers (Wanghead) 1989

A trailer-park sensibility, genuine Kentucky accents and racing Ramonesy punk make this rowdy Lexington quartet a smoke-belching blast of fun. I won't use derogatory expressions like "white trash" and "redneck" (the group will: "Redneck Romance" is one of the best tracks), but these guys have enough low-culture resonance (not to mention mechanical skills) to become the kings of drive-in rock'n'roll. And if Nine Pound Hammer sounds like a four-headed Mojo Nixon, it should be noted that their "Bye Bye, Glen Frey" predates his "Don Henley Must Die" by a year. [i]

9353

To Whom It May Consume (R+B) 1984

We Are Absolutely Sure There Is No God (Fountain of Youth) 1985

With hardcore just as stagnant in Washington DC as it was everywhere else in 1984, the appearance of 9353 came as quite a jolt. Although the band wasn't first-rate—Jason Carmer's delay-driven guitar serves as only a decorative ornament, and the rhythm section is rarely more than competent—To Whom It May Consume is surprisingly good, psychotic punk psychedelia (with a twist of good-humored evil) highlighted by Bruce Merkle's astounding vocal range, which can shift from a deep drawl to a convincing Ethel Merman warble in a flash.

We Are Absolutely Sure There Is No God was released at the end of 1985, after the short-lived band's breakup. Merkle continues to display his bag of tricks, never once treating any of his many voices with seriousness or respect. The album does not contain as many memorable songs as the first, but try "American Schizo," "Evil Teen Facility Yard" and "Who Does What and Why." [icm]

NIPS 'N' NIPPLE ERECTORS

See Pogues.

NIRVANA

Bleach (Sub Pop) 1988 •

Blew EP (Ger. Sub Pop-Glitterhouse) 1989 •

Nirvana was formed in 1986 by vocalist/guitarist Kurt Cobain and bassist Chris Novoselic in Aberdeen, Washington, home of legendary quaalude-metal titans the Melvins, whose drummer played on the band's 1987 demo. After a brilliant debut single (a snarling cover of the Shocking Blue's "Love Buzz," included on the first album), Bleach elevated Nirvana to major hip-press status, as Cobain's sandpaper growl and roaring guitar propelled amazing hard-rock hooks. His taut, jagged songs contain elements of the Seattle sound but show a rare sophistication.

The Blew EP combines two album tracks with two new songs, the slow-grinding "Been a Son" and the bruising "Stain." [ja]

NITECAPS

Go to the Line (Sire) 1982

Spearheaded by erstwhile Voidoid (known then as X-sessive) Jahn Xavier, the Nitecaps—a multi-racial quartet including New York Dolls roadie/bassist Peter Jordan—were sort of an American counterpart to Graham Parker's Rumour. On Go to the Line, with the fab Uptown Horns and production by Langer and Winstanley, the babyfaced Xavier reveals himself to be not only a mean guitarist, but a throaty growler with a voice that crosses Joe Jackson and Otis Redding. R&B like this rarely sounds so strong or credible. The only misstep is a Zombies/Easybeats medley; the rest (originals, aside from one arcane oldie) is solid, foot-stompin' fun. Nitecaps guitarist Al Maddy later joined the Dots.

In 1990, several Nitecaps resurfaced as Jahn Xavier and the Preachers. [jg]

See also Dots, Richard Hell & the Voidoids.

NITS

The Nits (Hol. Scramble) 1978

Tent (Hol. Epic) 1979 •

New Flat (Hol. CBS) 1980 •

Work (Hol. CBS) 1981 •

Omsk (Hol. CBS) 1983 •

Kilo EP (Hol. CBS) 1983 •

Adieu, Sweet Bahnhof (Hol. CBS) 1984 •

Henk (Hol. CBS) 1986 •

In the Dutch Mountains (Hol. CBS) 1987 (nr/CBS) 1988 •

Hat EP (Hol. CBS) 1988

Urk (Hol. CBS) 1989 •

Giant Normal Dwarf (Hol. CBS) 1990 •

R.J. STIPS

U.P. (Hol. CBS) 1981 •

The obvious derivativeness on the Nits' early albums could have been written off as cut-rate local filtration/reassembly of the real thing from Britain and America (Beatles, Talking Heads, etc.). In retrospect, however, those records can be seen as learning experiences of a world-class band now deserving international attention.

Evidently a thousand or so copies of an LP entitled

The Nits were pressed prior to their CBS signing, an achievement apparently best forgotten. That's only marginally less true of their first three CBS outings. Comparisons to tongue-in-cheek pop synthesists like 10cc and fellow Dutchmen Gruppo Sportivo immediately come to mind, but leave the Nits on the short end of the stick—too cute, not clever enough by half and too sterile, especially on Tent. Arty touches provide welcome contrasts here and there on New Flat, and a melody or two does catch the ear. Work attempts to up the Serious Artistic Expression ante, but the music rarely can carry the lyrical weight. Still, at points on both New Flat and Work, Hans Hofstede reveals a growing aptitude for creating little emotional postcards.

Omsk and Kilo show the Nits beginning to find their voices; it must be at least partly attributed to the arrival of keyboardist Robert Jan Stips. Previously known for his work with Golden Earring and for producing Gruppo Sportivo albums, he oversaw part of Tent and all of New Flat. His own LP is a curious blend of pop-rock and jazz syncopations, in a unique style that starts out intriguing but turns irritating. All the same, he does bolster the Nits' brighter, poppier side and shades the darker, moodier aspect most often explored by Hofstede. On Omsk and Kilo, Hofstede unveils a mild resemblance to Elvis Costello (but dreamier, more vulnerable, less venomous); Stips' dominant keyboards make for settings that are affecting, even haunting.

Adieu, Sweet Bahnhof reflects the group's odd international sensibility. None of the Nits' lyrics have ever been in Dutch; a song on the LP which refers to Holland is sung half in English, half in Turkish. Is there some national inferiority complex at work here? In any case, the record is more musically confident and aggressive, yet less affecting, than its immediate predecessors. There are still clumsy phrasings and syntactical mistakes (in songs by Stips and Michiel Peters, not Hofstede), which would be more easily forgiven/ignored if the melodies were stronger. This album seems to be a move sideways, a retrenchment, a sort of public ironing out of the kinks, though the really good tracks (like those featuring Hofstede's Lennonish Costelloisms) do make it a respectable opus.

Henk is another story altogether. Firstly, there's the mystery of the title (weirder since Hofstede changed his name from Hans to Henk after the Work LP). Peters is gone. Hofstede now writes all the lyrics, while he, Stips and agile drummer Rob Kloet share equal credit for the music. Other than a spot of banjo (!) and one track's worth of guitar, there are no fretted instruments to be heard—it's all voices, keyboards and drums. And it's great—oddball pop-rock of the first order. The imaginative range of electronic sounds and textures can be breathtaking, as on "Cabins" and "Under a Canoe." The melodies are attractive. The words are often abstract but always evocative. The Nits now sound like . . . the Nits. (The Henk CD also contains Kilo.)

In the Dutch Mountains—the title track inspired by Cees Nootboom's acclaimed quasi-fantasy novel—is also impressive. The Nits again sound like the Nits, but substantially different Nits. Intended to resemble a live show, it was recorded "in their own rehearsal room, an old gym in Amsterdam . . . straight to two-track digital tape with no dubbing or mixing after the actual recording." New bassist Joke Geraets plays only a stand-up acoustic; Hofstede's back to playing guitar. The occasional guests are three female backing vocalists and a steel guitar player. Hofstede's lyrical approach is—as on Henk—offbeat, but also consistently personal (even at one point confessional). Surreal juxtapositions of prosaic imagery suggest travels through his dreams. The cleverly contrapuntal music and rhythms use a tonal/umbral palette that is more subdued (yet equally effective in its way) than Henk. And this is nearly a live album! Brilliant.

The Hat mini-album (six tracks, 25 minutes) refines the earlier "emotional postcard" approach, with the theme of loneliness—romantic, spiritual, physical—getting a real workout. It's quite enjoyable, the unified sound not unlike Omsk or Kilo, yet sonically lighter and simpler.

Soon after, the Nits recorded a double live album, Urk. The selection of 29 songs (over two hours) samples every record from Work on, with Dutch Mountains getting the most emphasis, followed by Henk, Omsk and Hat; a strong, well-blended assortment. Carps: While several songs from weaker records seem more impressive than before, some better numbers are a little less so. In addition, a couple of theatrical songs geared for the stage lose something without the visual component. Still, it's an enjoyable overview as delectable as the original albums.

Geraets had departed by Giant Normal Dwarf, and the LP is all Stips' keyboards, Kloets' drums and Hofstede's voice(s). Even more explicitly than Dutch Mountains, the record concentrates on dreams, fantasies and childlike visions. With less energy and more reserve, it's not as immediately imposing as Dutch Mountains or Henk, but is still an attractive, wistful, sometimes disturbing album, engagingly capturing the internal logic of dreams and translating complex emotional states into songs. And it's darned pretty, too!

[jg]

NITZER EBB

Isn't It Funny How Your Body Works EP (nr/Power of Voice Comm.) 1985

That Total Age (Mute-Geffen) 1987 •

Belief (Mute-Geffen) 1988 •

So Bright So Strong (Ger. Upfront) 1988 •

Showtime (Mute-Geffen) 1990 •

With its aggressive music and Teutonic name, casual listeners may assume Nitzer Ebb to be of German origin when, in fact, the trio is from the tranquil English town of Chelmsford. Nonetheless, this is one angst-ridden band: seizing on simple catchphrases (shouted more often than sung or rapped), minimal synthesized hooklines and pounding, cathartic beats, the songs on That Total Age are industrial-strength anthems. "Join in the Chant" became a bizarre early favorite of British acid house fans (its references to "muscle and hate" having little to do with peace and love), and equally intense songs such as "Let Your Body Learn" and "Murderous" are heard more on alternative dancefloors now than at the time of their release. For such a challenging combination of anger and rhythm, and without a dull moment, That Total Age is a monumental album.

Armed with that highly identifiable sound, Nitzer

Ebb has repeated it again and again; the songs on Belief could easily be substituted for those on the first album. In noteworthy cuts like the pulsating "Control I'm Here," "Blood Money" and "Hearts and Minds," Nitzer Ebb's lyrics hone in on basic emotions and issues of power and lust. There is no sense of advancement or development on Belief; arguably none is required.

A German label collected the group's first singles (including four versions of "Warsaw Ghetto," a song from That Total Age) for the So Bright So Strong compilation. The four tracks from the 1985 12-inch debut are notable for being more melodic and faster than what would become the archetypal Nitzer Ebb sound; even more unusual—given that Nitzer Ebb artwork tends to be as minimal and clinical as the music itself—the record contains photos of what was then a trio (now pared down to the duo of vocalist Douglas McCarthy and musician Bon Harris).

Showtime finds the group trying to diversify with little success, the electronic blues of "Nobody Knows" is messy, and attempts at melodic vocals only emphasize McCarthy's weakness as a singer. There are strong moments—the single "Lightning Man," with its incessant keyboard refrain, and the jaunty "Fun to Be Had"—but this isn't their strongest opus. Not so ironically, it proved a quick seller; touring stadiums with Depeche Mode made Nitzer Ebb the underground name to drop at the start of the new decade. [tf]

MOJO NIXON AND SKID ROPER

Mojo Nixon and Skid Roper (RBI-Enigma) 1985 (IRS) 1991 •

Frenzy (Restless) 1986 (IRS) 1991 •

Get Out of My Way! (Restless) 1986 (IRS) 1991 •

Bo-Day-Shus!!! (Enigma) 1987 (IRS) 1991 •

Root Hog or Die (Enigma) 1989 (IRS) 1991 •

Unlimited Everything (nr/Enigma) 1990 •

MOJO NIXON

Otis (Enigma) 1990 (IRS) 1991 •

SKID ROPER AND THE WHIRLIN SPURS

Trails Plowed Under (Triple X) 1989 •

Lydias Cafe (Triple X) 1991 •

You figure it out. Mojo Nixon and sidekick Skid Roper first gained attention with a delicate love-letter ditty to then-MTV VJ Martha Quinn subtly entitled "Stuffin' Martha's Muffin." In addition to bluntly proclaiming his desire to get intimate with the perky Ms. Q, the call-and-response vocals in the bridge take on the whole institution: "MTV/get away from me . . . I say, Music Television/should be covered in jism." Several years later, there's Mojo doing spots on MTV, talking about post-punk philosophers while hanging from a jungle gym and serving as a roving reporter on the beach for Spring Break.

Sold out? Quite the opposite. Mojo Nixon and Skid Roper is a bit on the tame side—songs with titles like "Jesus at McDonalds" and "Art Fag Shuffle" should be great, but are merely clever. Mojo finds his true voice on Frenzy. The musical accompaniment to Nixon's often hysterical socio-political commentary is mostly a frisky down-home mixture of blues, R&B and rockabilly. Roper's contributions consist of things like washboard, harmonica, mandolin, etc. Besides "Stuffin' Martha's Muffin," Frenzy offers Nixon's appraisal of such topics as giggling ("Where the Hell's My Money"), fatherhood ("I'm Living with the Three-Foot Anti-Christ") and savings & loans ("I Hate Banks"). Add to that his hilarious checkout line tabloid spoof, "The Amazing Bigfoot Diet," and a fleeting harmonica-driven version of "In-a-Gadda-Da-Vida," and this LP should appeal to anyone with a funny bone.

Get Out of My Way! is a seven-track mini-LP (issued, at one point, on clear vinyl) reprising "Stuffin' " and "Jesus at McDonald's," plus a few of Mojo's very own Christmas songs. All of these tracks are included on the Frenzy CD.

Bo-Day-Shus!!! is every bit as big a hoot, with the epic "Elvis Is Everywhere" (finally revealing the identity of the much-feared anti-Elvis—sure to be a Trivial Pursuit question to some future generation) and a topical ode to the just-say-no crowd, "I Ain't Gonna Piss in No Jar." Other little slices of Americana include "B.B.Q.U.S.A.," "Wash No Dishes No More" and "I'm Gonna Dig Up Howlin' Wolf." Folks, Nixon is the man this country needs—Mojo ain't no Dick. (CD bonus cuts: "Don't Want No Foo-Foo Haircut on My Head" and "The Story of One Chord.")

Jim Dickenson's [sic] production and a few extra sidemen makes Root Hog or Die relatively fancy (for Nixon and Roper, that is). Mojo kicks things off with the hilarious one-two pop-iconography punch of "Debbie Gibson Is Pregnant with My Two-Headed Love Child" and "(619) 239-KING" (a plea to locate Elvis who is, as we all know, everywhere) and follows it with a patriotic rendition of "This Land Is Your Land" that devolves into a convincing pitch for that imaginary trash heaven, Mojo World. The record sags a bit after that, although Skid's "Tennessee Jive" serves up a sweet bit of Rockpiliish rock and the Mojo sexuality rears its ugly head in "She's Vibrator Dependent" and the funky "Louisiana Liplock."

Skimming the scunge off the top of the Mojo and Skid oeuvre, the Unlimited Everything compilation condenses the best of the duo's four albums together for a brainbusting dose of raucous pop culturecide from the best in the business. (Kids, don't attempt to sing these songs at home. These men are professionals.)

Parting company with Mojo, Skid formed a rocking cowboy/country band and launched his solo career with an amiable album of (mostly) romantic (mostly) originals. Jayne Robson's vocals, harmonizing nicely with Skid's, help the agreeable Trails Plowed Under drift along, a twang in its heart and nothing much on its mind. (The ironic "Please Forgive Me" is one clever exception.) Lacking his ex-partner's demented imagination, Roper's more modest talents as a frontman and songwriter make the album easy to hear but hard to remember. (The CD adds two bonus tracks.)

Old producer pal Dickinson helped Mojo assemble the ultimate trailer-park-rock studio band for his solo debut. As John Doe (bass; X), Country Dick Montana (drums; Beat Farmers), Bill Davis (guitar; Dash Rip Rock) and Eric Ambel (guitar; Del-Lords) launch Otis into a solidly musical orbit, Mojo adjusts himself to such skilled company and straddles their sonic missile, ranting and raving about the legal profession ("Destroy All Lawyers"), ex-Eagles ("Don Henley Must Die," complete with a relevant guitar quote), politics (the funky "Put a Sex Mo-Sheen in the White House"), celebrity teeth ("Shane's Dentist") and pomposity (the Stonesy "Ain't High Falutin' "). With the exception of an unironic ballad bad enough to hopefully discourage any such missteps in the future, Otis is maximum Mojo. [dgs/i]

NO DIRECTION

No Direction (No Direction) 1984

Becoming Obsession (No Direction) 1986

The No Direction Tapes (No Direction) 1988

On what has to be the first independent album ever released by a Sioux Falls, South Dakota punk band, No Direction plays earnest political protest numbers with a lot more spirit than technique. Far removed from any stylistic trendiness (or, for that matter, pop musical trends of any sort), this trio gains strength from its basic simplicity. The sixteen songs on No Direction have energy but a spare sound with open spaces that would benefit enormously from bigger amps and a skilled producer.

Except for horribly mis-EQ'd sound that entirely ignores the audio spectrum's bottom half, Becoming Obsession (recorded in 1984) demonstrates an enormous amount of growth: guitarist Rick Smith works complex jagged figures around singer Rich Show's busybody bass (at least what can be heard of it) and Charles Luden's understated drumming. Without suggesting that it sounds dated, the trio's drivingly hypnotic swirls here recall '78/'79-vintage Cure or Gang of Four, with a bit of Joy Division in the rhythm section. Really cool.

Presented in unedited form—complete with false starts, unstructured jams, etc.—the album is positively amazing, easily comparable to the work of any other post-punk band around. Displaying exceptional trio skill (Show's vocals, having acquired a Bonoesque emotional range, are also drastically better), the thickened attack turns rich and catchy melodic rock songs like "Rise Up," the touching "Letter to Jeffrey" and the evocative "Michael Nydelski" into storms of harmonics and rhythm that are equally powerful on conscious and subliminal levels. A reverent cover of Joy Division's "Transmission" may be a bit too tributary, and "Dark Basement" more or less reinvents U2 (clearly the strongest influence here) in an unpretentious American mold, but "Life Is a Crisis" switches through something resembling the Minutemen's sideways funk, some unmistakable Who quotes and a U2-ish charge within a few seconds. That the tracks were recorded virtually live suggests what an awesome unit these guys had become; few local indie bands sound as ready to play for 50,000 people as this. Or not. No Direction broke up in 1989. [1]

NO MAN

See Roger Miller.

NOMEANSNO

Mama (Can. no label) 1984

Sex Mad (Can. Psyche Industry) 1986 (Alternative Tentacles) 1987

The Day Everything Became Nothing EP (Alternative Tentacles) 1988
Small Parts Isolated and Destroyed (Alternative Tentacles) 1988
The Day Everything Became Isolated and Destroyed [CD] (Alternative Tentacles) 1988 •
Wrong (Alternative Tentacles) 1989 •

Emerging from a basement in Victoria, British Columbia, brothers Rob (bass, vocals, guitar) and John (drums, vocals, keyboards) Wright began NoMeansNo's strange recording career with Mama, a self-released album of selfconsciously warped lyrics ("We Are the Chopped," "My Roommate Is Turning into a Monster") and semi-melodic music that asserts its angular divergence from the norm politely, more jazzy Devo than anti-chromatic noise.

But that was just the first step. On Sex Mad (the American edition was revised from its original Canadian release), NoMeansNo pours out punky collegiate weirdness with some of the same slash'n'burn egghead energy as Couch Flambeau. Songs like "Self Pity" and "Dead Bob," not to mention an appropriately titled instrumental ("Obsessed"), revel in conscientious bizarritude and a feverish demi-musical attack.

The Day Everything Became Nothing—a six-song 12-inch—offers more dadaesque invention with concertedly intense and pointed music. The unstructured prose of the title track is supported by pounding drums alternating with bursts of guitar noise; "Beauty and the Beast" syncopates the rhythms for a disorienting effect that suggests funk and negates it in the same line. Impressive.

Small Parts Isolated and Destroyed focuses the band's anomie into fairly presentable form, modulating the carefully arranged muscular rock and punk into a tense knot of energy with fewer jagged points and rough edges than usual. John's syncopated drumming and Rob's noisy guitar solos provide most of the record's appeal; the frequent rhythm shifts are unsettling. (Small Parts later joined its immediate predecessor on a power-packed CD entitled The Day Everything Became Isolated and Destroyed.)

Wrong puts an angry amphetamine charge to Small Parts' precision, sending NoMeansNo into clamorous, roaring overdrive that, in its most organized portions, approaches thrash jazz. The lyrics don't bother with longwinded expressions of sensitive emotions: the complete libretto of "Brainless Wonder" (albeit not typical) is "I need lunch/Feed me now/I need lunch/Where's my break?!!!" The album's occasional descents into mere punk are more often than not disappointingly plain, but tracks like "The End of All Things" and "Big Dick" are bracingly original and utterly invigorating. (The CD and cassette add two.) [i]

See also Jello Biafra.

NON

See Boyd Rice.

NO TREND

Teen Love EP (No Trend) 1983
Too Many Humans (No Trend) 1984
A Dozen Dead Roses (No Trend) 1985

Heart of Darkness EP (Widowspeak) 1985
When Death Won't Solve Your Problems (Widowspeak) 1986
Tritonian Nash—Vegas Polyester Complex (Touch and Go) 1986

No Trend clunked around Washington DC in the '80s, releasing a number of wildly inconsistent records in the process. The Teen Love EP, a fun four-song 12-inch, has the off-kilter and terrific "Mass Sterilization Caused by Venereal Disease," a Flipperesque pandemonium feast punctuated by the simple lyrics of the title. What follows is the bumbling "Die," a song not all that dissimilar from PiL's "Death Disco." The flipside contains the lengthy, snidely vituperative "Teen Love."

After that promising beginning, Too Many Humans succumbs to abject hero worship, as the group kneels before Public Image's Metal Box altar. Toss in Flipper, Alien Sex Fiend and, in one case, Negativland and you've got No Trend's recipe here. The Flipperish songs include heavily reverbed vocals (just like Flipper), and the PiL-isms feature blatant Levene and Lydon imitations—albeit pretty good ones. Think about the original combos real hard and you won't need to hear this record.

Lydia Lunch made a guest appearance on A Dozen Dead Roses and then joined forces with the group for a 10-inch EP, Heart of Darkness. Her label, Widowspeak, also released a No Trend compilation, When Death Won't Solve Your Problems. All of which led up to Tritonian Nash, a thoroughly amazing chunk of plastic crammed full of surprises, including a horn section, bells, a cellist, guitarists who don't want to be Keith Levene and a sorely needed sense of humor. Start to finish, Tritonian Nash is a nearly indescribable aural romp of punk, funk and pop, with dashes of lounge music and some dreadful country twinges. Find this record and buy it. [icm]

See also Lydia Lunch.

NOVA MOB

See Grant Hart.

NOYES BROTHERS

See Spherical Objects.

GARY NUMAN

The Pleasure Principle (Atco) 1979 •
Telekon (Atco) 1980 •
Living Ornaments '79 (nr/Beggars Banquet) 1981
Living Ornaments '80 (nr/Beggars Banquet) 1981
Dance (Atco) 1981 •
I, Assassin (Atco) 1982 •
New Man Numan: The Best of Gary Numan (nr/TV) 1982
Warriors (nr/Beggars Banquet) 1983 •
Berserker (nr/Numa) 1984
White Noise—Live (nr/Numa) 1985
The Fury (nr/Numa) 1985 •
Strange Charm (nr/Numa) 1986 •
Exhibition (nr/Beggars Banquet) 1987 •
Metal Rhythm (nr/Illegal) 1988 •
New Anger (IRS) 1989 •

Selection EP [CD] (nr/Beggars Banquet) 1989 •

The Skin Mechanic (IRS) 1989 •

The Collection (nr/Castle Comm.) 1989 •

Outland (IRS) 1991 ◊

TUBEWAY ARMY

Tubeway Army (nr/Beggars Banquet) 1978 (nr/Fame) 1983 •

First Album (Atco) 1981

The Peel Sessions EP (nr/Strange Fruit) 1987

GARY NUMAN & TUBEWAY ARMY

Replicas (Atco) 1979 •

The Plan 1978 (nr/Beggars Banquet) 1984 •

The Peel Sessions Album (nr/Strange Fruit) 1989 •

RADIO HEART FEATURING

GARY NUMAN

Radio Heart (nr/NBR) 1987 •

SHARPE AND NUMAN

Automatic (nr/Polydor) 1989 •

DRAMATIS

For Future Reference (nr/Rocket) 1981

Gary Numan (Webb) originally rose to UK prominence in 1979 with a frigid synthesizer dance hit, "Are 'Friends' Electric?" His basic sound—subsequently very influential in the dance music and new romantic spheres—began with precise, antiseptic synth handling much of the instrumental work, topped off with lobotomized deadpan vocals singing science-fiction lyrics.

His first album, Tubeway Army (released in America three years later as First Album), features primitive electronics and production that show some flair, though guitars dominate and compositions are locked into the three-minute post-punk structure. Shifting the band's billing, Replicas, on which synth emerges as the dominant instrument, includes "Are 'Friends' Electric?" and reached the top of the British charts. A composite of material from J.G. Ballard novels, Germanic iciness and '60s pop, the album forged a style that was stunningly new at the time but now sounds hopelessly dated.

The Pleasure Principle, Numan's first release under his own name, contains the international hit "Cars" and continued Numan's maturing love affair with the synthesizer. His interest in technology showed itself to be increasing in both the lyrics and the music. Telekon brought guitar noticeably back into the mix. The songs raised Numan's despondent romanticism to new heights (depths?), permeated by doom and synthetic syncopation.

Living Ornaments '79 and Living Ornaments '80, each of which documents a London gig from the specified year, were issued separately as well as in a special boxed set. (All three were, by plan, quickly deleted.) Performances give energy to the songs, and Numan's live voice is frequently more impassioned than his studio persona's. The 1979 LP features synthesizer pyrotechnics by Ultravox's Billy Currie that are unmatched on the 1980 recording.

Dance was Numan's first outing following the disbanding of his backup group and his retirement from touring. It exposes a flair for ironic lyrics and a most undanceable set of dance tunes, downplaying the beat and showing new interest in melodics. Unfortunately, I,

Assassin suggests that Numan had hit a stylistic quandary, as it tended back towards the sound of his hits but—in the wake of new fashions—without any sense of contemporary style. Whereas Pleasure Principle was the vanguard of the future, I, Assassin borders on nostalgia.

Numan's former backing group became Dramatis, and tried a little of everything—mock symphonics, electro-disco, mainstream pop—on the mistitled For Future Reference. Predictably, the only track worth a toss is the one on which Numan adds his deadpan signature to an otherwise faceless outfit.

Subsequently stumped for a way to revive his flagging career, Numan made the roundly dismissed, almost laughable Warriors. He was much better served by the TV best-of and, surprisingly, a collection of pre-synthesizer riff-rockers dating from 1978. The dozen previously unreleased guitar-based demos on The Plan are punky but clear and nonaggressive, providing an unassuming setting for Gazza's characteristically robotic voice and ridiculous lyrics, free of the formulaic setting that typified his early hits, some of which clearly had their beginnings in this material. (Three of the songs were re-recorded with keyboards for Tubeway Army.) Funny stuff that holds up quite well and proves he hasn't always been a bozo.

Numan then began issuing albums and singles on his own Numa label, feeding faithful UK fans, who responded by sending every new item briefly into the lower ends of the charts. He began an occasional collaboration with Shakatak keyboardist Bill Sharpe, producing a neat 1985 single ("Change Your Mind") and an album four years later.

Abiding interest in Numan's back catalogue prompted the 1987 release of a comprehensive two-disc, 25-cut (studio and live) career summary, Exhibition. (Selection offers a sampling of classics from the anthology, including an impressive Zeus B. Held overhaul of "Cars," "Down in the Park," "We Are Glass" and three others. The unrelated Collection is also a two-record compilation; there's some overlap with Exhibition, but the focus is on familiar LP tracks rather than hit singles.)

In an unsuccessful bid to move his career out of its rut, Numan got a new record deal and made Metal Rhythm (released in the US, with two swapped tracks and a remix, as New Anger). Except for soulful female backing vocals and technical improvements that bring them into line with contemporary electro-dance sound (if not style—Numan's hip-hop era has yet to begin), Numan's new songs are indistinguishable from his old ones. (And the attempted appropriation of David Byrne's Talking Heads voice is no benefit.)

Recorded live at one London show in September 1988, The Skin Mechanic adds another concert album to Numan's catalogue with a program of hits (including the umpteenth "Down in the Park" and "Cars" as well as "New Anger" and 1986's "I Can't Stop") played with an eight-piece band.

Beggars Banquet has issued many of Numan's original albums on twofer CDs, pairing The Plan with Replicas, Tubeway Army with Dance, Pleasure Principle with Warriors and Telekon with I, Assassin. Completists may also feel compelled to shell out for The Peel Sessions EP, three Tubeway Army songs ("Me I Disconnect from You," "Down in the Park" and "I Nearly Married a Human") recorded in January 1979, or the superseding Peel Sessions Album, which adds a second batch, four post-Army efforts recorded eight months later. [sg/i]

NUNS

The Nuns (Posh Boy-Bompl) 1980

Rumania (PVC) 1986

For a brief moment in the late '70s, it seemed as if the Nuns might be the catalyst for a successful new wave/punk scene in San Francisco. Their early days earned media praise and they owned a rabid local cult following, but time quickly passed them by. Aggressive musicianship and demanding vocals—especially Jennifer Miro's ice-cold, intense singing—make the first album (which the group had to reform to record) well worth hearing. Lyrically, the Nuns spoke to the decadent side of life as well as anyone, with such tales as "Wild," "Child Molester" and "Suicide Child."

The Nuns inexplicably reformed again, with much the same lineup, for another, more innocuous, album six years later. Miro and Jeff Olenar share the vocals on Rumania, a sophisticated dance record that generally resembles a tasteful version of the group Berlin. Although he's evidently serious, Olenar's idiotic melodramatics suggest Fred Schneider as a sarcastic lounge sleaze, while the far more talented Miro melds nicely with the lightweight synthesizer concoctions. Enjoy her solo turns here, but ignore the rest. [cpl/i]

See also Rank and File.

NURSE WITH WOUND

Chance Meeting of a Sewing Machine and an Umbrella on a Dissecting Table (nr/United Dairies) 1979 ●

To the Quiet Men from a Tiny Girl (nr/United Dairies) 1980 ●

Merzbild Schwet (nr/United Dairies) 1980 ●

Insect and Individual Silenced (nr/United Dairies) 1981

Homotopy to Marie (nr/United Dairies) 1982

Ostranenie 1913 (nr/Third Mind) 1983

Gyllensköld, Gijerstam and I at Rydberg's EP (Bel. Laylah) 1983

Brained by Falling Masonry EP (Bel. Laylah) 1984

Sylvie and Babs Hi-Fi Companion (Bel. Laylah) 1985 ●

Automating Vol. 1 (nr/United Dairies) 1986

Spiral Insana (Hol. Torso) 1987

Drunk with the Old Man of the Mountains (nr/United Dairies) 1987

Alas the Madonna Does Not Function EP (nr/United Dairies) 1988

Soliloquy for Lilith (nr/Idle Hole) 1988

Automating Vol. 2 (nr/United Dairies) 1988

Present the Sisters of Pataphysics (nr/Idle Hole) 1988

A Sucked Orange (nr/United Dairies) 1989 ●

Cooloorta Moon EP (nr/Idle Hole) 1989

Gyllensköld/Brained (Bel. Laylah) 1989 ●

Soliloquy for Lilith Parts 5/6 (nr/Idle Hole) 1989

Psilotripitaka [CD] (nr/United Dairies) 1990 ●

NURSE WITH WOUND/ORGANUM

A Missing Sense (nr/United Dairies) 1986

NURSE WITH WOUND/ CURRENT 93

Nylon Coverin' Body Smotherin' [tape] (nr/United Dairies) 1988

As a testament to the random disorder and beauty of life, London's Nurse with Wound (Steve Stapleton) functioned outside the normal musical channels for a decade, experimenting with tape collages of disjointed phrases, improvised music, electronics and found sounds on a series of intriguing, provocative, humorous and frequently entertaining self-released records. Between 1978 and 1988, Stapleton collaborated with such likeminded sonic adventurers as David Tibet of Current 93 and Tony Wakeford of Sol Invictus to produce a prodigious body of work that embraces surrealism in both content and graphics.

NWW's debut, Chance Meeting (originally issued in an edition of 500), welds introverted, spacey guitar to converging hemispheres of intergalactic blips. Then, like much of the band's music, it veers into sketchy doodles: between intermittent lulls of humming and buzzing, there are bursts of frenzied screeching, torture chamber screams, piano scales, women speaking French, etc.

To the Quiet Men from a Tiny Girl resembles a nest of vibrating insects, with clinking chains, someone practicing saxophone, an operatic soprano and other voices. "Ostranenie" suggests a house of a hundred rooms—with a different noise in each.

Merzbild Schwet is as challenging as a Buñuel film, with repeated lines (like "We have fallen silent . . . lost the power of speech . . . our heads are empty . . .") as women laugh and sing. Other ingredients: clanking, ripping velcro, angry voices and something like a sick elephant honking.

Those first three albums were later reissued in a CD boxed set (Psilotripitaka), which also includes Ladies Home Tickler, another bizarre cut-up collage: snippets of sappy tunes, electrical noises and taunting laughter. Present the Sisters of Pataphysics compiles passages from the first three LPs.

The avant drippings on Sylvie and Babs—the most guest-laden NWW effort, with dozens of contributors as opposed to the usual one or two—include more laughter and repetition of the word "pardon." The two Automating albums collect material from the many compilations to which Nurse with Wound has contributed. Slices of show tunes, repetitive background beats and advice like "Never eat anything bigger than your head" are sprinkled throughout. Volume II addresses the hierarchy of biological existence; one segment could be the soundtrack for a science fiction feature about giant rampaging tarantulas.

A pair of 12-inch EPs paired as an album, Gyllensköld bristles the coarsest of hairs with scratching and horror dungeon screams while Brained adds the demonic voice of Clint Ruin yet contains a movement that could accompany an underwater Cousteau documentary.

A Sucked Orange offers 20 experimental vignettes, many of which justify their titles: the scraping murmur of "Flea Bite," the repetitive clank of utensils beneath a spoken loop of "It ain't necessarily so" on "It Just Ain't So," the catchy ditty plinked out on "This Piano Can't Think."

Soliloquy for Lilith is Stapleton's surprising chef d'oeuvre, a three-album box of contemplative, atmospheric experiments employing treatments of a stringed instrument of his own invention.

Over time, however, the group's usual organized chaos gained a certain predictability. At the end of 1988, Stapleton retired to a farm in Ireland and Nurse with Wound ended [mg]

See also Current 93.

NUTTY BOYS

See Madness.

N.W.A

N.W.A. and the Posse (Macola) 1987

Straight Outta Compton (Ruthless-Priority) 1988 •

100 Miles and Runnin' EP (Ruthless-Priority) 1990 •

Niggaz4Life (Ruthless-Priority) 1991 •

EAZY-E

Eazy-Duz-It (Ruthless-Priority) 1988 •

ARABIAN PRINCE

Brother Arab (Orpheus) 1989 •

THE D.O.C.

No One Can Do It Better (Ruthless-Atlantic) 1989 •

ICE CUBE

AmeriKKKa's Most Wanted (Priority) 1990 •

Kill at Will (Priority) 1990 •

Like any grassroots movement, the hard end of rap music attracts a diversity of views and motives. Where Public Enemy brings some intellectual analysis to its militant demands for African-American justice, N.W.A. (Niggas With Attitude) give voice to urban alienation and black rage, offering an unpoliticized expression of their own lives and fantasies. By offering a vast audience of disaffected young people an unvarnished and inherently glamorized version of brutal street life, this potent crew from Compton (south of central Los Angeles) has managed to sell loads of records, pique governmental interest and raise disturbing issues about the reality quotient in rhymes about violence, misogyny and sociopathic behavior.

N.W.A. and the Posse is a loose and funky warm-up, showcasing the young crew—Eazy-E, Ice Cube, Arabian Prince, M.C. Ren, etc.—in various permutations rapping about cars, girls and booze over Dr. Dre's on-the-money Cali-style backing tracks. Although much of the record is strictly for fun ("Drink It Up" is a goofy party number sung to the tune of "Twist and Shout"; "Fat Girl" tells a dumb story about an overzealous, overweight gal), Eazy-E's autobiographical "Boyz-n-the Hood" and the nonjudgmental "Dope Man" aptly demonstrate the group's tougher side. Although delivered as a TV joke, "Panic Zone" elevates Compton to a mythological domain over which N.W.A. prevails.

Beginning with the classic "Crazy motherfucker named Ice Cube/From the gang called Niggas With Attitude," the blistering Straight Outta Compton defines gangsta style, laying down a shockingly fearless tough-guy line, demanding respect and threatening violence at every turn. "Do I look like a motherfucking role model?," asks Ice Cube in "Gangsta Gangsta": "To a kid looking up to me life ain't nothin' but bitches and money." (His nearly upstanding "Express Yourself," however, confuses matters completely.) The controversial "___ the Police," a mock trial of the boys in blue, promises armed resistance to unwarranted hassles, underscoring the point with the sound of gunshots. Whether this hyper-drama is meant to be taken seriously or not, the distinction—created by first-person delivery of realistic tales that shift without blinking from hustling women at parties to shooting people for fun—is obviously lost on some listeners.

Exploiting their notoriety as FBI-certified outlaws, N.W.A.—no longer numbering Ice Cube in the posse—rap a high-tension action adventure on the title track of 100 Miles and Runnin', which also includes "Sa Prize (Part 2)," a crudely theatrical continuation of "___ the Police." But any hope of a political consciousness taking hold is dashed by "Just Don't Bite It," a detailed discussion of fellatio, and the pointlessness of the record's two other cuts.

On his own album, Eazy-E (Eric Wright) reveals himself to be a surprisingly ineffectual rapper, an unconvincing hothead and would-be sex machine who sounds like the victim of peer pressure. Eazy-Duz-It demonstrates E's ready willingness to restrain himself (something that has evidently never occurred to Ice Cube) and make commercial concessions (Cube's got him beat there, with an absurd cable-TV beer ad that rhymes "malt liquor" and "makes your jimmy thicker") Eazy's weedy voice suits meaningless tripe like "We Want Eazy," "Radio" and "I'mma Break It Down" on the cleaned-up side, but he sounds forced and fake on the nasty discussions of crime ("Nobody Move," a rap over Yellowman's toast of the same name) and sex ("Still Talkin'," which contains such charming remarks as "I might be a woman-beater but I'm not a pussy-eater") that fill the album's Street Side.

With one memorably bad pun ("She's Got a Big Posse," a dating nightmare) the understated Brother Arab is a nonconfrontational album with a couple of positive doses of reality ("Let the Good Times Roll (Nickel Bag)," "It's a Dope Thang") amid the macho sex and party rhymes. While Arabian Prince has distinctive beats and a quiet authority to his voice, he isn't an inventive enough rhymers, and his LP is easy to overlook.

The D.O.C., another member of the N.W.A. family, released only one album before his rhyming career was derailed in a near-fatal car crash, but it's a good one. Sharply produced (using live musicians as well as transistor beats) by Dr. Dre, No One Can Do It Better—with guest spots by the entire clan, from Eazy-E and Ice Cube to Michel'le—is a symphony of scratching and party funk that avoids politics to make a more general cultural statement.

Quitting N.W.A. after a management dispute, Ice Cube (Oshea Jackson) hooked up with Public Enemy and the Bomb Squad and went solo, playing his viciously coldhearted punk role to the hilt on AmeriKKKa's Most Wanted. Overdoing it on every level—attitude, misogyny, gunplay, crude sexuality and language—the brilliantly produced record is unarguably powerful and frequently incisive in its venomous stabs at various targets (taking as many haphazard pot shots as Fear of a Black Planet) and expressions of incoherent rage. But the victimization of women and the glorification of violence makes this platinum-selling outpouring of profound sociopathy a deeply unsettling cultural achievement.

Kill at Will consists of two LP remixes and four new tracks, including the lighthearted "Jackin' for Beats" (which bites EPMD, PE, Digital Underground, L.L. Cool J and other peers) and the devastating "Dead Homiez," solemnly contemplating the murder of a friend over an evocative mix of horn, guitar and piano.

[i]

JUDY NYLON AND CRUCIAL

Pal Judy (nr/On-U Sound) 1982 [tape] (ROIR) 1990

SNATCH

Snatch EP (nr/Fetish) 1980

Snatch (nr/Pandemonium) 1983

Abandoning New York for London, no-wave singer Judy Nylon teamed with Pat Palladin to form Snatch, ultimately making the German-inspired sound collage

"R.A.F." with Brian Eno, which appeared on the B-side of his "King's Lead Hat" 45. The Snatch EP features Nylon and Palladin teaming up for a pseudo-Tom Waits blues drone called "Shopping for Clothes" and the softly electronic ballad, "Joey," as well as "Red Army," which imitates the technique and style of "R.A.F." Clever and inventive, the work has gentle strength, bitter humor and a thoroughly jaundiced worldview.

Pal Judy, which she co-produced with Adrian Sherwood, grafts Snatch's blues poetics and electronic compositional structures onto fairly straightforward rock music. The result—a moody, adeptly created and performed record suggestive of Patti Smith—smacks of modernized cocktail-lounge music (in the best tradition of that genre). Nylon's originals are acrid and funny in their scope, but the record is stolen by her laconic, opiated rendition of "Jailhouse Rock." [sg]

See also Johnny Thunders.

PHILIP OAKY & GIORGIO MORODER

See Human League.

EBENEZER OBEY

Je Ka Jo (nr/Virgin) 1983

Miliki Plus (nr/Virgin) 1983

Juju Jubilee (Shanachie) 1985 •

Get Yer Jujus Out (Rykodisc) 1989 ◊

Along with King Sunny Adé, Chief Commander Ebenezer Obey dominates the juju music genre, that beautiful, spiritual and eminently danceable combination of traditional chants, hymns, highlife, rock and country-western. An easy way to think of juju is as inverted Western pop: interlocking guitars function as rhythm instruments while numerous drummers take on the melodic responsibilities. Born in Western Nigeria in 1942, Obey joined his first professional band, the Fatai Rolling Dollars, in 1958. By 1963 he had formed his own group, and has since released over 90 singles and albums.

Obey calls his personal style the miliki (enjoyment) sound. Beginning where noted juju entertainer I.K. Diaro left off, Obey has drawn in such Western elements as multiple guitars and a Hawaiian steel guitar soloist, adding them to the traditional rhythmic fundament. Songs tend to reflect Obey's strong Christian beliefs as well as the common problems (often economic) of everyday life.

No record could do justice to the endlessly intense melodic and rhythmic variations heard during one of Obey's all-night concerts. (His touring band is fifteen members strong.) Most juju albums contain side-long songs, but even those rarely put across the scope of a single number. Je Ka Jo and Miliki Plus are similar to Obey's many Nigerian records; Jubilee is a sampler package—edited versions of eight tunes—that displays Obey's progression from grassroots juju to ever-more-sophisticated compositions. Unfortunately, it suffers from a severe case of enjoyment interruptus.

Recorded onstage in exotic Seattle (1987) with his Inter-Reformers Band, Get Yer Jujus Out delivers the live goods, as Obey weaves a sinuous spell for nearly 70 minutes. Featuring nine songs from his scores of Nigerian records, the music rolls with a hipshaking pan-African lilt informed by the guitar styles of soukous, highlife and, of course, juju. [rg]

RIC OCASEK

See Cars.

OCEAN BLUE

The Ocean Blue (Sire-Reprise) 1989 •

Despite echoes of Echo and the Bunnymen, Ultravox and other post-Roxy Britons, this tasteful and skilled quartet actually hails from central Pennsylvania. Energetically playing pristine art-pop of varying character (although some of the tracks are rather styleless), the Ocean Blue comes up with a few winners on the second side of its Mark Opitz-produced debut, but is otherwise too mild-mannered to matter. The group obviously has all the necessary artistic tools in hand, but will need a stronger vision to create a really striking record. [i]

SINÉAD O'CONNOR

The Lion and the Cobra (Ensign-Chrysalis) 1987 •

I Do Not Want What I Haven't Got (Ensign-Chrysalis) 1990 •

It's been a while since a newcomer burst onto the scene with quite as much impact as this amazingly talented young Dubliner. With masterful ability to switch gears between the delicate and the pompous or the direct and the ambiguous, O'Connor piles bits of hard rock, funk, '70s-style spaciness and Celtic traditionalism into her self-produced debut album. Delivering deliberately vague lyrics that manage to at least sound poetic, O'Connor wails, shrieks, whispers, croons, snarls and bellows with the skill and confidence of a veteran. Although The Lion and the Cobra doesn't display much sophistication in the way of musical skills—the songs are pretty basic—her creativity and expressiveness are quite impressive. It wouldn't hurt if she did lighten up a bit, but it's rare to hear such a young artist (20 when the LP was recorded) so clearly in control; if the six-and-a-half-minute "Troy" sounds slow and laborious, she probably wanted it that way.

As grand an artistic and commercial success as the debut was, O'Connor was just warming up. I Do Not Want What I Haven't Got, again self-produced, dwarfs its predecessor in terms of creative ambition and achievement. Amazingly, this harrowingly personal testament to the tumult in her life sold two million copies in its first month of release, largely on the strength of Prince's "Nothing Compares 2 U," ironically one of the record's weakest efforts. Again refusing to be type-cast, O'Connor makes a warm orchestral bed for "Three Babies," delivers the otherwise a cappella "I Am Stretched on Your Grave" over a clattering hip-hop beat, conjures up catchy pop-rock for "The Emperor's New Clothes," gathers thickly chugging electric guitars for "Jump in the River" and sings "Black Boys on Mopeds"—a topical indictment of English hypocrisy—as acoustic folk. But such diversity is no impediment to the album's overall impact. Unified by the razor-sharp intensity of her lyrics and the staggering power of her vocals, I Do Not Want What I Haven't Got is an absolute masterpiece. [dgs/i]

See also U2.

OF CABBAGES AND KINGS

Of Cabbages and Kings (Purge/Sound League) 1987

Face (Purge/Sound League) 1988

Basic Pain Basic Pleasure (Triple X) 1990

Evolved from early-'80s Chicago-to-New York transplants the Bag People (whose one undistributed 45 was seemingly pressed solely for the jukebox at their local Brooklyn bar), guitarist Carolyn Master reassembled Of Cabbages and Kings in 1985 from parts scattered to Swans, Foetus, Glenn Branca, etc. Playing only sporadically due to their outside commitments, they gradually coalesced into a focused unit, although Ted Parsons bailed out after the second record (for his full-time group Prong) to be replaced by ex-Live Skull/Rum drummer Rich Hutchins (also now departed); Diane Wlezien, still a Chi-based blues chanteuse, remains a cameo vocalist both live and on record. Effectively, the core of OCAK is the duo of Master and bassist/singer Algis Kizys (a Swan and sometime Branca associate) plus a drummer.

Decidedly unprolific and rare to perform, OCAK's highly visceral attack is founded on a vivid technical mastery owing little to the commonly revered tenets of speed and/or flash, instead conjuring a brutal, primal power and intensity virtually unmatched in modern music, with Kizys' bone-rattling semi-chorded playing rendering most contemporary rhythms effete, even as Master's guitar shards swirl about the edges like razors in a tornado.

Of Cabbages and Kings delivers a dizzying panorama of dark surrealistic desire and fear—both in sound and lyric—the latter including a soundtracked snippet of Baudelaire. The seven-song Face delves deeper into the group's grueling, obsessive world, stretching the music into less predictable shapes and ingesting piano and accordion while reintroducing Master as a vocalist. Comparatively quiet in spots but no less redolent of dis/unease, it (like the first record) includes radical updates of Bag People material, reinterpreted in Cabbage style as paranoid introspection, more like the ruminations of a self-loathing rape victim than the simpleminded lurid voyeurism so common in deathmetal and elsewhere. Two of the eight songs on Basic Pain Basic Pleasure were previously issued on a 45 and a compilation; what the album lacks in length it more than makes up in breadth, offering the band's crispest (if not most physically imposing) production and arrangements, as well as increased variety of approach. Hutchins is neither as creative nor as aggressively captivating a drummer as Parsons, but songs like the moody, guitarless "Crawl Again" illustrate yet more facets of a band too facetiously dismissed as "mere" New York noisemongers. [ab]

See also Live Skull, Swans.

SEAN O'HAGAN

See Microdisney.

OH-OK

Wow Mini Album EP (DB) 1982

Furthermore What EP (DB) 1983

BUZZ OF DELIGHT

Sound Castles EP (DB) 1984

HOLIDAY

Hello EP (Nightshade) 1987

HETCH HETCHY

Make Djibouti EP (Texas Hotel) 1988

Swollen (Texas Hotel) 1990

After hearing so many art bands buried in their own sense of self-importance, it's refreshing to bask in the modesty of Athens' Oh-OK. Like R.E.M. (with whom they share a family tie), this humble group put their elliptical ideas over as much by being good guys as anything else.

Oh-OK was a guitarless trio on the 7-inch Wow, offering four clever and tuneful songs that get their drive from Lynda (sister of Michael) Stipe's pumping bass and their charm from Linda Hopper's breathy singing: a delightful mix of Pylon and the female side of the B-52's.

With a new drummer and guitarist Matthew Sweet joining Hopper and Stipe, Furthermore What (a six-song 12-inch, co-produced by Mitch Easter) has dreamy melodies, oblique lyrics, ringing guitars—it is the New South, after all—and quirky, minimalist arrangements that hover just outside the pop realm. This kind of undersell rarely ascends to greatness, but Oh-OK is a distinctly fresh pleasure.

Following Oh-OK, Sweet formed the Buzz of Delight, a sugary pop duo, with original Oh-OK drummer David Pierce. The six finely wrought tunes on Sound Castles capture the essence of airy Southern power-pop and are ultimately delightful.

Hopper, meanwhile, formed Holiday with Lynn Blakey (also a singer/guitarist/songwriter) and a rhythm section. Recorded in 1985, the 12-inch Hello makes good use of the women's vocal interplay on five light and sprightly songs that have an appealingly casual sense of accomplishment. (More recently, Hopper has been fronting a new quartet that changed its name from Homemade Sister to Swell.)

Although her name is Lynda L. Limner, the Hetch Hetchy singer with a sometimes harsh loud-soft-loud style is the selfsame Stipe sister. (Michael produced the trio's six-song debut.) From the lightly laughing clarinet that opens "Retarded Camel" through chunks of darkly deep guitar and lots of smooth new music electronic keyboards, the melodic group—named after a valley in Yosemite National Park—creates the kind of lightly arty pop-rock that college radio eats for breakfast, lunch and dessert.

With production by Hugo Largo's Tim Sommer, Hetch Hetchy—now a duo of Limner (vocals, bass, guitar and keyboards) and Jay Totty (bass and guitar), assisted by local singers and players—moves into tastefully restrained atmospheric vagueness on Swollen. Some of the songs use drums and a few ("Satanette," "Retsina," "Mother's Drum") actually have decisive melodies but, for the most part, this is sub-Largo background music in need of a spine. [jl'e/i]

See also Matthew Sweet.

INGO BOINGO

Oingo Boingo EP (IRS) 1980

Only a Lad (A&M) 1981 •

Nothing to Fear (A&M) 1982 •

Good for Your Soul (A&M) 1983 •

Dead Man's Party (MCA) 1985 ●
Boi-ngo (MCA) 1987 ●
Boingo Alive: Celebration of a Decade 1979-1988
(MCA) 1988 ●
Skeletons in the Closet: The Best of Oingo-Boingo (A&M)
1989 ●
Dark at the End of the Tunnel (MCA) 1990 ●

DANNY ELFMAN

So-lo (MCA) 1984 ●
Music for a Darkened Theatre (MCA) 1990 ●

This eight-piece LA outfit (with a three-man horn section) started out trying to be a West Coast answer to XTC and Devo, but suffered from studied wackiness/quirkiness and managed to hide solid cleverness behind overproduction and hamminess. While frontman Danny Elfman has emerged as the king of the soundtracks, Oingo Boingo has pretty much continued to ply their rather pointless trade with little modification.

The EP, all 10 inches of it, is the band's most succinct engagement. The four cuts belie the size of the lineup—a trio might have made these long slices of mild perversity. The album that followed, however, plays up OB's flaws, letting contrived bits diminish the impact of demi-clever lyrics and thoroughly competent music. The only track that stands out is "On the Outside," and it succeeds because it sounds normal. Despite obvious talent, Only a Lad is a waste.

Taking a turn towards synth-funk (as either a commercial ploy or an amused art statement), Nothing to Fear is more likable, yet still sounds phony. A couple of the tunes, especially the title cut, are forceful enough to be exciting. When not pushing pressurized dance rock, Oingo Boingo revert to their previously established lighter style, and the horns play it subtle rather than brassy. Better, but still a derivative disappointment.

Electronic music veteran Robert Margouleff produced Good for Your Soul and trimmed some of the usual excess, giving Oingo Boingo a streamlined and powerfully driven attack. The timely "Wake Up (It's 1984)" and "Who Do You Want to Be" are among the most invigorating and engaging things the band has ever done. There's still significant quantities of chaff, but on this outing the wise-guy dance-rock largely works.

Singer, chief songwriter and Oingo Boingo leader Danny Elfman made So-lo with five members of the band, but it offers a slightly different, more synthesized outlook. "Gratitude" is a brilliant construct combining Elfman's best melody and absurd vocals in one wacky tour de force; other tracks (a ballad, a raveup, etc.) are more like Oingo Boingo's work. Displaying Wall of Voodoo B-movie aspirations, Elfman unfortunately lacks the focus or vision to counteract his grandiose, theatrical instincts.

Dispersing rumors of nonexistence, Oingo Boingo returned with their least obnoxious record yet. Dead Man's Party benefits from one captivating soundtrack single ("Weird Science") and a couple of other strong songs (including "Stay," a soulful "Help Me" and the Akron-oriented title track).

Did Spike Jones mix Boi-ngo or what? Instruments fly out of the speakers at crazy angles as if this were a stereo effects demonstration record. The absurdly busy arrangements make the songs take a back seat to the studio showboating as each guitar chord, horn toot and drum beat calls attention to itself. Elfman is really in control here, and his mastery of this hyperkinetic niche (at times it sounds like two coordinated recordings being played simultaneously) is an awesome individual accomplishment. The LP jitterbug, bounces and slides from start to finish, leaving listeners either happily exhausted or utterly exasperated.

With Elfman's career as a composer of film and television scores in superstar overdrive (the Music for a Darkened Theatre compilation—orchestral excerpts from Batman, Dick Tracy, Scrooged, The Simpsons and many more—provides a summary of his soundtrack albums that no one need actually hear), he still finds time to fit the band into his schedule. And Boingo—with just two personnel changes in eleven years—just keeps on keeping on, issuing a double-live set (recorded, without the distraction of an audience, in a Hollywood rehearsal studio), a straightforward studio retrospective of the band's A&M era and Dark at the End of the Tunnel, an all-new LP of Elfman originals which won't surprise anyone at all familiar with the group's past work. [1]

OLD SKULL

Get Outta School (Restless) 1989 ●

Billed as the youngest punk band in the world, these noisy Wisconsin tykes (two Toulon brothers and a non-fraternal drummer whose dad is in the Tar Babies) make a godawful calamity on Get Outta School, screaming and ripping through fifteen semi-coherent noise-fests that are amusingly bad but still hard to believe as the work of nine-year-olds. With daddy Toulon (who has some connection to Missing Foundation) co-producing, these precocious skate-rockers switch from dead serious ("Homeless," "AIDS") to silly ("Hot Dog Hell") in a flash, sounding like nothing so much as a pre-teen birthday party spiked with Jolt cola and amplifiers. [1]

100 FLOWERS

100 Flowers (Happy Squid) 1983
Drawing Fire EP (Happy Squid) 1984
100 Years of Pulchritude [CD] (Happy Squid-Rhino)
1990 ●

You wouldn't know it to listen to their records, but West Los Angeles' 100 Flowers started as a joke, a black-humored parody of the punk scene. As the Urinals, they recorded a pair of 1979 7-inch EPs and a single for Happy Squid, then got serious, changed their name and got real serious. In their second incarnation, the trio played arty, poetic music that is kinetic in spite of occasional murkiness.

100 Flowers owes a mild debt to the Fall, although its more melodic guitar sound is all-American. Dispensing with such concepts as verses and choruses, the trio favors subterranean funk grooves and drones; the effect is impressive if limited, and wears thin over the record's course. The five-song Drawing Fire EP benefits from stronger material. With songs that build but never pop out with climaxes and releases, this is how R.E.M. might have sounded as a punk band.

Neatly recapitulating 100 Flowers' entire existence, the 28-track 100 Years of Pulchritude combines the album, EP, both sides of a 1982 single and three compilation contributions. Two previously unreleased cuts offer a bonus to real fans. [j/l/i]

See also Trotsky Icepick.

101ERS

Elgin Avenue Breakdown (nr/Andalucia) 1981

Before there was a Clash, Joe Strummer was in a gritty, R&B-styled London pub band. The 101ers broke up after a short career, issuing only one incredible 45, "Keys to Your Heart" (an alternative version of which is included here), while in business. Released five years after the fact, Elgin Avenue Breakdown combines three 1975-'76 demo sessions and a live performance captured on cassette. It's an essential artifact for Clashologists, spreading hints of things to come all over the place. As an energetic slice of simple, raucous rock'n'roll, it's worth every penny as well. [i]

See also Clash.

ONLY ONES

The Only Ones (nr/CBS) 1978

Even Serpents Shine (nr/CBS) 1979

Special View (Epic) 1979 •

Baby's Got a Gun (Epic) 1980

Remains (Fr. Closer) 1984 •

Alone in the Night (nr/Dojo) 1986

Live (Skyclad) 1989 •

The Peel Sessions Album (nr/Strange Fruit) 1989 •

ENGLAND'S GLORY

Legendary Lost Recordings (Skyclad) 1989 •

Led by singer/songwriter Peter Perrett, England's Only Ones combined the energy of the punk movement and a more traditional sense of rock craft, with Perrett singing his goodnatured tortured-romantic lyrics in a distinctive (and not unpleasant) whine. The quartet's mix of youthful spunk and seasoned experience (drummer Mike Kellie was a member of Spooky Tooth and bassist Alan Mair's resumé stretched back to the early '60s) helped gain the Only Ones quick prominence, but only one song—the much-covered "Another Girl, Another Planet"—earned the highly touted group any lasting acclaim.

The Only Ones (which includes that stupendous number) is the best of the three original albums. Perrett's languid vocals and songs provide the character and focus, while the band's skills carry it off handsomely. Even Serpents Shine varies little from its predecessor and contains some captivating material, but lacks anything as great as "Another Girl, Another Planet." Special View picks tracks off both albums and adds the two sides of the band's self-released 1977 debut single for an introductory lesson in the Only Ones' early oeuvre.

Although finally realizing simultaneous release in the US and the UK with the Colin Thurston-produced Baby's Got a Gun, the Only Ones' commercial success was still too slight to sustain them, and they called it quits in 1981. The group's cult status has grown steadily ever since, as evidenced (or at least encouraged) by a stream of posthumous releases. Remains and Alone in the Night are decent collections of non-album material.

The songs on Live predate the CBS albums, and show the band to have been firmly in musical control even at that early juncture. The Peel Sessions Album compiles sixteen BBC recordings from 1977 to '80, and is actually a stronger representation of the Only Ones' gifts than any of the band's studio albums.

The England's Glory disc offers ten 1973 demos by Perrett's pre-Only Ones combo (including future Squeeze bassist Harry Kakoulli) and demonstrates nascent talent as well as an overriding Lou Reed fixation. Two of the songs, "City of Fun" and "Peter and the Pets," later showed up on the Only Ones' first LP.

[i/hd]

OPAL

Northern Line EP (nr/One Big Guitar) 1985

Happy Nightmare Baby (SST) 1987 •

Early Recordings (Rough Trade) 1989 φ

MAZZY STAR

She Hangs Brightly (Rough Trade) 1990 •

KENDRA SMITH/DAVID

ROBACK/KEITH MITCHELL

Fell from the Sun EP (Serpent-Enigma) 1984

After he left the Rain Parade, guitarist David Roback and ex-Dream Syndicate bassist Kendra Smith formed a quartet known as Clay Allison (obscurely named after a character in a TV movie) with drummer Keith Mitchell and guitarist Juan Gomez. The group issued a single, but dropped a member and shed the moniker before adding two new songs to flesh out Fell from the Sun. On it, Smith's vocals perfectly meld with the subtle mood music—a pleasant drone with translucent elegance that resembles the Velvet Underground at their most restrained. Lovely and touching.

Renaming themselves Opal, the group issued a three-song 12-inch that continues in the same vein. "Northern Line" and "Empty Bottles" are gorgeous acoustic folk-blues, while the B-side, "Soul Giver" (which also turns up on Happy Nightmare Baby), is eight-and-a-half minutes of spacey organ and feedback guitar.

Opal clung to neo-psychedelia, even after many of its original Los Angeles scene compatriots had moved on to other fads. Happy Nightmare Baby has its share of nostalgic organ-colored drone contemplations, but adds an unexpected and amusing item to the repertoire: a stripped-down T. Rex imitation ("Rocket Machine") that drifts towards Television. Criticisms: Smith's laconic singing can become arduous, some of the instrumental work is self-indulgent nonsense and the pace is too slow. Qualities: the songs are there, the ambience is affecting and the performances offer enough texture and dynamics to make Opal's debut album ultimately satisfying.

Smith exited the group in the middle of the Happy Nightmare tour, and the posthumous Early Recordings gathers outtakes, all four Fell from the Sun tracks, plus "Northern Line" and "Empty Bottles." Draining away much of Happy Nightmare's pseudo-mystical fiddle-faddle, Early Recordings concentrates on Opal's acoustic side; the spare production adds a chilling closeness to Smith's vocals, and Roback's guitar noodlings feel loose and uncontrived. The previously unissued tracks, especially "Empty Box Blues" and "My Only Friend," have a casual, unrestrained grace. The CD appends "Hear the Wind Blow."

A few years later, Roback joined up with LA singer Hope Sandoval, formerly of an acoustic duo (Going Home) whose unreleased album Roback had produced. Like Smith, Sandoval has a smooth, passionless voice, but she also has a disarming childlike quality that's almost ghostly. Other than that, differences between Opal and Mazzy Star are minor. Roback shifts between acoustic folk and electric psych-outs while Sandoval rambles, waiflike, about love, highways and sailboats. [i/kss]

See also Dream Syndicate, Rain Parade.

OPHELIAS

The Ophelias (Strange Weekend) 1987

Oriental Head (Rough Trade) 1988

The Big O (Rough Trade) 1989

This San Francisco quartet sings/chants theatrical lyrics over colorfully dramatic rock—like Oingo Boingo but more inclined to genuine offbeatness and exciting music—on The Ophelias, an accomplished if not entirely appealing debut. "Mr. Rabbit," an old children's folk song given a charming update, is the album's high point; elsewhere, Leslie Medford (vocals, guitar, trumpet, harmonica, recorder) tries too hard to sell his songs, obscuring whatever lies beneath all the multi-tracked play-acting. And using dialogue from Hamlet is just a little pretentious, n'est-ce pas?

Besides unveiling a half-new lineup that includes guitarist David Immerglück (also of the Monks of Doom), Oriental Head displays a mildly psychedelized rethink and a Zappaesque goof-jazz influence. Medford's still on his Shakespearian kick (the LP leads off with "Midsummernight's Scene," a number credited to Marc Bolan), but tones down the delivery to improve songs rather than suffocate them. Unpredictable, uneven and occasionally fascinating, Oriental Head is filled with ideas, some of which actually make weird sense.

Issued in a circular sleeve, The Big O—easily the Ophelias' best effort yet—irons the group's music into an effectively derivative set of '60s folk-rock/acid-garage/rock idioms. Using other songwriters besides Medford helps, as some of the record's most entertaining tunes ("Leah Hirsig," for instance) aren't his. Typical of the escapade's goodnatured foolishness are "Lawrence of Euphoria" (sung like a Bonzo Dog Band outtake), a cover of the Nervous Breakdown's crude proto-punk "I Dig Your Mind" and an inexplicable T. Rex parody, "When Winter Comes." [i]

See also Camper Van Beethoven.

O-POSITIVE

Only Breathing EP (Throbbing Lobster) 1985

Cloud Factory EP (Link) 1987 •

toyboatToyBoatTOYBOAT (Epic) 1990 •

Although some may view Boston's O Positive as nothing more than generic college-radio pop, the Boston group's talent and potential exceed that of many similar bands. Unfortunately, the quintet has yet to make the most of its abilities on record.

Only Breathing is a promising debut. Drummer Alex Lob and bassist David Ingham unite to form a monstrously strong rhythmic backbone, upon which guitarist/singer Dave Herlihy drapes his clumsy but earnest lyrics about self-preservation in the face of obsession and unrequited love. Although this is thematic terrain which has been crossed a million times, Herlihy displays an Andy Partridge-like penchant for clever wordplay, some of which works nicely.

Released two years later, Cloud Factory is a horrible sophomore effort. Murky sound negates the rhythm section; Herlihy's lyrics and delivery are also gutterballs, an apparent attempt to emulate Michael "This doesn't make much sense but it sure does sound intellectual" Stipe stylings. Add in a shameful over-dependence on guitar effects, and this is one bad record. (Perhaps for comparison purposes, the CD and cassette include Only Breathing.)

toyboatToyBoatTOYBOAT, the band's major label debut (and its first full-length album), combines the first record's best attributes with some of the second's shortcomings. The results—which often waver between R.E.M. imitations and U2 guitar quotes (with one laughably bad Wilson Pickett rewrite)—are generally pleasantly listenable, if nothing more. The rhythm section is as complex and appealing as before, and Herlihy's guitar work and lyrics show improvement, but this innocuous LP is, at best, distinctly short on character.

[icm]

ORANGE JUICE

You Can't Hide Your Love Forever (nr/Polydor) 1982

Rip It Up (nr/Polydor) 1982 •

Texas Fever EP (nr/Polydor) 1984

The Orange Juice (nr/Polydor) 1984

In a Nutshell (nr/Polydor) 1985

ZEKE MANYIKA

Call and Response (nr/Polydor) 1985

Mastercrime (nr/Some Bizzare-Parlophone) 1989 •

EDWYN COLLINS

Hope and Despair (nr/Demon) 1989 •

Hellbent on Compromise (nr/Demon) 1990 •

Glasgow's insufferably coy Orange Juice, de facto leaders of the Scottish neo-pop revolution, typified a UK trend towards clean, innocent looks that unfortunately spilled over into the music. Emphasizing their "unspoiled" raggedness, the band began with clumsy tunes about insecurity and romantic rejection; singer Edwyn Collins mumbles and croons like a slowed-down Ray Davies. You Can't Hide Your Love Forever is supposed to be charming, but isn't.

Surprisingly, Rip It Up (not named after the Little Richard tune) explores the first album's ingenuousness in greater depth with thought-provoking results. Though young love remains the theme, tension has replaced cuteness; on the title track, "Louise Louise" and others, Collins responds angrily to being treated like a chump. He's still a bit of a narcissistic vocalist, but Rip It Up's more realistic approach is appealing and rewarding.

Escalating musical differences and other internal conflicts caused the band to split prior to the release of Texas Fever, leaving Collins and drummer Zeke Manyika to carry on as a duo. Salvaged from the original band's final sessions, the Texas Fever EP (produced by Dennis Bovell) further refines the standards set on Rip It Up. There's an implicit Western theme, but most of the songs have a quirky, exotic Afro-funk feel, fleshed out with stellar guitar work by Collins and Malcolm Ross (later of Aztec Camera). Their talents make "Punch Drunk," "A Place in My Heart" and "A Sad Lament" memorable.

Collins and Manyika again teamed up with Bovell for The Orange Juice, which contains some of Collins' strongest songs: the sadly biographical "Lean Period," the melodically haunting "What Presence?!" and "Artisans," a garage-styled raveup.

Embittered by commercial failure, Orange Juice called it quits. In a Nutshell is a posthumous compilation that contains the band's very best, from the early days on Postcard ("Falling and Laughing," "Poor Old Soul") through the last days on Polydor (tracks from the third LP).

Collins and Manyika continue to be musically active. Turning again to Bovell as producer and bassist, Collins made a spectacular solo debut with Hope and Despair, a debonair but rocking album of strongly worded downcast contemplations delivered in a commanding deep voice over varied music that rings and resonates with exceptional songwriting craft. Aztec Camera's Roddy Frame is one of the luminary sidemen; the CD and cassette add the title track as a bonus.

[jy/ag]

ORB

See Justified Ancients of Mu Mu.

WILLIAM ORBIT

Orbit (IRS) 1987 ●
 Strange Cargo (IRS No Speak) 1988 ●
 Strange Cargo 2 (IRS No Speak) 1991 ♠

TORCH SONG

Wish Thing (IRS) 1984
 Exhibit A (IRS) 1987

BASSOMATIC

Set the Controls for the Heart of the Bass (nr/Virgin) 1990 (Virgin) 1991 ●

Torch Song debuted as a trio on Wish Thing, an ethereal set of instrumentally subtle synth-dance tracks, given most of their character by Laurie Mayer's delicate voice and the gimmicky production. "Don't Look Now" and "Sweet Thing" are appealing, airy concoctions; a demento version of "Ode to Billy Joe" seems calculated to shock and/or offend but is nonetheless amusing. Intriguing.

Three years later, reduced to a duo, Torch Song ("featuring William Orbit") issued a second record consisting of four cuts (including "Don't Look Now" and "Sweet Thing") remixed from Wish Thing, plus five new ones that also benefit from Mayer's wan singing. Inconclusive but equally appealing, Exhibit A has another weird cover version: an atmospheric deconstruction of Blind Faith's "Can't Find My Way Home."

Multi-instrumentalist Orbit (real name: Wainwright) then dropped the Torch Song name, found a new singing partner in Peta Nikolich and recorded Orbit. (Mayer is still his co-writer, but she performs on only one song.)

A disappointingly conservative—except for the mock-Spanish horns—cover of the Psychedelic Furs' "Love My Way" leads off the album, and things never get much more adventurous than that. Despite an assortment of genres, most of the music is short on individual character; Nikolich is a capable singer without enough personality to carry the weight. "Feel Like Jumping," a mildly revisionist reggae cover (Jackie Mittoo), is the weak album's lively highlight.

Building on his soundtrack work, Orbit released Strange Cargo, a one-man-band collection of unrelated instrumental pieces recorded between 1984 and 1987. Mostly urgent and kinetic, with colorful sound effects, the unresolved semi-songs are mood-heavy and suggest a number of visual idioms, including action-adventure, comedy, espionage and mystery.

In recent years, Orbit has become an extremely successful remixer, with credits that include Madonna, Prince and the Cure. In early 1991, however, he released a second instrumental album, Strange Cargo 2.

Bassomatic is Orbit's dance band with singer Sharon Musgrave, a DJ and a percussionist. [i]

ORCHESTRA ARCANA

See Bill Nelson.

ORCHESTRAL MANOEUVRES IN THE DARK

Orchestral Manoeuvres in the Dark (nr/DinDisc) 1980

(Virgin) 1987 ●

Organisation (nr/DinDisc) 1980 (Virgin) 1987 ●

O.M.D. (Virgin-Epic) 1981

Architecture & Morality (Virgin-Epic) 1981 ●

Dazzle Ships (Virgin-Epic) 1983 ●

Junk Culture (Virgin-A&M) 1984 ●

Crush (Virgin-A&M) 1985 ●

The Pacific Age (Virgin-A&M) 1986 ●

Shame EP (nr/Virgin) 1987 ●

The Best of OMD (Virgin-A&M) 1988 ●

Sugar Tax (Virgin) 1991 ●

Moving from electronic tape experiments to highly polished synthesizer pop and beyond, Liverpoolians Andy McCluskey (bass/vocals/keyboards) and synthesist Paul Humphreys (with other fulltime members, including—very significantly—a corporeal acoustic drummer) are among the most successful practitioners of electro-pop, as first demonstrated by a delightful string of singles. Abandoning their formula after two albums, however, OMD proved capable of far more ambitious creations not tied to the apron strings of technology.

Orchestral Manoeuvres in the Dark exhibits stylish electro-pop comparable to Ultravox. Aided by Dalek I's Andy Gill, McCluskey and Humphreys build the songs up from computer-generated rhythms and, while the album does not create any new forms, it polishes the synthesizer song into a full-bodied medium. Thanks to a knack for melodies and hooks, notable attractions are the catchy "Electricity" and "Messages."

Organisation (which originally included an excellent bonus single of early tape experiments and live tracks) introduces drummer Malcolm Holmes and ethereal synthesizer techniques that suit the depressive subject matter of "Enola Gay" and the like. It also pays attention to ensure variation in the tunes, a problem that mars the first LP. With nods to John Foxx and David Bowie, OMD overlays melodies to dramatic effect; the performances are excellent.

O.M.D. is an American compilation of songs from the two British albums, including both catchy OMD standards, "Enola Gay" and "Electricity." Recommended.

Architecture & Morality struggles with new techniques, and includes two magnificent, ethereal hit singles: "Souvenir" and "Joan of Arc." OMD is again experimenting with sound and much of the album sounds more naturalistic than electronic. An intriguing and highly inventive use of the technology.

The conceptual Dazzle Ships overreaches by a mile, succumbing to excessive found-tape gimmickry in lieu of adequate songwriting. It does contain the striking "Genetic Engineering" (which integrates a Speak and Spell toy to make a point) and "Radio Waves," as well as some amazing sounds and a powerful atmosphere to recommend it. Impressive but not satisfying.

Junk Culture is much stronger, pulling away further from sparkling pop while retaining smart melodies in far denser and newly dance-based styles. "Tesla Girls" employs scratch production to great effect while fixing on science as a clever lyrical base (shades of Sparks); the rhythm-heavy "Locomotion" and the more fanciful "Talking Loud and Clear" are likewise ace tracks.

Despite its easygoing ambience and a shortage of really memorable songs, Crush—OMD's least stylized, most mainstream album—isn't half-bad. "So in Love" and "Secret" are the obvious romantic singles, but the record has more serious moments as well: the topical "88 Seconds in Greensboro," "Women III" (an ambiguous consideration of feminism) and "Bloc Bloc Bloc," wherein McCluskey sings some truly stupid lyrics with only a trace of embarrassment.

OMD's international commercial breakthrough began with Crush but exploded when "If You Leave," a dull ballad from the Pretty in Pink soundtrack, became a Top 10 American single. That song was thankfully omitted from OMD's subsequent album, The Pacific Age, but so was anything that might have prevented the record from being dull, ponderous and self-important. (Typical of the band's well-meaning missteps is "Southern," an instrumental bed over which excerpts of Martin Luther King speeches are played.) OMD's expansion from a duo to a sextet—the three recent additions play horns, guitars and more keyboards—has cost the group focus and clarity, its singleminded creative vision. Except for the smoothly contrived hit "(Forever) Live and Die" and the catchy "We Love You," this dilettantish mess is less a set of songs than a meaningless collection of sounds. Re-recorded and released on an EP, "Shame" was combined with a couple of other Pacific Age tracks and the 10-inch edit of "Messages."

The Best of OMD is the ideal remedy for The Pacific Age. After a concise recapitulation of the band's artistic development—via fourteen A-sides, from clever synth-based pop ("Electricity," "Enola Gay," "Souvenir") to well-realized audio experiments ("Tesla Girls," "Locomotion") to increasingly bland chart fodder ("So in Love," "If You Leave")—it ends with a promisingly pert new single, "Dreaming." (The CD adds two bonus 12-inch versions of "We Love You" and "La Femme Accident.")

Returning from a lengthy absence, OMD—no longer including Humphreys—issued Sugar Tax, its first new album in five years, in June 1991. [sg/i]

ORDINAIRES

The Ordinaires (Ger. Dossier) 1985 (Bar/None-Restless) 1990 •

One (Bar/None) 1989 •

Like many of the all-instrumental big-band ensembles on New York's semi-underground scene (er . . .), the Ordinaires' debut album was originally released only in Germany. On it, nine men and women—covering guitars, horns, woodwinds, strings and percussion—make a totally unique and marvelous sound, combining styles and eras with equanimity. Polytonality rules here with a twisted but firm hand, guiding the convoluted pieces through strident (never discordant) passages filled with sharp turns, sudden volume shifts and abrupt tempo changes. Advanced without being obnoxiously arty, this is an album to curl your hair and spark your imagination. (The 1990 reissue, despite incorrect sleeve and label copy that omits any mention of "The Last Song," does contain the entire original record, as well as a bonus version of the Stones' "She's Like a Rainbow" from the same sessions.)

The equally delightful One is alternately swinging and funky, at its best suggestive of Henry Cow with a highly developed sense of humor (one number is titled "The Dance of the Coco Crispies"). The group's rhythmic command remains incredible, and its eclecticism comes off as honest and modest, not ostentatious. The album ends with a wry but powerful rendition of Led Zeppelin's "Kashmir," which earned the group some attention outside of its usual circles. The Ordinaires disbanded in April '91. [i/gk]

ORIGINAL MIRRORS

Original Mirrors (Arista) 1980

Heart-Twango & Raw-Beat (nr/Mercury) 1981

After Deaf School bit the dust, that band's Steve Allen, a strong crooner in the Bryan Ferry mold, started his own Liverpool band with ex-Big in Japan guitarist Ian Broudie (who would go on to be a successful producer and leader of the Lightning Seeds) and three others. It didn't work out well at all. The Original Mirrors seemed entranced by the kind of pop-opera bombast that characterized Deaf School at its worst; self-discipline was never a high priority. For every rockin' moment that crystallizes passion into something comprehensible, there are ten others of sprawling excess. [jy]

See also Deaf School, Lightning Seeds.

ORIGINAL SINS

Big Soul (Bar/None) 1987

The Hardest Way (Psonik) 1989 •

Party's Over (Aus. Dog Meat) 1990

Self Destruct (Psonik-Skyclad) 1990 •

Big Soul is an instant classic, contemporary garage grunge stripped of nostalgia and ready for consumption. Led by diminutive howler J.T. (John Terlesky), the Bethlehem, Pennsylvania quartet avoids the easy cover route to re-create the down and dirty excitement of the Standells and the Seeds on "Not Gonna Be All Right" and "Can't Feel a Thing," with Dan McKinney's cheesy organ adding the appropriate icing. Less aggressive tunes—like "Why Don't You Smile, Joan?"—maintain the no-nonsense spirit, peeling away tough posturing to get at searing emotions that are never far from the surface.

Kicking off with the selfconscious "Heard It All Before," The Hardest Way ("All distortion purely intentional") demonstrates the Sins' marvelous ability to synthesize an original sound—less stylized than the Lyres—from now-standard ingredients. Rather than quote punk scripture in an attempt to turn back the calendar, the album seems like the logical result of an anachronistic environment. J.T.'s storming guitar roar and McKinney's chunky organ-izing provide a tersely exciting bed for lyrics that—other than a few happy love songs—resound with alienation ("Don't Fit In," "Out of My Mind"), dejection ("Rather Be Sad," "Can't Get Over You") and negativity ("I Can't Say," "End of the World").

Four of the eight songs on the Australian Party's Over are first-rate bonus tracks from The Hardest Way CD and cassette (which also contain an alternate version of the album's title track); three more are developmentally significant outtakes from the same sessions. Most pointedly, "That's All There Is" whips up a psychedelic guitar frenzy as J.T. shrieks blunt sex'n'drugs lyrics. A remix of the band's 1986 Bar/None single, "Just 14," winds up this particular party.

After the modest and concise garage freakouts of the first two albums, Self Destruct (dedicated to, among others, "everyone who knows anger can be fun") delivers a surprising level of domineering intensity, beginning with the cover photo of J.T. with a grin on his face and a pistol held to his head. The new-sound Sins are a snarling psychedelic powerhouse, a thickly seething cauldron of hyperactive feedback and wah-wah, rabid vocals, galloping rhythms and lyrics about drugs and sex. Some of the longer songs (the teetering-on-the-brink "Black Hole" runs past eight minutes) spend too much time on instrumental workouts, but Self Destruct captures acid-rock's disorienting chaos with a visceral impact few other bands can touch. The two CD/cassette bonuses are from a 1990 single. [jy/i]

BEN ORR

See Cars.

OTTO'S CHEMICAL LOUNGE

See Blue Hippos.

JOHN OTWAY & WILD WILLY BARRETT

John Otway & Wild Willy Barrett (nr/Extracted) 1977
(nr/Polydor) 1977

Deep & Meaningless (nr/Polydor) 1978

Way & Bar (nr/Polydor) 1980

I Did It Otway EP (Stiff America) 1981

I Did It Otway (Can. Stiff Canada) 1981

Gone with the Bin: The Best of Otway & Barrett

(nr/Polydor) 1981

12 Stitch EP (nr/Empire) 1982

JOHN OTWAY

Where Did I Go Right? (nr/Polydor) 1979

Deep Thought (Stiff) 1980

All Balls & No Willy (nr/Empire) 1982

John Otway's Greatest Hits (nr/Strike Back) 1986

Cor Baby, That's Really Me! [CD] (nr/Strike Back) 1990 •

WILD WILLY BARRETT

Krazy Kong Album (nr/Black Eyes) 1981

Organic Bondage (nr/Galvanised) 1986

This charming nutter from Aylesbury (40 miles northwest of London), best heard in the company of his multi-instrumental sidekick/musical interpreter Barrett, is tough to evaluate on vinyl. Unpredictable, ingenious, inconsistent, unselfconscious, totally unafraid of making a fool of himself, Otway is capable of extraordinary quality swings. Since so much of what he's about just doesn't translate to disc, seeing him is nearly essential, and enhances listening to even the relatively duff tracks.

Otway renders covers—from "Green Green Grass of Home" to Alfred Noyes' "The Highwayman" to "You Ain't Seen Nothing Yet"—with daffily inspired abandon. He writes hysterically infectious ditties ("Really Free," "Louisa on a Horse," "Baby's in the Club") and likably sentimental tunes ("Montreal," "Genevieve"), though these can be a little drippy. There's little pattern for rule-of-thumb judgment, save that Barrett-less he comes off bland (Where Did I Go Right?, which boasts "The Highwayman" and the poignant "Frightened and Scared," as well as the guitar playing of Ollie Halsall and keyboardist Morgan Fisher) or energetic but less effective (All Balls & No Willy, which has such tender romantic odes as "Montreal" and "Middle of the Winter").

The most consistent records are the first album (in part produced by Pete Townshend) and Way & Bar (or Deep Thought, which is half the latter plus assorted cuts). The Gone with the Bin compilation is a neat if incomplete summation of Otway's haphazard repertoire, drawn (with the exception of "I Did It Otway," a Barrett guitar instrumental in which someone—hmm, wonder who?—methodically destroys the instrument on mic) from the duo's first three albums and Otway's Where Did I Go Right?

The six-song I Did It Otway EP mixes the A-sides from Otway's first three Stiff singles ("Green Green Grass of Home," "Turning Point" and the hysterical "Headbutts") with three LP tracks: "Running from the Law" (from Deep and Meaningless), "The Highwayman" and "I Did It Otway." The expanded Canadian equivalent (in a red, rather than green, cover) of I Did It Otway adds two tracks from the first album, one from the second and "Makes Good Music" from Where Did I Go Right?

The penultimate collection of Otway new and old is available on the recent Greatest Hits album. (The title is a cheap Japanese dialect joke.) The record trundles out familiar favorites ("Really Free," "Headbutts," "Beware of the Flowers Cause I'm Sure They're Gonna Get You, Yeah" and "Green Green Grass of Home") as well as other fine LP tracks ("Middle of Winter," "Montreal") and an uproarious version of Bachman-

Turner Overdrive's "You Ain't Seen Nothing Yet" from a 1982 B-side.

After years of successfully avoiding Otway (and releasing solo records now and again), Barrett was cajoled into an abortive 1987 reunion that lasted long enough to record part of an album that was to be called The Wimp and the Wild. (What actually surfaced was a single, "The Last of the Mohicans.") In 1990, Otway penned an amazingly detailed and humble third-person autobiography (Cor Baby, That's Really Me!) and assembled a spectacular 21-track career retrospective (solo and duo) under the same title. Billed as "The CD of the Book," Cor Baby has classics ("Louisa on a Horse," "Headbutts," "Green Green Grass of Home," "Really Free," etc.), rarities (the staggering orchestral version of "Geneve," a live version of "Racing Cars" from a '77 promo LP), an unreleased 1972 version of "Misty Mountain" produced by Townshend and—bringing the story up to date—"The Last of the Mohicans." [jg/l]

O-TYPE

See MX-80 Sound.

OUR DAUGHTERS WEDDING

Digital Cowboy EP (EMI America) 1981

Moving Windows (EMI America) 1982

This snappy San Francisco-relocated-to-New York electro-pop trio's 1980 indie single "Lawnchairs" became a dancefloor favorite, combining a good beat and a catchy hook with absurdist lyrics of bemused paranoia ("Lawnchairs are everywhere"). Unfortunately, the five-song Digital Cowboy, produced by Colin Thurston, makes the mistake of redoing "Lawnchairs" with a real drummer (and not just any real drummer, but Simon Phillips) and badly rephrased vocals.

Before retiring into the annals of one-hit-wonderdom, ODW made a full-length album, managing to fit two memorable tunes ("She Was Someone" and "Elevate Her") amid the rudimentary dance-pop. [mp/l]

OUTSETS

Outsets EP (Plexus) 1983

Led by guitarist Ivan Julian (ex-Richard Hell's Voidoids and later briefly in Shriekback), this trio's six-song EP is a clear and strong exercise—half funky-butt dance grooves, half slow rockers—with particularly interesting axework and a lot of spunk. The four songs produced by Garland Jeffreys aren't brilliant, but Julian's singing and playing provide them with a distinctive and attractive flavor. [i]

See also Bush Tetras, Richard Hell & the Voidoids.

OUTTA PLACE

We're Outta Place (Midnight) 1984

Outta Tool (Midnight) 1987

Of NYC's short-lived but plentiful litter of garage revivalists, this quintet was the last to form, the first to reach vinyl and probably the only ones young enough not to have been around for the real thing. On their debut, "New York's own cave teens" display plenty of raunch, ripping through seven songs in the most distorted mono imaginable, with cheesy two-finger organ bleats and Mike Chandler's epileptic-fit shrieks. They also display plenty of chutzpah; changing two words of the Chöb's garage classic "We're Pretty Quick" gets Chandler a writing credit and the band a titular theme song.

Begun in '84, Outta Too! was completed and issued three years after the volatile band's demise. Chandler, who had left to front the even more over-the-top Raunch Hands agreed to a sodden evening of vocal sessions and presto! it's 1984 (or was that 1966?) all over again. Outta Place bassist Jordan Tarlow is currently in the Fuzztones, and drummer Andrea Matthews plays with '70s monsters Freaks. [dss]

See also Fuzztones, Raunch Hands.

OYSTERS

Green Eggs and Ham (Taangl) 1985

Imagine for a moment what the Replacements would sound like nowadays if Bob Stinson were still in the band, and Paul Westerberg had increased his drinking tenfold. They might sound a bit like the Oysters, a Boston-based one-album cult wonder. Green Eggs and Ham is a delightful alcohol-soaked platter; a mesh of sloppy playing, incompetent production and slobbering vocals that makes the same sort of effort to blend pop-punk with other styles as Hootenanny. Entirely free of seriousness, each song hits the devil-may-care punk-rock bullseye. Toe-tappers like "Reeperbahn" and "Headhunter" are enough to gouge a special memory groove, but the confessional "On Special"—extolling the virtues of a local chainstore—is singularly entertaining. [icm]

P P P P P P P P

AUGUSTUS PABLO

- This Is Augustus Pablo (Jam. Tropical) 1973
 Ital Dub (nr/Trojan) 1975
 King Tubbys Meets Rockers Uptown (Jam. Clocktower) 1976 (Message) 1984 •
 Original Rockers (nr/Greensleeves) 1979 (Message) 1982 •
 Africa Must Be Free Dub (RAS) 1979
 Rockers Meets King Tubby in a Firehouse (Shanachie) 1981 •
 East of the River Nile (Message) 1981 •
 Earth's Rightful Ruler (Message) 1983 •
 Thriller (nr/Vista Sounds) 1983 (nr/Echo) 1985
 King David's Melody (Alligator) 1983
 Rising Sun (Message) 1986 •
 Rebel Rock Reggae (Heartbeat) 1986 •
 Rockers Come East (Message) 1987 •
 Eastman Dub (RAS) 1988 •
 Presents Rockers Story (RAS) 1989
 Blowing with the Wind (Shanachie) 1990 •
 Presents Rockers International Showcase (Rykodisc) 1991 ♠

A true reggae original, dubmaster Augustus Pablo is as closely identified with his instrument—the melodica—as most jazz musicians are with theirs. Pablo (Horace Swaby) was a Kingston pianist when he borrowed a melodica; the simple instrument's unusual sound caught the ears of local record producers, who hired him to give their dub treatments some exotic color. Soon he was composing, arranging and producing his own instrumental tracks; now the reedy, vaguely Middle Eastern sound of Pablo's melodica is immediately recognizable, a plaintive cry in the dub landscape.

Like his music, Augustus Pablo has always been in a class by himself. His music is a sensory stimulation interlude, evoking different moods as it carries the listener to other lands and other times. Pablo's deep spirituality and carefully guarded public image only add to his mystique.

Pablo's earliest available recordings are mainly session work. Both Ital Dub and King Tubbys Meets Rockers Uptown (widely considered a dub classic) are as much showcases for King Tubby's mixing as for Pablo's playing. His own debut, This Is Augustus Pablo (later reissued as Rebel Rock Reggae), is much better, distinguished by strong presence and lively playing. So is Original Rockers, a collection of singles he doctored. The selection is diverse, and Pablo's production (particularly the drum sound) is bright and snappy. For the uninitiated, either of these two offers a perfect starting point.

His recent work is, to some extent, of a piece, with little variety and few distinguishing characteristics. Africa Must Be Free Dub is an adequate companion to an LP made by singer Hugh Mundell, a young Pablo protégé who was murdered. Rockers Meets King Tubby in a Firehouse, while compelling, features less melodica than usual. East of the River Nile is quintessential Pablo, and perhaps his most consistent LP. Earth's Rightful Ruler includes a real rarity—a vocal—along with a new version of Pablo's first record, "Java." King David's Melody, a singles collection, has the evenness of sound and style of an album. It's a bit sleepy, but lovely all the same.

Pablo's '86 release, Rising Sun, marked a change in direction. Mixed by Scientist, the overall sound is less distinctive than Pablo's other work. Many of the tunes are uptempo and disappointing, even though some of the playing—particularly on "Pipers of Zion"—is superb.

But it proved to be a transitional album rather than a glimpse of things to come. On Rockers Come East, Pablo returns to the dreamy sound that is his trademark, using lots of synthesizer bits to supplement his melodica. The synthetics are subtle, however, so the dub remains warm and compelling. More richly textured than ever, the music on the LP ranks with Pablo's best, and shows the maestro to be at the top of his form.

Like Sugar Minott (with his Youth Promotion label), Pablo has always provided a forum for ghetto youth to explore and express their musical talents; his Rockers label has become a training ground for up-and-coming artists. Rockers Story, the fifth collection of Pablo's various protégés, is a mixed bag of Pablo's own material, singers such as Delroy Williams and Barry Reid, U-Roy-style DJs (e.g., Dillinger and Ras Bull) and such groups as Tetrack and the Rockers Allstars.

Eastman Dub is actually the dub version of the Tetrack album Let's Get Started, a classic example of Pablo's exotic and meditative melodies, not to mention his renowned melodica playing. The subtleties and colorations that a wind instrument can express are elevated to an almost ethereal quality in Pablo's music.

[bk/aw]

PAGANS

- The Pagans (Terminal) 1983
 Buried Alive (Treehouse) 1986
 Live—The Godlike Power of the Pagans (Treehouse) 1987
 Street Where Nobody Lives (Resonance) 1989 •

While Pere Ubu and other Ohio cousins were offering only cerebral dissonance, the 1977 punk explosion visited Cleveland in the form of the Pagans. Picking up where the departed (for NYC) Dead Boys left off, the Pagans were younger, louder and, if not as snotty, better in other ways. Led by raspy-voiced Mike Hudson, this slam-dunk garage quartet produced a small stack of classic singles: "Not Now No Way," "Street Where Nobody Lives" and "What's This Shit Called Love" (later covered by the Meatmen) are all down and dirty, glorious three-chord excursions into the filth and the fury.

The Pagans broke up in late '79 without ever issuing an album. The band's first longplayer was the result of a 1983 reunion gig (only Hudson and guitarist Tommy Gunn are holdovers from the old days), pressed as a limited-edition (500 copies) live LP. The sound quality of The Pagans isn't horrible and the rawness is true to the band's essential spirit, but the performances of the group's best tunes are sorely deficient.

Buried Alive compiles seven of the Pagans' eight original single sides, adding ten outtakes of the same late-'70s vintage, including the grubbiest version of Jagger/Richards' "Heart of Stone" imaginable. The Pagans' unrefined attitude saturates the entire first-rate collection.

Buried Alive sparked more reunions and a spate of touring. One such gig—a November 1986 date at Minneapolis' 7th St. Entry—resulted in a second concert LP. With six new songs (like "She's a Cadaver and I Gotta Have Her"), Live—The Godlike Power of the Pagans is far better than the '83 live disc (original bassist Tim Allee is back in the lineup), but still doesn't reach the godlike power of the band's studio work.

Street Where Nobody Lives mostly rehashes the same recordings as Buried Alive—odd, since the latter is still widely available. In November 1989, the Pagans opened for the reunited Buzzcocks in Cleveland. [jr]
See also Paul Marotta.

PAILHEAD

Trait EP (Wax Trax!) 1988 ●

Although not quite the cultural turning point of Run-DMC's collaboration with Aerosmith, Pailhead's two records (1988's "I Will Refuse" and Trait) do mark an historic genre conjunction. By the late '80s, hardcore and industrial were ripe for merger, and two preeminent icons—Ian MacKaye (frenetic vocalist of Minor Threat and Fugazi) and Ministry's Al Jourgensen/Paul Barker axis—were ready to make the move.

"I Will Refuse" (included, with its flipside, on the Trait CD) is positively explosive, repeatedly escalating from funk-industrial verses to a screamingly defiant hardcore-tempo chorus with thrashing guitars. The more seamless mixture of Trait's four songs integrate the passion and three-chord thrust of punk with advanced electronics, a sound subsequently employed by Ministry and Lard, the Jourgensen/Barker collaboration with another hardcore legend, Jello Biafra. [gef]

See also Fugazi, Lard, Ministry, Minor Threat, Revolting Cocks.

PAINKILLER

See Napalm Death.

PAINTED WILLIE

Mind Bowling (SST) 1985

Live from Van Nuys EP (SST) 1986

Upsidedowntown (SST) 1987

Relics (SST) 1988

More noisy guitar excitement from SST: this non-punky Los Angeles trio shows a certain wit and lyrical perception on Mind Bowling. Although the music sounds like a sanitized junior version of Motörhead, songs about Chia Pets, sex without love and an obscure monkey species share an uncommon view of the world that elevates the tiresome vamps a bit. The inclusion of the classic "Little Red Book" only points up the band's lack of songwriting aptitude.

The energetic live mini-album features that song plus "Cover Girl" from Mind Bowling; there's the next-LP preview of "Upside Down Town" plus three other "tunes." These guys (especially guitarist Vic Makauskas) can play well enough, but their material lacks melody, focus and structure—once again, Burt Bacharach steals their thunder without even showing up!

Upsidedowntown has spiffy cover art and more taut riff-rock songs, this time on such less intriguing topics as "My Seed," "Personality and Style" (thirteen minutes of it) and "Totem Pole." The playing keeps getting stronger, but the Willies should put out an APB for a songwriter.

Relics is a compilation of outtakes and leftovers, dating back to the band's prehistory. [i]

PALE SAINTS

Barging into the Presence of God EP (nr/4AD) 1989 ●

The Comforts of Madness (nr/4AD) 1990 ●

Half-Life EP (nr/4AD) 1990

Along with London's Lush, this Leeds trio is the closest thing to a "normal" British guitar pop group on 4AD. Pale Saints do have the label's familiar etherealism (some songs on The Comforts of Madness—like "A Deep Sleep for Steven"—even approximate the Cocteau Twins' trancescapes), and each track features long, languid instrumental passages. But the hooks keep coming, amid an alternation of slower pop numbers ("Sea of Sound," "Little Hammer" and "Sight of You," which first appeared as the A-side of the Barging into the Presence of God 12-inch) and rapid, powerful clankers, an odd mix of piston power and floating vocals. The faster selection ("Language of Flowers," "True Coming Dream" and the closing "Time Thief") offer strongly contrasting emotions and undeniably catchy tunes. Using triple-time tempo for the chorus, a cover of Opal's "Fell from the Sun" completely bowls over the original, taking off in directions Opal's foggy murk never intimated. A remarkable, ear-catching debut.

After Gil Norton and John Fryer's inspired work on the LP, Pale Saints chose Wedding Present producer Chris Allison to record the four-song Half-Life EP, with less impressive results. Although Allison leaves them sounding like a less scratchy Wedding Present, the record is not without merit: "Baby Maker" features little slugs of psychedelic guitar and more swooning vocals, while "A Revelation" applies the group's curious penchant for gear-switching. As a particularly unsettling bonus, the 12-inch EP contains an untitled and unlisted horror-scream track that only plays if you pick up the needle and reposition it. [jr]

PATTI PALLADIN

See Judy Nylon and Crucial, Johnny Thunders.

ROBERT PALMER

Sneakin' Sally Through the Alley (Island) 1974 ●
Pressure Drop (Island) 1976 ●
Some People Can Do What They Like (Island) 1976 ●
Double Fun (Island) 1978 ●
Secrets (Island) 1979 ●
Clues (Island) 1980 ●
Maybe It's Live (Island) 1982
Pride (Island) 1983 ●
Riptide (Island) 1985 ●
Heavy Nova (EMI Manhattan) 1988 ●
"Addictions" Volume 1 (Island) 1989 ●
Don't Explain (EMI) 1990 ♠

It's not surprising that this stylish rock dilettante—whose '70s dabblings included excursions into R&B, funk, reggae and Little Feat-backed rock'n'roll—should catch up with post-punk in the '80s. What is remarkable is that on Clues he manages to come up with two tracks as sublime as "Johnny and Mary" and "Looking for Clues," which are heady, intricate and danceable at the same time. Also commendable is the job he does on a couple of collaborations with Gary Numan, injecting more life into them than one would think possible. Still, Clues retains an irritating stylistic disparity (heavy metal track/Beatles cover), as if Palmer were afraid his going wholeheartedly into anything new might alienate his audience.

Two years on, Palmer's dilemma is even more apparent on Maybe It's Live, a sidestep tentative down to its title and half-live/half-studio format. Combining inferior concert versions of old material, blah new stuff and another collaboration with Numan, the LP continues Palmer's indecisive course.

While any big-name collaborators, Palmer again delivers a weirdly mixed bag on Pride, venturing into electro-disco with the herky-jerky, overbearing "You Are in My System," while affecting a charming calypso flavor in other spots. There's also a reprise of the unsettling undercurrents of "Johnny and Mary" on "Want You More." Palmer's voice is such that the less he tries, the better he sounds: when the going gets hot, his singing becomes overwhelming and irritating.

Palmer's next move was into the vile but hit-bound Power Station, a temporary all-star band with two Durannies, produced by Bernard Edwards. When the group opted to tour, however, Palmer bailed out, retaining Edwards and Tony Thompson from the brief collaboration to finish Riptide, a bombastic funk record with such tripe as "Addicted to Love," a song whose main value lies in its parody potential.

Can an album get any more eclectic than Heavy Nova? From the trashy (and awful) pop hit "Simply Irresistible" to the reggae-cajun fusion of "Change His Ways" (a bizarre song that, amazingly, works), the Peggy Lee ballad "It Could Happen to You," Brazilian, African, funk, metal . . . every record ever recorded all on one disc! It's nice to see that Palmer is so open-minded, but if an LP is meant to suit or promote a particular mood, this one's just too hectic.

Compared to Heavy Nova, the "Addictions" Volume I best-of plays like a concept album. (In his excellent sleeve notes Palmer mentions the care he took in programming it.) There are only three pre-1980 cuts here and none from before '78. As an overview of post-punk Palmer (through Heavy Nova), it's all there—the good and the bad.

More strange fusions abound on Don't Explain. Palmer rocks hard (with guitarists Steve Stevens and Eddie "Rock Box" Martinez) on one number; sings pop on the next; then soca, a cappella, etc. No doubt pleased by "It Could Happen to You" and the other softer moments on Heavy Nova, he devotes the last seven songs of this double-album-length disc to string-laden torch songs of the type Billy Holiday sang late in her life (though only the title track is actually hers), a couple of Brazilian-influenced pieces and a rollicking Mose Allison cover. When he covers Mose, he sounds like Mose; when he covers Otis Redding and Marvin Gaye elsewhere on this LP, he takes on their inflections. Whatever the setting, Palmer plops down and makes himself comfortable. People used to call David Bowie rock's great chameleon, but it's hard to imagine any commercial music fan, regardless of personal taste, not finding something to like (and hate) on any of Palmer's recent records. [ds/i]

See also Power Station.

PANDORAS

The Pandoras EP (Moxie) 1984
It's About Time (Vox) 1984 ●
Stop Pretending (Rhino) 1986
Rock Hard EP (Restless) 1988 ●
Live Nymphomania (Restless) 1989 ♠

The unashamedly '60s-obsessed Pandoras (led by singer/writer/guitarist Paula Pierce) are revivalists in the best sense of the word, recapturing the gleeful amateurism of vintage garage-punk-pop while adding their own cheerfully slutty persona to the mix. Following an energetically amateurish 7-inch EP, the LA band made its longplaying debut on It's About Time (produced by Greg Shaw), which makes a virtue of its shoestring primitivism. With some crackerjack tunes wash in Pierce's fuzztones and Gwynne Kelly's appropriately trashy organ, it's as good a '60s punk record as any contemporary combo is likely to make. (The Vox/East Side Digital CD adds five bonus tracks, including three songs from the EP.)

Pierce ditched the rest of the band soon after the debut LP (though the other three original members continued performing under the Pandoras name for a while) and recorded Stop Pretending with a new lineup. While maintaining the '60s fixation and playing up the brash-hussy stance, Stop Pretending features stronger playing and a harder-rocking edge (there's no reason why "In and Out of My Life (In a Day)" shouldn't have been a hit), suggesting that the Pandoras aren't as hopelessly mired in historical fetishism as one might assume.

Although the Pandoras were signed to Elektra and recorded an album (entitled Come Inside), the band and label went their separate ways and the LP was scrapped. Instead, the Pandoras issued Rock Hard, five blaring rock songs of horny raunch—with titles like "Six Times a Day," "Craving" and "He's Coming"—and one strongly suggestive pop song. Judging by this unseemly musical and lyrical display, Pierce has just discovered masturbation, her G spot or the Runaways. Unless five women in leather singing about sex with the crotch-grabbing delicacy of dockhands sounds like a cheap thrill, avoid being slumed by this embarrassing adolescent trape.

Demonstrating that Rock Hard was no one-disc stand, the Pandoras recycle four of its songs (alongside others in the same vein) on Nymphomania, a hopeless live set recorded in Dallas. Pierce's voice is totally unsuited to such loud rock; her uncertain grip on melody and sloppy, out-of-tune guitar work (not to mention drummer Sheri Kaplan's lame thumping) make listening to this quite a chore. Most significant liner note thank you. "to my human sexuality teacher & classmates." Just what are they teaching in school these days?

[hd/i]

PANKOW

Freedom for the Slaves EP (Wax Trax!) 1988 ●

Gisela (Wax Trax!) 1989 ●

Pankow Show You Their Dongs EP (Wax Trax!) 1990 ●

Omne Anima Triste Post Coitum [tape] (ROIR) 1991

One is naturally wary when Italians and Germans get together, and at least some of this caution is justified by Pankow, which uses Florence as its operational base. Multi-instrumentalist (okay, sample-meister) Maurizio Fasolo and singer Alex Spalck form the core of this intermittently interesting and conscientiously provocative group that gets Adrian Sherwood to do a lot of its mixes. Always sonically engaging, Pankow goes wrong whenever Spalck opens his mouth. You can laugh at the nihilism of Revolting Cocks (indeed, that's probably the point), but with Pankow you can only roll your eyes and hope for the vocals to end.

The six-song Freedom for the Slaves boasts a cut called "Art & Madness" (yeesh!) as well as a cover of the Normal's classic "Warm Leatherette." The beats are loud and nasty, and the accompanying noises crunch in all the right places.

Although it was actually released in a 100-copy edition with a gold-embossed slab of marble for a cover, the more commonly circulated edition of Gisela merely has a particularly creepy sleeve illustration. In any case, it contains another swipe at "Warm Leatherette," which sounds like a nightmare concocted by Saturday Night Live's Hans and Franz. Although it rocks, "Me & My Ding Dong" is basically an industrial-noise take on Chuck Berry's "My Ding-a-ling." (Which is to say unessential.) "I shall die in mediocrity," Spalck sings on "Germany Is Burning" (from Pankow Show You Their Dongs, the 12-inch/CD version of "Me & My Ding Dong"); speaking as someone whose favorite Pankow cut is the CD's instrumental remix of that song, I don't doubt it.

The 1991 cassette (the title of which translates as All Animals (Are Sad After Coitus)) is a live compilation from a recent tour. [gk]

See also Ben Vaughn Combo.

(TAV FALCO'S) PANTHER BURNS

Behind the Magnolia Curtain (Rough Trade) 1981 (Fr. Fan Club) 1988 ●

Blow Your Top EP (Animal) 1982 ●?

Now! [tape] (Frenzi) 1984

Sugar Ditch Revisited EP (Frenzi) 1985 ●

Shake Rag EP (Fr. New Rose) 1986 ●

The World We Knew (Fr. New Rose) 1987 ●

Red Devil (Fr. New Rose) 1988 ●

10th Anniversary Live LP: Midnight in Memphis (Fr. New Rose) 1989 ●

Return of the Blue Panther (Triple X) 1990 ◊

MUD BOY & THE NEUTRONS

Known Felons in Drag (Fr. New Rose) 1986

JAMES LUTHER DICKINSON

Delta Experimental Projects Compilation Volume 2: Spring Poems (Fr. Fan Club) 1990

For folks who prize unspoiled simplicity in rock-'n'-roll (and especially in rockabilly), Tav Falco's Panther Burns may be the ultimate band. On the early records, his voice drenched in echo, Falco goes through a familiar repertoire of Presley-derived whoops, mutters and coos, while an amateurish backing ensemble that often includes Alex Chilton grinds away laboriously like high-school rockers struggling through their first rehearsal. The deliberately slowed-down tempo and brazen sloppiness invest Behind the Magnolia Curtain with an intriguing conceptual purity, but the rawness turns prolonged exposure into a painful experience.

The four songs on Blow Your Top provide more of the same frayed recklessness. But thanks to cleaner sound and playing that verges on being professional, this set almost has commercial potential. (See "Love Is My Business" for proof.) There's still plenty of ground separating Falco's sweaty hysteria and the well-oiled appeal of the Stray Cats, though.

Falco recorded Sugar Ditch Revisited at Sam Phillips' Memphis studio with "Lx" Chilton and a few other Panther Burnsmen; the six tracks are well played, well sung, well recorded, under control and somewhat underwhelming. The countrybilly spirit and sincerity is there, but the performances start and stop without ever really heating up, and the absence of chaos leaves the simple (if esoterically sourced) material to stand alone, which—until the frisky finale, "Tina, the Go Go Queen"—it doesn't do all that well.

The Now! cassette, issued by Falco on his own label, contains seven numbers (including ten minutes of "Jump Suit") taped absolutely live in Memphis in 1984. New Rose subsequently included that material as a bonus disc in original pressings of the killer 12-inch Shake Rag E.P.: studio recordings with Jim Dickinson that include one original (the stomping "Cuban Rebel Girl," also on the live tape/disc) and three typically swell obscurities.

Chilton's revitalized production and playing on The World We Knew helps make it one of Falco's all-time best showings. Using a rotating collection of sidemen, the carefully annotated songs—a scholarly combination of R&B, Sun rockabilly, blues and other wondrous musical inventions ("desert skulk fugue; decorticated cycle tune; the Stuttgart, Arkansas sound," to quote the liner notes)—get a thorough and affectionate workout that remains surehanded without ever slipping down off the rustic funk meter. (There are no originals on this non-didactic history course.) All concerned sounds as though they're having a blast, and that feeling comes right through the speakers. The CD adds Shake Rag.

The 10-inch Red Devil signals a measured return to the uncontrolled wildness of early Panther Burns' records. Falco lays some truly soulful hollerin' over noisy electric guitars and a thumping backbeat on tracks produced individually (not to mention artlessly) by Chilton, Dickinson and others. Red Devil—ten songs and an abundance of hellacious energy—features esoterica by Chuck Berry, Lee Hazelwood and others, adding the songwriting talents of Dickinson and even Tav himself to the party. (The French CD also contains Sugar Ditch Revisited.)

The tenth anniversary album—a two-disc live-in-Memphis (February '89) extravaganza with Chilton, Dickinson, other alumni and assorted guests—confidently covers a broad variety of vintage material, from "It's Only Make Believe" to "Goldfinger" to "Train Kept a-Rollin'," but generally lacks the fiery excitement of Panther Burns' fringe best. The years have evidently been too kind to Falco: the former rockabilly loony has become—of all things—an accomplished entertainer. (Could his small role in Great Balls of Fire have anything to do with such a shocking transformation?) Despite a few flat notes, an out-of-tune guitar and some offbeat song introductions, the performances are kind of colorless—calm and controlled where they should be frantic.

Not to worry. Return of the Blue Panther is wonderfully crappy-sounding, an edgy three-day session in reverb-land as raw as you please. (In keeping with the music's fast'n'loose spirit, the sleeve has its share of mistakes.) Considerately performing material people outside of swap meets are likely to have heard, Falco rips through a fine R&B-oriented program that includes "Rock Me, Baby," "Got Love If You Want It" and "I Got a Woman." Falco's back!

Mud Boy & the Neutrons are Dickinson's band. Known Felons is Elmore James and Sleepy John Estes, Chuck Berry and Bo Diddley ... cranked out by white Memphis boys in the late '80s. Considerably more rigid and fratlike than Tav's excursions into like territory, Mud Boy could be NRBQ's little cousins with twice the reverence and half the talent. Spring Poems, the second volume in a Memphis compilation series helmed by Dickinson, unexpectedly offers him solo for ambience with a paucity of songs, perhaps effective in their intent as soundtrack but fairly pointless on album. [jy/tr/ab]

See also Alex Chilton.

PARIS

The Devil Made Me Do It (Scarface-Tommy Boy) 1990 •

Under the dual banners of the Black Panther Party and the Nation of Islam (a contradiction in terms that evidently eludes him), this devastating young MC's debut is the most politically potent radical rap record yet. (That Paris' self-produced backing tracks are diverse, imaginative and burningly intense only adds to the record's heavy impact.) Stepping away from Public Enemy's scattershot militancy, The Devil Made Me Do It expands on the ruthless rhymes—rooted in the Panthers' revolutionary nationalism ("Brutal," a non-vinyl bonus track, offers a concise history of the African-American struggle) and Muslim faith—with archival sound bites and carefully detailed written descriptions of pivotal historical figures, from Nat Turner to Huey P. Newton (Indicative of Paris' truth-bending divided loyalties, the liner notes attribute the murder of Malcolm X to "an agent of the U.S. government.") Whether you agree with his opinions or not, Paris is a bold and important new spokesman. [i]

GRAHAM PARKER

Howlin' Wind (Mercury) 1976 •
Heat Treatment (Mercury) 1976 •
Another Grey Area (Arista) 1982 •
The Real Macaw (Arista) 1983
Anger: Classic Performances (Arista) 1985
The Mona Lisa's Sister (RCA) 1988 •
Live! Alone in America (RCA) 1989 •
Human Soul (RCA) 1989 •
Struck by Lightning (RCA) 1991 •

GRAHAM PARKER AND THE RUMOUR

Stick to Me (Mercury) 1977 •
The Pink Parker EP (Mercury) 1977
The Parkerrilla (Mercury) 1978
Squeezing Out Sparks (Arista) 1979 •
The Up Escalator (Stiff-Arista) 1980 •
High Times (nr/Vertigo) 1980
It Don't Mean a Thing If It Ain't Got That Swing (nr/Philips) 1984
Pourin' It All Out: The Mercury Years (Mercury) 1986

GRAHAM PARKER AND THE SHOT

Steady Nerves (Elektra) 1985 •

Before Elvis Costello and Joe Jackson, there was Graham Parker, redefining the singer/songwriter category for mid-'70s rock'n'roll audiences suspicious of the James Taylors and Carly Simons. With his raspy, Van Morrison-influenced vocals and soul-on-fire tunes, this diminutive Englishman burst on the scene just before the punk explosion and showed how to make music personal without sacrificing power.

Produced by Nick Lowe, Howlin' Wind is a classic debut album, full of fine ideas fleshed out with ragged enthusiasm. Parker acknowledges his roots throughout, singing original R&B boppers ("White Honey" and "Lady Doctor") with sly wit and masterfully reconstructing rockabilly on the angry "Back to School-days," complete with guest twangin' by Dave Edmunds (who later recorded the song himself on Get It). Evidencing an equally powerful sensitive side, Parker checks in with the reflective "Between You and Me" and "Don't Ask Me Questions," the latter a chilling wail of anguish.

On Howlin' Wind (and all subsequent LPs through The Up Escalator), Parker received formidable backing from the Rumour: Brinsley Schwarz (guitar) and Bob Andrews (keyboards), both ex-Brinsley Schwarz band members; Martin Belmont (guitar), ex-Ducks Deluxe; Stephen Goulding (drums) and Andrew Bodnar (bass), both ex-Bontemps Roulez. Often compared to Dylan's erstwhile '60s cohorts, the Rumour displays the same self-assurance and finesse as the Band, but rocks harder. Despite a checkered recording career on its own, the Rumour was always a stellar support group.

Although produced by Robert John Lange, Heat Treatment is essentially a punchier continuation of Howlin Wind. For spirited soul, there's "Hotel Chambermaid" and "Back Door Love." Parker's serious tunes are also more intense: "Turned Up Too Late" delivers a devastating romantic rejection; the anthemic "Fools' Gold," one of his finest achievements, affirms the need to search for the best, however elusive—it's unaffected and inspiring.

The Pink Parker, an EP pressed on colored vinyl, combines non-LP studio renditions of the Tramp's "Hold Back the Night" and a Parker original with hot live versions of "White Honey" and "Soul Shoes."

With the vastly improved music scene as a catalyst, Parker evidently felt the need to assert himself more strongly on Stick to Me, but the resulting overstatement and stylistic diversity couldn't be contained comfortably on one LP. Nonetheless, taken individually, many tracks are undeniably compelling. The title cut is Parker's soaring declaration of dedication in the face of a hostile world; he unleashes exhilarating nastiness in Ann Peebles' "I'm Gonna Tear Your Playhouse Down." But one need only look at Side Two to sense the confusion: it begins and ends with raucous throwaways designed to compensate for the massive epics in the center. No amount of party fun, however, could clear the air after the overblown theatrics of the seven-minute "Heat in Harlem." Parker is sabotaged by his own indecision.

In classic contract-fulfilling tradition, Parker cranked out a two-record set, The Parkerilla: three live sides plus a second studio version of "Don't Ask Me Questions." Adequate but musically unnecessary, it did the legal trick, and Parker was free to switch to a different American label. The sour-grapes "Mercury Poisoning" (1979) was his first release on Arista, which declined to put its name to the promo-only gray 12-inch one-sided single.

Squeezing Out Sparks resolved Parker's stylistic dilemma. It's his toughest, leanest and most lyrically sophisticated LP; in a way a sad loss of innocence. Eschewing the lighter soul elements of his earlier work, Parker adopts a harsh, nearly humorless tone that suggests cynicism instead of anger. (Regardless, critics generally loved it and sales were decidedly improved over previous efforts.) "Discovering Japan" and "Nobody Hurts You" are sizzling, passionate rockers; for better or worse, the album's centerpiece (echoing the album title's judgmental metaphor) is "You Can't Be Too Strong," an anti-abortion ballad full of disturbing imagery and emphatic phrasing. In his eagerness to forge a coherent style, Parker neglects to vary the emotional tone. (A novel 1979 promo album—live versions of every Sparks song in the same running order as on the studio version, plus two other live cuts—was issued to radio as Live Sparks, further strengthening the band's concert reputation.)

Parker somehow lost his sense of purpose on The Up Escalator. Although retaining the intense, driven approach of Squeezing Out Sparks, the material on this album falls short, possessing fury without context, which results in unsatisfying overkill. Individually, "No Holding Back," "Devil's Sidewalk" and "Love Without Greed" crackle nicely; collectively, they produce a hollow roar. Those looking to assign blame will notice the increasing influence of the king of rock melodrama, Bruce Springsteen, who even joins in vocally on the bloated "Endless Night." Also, the departure of Bob Andrews must have added to the changing situation.

The rest of the Rumour followed Andrews through the exit prior to Another Grey Area, which actually constitutes a minor comeback, avoiding the noisier extremes of The Up Escalator. A band of New York session musicians provides precise though unspectacular accompaniment; Parker co-produced with Jack Douglas. Interestingly, the harder-rocking tracks are the least effective: "Big Fat Zero" and "You Hit the Spot" seem little more than halfhearted gestures. In contrast, ballads like "Temporary Beauty," "Dark Side of the Bright Lights" and "Crying for Attention" have a graceful and unforced ring of sincerity never before heard on a Parker LP. Though Another Grey Area seldom overwhelms, it does indicate that, after six studio albums, Parker is still willing to take chances.

The Real Macaw, however, is a chance he probably shouldn't have taken. Songs like "You Can't Take Love for Granted" and "Life Gets Better" reach Parker's required level of intensity, but the production and playing do not. Producer David Kershenbaum gives Parker the kind of sparse, colorless setting he used to create for Joe Jackson; the musicianship is unnecessarily understated. The end product: a disc that is watered down and should have been harder.

Steady Nerves rights the balance, blending the pop veneer of The Real Macaw with a tougher band attack for a bracing series of characteristically pithy performances, from the cheerfully raunchy "When You Do That to Me" to the gorgeously romantic "Wake Up (Next to You)" to "Break Them Down," a classic Parker fist-waver. A solid album that bodes well. (The CD has an extra song, "Too Much Time to Think.")

Parker soon left Elektra and, following an abortive alliance with Atlantic that didn't result in any releases, signed to RCA and, three years after Steady Nerves, came up with The Mona Lisa's Sister. Getting excellent backing from the extraordinary Schwarz (who co-produced with Parker), Bodnar, ex-Rockpile drummer Terry Williams and keyboardist James Hallawell, Parker engages his sharp tongue and sketchy melodicism for another collection of smooth songs that has its ups ("OK Hieronymous") and downs ("Get Started. Start a Fire"). Brittle sound tends to undercut Parker's soulful strut (especially on "I'm Just Your Man" and a lovely reading of Sam Cooke's "Cupid"); "The Girl Isn't Ready" and "Don't Let It Break You Down," however, gain edgy tension from the same audio characteristic. Although not among his best, The Mona Lisa's Sister confirms Parker's continued artistic vitality.

The only thing Parker's solo live album (recorded in Philadelphia, October 1988) confirms is that he really does need accompaniment to put his songs across. Naked renditions of classic material ("White Honey," "Gypsy Blood," "Back to Schooldays," "Protection," "You Can't Be Too Strong") are blunt but lifeless; of the provocative new songs, only the blistering "Soul Corruption" is strong enough to rise above the demolike presentation.

Fronting a band composed of Schwarz, Bodnar and Steve Nieve and Pete Thomas from the Attractions, Parker bounced back with Human Soul, an exceptionally fine album of memorable, mature songs. With nods hit-and-miss. In the winning column, Shinehead does an impressive reworked version of Sly Stone's "Family Affair," flashes his rapid-fire lyrical style (as well as his sense of humor) on "Cigarette Breath," clings to his Jamaican birthright with "Musical Madness," delivers an inspiring sermon in "Strive" and lands a dose of reality on the title track. [aw]

SHIRTS

The Shirts (Capitol) 1978

Street Light Shine (Capitol) 1979

Inner Sleeve (Capitol) 1980

JING/CHEMICAL WEDDING

Off the Board [tape] (CBGB) 1987

JING

Jing (Three Cherries) 1989

Six Brooklynites known as the Shirts were playing Top 40 covers in local bars until they happened onto the Bowery club circuit in 1975. Abandoning the boroughs for a career in Manhattan with original material, the Shirts became a popular (if unhip) fixture on the burgeoning New York new wave scene, and went on to make three albums of totally bland hoping-for-the-mainstream rock. Singer Annie Golden went on to success as a singer/actress—in the movie Hair, with a solo single in 1984 and on Broadway—but the Shirts are little more than a dull memory. Each of the albums has an enjoyable song or two, but there's nothing remarkable about any of them.

A decade later, Shirts guitarist/vocalist Artie La Monica (now calling himself Arthur Jing) turned up back on CBGB's stage, filling one side of a live cassette with his solo debut. Supported by a skilled quartet and bearing traces of Elvis Costello, Bob Dylan and Dion in his voice, Jing makes a credible, well-recorded showing. Four of the same songs turn up again on the eponymous studio album, a not unpleasant anachronism that has its roots in '70s new wave, Brill Building pop and the same mixture of '60s rock and soul that informed Springsteen's early records. Golden guests on three tracks. [i]

SHOCKABILLY

The Dawn of Shockabilly EP (nr/Rough Trade) 1982

(Shimmy-Disc) 1988

Earth vs. Shockabilly (nr/Rough Trade) 1983

(Shimmy-Disc) 1988

Greatest Hits EP (Red) 1983

Colosseum (nr/Rough Trade) 1984

Vietnam (Fundamental Music) 1984

Heaven (Fundamental Music) 1985

The Ghost of Shockabilly [CD] (Shimmy-Disc) 1989 •

Vietnam/Heaven (Shimmy-Disc) 1990 ♪

Live... Just Beautiful (Shimmy-Disc) 1990 •

Crazed rockabilly-tinged remakes of "Psychotic Reaction" and two Yardbirds classics isn't a bad idea, especially if gonzo guitar and drums like those on The Dawn of Shockabilly are brought to bear on 'em. Taking the same tack on "A Hard Day's Night" and a country oldie, adding silly organ also makes a funny kind of sense. But guitarist Eugene Chadbourne's nonsense vocals (stupidly muffled, or in silly cartoon character styles, with at least two or three different voices per track) ruin the whole thing. Eugene shouldn't be careful with his axe, but with his mouth.

Greatest Hits takes one track each from the two preceding English records and adds a quartet of stunning live cuts, including the amphetaminized "Bluegrass Breakdown" and a nearly unrecognizable version of the Doors' "People Are Strange." The Ghost of Shockabilly CD combines Earth and Colosseum, the album on which the writing team of Chadbourne and Mark Kramer (bass/organ/production) began to flourish, with the Kramer musically embellishing Eugene's political and instrumental rants, parodies and white-trash obsessions. (The Shimmy-Disc cassette of Earth contains The Dawn of Shockabilly.)

Vietnam is a relatively grand affair, with a huge tour-diary poster and material by Arthur Lee, John Fogerty, John Lee Hooker and the Beatles mercilessly savaged by Chadbourne, Kramer and drummer David Licht.

Heaven takes the terrible trio further into the realms of the truly weird. Only three covers (Bolan, Lennon and a mystery), but such inspired originals as Eugene's "How Can You Kill Me, I'm Already Dead" and "She Was a Living Breathing Piece of Dirt" more than make up the difference. On that (bum) note, Shockabilly ceased to exist. (Shimmy-Disc later paired Vietnam and Heaven on CD and cassette.)

The posthumous live CD, Just Beautiful, is a generous 27-track plunge into the group's hyperkinetic non-stop electric vaudeville: Chadbourne wreaks havoc on an electrified rake and birdcage while Kramer and mutant-percussionist Licht fall apart in the background. Almost entirely comprised of covers, the CD includes five remixed tracks from Dawn of Shockabilly sutured in the middle. The cassette version has a dozen live tracks (from '84 and '85), the entire Colosseum LP and the five Dawn remixes.

Occasionally listenable, often more stupid than funny, Shockabilly was, if nothing else, absolutely unique. [jg/i/rg]

See also Bongwater, Carney-Hild-Kramer, Eugene Chadbourne.

MICHELLE SHOCKED

The Texas Campfire Tapes (Cooking Vinyl) 1986

(Mercury) 1988 •

Short Sharp Shocked (Mercury) 1988 •

Anchorage EP (nr/London) 1988 •

If Love Was a Train EP (nr/London) 1989 •

Captain Swing (Mercury) 1989 •

In the interests of critical fair play, let it be acknowledged that Bob Dylan also changed his name, invented (or at least outrageously embellished) his personal mythology and slyly claimed an entirely fictitious folk rootsiness with all the guile of film star. Since Michelle Shocked is no Bob Dylan, her ability to pull off the same charade only proves that you can fool some of the people all of the time. That's not to say she's not talented but, as a well-rounded pop star, her strained efforts at self-promotion and political action are dubiously credible and unforgivably distasteful in light of her pretensions of unpretentiousness.

Recorded live at a folk festival on a portable tape machine (not exactly a field recording but close enough

twee is not without its gems, especially the cute but noisy "Baby, You're Just You" and the revamped "Sit on It Mother." (Richard Mazda produced.)

Deliberately amateur and willfully obscure in that distinctively Scottish manner, the Pastels are notorious for cutting multiple versions of the same songs: if you include radio sessions, there are as many as five different renditions of some early tunes. Stephen's label, 53rd & 3rd, has been almost as influential as the Pastels, releasing records by the Vaselines, Pooh Sticks, Shop Assistants and Beat Happening. [ag/ja]

JEAN-FRANCOIS PAUVROS

See Blurt.

PAYOLAS

Introducing Payolas EP (IRS) 1980

In a Place Like This (IRS) 1981

No Stranger to Danger (A&M) 1982

Hammer on a Drum (A&M) 1983

PAUL HYDE AND THE PAYOLAS

Here's the World for Ya (A&M) 1985

ROCK AND HYDE

Under the Volcano (Capitol) 1987 •

Vancouver, British Columbia was the site of one of Canada's most volatile early punk explosions, but only a couple of bands managed to spread their fame much beyond the city limits. The Payolas were one of those, and temporarily managed to retain some of the scene's fire after signing to an American label.

The gatefold 7-inch EP—four songs, two of them redone for the first album—records an early four-piece lineup, produced by guitarist Bob Rock to sound like a high-voltage cross between the New York Dolls, the Clash and the Ramones.

An impressive debut, In a Place Like This is political (but not preachy), offering sophisticated punk with reggae seasoning, which makes it again reminiscent of the Clash without being derivative. Musical variety, lyrical quality and youthful power add to the album's strong impact.

No Stranger to Danger, expertly produced by Mick Ronson (who had not previously distinguished himself in that role), shows enormous progress—from an able but inexperienced adolescent band to a skilled and creative heir to Mott the Hoople. (If that connection doesn't register, consider that Ronson was a late member of Mott and subsequently worked extensively with Ian Hunter.) The judicious addition of contemporary keyboards, vastly improved singing and a more-melody/less-thrash outlook make every track a treat. In a nice touch, it's dedicated to the late Alex Harvey.

Sticking with Ronno, Hammer on a Drum takes a large step away from the youth and energy of the band's beginnings. Singer Paul Hyde selectively affects a near-perfect vocal imitation of Ian Hunter (who also appears on the record, furthering the Mott relationship). It's slick and engaging, but sorely lacking in believable personality. It may not be fair to expect any group to remain true to its (perceived) principles, but getting this foggish so fast is neither commendable nor flattering.

Here's the World for Ya, produced by big-time mainstreamer David Foster, is even worse. Typical of this boring and bland synth-rock record, the band is careful to thank members of Rush and Loverboy.

Ditching the band name, Rock (guitar, keyboards and bass) and Hyde (vocals, guitar), joined by ex-Payola Chris Taylor (drums, keyboards) and several other part-timers, returned with an excellent duo album. Spanning a number of styles—all of which show imagination, pop and rock smarts and enthusiasm—the album is adult and intelligent. One of those rare multifaceted records that reveals itself differently each time, Under the Volcano more than makes up for the long dry spell.

Rock has since gone on to become a very successful producer, working with the Cult, Metallica and other hard-rock bands. [i]

PEDALJETS

Today Today (Twilight) 1988 •

Pedaljets (Communion) 1989 •

This nifty Kansas alterno-pop trio lays noisy rock energy and unmitigated passion into melodies strong enough to withstand rough handling. Singer/guitarist Mike Allmayer does a really good job on both, giving Today Today an intriguing sound—Byrdslike harmonies and punky Replacementism—works just as well (albeit differently) at high and low volumes.

The addition of a second guitarist and more stylistic variation complicates things a bit on the ambitious but unconvincing Pedaljets. Stretching out and opening up his songwriting, Allmayer decompresses the first album's tersely surging pop with empty spaces, slower rhythms and acoustic guitars; the results are enjoyable but not as distinctive. Had the group not made Today Today this record would have been a credible starting point. As a developmental step, however, Pedaljets is a disappointing step in the wrong direction. (The CD adds two songs.) [i]

PEGBOY

See Naked Raygun.

PENETRATION

Moving Targets (nr/Virgin) 1978 •

Coming Up for Air (Virgin Int'l) 1979

Race Against Time (nr/Clifdayn) 1979

PAULINE MURRAY AND THE INVISIBLE GIRLS

Pauline Murray and the Invisible Girls (nr/Illusive) 1980

Searching for Heaven EP (nr/Illusive) 1981

PAULINE MURRAY

Hong Kong EP (nr/Polestar) 1987

Storm Clouds (nr/Cot and Mouse) 1989 •

Originally inspired into existence by Patti Smith and the Sex Pistols, Penetration emerged from northern England (Durham, near Newcastle) in 1977 with a great punk single, "Don't Dictate." Led by singer Pauline Murray, the band's brash amateurism had been converted into competent musicianship by the time of Moving Targets, released at first on glow-in-the-dark gimmick vinyl that was far noisier than illuminating. Playing mostly originals (written by Murray in collaboration with bandmates), but including Smith's "Free

Money” and the Buzzcocks’ “Nostalgia,” Penetration’s debut LP mixes expansive creations and direct punk-outs, all done with flair and originality. Unlike other LPs by young bands of this era, Moving Targets still sounds surprisingly fresh. (The belated CD issue adds five tracks, including “Don’t Dictate” and its B-side, 1978’s “Fire Squad” and its B-side, and the flip of the album’s incisive “Life’s a Gamble.”)

Coming Up for Air, produced poorly by Steve Lillywhite, isn’t nearly as good, despite some swell tracks. Where the first record was almost consistently exciting, only “Shout Above the Noise,” “On Reflection” and “Lifeline” have the same melodic, dramatic intensity. The band had evidently run out of good songs, and the muffled sound only exacerbates the mishmash.

An officially sanctioned bootleg, Race Against Time, joins a side of demos with a side of live performance. The studio work predates the band’s album sessions and is pretty boring; the live material, recorded in Newcastle mostly in 1979, is energetic and well played.

After Penetration, Murray joined forces with producer Martin Hannett’s occasional agglomeration, the Invisible Girls; the 1980 incarnation that backed Murray on an LP included Buzzcocks drummer John Maher and future Sisters of Mercy/Mission guitarist Wayne Hussey. The eponymous album’s subtle pop is closer in spirit and execution to British folk-rock than to the Beatles or Sex Pistols. Murray’s singing is too bright and lively to handle the more downbeat material, but the band’s ability to pattern exciting sounds around her brings out the inherent passion in her voice, and the soft but dense rock creates a mood of chilling agitation.

Searching for Heaven repeats the album’s accomplishments but digresses on “Animal Crazy,” which introduces a dislocated disco beat that turns it into an interesting dance music variant.

Between 1981 and ’89, Murray struck out on her own and managed some wonderful singles like “New Age” and a striking chamber treatment of Alex Chilton’s “Holocaust.” Storm Clouds compiles the best of those efforts and the Hong Kong EP, adding some newer tracks as well. While more consistent and more thoroughly listenable than any of Penetration’s albums or the Invisible Girls record, it’s also lighter and breezier. Like Poly Styrene’s later solo work, Murray sounds hushed, introspective and quiet, a marked contrast to her full-throated Penetration histrionics. The soothing vocals combine with sparkling textures; Murray is inclined to make modest pop gems that succeed with understatement. Investigate completely, then head backwards. [i/sg/jr]

PERE UBU

The Modern Dance (Blank) 1978 (Rough Trade) 1981 •
 Datapanik in the Year Zero EP (nr/Radar) 1978
 Dub Housing (Chrysalis) 1978 (Rough Trade) •
 New Picnic Time (Rough Trade) 1979 •
 The Art of Walking (Rough Trade) 1981 •
 390 Degrees of Simulated Stereo (Rough Trade) 1981 •
 Song of the Bailing Man (Rough Trade) 1982 •
 Terminal Tower: An Archival Collection (Twin/Tone) 1985 •
 The Tenement Year (Enigma-Mercury) 1988 •

One Man Drives While the Other Man Screams (Rough Trade) 1989 •

Clouland (Fontana) 1989 •

Worlds in Collision (Fontana) 1991 ◊

In its first incarnation, Cleveland’s Pere Ubu—a crucial pioneer in the American underground—combined disorienting, often dissonant, rock and urban blues in a stunningly original and outlandish mix, but never lost an urgent, joyous party atmosphere. Lead singer David Thomas’ plebeian warble, the band’s most noticeable sonic feature, colors all of Ubu’s proceedings in a bizarre light; casual listeners might, as a result, overlook the powerful, polished musicianship. One of the most innovative American musical forces, Pere Ubu is to Devo what Arnold Schoenberg was to Irving Berlin.

The Modern Dance includes two songs remade from early 45s that Pere Ubu had released on its Hearthan label (when Thomas was calling himself Crocus Behemoth and the late Peter Laughner was one of the sextet’s guitarists and main songwriters). Focusing on themes of alienation and adolescent angst, the album cuts a precarious middle ground between art-rock and Midwestern garage pop. The British Datapanik in the Year Zero catching-up compilation is more successful, collecting five of the original Hearthan tracks, including the dynamic, paranoid “30 Seconds Over Tokyo.” Dark, challenging material.

Dub Housing takes a quantum leap in production and material. Tom Herman’s eerie guitar and Allen Ravenstine’s keyboard work rivets Thomas’ otherworldly vocals to a dark vision at once surreal and lodged in claustrophobic real life. Ubu’s music is uncompromising and its songwriting solid, especially on the obsessive drone, “Codex.”

Ubu shifted towards brighter, more open sound and a deformed blues ethic on New Picnic Time. Still bearing an air of disaster, Thomas’ lyrics develop story-songs that increasingly focus on common elements of everyday life, drawing more in line with his strong religious (Jehovah’s Witness) beliefs. A bizarre album that is more than a little reminiscent of Captain Beefheart. In 1979, Herman left and Red Crayola guitarist/leader Mayo Thompson joined.

The Art of Walking evinces increasing interest in developing the band’s musical range, and tends towards ambient use of sound to create new aural landscapes, as well as more creative use of dissonance.

Ubu’s first live album, 390 Degrees of Simulated Stereo, takes an overview of the band’s development through a collection of live recordings from Cleveland, London and Brussels, featuring the group’s best songs from the 1976-9 era, including “30 Seconds Over Tokyo,” “My Dark Ages” and “Heart of Darkness.”

With Thompson’s expanding influence and the replacement of drummer Scott Krauss by Anton Fier, Pere Ubu firmly entered the art-rock fold on Song of the Bailing Man. With clean production (by Adam Kidron) and spare sound, Pere Ubu abandoned the chaotic inspiration that charged its earlier work, substituting an unaccustomed and incongruous restraint. After finishing the album, Ubu decided to disband, allowing Thomas to concentrate on his solo career.

Terminal Tower is, as billed, an archival collection with lyrics and abundant liner notes. Many of these eleven essential Ubu tracks—from “Heart of Darkness” and “Final Solution” to “Not Happy” and “Lonesome Cowboy Dave”—are otherwise hard to find; two are alternate mixes.

Pere Ubu formally reformed in late 1987, but all that actually meant was a name change and inclusion of Scott Krauss in the lineup of Thomas’ most recent solo support band, the Wooden Birds. In July 1988, Thomas, Krauss, bassist Tony Maimone, synthesist Allen Ravenstine, drummer Chris Cutler and guitarist Jim Jones released Ubu’s first new LP in six years. Although not entirely successful (two drummers is one too many; Ravenstine’s noise doodles now seem extraneous and dated), The Tenement Year builds a solid rock structure around Thomas’ whimsical fascinations, putting restless instrumental curiosity to work in a mix of mild noise (“George Had a Hat”) and moderate accessibility (“We Have the Technology”).

One Man Drives While the Other Man Screams, the long-delayed second Ubu tour document, offers thirteen tracks recorded in London (1978, with Tom Herman), Cleveland (1980, with Mayo Thompson) and Germany (1981, ditto). Drawing a lot of its material from Dub Housing (“Navy,” “Ubu Dance Party,” “Codex,” etc.), the record has a relaxed feel and (on CD, at least) extremely clear sound.

Using The Tenement Year’s prettier tunes as a rough sketch, Ubu put itself in producer Stephen Hague’s competent hands for half of Cloudland and delivered a big surprise: wonderful pop. Jettisoning such inconvenient sonic baggage as vocal disharmony, chaos and electronic graffiti, the album offers an ingenious subversion of classic Top 40 as run through Ubu’s unique wringer. While “Breath” and “Race the Sun” appropriate simple chord structures from such familiar sources as Buddy Holly pop and surf-rock, unlikely bridges, tantalizing lyrics and Thomas’ moderate warble make them modern and magical. “Waiting for Mary” and “Bus Called Happiness” (Hague’s other efforts) are even better, matching catchy choruses to adventurous verse arrangements. On his tracks, longtime Ubu studio chum Paul Hamann helps steer the group back into temperate weirdness, resulting in a demento version of “Sloop John B” that surfaces in “Nevada!” and the recitation and sickly chanting of “Flat.” As unpalatable as this open-armed album may be to fans of challenging music, Cloudland is quite obviously a masterpiece.

[sg/i]

See also Peter Laughner, Paul Marotta, Bob Mould, Red Crayola, David Thomas, Tripod Jimmie.

PERFECT DISASTER

Perfect Disaster (Fr. Kampa) 1985 (nr/Glass) 1987 (Fire) 1991 •

Hey Hey Hey EP (nr/Glass) 1987

T.V. (Girl on Fire) EP (nr/Fire) 1988

Asylum Road (Genius-Rough Trade) 1988 •

Up (nr/Fire) 1989 (Fire) 1990 •

Mood Elevators EP (nr/Fire) 1989

Rise EP (nr/Fire) 1989

Heaven Scent (nr/Fire) 1990 (Fire) 1991 •

Singer/guitarist Phil Parfitt and guitarist Dan Cross have been the only constants in this fascinating and prolific English band’s intricate genealogy. (Part of an early incarnation transmuted into Fields of the Nephilim; ex-bassist Josephine Wiggs is now a Breeder.) Typified by constant artistic tension and a habit of shifting direction as frequently as possible, the Perfect Disaster is a strange bird, but one worth keeping an ear on.

The restrained and debonair (but far from slick) suave-pop on Perfect Disaster gently builds alluring, occasionally rocking (with a bit of sax and even feedback), arrangements around Parfitt’s deep, character-laden voice. With a cover of Lou Reed’s “Over You” to underscore affection for the Velvet’s pretty side and such tunelessly neurotic Parfitt originals as “What’s Happening to Me” and “Hiding from Frank,” this stylelessly inventive collection—easily commendable to fans of Aztec Camera—is a most auspicious debut.

Two of the four new songs (including a weird Vietnam-war number entitled “The Night Belongs to Charlie” that later turned up, in a different recording, on Asylum Road) on the 1987 12-inch firm up the Perfect Disaster’s pop backbone with more guitar intensity; the other two keep things light and airy. After previewing another album track—this one with Wiggs’ cello and string bass providing an eerie aura—on the T.V. (Girl on Fire) EP, the band released its second LP, Asylum Road. A shifting sky of cloudy moods, the songs run from somber (“All the Stars”) to rushing enthusiasm (“The Crack Up”) to Velvety drone (“In Conference Again”), all punched up by Cross’ incisively diverse guitar work. In a typical contradiction of sound and content, “What’s the Use of Trying?” voices disgust over a delightful pop melody.

The band brought its stylistic approach more in line with Parfitt’s increasingly bitter and cynical lyrics on Up, kicking up a bracing Velvet-derived noise. (Although, of course, one segment of a lengthy three-parter named “Down” is a mock-baroque cello/acoustic guitar instrumental.) While the rhythm section sets a driving “Sister Ray” backbeat in motion, Cross goes to town, overlaying distortion, feedback, toggle-switching, noise-rock aggression and all the other good things he could only hint at on prior records. (On the few quiet songs—like “It Doesn’t Matter” and “Go Away”—he satisfies himself with veiled threats.) For his part, Parfitt unveils a suitably roughened-up voice on the louder tunes.

From there, it was only a small step to the strong Madchester-oriented rock of “Mood Elevators” (available in two versions, plus a pair of non-LP songs, on a 12-inch) and the nearly Jesus & Mary Chain pop roar of the wonderful “Rise.” All three additional tracks on the Rise EP—a fragile lullaby entitled “Lee” plus ’89 live versions of Up’s “B52” (thirteen minutes’ worth) and an early single—reappear on the Heaven Scent CD as bonuses, along with the weaker mix of “Mood Elevators” from the preceding EP.

Other than “Rise,” which opens it, the kicky “Takin’ Over” and the dramatic “Sooner or Later,” the other two-thirds of Heaven Scent (Wiggs’ last stand with the band) are claustrophobically subdued, deeply personal songs (“Father,” “Little Sister (If Ever Days),” “Where Will You Go with Me”) given sleepy, intimate performances. Even the songs with loud guitar bits (e.g., “Wires” and “It’s Gonna Come to You”) are played at such a woody tempo and with so much sonic room that an occasional bit of window-rattling doesn't really upset the gentle mood. [i]

See also Breeders.

LEE "SCRATCH" PERRY (AND THE UPSETTERS)

Super Ape (Mango) 1976

Roast Fish Collie Weed and Corn Bread (Jam. Upsetters) 1976

Cloak and Dagger (Hol. Black Art) 1979 (nr/Anachron) 1990

Scratch on the Wire (nr/Island) 1979

The Return of Pipecock Jackxon (Hol. Black Art) 1980

The Upsetter Collection (nr/Trojan) 1981 •

Scratch and Co.: Chapter One (Jam. Clocktower) 1982

Mystic Miracle Star (Heartbeat) 1982

History, Mystery and Prophecy (Mango) 1984

Reggae Greats (Mango) 1984 •

The Upsetter Box (nr/Trojan) 1985 •

Battle of Armagideon (Millionaire Liquidator) (nr/Trojan) 1986 •

Some of the Best (Heartbeat) 1986 •

Time Boom X De Devil Dead (nr/On-U Sound) 1987 •

Satan Kicked the Bucket (Bullwackies) 1988 (Rohit) 1990 •

All the Hits (Rohit) 1989 •

Chicken Scratch (Heartbeat) 1989 •

Build the Ark (nr/Trojan) 1990 •

From the Secret Laboratory (Mango) 1990 •

Message from Yard (Rohit) 1990 φ

Lee Scratch Perry Meets Bullwackie in Satan's Dub [tape] (ROIR) 1990

Lord God Muzick (Heartbeat) 1991 •

LEE PERRY AND FRIENDS

Give Me Power (nr/Trojan) 1988 •

Open the Gate (nr/Trojan) 1989 •

Shocks of Mighty 1969–1974 (nr/Attack) 1989 •

Public Jesting (nr/Attack) 1990 •

JAH LION

Colombia Colly (Mango) 1976

LEE "SCRATCH" PERRY & MAD PROFESSOR

Mystic Warrior (RAS) 1989 •

Mystic Warrior Dub (Jam. Ariwa) 1989 [tape] (ROIR) 1990

UPSETTERS

Vension Like Rain (nr/Trojan) 1990

VARIOUS ARTISTS

Heart of the Ark Vols. 1 & 2 (nr/Seven Leaves) 1982

Megaton Dub Vols. 1 & 2 (nr/Seven Leaves) 1982

Certainly eccentric, possibly mad (even his record company bio acknowledges it!), Lee "Scratch" Perry is reggae's most influential producer, with a career that spans the entire history of the music. He started at Coxson's Studio One label, first as a talent scout, then as producer. Moving on to other labels, he recorded hit after hit for Jamaican artists, assembling the original Wailers and producing their earliest—some say best—tracks. Perry has also done extensive solo work, composing, arranging and singing his own records.

With the help of a studio band, the Upsetters (named for one of his aliases), Perry has forged a style that's idiosyncratic and revolutionary—full of shifting, echoey rhythms and weird sound effects. His characteristic sound is unique—extended grooves layered like fog, with odd vocals and percussion shimmering in the dense mist.

Perry became an Island house producer in the '70s and a major influence on new wave bands with an affinity for reggae. (The Clash covered "Police and Thieves," a tune he co-wrote with Junior Murvin, on their first LP; Perry later did some production for the band.)

Perry's early work as both producer and performer is well chronicled. Some of the Best contains many fine recordings, including "People Funny Boy" and others that make plain American R&B's essential link to reggae. The Upsetter Collection has "Return of Django," a UK hit, and the Gatherers' "Words of My Mouth," the rhythm track of which Perry has used again and again. Chapter One features a dub of Junior Byles' "Curly Locks," Ricky and Bunny's "Bush Wed Corn Trash" and others co-produced with Brad Osbourne. All three compilations are lively, vital and consistent.

Perry's Island releases are also notable. Colombia Colly (billing him as Jah Lion) is one of the best, showing him in stylistic transition and getting weirder, with a cover of Peggy Lee's "Fever" and one cut that features a creaking door. Super Ape, from the same year, is more conventional, a dub LP that emphasizes the Upsetters' playing. Perry's personality is evident, though subdued. The number of engineers credited on History, Mystery and Prophecy, Perry's last Island LP, suggests the label might have been attempting to smooth out the roughness. The sound is too clean, static and unexciting.

Perry's Island years also yielded two almost identical compilations—Scratch on the Wire and Reggae Greats. Both feature Junior Murvin's "Police and Thieves," as well as his own "Roast Fish and Cornbread" and "Soul Fire" (from the brilliant Jamaican-only Roast Fish Collie Weed and Corn Bread LP), but neither is essential.

His other LPs vary in quality. The Return of Pipecock Jackxon derives from Dutch sessions during which Perry reportedly experimented with LSD and destroyed the studio. Needless to say, it's brilliant. So is Mystic Miracle Star, which he made with the Majestics. Surprisingly straightforward, with few sound effects, it's still filled with his characteristic production signatures. Less impressive are the two so-so volumes of Heart of the Ark (compilations of Perry-produced singers); worse, the two Megaton Dub volumes are so lackluster that one authority wondered in print whether Perry had actually produced them.

Two notable '85 releases: on "Judgment in a Babylon," a startling Jamaican 12-inch, Perry accuses Island Records boss Chris Blackwell of being a vampire who killed Bob Marley. Although libelous and crazy, it must be heard. In a more historical vein, The Upsetter Box makes three classic out-of-print LPs (African Blood, Rhythm Shower and Double 7) available again. Priced but worthwhile, the set features appearances by U-Roy, I-Roy and others, and marks Perry's return to Trojan.

His next release for the label, Battle of Arma- gideon, is a collection of new tracks recorded in London. A return to form of sorts, the LP is full of his characteristically dense production (which sounds thoroughly contemporary) and lots of cryptic, stream-of-consciousness lyrics. (On one song, "I Am a Madman," he even celebrates his lunatic persona.) Perry's time in London also resulted in Time Boom X De Devil Dead, a collaboration with British dubmeister Adrian Sherwood. Influenced by Perry in the past, co-producer Sherwood provides a steadying hand, so the music is consistent, even if Perry's personality—he does all the singing—seems restrained. While perhaps lacking the eccentric edge of Perry's own work, the LP is still weird and wonderful, a sample of some of the best avant-garde groove music being made today.

In 1988, Trojan released Give Me Power, another compilation of tracks Perry wrote and produced for other artists. Superbly sequenced and annotated, it's one of the best and most representative collections of the producer's past work. Don't miss it.

Produced by Coxsome Dodd during Perry's 1964-'66 heyday, most of the tracks on Chicken Scratch have been unavailable for over 20 years, and some are previously unreleased. All of the cuts are performed by the peerless Skatalites, and many include the female vocals of either the Soulettes (Rita Marley's first group) or the Dynamites. This is Lee Perry in his pre-Upsetter days, before his artistically and commercially fruitful collaboration with the Wailers. Songs like "Man to Man" (featuring Marley, Tosh and Bunny Wailer), "Cruma," "Takcoo," "Roast Duck" and the title track (which provided one of Perry's many aliases) make Chicken Scratch a time capsule of Jamaica's ska era.

Way beyond weirdness, the world of Lee "Scratch" Perry is one where people wear umbrellas on their heads, where the bass is the place, where space constantly shifts, where age does not wither, where reason sleeps and the dub quivers, and where avant-garde sonic formalism and mindless fun are bedmates. The madman who for years has continually pushed the frontiers of dub with his heavy sounds, surprising tricks and unorthodox methods, currently resides on a mountaintop in Switzerland. And he keeps making records, seemingly more than ever.

From the Secret Laboratory is Perry's second co-production with Adrian Sherwood. The Dub Syndicate and Jamaica's veteran Roots Radics underpin Perry's free-form word associations and social commentaries on "Secret Laboratory (Scientific Dancehall)," "You Thought I Was Dead" and the crowning "Seven Devils Dead."

With such signature tunes as "Run for Cover" and "Water Pump," All the Hits covers Perry's rock steady-era work.

Mystic Warrior, the collaboration between reggae's preeminent techno-wiz geniuses, doubles your madmen-cum-musical visionaries pleasure. The Mad Professor (Neal Fraser) is a Guyana-born producer-engineer who rules over the cutting edge of Britain's avant-garde reggae scene and runs the Ariwa Sounds label. Mystic Warrior is an awesomely imaginative display of effects and far-ranging musical references.

Trojan Records has mined Perry's incredible backlog of hard-to-find '70s productions with three recent compilations: Version Like Rain is a brilliant collection of sixteen tracks taken from three popular Upsetter rhythms, while the three-LP/two-CD Build the Ark box set features eighteen mid-'70s tracks (and their dubs): Scratch at his production peak. [bk/aw]

See also Junior Murvin.

MARK PERRY

See Alternative TV.

PET SHOP BOYS

Please (EMI America) 1986 •

Disco (EMI America) 1986 •

Pet Shop Boys, actually. (EMI Manhattan) 1987 + 1988 •

Introspective (EMI Manhattan) 1988 •

Behavior (EMI) 1990 •

LIZA MINNELLI

Results (Epic) 1989 •

Pet Shop Boys, the London duo of ex-Smash Hits journalist Neil Tennant and electro-musician Chris Lowe, have made an enormously successful career by applying intentionally provocative intellectual pretension and philosophical self-indulgence to au courant dance music. Please is a slick set of anonymous easy-listening disco tracks, brilliantly, soullessly produced (mostly by Stephen Hague), with ridiculous, overbearing smug lyrics recited by Tennant, who speak-sings suspiciously like a young Al Stewart. The in-joke references and self-amused esoterica strewn throughout songs like "West End Girls" and "Opportunities (Let's Make Lots of Money)" should have precluded their general popularity, but evidently the laxative-smooth synth backing has utilitarian value for clubgoers. Ghastly, depressing and offensive.

The Disco remix album employs an assortment of American dubmen (Shep Pettibone, Arthur Baker, the Latin Rascals and others) for extended versions of those two songs, plus "In the Night" (the B-side of "Opportunities") and other selections from Please: the dreamy "Love Comes Quickly" (botched by the incongruous ticking sequencers) and the sarcastic "Suburbia," subtitled here "The Full Horror" and loaded with barking dogs and other ambient ephemera. A crackling snare drum on "West End Girls" is likewise an extraneous annoyance. While it's nice that the pair can acknowledge the crassness of their motives, how much better does that make the music sound?

Virtually a sonic translation of the ambivalent cynical fiction of writers like Jay McInerney and Bret Easton Ellis that became popular around the same time, the uncertain attitudinal incoherence of Please is traded for a decisive formula on actually, a crafty album of naked '80s yuppie-dom (or, of course, a scathing indictment thereof) with songs like "Shopping" and "Rent" offering incisive social satire (or merely basking in the fruits of stardom). To be fair, the duo's melodic sense shows remarkable improvement, and the well-arranged record (entirely programmed on Fairlight synthesizer) draws as much from Abbey Road as Kraftwerk. Tennant's voice has lost none of its creepy unctuousness and songs like the abominable "One More Chance" are virtual rewrites of past hits. But "It's a Sin" has a brilliant refrain, and Dusty Springfield's guest vocals on "What Have I Done to Deserve This?" salvage that tune handily. In early 1988, actually was reissued in the US with a second disc containing two versions of "Always on My Mind" (the Willie Nelson hit) and "Do I Have To?"

The following year, the Pet Shop Boys wrote, "performed" and produced the magnificent "Nothing Has Been Proved" for Springfield to sing on the Scandal soundtrack. The pair played much the same role on Liza Minnelli's ungodly Results. Co-producing the record with their frequent studio collaborator, Julian Mendelsohn, the Pet Shop Boys did a lot of the programming and wrote most of the material, leaving Liza to emoté absurdly over coy and starkly inappropriate songs like "Don't Drop Bombs" and "I Want You Now." (Actually, a schmaltzy remake of "Rent" doesn't come off too badly.) Slathering strings (arranged by Art of Noise) Anne Dudley and Twin Peaks composer Angelo Badalamenti) on top of pulsing synthesizers creates the superficial impression of a sympathetic environment for the melodramatic chanteuse, but the vast stylistic gap between singer and songs makes the record comical.

The boring and redundant Introspective jams six songs (four of them also issued as singles) into 48 minutes, largely dispensing with such needless formalities as melody in favor of protracted pre-mixed dance grooves. "Always on My Mind" makes a repeat appearance in a nine-minute house version; "Left to My Own Devices," which employs an orchestra, is yet another of Tennant's droll and insufferable diary entries; "Domino Dancing" deftly inserts a salsa breakdown into the middle of a standard mid-tempo concoction.

Where Introspective revealed absolutely nothing about the men behind the smug facade, "Being Boring," the first song on Behavior, is downright generous in its reflective view of the band's shifting existence and the decimation wrought by AIDS. Co-produced by Harold Faltermeyer, the album returns to the lush and tuneful musicality of actually, with Tennant singing lyrics that are, for a change, not simply irritating. While "How You Can Expect to Be Taken Seriously?" provocatively addresses an unnamed pop star, "Jealousy" and "So Hard"—both touching breakup songs—and the new-love "Nervously" prove that Tennant can actually manage emotional conviction in his lyrics and delivery. Opening the Pet Shop door to a bit of equally unfamiliar musical styles, Johnny Marr is one of two guest guitarists. [i]

See also New Order.

BOB PFEIFER

See Human Switchboard.

P-FUNK ALL-STARS

See George Clinton.

PHANTOM, ROCKER & SLICK

See Stray Cats.

PHANTOM 309

A Sinister Alphabet (Tupelo) 1989 •

With cover art and lettering by Edward Gorey (uncle of bassist Mac McNeilly, who left P309 to become the drummer in Jesus Lizard) and production by Jon Langford (Mekons/Three Johns), all this erstwhile trio—self-billed as the biggest band in Picayune, Mississippi—had to do was show up on its first record to make its small cultural impact. A dish of gutter-level grungeabilly and cohesively crude rock noise distinguished by guitarist John Forbes' devilish growl, A Sinister Alphabet simmers with backwoods weirdness and domineering intensity. There may not be much difference between songs like "Beaver Hollow Turnaround," "Slowboat to China" and "Janitor to the Stars," but Phantom 309's demento racket easily slinks below such petty criticisms.

See also Jesus Lizard.

[i]

PHANTOM TOLLBOOTH

Phantom Tollbooth EP (Homestead) 1986

One-Way Conversation (Homestead) 1987 •

Power Toy (Homestead) 1988 •

Daylight in the Quiet Zone EP (Homestead) 1990

Some of those prone to facile analogies have compared this latter-day power trio led by guitarist Dave Rick (an early member of Yo La Tengo and a frequent participant in Bongwater and B.A.L.L. before joining King Missile fulltime in 1990) to Hüsker Dü and the Minutemen, but New York's Phantom Tollbooth was more like a trash-inflected version of Fred Frith's Masacre than anything else. (In all fairness, the inclusion of an original song entitled "Flip Your Wig" on Phantom Tollbooth didn't help matters.) Various art-rock influences—quick tempo shifts, the occasional jazzy swing and the use of noise as a genuine musical element (rather than a cheap way to telegraph rage or intensity)—gave these guys away.

That said, it must be added that Tollbooth's addition of vocals to its heady and complex clamor wasn't always the greatest thing for the music. One-Way Conversation and Power Toy (which has a pretty funny version of Heart's "Barracuda" and two bonus tracks on CD) contain the band's best, most focused work, a striking synthesis of the art-rock that so clearly influenced its song structures and the frenzied attack of hardcore. [gk]

BINKY PHILIPS

Binky Philips EP (Caroline) 1987

Sixteen years after his band, the Planets, first opened for the New York Dolls, this Manhattan scene veteran finally made his first record. Whew! Amazingly, he seems none the worse for wear. The five songs cut live at CBGB sound pretty darned fresh: an infectiously rockin' plea for peace (between lovers? friends? countries?), a power pop love song (slight but durable), a nasty slice of early Elvis Costello-meets-Pete Townshend (or, how to say goodbye to an ex-lover with no physical violence but still be guilty of assault and battery), a regretful farewell that's sort of a wailin' hard-rock hoedown and a sardonic expression—in loud, modern guitar-funkatiousness—of the hoary dictum, "Nothing's Free." It all hangs together by virtue of Philips' strong guitar playing and savvy (if a bit hoarse) vocals, and the tight, punchy rhythms of his cohorts, the Max-Gang of Four. League of Gentlemen bassist Sara Lee and drummer Mick Leyland. [tr]

PHILTHY PHIL AND FAST EDDIE

See Motorhead.

PHRANC

Folksinger (Rhino) 1985 (Island) 1990 ●
I Enjoy Being a Girl (Island) 1989 ●
Positively Phranc (Island) 1991 ☐

Looking like a buzz-cut Matt Dillon on the cover of her first album, California's Phranc—a veteran of such punk bands as Nervous Gender and Catholic Discipline—is an otherwise tradition-minded descendant of such '60s protest singers as Bob Dylan, Phil Ochs, Joan Baez and Tom Paxton. Phranc's topical songs, performed with simple beauty on acoustic guitar, address various subjects and personalities of current interest, from women athletes to Marvel's Pope comic book to "Female Mudwrestling" to Los Angeles' celebrity coroner, Thomas Noguchi. Taking one too many cues from Dylan, there's an unnecessary reading of his chilling "Lonesome Death of Hattie Carroll" and several overly similar originals. Phranc's not a timeless melodicist, but her wry lyrical observations and attractive singing make Folksinger a fine effort. The 1990 reissue adds "Everywhere I Go (I Hear the Go-Go's)."

Phranc can barely suppress the giggles as she croons the absurdly outdated Rodgers and Hammerstein song—several layers of gay and feminist irony here—for which she named her second album. I Enjoy Being a Girl, produced by Violent Femme Victor DeLorenzo, has incidental instrumental accompaniment on a few jazzy numbers but is otherwise another one-woman/one-guitar show. Phranc's concerns here are white guilt ("Blood-bath"), the trendiness of acoustic performers ("Folksinger"), family (the tender "Myriam and Esther"), pets (the winsome "Rodeo Parakeet"), mindless emblem wearing (the clumsily righteous "Take off Your Swastika") and a tennis heroine ("M-A-R-T-I-N-A"). Ace. [i]

PIANOSAURUS

Live at the Speakeasy NYC [tape] 1985
Live at Folk City [tape] 1985
Groovy Neighborhood (Rounder) 1987 ●
Back to School (unreleased)

High concept on a low budget: New York-region trio Pianosaurus plays Alex Garvin's charmingly light-hearted pop songs entirely on toy instruments for a tikki-takki effect that only adds to their winsome adorability. Plinking away on itzy-bitsy pianos, cheapie organs, kiddie guitars, baby drum kits and plastic horns with sincerity and enthusiasm, Pianosaurus proves that big-people equipment isn't necessary for big-people music. (Groovy Neighborhood's renditions of Chuck Berry's "Memphis" and John Lee Hooker's "Dimples" indicate that the gambit can work on well-known songs without any diminution of delight.) Peter Holsapple of the dB's produced this warm and wonderful debut.

In 1988, Pianosaurus appeared in Francis Ford Coppola's segment of the New York Stories, and on the accompanying soundtrack, playing the title song of their second album in a version produced by Chris Butler. Then things went awry. With the Back to School album in the can, Garvin skipped town, apparently following in the emotional footprints of his musical influences, Brian Wilson and Alex Chilton. Rounder decided against releasing the record.

It's a shame the LP has yet to see the light of day. Pianosaurus' lost album shows the group growing up without straying far from the debut's ingenious urban-pastoral whimsy. Still performed exclusively on toys, the sophomore effort finds Garvin's bandmates playing greater roles. Drummer Steve Dansiger and keyboardist Bianca "Flystrip" Miller join in on tasty harmonies throughout, lending depth to the sound; each gets a lead vocal. [i/ws]

CHARLIE PICKETT AND THE EGGS

Live at the Button (Open) 1982 (Safety Net) 1988
Cowboy Junkie Au-Go-Go EP (Open) 1984 (Safety Net) 1988 ●

CHARLIE PICKETT

Route 33 (Twin/Tone) 1986

CHARLIE PICKETT & THE MC3

The Wilderness (Safety Net) 1988 ●

Pickett may have led the new wave bar band; on the Eggs' records, these Floridians throw original tunes in with covers of wildly varying notoriety, shake it all up and pour out fiery stuff. That Pickett's own tunes often compare favorably to those he chooses to cover makes their scarcity on the live LP disappointing, and using three tunes by the Pirates (during and after Johnny Kidd) and three written or adopted by the Flamin' Groovies on one album is a bit much, even if Pickett's slide work and the nasty ensemble nearly makes numbers like "Slow Death" sound newly minted. (Other borrowings come from Manfred Mann and Lou Reed.)

For their long-awaited second vinyl outing, the Eggs took to the studio and cut five songs, including the great Miami localisms of "Overtown" and "Marlboro Town," a dopey "Louie Louie" adaptation that was a local hit two decades ago for its author, Charlie's cousin Mark Markham. (Markham also penned "If This Is Love, Can I Get My Money Back?") which is included on the live LP and was also recorded and issued as a 1982 Pickett single.) Even without the special charge they get onstage, the Eggs reel off true-blue high-energy rockers, further establishing guitarist John Salton as a first-rate student of Thunders, Fogerty and Sky Saxon (not to mention a dead-great slide player). It's hard to believe this band isn't as big a global legend as it deserves to be.

Egless, but joined by such sympathetic grunge talents as ex-Panther Burns guitarist Jim Duckworth and Maureen Tucker, Charlie is still burning with unquenchable rock'n'roll fire on Route 33. The material is almost entirely Pickett's; Minneapolis legend Chris Osgood produced it to resemble an old Stones album from a real ethnic American perspective. A little bit blues, a little bit country, but strictly bullshit-free, the album is a straightforward electric charge from a real heartlands original.

The Wilderness finds Pickett howling and rocking at top form with a new backing band. The Magic City (Miami, that is) Three includes ex-Egg Salton, whose blistering blues-based guitar excitement provides fiery encouragement for Pickett's plain and emotional singing which, at times, recalls Neil Young's mournful country wail. Covers of a twelve-bar blues and a gospel song, both penned by Son House, and an electrifying new rendition of "If This Is Love" settle in nicely alongside such new originals as "Religion or Pleasure" and the cowboy saga, "Destry Rides Again."

The CD of The Wilderness contains Cowboy Junkie Au-Go-Go. That record was also re-released in an expanded edition that appends the contents of Pickett's first two singles and a track from a compilation cassette. [jg/i]

JEFFREY LEE PIERCE

See Gun Club.

PIG

A Poke in the Eye ... with a Sharp Stick (Wax Trax!) 1988 •

Although he subsequently got Jim (Foetus) Thirwell to produce a 12-inch single, Raymond (Pig) Watts managed to record the exceedingly Foetuslike Poke in the Eye with just a bunch of German guitarists and percussionists. A powerfully bestial singer with an outraged lyrical view ("Scumsberg," "It Toll for Thee (Pig-breath)," "Shit for Brains") and a good sense of rhythm, Pig also has a surprising lighter side that nearly derails the record. But when Watts revs up a thundering herd of angry noise, Pig can be a real party animal. [i] See also Foetus Inc.

PIGBAG

Dr. Heckle and Mr. Jive (Stiff) 1982

Lend an Ear (nr/Y) 1983

Pigbag Live (nr/Y) 1983

Favourite Things (nr/Y) 1983

Discology: The Best of Pigbag [CD] (nr/Kaz) 1987 •

Bristol's Pigbag was an instrumental sextet with a four-piece brass-and-reed section. The music they played—mostly uptempo, Latin-tinged jazz-funk—was good fun for the length of a 1981 single, and "Papa's Got a Brand New Pigbag" was duly a big dancefloor hit. Stretched out over an album, though, the band's writing limitations become stultifyingly clear.

Dr. Heckle and Mr. Jive contains three variations on the "Papa" formula and a couple of slower cuts that reveal a band with plenty of technical know-how and nothing to say. Following a second studio album and a poorly received live set, Pigbag called it a day. Favourite Things and the CD-only Discology are retrospectives, the latter containing "Papa's Got a Brand New Pigbag" in both its album and 12-inch remix versions. [si]

PINK CADILLAC

See Treat Her Right.

PINK FAIRIES

See Social Deviants.

PINK MILITARY

Blood and Lipstick EP (nr/Eric's) 1979

Do Animals Believe in God? (nr/Eric's) 1980

PINK INDUSTRY

Forty-Five EP (nr/Zulu) 1982

Low Technology (nr/Zulu) 1983

Who Told You, You Were Naked (nr/Zulu) 1983

New Beginnings (nr/Zulu) 1985

Pink Industry (nr/Cathexis) 1988

With many of her early Liverpool compatriots on their way to worldwide fame and fortune, singer Jayne Casey formed Pink Military after the short-lived but seminal Big in Japan folded in 1978. Pink Military's one album, recorded after two years and numerous lineup changes, is an eclectically derivative (yet amusing) hodgepodge that is neither stunningly original nor disgustingly clichéd.

After Pink Military ended, Casey joined up with bassist/keyboardist Ambrose Reynolds (a onetime member of Frankie Goes to Hollywood), adding a guitarist after the first album, and continued to evade commercial success as Pink Industry Inhabiting and exploring an original world of sound and vision, Pink Industry sounded something like Siouxsie Sioux fronting Japan, using bits of guitar, bass, drums, electronics and found audio to weave a fascinating soft cushion for Casey's plain vocals. As the trio progressed (Casey's vocals on the later records are a big improvement), their efforts turned more towards alluringly textured layers of electronics, making the group's end all the more regrettable.

Pink Industry, released during a surprising spurt of UK interest in the by-then-defunct band, is a fine condensation of the three albums that adds a pair of alternate versions, a remix of "What I Wouldn't Give" and the otherwise unissued "Cruel Garden." [sg/i]

See also Big in Japan.

PIXIES

Come on Pilgrim (nr/4AD) 1987 (4AD-Rough Trade) 1988 •

Surfer Rosa (4AD-Rough Trade) 1988 •

Gigantic EP (nr/4AD) 1988 •

Doolittle (4AD-Elektra) 1989 •

Monkey Gone to Heaven EP (4AD-Elektra) 1989 •

Here Comes Your Man EP (4AD-Elektra) 1989 •

Bossanova (4AD-Elektra) 1990 •

With so much of what was once the rock underground drifting towards shamefaced respectability and mainstream acceptance, the Pixies reclaimed the land of the disenfranchised with a lively, thoughtful new outlook and unique sounds for these disturbing times. As a result, the quartet quickly became the darlings of college radio and have grown into major stars for those who no longer believe in R.E.M.

The Pixies hail from such diverse locales as Ohio, the Philippines, California and Boston, where the group assembled in 1986. Following Throwing Muses onto Britain's 4AD label, they debuted with Come on Pilgrim, an eight-song explosion (recorded, roughly, as a demo) of gritty art passion: strummed and scratched acoustic and electric guitars, vocals sung and shrieked in English and Spanish, rhythms that race, rest and drift. The fuzzy chaos alternates noisy pop melodicism with primal anarchy; fervid singer Black (Charles) Francis' lyrics, when audible, skew towards surprising, occasionally shocking terrain. Difficult and intriguing.

Ex-rock crit/Big Black mainman (not yet established as a bigtime underground studio maven) Steve Albini produced Surfer Rosa, giving the Pixies a virulent, slashing guitar sound and organizing drummer David Lovering and bassist Mrs John Murphy (Kim Deal) into a stronger, surer rhythm unit. A sturdy grasp on melody and the importance of good—not necessarily pleasant—vocals (Francis and Murphy) make songs like "Bone Machine," "Gigantic," "Vamos" (reprised from Pilgrim) and the crazed B-52's noise parody of "Tony's Theme" into gripping rock that equally invites dancing and bewildered headshaking. (The CD of Surfer Rosa includes Come on Pilgrim.)

Taking the spotlight off Francis, the Gigantic 12-inch features Deal singing on all four of its tracks: superior remakes (produced by Gil Norton) of the title tune and "River Euphrates" (another Surfer Rosa number) and exciting live renditions of "Vamos" and "Heaven," a brief song borrowed from the Eraserhead soundtrack.

Doolittle is the apotheosis of the Pixies' art, a tension-filled blend of abrasion and balm that shifts uneasily between the freakout horror of "Debaser," the catchy pop of "Here Comes Your Man," the punky roar of "Crackity Jones," the melodic surf-noise of "Wave of Mutilation" and the unnerving calm of "Monkey Gone to Heaven" (which even incorporates a string quartet). Norton's production helps rein in Francis' excessive tendencies (not that he doesn't still manage some merciless shrieking) and harnesses Joey Santiago's guitar to striking effect. Overall, fine songwriting and clearly articulated performances demonstrate the band's visionary self-awareness.

The Monkey EP has three non-LP studio tracks: two variations on a theme ("Manta Ray" and "Dancing the Manta Ray") and the silly "Weird at My School." Here Comes Your Man has a really slow live rendition of "Wave of Mutilation" as well as "Into the White" and "Bailey's Walk," half-assed studio productions that sound like abandoned song demos.

Whether the result of too much praise and power or merely a creative drought, Bossanova is a major drag, a bad-sounding record with little variety or invention, few good songs (the lyrics are especially trivial) and an annoying atmosphere of smug indifference. Reasonably well-crafted tracks like "Velouria," "The Happening," "Blown Away" and "Allison," all of which would have been fine secondary items on Doolittle, are hardly adequate to carry an album on their own, and the rest of Bossanova offers them neither support nor competition.

See also Breeders. [i]

HONEST JOHN PLAIN

See Boys, Lurkers.

PLAN B

Plan B EP (Ger. Wall City) 1985

Three Songs by Plan B EP (Ger. Wall City) 1986

Fortune Favors Fools (Ger. Wall City) 1986

The Greenhouse Effect (RCA) 1990 •

Fervent young Germans with a love for English-speaking bands, Plan B have emerged from the shadows of heavies like U2 and the Clash to become solid rockers in their own right. The quintet's debut EP is marked by good intentions and an obvious delight at being able to create a ruckus: "Gimme the Reason" is a fine, foot-stomping shoutalong.

The Three Songs EP (recorded as a four-piece) has the same mixture of grit and grandiosity that made London Calling so electrifying. If these guys are simply following Strummer and crew, they're doing a damn fine job of it.

Fortune Favors Fools boasts a five-man lineup and a full complement of ingredients: insistent vocals à la Midnight Oil's Peter Garrett, edgy guitars and crackin' drums. "Stop These Men," "House of Decline" and others resonate with the inflamed passions unleashed in the quest for a meaningful existence. When they sing "It's the sound of us/Trying to break free" in "Plan B," it's hard not to cheer 'em on.

Bolstered by increased confidence and, for the first time, slick, professional production (by Pat Collier), Plan B became an impressive rockin' machine on The Greenhouse Effect, the quartet's first Stateside release. Still in dogged pursuit of truth, justice and electric epiphanies, they fight the cool fight on "Mad World," "The Day to Be Jesus," "Devil's Train," etc. Comparisons no longer apply. [jy]

PLANET WILSON

See Red Guitars.

PLAN 9

Frustration (Voxc) 1982 •

Dealing with the Dead (Midnight) 1984

Plan 9 (Fr. New Rose) 1984

I've Just Killed a Man I Don't Want to See Any Meat (Midnight) 1985

Keep Your Cool and Read the Rules (Pink Dust) 1985 •

Anytime Anyplace Anywhere EP (Pink Dust) 1986

Sea Hunt (Enigma) 1987 •

Ham and Sam Jammin' (Restless) 1989 •

BRIAN T. & PLAN 9

"Hideaway" EP (Midnight) 1984

BRENT HOSIER

The Secret That Lies (Fr. New Rose) 1987

Outside of its art college, Rhode Island hasn't exactly been a storehouse for modern rock music. But the state has a group to be proud of in Plan 9, whose Frustration is exciting garage psychedelia. The swirling, mesmerizing effect of four (!) guitars recalls the best of the late '60s and gives able support to Eric Stumpo's emotional vocals. There are no original songs here, just covers of period gems like Them's "I Can Only Give You Everything."

The French-only Plan 9 is an assortment of 1981-'84 studio recordings (plus a live cut) by various lineups, including a poppy five-piece fronted by singer/guitarist Brian Thomas. (Three songs—two of which overlap the LP—by that formulation also appear on the “Hideaway” maxi-single.) Surprisingly, these recordings manage to hang together as an album.

Dealing with the Dead features eight originals, played with a '60s sound so convincing you'll swear you can smell incense burning. Stumpo's vocals are great, a whiny growl cross-breeding Michael J. Pollard and John Kay; the massed guitars and Deborah DeMarco's atmospheric keyboards increase the sense of déjà entendu even further. Far more convincing than a lot of other similar-minded outfits, Plan 9 knows just how to launch a magic carpet ride to the center of your mind. Diabolical.

I've Just Killed a Man is a steamy live album recorded as a six-piece in Boston, Washington, DC, New Haven and back home in Providence. A trio of ace covers, including the MC5's “Looking at You,” and a guest appearance by head Lyre Jeff Conolly on “I'm Gone” add extra excitement to the spirited fun.

Keep Your Cool covers lots of stylistic ground, including the film noir ambience of “Street of Painted Lips” sung by DeMarco, an unclassifiable rollicking instrumental (“King 9 Will Not Return”) and various stripes of '60s rock, running the stylistic gamut from Spirit to Steppenwolf. Although some are a little undeveloped, the band's songs are solid; the two covers are righteously arcane.

Anytime Anyplace Anywhere is a five-song EP of new material, including the title tune and “Green Animals.”

A revised seven-person lineup on Sea Hunt cuts the guitar army down to three and adds a female sax player. The LP removes Plan 9 from revivalism, leaving in the resulting vacuum a rather plain-sounding rock band with a predilection for guitar solos. Sea Hunt is by no means bad, but the lack of focus creates an imbalance that Stumpo's unexciting originals don't resolve. The dreamy title track drifts along aimlessly for almost fourteen instrumental minutes; it's followed by the Ramonesque eleven-second “Human Mertzies.” Faced with a choice of the lady or the tiger, Plan 9 fluffs it.

Eric, Debora and the rhythm section from Sea Hunt drafted a cool new lead singer named Pip and made Ham and Sam Jammin' as an economical quintet. Although the band's direction hasn't really changed, the elimination of two guitarists leaves DeMarco's colorful keyboards room to stretch out and be noticed; a guest violinist provides a provocative alternative to Stumpo's fevered riffing on most of the songs. Overall, Ham and Sam is better than Sea Hunt, although still nowhere as wacky or enjoyable as the band's early work.

Virginian singer/guitarist Hosier was in Plan 9 briefly (he appears on half of Keep Your Cool); his intriguing and not overly stylized psychpunk solo album is a weird blend of David Bowie's Anthony Newley vocal period, a variety of players' brisk guitar work and colorful songs inspired by exploitation films. [cpl/i]

PLASMATICS

New Hope for the Wretched (Stiff America) 1980
Beyond the Valley of 1984 (Stiff America) 1981 •

Metal Priestess EP (Stiff America) 1981 •

Coup d'État (Capitol) 1982

WENDY O. WILLIAMS

W.O.W. (Passport) 1984

Kommander of Kaos (Gigasaurus) 1986

Maggots: The Record (Profile) 1987

ULTRAFLY AND THE HOMETOWN GIRLS

Deffestl and Boddestl (Defest Disc-Profile) 1988

New Hope for the Wretched, “produced” by Jimmy Miller, represents the Plasmatics' first stage—mere artless gimmickry—as conceived by the group's manager and lyricist, ex-porn entrepreneur Rod Swenson. Former sex-show queen Wendy O. Williams hoarsely talks/shouts/heavy-breathes lyrics jumbling the psychotronic film aesthetic (sex, violence, gratuitous grotesqueries) accompanied by a band playing with no subtlety whatever at punk speed and volume, reprising the “best” bits of the ‘Matics’ preceding proto-hardcore indie singles (e.g., Williams buzzsawing a guitar in half). Entertaining for its sheer crassness perhaps, though hardly listenable.

Beyond the Valley of 1984, though, is quite listenable, if only intermittently memorable. Swenson's lyrics aspire to nightmares of apocalypse and superhuman lust and degradation. The music is likewise heavier, but clearer and not without flashes of finesse: punchy drums (courtesy of guest Neal Smith, once in Alice Cooper), good guitar squeals from Swenson's main writing collaborator, Richie Stotts, and even a culture-shock backing-vocals appearance by the girl-group Angels. (The CD, released many moons later on the PVC label, appends Metal Priestess.)

Metal Priestess—25 minutes at a sub-LP price—is the best buy of the lot: smokin' live versions of two of Beyond's best, not to mention proof that Williams can sweetly carry a tune, as grim as it is (“Lunacy”). Coproduced by Dan Hartman (!) and Swenson, it captures the band in mid-transition to metal; part of that change included the departure (early in the project) of Beauvoir for his solo and production career.

Wendy kicks off the awkwardly metallicized Coup d'État with some superhuman screaming (a complement, really!), but it's downhill from there. While Side A's simpleminded messages—“Put Your Love in Me,” “Stop” (“the rape of the earth”), etc.—are capped by an adequate take on Motörhead's “No Class,” the lyrics on the backside echo the fever-dreams of Beyond and Priestess, but less compellingly.

When Stotts left (to form the Richie Stotts Experience and King Flux, which also included Marc Bell between stints in the Ramones) it was decided to drop the Plasmatics name. In came Michael Ray to play flashy licks, and Williams' transformation to metal priestess was complete. With writing and performing help from Kiss bandmates, Gene Simmons produced W.O.W., on which Wendy sounds like a hoarse Joan Jett doing Kiss outtakes.

K.O.K. is modestly successful speedy metal and speedmetal, but the sex-goddess role-playing (Motörhead's “Jailbait,” “Bad Girl,” “Fk That Booty”) falls as flat as ever; Williams' voice has always been too tough for that. Her singing is much more suited to the apocalyptic world-domination concept album that followed. Maggots isn't all that bad, but how much attention can you focus on a subject that gross?

Defest! and Baddest! is (gulp) Wendy O's rap album. [jg]

See also Jean Beauvoir, Motörhead.

PLASTIC BERTRAND

Plastic Bertrand AN1 (nr/Sire) 1978

Ça Plane pour Moi (Sire) 1978

J'te Fais un Plan (Bel. RKM) 1979

L'Album (Can. Attic) 1980

Grands Succès/Greatest Hits (Can. Attic) 1981

Plastiquez Vos Baffles (Can. Attic) 1982

One of the first punk gag records and still one of the greatest, "Ça Plane pour Moi" was a major European hit in late '77 and early '78, launching the career of blond Belgian pretty boy Roger Joutet, aka Plastic Bertrand. Scuttlebutt at the time claimed Bertrand was the invention of some anonymous French studio pranksters; in fact, Joutet had already played drums in an earlier Belgian punk trio called Hubble Bubble (whose one LP was notable for a trashy cover of the Kinks' "I'm Not Like Everybody Else"). Together with producer/songwriter Lou Deprijck, he created the persona of Plastic Bertrand, a jolly satire on the safety-pin image and jackhammer crunch of punk.

"Ça Plane pour Moi" ("This Life's for Me") is truly great dumbness—Bertrand singing verbose, seemingly nonsensical French lyrics over a classic three-chord Ramones roar with Spectorish saxs and a winning falsetto "oooh-weee-oooh" on the chorus. Ça Plane pour Moi (the US title of Plastic Bertrand AN1, released first in Belgium, then in England) also contains more of the hilarious same—a spirited remake of the Small Faces' "Sha La La La Lee" and "What! What!," wherein Bertrand does barnyard animal imitations.

J'te Fais un Plan has two limp reggae entries actually recorded in Jamaica (the title song and "Hit 78") and a sugary-sweet ballad ("Affection") dedicated to Jonathan Richman. More interesting is the ten-minute electro-disco "Tout Petit la Planète," a blatant Kraftwerk cop tarted up with a nagging hook and a rich synthesizer sound—predating by two years the synth-pop confections of the Human League and OMD.

L'Album is for the true P-Bert devotee, its more tightly formulaic new wave pop distinguished only by a catchy vanilla-funk rap track, "Stop ou Encore," which bears a passing similarity to Blondie's "Rapture." Greatest Hits collects his big European successes, adding a pair of live tracks. [df]

PLASTICLAND

Pop! Op Drops EP (Scadillac) 1982

Color Appreciation (Fr. Lolita) 1984

Plasticland (Pink Dust) 1985

Wonder Wonderful Wonderland (Pink Dust) 1985 •

Salon (Pink Dust) 1987 •

Confetti (Midnight) 1990

Let's Play Pollyanna EP (Ger. Repulsion) 1990 •

Following several 7-inch EPs and 45s on their own label, this time-warped psychedelic quartet from Milwaukee (the successor to a legendary band called Arousing Polaris) began issuing wonderful albums of original acid-paisley retro-rock.

Except for two track substitutions, the pink-vinyl Plasticland is the same LP as the French Color Appreciation; both contain all four songs from Pop! Op Drops. Adding two bonus cuts, the cassette of Plasticland contains the whole kit and kaboodle: seventeen slices of droning delight, including a Pretty Things tune and such evocative band creations as "Euphoric Trapdoor Shoes," "Rattail Comb" and "Driving Accident Prone." Wonder Wonderful Wonderland features such giddy items as "Grassland of Reeds and Things," "Processes of the Silverness" and "Fairytale Hysteria." Charming, whimsical, stylish, exciting, witty and utterly entertaining.

Salon puts an even less selfconscious twist on things (although the faint British component in Glenn Rehse's accent argues against that) and displays an easy command of swinging London art-school power pop psychedelia. Armed with a mellotron and other relevant instruments, Plasticland shoots delicious flashes of Manfred Mann, frilly-shirt-era Who and Stones, Yardbirds and Magical Mystery Tour into their creations, making Salon an incisive nostalgia exercise that transcends its basis to stand on its own merits. A remarkably good time.

Confetti presents songs from all of the band's albums (plus a game stab at a section of George Harrison's Wonderwall soundtrack) in churning, stripped-down live versions that attest to the fundamental strength of Plasticland's uncanny melodic sense. Despite inconsistent production, the Let's Play Pollyanna EP (three tracks on 12-inch, four on CD) is a welcome return to the studio, with a rockingly memorable title track (also available in a live rendition on Confetti) and some enjoyably experimental B-sides. [i/hd]

See also Social Deviants.

PLASTICS

Welcome Plastics (Jap. Invitation) 1979 •

Origato (Jap. Invitation) 1980

Welcome Plastics (nr/Island) 1981

Plastics (Island) 1981

HAJIME TACHIBANA

H (Jap. Yen-Alfa) 1982

Hm (Ralph) 1984

Mr. Techie & Miss Kipple (Jap. Alfa) 1984

Taiyo-Sun (Jap. School) 1986

Those who have only experienced Plastics through their lone Western album release—the English Welcome and its American equivalent, Plastics, an Alex Sadkin-dulled production of inferior remakes of material from the band's first two albums—are missing out on the Japanese quintet's best work.

The original Japanese albums—Welcome Plastics and Origato—are marvelous and well worth finding for fans of extreme kitsch and quirk. Sung in English by Toshio Nakanishi and Chica Sato, the Plastics' ultra-perky art-pop (played on guitar and synth) takes its cues from American culture of the '60s as portrayed by the B-52's and Devo. Jumpy and clever, nervous and zany, the group takes Western ideals of technology and commercialism and makes catchy Asian sport of them. The first album's song titles say it all: "Digital Watch,"

“Too Much Information,” “Robot,” “I Am Plastic,” “Top Secret Man.” (There’s also a silly cover of “Last Train to Clarksville”); Origato includes the Plastics’ rendition of “Eight Days a Week.”) A great, cool, original band that might just as well be from Mars.

Following Plastics’ breakup at the end of 1981, Tachibana put down his guitar in favor of exploring jazz sax, resulting in H, a diverting album which is wacky but not silly—his commitment to this musical path is no less sincere for its synthesis with what he helped develop in Plastics.

On Hm, his saxisms are a touch artier and less light-heartedly playful, but it’s still a fun record. Primitive drums (or were they copped from a ‘40s B-movie conga line production number?) are often used to underpin “outside” jazz sax charts and solos, interlarded with quieter numbers minus bass and drums in which pretty melodies are stated. Odd but ingratiating.

With Yukihiro Takahashi producing and supplying occasional drums, the synth-oriented Mr. Techie & Miss Kipple just doesn’t make it. The menu: a James Brown tribute that goes on too long, oddball instrumentals (including one Tachibana wrote with Devo’s Mark Mothersbaugh) that are interesting at best and irritating at worst, a stiff Plastics rehash and a poker-faced hymn professing “No Disappointment in Jesus” (delivered in a low and slurry half-speed voice). Weird yet uninviting. [i/jg]

PLAYHOUSE

Gazebo Princess (Twin/Tone) 1987

Soul Asylum’s Dave Pirner co-produced Gazebo Princess, this uncommon Minneapolis trio’s rawboned mini-album debut. Skittish, disorienting syncopation supports guitarist Eric Haugesag’s distorted power-’n’jazz chords and throaty vocals in a punk-folk-jazz hybrid that derives equally from Killing Joke, the Minutemen and Love. Melodic but no less challenging than the flintier tracks that surround them, “My Eyes” and “Rule No. 1” are standouts that indicate the extent of Playhouse’s potential. [i]

MARTIN PLAZA

See Mental as Anything.

PLIMSOUHS

Zero Hour EP (Beat) 1980

The Plimsouhs (Planet) 1981

Everywhere at Once (Geffen) 1983

One Night in America (Fr. Fan Club) 1988 ●

LA’s Plimsouhs were one of numerous bands which were sucked up by record-label power pop madness in the Knack’s wake. Following a short independent recording career, they signed a big deal and made one fine LP that didn’t sell. That was very nearly the end of that.

Heaps of promise are already evident on the cheap-sounding Zero Hour 12-inch EP. Fronted by sharp-voiced Peter Case (formerly Paul Collins’ bandmate in the Nerves), the Plimsouhs toss out enough cutting harmonies and nifty guitar licks to recall Beatles VI, although their spirit is totally fresh and beyond nostalgia, the aggression modern.

That promise is fulfilled on The Plimsouhs, the band’s first major-label LP, which trims only the raggedest edges to showcase vibrant, hummable tunes like “Now.” The Plimsouhs’ affection for ‘60s soul also gets a tumble via the use of a horn section and a hot cover of “Mini-Skirt Minnie.”

The band’s relationship with Planet soured soon after the LP stiffed, and the Plimsouhs left the label to make a wonderful independent 12-inch called “A Million Miles Away.” In a show of enormous resilience (both commercial and individual), the Plimsouhs subsequently joined the Geffen roster and produced Everywhere at Once, re-recording that memorable single alongside a batch of similarly strong new ones, all bubbling with undiminished fire and melody. Lyrics, however, show signs of frustration: “How Long Will It Take?,” “My Life Ain’t Easy,” “Play the Breaks.” But the Plimsouhs were never to hit the big time, and soon faded away.

The posthumously released One Night in America captures a live set from 1981, mixing original tunes with some fine vintage covers. Recorded during the Plimsouhs’ cocky, hard-rocking prime, it’s a fitting epitaph for an underappreciated band. [jy/i/hd]

See also Peter Case, dB’s, Walking Wounded.

PLUGZ

Electrify Me (Plugz) 1979 (Enigma) 1990 ●

Better Luck (Fatima) 1981 (Enigma) 1990 ●

SNAKE FARM

What Kind of Dreams Are These (Fr. New Rose) 1989 ●

Featuring guitarist/singer Tito Larriva (later in the Cruzados) and drummer Chalo Quintana (most recently of the Havalinas), this early LA new wave band play sharp and punky rock’n’roll with a strong sense of pop structure on the varied Electrify Me. The title track is mildly reggaeified; there’s also a pre-Los Lobos cover (in Spanish) of “La Bamba” and some folkly detours, but the band never strays too far from an essentially unadventurous core.

The more mainstream Better Luck ups the Plugz’s folk and country sides for a blend of Rank and File (another ex-punk outfit whom they predated) and Tom Petty, displaying a promising rock talent enervated to the point of tedium. (The Plugz subsequently contributed three very divergent songs to the Repo Man soundtrack.)

Years after the Plugz folded, bassist Barry McBride resurfaced as a guitarist leading an atmospheric cowboy band of no fixed lineup. Snake Farm’s album is crisp and taut, resonant Southwestern rock played with unadorned skill and conviction. Given eloquent instrumental support—Dave Alvin and Billy Bremner each make one-song cameos—McBride’s vocals and playing are quite effective, but his often ungainly lyrics need help.

See also Cruzados, Havalinas. [tr]

POET AND THE ROOTS

See Linton Kwesi Johnson.

POGUES

Red Roses for Me (nr/Stiff) 1984 (Stiff-Enigma) 1986 ●
Rum Sodomy & the Lash (Stiff-MCA) 1985 ●
Poguetry in Motion EP (Stiff-MCA) 1986
If I Should Fall from Grace with God (Island) 1987 ●
Peace and Love (Island) 1989 ●
Misty Morning, Albert Bridge EP (nr/WEA) 1989 ●
Yeah Yeah Yeah Yeah EP (Island) 1990 ●
Hell's Ditch (Island) 1990 ●

NIPS 'N' NIPPLE ERECTORS

Bops, Babes, Booze & Bover (nr/Big Beat) 1987

VARIOUS ARTISTS

Straight to Hell (Hell-Enigma) 1987 ●

The London-based Pogues (originally known as Pogue Mahone—Gaelic for “kiss my ass”) are a motley Anglo-Irish agglomeration (at last count an eight-piece) of erstwhile punk rockers—as a young raver, singer/songwriter Shane MacGowan was in the late if unlamented Nipple Erectors (later the Nips), a frisky Ted-style punkabilly-cum-beat quartet memorialized a decade after the fact in the eight-song Bops, Babes, Booze & Bover retrospective; guitarist Philip Chevron led Dublin's estimable Radiators from Space, also in the late '70s—and knockabout folkies. Their repertoire mixes traditional Irish, English and Australian folk songs with an increasing majority of MacGowan's stylistically antiquated originals. Although early supporters of the group conveniently overlooked the existence of genuine folk artists in Great Britain who play traditional music with more knowledge and credibility, the Pogues have managed to transcend such beginnings to hone themselves into a unique and original creation.

The first two albums are exploratory, but both have their fine moments. Concertina, banjo, pipes, guitar, bass, minimal drums, mandolin and the like in the hands of post-rock rebels make for an intriguing blend of old-fashioned and newfangled. Recorded as a drape-jacketed six-piece, Red Roses for Me (the American cassette of which adds three cuts) mixes traditional balladry (“Poor Paddy,” “Greenland Whale Fisheries”) with Shane's derivative but promising creations (“Boys from the County Hell,” “Dark Streets of London”).

Red Roses' rudimentary acoustic instrumentation gave way to relative sophistication on the more varied Rum Sodomy & the Lash (produced by Elvis Costello), which evidences growing stylistic ambition as well. MacGowan, a besotted Tom Waits-like figure with an obvious Brendan Behan/James Joyce Jones, shows increased confidence and talent as a songwriter on numbers like “The Old Main Drag” and “A Pair of Brown Eyes,” notable examples of his gritty, realistic tales of life's urban downside.

Miles better than either of those, however, is Poguetry in Motion: an EP of three new MacGowan songs and a reel. Mixing zydeco with Gaelic soul, “London Girl” is a rousing singalong, an urban travelogue that sounds like the hit of Kevin Rowland's dreams; “A Rainy Night in Soho” plays a hauntingly beautiful Van Morrison-like waltz on piano, with tasteful horns and strings; “The Body of an American” is a drinking song that most closely resembles the Pogues' primal busker sound, with uilleann pipes, martial drums and jolly tin whistle.

Along with Costello and Joe Strummer, the Pogues fell in with director Alex Cox, contributing a pair of tracks to Sid & Nancy, appearing in the motley Straight to Hell and providing the bulk of its soundtrack. Surrounded by contributions by the (Declan) MacManus Gang, Strummer and others, the Pogues offer atmospheric Latinisms like “Rabinga” and Ennio Morricone's “The Good, the Bad and the Ugly,” as well as more European creations like “If I Should Fall from Grace with God” (a preview of their next album) and the traditional “Danny Boy,” recorded as a reunion with ex-bassist Cait O'Riordan.

If I Should Fall from Grace with God is an exciting, strong album that opens new vistas for the Pogues. Almost all of the material is by the band; amidst winningly unreconstructed folk designs (“The Broad Majestic Shannon,” “Medley,” the title tune) is a jazz/swing instrumental (“Metropolis”) and the oddly accented “Turkish Song of the Damned.” But the record's easy standout is another example of the melancholic urban balladeering introduced on Poguetry in Motion: “Fairytale of New York,” a fragile piano-and-strings lullaby with guest vocals by Kirsty MacColl, wife of the album's producer, Steve Lillywhite, and daughter of folk titan Ewan MacColl, whose songs the Pogues have covered.

What were merely digressions on If I Should Fall form the stylistic basis of Peace and Love, an amazing album (also produced by Lillywhite) that redefines the Pogues and demonstrates the enormous breadth of talent the eight men possess. Kicking off with a blistering big-band instrumental (“Gridlock”) and then careening joyously into one of MacGowan's finest folk-rock creations (“White City”), the record is a marvel of rich playing, resonant emotions, sturdy melodies and low tales. In this varied effort, mandolinist Terry Woods offers a fiery acoustic calumny against Oliver Cromwell in “Young Ned of the Hill”; Chevron contributes the rollicking New Orleans-accented “Blue Heaven”; banjo-player Jem Finer chips in with the dramatic “Night Train to Lorca” and a wistful waltz (“Misty Morning, Albert Bridge”). Meanwhile, MacGowan tops things off with “Boat Train,” an engrossing recollection of a drunken voyage, the American-conscious “Cotton Fields” and “London You're a Lady,” ending the album in an orchestral flourish. (The Misty Morning EP offers three album tracks—one in a surprising dub mix—and Finer's “Train of Love.”)

Although the excellent stomping and lusty R&B single “Yeah Yeah Yeah Yeah” was released in 1988, a 12-inch EP built around it—adding a rambunctious banjoed rendition of “Honky Tonk Woman” [sic] and a pair of Irish folk songs (one a Pogues original) performed with the Dubliners (the two bands had previously teamed up on a 1987 single)—suddenly appeared in 1990.

Joe Strummer produced Hell's Ditch, a casually organized musical voyage that spends far too much of its time in Spain and the Mediterranean. While keeping the music close to home, MacGowan drops eight place names in the first three songs (two of which—“The Ghost of a Smile” and “The Sunnyside of the Street”—are positively wonderful examples of Poguetry) but that's only an orientation session. Once the Pogue ship sets sail, he turns cinematic, spinning spaghetti western yarns ("Hell's Ditch," "Lorca's Novena") with sinuous Middle Eastern accents. Before finishing (with an African-styled chant no less), the Pogues try out cocktail jazz (complete with piano and harp), insert what sounds like a Semitic dance melody into Finer's "The Wake of the Medusa" and manage a convincing early-'70s Dylan impression in "5 Green Queens & Jean." Track by track, there's some fine stuff here, but Strummer's casual production and the album's maddening stylistic hopscotch make it, overall, a frustrating exercise.

See also Men They Couldn't Hang. [i]

POI DOG PONDERING

Poi Dog Pondering EP (Texas Hotel) 1988

Circle Around the Sun EP (Texas Hotel) 1989

Poi Dog Pondering (Texas Hotel-Columbia) 1989 •

Wishing Like a Mountain and Thinking Like the Sea (Texas Hotel-Columbia) 1990 •

Fruitless (Texas Hotel-Columbia) 1990 •

As noted by Robert Downey (Sr.) in Putney Swope, you've got to know the rules before you can break the rules. That axiom certainly applies in the world of "alternative" rock, where bands with big dreams must be colorfully offbeat, but not too weird for radio. As such, Poi Dog Pondering—a modern jug band formed on the streets of Waikiki but based in Austin, Texas—is a record industry fantasy, a lovable mongrel bred of gentle folk-rock exotica with richly diverse influences and enough built-in mystique and credibility to last a career. Led by singer/guitarist Frank Orrall, the large ensemble made a delightful debut on Poi Dog Pondering, performing whimsically bright pop songs (like "Living with the Dreaming Body") on a shifting brew of accordion, banjo, horns, fiddle, percussion, acoustic guitar, etc. Despite the potential for instrumental calamity, Poi manages to keep their sound light, leaving plenty of room in the varied arrangements. If Poi were a restaurant, it would be an urban fern bar with a kooky international menu, efficiently run by the children of hippies.

Haunted around the edges by encroaching preciousness and more overt stylistic expeditions (the tenor guitar swing of "Aloha Honolulu," for instance), Circle Around the Sun allows a stronger rock sound ("Wood Guitar" has a crisp backbeat and amplifiers) to shift the stylistic balance a bit. The songs are okay, but the partial loss of innocence is disturbing. (Upon signing the group, Columbia combined the two EPs and reissued them as Poi Dog Pondering, using the front cover art of the first.)

Poi took a step closer towards adult contemporary acceptance on Wishing Like a Mountain, locating a tropical folk-rock headquarters from which to make assorted folk and country sorties, traveling outside national borders to embrace Latin and African styles. The songs are unfailingly pleasant and occasionally wonderful, but the selfconscious granola consciousness of Orrall's lyrics and the slickening sound of inspired amateurism on its way to becoming selfconscious multicultural calculation weighs down the record, punching holes in the group's easy allure. Just where does genuine diversity end and insufferable dilettantism begin? Even if Poi has the decency to acknowledge the designs of "The Ancient Egyptians," crafting a song in the style of Jonathan Richman seems like a condescending academic exercise. (The CD adds two bonus songs, "Big Beautiful Spoon" and "Sugarbush Cushman.")

The Fruitless mini-album is a patchwork assortment: three live cuts, a remix from Wishing, covers of New Order ("Love Vigilantes," given the folk treatment it so obviously merits) and Canned Heat ("Going Up the Country"), plus "I Had to Tell You," Poi's acoustic contribution to the Roky Erickson tribute LP. [i]

BUSTER POINDEXTER

See David Johansen.

POISON GIRLS

Hex (Xntrix-Small Wonder) 1979

Chappaquiddick Bridge (nr/Crass) 1980

Total Exposure (nr/Xntrix) 1981

Where's the Pleasure (nr/Xntrix) 1982

I'm Not a Real Woman EP (nr/Xntrix) 1983

7 Year Scratch (nr/Xntrix) 1984

Songs of Praise (CD Presents) 1985

The Poison Girls—a wise post-adolescent poet/singer/guitarist who wittily calls herself Vi Subversa plus a male backing band—are politicized musical agitators employing rock (minimalist at the start but improving steadily to the point of sophisticated diversity later on) as their means for registering social and sexual protest. Lyrics are clever and subtle, making points with intelligence rather than sloganeering.

Produced by Crass drummer Penny Rimbaud and featuring guest vocals by that band's Eve Libertine, Hex makes no grand statements (even the frantic "Bremen Song" doesn't really say anything cogent). Instead, Vi's lyrics deal cleverly with sex roles and existential personal issues. What is normal? Do we really need doctors? Is romance political? The guitar-based music is really good—nothing fancy, but subtle and effective on its own terms.

The music isn't much more raucous on Chappaquiddick Bridge (also produced by Rimbaud), but the lyrics (and Subversa's angry singing) are far more bilious. From the bluntly titled "Statement" (a humanist manifesto delivered via a bonus flexi-disc) to the sexual analysis of "Good Time (I Didn't Know Sartre Played Piano)" and the duck-for-cover "Underbitch," the prose is substantial (if unfocused) and Subversa's theatrical delivery sells it even when the words don't amount to much.

Some of the songs on the live (in Edinburgh, mid-'81) Total Exposure—pressed on clear vinyl and fitted in a transparent plastic sleeve—come from the first two LPs, but there's new material as well. It's an exciting document, but the studio albums offer an easier entry point to the Poison Girls' music, thanks to a somewhat varied approach that doesn't carry over in concert.

With their musical skills much improved, Where's the Pleasure balances intellectual integrity with audio listenability and achieves a measure of success on musical merit alone. Largely ignoring the governmental politics of the first two studio discs, Where's the Pleasure deals almost solely with sexual matters, using refined music and crystal-clear vocals. Subversa's weary, whisky-and-tobacco-stained voice is a husky but serviceable instrument that perfectly suits the material and lends a tragic, poetic air to the record.

Even more accessible is the wonderful I'm Not a Real Woman EP—four varied songs that utterly abandon punk for a rock-cabaret sound. Celtic folk singing and poetic recitation. At her funniest, Subversa employs a Noel Coward-like delivery to offer her sharp feminist lyrics.

Songs of Praise is even more skillful and attractive. Having long since proven herself a talented and unique singer, Vi is in fine voice; the band stretches further into areas of sublime, suave rock and funk scarcely imaginable at the group's outset. Lyrics are likewise subtler and more intriguing, setting this album somewhere between Marianne Faithfull, John Cale and Ian Dury. [i]

POLECATS

Polecats Are Go! (nr/Vertigo) 1981

Make a Circuit with Me (Mercury) 1983

Cult Heroes (nr/Nervous) 1984

Live and Rockin' (nr/Link) 1989

The Polecats Won't Die! (nr/Vinyl Japan) 1989

This young, stylish London trio (plus a drummer) dropped out of the spotlight after releasing Polecats Are Go!, a gem of a rockabilly revival album. Producer Dave Edmunds applies the same polish he brought to the Stray Cats, and these 'Cats truly sparkle. Piano, saxophone and careful vocal harmonies ice the usual neo-rockabilly cake of trebly guitars, acoustic bass and driving drums. A bizarrely conceived stab at David Bowie's "John, I'm Only Dancing" doesn't quite come off; otherwise, this mix of oldies and originals parties like crazy.

The Polecats' American label passed on releasing the band's original LP, and instead patched together a seven-cut disc from singles (the glossy title track, a version of T. Rex's "Jeepster" and the aforementioned Bowie tune) and album tracks.

The original trio (plus a different drummer) reaffirmed its continued retro-rock existence in 1989 with a live mini-album (seven okay cuts, including "Blue Jean Bop" and "Rock Billy Boogie") and a new studio set. Despite a garish cartoon cover which reflects the development of a garage-trash/rock'n'roll side, the snappy rockabilly cuts on Won't Die are even more traditional than the group's initial pop efforts. (No more glam-rock covers: the handful of old tunes here are strictly Eddie Cochran et al.) The revival fad may have ended, but the Polecats rock on. [si/i]

POLICE

Outlandos d'Amour (A&M) 1978 •

Reggatta de Blanc (A&M) 1979 •

Zenyatta Mondatta (A&M) 1980 •

Ghost in the Machine (A&M) 1981 •

Synchronicity (A&M) 1983 (A&M-Mobile Fidelity) •

Every Breath You Take/The Singles (A&M) 1986 •

Compact Hits EP [CD] (nr/A&M) 1988 •

VARIOUS ARTISTS

Brimstone & Treacle (A&M) 1982 •

Though neither bassist/singer Sting nor veteran guitarist Andy Summers would have gone in this direction individually, they became intrinsic to ex-Curved Air drummer Stewart Copeland's notion of being new wavers in 1977, when it was still pretty new. As a band, the three (Summers having replaced original guitarist Henri Padovani after one single) worked in earnest to stake out their own musical turf, even probing a few of rock's boundaries. Their considerable abilities eventually yielded the Police sound: rock and reggae interlocked in proportions varying from number to number, further spiced with musical influences like Summers' quasi-classical harmonic overtones and Sting's reggae-into-jazz vocalisms.

Outlandos d'Amour is the brisk, brash initial Police barrage of bright, featherweight tunes (like "Roxanne," "Born in the 50's," "Can't Stand Losing You") and deceptively clever riffs and rhythms. It's pithy, infectious and seductive, sometimes all at once. Only a silly joke in dubious taste and Sting's pair of "let's own up" diatribes are irksome, but those can be ignored—musically, they aren't bad anyway.

Sting came up short of material on Reggatta de Blanc and only one of Copeland's attempts at taking up the slack is truly spot-on, funny and catchy. All the same, "Message in a Bottle" is an all-around gem, and if Sting's other material isn't stellar, the performances are: effective vocal emoting and instrumentally sparkling tours de force like the title track (which also shows the virtue of space in music). The sound was further enhanced for Zenyatta Mondatta, and that same instrumental excellence brightens much of the record, but too much of the album relies on just that. The more direct cuts are too cute for words (hence "De Do Do Do . . .") but, like bubblegum (the music and the candy), they stick to you.

Ghost in the Machine was critically considered the milestone marking the threesome's arrival as Major Artists, but this critic begs to differ. Aside from a half-step forward (mainly Sting's sexual experimentation) the record shows the Police taking several giant leaps in the direction of the rock mainstream at the expense of at least half the songs (which are, in and of themselves, okay to pretty good).

Synchronicity (or at least "Every Breath You Take") pitched the Police into the ranks of commercial rock superstars, but most of the record simply can't be taken seriously by anyone but a chowderhead and/or indiscriminate fan. The "humor" is flat, the "experiments" with jazz shadings and electronic touches more yawn-provoking than mood-evoking; in the end, it seems just an overgrown platinum molehill. Sting's "love me—I'm the sexy, intellectual and vulnerable man of the '80s" off-the-record image is hard to divorce from his songs, especially when he whines about being the "King of Pain." And Iron Maiden has churned out epics as gripping as "Synchronicity II." The Police have clearly become the bloated dinosaur they once complained about. But "Every Breath You Take" is every bit a classic, a surf-music rhythm line utterly transmogrified, relentlessly driving Sting's declaration of love-hate-obsession. So skip the LP and get the 45, which even edits out the song's draggier bits. (The posthumous singles compilation named for that huge hit features a dozen Police standards, including a 1986 remake of "Don't Stand So Close to Me" in lieu of the 1980 original. The British Compact Hits CD-5 contains four songs drawn from the first three albums.)

As a movie, Brimstone and Treacle has lots of mystical mood, with Sting effective as a rogue busy smudging the line between good and evil. The soundtrack album consists of one Go-Go's track, a Squeeze item, two choral pieces and some miscellaneous music by Sting, with and without his two compatriots, successful only on the evocative title instrumental and the band's resurrection (from Sting's early days in Last Exit) of the smoldering "I Burn for You." [jg]

See also Stewart Copeland, Fripp & Eno, Sting, Andy Summers.

POLYPHONIC SIZE

Live for Each Moment/Vivre pour Chaque Instant (Fr. New Rose) 1982

Mother's Little Helper EP (Enigma) 1982

Walking Everywhere (Fr. New Rose) 1984

The Overnight Day (Fr. New Rose) 1987

Polyphonic Size is Belgian; their first album was produced by Strangler Jean-Jacques Burnel, who also contributed bass and vocals. Unlike Burnel's other work outside the Stranglers (his first solo LP, production for Japan's Lizard), this effort has none of his usual aggression. Instead he delicately captures Polyphonic Size's lovely synthesizer art-pop. Sung primarily in French by a man and a woman backed by simple (not rudimentary—carefully constructed and subtle) electronics, this resembles Orchestral Manoeuvres' lighter work. Excepting some perky numbers that lean towards Japanese synthesists like Plastics, a low-key approach—gentle, almost tender singing and languid tempos—makes Live for Each Moment as relaxing as a hot bath, but without the ennui, thanks to a resolute commitment to pop song structures. A very pretty record.

The Mother's Little Helper 12-inch singles assemblage has five tracks, including a humorous electronic reinterpretation (not unlike the Flying Lizards) of the Rolling Stones classic after which it is named.

A new four-piece lineup, working with producer Nigel Gray (Police, Siouxsie and the Banshees) on Walking Everywhere and The Overnight Day, has kept Polyphonic Size moving towards mild, commercialized pop fare—a less quirky Plastic Bertrand or perhaps a Flemish answer to Nena. The wispy male and female vocals (in French and lightly accented English) and the understated music keep the records unflinchingly pleasant, but a shade too skimpy on character to make Polyphonic Size a bigger international commercial property. [i]

POLYROCK

Polyrock (RCA) 1980

Changing Hearts (RCA) 1981

Above the Fruited Plain EP (PVC) 1982

No Love Lost [tape] (ROIR) 1986

Formed in 1978, Polyrock was one of New York's first groups to explore post-disco/new-sensibility dance music. The sextet led by ex-Model Citizens singer/guitarist Billy Robertson gained unquestionable artistic credibility through the patronage of Philip Glass, who (with Kurt Munkacsy) produced and played on their two original albums. The first combines minimalist repetition with electro-pop and smart, aware songs, then strips it all down to skin and bone for extremely singleminded dance music. Fascinating in its extremity.

Changing Hearts follows the same basic pattern but loosens up the sound, occasionally breaking away from austere dance music for a taste of straightforward pop, including a reworking of the Beatles' "Rain." Otherwise, Billy and Tommy Robertson write some of the most vulnerable songs this side of David Byrne, with solid (if lean) performances and production.

Following Tommy's departure (which left Polyrock a notably improved five-piece), his brother produced Above the Fruited Plain, five tracks with more character and melody than any of the group's previous releases. No Love Lost is a posthumous collection of 1980 and 1983 live performances, plus unreleased studio demos done as recently as 1984. [sg/i]

POMPEII 99

See Christian Death.

PONTIAC BROTHERS

Big Black River (Fr. Lolita) 1985

Doll Hut (Frontier) 1985

Fiesta en la Biblioteca (Frontier) 1986

Be Married Song EP (Frontier) 1987

Johnson (Frontier) 1988 •

Even their record company describes the Pontiac Brothers as Stones-influenced, a rare case of restraint in advertising. The Orange County, California band has never denied it; indeed, they originally got together in 1983 to play Stones tunes. (Guitarist Ward Dotson had previously been a mainstay in the Gun Club; the other Brothers are California scene veterans with numerous credits, including the Middle Class.)

Big Black River, their first album, was released only in France, which might reinforce prejudices about French taste in rock. Singer Matt Simon pushes his Mick Jagger impression beyond what it's worth; the original songs are uninspired pastiches of the Rolling Stones and '60s punk in general; the production can charitably be called shabby.

Using a new rhythm guitarist, the Pontiacs re-recorded a third of Big Black River for Doll Hut. Their US debut has a more polished sound, though still decidedly Jagged vocals. The new Dotson/Simon material shows promise: "Out in the Rain" sets a poignantly wasted lyric against well-juggled musical clichés, while "Keep the Promise"—with acoustic guitar, a first—is passionate if murky. (The cassette reflects the band's fondness for performing vintage covers by including a version of the MC5's "Tonight.")

Simon finally downplayed his Jagger tendencies on Fiesta en la Biblioteca, also the first Pontiac Brothers album as a quartet. There's some welcome variety in tempos, arrangements and sentiments. (The cassette adds a Bad Company song, "Movin' On.") The album's wistful "Be Married Song"—a rare Dotson lead vocal—was redone in an electric arrangement on a 12-inch EP, which also contains "Doll Hut" (from Fiesta), the fine non-LP "Brenda's Mom" and a bracing rendition of AC/DC's "Dirty Deeds (Done Dirt Cheap)."

The Pontiacs' chef d'oeuvre, Johnson, starts with a roar ("Ain't What I Call Home") and scarcely lets up in intensity. The inevitable Stones substratum remains—guest pianist Ian McLagan adds British authenticity—but the band has grown its own shaggy personality. Replacements fans will enjoy the frustrated vitriol of "Creep" (another Dotson vocal) and "Real Job," which Simon delivers in a Westerbergian howl. (The cassette and CD add Paul McCartney's "Magneto and Titanium Man.") Identifying with the underdog without getting misty-eyed about it, the Pontiac Brothers are ragged but right.

After that triumph went unnoticed by the masses, the Pontiac Brothers parted company. Ward Dotson moved to New York, formed a new band and also joined the retro-pop Pussywillows. [si]

See also Clawhammer, Gun Club, Pussywillows.

POOH STICKS

Alan McGee EP (nr/Fierce) 1988 •
 The Pooh Sticks EP (nr/Fierce) 1988
 Orgasm (nr/53rd & 3rd) 1988 •
 Trade Mark of Quality (nr/Fierce) 1989 •
 Formula One Generation (Sympathy for the Record Industry) 1990

On the whole, British pop music has always taken itself far too seriously, and no less so since the trad-busting original '77 wave. Consequently, aberrations as polar as Half Man Half Biscuit, Sigue Sigue Sputnik and Zodiac Mindwarp (to name three at random) have all based careers on taking the piss out of pop iconography. Likewise, some of the anorak and twee pop stylists of the late '80s (like edgy gentlepunks the Pastels) invested netherness with genuine wit and value. But it took Wales' Pooh Sticks (aided and abetted by the open-minded Fierce Records) to perform the ultimate inbreeding of pure pop and pure cynicism. Brilliantly derivative and deliriously infectious, the quartet's debut P (half an LP—the flipside is a scratched-in-vinyl stick figure portrait of the band) gathers four of the five songs from their Alan McGee boxed set of one-sided singles (later on CD), adding a prior 45 for a first-rate collection of bare-bones pop with magnificently minimal barbed hooks. Characteristically, the record's sole cover (the 1910 Fruitgum Company's "1,2,3 Red Light") is by far the least catchy and invigorating thing on it.

Creating a sea of "product," the Pooh Sticks continued to release a string of limited edition singles, picture discs, flexies and a side-project (Dumb Angels, with a one-song Brian Wilson tribute 45). Orgasm is ostensibly an official low-budget bootleg taken from one of the band's rare live gigs (six shows in three years), mixing familiar songs with new faves, nearly every one as sharp and kinetic as on the first P. (The CD includes ten additional unreleased songs from October 1988.)

Also live, also a borderline bootleg, Trade Mark of Quality has excellent sound, great playing, good songs, okay crowd interaction and absolutely none of the wicked spark that ignites their best recordings. On the other hand, the band's first proper studio album, Formula, is sublimely poppy in the classical sense, the dark satire and deep appreciation of precedents combining to create an inspired if imperfect LP by the most self-conscious, referential and knowing band in post-punk pop. [ab]

POOPSHOVEL

Opus Lengthemus (Community 3) 1989 •
 I came, I saw, I had a hotdog (Community 3) 1991 •

If not for the bizarre lyrics (in songs like "Young People in Love Are Hardly Ever Hungry," the cautionary "African Bees" or the womb-delivered "Earliness Factor"), singer Bill Crawford's unpredictable jazz trumpet interpolations would be this raucous Madison, Wisconsin, quartet's strangest feature. As it is, Opus Lengthemus rambles imaginatively and excitingly through wicked noise-punk, understated rock-pop and crude fusion, all united under the band's oblique worldview. A bit sophomoric at times, but otherwise smart and involving. [i]

POOR RIGHTEOUS TEACHERS

Holy Intellect (Profile) 1990 •

Wise Intelligent, Culture Freedom and Father Shaheed—the three Trenton, New Jersey rappers known as Poor Righteous Teachers—are members of the Islamic Five-Percent Nation, and Holy Intellect is littered with the sect's phraseology and philosophy. On a strictly sonic level, the album is funky and inviting, with soulful tracks, skilled warm-voiced rapping and a bit of romantic crooning (on "Shakiyla"), but the lyrics' religious content is as boring and irrelevant to non-believers as it was when born-again rockers—from Little Richard and Wanda Jackson through George Harrison and Cat Stevens—started sharing their personal faith on record. The fact that PRT's moralistic views involve issues of racial superiority (not strongly pushed here) further complicates matters, limiting the trio's audience to a very select segment of the hip-hop audience. [i]

POP

The Pop (Automatic) 1977
 Go! (Arista) 1979
 Hearts and Knives EP (Rhino) 1981

DAVID SWANSON

Reclamation (RCA) 1990 •

Essentially a routine hard-rock/power pop outfit, this LA group acquired hipness through an actively pro-local scene stance as well as attitudes shared with more overtly rebellious colleagues. Their DIY debut LP shows them equally adept at pounding out fierce rockers and lovingly constructing softer, more melodic tracks, with occasionally eccentric production touches, linking both in the anthemic "Down on the Boulevard." As good as the Raspberries' Starting Over but more urgent, and less studiously nostalgic or obviously derivative.

Produced by Earle Mankey, Go! shows how the band moved with the times, modifying British modern pop notions to suit themselves. Not quite as humor-conscious (for better and worse) as XTC, the Pop employs a strangely detached intensity that gives a fillip to each track. There isn't any one brilliant number (although "Under the Microscope" comes close), yet Go! is entertaining straight through.

Two years later, without the guitar and arranging talents of Tim McGovern (who had joined the pre-stardom Motels) or the support of a major label, the remaining foursome sound somewhat chastened for not having played it safer—and they do. The six-song Hearts and Knives presents a blander version of their former selves: pleasant, lightweight originals and a lame Stones cover that's limply out of character.

Towards the end of the '80s, singer/guitarist Roger Prescott surfaced in a band called Train Wreck Ghosts, which he formed with ex-Plimsouls guitarist Eddie Munoz following the latter's brief stint in the dB's. He and Munoz then hired on to the Walking Wounded, and appeared on one of that group's records before continuing their Texas-based band. The Pop's other frontman, David Swanson, reappeared in 1990 with a dull album of awkwardly sung heartland rock. [jg/i]

See also Walking Wounded.

IGGY POP

The Idiot (RCA) 1977 (Virgin) 1990 ●
Lust for Life (RCA) 1977 (Virgin) 1990 ●
TV Eye Live (RCA) 1978
New Values (Arista) 1979
Soldier (Arista) 1980
Party (Arista) 1981 ●
Zombie Birdhouse (Animal) 1982
I Got a Right (Invasion) 1983 (Enigma) 1985
Choice Cuts (RCA) 1984
Blah-Blah-Blah (A&M) 1986 ●
I Got a Right (Fr. Revenge) 1987
Compact Hits EP [CD] (nr/A&M) 1988 ●
Instinct (A&M) 1988 ●
Livin' on the Edge of the Night EP [CD] (nr/Virgin) 1990 ●
Brick by Brick (Virgin) 1990 ●

Iggy Pop (James Jewel Osterberg) embodied everything punk stood for when it exploded in England in the mid-'70s, but he had begun performing in Middle America nearly a decade earlier. Moving into the '90s, he is still a vital and active performer, serving up much the same arrogant honesty that first put him in the punk pantheon.

After the Stooges ended, Iggy resurfaced as a solo artist, under the influence of David Bowie, The Idiot's producer and co-writer. Instead of flailing all over the place, Iggy conserves his energy on numbers like the surprisingly funky "Sister Midnight" and the menacing "Funtime." The album's tone is generally subdued ("Baby," "Nightclubbing," "Dum Dum Boys"), lumbering along in medium gear. It's disturbingly effective, but of mixed parentage.

Iggy reasserted himself on the rapid follow-up, Lust for Life. More upbeat than its predecessor (just check the smiling cover snap), the album swaggers along to Iggy's confident delivery of the title track, "Success," the powerful "Turn Blue" and other self-analytic tunes. The music is Bowie's, and Jim Morrison's unmistakable influence is noticeable on a few vocals, but the clear-eyed vision is Iggy's own.

The dreadful TV Eye Live was a contract-breaker and sounds like it. Half of the tracks—recorded on 1977 US tours—include Bowie on keyboards. Those sound bad; the others sound worse. Iggy is uninspired throughout. Forget this quickie.

Reuniting with Stooges guitarist James Williamson, Iggy signed to Arista and released New Values, a nonsense collection of hard rockers. His increasingly sophisticated lyrics abound in mordant humor ("I'm Bored," "Five Foot One," "New Values"). Soldier features a supergroup of sorts (Glen Matlock, Ivan Kral, Steve New, Barry Andrews, Klaus Kruger) riffing along to Iggy's mostly bitter rants. Party continues in this vein, vacillating between self-deprecation ("Eggs on Plate") and obnoxiousness ("Rock and Roll Party," "Sincerity," etc.). Two non-original oldies—"Sea of Love" and "Time Won't Let Me"—also get perfunctory treatment.

After the aesthetic dead-end of the Arista albums, the Chris Stein-produced and released Zombie Birdhouse marks a welcome shift in strategy. No longer singing so much as rap-chanting, Iggy turns surprisingly cerebral for a crazy blend of sociological ("The Villagers") and philosophical ("Eat or Be Eaten") discourse, pseudo-folk ("The Ballad of Cookie McBride") and topical documentary ("Watching the News"). Spare musical accompaniment underscores the album's ascetic nature. He's come a long way since the Stooges, but Zombie Birdhouse reveals that Iggy is far from reaching the end of his creative tether.

Following Bowie's 1983 hit version of the pair's collaborative "China Girl" (originally from The Idiot), Iggy's two RCA albums were culled for the hoped-for-fast-buck Choice Cuts, the cover of which helpfully notes the inclusion of that song and prominently mentions Bowie's songwriting and production credits.

Their creative partnership thus re-established, Iggy took some time off before recording Blah-Blah-Blah in Switzerland with Bowie. The individual musical changes both have undergone (with further diversion by the considerable involvement of ex-Pistol Steve Jones) make it a strange and sometimes mainstream-sounding maelstrom of styles, but the lyrics—thoughtful personal reflections on various topics—provide at least intellectual cohesiveness. The commanding "Cry for Love," "Fire Girl," "Winners and Losers" and a wonderful cover of '50s Australian rocker Johnny O'Keefe's "Real Wild Child (Wild One)" are more than worthy of Iggy's ready-to-wear legend. (The UK CD EP merely contains four selections from Blah-Blah-Blah.)

Bill Laswell produced Instinct, a straightforward rock record that sags under a cloddish rhythm section and Jones' unmodulated, unimaginative guitar work. Although Iggy's unshakeable stylishness and some impressively dramatic vocalizations (especially on "Low-down" and "Cold Metal") keep the LP out of the worthless-olddimers-why-bother dumper, he's hovering dangerously close to artistic vacuity here.

After signing Iggy, Virgin (UK) issued the four-song Livin' on the Edge of the Night EP, joining that new song with "China Girl," "Nightclubbing" and "The Passenger"—songs from The Idiot and Lust for Life, crucial Pop albums the label had licensed and reissued.

Evidently, the change of corporate scenery did Iggy a world of good: Brick by Brick is his strongest, most rewarding (not to mention commercially presentable) album in a decade. Taking a firm and creative role in the project, producer Don Was deftly helps organize a stellar lineup of session players into sympathetic backing for surprisingly accomplished songwriting. As huge a disaster as the record could have been, the bizarre mix of LA studio hacks (like David Lindley and Waddy Wachtel), groovy session pros (bassist Charley Drayton, drummer Kenny Aronoff), John Hiatt, members of Guns n' Roses and Kate Pierson of the B-52's works like a charm, rising and falling in synch with Iggy's shifting stylistic moods. Going from strength to strength, Brick by Brick rocks ("Home," "I Won't Crap Out," "Butt Town"), rolls ("Pussy Power"), slithers ("Something Wild"), cruises ("Main Street Eyes," "The Undeafed"—now there's an apt epithet), dances around ("Candy") and even takes a gentle romantic breather ("Moonlight Lady"). [si/i]

See also New Order, Stooges

POPEALOPES

An Adder's Tale (Skyclad) 1988
Kerosene (Skyclad) 1990 •

With two albums produced by Russ Tolman, this Davis, California quartet isn't defying any laws of logic by bearing a certain stylistic resemblance to True West (not to mention the pride of Davis, Thin White Rope). The popeAlopes' quirky pop rhythms and trancey psychedelic flavors (the latter especially on a noisy cover of the Stones' "2000 Light Years from Home") provide An Adder's Tale with some personality; otherwise, the band's western-flavored guitar rock runs a bit on the generic side.

It's probably not due to the change in bassists, but the confident Kerosene is much better, a striking-sounding wash of layered guitar and Steven Ducker's quietly haggard vocals. While the heavy atmospherics overcome songwriting deficiencies, the popeAlopes spin echoes of U2, R.E.M. and the Psych Furs into the stew, making Kerosene a dose of the right medicine. [i]

POP GROUP

Y (nr/Radar) 1979
For How Much Longer Do We Tolerate Mass Murder?
(Y-Rough Trade) 1980
We Are Time (nr/Y-Rough Trade) 1980

These abrasive, militant British punks rage against racism, oppression, hunger and anything else that's a world problem; as usual, there's no solution, only anger. The seminal Bristol band synthesizes Beefheartian structures and tribal dance beats to create a didactic soundtrack that barely lets you breathe. Their two primary albums are alternately brilliant and intolerable, with exhortatory songs like "Feed the Hungry," "Rob a Bank" and "Communicate." We Are Time collects outtakes, live tracks and other assorted items.

Despite the limitations of their own records, the Pop Group made their influence strongly felt, both as credible rock minimalists ahead of their time and via the members' subsequent musical ventures. Bassist Simon Underwood helped found Pigbag; multi-instrumentalist Gareth Sager formed Rip Rig + Panic; singer Mark Stewart is well known under his own name. [gf]

See also Pigbag, Rip Rig + Panic, Mark Stewart and the Maffia.

POP RIVITS

Pop Rivits EP (nr/Hypocrite) 1979
The Pop Rivits Greatest Hits (nr/Hypocrite) 1979
Empty Sounds from Anarchy Ranch (nr/Hypocrite) 1979

Fun in the U.K. (Jim's) 1987
The Original First Album (nr/Hangman) 1989
Live in Germany '79 (nr/Hangman) 1990

MICKY AND THE MILKSHAKES

Talking 'Bout Milkshakes (nr/Milkshakes) 1981

THE (E) MILKSHAKES

14 Rhythm & Beat Greats (nr/Milkshakes) 1982 (nr/Big Beat) 1983
After School Session (nr/Upright) 1983 (nr/Hangman) 1988
The Milkshakes IV: The Men with the Golden Guitars (nr/Milkshakes) 1983
Brand New Cadillac EP (nr/Big Beat) 1983
Showcase (Brain Eater) 1984
The Milkshakes Sing and Play 20 Rock and Roll Hits of the 50's and 60's (nr/Big Beat) 1984
The Milkshakes in Germany (Ger. Wall City) 1984
Nothing Can Stop These Men (nr/Milkshakes) 1984
Ambassadors of Love EP (nr/Big Beat) 1984
Thee Knights of Trashe (nr/Milkshakes) 1984
They Came They Saw They Conquered (Pink Dust-Enigma) 1984
The 107 Tapes (nr/Media Burn) 1986
The Milkshakes' Revengel (nr/Hangman) 1987
Live from Chatham (nr/Hangman) 1987
19th Nervous Shakedown [CD] (nr/Big Beat) 1990 •

MILKSHAKES/PRISONERS

The Last Night at the M.I.C. (nr/Empire) 1985
Thee Milkshakes vs the Prisoners (nr/Media Burn) 1985

1979: The Pop Rivits, a Canterbury group of devoted acolytes to punk's gritty DIY ethos, release Greatest Hits, home-recorded and enclosed in hand-made sleeves (later repressed in printed covers; later still retitled for its Hangman reissue). A more mod-oriented and less reserved TV Personalities or Desperate Bicycles, the Rivits retrospectively fit neatly in with the sloppy, violent pop noisemeisters of the era, endearingly careless (though even the best songs leave mere flesh wounds as opposed to the scars inflicted by their more prominent contemporaries).

Empty Sounds from Anarchy Ranch consolidates the band's sound into a tamer, more controlled—albeit equally ill-tempered—punk stew. While Fun in the U.K. is a compilation drawn somewhat randomly from both LPs, Live in Germany '79 simultaneously nods deeper to their UK punk basis and points up their obvious (again in retrospect) trash '60s roots and attitudes—all recorded in glorious monoloudarama.

1981: Talking 'Bout Milkshakes, the debut LP by Chatham's Mickey and the Milkshakes, limps into stores. "Mickey" is guitarist M. Hampshire; he and bassist Banana Bertie (both former Pop Rivits roadies) had formed the band to do opening slots at Rivits gigs but recombined with two of their former employers—Rivits drummer Bruce Brand and guitarist Billy Childish—when the headliners split. Discovering a chemistry (particularly in the Hampshire/Childish tagteam), they sat back and calmly began writing and performing a song every other minute. But only when fueled by excessive alcohol. Meaning only 22-1/2 hours a day.

1982: With ex-Rivit Russ Wilkins replacing Bertie on bass, 14 Rhythm & Beat Greats (recorded in Germany on borrowed money) showcases a band more in dynamic control and confident of their direction. Distinct echoes of the Kinks and assorted forgotten US garages begin to reverberate in the vinyl canyons.

1983: After School Session offers a somewhat tempered 'Shakes, playing familiar covers (like Bo Diddley's "Cadillac" and "I Can Tell") and chummy originals with all the verve but none of the previous grit. The Milkshakes IV is an instrumental album that calculatedly sidesteps their "career," consisting instead of Link Wray-influenced dark chord/riff-rockers.

1984: Having hit their stride (and quickly surpassing it), the Milkshakes finagled the same-day release in March of four different albums in three separate countries. Showcase, the US debut, pits a pair of unreleased tunes against a dozen more culled from prior LPs. In Germany is a rowdy and stylistic representative collection of new originals. Nothing Can Stop These Men is a less rambunctious variation of same, while 20 Rock and Roll Hits of the 50's & 60's consists of common classics ("Peggy Sue," "Hippy Hippy Shake," "Money," etc.) and is a considerably less essential shot of partytude. Brand New Cadillac and Ambassadors of Love are both four-song 7-inches.

Although not issued until 1987, The Milkshakes' Revenge! (or "The Legendary Missing 9th Album") was the next to be recorded. Rather low-key and well-mannered, its greatest notoriety is as the debut release on Billy Childish's Hangman Records & Books label.

With an extra "e" in their article and the ouster of Russ Wilkins (to be replaced by John Agnew), things are definitely on the upswing, with countless compilation appearances as well as a prominent lip-synch role in a garage rockumentary for British television. They Came They Saw They Conquered rocks as blatantly and singlemindedly as anything preceding, but Thee Knights of Trashe really ignites where they previously only sizzled, with great songs (including an alternate version of the excellent "Out of Control," written for the TV documentary), confident (if basic) playing and enormously complementary raw—yet detailed—production. Unfortunately it's the last Milkshakes album proper, their tenth (eight all-original) in three years. The posthumous 107 Tapes—sleeved in a monumental interview—contains one LP of blisteringly ragged, painfully overdriven '81 demos with the Prisoners' bassist on loan and a disc of '83 live-in-Germany drunken mayhem. If not quite the Milkshakes' recorded apex, this package may nonetheless be the band's most representative document.

Live from Chatham is cleaner and warmer, like your fondest bootleg tape, while Last Night at the M.I.C. is uncontrolled hysteria. Thee Milkshakes vs the Prisoners (recorded live in the studio) is pure libido on parade, and one of the band's vinyl peaks. 19th Nervous Shakedown is a CD-only compilation and so far the only Milkshakes available to the post vinyl/tape generation. [ab]

See also Delmonas, Prisoners, Thee Mighty Caesars.

POP WILL EAT ITSELF

Poppiecock EP (nr/Chapter 22) 1986

Poppiecock (nr/Chapter 22) 1986

The Covers EP EP (nr/Chapter 22) 1987

Box Frenzy (Rough Trade) 1987 •

Now For a Feast! (Rough Trade) 1988 •

Can U Dig It EP (nr/RCA) 1989 •

This Is the Day . . . This Is the Hour . . . This Is This! (RCA) 1989 •

Cure for Sanity (RCA) 1991 •

In the grand British tradition of selling a band on self-hype and a look—with the music added on as an afterthought—Pop Will Eat Itself became the guiding lights of England's "grebo" (slimy-looking lowlifes playing retrograde raunch) movement of 1986-'87, probably because nobody else wanted the dirty job. Hailing from Stourbridge (a city near Birmingham), PWEI has so far made a career out of hopping on the latest musical bandwagon (so long as it doesn't require dressing up or sounding like Duran Duran). What the Poppies lack in originality, they more than compensate for it with good dirty fun.

The ten cuts (expanding a previous five-song EP of the same name) of hooliganism on Poppiecock owe more than a little to early Damned records (not to mention several pints of lager). Just draw a mental picture of longhairs in torn jeans thrashing away on guitars, playing songs with titles like "The Black Country Chantstore Massacre," "There's a Psychopath in My Soup" and the seminal "Oh Grebo I Think I Love You" and you'll have a fairly accurate synopsis.

The Covers EP is just that—four good, raunchy ravaups of an interesting selection of tunes, highlighted by Sigue Sigue Sputnik's "Love Missile F1-11" (vastly superior to both the original and the second take on Box Frenzy) and Hawkwind's "Orgone Accumulator." Box Frenzy, their first US release, goes for both of 1987's top trends, hip-hop and sampling. This time around, the Poppies are basically a British answer to the Beastie Boys—their rapping is laughably awkward but they do get the self-promotion part down just fine. The sampling is funny, too, with everyone from L.L. Cool J to Nat King Cole making unauthorized guest appearances. The approach on Poppiecock seems more up their alley, but Box Frenzy is still a good time.

Now For a Feast! compiles Poppiecock, three covers and the "Sweet Sweet Pie" 45 for a solid pre-Frenzy recapitulation. (The cassette adds two for a fuller course.)

The Poppies' mastery of hip-hop hooliganism reaches its apogee on the brilliant Flood-produced This Is the Day, an aurally exciting sonic collage informed by a pronounced affection for Alan Moore's groundbreaking comic books and Blade Runner's sci-fi nihilism. The amazing single, "Can U Dig It?" (the Poppies' answer to the Psychedelic Furs' "We Love You," itself a catalog of cool), can be found here, as can "Def. Con. One.," which samples Siouxsie Sioux, the Beastie Boys and Rod Serling, ripping off both the Stooges and Lipps, Inc. in a seamless dadaist stew. Bright, vital and biting funny (check out the scratch-mix ode to a felonious James Brown), this record teems with invention.

Cure for Sanity is This Is the Day minus the jokes. Not content with being the Beastie Boys' retarded cousins, the Poppies decide to get serious and come down heavy on the KKK, scary air travel and censorship. That's not necessarily a bad thing, and some of the beats still pack a wallop (especially on "Dance of the Mad Bastards" and "Lived in Splendour: Died in Chaos"), but the absurd sloganeering is tiresome. One anomaly: the beatific electropop "X Y & Zee," a splendid extended remix of which appears on the CD. [dgs/db]

POSIES

Failure [tape] (23 Records) 1988 (PopLlama Products) 1988 ●

Dear 23 (DGC) 1990 ●

Bucking Seattle's prevailing grunge-noise-metal trend, singing guitarists Jonathan Auer and Kenneth Stringfellow have devoted themselves to '60s-influenced Anglo-pop and the music's primary American interpretation by Big Star. The duo's fine first album (originally self-released on cassette) would have been just another skillful neo-merseybeat retreat (albeit with odd daily-life lyrics about such things as waiting in line and scheduling household chores) were it not for the magic that occurs when the two Posies harmonize, a blend that is remarkably similar to the joyous sound of Allan Clarke and Graham Nash in the original Hollies. Despite a few notable missteps, Failure is quite a successful debut.

Having moved to a major label, enlisted a rhythm section and gotten John Leckie in to produce, the Posies confidently play to their Holliesque strengths while also consciously working against type on the marvelous Dear 23. Sticking offbeat lyrics into irresistible melodic power, "My Big Mouth" opens the record in a crisp wash of acoustic strums and a jazzy falsetto chorus; "Golden Blunders" puts a strong rhythmic charge under a cautionary bit of advice about adulthood. While the vintage-sounding "Apology" and "Any Other Way" can only offer illusions of familiarity, the heavy harmony rock of "Help Yourself" and the epic "Flood of Sunshine" (which winds in an awesome spiraling guitar solo) underscore the Posies' thoroughly modern versatility. [i]

POSITIVE NOISE

Heart of Darkness (nr/Statik) 1981

Change of Heart (Statik-Sire) 1982

Distant Fires (nr/Statik) 1985

The title of Positive Noise's second album signifies the drastic change that took place after the group's debut LP as a result of the departure of Ross Middleton, the band's singer/leader/lyricist who left in mid-1981 to form Leisure Process with saxophonist Gary Barnacle. The Scottish band began as a five-piece (including two other Middleton brothers who stuck it out to the end) and in late 1980 recorded Heart of Darkness, which is pretty dire—a badly produced mishmash of art-funk, Skids-like cheering, PiL noise and assorted pretentious nonsense. It suffers from indecisive direction as much as a lack of originality.

For Change of Heart, guitarist Russell Blackstock also assumed the vocal chores, and Positive Noise transmuted into a slick electronic dance machine, churning out precise rhythms with anxious, semi-melodic vocals. Gone is the audio clumsiness and uncertain footing of the first LP; Positive Noise's niche is definitely in club music.

Produced by Dave Allen, Distant Fires finds the quintet trying to balance techno-dance sterility and coarse melodic pop. While the continued use of synthesizer leaves some of the uneven material sounding like a credible alternative to Human League or junior-league Ultravox, sturdy guitar-based arrangements and Blackstock's rough singing make the soaring "When Lightning Strikes" (originally issued as a 1983 single) and "A Million Miles Away" distinctive and memorable. [i]

ROBERT POSS

See Band of Susans.

POSTER CHILDREN

Toreador Squat [tape] (Poster Children) 1988

Flower Power (Limited Potential) 1989 ●

This Champaign, Illinois, quartet plays loud, punky guitar-rock. The bass is mashed into the guitar, which in turn drenches the voice; the drums are machine-gun popcorn underneath. The writing is slightly influenced by late-'70s Britwave (a smidge of Buzzcocks here, a dab of Jam), plus a soupçon of the poppier side of Television, but those are all influences, not derivations. Toreador Squat is a raw, basic, set-length cassette for admirers of their live shows.

Flower Power, half produced in 1988 by Iain Burgess and the rest in '89 by Steve Albini, displays two different approaches. The earlier sessions are more or less straightforward songs; the later yielded a more fragmented, impression-oriented effect which stretches words out over the thundering music. Both work, and though neither is fully realized, guitar-sound lovers will enjoy this even before the songs start to kick in. The CD and cassette have six worthwhile bonus tracks, making (gulp) vinyl the least worthy choice. [jg]

POSTE RESTANTE

See Minnie Pops.

POWER STATION

The Power Station (Capitol) 1985 ●

This short-lived supergroup (whose name would be "Kraftwerk" in German) agglomerates Andy and John Taylor—then the guitar/bass axis of Duran Duran—with ex-Chic drummer Tony Thompson and singer Robert Palmer. (Plus Bernard Edwards as producer.) On paper, a promising idea—especially in light of the Duranies' funk pretensions and Simon Le Bon's vocal inadequacies—but, on vinyl, a miserable, boring explosion of overbearing drums pounding (you thought the drums were mixed high on Let's Dance?) through tuneless, formless "songs." While Power Station's slickly functional dance-funk is just minor on the softer numbers, the ultimate realization of the concept, "Some Like It Hot," offers a numbingly industrial take on electro-funk made truly execrable by Palmer's contemptible singing. But that's nothing compared to the excruciating jam/destruction of Marc Bolan's classic "Bang a Gong (Get It On)," matching an appalling lack of originality with utter disdain for and desecration of the song's melody, tempo and boppy charm. Repugnant.

When the band that swore it would not tour hit the road, it was without Palmer, replaced for disputed reasons by the even-less-talented Michael Des Barres, adding another chapter to his Chequered Past. [i]

See also Duran Duran, Robert Palmer.

POWERTRIP

See Jeff Dahl Group.

PRAXIS

See Bill Laswell.

PRECIOUS WAX DRIPPINGS

Ain't We a Wishin' Bunch EP (Fat Bat-Landmind) 1987

Rayon EP (Pravda) 1988

After History (Amoeba) 1990 •

Playing with the breathless enthusiasm (and some of the velocity) of a young band told their studio time is nearly up, Chicago's Precious Wax Drippings give the six ruggedly melodic numbers on the Wishin' Bunch 12-inch a real charge, firing up the richly distorted twin-guitar attack to devastating effect. While the jumpin' cuts (especially "Prayers" and "Soulbait") also benefit from unfancy mean-it vocals, the racing instrumental "Big Cheese" reveals chordal ingenuity and sharp interplay by the unpretentious quartet.

Heralded by an incongruous bagpipe chant, the more confident 7-inch Rayon offers up four cool new songs in a full-bodied Anglo-rock vein that owes something to the Small Faces (via the Rich Kids).

After History is divided into Industrial and Sexual sides, but that distinction doesn't begin to cover the boldly diverse collection of styles the group attempts on this ambitious longplayer. Sure, "Brontosaurus" (not the Move song) moderately acknowledges Ministry, but the same side also includes the gentle, pretty pop of "Steeptime." The flip, meanwhile, has a remake of "Rayon" as well as some sizzling punky funk ("Break Down"), thrashy rock ("This Year") and mildly country-fied rock ("Bob," with piano and a buzzing guitar undercurrent). Throughout, the group uses simple guitar-bass-drums resources to craft memorable songs, continually revealing imaginative twists. Fascinating. [i]

PREFAB SPROUT

Prefab Sprout EP (nr/Kitchenware) 1983

Swoon (Kitchenware-Epic) 1984 •

Steve McQueen (nr/Kitchenware) 1985 •

Two Wheels Good (Kitchenware-Epic) 1985 •

From Langley Park to Memphis (Kitchenware-Epic) 1988 •

Swoon/Steve McQueen [CD] (nr/CBS) 1988 •

Protest Songs (nr/Kitchenware-CBS) 1989 •

Jordan: The Comeback (Kitchenware-Epic) 1990 •

Machine Gun Ibiza EP (Kitchenware-Epic) 1990 •

Jordan: The EP (nr/Kitchenware-CBS) 1990 •

Smart and sophisticated garden-pop-jazz. Imagine Aztec Camera meets Steely Dan with absurdist lyrical inventions and close-formation female backing vocals—that's Prefab Sprout, the unique creation of Newcastle singer/songwriter Paddy McAloon. Performed as a trio joined by a guest drummer, the debut EP and Swoon (no overlapping tracks) reveal a unique and ingenious wit—the album's "Cue Fanfare" is about chess champ Bobby Fischer—supported by light and mellifluous music in a number of refined styles. Remarkable and enticing.

Steve McQueen (issued in the US as Two Wheels Good) was produced with a fine hand by Thomas Dolby, who also plays on it as the group's fifth member. (Drummer Neal Conti had signed on fulltime, making the Prefabs a standing quartet.) A significant advancement over Swoon, the adult gossamer pop includes the remarkably airy "When Love Breaks Down" (guest produced by Phil Thornally, indicating the band's strong stylistic backbone), the obscure but lovely "Appetite" and the mesmerizing "Goodbye Lucille #1." "Blueberry Pies" sounds like a lost Sade tune; "Horsin' Around" is as cavalier as its title Brilliant!

On the airy Langley Park to Memphis, the quartet gets minor assistance from Pete Townshend (inaudible acoustic guitar on one track), Stevie Wonder and a gospel group; Dolby produced and played keyboards on four tracks. Notwithstanding one energized exception ("The Golden Calf," which bizarrely resembles Cheap Trick), the easy listening lounge music—deco-era strings, movie-music horns, stage-whisper vocals, restrained tempos—is boring and uninviting, burying McAloon's offbeat lyrics in too deeply mellow an audio disguise.

After that loss of stylistic footing, it took the band a while to regroup—a situation effectively camouflaged by the belated official release of Protest Songs, an oft-bootlegged collection that was actually recorded on the heels of Steve McQueen, and suffers from that proximity. There's a cavernous emptiness beneath the gossamer surface of unfinished-sounding songs like "A Life of Surprises" and the blue-contact-lensed soul of "Wicked Things" that's all the more frustrating when you can hear the germs of so many squandered ideas.

Dolby's return helps insure that not a drop of Jordan: The Comeback's considerable inspiration is wasted. With atmospheric worries out of mind, McAloon is free to rush headlong, through the doors of the Brill Building, across the Great White Way, into the arms of his muse. Echoes of Sondheim and Jimmy Webb resonate throughout the joyfully faux samba of "Carnival 2000" and the eerily precise Swede-pop of "The Ice Maiden," but that's not the real story here. The scoop is that Prefab Sprout has revived the concept album by crafting an interlocking sequence of concept mini-albums. Roughly half of Jordan's nineteen (!) tracks fall into two tightly laced suites that pursue McAloon's dual obsessions; religion and celebrity (or, more specifically, God and Elvis). The latter supplies two of Jordan's most moving songs ("Jesse James Bolero" and "Jesse James Symphony"), while the former gets the best line ("One of the Broken"'s salutary "Hi, this is God here," and an open letter of apology from Lucifer: the breathless "Michael"). Remarkably dense, intensely rewarding listening. The related American EP joins the album's souled-out "Machine Gun Ibiza" with three non-LP tracks. [i/dss]

PRESSURE BOYS

Jump! Jump! Jump! EP (A-Root-Da-Doot-Doo) 1983

Rangleddoon EP (A-Root-Da-Doot-Doo) 1984

Hell Tape [tape] (ARDD) 1986

Krandlebanum Monumentus (AR3D) 1987

Chalk up another one for Mitch Easter, who co-produced Jump! Jump! Jump! at his world-famous Drive-In Studio. Given his background, one might expect power pop, but North Carolina's P-Boys instead deliver hot'n'sweaty horn-inflected ska-beat rock. The sextet's gangbusting, headlong enthusiasm recalls the early Specials (without the accents or trebly sound) but songs like "Tina Goes to the Supermarket" undercut any seriousness that might have been intended. Easter acquires himself admirably on this atypical production fare, making a record likely to pump your speakers free of their cabinets.

Produced by Don Dixon, the four songs on Rangleddoon (a 12-inch with entirely blank grooves on one side) are even more ambitious and better realized than the first album. By toning things down stylistically, the group reveals more conceptual depth, applying its brassy assets with intuitive imagination. "Where the Cowboys Went," for instance, makes effective use of spoken narration, while the brisk "Policemen (In My Neighbor's Yard)," complete with gunshots, executes tricky musical turns on a dime. Excellent.

Besides the entirety of Rangleddoon and four of the six tracks from Jump! Jump! Jump!, the cassette-only Hell Tape has an early four-song demo (including alternate versions of the two first-EP omissions) and three tracks recorded for (but unused on) the band's subsequent album. Despite the varied studio circumstances and personnel, Hell is an entirely enjoyable collection of pep and pop.

Krandlebanum Monumentus contains a second rendition of "Tina" as well as such offbeat weirdities as "Terrible Brain," "Trombonehead" and "A Chew and a Swallow." Three horns still lead the kinetic attack, but the Pressuremen no longer hie to bluebeat, choosing a straighter rock direction (a bit like Oingo Boingo) that proves their tightness but leaves less of a lasting impression. [i]

PRESSURE COMPANY

See Cabaret Voltaire.

PRETENDERS

Pretenders (Real-Sire) 1980 •

Extended Play EP (Real-Sire) 1981

Pretenders II (Real-Sire) 1981 •

Learning to Crawl (Real-Sire) 1984 •

Get Close (Real-Sire) 1986 •

The Singles (Real-Sire) 1987 •

Packed! (Sire) 1990 •

Although bands fronted by ex-music critics have generally been doomed to culty oblivion, the Pretenders—formed in London by Ohio-born Chrissie Hynde—became huge around the world. Surviving the tragic deaths of guitarist James Honeyman Scott in 1982 and bassist Pete Farndon (after leaving the group) a year later, Hynde has pressed on, overcoming disaster with incredible strength and resilience. At this point, the Pre-tenders seem capable of existing and succeeding as long as Hynde cares to exercise her unique talents as a songwriter and vocalist.

After several brilliant singles (starting with an unforgettable Nick Lowe-produced Kinks cover, "Stop Your Sobbing"), the long-awaited Pretenders (produced by Chris Thomas) proved that the 45s were only the beginning. The band's several strengths—Hynde's husky voice and sexually forthright persona, drummer Martin Chambers' intricately syncopated (but never effete) rock rhythms, Honeyman Scott's blazing, inventive guitar work—give numbers like "Tattooed Love Boys," "Mystery Achievement," "Kid," "Brass in Pocket" and "Stop Your Sobbing" (the last three were pre-LP singles) instantly identifiable character and obvious rock excitement.

Mind-boggling success caught the Pretenders short of material, and producing a follow-up proved no small challenge. Eighteen months of touring left little time for writing or recording, the stopgap EP compiles both sides of two singles and a live version of "Precious." The record's fine as a placeholder, but was rendered redundant when both A-sides turned up on the second album.

Pretenders II would have been a real stiff, creatively speaking, were it not for those selfsame 45 cuts ("Message of Love" and "Talk of the Town"), the latter being one of the best things the band has ever done. Only a handful of the other ten tunes match the first album's quality, with selfconsciousness and repetition marring Hynde's writing and performance. An air of uncertainty—whether to play up the overstated arena-scaled side or explore restrained ballads and more complex, subtle arrangements—stymied them, and resulted in a confusion of conflicting directions. (Cassette collectors may be interested in a US tape pairing of the first two albums.)

Scott's death and Farndon's departure, coupled with Hynde's pregnancy, kept the band out of action for most of 1982. They released only one 45: "Back on the Chain Gang" b/w "My City Was Gone," with Billy Bremner guesting on guitar and future Big Countryman Tony Butler on bass. The band's output the following year also amounted to one fine single, the wistful, sentimental "2000 Miles."

Rather than the rattled, self-pitying record many expected, Learning to Crawl was a remarkable return to prime form. A revitalized Hynde and Chambers lead two new Pretenders through a collection of characteristic songs, including all three aforementioned single sides and such new grippers as "Middle of the Road" and "Time the Avenger," which are equal to anything she had previously written or recorded. The only thing lacking is Chambers' percussive complexity, replaced here by sturdy beats that are nothing special. But free of the misjudgment that ankled the second album, Hynde and the Pretenders again display mettle and talent.

Unrelated to the music, but typical of the inescapable private life drama that seems intrinsic to the band, Hynde then took time off to marry Simple Minds' singer Jim Kerr and tend to two children, forcing another long wait between records. When the Pretenders returned to action in 1986 with the disappointing Get Close, Chambers (and everyone else, save for guitarist Robbie McIntosh) was gone, although he does appear on an ill-advised cover of Jimi Hendrix's "Room Full of Mirrors." The new lineup includes ex-Haircut One Hundred drummer Blair Cunningham, but the record relies on session players (including Bernie Worrell, Carlos Alomar and Simon Phillips) and contains only two sentimental love songs ("Don't Get Me Wrong" and "My Baby") and Meg Keene's haunting ballad ("Hymn to Her")—all released as singles—to recommend it.

That trio of songs, plus a dozen more classics and near-greats, comprise what is unquestionably the best Pretenders album of all. One can overlook The Singles' shockingly shoddy packaging; this is a true best-of career distillation (all the A-sides from 1979 to 1986) with one bonus track: Hynde's winning duet with UB40 on a reggaefied "I Got You Babe."

Although Hynde sags dangerously close to self-parody on Side 2 of Packed!, her amazing voice does manage to breathe a little life into the Pretenders' stiffening body. Subtle production (plus keyboards) by Mitchell Froom and skilled studio work by Cunningham, Bremner and others free Hynde to give the songs her all. Unfortunately, many of the melodies are re-writes; worse, the lyrics lack focus and intensity. Even when narrating the end of her marriage, Hynde's pain is reduced to bland phrases and simple clichés. Other than a dreamy cover of Hendrix's "May This Be Love," the album's most affecting tunes—"Let's Make a Pact" and "When Will I See You" (co-written by Johnny Marr)—find their strength in emotional maturity, expressing love without resorting to bravado. [i]

ANDY PRIEBOY

See Wall of Voodoo.

PRIMAL SCREAM

Sonic Flower Groove (nr/Elevation) 1987

Primal Scream (nr/Creation) 1989 •

Loaded EP (nr/Creation) 1990

Come Together EP (Sire) 1990 •

Scotland's Primal Scream made its live public debut in Glasgow in late '84, a show at which singer Bobby Gillespie also made his first appearance as the Jesus and Mary Chain's style-over-competence drummer. Signed to Creation, Primal Scream released a couple of singles on Creation over the next two years, but the band took a back seat to Gillespie's other career. When John Moore replaced him in the Chain's drum slot in early '86, Gillespie finally turned his full attention to his own band.

Primal Scream's influences are a hip mix not unlike the Chain's: Stones, a dash of psychedelic Beatles, MC5, Velvets, etc. Yet instead of, say, adopting a couple of salient characteristics of one of those bands, exaggerating them, and adding a personal imprint (as the J&M Chain did with the Velvets, Primal Scream seek a more careful blend, with little to add of their own. The result: the Chain have an easily identifiable sound; Primal Scream doesn't. It does, however, use lots of little bits nicked from various sources. At best, Primal Scream records are pleasant but no-stick.

The band evidently felt that 1987's Sonic Flower Groove was enough of a mistake to try to scrap it (unsuccessfully). If they felt Primal Scream redressed their self-grievances, they should've thought twice.

About a third sounds good, the slow stuff drags under its own weight and none of it has much (of its own) to say. "You're Just Dead Skin to Me" is a striking title, but it's just another distraction that overshadows the song itself (all too easy anyway)—the band's problem in a nutshell.

Come Together (Loaded plus two versions of the subsequent single, "Come Together," and two additional mixes of "Loaded") is worse. The title track makes a big deal out of essentially reusing people's lyrics. Lyrically, "Loaded" (as in "let's get . . .") takes off from lines in Peter Fonda's '60s biker pic The Wild Angels (repeatedly sampled into the track), while musically it reworks "Sympathy for the Devil" with a slower, funkier (dance) beat. Also included: a cut from Primal Scream and an okay live version of the MC5's old "Ramblin' Rose." [jg]

PRIME MOVERS

See Prisoners.

PRIMITIVES

Thru the Flowers EP (nr/Lazy) 1986

Lovely (RCA) 1988 + 1988 •

Out of Reach EP (nr/RCA) 1988 •

Secrets EP (nr/RCA) 1989 •

Pure (RCA) 1989 •

Lazy 86-88 (nr/Lazy) 1989 •

Coventry's Primitives are one of best results of a British pop genre that first gained notoriety around 1986, in the wake of the Jesus and Mary Chain (but with a backwards nod to early Blondie). Characterized by self-consciously naïve vocals and distorto-guitar backing tracks that pay tribute to the '60s while reveling in post-punk insouciance, such efforts can either be utterly charming or noxiously grating. Thanks to excellent songwriting and the enchanting vocals of Tracy Tracy (guitarist/songwriter Paul Court sings the occasional tune as well), the Primitives have made some sparkling catchy bubblegum gems. Unfortunately, the young quartet peaked early and has been sagging downhill ever since.

The most memorable tracks on the wonderful Lovely reprise material from the group's early UK singles. (The American edition was reissued with the post-LP "Way Behind Me," also included on Pure). Produced by Paul Sampson (later the group's bassist), Lovely runs through a variety of musical formats—from abject California bubblegum pop ("Thru the Flowers," the ultimate "Crash," "Stop Killing Me") to early Blondiepunk ("Nothing Left") and '60's mock-Indian psychedelia ("Shadow"). An ingenious and tune-crazy album of instantly accessible pop standards.

The two inter-album EPs contain some interesting non-LP material. The Out of Reach 12-inch plucks four songs from Lovely and adds live takes of "Crash" and "Really Stupid." Secrets, a two-song preview of Pure, adds the song's demo and a non-LP bonus.

Pure has its charms, but this attempt to fancy things up in the face of inconsistent material leaves it no match for the first LP. Bookended by the rushing "Secrets" and the gently swaying "Summer Rain," fine songs like "Outside," "Lonely Streets" and the spectacular "Way Behind Me" all unearth delightful new ingredients with which to modulate the group's stylistic approach. Amusing little guitar references to the Who, Status Quo and Sonny and Cher add to the fun. But other songs are halfbacked or dull, pale rewrites of prior tunes. Slathering echo on the vocals in an obvious homage to the J&M Chain ("All the Way Down") is a bad idea, as is the mild infusion of Manchester house rhythm in the clunky "Sick of It." (The British album has two songs not on the American; the British CD further adds an alternate version of "All the Way Down" and "I Almost Touched You" from the Secrets EP.)

Compiling the Primitives' first four releases, Lazy 86-88 includes the miserably primitive Thru the Flowers debut EP and the title track's vastly superior remake, two additional three-song singles ("Really Stupid" and "Stop Killing Me," both with neat non-LP tunes) and a rare alternate version of "Shadow" from a limited-edition give-away 45. [ag/i]

PRIMITIVE SOULS

See Real Kids.

PRIMITONS

Primitons (Throbbing Lobster) 1985

Happy All the Time (What Goes On) 1987

The two prime movers in Birmingham's Primitons are drummer/accordionist Leif Bondarenko and singer/guitarist/organist Mots Roden, a Swede who somehow wound up living in Alabama. Following a long stint in Jim Bob and the Leisure Suits (a promising but gimmicky local adaptation of new wave), the pair formed the all-pop Primitons with singer/guitarist Brad Dorset and non-performing lyricist Stephanie Truelove Wright.

Joined by a guest vocalist, the trio recorded a sturdy and attractive seven-song debut, produced with Mitch Easter. Primitons is a pop record, but with the same sort of gravity and lyrical depth as the Windbreakers. "All My Friends" offers a rich R.E.M.-influenced rush; "She Sleeps" puts a gothic tale of death and grieving to simple music strengthened by high, lonesome singing; "You'll Never Know" is an ominous whisper about nuclear destruction.

Bassist Don Tinsley replaced Dorset; the trio (plus Wright) issued an ambitious and spectacular Anglo-pop 12-inch, "Don't Go Away," which covers the Left Banke's "Something on My Mind" as one of its two B-sides. Happy All the Time, which boasts "Don't Go Away" and other similarly well-executed numbers, is a winning collection and shows what a fine band the Primitons are. Layers of guitars and vocals are the main ingredients; subtlety and diversity are a bonus; talented songwriting and offbeat lyrics provide the solid foundation. Tim Lee guests. [i]

PRIMUS

Suck on This (Prawn Song) 1989 (Caroline) 1990 ●

Frizzle Fry (Caroline) 1990 ●

Sailing the Seas of Cheese (Interscope) 1991 ☐

Although Primus is one of numerous metal-funk outfits to emerge from the Bay Area in the late '80s, what sets this trio apart is bassist Les Claypool's distinctive reedy vocals, the band's herky-jerky rhythms and the stop-and-go song structures (perfect for moshing!).

Recorded live in early '89, Suck on This (first released on Primus' own label, then reissued after Frizzle Fry) offers a decent introduction to the band, capturing its manic energy, if not the intricacies and vocal firepower subsequently displayed in the studio. (The two records have five songs in common.)

Although by no means excessively produced, the improved sound quality and the chance to overdub an extra guitar part or two to heighten the abrasive textures of the songs make Frizzle Fry a far more definitive artistic statement. Claypool is an impressive lyricist (maybe the genre's best), whether he's writing morning-after streams-of-consciousness ("Harold of the Rocks," "Groundhog's Day") or spinning cautionary political/environmental tales à la the Mothers' We're Only in It for the Money ("Too Many Puppies," "Pudding Time," "Sathington Willoughby"). Having established such a unique sound and vision, all Primus has to do now is build and expand on it. [ds]

PRINCE

For You (Warner Bros.) 1978 ●

Prince (Warner Bros.) 1979 ●

Dirty Mind (Warner Bros.) 1980 ●

Controversy (Warner Bros.) 1981 ●

1999 (Warner Bros.) 1982 ●

Sign "o" the Times (Paisley Park) 1987 ●

The Black Album (unreleased) ●

Lovesexy (Paisley Park) 1988 ●

Batman (Warner Bros.) 1989 ●

The Scandalous Sex Suite EP (Warner Bros.) 1989 ●

PRINCE AND THE REVOLUTION

Purple Rain (Warner Bros.) 1984 ●

Around the World in a Day (Paisley Park) 1985 ●

Parade (Paisley Park) 1986 ●

PRINCE ET AL.

Music from Graffiti Bridge (Paisley Park-Warner Bros.) 1990 ●

Prince's impact on the direction and sound of '80s pop music can't be overstated. By the mid-'70s, race segregation had become nearly as rigid a musical barrier as it was at the outset of rock'n'roll in the '50s, but Prince's brilliant stylistic cross-fertilization has been a major agent in its slow dissolution. He continually demonstrates a phenomenal grasp of forms, styles and production techniques, and he has the ability to create stunning syntheses of them. True, he's shown a lyrical penchant for excessive and/or tasteless sexuality, but he's also responsible for some of the most playful, open and un-hung-up sexiness in pop music. Prince is the biggest figure in '80s pop music whom musicians at opposite ends of the rock and soul spectrum will admit liking and paying attention to.

The upstart 19-year-old's first album, For You, operates within the conventions of soul music—even of disco—without sounding like a tired string of clichés or succumbing to corporate overkill. The assertive sexuality (e.g., "Soft and Wet") isn't the LP's big surprise, which he saves for last—something like a cross between MFSB and the Delfonics trying to condense the Cream songbook into one number. Prince's soul is also slick, its rock less crunchy. His libido advertisements range from mock-coy to wham-bam, from straightforward to confusing ("I wanna be your lover . . . your brother . . . your mother and your sister too") to confused ("It's mainly a physical thing . . . [but] I think it's love"). Prince is a bit more entertaining than For You, but both are a touch too clinical.

Dirty Mind and Controversy began to attract the attention of the rock crowd. To oversimplify, the two LPs blend Blondie, Bootsy and Blowfly; while other artists bared their souls, Prince preferred to bare his genitals. Ultimately, Dirty Mind comes off as a flawed triumph, Controversy as a miscalculation. The former's crotch-mindedness is offset by ingenuous ingenuity. The sly lyrics, good tunes, strong production and his super falsetto all make for a winning combination; a song like "When You Were Mine" (later covered to great effect by Cyndi Lauper) declared that he was a tunesmith to be reckoned with. Controversy, though, shows too much flash with too little substance—Prince is straining too hard for approval from his new audience and the touch-all-bases agenda yields "Ronnie, Talk to Russia," "Annie Christian" and "Jack U Off," all on one LP side.

The largely dance-oriented 1999, however, is his first real tour de force. Prince exercises even greater skill than before, and when he couples that with some restraint, the results are incredibly gratifying. (The first side alone has three of his best-ever cuts: "1999," "Little Red Corvette" and "Delirious.") Gratuitous sexuality and stylistic indulgences that overstretch tracks make the double-album set less than an unmitigated success; all the same, sometimes his talent is so dazzling that you don't notice (or care about) his excesses. (As a result of single-disc time constraints, the 1999 CD was originally issued without "D.M.S.R.," a defect finally rectified in 1990.)

Purple Rain is the first Prince album to use a band in the studio, and his first movie music; however much those factors influenced the outcome, it also clearly topped its predecessors. Superior focus and control enable him to move effortlessly from the party-down ebullience of "Let's Go Crazy" to the spare, delicate anguish of "When Doves Cry" to the commandingly Hendrixian guitar balladry of the title track.

From back-to-back killers, though, he went to back-to-back turkeys: Around the World in a Day and Parade. But no matter what he gets into on these records, each has at least one ace track and another just a notch below. Prince's father helped him write three of the tunes on Around the World, but don't blame Dad—the blatherings on sex and religion, and the neo-psychedelic/flower-power tripe in which it's couched, are all Prince's doing. All the same, "Raspberry Beret" is an uncanny recycling of the Small Faces and the bouncy "Pop Life" (which allegedly incorporates a tape of the crowd that boed him offstage when he opened for the Stones) offers politely witty lyrics. Parade's strangeness isn't as bad as the worst of World, though it's a wonder the soundtrack of Prince's laughably bad second film, Under the Cherry Moon, was any good at all. Some of it is weird—stripped-down funk that just doesn't work—but the spartan "Kiss" is an instant classic. Right on its heels comes "Anotherloverholenyo-head," which isn't—can't be—as good, but is still pretty stimulating.

The time for the Revolution had evidently come and gone, so Prince decided to strike out on his own again. The split was apparently amicable; Wendy and Lisa (guitar, keyboards, vocals) appear on his next LP (while also making one of their own). Sign "o" the Times is a two-disc bag of goodies, filled with different flavors and colors. The title track is the most minimal of his minimalist singles (even compared to "Kiss"), an off-beat reality-minded protest record that's hardly there. It shouldn't work, but it does, like crazy. Sheena Easton and Sheila E. join in for "U Got the Look," a throw-back to the "old" Prince sound and over-the-top sexual aggression ("let's get to rammin' ") and a strong track in spite of itself. Otherwise, there's some of everything—rap, funk, pop, James Brown tributes, rock'n'roll, etc. Highlights include "If I Was Your Girlfriend," which redefines a relationship in a surprisingly mature way; "Strange Relationship," a nonplussed admission of emotional sado-masochism; and the sleeper ending Side Three, "I Could Never Take the Place of Your Man," a "When You Were Mine" melody with an older and wiser message. A double album eminently worthy of the vinyl.

Ostensibly in a disagreement with Warner Bros. over release scheduling, Prince withdrew a completed record known as The Black Album, which wound up widely bootlegged on cassette, vinyl and CD. It's not a great album, but it's pretty damned neat. Except for the pretty (X-rated) ballad, "When 2 R in Love," each track offers a slightly different kind of (usually scatological) funk. The sneer of "Le Grind," a leering call to orgy to the beat, is grating but, like the rest, is so well done it succeeds anyway. "Bob George" is fabulously nasty, off-the-wall black (in many senses) humor; "2 Nigs United 4 West Compton" is a tribute (!?) of sorts to guys like Jimmy Smith and Brother Jack McDuff; "Cincy C" is a hot, sexy groove. Lots of synthetic sounds, not the least of which is the obvious electronic alteration of Prince's voice. This LP would've received no airplay, but it's a gas.

Prince must have known The Black Album wouldn't really pass muster at the label: he already had Lovesexy ready. (Its cover caused a different retail furor.) With backing by the group Madhouse (minus its drummer, replaced by Sheila E.), it's a fine record. "Alphabet St." brightly continues that minimalist single string. "Anna Stesia" is a wonderfully weird intertwining of love, sex and religion that works where it failed before; the title track is a funny/affecting affirmation of real and exciting romance that doesn't have to be immediately consummated (even though "race cars burn rubber in my pants"!). The only song carried over from The Black Album is "When 2 R in Love." Prince was on a roll, and the sky seemed the limit. Then came Batman.

Like the movie itself, the lines that open Batman the album ("I've seen the future and it will be/I've seen the future and it works") are incomplete, unsatisfying and say less than meets the eye. The film may not have been a total bust, but it had too little substance to live up to its hype. The album is equally deficient, and Prince acting out some of the parts in song, trying to take them even further, simply doesn't make it. (Caught up in the Batman hype wind, the record did return Prince to the top of the charts.) "The Future" and "Batdance" have moments, but the best bit is still the chorus chanting "Batman!" in emulation of Neal Hefti's '60s TV theme. (A special edition of the CD—packaged in a can—was issued commercially.)

"Scandalous" didn't live up to its title in the 6:15 Batman version; neither do its equally (over)long reworkings, "The Crime," "The Passion" and "The Rapture" on The Scandalous Sex Suite EP. Prince adds bedroom dialogue with actress Kim Basinger (the couple allegedly had an affair), more "sexy" whimpering from the original (which may not actually be Basinger) and instrumental excess (including heavy guitar). Also included: a non-LP track ("Sex") and Lovesexy's "When 2 R in Love."

The soundtrack to Prince's flop movie Graffiti Bridge is nowhere near as disappointing, but neither can it stand up to very many of his other albums. Prince shares the spotlight here: although he had a hand in producing and writing everything and played and sang most of it, three of the seventeen tracks are performed by the Time (Prince joins the Time on another); there's a collaboration with George Clinton and lead vocals by Mavis Staples and (on the hit "Round and Round") young Tevin Campbell. The musical mix is a virtue, but the writing is too rarely impressive or memorable, much of it retreading ground he's already crossed with far more style and grace. Two of the best tracks are the rock'n'rolly opener ("Can't Stop This Feeling I Got") and the sing-along title tune. Time for a rethink? [jg]

See also Andre Cymone, Morris Day, Jesse Johnson's Revue, Time, Wendy and Lisa.

PRINCESS TINYMEAT

See Virgin Prunes.

PETER PRINCIPLE

See Tuxedomoon.

PRISONERS

A Taste of Pink! (nr/Own-Up) 1982

Thewisermiserdemelza (nr/Big Beat) 1983 •

Revenge of the Prisoners (Pink Dust) 1984

The Last Fourfathers (nr/Own-Up) 1985

Whenever I'm Gone EP (nr/54321 Countdown) 1986

In from the Cold (nr/54321 Countdown) 1986

Rare & Unissued (nr/Hangman) 1988

PRISONERS/MILKSHAKES

The Last Night at the M.I.C. (nr/Empire) 1985

Thee Milkshakes vs the Prisoners (nr/Media Burn) 1985

PRIME MOVERS

Sins of the Fourfathers (nr/Cyanide) 1989 (Ger. Universe) 1989

JAMES TAYLOR QUARTET

Wait a Minute (nr/Urban-Polydor) 1988 •

Get Organised (nr/Polydor) 1989 •

Do Your Own Thing (nr/Polydor) 1990 •

Lesser-known purveyors of the "Medway Delta" sound, Graham Day's Prisoners/Prime Movers, alongside Billy Childish's myriad combos, butted their way into prominence through sheer persistence in the '80s

Chatham (the city between London and Canterbury where the Medway River meets the North Sea) chapter of the Great Garage R&R Manifesto. Less spontaneous than Mr. C and considerably more of a popsmith (in the Jeff Conolly sense), Day's songs are uniformly well crafted, with fully dynamic backing as opposed to Billy's headlong drunken bashing. The sixteen-hours-in-a-studio extravaganza A Taste of Pink! comes closest to a melding of the two Medway styles, both raw/immediate and hooky/heady.

Thewisermiserdemelza hones the Prisoners' unique blitz, emphasizing Jamie Taylor's atmospheric trash-pop organ and Day's appealingly raspy vocals. (The 1990 CD issue adds an EP and a 7-inch for an hour of fun.) Revenge of the Prisoners pulls the best tracks off Wiser, adding 7-inch and unreleased songs for the apex of studio Prisonhood. The Last Fourfathers (back on their own label) sounds dangerously like Deep Purple just prior to metal ascension: humor withdrawn, keys all broody rather than bracing, the overall tone quite serious and enervated.

Briefly signed to the renamed and fading remnants of the Stuff empire, the Prisoners cut a niftily retro EP (Whenever I'm Gone) and then made their last studio album, In from the Cold, a dreadful kitchen-sink mess that sounds, by turns, like everyone except the Prisoners. Rare & Unissued rebalances the scales a bit, with several songs rescued from the last LP but done in more traditional Prisoner style, surrounded by noise and trash and ephemera. Recorded in January and September of '84, both of the live LPs shared with The(e) Milkshakes echo the snot, raunch, abandon and crisp sonics (snort) of Got Live If You Want It.

Subsequent to his term as pseudonymous drummer for Thee Mighty Caesars, Graham Day once more allowed his own undiluted musical vision full vent with the Prime Movers (not to be confused with imbecilic West Coast synthsters of the same name, nor Boston's amazing late-'80s amphetamine acidheads), playing garage Hendrixia backed by the Prisoners' bassist and the drummer from the Daggermen (short-lived little-brother Medway band with Prisoners/Milkshakes ties), both of whom had also been in the original James Taylor Quartet, the '60sish all-instrumental combo led by Prisoners organist James Taylor.

Sins of the Fourfathers, originally released as a return-to-basics early-Prisoner-style LP, was quickly remixed with the added keys of Graham's new wife Fay Day (formerly Fay Fife of the Revillos/Rezillos, aka Fay Hallam of the excellent beat-soul combo Makin' Time) and re-released in Germany. [ab]

See also Pop Rivits, Thee Mighty Caesars.

PROCLAIMERS

This Is the Story (Chrysalis) 1987

Sunshine on Leith (Chrysalis) 1988 •

King of the Road EP (nr/Chrysalis) 1990 •

One of the neo-folk movement's most rewarding eruptions is the Proclaimers, a pair of sharp-tongued Scottish twins (Craig and Charlie Reid) who not only acknowledge their thick accents, they sing about 'em (in "Throw the 'R' Away"), strumming acoustic guitars and tapping on bongos for accompaniment. Oldtimers will be forgiven for thinking the duo sounds like Lonnie Donegan, the Glaswegian superstar whose skiffle records served to popularize American folk music in the UK three decades ago. By telling it straight and artlessly, This Is the Story stands out, embracing and updating ancient traditions without phony posing. Those who like Billy Bragg's sound but find his politics an impediment are recommended to the Proclaimers for a largely non-topical dose of similarly spare melodicism.

The upscale production of Sunshine on Leith adds a full complement of sidemen (including LP producer Pete Wingfield and a couple of Fairport Convention veterans) and a certain gloss, but only succeeds in making the duo's second record even more delightful than the first. On their way to becoming Scotland's very own Everly Brothers, the Reids deliver another batch of lyrically clever and extraordinarily tuneful songs. Coping handsomely with the fuller sound, their harmonizing voices and the tastefully electrified arrangements combine into a rich brand of folk-rock loaded with pop hooks.

King of the Road is a four-cut EP which contains the duo's amusingly pointless version of the Roger Miller song. [i]

PROFESSIONALS

I Didn't See It Coming (nr/Virgin) 1981

Following the breakup of the Sex Pistols, Paul Cook and Steve Jones—aka the Professionals—stuck together, finishing some final tracks under the Pistols' name, backing people like Joan Jett and Johnny Thunders and doing lots of production work. I Didn't See It Coming, however, is their only joint post-Pistols album. With Paul Meyers (bass) and Ray McVeigh (guitar), the trademark Cook/Jones rock crunch stretches over wide terrain, on songs that are neither trusty punk oldies nor retreats thereof. The album's not consistently good, but "The Magnificent" (a song seemingly aimed at John Lydon, complete with parodic Public Image guitar), "Payola" and the anthemic "Kick Down the Doors" are among the tracks that bear repeated spins.

Cook and Jones can be seen in several movies, including the Pistols' Great Rock 'n' Roll Swindle and Ladies and Gentlemen, the Fabulous Stains. Jones went on to record a solo album and work with Iggy Pop, Andy Taylor and others; Cook wound up in a band called Chiefs of Relief. [i]

See also Chiefs of Relief, Steve Jones, Sex Pistols.

PROFESSOR GRIFF AND THE LAST ASIATIC DISCIPLES

See Public Enemy.

PRONG

Primitive Origins (Mr. Bear) 1987

Force Fed (nr/Spigot) 1988 (In-Effect) 1989 •

Beg to Differ (Epic) 1990 •

The Peel Sessions EP (nr/Strange Fruit) 1990 (Strange Fruit-Dutch East India) 1991 •

Whether they're metal or not, this underground-spawned, speedcore-trained New York trio produces some of the most brutally assaultive power rock around. Little surprise, considering the group's bloodlines trace back to such eustachia-batterers as Damage and the Swans.

Although Prong's debut generated loads of critical enthusiasm, it'd be hard to finger the record in a lineup of East Coast speedmetal; an annoying reliance on change-on-a-dime tempos keeps the lyrical street-smarts from sinking in. Force Fed is a far less hysterical showcase for the group's considerable chops. The control displayed on "Look Up at the Sun" and (on the US version) the grinding "Bought and Sold" is heartening. A pair of creepy-crawly instrumentals ("It's Been Decided" and "The Coliseum") that are equal parts muscle-flex and mind-control set the stage for Prong's major label bow.

Oddly enough, Beg to Differ is a lot more radical than either of Prong's indie discs. Delivering violent minimalist lyrics in a drill-sergeant bark over stark backdrops, the LP has the feel of a post-nuke documentary. The pointillist precision of ex-Swan Ted Parson's drumming leaves plenty of room for guitarist/singer Tommy Victor and bassist/singer Mike Kirkland's shared death dance. (The CD adds a nice live version of Chrome's "Third from the Sun.")

Recorded in January 1989, the Peel EP offers commanding high-voltage renditions of "Defiant," "Decay," "Senseless Abuse" and "In My Veins." [dss] See also Of Cabbages and Kings, Swans.

PROOF OF UTAH

A Dog, a Dodo, and a Fool (Smiley Turtle) 1985

It Doesn't Matter Much (Smiley Turtle) 1986

The Belly's Virginal Polylips [tape] (Smiley Turtle) 1986

Happy to Be Here (Ger. No Man's Land-Recommended) 1988

Out of Order (Smiley Turtle) 1989

Free and Female (Ger. No Man's Land-Recommended) 1990

Originally from Bowling Green, Ohio and now based in Champaign, Illinois, Proof of Utah has no Utah connection at all. The name's just a phrase co-founder Louie Simon overheard in a conversation—but what kind of conversation was that? The band's records are left-field in much the same way: musical and lyrical banalities transformed via unexpected juxtapositions into deliciously deadpan whimsy. To liken them to Frank Zappa, Captain Beefheart, the Residents, Brian Eno, Talking Heads and Devo is an ultimately misguided impulse, and the bases for such comparisons are mostly pretty general: POU use (or subvert) a variety of musical styles, and seek out strange sonic textures. They incorporate radio snippets (or simulations thereof); recite, or talk-sing, in homely (sometimes funny) voices; their lyrics are nothing if not off-the-wall.

Simon (voice, drums, tapes) and co-conspirator Mike Brosco (aka Bosco: voice, guitar, bass, synths, tapes) were, with some guests invited at the last minute, the group on POU's debut album, a consciously eclectic collection of styles somewhat primitively performed. Starting with the second album, Brosco and Simon acquired three sidemen, contributing sax, keyboards, harmonica, etc.

Each side of It Doesn't Matter Much starts with a dopey, seemingly mundane ditty that's just a little bit off. Then things get weird. There's tuneful guitar rock with oblique lyrics, a bizarre tone poem, an offbeat jazz tune. It's all pretty goofy yet ingratiating, even amid some of the silliest bits, striking sounds and lyrical images emerge. Happy to Be Here is a tad more varied, and the weird stuff is definitely weirder. Some of it isn't all that odd: an ode to corn dogs ("On a Stick") is a rockin' little hoedown. But then "The Wedding Song" alternates wacky rapid-fire verses with mutant dance-rock, and the sax-laden "Mamba" has four different tempos ("movements"?) in succession; its "lyrics" are a guest couple speaking in foreign languages.

Out of Order is the rockiest album, especially the first side; new listeners may find this the most accessible. It's pure coincidence that several of its tracks are among the band's best: the rocking lope and curiously evocative nonsense lyrics of "The Pointed Lady" and the dense, tense, intense rock of "Mr. Summer."

Free and Female returns to the antic assortment, though it also has some rockin' sides. "Death of Italian Acrobats" intones typically skew(er)ed POU lyrics over Big Brother's "Combination of the Two" as interpreted by the Banana Splits on drugs; "Forks or Blades" is a boogeyin' little commentary of sorts on the state of radio. But it also includes a self-parodic quasi-jazz "tribute" to John Coltrane's "A Love Supreme" ("I Love Ice Cream").

Despite their intellectual leanings and occasional concerns about the dark side of human relations, POU albums possess an innocent, almost childlike sense of wonder and even happiness (irreducible to some pat intellectual formulation). Each has so much going on that it takes more than a few listenings to catch it all. Happy to Be Here, Out of Order and Free and Female are all highly recommended to listeners with a sense of adventure, but virtually any POU is worthwhile. (One possible exception is The Belly's Virginal Polylips, which consists of live stuff, outtakes and fragments, none of which exactly deserves to be on an album.) [jg]

PROPAGANDA

Propaganda's Secret Wish (ZTT-Island) 1985 •
Wishful Thinking (nr/ZTT-Island) 1985
1234 (Charisma) 1990 ♪

CLAUDIA BRÜCKEN

Love: And a Million Other Things (nr/Island) 1991 •

On their first album, Propaganda—two men and two women—play intricate, almost orchestral synth-based rock of little inherent excitement. As encouraged by Trevor Horn and Paul Morley, each divergent track is a huge stylized production number, but none offers much in the way of listening pleasure. The German band's character—when any is present—derives mainly from gimmickry (gory English S&M lyrics on "Duel," Art of Noise-styled mix hysterics on the song's invigorating instrumental version, "Jewel"). Secret Wish includes contributions from Steve Howe, David Sylvian, Glenn Gregory and others, not that you'd notice them without reading the credits. Wishful Thinking contains remixes and reworkings of previously released material.

The Propaganda on 1234 is a drastically different outfit—only keyboard player Michael Mertens remains from the original lineup, although two ex-members do make guest contributions. Playing intelligent and slick but rarely exciting music that varies electronically between mainstream Anglo-soul and mainstream dance-rock, the new quartet now features British vocalist Betsi Miller and Simple Minds' old rhythm section (Derek Forbes and Brian McGee).

Original Propaganda vocalist Claudia Brücken issued her first solo album in early '91. [tr]

CHUCK PROPHET

See Green on Red.

LINK PROTRUDI AND THE JAYMEN

See Fuzztones.

PRUNES

See Virgin Prunes.

PSEUDO ECHO

Pseudo Echo (EMI America) 1984
Love an Adventure (RCA) 1987 •
Long Plays 83-87 (Aus. EMI) 1987
Race (RCA) 1989 •

The distance between Australia and the world's musical capitals occasionally leads to lame time-zone wrinkles like Pseudo Echo, a Melbourne quartet whose functional dance-rock sound (on Pseudo Echo) would have fit nicely alongside Duran Duran or other emergent hair-synth-guitar bands a few years earlier. The Pseuds' weird move was hitching their wagon to turn-of-the-decade disco, cutting a pablumized Sparks-like version of "Funkytown" in 1987. (For what it's worth, that goofy hybrid appears on Love an Adventure.)

John Punter produced the first album (entitled Autumnal Park outside of the US), setting the vapid and repetitive songs in a posh blend of sounds traceable to Duran Duran and Ultravox. (Although the catchy hook of "Listening" actually owes more to Men Without Hats.)

Having undergone a major personnel shift and a radical image change (out went the lipstick and stupid haircuts, on went the leather jackets and casually rumpled look), Pseudo Echo re-recorded three of the first LP's songs with lots more percussion for the dance-oriented Love an Adventure, a slicker and less overtly stylized album that still has no reason to exist.

Co-produced by Julian Mendelsohn and singer Brian Canham, Race (another image change: long hair/serious expressions) drops the synthesizers and crashing beats to play melodic hard-rock with blustery Eddie Van Halen-imitation solos. Having discovered three styles to which they can't make any contribution, Pseudo Echo should really consider going away. [i]

PSI COM

See Jane's Addiction.

PSYCHEDELIC FURS

The Psychedelic Furs (Columbia) 1980 •
Talk Talk Talk (Columbia) 1981 •
Forever Now (Columbia) 1982 •

Mirror Moves (Columbia) 1984 ●
 12" Tape EP [tape] (nr/CBS) 1986
 Midnight to Midnight (Columbia) 1987 ●
 All That Money Wants EP (nr/CBS) 1988 ●
 All of This and Nothing (Columbia) 1988 ●
 Book of Days (Columbia) 1989 ●
 Crucial Music: The Psychedelic Furs Collection [CD] (CBS Special Products-Relativity) 1989 ●

The Furs, whose lineup has varied substantially around a core of three (singer Richard Butler, his bassist brother Tim and guitarist John Ashton), came onto the London scene well after the initial punk explosion, but debuted with an album that mixed a drone-laden wall of noise (two guitars, sax and/or keyboards) and an odd adaptation of the quieter Bowie Low-style sound over which Butler rasped his lyrics in a bored, asthmatic drawl. While the record sounds great in the blur of history, at the time it was belated and too stylistically derivative not to seem redundant.

Talk Talk Talk, produced by Steve Lillywhite, displays surprising melodiousness in a newly crystallized style that amalgamates the Velvet Underground, Highway 61-era Dylan and even Revolver-era Beatles, all given a fresh face and a driving beat. The wall of noise is sculpted to bring the components into sharp relief; Butler tosses off memorable imagery with mock-casual aplomb. The catchy opening track, "Pretty in Pink," served as the titular inspiration for a 1986 film and soundtrack album of the same name.

Butler writes to his strengths on Forever Now. Though the Furs had lost two key members, the others' increased sophistication—shored up by wisely chosen session help (somber cello, horns, Flo & Eddie)—is orchestrated by Todd Rundgren in a major production coup, best exemplified by the brilliant single, "Love My Way."

In collaboration with producer/pro tem drummer Keith Forsey (filling in for the departed Vince Ely), the Furs turned decisively commercial on Mirror Moves, which is distinguished by a full side of memorable rockers written and played in the group's by-now-inimitable style. "The Ghost in You," "Here Come Cowboys," "Heaven" and "Heartbeat" may not be profound or timeless, but they do show perspicacity and exceptionally well-ordered playing and production. (Prior to the next album's release, a UK cassette appeared, compiling five singles including "The Ghost in You," "Love My Way" and "Pretty in Pink.")

Midnight to Midnight gets off to a fine start with "Heartbreak Beat," a deceptively restrained rocker whose lyrics reflect Butler's relocation to New York, but then founders amid listenable but low-impact songs. Sparked by semi-member Mars Williams' metropolitan brass, Chris Kimsey's production tightens the Furs into a muscular, focused unit, making the shallow material accessible by shortchanging the band's stylish personality. The reliable "new music" hit machine is running on empty here.

Amid a long period of inactivity, the Furs finally released a new single ("All That Money Wants") in mid-'88. A few months later that song appeared on All of This and Nothing, a career review that wisely reaches beyond the familiar to include equally significant material like "President Gas" and "Imitation of Christ." Crucial Music, prepared without the band's involvement, repeats "Heaven" and "Heartbreak Beat" and adds eight other worthy selections ("Sleep Comes Down," "She Is Mine" and "Here Come Cowboys") from the catalogue.

With Vince Ely back on the drum throne, David Allen co-producing and no horn players in attendance, Book of Days repudiates Midnight to Midnight without advancing a completely viable alternative. In place of posh, uptempo slickness, Book of Days substitutes a simple, slow-moving guitar roar; if the songs were any good, the album might have been great. But after a powerful beginning ("Shine"), monotony sets in, a richly textured roar that goes nowhere beneath Butler's weary vocals. Two notable exceptions are the single "House," which has a real melody and pulsing energy, and "Torch," a melancholy lament effectively performed on acoustic guitar and cello.

Note: The first three LPs have different track sequences in their US and UK releases. Also, two tracks were substituted for a controversial cut on the first LP and one was altered and retitled on the third. The 12" Tape is, reasonably enough, a cassette containing the 12-inch mixes of five familiar singles, including "Pretty in Pink," "Love My Way" and "Heaven." [jg/i]

PSYCHEFUNKAPUS

Psychefunkapus (Atlantic) 1990 ●

As the name suggests, this Bay Area quintet offers up equal doses of '60s psychedelia and Chili Peppers-influenced hyper-funk. Basically a metallic power trio with two lead singers, Psychefunkapus shows a lot of promise on its debut album, despite a damaging tendency to over-freneticize. Still, there's a kind of silly charm at work here: "We Are the Young," for example, comes off as a well-meaning update of The Monkees' theme ethics, set to the groove of Spencer Davis' "I'm a Man," while other tracks walk an uneasy line between '60s optimism and '80s street reality. The message: it ain't easy growing up these days. The cure: turn up the volume and get down with the funk. [ds]

PSYCHIC TV

Force the Hand of Chance (nr/Some Bizzare) 1982
 Dreams Less Sweet (nr/Some Bizzare) 1983
 N.Y. Scum Haters (nr/Temple) 1984
 25 December 1984—A Pagan Day (nr/Temple) 1985
 Those Who Do Not (Ice. Gramm) 1985
 Themes (nr/Temple) 1985
 Themes II (nr/Temple) 1985
 Mouth of the Night (nr/Temple) 1985
 Live in Tokyo (nr/Temple) 1986
 Live in Paris (nr/Temple) 1986
 Live in Heaven (nr/Temple) 1987
 Live in Reykjavik (nr/Temple) 1987
 Live en Suisse (nr/Temple) 1987
 Live in Glasgow (nr/Temple) 1987
 Live in Gottingen (nr/Temple) 1987
 Live in Toronto (nr/Temple) 1987
 Themes III (nr/Temple) 1987
 The Yellow Album (nr/Temple) 1988
 Live at Mardi Gras (nr/Temple) 1988
 Jack the Tab: Acid Tablets Volume One (nr/Castalia)
 1988

Allegory and Self (Revolver-Fundamental) 1988 •
 Live at the Circus (nr/Temple) 1988
 Tekno Acid Beat (nr/Temple) 1989 •
 Tekno Acid Beat Vol. 2 (nr/Temple) 1989 •
 Live at the Ritz (nr/Temple) 1989
 Kondole/Copycat (nr/Temple) 1989 •
 Live at the Pyramid NYC 1988 (nr/Temple) 1989
 Towards the Infinite Beat (Wax Trax!) 1990 •
 Beyond the Infinite Beat (Wax Trax!) 1990 •

PSYCHIC TV/Z'EV

Berlin Atonal Vol. 1 (Ger. Atonal) 1984

PSYCHIC TV/LA LOORA

Berlin Atonal Vol. 2 (Ger. Atonal) 1984

An album that appears to be devoted to an obscure faith known as "The Temple of Psychick Youth" might be accepted on face value—after all, various cults have produced albums of devotional music to spread their gospel among rock fans. However, when the musicians behind the project are the former leader of Throbbing Gristle—merry prankster Genesis P-Orridge—and one-time Alternative TV-er Alex Fergusson (joined by Peter Christopherson, also a TG co-conspirator) it becomes much harder to judge where religious sincerity ends and elaborate put-on begins. (With hindsight, the notion that overzealous conceptual shenanigans can spiral out of anybody's control offers a third alternative.) Adding to the confusion, Stevo, who runs Some Bizzare (the label that originally abetted the group), is quoted on the back cover of their first album: "A naïve person can open his eyes in life, but someone with his eyes open can never end up naïve." Just who's kidding who here?

Force the Hand of Chance, regardless of its sincerity or utter lack thereof, is an amazing package: two records (one purported to be the partial soundtrack of a four-hour videocassette), a poster/booklet, pictured costumes, symbology and mail-order merchandise offerings. Musically, the main disc is a weird assortment of quiet ballads, screeching white noise, simple pop and more, with lyrics by P-Orridge that drift over terrain not all in keeping with the mystical concept. At times, form far outweighs function and some songs become merely effect without substance; others stand up nicely on their own regardless of the accompanying baggage. The adjunct record, Psychick TV Themes, uses real and imagined ethnic instruments from various exotic cultures to produce instrumentals that range from crazed to cool, intense to ephemeral—something like Eno's ambience filtered through a Spike Jones sensibility.

Dreams Less Sweet is another remarkable record, no less appealing for its equally abundant bizarrry. From the sweet vocal pop of "Hymn 23" or "White Nights" to pan-ethnic soundscapes and soundtracks that employ everything from English horn to Tibetan thighbone (as well as a lot of found sounds), PTV display an ineffable mastery of avant-garde dadaism as well as traditional musicmaking. Like tuning into a radio station overrun by university-educated acid-freaks, Dreams Less Sweet provides a thoroughly unpredictable and unsettling, yet profound, experience. The LP originally contained a bonus 12-inch entitled The Full Pack. (The cover photograph, while seemingly innocuous, is an astoundingly vulgar visual double entendre. Shades of Lovesexy.)

PTV has since continued to release disturbing live

albums, featuring different lineups around the P-Orridge-Christopherson-Fergusson core. Berlin Atonal Vol. 1, recorded at a festival in December 1983, matches a grisly side of speaker-shredding, grinding, excruciating chaos by PTV with a side by American percussionist Z'ev. The limited edition N.Y. Scum Haters—an all-PTV onslaught, captured at New York's Danceteria in November 1983—is better organized and recorded, more varied and sporadically more musical. There's still a lot of fearsome noise, but there's also some respite from the mania. Berlin Atonal Vol. 2 is shared with a band called La Loora; Those Who Do Not is a double-LP live in Iceland. Extending the group's influence into other artistic endeavors, PTV was commissioned to score a ballet, a work which became Mouth of the Night.

As strange as it may seem, PTV hit the UK charts in early '86 with a catchy pop single ("Godstar") about Brian Jones; that song was later remixed and included on the group's first-ever American release, Allegory and Self, joined by a typical PTV assortment of delicate tapestries and unsettling madness. In the meantime, PTV had begun releasing a series of 23 albums—all concert recordings, titled after the venue's locale—on the 23rd of each month. Squeezing out fourteen British LPs (either some not listed above or somebody has the dates wrong) in eighteen months got the group into the Guinness Book of World Records, but Genesis—himself no stranger to hallucinogens—had already turned his attentions to the burgeoning acid house dance scene, finding in the smiley-face warehouse-raves Ecstasy environment the perfect vehicle for his subversive socio-musical plots and semiotic fascinations.

Under the PTV banner and a variety of pseudonyms (including Jack the Tab, a collaboration with journalist Richard Norris and ex-Soft Cell synthesist Dave Ball) used to create all-PTV pseudo-compilation albums, Genesis became a major underground force on the UK dance scene. Towards the Infinite Beat conveys some of what he's been up to: a few songs (like "S.M.I.L.E." and "I.C. Water") co-written by guitarist Fred Gannelli, but mostly varispeed grooves of bass and percussion lightly layered with guitar, keyboards and other instrumental touches as well as non-singing vocals and found-sound debris. Even on the sketchiest constructions, Genesis' demented imagination fills the tracks with enough action to keep them from being totally tedious. Beyond the Infinite Beat, the associated remix record, delves deeper into house with extended—in some cases overhauled and retitled—deconstructions of a half-dozen tracks. [1]

See also Dave Ball, Throbbing Gristle.

PUBLIC ENEMY

Yol Bum Rush the Show (Def Jam-Columbia) 1987 •

It Takes a Nation of Millions to Hold Us Back (Def Jam-Columbia) 1988 •

Fear of a Black Planet (Def Jam-Columbia) 1990 •

PROFESSOR GRIFF AND THE LAST ASIATIC DISCIPLES

Pawns in the Game (Skywalker) 1990 (Luke) 1991 •

Just as sages of the hippie era discovered that a shared musical culture had created a longhaired nation of millions, someone was bound to recognize the political potential of rap for African-American youth in the '80s. That person turned out to be Carlton Ridenhour, a college student from New York's "Strong" (Long) Island. Taking the handle Chuck D, the self-styled lyrical terrorist formed Public Enemy as a militant mouthpiece for an abstractly violent form of black nationalism that owes its aggressive stance (if nothing in the way of a cogent vision) to the Black Panthers. Unlike other educational rappers (most notably Boogie Down Productions), PE is big on image and attitude and, as a result, has caused almost endless controversy in the music community. But as a role model for disaffected B-boys, Chuck D is the articulate embodiment of their frustration and rage. He also happens to be, hands-down, the strongest, most exciting MC ever to rock a microphone.

With PE's characteristic bracing, bustling sound, Yo! Bum Rush the Show (produced by Hank Shocklee, Bill Stephney and others) is a brilliant combination of white-hot, hard-edged guitar (largely supplied by Vernon Reid) and odd, off-kilter samples of all descriptions, topped with in-your-face raps by Chuck D and his comical foil, Flavor Flav (William Drayton). Considering what an impact the record had upon its release, it's surprising how few of the tracks actually evince any political perspective whatsoever (even "Public Enemy No. 1" and the provocatively titled "Miuzzi Weighs a Ton" are standard DJ boasts; "You're Gonna Get Yours" is about a car). But amid such wheel-spinning, "Rightstarter (Message to a Black Man)" and "Timebomb" reveal the stirrings of an incisive thinker with something much more potent on his mind.

It Takes a Nation of Millions to Hold Us Back—the cover of which pictures Chuck and Flav in a prison cell, under the group's gunsight logo—delivers on Bum Rush the Show's promise with a blistering collection of raps that makes that first album seem like a practice run. "Don't Believe the Hype," "Bring the Noise," "Prophets of Rage," "Rebel Without a Pause," "Party for Your Right to Fight" and others make masterful use of knowledge and language, firing off topical salvos in a dozen directions, dropping names from Marcus Garvey to Minister Farrakhan, J. Edgar Hoover to Margaret Thatcher. While the record's titanic musical power is undeniable, its content polarized listeners, making this one of the first pop albums in history to elevate politics to a crucial aesthetic criterion.

Before PE could make another album, a very public ruckus broke out over crudely absurd anti-Semitic assertions made by Professor Griff (Richard Griffin), the group's minister of ignorance, in a newspaper interview. Attempting to salvage the situation, Chuck D cut Griff loose in June of '89, then dissolved the group—briefly. When PE returned to action, Griff was (temporarily, as it developed) back in the lineup. In January '90, a couple of lines in a pointed new single about the band's troubles ("Welcome to the Terrordome") fanned the embers back into flames, setting the stage for Fear of a Black Planet's release a few months later.

Produced by Shocklee's peerless Bomb Squad, PE's third album is a masterpiece of art and articulation, a roaring subway train of rhythmic noise over which Chuck and Flav (aided, news-style, by relevant spoken-word bites and guests) deliver harangues flowing from a chaotic but rising Afrocentric consciousness. Beyond "Fight the Power"—a spectacular call to arms initially recorded for Spike Lee's Do the Right Thing—Black Planet's power is in its topical specificity. "Burn Hollywood Burn" attacks racism in the movies; "911 Is a Joke" takes a potshot at the efficiency of emergency services; "Pollywanacraka" dissects black sexism. "Who Stole the Soul" and "Revolutionary Generation" complain, respectively, about the mistreatment of culture icons and women. (While PE has transcended common rap attitudes about women, homosexuality still gets the shaft on "Meet the G That Killed Me.")

After leaving Public Enemy for good, Griff made a solo album that has all the charm and musical appeal of a religious fanatic ranting to an audience of disciples. Although the strong rhythm tracks are gripping, Pawns in the Game isn't about entertainment. In one typical example of the outlandish remarks Griff's bizarre beliefs about science, history and world events lead him to make, he describes the Universal Product Code as "an anti-Christ mechanism." [dgs/i]

PUBLIC IMAGE LTD.

- Public Image (nr/Virgin) 1978 •
- Metal Box (nr/Virgin) 1979 •
- Second Edition (Island) 1980 •
- Paris au Printemps (nr/Virgin) 1980 •
- The Flowers of Romance (Warner Bros.) 1981 •
- Live in Tokyo (nr/Virgin) 1983 (Elektra) 1986 •
- This Is What You Want ... This Is What You Get (Elektra) 1984
- Commercial Zone (PiL) 1984
- Album (Elektra) 1986
- Cassette [tape] (Elektra) 1986
- Compact Disc [CD] (Elektra) 1986 •
- Happy? (Virgin) 1987 •
- 9 (Virgin) 1989 •
- The Greatest Hits, So Far (Virgin) 1990 ◊

The Sex Pistols were a tough act to follow, even for Johnny Rotten. After that band's entropic dissolution, Rotten reclaimed his civilian surname, Lydon, and started Public Image Ltd., supposedly more a way of life than a mere band, "rock" or otherwise.

The first of PiL's many lineups featured Keith Levene (guitar), Jah Wobble (bass) and Jim Walker (drums). The group's opening salvo, Public Image (aka First Issue, thanks to the album's arch magazine-cover design) couldn't seem to make up its mind between more-or-less straight rock (the unnaturally likable guitar drive of "Public Image") and musical endurance tests. "Annalisa" could be a Led Zeppelin backing track, but other cuts ("Theme," "Fodderstompf") are excruciating and/or self-indulgent. Lydon knew he wanted to annoy, but was still working out the best way to do it.

He hit the green on Metal Box, a brilliant statement from original packaging—three 12-inch 45s in an embossed circular tin—to performance. Jah Wobble's overpowering bass sets up throbbing lines around which Keith Levene's guitar and keyboards flick in and out. Lydon wails, chants and moans impressionistic lyrics. A disturbing and captivating milestone. The limited-edition Metal Box wasn't cheap to produce, and so the music was reissued as Second Edition: two LPs in a gatefold sleeve. Second Edition benefits from printed lyrics and funhouse photos, but has inferior sound—this is tactile music—and a running order that makes less sense. (Metal Box came full conceptual circle in 1990 when it was issued as a single CD in a five-inch tin.)

The live Paris au Printemps (Paris in the Spring) offers no new material, and may even have been released primarily to stifle a bootleg from the same concert. The band plays well, with drummer Martin Atkins—later a solo artist under the name Brian Brain—more noticeable than on Metal Box. But the Parisian audience is barely perceptible. All cover type (title, songs, etc.) is in French. Get the joke?

PiL shows a healthy desire not to repeat itself on The Flowers of Romance. With Wobble gone, Lydon relies on other resources; compared to this, Metal Box could be played in supermarkets. Lacking a bass, the “band” centers its “songs” around drum patterns and little else. Lydon’s romantic imagery dabbles in ghostly apparitions (“Under the House”) and Middle East chic (“Four Enclosed Walls”). He also serves up customary rants against hangers-on (“Banging the Door”), women (“Track 8”) and Britain (“Go Back,” “Francis Massacre”). But the music is so severe as to lend credence to a record executive’s statement that The Flowers of Romance is one of the most uncommercial records ever made—at least within a “pop” context.

Never a comradely bunch, PiL seemed to unravel beyond repair when Levene left in 1983. But the band had just scored a surprise comeback demi-hit with “(This Is Not a) Love Song,” so Lydon rounded up some unknown New Jersey accompanists and went to Japan. Only two of the ten tracks on Live in Tokyo are new songs; the faceless recruits are shoved in the back of the sonic mix; the album stretches about 45 minutes of material over two 12-inch 45s without Metal Box’s punch. Forget this one.

PiL had started work on This Is What You Want before Levene’s departure. His guitar parts were wiped off the finished product, leaving them spiked only by Lydon’s glum caterwauling. Levene saw to the release of his own version of the session tapes under the name Commercial Zone; the music here is considerably more interesting—perhaps even lively. By taking PiL seriously as a career, Lydon committed heresy against punk anomie. But at least he’s still excruciating.

The same can’t be said for the eminently listenable Album (or Cassette or Compact Disc, depending on your format of choice), which is either the worst sell-out of Lydon’s career or the first popular-oriented PiL album ever. Dispensing with noise, free-form aggression and anti-music production, a stack of uncredited musicians play powerful, highly organized, prickly but accessible rock (and, on the brilliant “Rise,” demi-pop) while Lydon masterfully bleats in near-tuneful harmony on top. The studio sound (courtesy Lydon and Bill Laswell) is live and virile; the seven tersely named songs (“FFF,” “Home,” “Ease”) are as intelligent and captivating as any in PiL’s past. Album. Great.

Happy? (co-produced by Gary Langan), hindered only by not-quite-as-good material, continues PiL’s productive gambit of playing self-amused footsie with the rock audience. Despite conscious concessions to formal structures and traditions, the record maintains an un-bending undercurrent of off-center subversion, manifested in skewed melodies, bizarrely contrapuntal instrumental figures and dub-styled percussion. Joined by a wonderful, tight band—guitarists Lu Edmonds (ex-Damned, etc.) and John McGeoch (ex-Magazine, Siouxsie and the Banshees, Armoury Show), drummer Bruce Smith (Rip Rig + Panic, Float Up CP) and New York bassist Allan Dias—Lydon (or Rotten, depending on his fluctuating preference) is in peak form, creating captivating dance rock (“Seattle,” “Hard Times,” “The Body,” “Fat Chance Hotel”) that holds back the bile and intentional aggravation in favor of first-rate musicianship and invention.

If Album and Happy? were accommodating, the sound of 9 is downright loveydovey. Under the production guidance of Stephen Hague and Eric Thorngren, a four-piece PiL (Edmonds co-wrote the songs but doesn’t play on the record) magically channels Lydon’s irascible iconoclasm into prickly minor-key rock’n’roll songs that meet timorous listeners more than halfway. In spots, thick layers of guitar, keyboards, close-formation female backing vocals, strings and horns challenge the supremacy of Lydon’s declamatory howls, but he rises from the hubbub with wavery aplomb. It may be difficult to take Lydon seriously when he describes himself romantically as a “Warrior,” but there’s no questioning his sincerity in the venomous “Disappointed.” From the electronic dance gimmickry of “Just Like a Woman” (no, not that one) to the galloping, Gang of Four blueprint of “Same Old Story,” 9’s shifting balance of content and presentation makes it a great record.

Following the PiL safari through an unassailable selection of thirteen songs (representing every studio album), The Greatest Hits, So Far telescopes a decade of thrashing about in the post-punk underbrush into a spectacular hour of power. Five remixes actually improve the material. The only extraneous item here is “Don’t Ask Me,” a crappy-sounding song that surprisingly preaches environmental responsibility. [si/i]

See also Afrika Bambaataa, Brian Brain, Keith Levene, Sex Pistols, Jah Wobble.

PURPLE HELMETS

See Stranglers.

PURPLE OUTSIDE

See Screaming Trees.

PURPLE TOADS

See Durango 95.

PURRKUR PILLNIKK

Tilf EP (Ice. Gramm) 1981

Ekki enn (Ice. Gramm) 1981

Googoplex (Ice. Gramm) 1982

No Time to Think EP (Ice. Gramm) 1982

Maskin (Ice. Gramm) 1983

A quartet of bratty minimalists featuring future Sugarbush Einar Örn (vocals) and Bragi Olafsson (bass), Purrkur Pillnikk was the most successful band formed in the early-'80s days of Iceland's post-punk revolution. Although together for only seventeen months, the group recorded lots of material, hit the Icelandic Top 10 with its first album and even toured England with the Fall, their most obvious musical influence.

There's more spit than wit on the teenage group's early releases. The 1981 debut, a ten-song 7-inch released on Gramm (a label co-founded by Einar), was recorded less than a month after the group was formed and sounds it. Ekki enn is a distinct improvement; Einar's robust haranguing (a kind of Arctic Circle version of Mark E. Smith) is underscored with pithy, scrappy guitar riffs that rarely outstay their Pink Flag-style welcome, although the songs—all seventeen of 'em—do blur together after awhile.

On Googooplex (issued as a pair of 12-inch 45s), Purrkur Pillnikk finally hits its musical stride, fortifying that spiky riffing with catchy, angular melodies and locomotive improvising. Einar even sings, after a fashion, in spots. Unfortunately, following a second 7-inch EP (with English lyrics) a few months later, the group broke up. The posthumous Maskinan is a ragged-but-righteous live album that captures both the spirit of the band and the Icelandic scene which it helped create. [df]

See also Sugarcubes.

JIMMY PURSEY

Imagination Camouflage (nr/Polydor) 1980

Alien Orphan (nr/Epic) 1982

JAMES T. PURSEY

Revenge Is Not the Password (nr/Turbo) 1983

The Lord Divides (nr/Eskimo Green) 1983

As a solo artist, the earnest Sham 69 mouthpiece took a turn for the arrier, leaving behind some of his plain-spoken charm as well as much of his punky obstreperousness in favor of more emotional and creative depth and range. Slide guitar, sax and even synthesizers broaden the instrumental palette of Imagination Camouflage; while none of the songs are excellent, they're almost all good. (Renegades from Generation X aided in composition and performance.)

Unfortunately, Alien Orphan goes almost too far. Leaving behind the stagey rock of its predecessor for a goulash of electro-rock-funk-jazz often held together by fluid, graceful bass riffing (guitar and keyboard are used only as embroidery), Pursey seems to have forgotten the notion of songs as songs, not elaborate aural concoctions. Still, it's swell background music—a meticulously constructed soundscape—and other than the parts that do try to be poignant or obvious, most of it does connect eventually, one way or another.

Revenge is similarly varied in its stylistic concept: eight spare semi-songs that wander off in different directions as if the idea of consistency had never occurred to the artist. Pursey is not the cleverest lyricist or suavest composer in the world, but his heart has always been in the right place and it's hard to denigrate sincerity. Although the album doesn't hold up at all, a few of Pursey's unpredictable forays are odd enough to work.

See also Sham 69.

[jg/i]

PUSSY GALORE

Feel Good About Your Body EP (Shove) 1985

Groovy Hate Fuck (Shove) 1986

Exiles on Main Street [tape] 1986

1 Yr. Live [tape] 1986

Pussy Gold 5000 EP (Buy Our) 1987

Right Now! (Caroline) 1987 ●

Groovy Hate Fuck (nr/Vinyl Drip) 1987

Sugarshit Sharp EP (Caroline) 1988

Dial M for Motherfucker (Caroline) 1989 ●

Historia de la Musica Rock (Caroline) 1990 ●

BOSS HOG

Drinkin' Lechin' & Lyin' EP (Amphetamine Reptile) 1989

Cold Hands (Amphetamine Reptile) 1990 ●

The aesthetic dilemma presented by intentionally offensive and/or consciously anti-musical groups is probably best settled by a critical rumble in the alley. There's certainly no rational way to discuss the potential merits of a record like this Washington, DC arm-to-offend quartet's four-song 7-inch debut (Feel Good About Your Body) or the eight-song 12-inch Groovy Hate Fuck, a raucous one-take no-rehearsal guitar-army tossoff. Setting the question of their atrocious non-musicianship aside, puerile compositions like "Teen Pussy Power," "Cunt Tease" and "Dead Meat" are nothing more than smears of self-satisfied juvenilia. You're supposed to be repulsed by Pussy Galore, but that certainly doesn't make this pathetic effluvia worth hearing. Cheap thrills for vulgar sissies.

Relocating to New York and adding a fifth member, Jon Spencer and his crew issued two limited-edition cassettes at the end of 1986: an infamous home-brew version of Exile on Main Street (in its entirety) and a live set called 1 Yr. Live.

With ex-Sonic Youth drummer-turned-metal-pounder Bob Bert in the lineup along with stalwarts Julia Cafritz (guitar, vocals), Neil Hagerty (guitar, vocals, organ) and Cristina (Martinez; guitar, organ), the five-song Pussy Gold 5000 12-inch displays improved—not good, but better—playing and sound. On the studio tracks, that is. The live "No Count" is as wretched as ever. It's still trash, but not quite as rank as before.

Following further personnel changes (Cristina defected to the Honeymoon Killers), Pussy Galore wound up a quartet: three guitarists (they've never had a bassist) and Bert. The full-length Right Now! album, co-produced (without credit) by the group, Steve Albini and Kramer, contains nineteen songs of almost interesting garage raunch. The LP brings Pussy Galore into the realm of artistic consideration but reveals them as a fairly bad noise band. (The CD adds six previously released tracks.) The 1987 Groovy Hate Fuck album—released on the Membranes' Vinyl Drip label—is a compilation of the first three records.

Sugarshit Sharp continues Pussy Galore's journey further into the realm of Art; the A-side is a lengthy, sample-ridden cover of Einstürzende Neubaten's "Yu Gung," the most entertaining portions of which are the repeated interpolations of Public Enemy's Flavor Flav saying "Don't believe the hype." Indeed. Side Two contains five grunge tunes of a somewhat higher grade than usual.

The cover art of Dial M for Motherfucker looks like it comes straight from a '70s exploitation flick (an idea that would find its ultimate realization with the Velvet Monkeys' Rake, which features Cafritz); the album's sound is more flagrantly pretentious noise than fake garage. As the product of honest bourgeois artistry rather than arch posturing, it's the band's best album. Standouts include the lurching "Understand Me" and the one-joke "Dick Johnson." The CD includes the five songs from the B-side of Sugarshit Sharp.

On the other hand, cover art triumphs over content in Historia de la Musica Rock, an album done up to look precisely like one of those ultra-cheap Spanish "classic rock" compilations. (The cover photo is atrocious; the liner notes are all in Spanish; the list of other artists in "the series" includes the Rolling Stones, Bloodwyn Pig, Murphy's Law and the Cro-Mags.) The record itself—more under-rehearsed ersatz grunge played by a trio of Spencer, Hagerty and Bert—is only intermittently entertaining.

The loosely configured Boss Hog features Spencer, ex-Galore guitarist Kurt Wolf, Jerry Teel of the Honeymoon Killers, Cristina (making her most notable contribution as the records' sexy cover model) and a revolving cast of friends. Produced by Albini, the six-cut 12-inch debut is casual good-natured sex noise with better songs than Pussy Galore can usually muster and better sound than the Honeymoon Killers generally allow, but the offspring definitely favors Spencer's side of the family. The full-length Cold Hands moves a bit closer towards the establishment of a Boss Hog audio personality—a louder, more aggressive effort, with grungier, bottom-heavy sound and songs ("Gerard," "Eddy," "Pop Catastrophe") that lurch and groan under the strain of thick rhythm-driven performances.

[i/gk]

See also Honeymoon Killers, Velvet Monkeys.

PUSSYWILLOWS

Spring Fever! (Telstar) 1988

New York's Pussywillows have an obvious mania for '60s girl groups like the Shangri-Las—the seven songs on their brief debut (recorded before the band had ever performed live) mix Lisa, Lisa and Elinor's heavily reverbed three-part harmonies with surfy guitar power-pop. All the tracks are covers, borrowed from such relevant obscuros as the Coupons, the Cinderellas and the Short-Cuts. Although some of the lead vocals are shaky and the concept is shamelessly derivative, Spring Fever! is nonetheless a goodnatured homage. [kss]

PYLON

Gyrate (DB) 1980

Pylon!! EP (nr/Armageddon) 1980

Chomp (DB) 1983

Hits (DB) 1989 ◊

Chain (Sky) 1990 ●

One of the new South's most revered and influential bands, this Athens, Georgia quartet came on like a cross between the B-52's and Gang of Four. Atop thin, almost brittle metallic guitar, muscular bass and no-nonsense drums—which all mesh into stark but inviting dance rhythms—Vanessa Briscoe artlessly shouts/talks/gargles celebrations of life and innocent warnings/wonderings about restrictions on freedom. Though limited in material—the first two records contain about four really good songs all told; the rest are merely okay or repetitive—Pylon is fraught with possibilities for development. The 10-inch Pylon!! EP has two of their best, including the dance-club staple, "Cool."

Promise notwithstanding, Chomp (produced by Chris Stamey and Gene Holder, both then-dB's) was the quartet's swansong. More ambitious in scope, the record incorporates a psychedelic drone in spots; Pylon sometimes sounds less anxious and strident than before. The album includes both melodic (!) sides of a great preceding single ("Crazy" b/w "M-Train") and other cool slices ("Beep," "Gyrate") of floor-shaking art.

After a half-decade of inaction, the original Pylon reunited and played a mid-'88 show in preparation for a full-fledged resurgence. Hits, a 20-track compilation of nearly all their work to date (including both sides of the 1979 "Cool" b/w "Dub" single), cleared the decks with digital sound and set the stage for the band's first new album in seven years.

While retaining the band's traditional bite, Chain gets more melody and texture from Briscoe-Hay's singing and Randy Bewley's sharp guitar jabs. The rhythm section cedes not an inch of dancefloor, but very few of the new songs build obsessively on a single chord. (Actually, three seems to be the optimum chord quantity here.) As a result, "Look Alive," "There It Is," "This/That," "Crunch" and others are memorable for more inviting reasons than the old band's tense sonic harangues. If maturity has softened Pylon's edge somewhat, Chain is still a strong link (sorry) to the past.

[jg/i]

Q-FEEL

Q-Feel (Jive) 1983 + 1989

These tiresomely upbeat British techno-poppers recall the giddy chirp of Pilot, getting down to their appointed dance-music chores with mucho polish and absolutely no soul. The popular club single contained here, "Dancing in Heaven (Orbital Be-Bop)," is a descendant of "Pop Muzik," lacking only that song's charm and originality. [i]

Q-TIPS

See Paul Young.

QUANDO QUANGO

Gifts + Battleships (nr/Factory) 1985

A masterful assortment of big-beat grooves helped make this Anglo-Dutch quartet popular on dancefloors (if not record stores) on both sides of the Atlantic. Latin and jazz-tinged funk shares the spotlight with reggaefied disco; orchestration is primarily busy percussion beneath bass, keyboards and horns, with mostly tuneless, chanted vocals of lyrics that aren't exactly poetry. Playing and production are uniformly sharp, but Quando Quango was best served by 12-inch dance mixes; an entire LP's worth becomes redundant and forgettable. [dgs]

QUEEN LATIFAH

All Hail the Queen (Tommy Boy) 1989 •

The talented herald of a welcome new feminist consciousness in hip-hop, New Jersey's dynamic Queen Latifah (Dana Owens) shakes off years of whore-bitch-victim dogma with pride and power, demonstrating that African-American women can redefine roles just by grabbing a mic and refusing to play boys' games. Latifah's first album—a masterful and original collaboration with producer DJ Mark the 45 King and such family friends as De La Soul, Monie Love and Stetsasonic's Daddy-O—is loaded with memorable tracks in a variety of styles: horn-battered soul ("Dance for Me," "Ladies First"), dub ("The Pros"), high-energy dance ("Come into My House"), Native Tongue hip-pop ("Mama Gave Birth to the Soul Children") and more. (The CD contains three remixes of album tracks.) [i]

QUICK

Mondo Deco (Mercury) 1976

Alpha/Beta EP (Quick Fan Club) 1978

After losing his grip on the Runaways, Kim Fowley discovered the Young Republicans, five male Californians (including drummer Danny Benair) he rechristened the Quick. They aspired to be an adolescent version of Sparks, playing melodic, Anglophilic tunes verging on bubblegum (like, but not as good as, Milk 'n' Cookies). Guitarist/songwriter Steven Hufsteter was pretty much the man in charge, and his limited talents shunted the Quick into a fairly tight mold; Mondo Deco is now more of an amusing artifact than it seemed at the time.

Alpha/Beta, a 10-inch souvenir of the group's unsuccessful attempt to court Elektra Records in 1977, came out early the following year through the band's fan club and showed they could draw on far more power than had previously been indicated. They're still basically Anglo/effete but, even on a version of "Somewhere Over the Rainbow," the Quick could manage real punch. [i/jg]

See also Cruzados, Three O'Clock.

QUIET SUN

See Phil Manzanera.

ROBERT QUINE/FRED MAHER

Basic (Editions EG) 1984 •

New York guitar master Quine (Voidoids/Lou Reed) and ex-Material drummer Maher recorded a mesmerizing no-frills celebration of the sound of the electric guitar. Over the pro forma mechanized rhythm patterns suggested by the title, the pair lay down their riffs and then Quine embroiders them—magically. Don't look for memorable tunes or even clever tricks—this is a player's album, amazingly pure, though not so simple. [mf]

See also Jody Harris and Robert Quine, Richard Hell, Lou Reed.

R R R R R R R

RADIATORS FROM SPACE

TV Tube Heart (nr/Chiswick) 1977

RADIATORS

Ghostown (nr/Chiswick) 1979 + 1989 •

London independent label Chiswick discovered these early Irish punk frontiersmen in Dublin; although never a commercial success, the Radiators from Space were a wonderful find. Their recording career, which actually predated the debut vinyl of such first wavers as the Clash and Elvis Costello, evinces talent and intelligence far beyond many of the forgotten bands of that generation.

TV Tube Heart may not have been revolutionary, but energetic delivery of clever and melodic songs about such soon-to-become-hackneyed topics as the music press and club denizens make it a much better survivor of its era than many now hopelessly dated artifacts. From the outset, Radiators from Space showed themselves to be a better breed of punk.

Ghostown, produced by Tony Visconti, is nearly a power pop record with some unsettling flaws damaging another batch of good tunes. One item is almost identical to later Boomtown Rats (although who recorded it first is unclear); there's also a trite '50s homage that seems out of place. Ghostown does have its moments, though, and several tracks have the same wonderful feel as the second Fingerprinz LP. Obviously a band with great untapped potential, the Radiators were a surprisingly sophisticated bunch whose records are worth hearing. (The reissue has new artwork, a different track sequence and two cuts from a 1988 reunion.)

In 1985, singer/guitarist Philip Chevron surfaced in association with Elvis Costello as a producer and performer, he then joined the Pogues. [i]

See also Pogues.

RADIO BIRDMAN

Burn My Eye EP (Aus. Trafalgar) 1976

Radios Appear (Aus. Trafalgar) 1977 (Sire) 1978

Living Eyes (Aus. WEA) 1981

More Fun! EP (Aus. WEA) 1988

Under the Ashes (Aus. WEA) 1988 •

NEW RACE

The First and the Last (nr/Statik) 1982

VISITORS

The Visitors EP (Aus. Citadel) 1982

The Visitors (Aus. Citadel) 1982

DENIZ TEK

Orphan Tracks (Aus. Citadel) 1982 •

Longtime cult darlings well on their way to becoming one of Australian rock's most enduring legends, Sydney's Radio Birdman sprang from a primordial stew comprised of the Doors, Stooges, MC5 and Blue Öyster Cult. The sextet's 7-inch Burn My Eye melded bits from each of those bands and, in so doing, became a durable archetype for the musical explosion that was about to occur. With twangy, reverberated guitar fleshed out by a barrelhouse piano, Rob Younger's commanding vocals and guitarist Deniz Tek's wandering leads, the EP's "Burn My Eye," "Smith and Wesson Blues" and "I-94" are positively revered by fans of the Aussie underground; the fourth ("Snake") is merely terrific.

Like many primal punks in '77 and '78, Radio Birdman was quick to acknowledge and indulge its stylistic ancestry; Radios Appear opens with a rendition of the Stooges' "TV Eye." (Born in Ann Arbor, Michigan, Tek played a crucial role in bringing the radical fruits of the American Midwest to Australia when he emigrated there in the early '70s.) While "Anglo Girl Desire" and the raucous Detroit tribute "Do the Pop" flirt with the punk upsurge occurring half a world away, the lengthy "Man with the Golden Helmet" sounds genuinely like 1970 vintage, finding the conceptual spot where the Doors and the Stooges intersected. "Descent into the Maelstrom" incorporates a bit of surf music, "Love Kills" is distressingly dreamy and "New Race," Birdman's rallying cry (dig those "Yeh-Hup!" chants), closes the album.

The Saints opened the world's eyes to Australian punk in late '76, and that group's American label went looking in Sydney and Melbourne to see if there were any more like them back home. Sire wound up issuing an overhauled version of Radios Appear with a totally different cover. The international edition retained some of the original's songs—some intact and some re-recorded—and added a chunk of new material, including the phenomenal "Aloha Steve & Danno" (an unapologetic Hawaii Five-O swipe coupled with a nowhere-life-in-front-of-the-TV narrative by Younger), as well as a hot cover of the 13th Floor Elevators' "You're Gonna Miss Me" and "Hit Them Again," a track co-written by Tek and Stooges guitarist Ron Asheton. The revised edition is a bit more aggressive than the original, but retains the same musical sensibilities.

Hard on the heels of their first (and only) worldwide release, Radio Birdman shut themselves up in a Welsh studio and concocted a fine sounding stack of tracks, Living Eyes. Australian fans got to sample the band's clearest recording yet—three years after it was finished. Birdman had broken up one tour after the LP's completion, scattering its members around Australia to go forth and multiply (band-wise), bolstering the country's already thriving underground with numerous new groups. (Canadian-born guitarist Chris Masuak went on to the Screaming Tribesmen. Bassist Warwick Gilbert joined the Lime Spiders.)

Living Eyes is a bit more somber and pensive than its predecessor. Tek coaxes some thoroughly frightening notes from his guitar, and Younger's lyrics conjure up clammy, sweat-soaked images of a world in flames.

There's a flipside, however, on the beachy bubblegum pop of "More Fun" and "Do the Movin' Change." (The LP also contains credible re-recordings of three Burn My Eye tracks.) Radio Birdman breathed its last with "Hanging On," three-and-a-half minutes of dense rock'n'roll history.

In 1981, Tek, Younger and Gilbert reunited to form the short-lived (one Australian tour) New Race with Ron Asheton and former MC5 drummer Dennis Thompson. The First and the Last is an impressive live record that includes searing renditions of the 5's "Looking at You," several Birdman tracks (including "Love Kills" and "Breaks My Heart") and some new originals. The crisp live mix and some deft studio tinkering make this a walloping good platter.

Younger went on to form the New Christs; Tek was part of the Visitors and had a brief solo career before becoming a flight surgeon in the US Navy. The Visitors, a short-lived project that also included Birdman drummer Ron Keeley, released an album in '82 (previewed on a four-song EP) of semi-memorable tracks (like "Euro Girls") that depart from the pair's past work to focus on an overtly '60s-style Lyres sound that relies heavily on Farfisa-style organ and B-movie kitsch Collected from a number of studio sessions, Tek's solo LP (Orphan Tracks) largely resembles Birdman's output, sans the intensity and keyboards. On many of the cuts, Tek's vocals are nearly identical to Younger's.

Although it contains only four songs (two drawn from Living Eyes), the extremely belated More Fun! is the definitive live Birdman record (there are scads of bootlegs as well). Under the Ashes is a boxed set (available on multi-disc vinyl or double-CD) of the band's entire legit catalogue: both editions of Radios Appear, Living Eyes, Burn My Eye (here a 12-inch), More Fun, a remix of the 1978 "Aloha Steve & Danno" single and the New Race album, The First and the Last. [icm]

See also Lime Spiders, New Christs, New Order, Screaming Tribesmen.

RADIO STARS

Songs for Swinging Lovers (nr/Chiswick) 1977

The Holiday Album (nr/Chiswick) 1978

Two Minutes, Mister Smith (nr/Moonlight) 1982

Britain's Radio Stars generally had more good ideas than they knew what to do with. On their two original albums they play fast-moving pop/rock with heavy overtones and a penchant for bizarre lyrical matter. On Songs for Swinging Lovers (even the cover is a poorly executed great idea), they come on like a 1977 version of singer Andy Ellison's legendary '60s psychedelic pop outfit, John's Children; faster and louder, but still decidedly off-center. Bassist/producer Martin Gordon, fresh from a stint in Sparks (a band many compared to John's Children), supplies the odd ditties, covering such topics as rotting corpses, rapists and macaroni'n'mice casseroles. He even adds a jingle for the group's label, "Buy Chiswick Records." If Gordon's way with a tune were always up to his words, the band might have lived up to its name. But the quality of the material is too inconsistent to sustain interest for a whole album—there's too much dull, repetitive riffing.

The Holiday Album suffers from much the same malady as its predecessor: too many throwaways. For that reason, Two Minutes, Mister Smith, a posthumous compilation of singles and choice album tracks, is the Radio Stars album to own. The group's heights were almost all achieved on singles, especially the brilliant "From a Rabbit," a kitchen-sink pop production number of the highest order, included here. [ds]

RAGE TO LIVE

Rage to Live (Bar/None) 1986

Blame the Victims (Bar/None) 1990 •

JONATHAN BOROFSKY/ED

TOMNEY

The Radical Songbirds of Islam [tape] (ROIR) 1987

The dissolution of New York's Individuals produced a number of positive developments. Doug and Janet Wygal formed a group (under their family name) which later included ex-dB Gene Holder; Glenn Morrow launched Bar/None Records (which brought out fine records by They Might Be Giants and others) and formed Rage to Live with ex-Necessaries leader Ed Tomney. Morrow's limited voice proves no serious impediment to enjoyment of the first album's well-written, exuberantly played melodies. Almost a sampler of New York/Hoboken styles, Morrow's songs lean from mild soul to twangy cow-pop to a Marshall Crenshaw-like gossamer; the quartet plays 'em clean and sweet.

A crude and careless electric cover of Crosby, Stills and Nash's "Suite Judy Blue Eyes" sets the general energy level but not the quality range for Blame the Victims, another fine set built on conscientious variety. With a few nods to the first record's polite pop, Rage to Live plays it a little harder and rougher this time. Besides the gently alluring "Deep Blue Sea," the countryish "Divorcee" and the Dylanesque "Again & Agam," there's gritty Gang of Four-ish funk ("Sexy #79"), taut garage rock ("Fireman"), parodic Led Zeppelin quotes ("Joker's Punch") and richly tuneful heartland rock ("My Heroine"). The CD includes eight songs from the first album.

Tomney's side project with conceptual artist Jonathan Borofsky, which involves computer-directed tape manipulation of Borofsky's vocals, is an intriguing but ultimately tedious ambient experiment that sounds like a cellist practicing random notes. [i]

See also Grace Pool, Individuals, Necessaries.

RAGING SLAB

Assmaster (Buy Our) 1987

Raging Slab (RCA) 1989 •

Imagine the thundering '70s sludge that would erupt from a Cuisinart containing Grand Funk Railroad, Blue Öyster Cult, Kiss and Molly Hatchet. That Raging Slab—a New York quintet led by two Washington DC escapees with roots in hardcore and art-funk and bottle-neck guitarist Elyse Steinman—can make all this retro nonsense sound relevant today is no small achievement, but frequent dips into the speedmetal jug help.

Despite an ultra-trebly mix that levels the sonic abilities of a high-tech stereo system with those of an AM portable, Assmaster cranks. Slab's molten fusion of chicken-fried metal and meaty '70s power rock is exciting as hell, and singer/guitarist Gregory Strzempka's lyrics—chock full of transparent double entendres and celebrations of chemical recreation—are never less than prurient. The record is even packaged with its own nifty comic book.

Besides much better songwriting, the band's self-titled major-label debut greatly benefits from Daniel Rey's muscular production. "Don't Dog Me," "Joy Ride" and "Bent for Silver" steamroll past with all the force of a fleet of monster trucks, while "Sorry's All I Got" possesses the kind of big fat hook .38 Special used to ride up the charts. All in all, Raging Slab is a wonderful reminder that not all guilty pleasures come from Sweden. [db]

RAHEEM

The Vigilante (Rap-a-Lot-A&M) 1988 ●

Signed to the majors in the record industry's mad rush to get hip-hop of any sort onto the roster, this Houston rapper (a labelmate of the Ghetto Boys) came up with a great-sounding album that didn't have a commercial prayer. Under Raheem's raps—a mix of mack/gangster crap and less outrageous boasting—the tracks break out into reggae ("Punks Give Me Respect"), hard soul ("Dance Floor") and hard rock ("Shotgun"). In the most intriguing innovation, "Freak to Me" nearly dispenses with drum/bass beats for an effective rhythmic keyboard/turntable pulse. (The CD adds one.) [i]

RAILROAD JERK

Railroad Jerk (Matador) 1990 ●

By dragging Lower East Side New York scum-rock on a Christmas Carol jaunt with the ghost of the Gun Club, this scaly foursome rocks in a hellhound-on-your-tail world all its own. Led by Marcellus Hall (guitar, vocals, harmonica) and Chris Mueller (guitar, vocals), Railroad Jerk takes Led Zeppelin's worst mistreatment of the blues and crosses it with a simpler, more spirited (but ironically lighter) swamp sensibility. Stopping well short of Crampsian luridry, this casual and freewheeling album offers a powerful contrast of dark personality and knotty melodicism; a fascinating Northern realization of Southern roots music that exists outside of specific time and place. [dss/i]

RAILWAY CHILDREN

Reunion Wilderness (nr/Factory) 1987 (Virgin) 1987 ●

Recurrence (Virgin) 1988 ●

Native Place (Virgin) 1990 φ

Named after a 1971 film, this young light Anglo-pop quartet from Wigan (near Manchester) sounds like any number of other northern groups, from the Smiths to James to Aztec Camera. Somehow, the group wound up on the usually adventurous Factory, releasing the singles compiled on the Reunion Wilderness mini-album (expanded by two tracks for American release). Gary Newby's attractive voice is the band's only notable asset; otherwise this exercise in ringing electric guitars and briskly strummed acoustics is entirely routine.

With two real producers (Jamie Lane and Bruce Lampcov) working the board, Railway Children show a little more stylistic breadth on Recurrence, but Newby's songs have yet to demonstrate any special strength or character that would elevate the records beyond mere pleasantness. (And his voice doesn't sound as richly expressive as it did the first time out.)

The overbearing Native Place adds synthesized keyboards, sampled drums, loud guitars and other rock attributes to a new batch of tunes. No longer an unassuming pop group, the Railway Children are growing into dance-oriented chart hacks. "You're young/ And it feels all wrong/ To be someone you're not." Exactly. [i]

RAINCOATS

The Raincoats (nr/Rough Trade) 1979

Odyshape (Rough Trade) 1981

The Kitchen Tapes [tape] (ROIR) 1983

Animal Rhapsody EP (nr/Rough Trade) 1983

Moving (nr/Rough Trade) 1984

The Raincoats introduced four English women parked on the fringes of conventional pop music. Or are they just an avant-garde edition of the Roches? The harmonies are there and the lyrics are esoteric and philosophical, eschewing predictable sentiments, but the music comes together only in spurts. A cover version of "Lola" plays havoc with that song's gender enigma. The rest of the songs just play havoc.

On Odyshape, the scope of the band's sound expands; the mingling of snappy acoustic and jangly electric guitars provides saner contrast to the violin shrieks. There's even a poignant song about a girl who's "Only Loved at Night." But the Raincoats are still no easy listen

The Kitchen Tapes captures a December 1982 New York show, on which the Raincoats are supported by three demi-monde musicians. The playing, while still a bit low on the virtuosity index, shows refinement and development. In spots, the Raincoats spin a shimmery curtain of lovely sound; elsewhere, pan-cultural percussion supports fascinating vocal arrangements. But their potential for cacophony (better organized than before, but boisterous nonetheless) will keep you alternately straining to hear and jamming your fingers in your ears. Moving reprises some of the material from the live cassette; the four-song Animal Rhapsody EP in turn reprises two from the LP. [gf/i]

RAIN PARADE

Emergency Third Rail Power Trip (Enigma) 1983 ●

Explosions in the Glass Palace EP (Enigma) 1984 ●

Beyond the Sunset (Restless) 1985

Crashing Dream (Island) 1986

VIVA SATURN

Viva Saturn EP (Heyday) 1988

VARIOUS ARTISTS

Rainy Day (Serpent-Enigma) 1984 (Serpent-Rough Trade) 1989 ●

Like most of the bands implicated in the West Coast psychedelic revival (the paisley underground, if you will), Rain Parade has a better ear for style than for substance. Most of the genre's bands tend to make very deft, subtle music but have nothing to say; Rain Parade at least knows the nuances of form better than anyone else. And if the Velvet Underground-meets-the Lemon

Pipers pop sound tells more about who they like than who they are, at least the Paraders have good taste.

Emergency Third Rail Power Trip is a gentle record with neatly crafted songs and mildly trippy textures. However, the retreat into style discourages listener identification and, while the songs make good background music, as foreground they're a snore. Explosions in the Glass Palace is a somewhat misleading title: there are, in fact, no explosions on this five-song EP. But the sound is filled out and less generic. The record has a dreamlike quality—where the band once sounded lethargic, it now waxes hypnotic. The psychedelic touches, rather than offering a running historical narrative filled with inside jokes, give the pop structures some depth. Not a glandular jolt, but a nice quiet listen. (Explosions is included on the Emergency Third Rail CD.)

The live-in-Japan Beyond the Sunset (originally released in Japan as Behind the Sunset—that's geography for you), which introduces a new drummer as well as a replacement for guitarist David Roback, is a mite redundant—five songs are from the two previous discs, with three more originals and covers of Television and Green on Red—but not badly executed.

Crashing Dream, Rain Parade's major label debut, has one simply beautiful song ("Depending on You"). Another ("Mystic Green") sounds uncannily like the Records, while "Don't Feel Bad" hybridizes two Beatles songs (you figure out which ones). The album is attractive but flimsy—competent technique in search of a spine and a direction. In other words, it sounds like the work of a band on the verge of breaking up—which, in fact, Rain Parade did not long after the album's release.

With David Roback off leading, in turn, Opal and Mazzy Star, his bass-playing brother (joined by another Rain Parade alumnus, guitarist John Thoman, and several sidemen) reemerged at the helm of Viva Saturn. The eponymous five-song 12-inch—a relaxed, wistful and intermittently rocking disc—finds him mining familiar musical territory in an unselfconscious continuation of his former band's good work.

While the Rain Parade was still a going concern, David Roback organized and produced Rainy Day, a heartfelt but uneven paisley underground supersedion, with members of the Bangles, Three O'Clock, Dream Syndicate and Rain Parade covering their fave tunes by the Velvets, Bob Dylan, Alex Chilton, Jimi Hendrix, Who, Beach Boys, etc. The simple arrangements and enthusiastic readings are fine-to-sublime, but the casual vocal performances are occasionally one-take second-rate.

As a bizarre but not entirely inappropriate postscript, Rain Parade guitarist Matt Pucci went on to record an album with Neil Young's sometime band, Crazy Horse.

See also Opal, Windbreakers. [j/l/i/hd]

RAIN TREE CROW

See Japan.

RAMONES

Ramones (Sire) 1976 •

Leave Home (Sire) 1977 •

Rocket to Russia (Sire) 1977

Road to Ruin (Sire) 1978

It's Alive (nr/Sire) 1979

End of the Century (Sire) 1980

Pleasant Dreams (Sire) 1981

Subterranean Jungle (Sire) 1983

Too Tough to Die (Sire) 1984

Animal Boy (Sire) 1986

Halfway to Sanity (Sire) 1987 •

Ramones Mania (Sire) 1988 •

Brain Drain (Sire) 1989 •

End of the Decade (nr/Beggars Banquet) 1990

All the Stuff (And More) Volume One (Sire) 1990 •

VARIOUS ARTISTS

Rock'n'Roll High School (Sire) 1979 •

DEE DEE KING

"Funky Man" (Rock Hotel) 1987

Standing in the Spotlight (Sire) 1989 •

With just four chords and one manic tempo, New York's Ramones blasted open the clogged arteries of mid-'70s rock, reanimating the music. Their genius was to recapture the short/simple aesthetic from which pop had strayed, adding a caustic sense of trash-culture humor and minimalist rhythm guitar sound. The result not only spearheaded the original new wave/punk movement, but also drew the blueprint for subsequent hardcore punk bands, most of whom unfortunately neglected the essential pop element.

Ramones almost defies critical comment. The fourteen songs, averaging barely over two minutes each, start and stop like a lurching assembly line. Joey Ramone's monotone is the perfect complement to Johnny and Dee Dee's precise guitar/bass pulse. Since the no-frills production sacrifices clarity for impact, printed lyrics on the inner sleeve help even as they mock another pretentious convention—although the four-or-five-line texts of "Now I Wanna Sniff Some Glue," "I Don't Wanna Walk Around with You" and "Loudmouth" are an anti-art of their own. Like all cultural watersheds, Ramones was embraced by a discerning few and slagged off as a bad joke by the uncomprehending majority. It is now inarguably a classic.

The slightly glossier Leave Home is cut from the same cloth: another Ramones' dozen (fourteen hits) and under a half-hour in length. The band's warped Top 40 aspirations emerge on "I Remember You" and "Swallow My Pride," sandwiched between such anthems as "Gimme Gimme Shock Treatment" and "Pinhead." Like "Let's Dance" on Ramones, "California Sun" relates the band to the pandemic morosity that has always informed the best rock'n'roll.

Rocket to Russia is the culmination of the Ramones' primal approach. Virtually all fourteen tracks (including ideally chosen golden oldies "Do You Wanna Dance?" and "Surfin' Bird") are well-honed in execution, arrangement and songwriting wit. Clean production streamlines toe-tappers like "Cretin Hop," "Teenage Lobotomy" and "Rockaway Beach," and emphasizes Joey's increasingly expressive singing on two ballads, "I Don't Care" and "I Wanna Be Well." The LP also contains the Ramones' naïve first attempt at a hit single, "Sheena Is a Punk Rocker."

"Sheena" only scraped the charts, and drummer Tommy Ramone (né Erdelyi) left, to be replaced by ex-Voidoid (and ex-Dust!) Marky Ramone (né Marc Bell). The Ramones had spewed out well over 40 tracks (including a couple of B-sides) inside of two years. They next emerged with Road to Ruin, an understandably downbeat collection. Desperate to join the mainstream, the band lengthened its material, even breaking the three-minute barrier on "I Wanted Everything" and "Questioningly," a touching love song. Despite the perky "I Wanna Be Sedated," pretty "Don't Come Close" and oldie "Needles and Pins," Road to Ruin is a bit lackluster; earlier raveups, unlike "I'm Against It" and "Go Mental," never sounded forced. A rethink seemed in order.

Meanwhile, the band lent their musical and dramatic talents to the movie Rock'n'Roll High School. The soundtrack album includes two new compositions (one the theme song), an eleven-minute live medley of previously recorded tunes, plus the Ramones backing the Paley Brothers ("C'mon Let's Go") and co-star P.J. Soles (on a different version of "Rock'n'Roll High School"). Appropriate songs by various artists fill out the record. Anyone whose appetite for live Ramones was whetted by the film soundtrack should seek out It's Alive, a two-disc London concert recording (with Tommy drumming) that pretty much reprises their first three albums.

End of the Century features intimidating production by the legendary Phil Spector. The band responds with a good brace of songs whose polish and (relative) wordiness show them outgrowing punk. Dubious bonus: Joey warbling "Baby, I Love You." On the Graham Goldman-produced Pleasant Dreams, the Ramones move away from their pioneering minimalism into heavy metal territory, although distinctive lyrics proved they hadn't lost their grasp of teenage angst.

Subterranean Jungle put the Ramones back to where they once belonged: junky '60s pop adjusted for current tastes. That means not only a couple of acid-age oldies ("Time Has Come Today," "Little Bit o' Soul") but original tunes with male protagonists hung up on girls and themselves. It also means easing off the break-neck rhythm that was once Ramones dogma. Subterranean Jungle is an underrated item in the band's canon.

On Too Tough to Die—with Richie Ramone (Reinhardt) as the new drummer and Tommy Erdelyi returning as co-producer—the Ramones got serious about stealing back some thunder from the hardcore punk scene they'd inspired. The sound is more ferocious than ever, and they dip back into quick-hit song lengths. Some by-now predictable macho sentiments (the title track, "I'm Not Afraid of Life") are offset by the token dose of sensitivity ("Howling at the Moon," guest-produced by Eurythmician Dave Stewart). But the Eddie Cochranesque "No Go" that closes the album shows they haven't lost their sense of humor.

The Ramones' big release in, what was for them, an otherwise quiet 1985 was "Bonzo Goes to Bitburg," a topical UK 45 assailing Ronald Reagan for the itinerary of his German vacation. That song, retitled "My Brain Is Hanging Upside Down," turned up on Animal Boy. Produced by ex-Plasmatic Jean Beauvoir, the Ramones resemble a straight rock band as never before (mostly in the drum sound and articulated rhythm guitar). The animal-theme record has typically entertaining entries (Richie's "Somebody Put Something in My Drink," a wistful ballad called "She Belongs to Me," the hopefully anthemic "Something to Believe In"); Dee Dee (the LP's main songwriter) affects a quasi-British accent to sing "Love Kills," a Pistols-styled tribute to Sid'n Nancy that wasn't used in Alex Cox's film. Meanwhile, the nostalgically terse "Eat That Rat" is the Ramones' closest brush with punk in eons.

The years of stylistic foundering ended on Halfway to Sanity, a confident-sounding dose of Ramones fundamentalism. The dozen cuts mix basic guitar riffs ("I Know Better Now," "Bop 'Til You Drop") and effervescent pop ("Go Lil' Camaro Go," with guest vocals by Debbie Harry, "A Real Cool Time"), adding some of the most intriguingly thoughtful lyrics ("I Wanna Live," "Garden of Serenity") in the band's career. This encouraging return to near-top form also benefits from gutsy rock production by the band and guitarist Daniel Rey. (The UK CD adds the bubblegum classic "Indian Giver" and "Life Goes On.") Upon the album's release, Richie quit over a salary dispute and Marc Bell reclaimed the drummer's seat.

The Ramones Mania compilation packs in 30 digitally remastered cuts (some of the tracks sound ace; others don't fare so well), adding detailed annotation and Billy Altman's voluminous liner notes. Although the song selection is straightforward, the running order is entirely non-chronological; a British B-side ("Indian Giver"), a previously unvinylized movie mix of "Rock'n'Roll High School" and a couple of 45 versions make it mildly attractive to collectors. Despite such dubious inclusions as "Commando," "Wart Hog" and "Momma's Boy," Ramones Mania isn't a bad textbook for Ramones 101.

Besides a T-shirt and poster, the luxurious limited edition (2,500) boxed set entitled End of the Decade contains half a dozen UK 12-inch singles (with some B-side rarities), dating from 1984-'87. A strange era to cover in such an expensive package.

The uneven quality of Brain Drain—produced with no special character by Bill Laswell—is most easily understood in light of Dee Dee's subsequent departure from the band. Clinging together in an uneasy alliance, the Ramones here sound aimless and diffuse on all but a few tracks. So while the album sinks to the grumbly "Don't Bust My Chops," it also rises to deliver the anthemic inspirational message of "I Believe in Miracles," the clumsy but convincing "Pet Sematary" (indulging Stephen King's rock music fandom for a horror film theme), and the poignant if unseasonal "Merry Christmas (I Don't Want to Fight Tonight)." Like a shopworn ghost, the band's negligible cover of "Palisades Park" punkifies a pop classic (well, a familiar pop oldie) with little of the bratty hubris that once invigorated such endeavors.

Dee Dee has tried to go solo twice (so far) with no success. Redubbing himself Dee Dee King, the goofy bassist made an inexcusably stupid rap-rock 12-inch ("Funky Man") in 1987, and then released an entire album just months prior to Brain Drain. And he still went ahead and left the group. Standing in the Spotlight finds him talking over music, but it's hardly a rap record; Dee Dee's nerdy sense of rhythm, inane good-time lyrics and la-de-da delivery make it a laughable disaster. The slickness of the Daniel Rey-produced/played tracks—a variety show of rock, oldies and pop idioms (with minor assists from Debbie Harry and others)—only underscores the star's awfulness. Most embarrassing are two surprising stabs at autobiography: the schmaltzy "Baby Doll" and the (hypothetically) bilingual "German Kid," which contains the eminently mortal "It's pretty cool to be half German."

All the Stuff (And More) Volume One looks like another greatest hits compilation, but is actually the one-CD/cassette pairing of Ramones and Leave Home, combined with two previously unreleased demos, a 1977 B-side ("Babysitter") and a live pairing of "California Sun" with "I Don't Wanna Walk Around with You." Piling 33 of these terse explosions of punk-pop genius onto one non-stop program makes for an avalanche of fun. [si/i]

See also Holly and the Italians, Rattlers.

RANDY RAMPAGE

See D.O.A.

LEE RANALDO

See Sonic Youth.

RANK AND FILE

Sundown (Slash-Warner Bros.) 1982

Long Gone Dead (Slash-Warner Bros.) 1984

Rank and File (Rhino) 1987 •

Rank and File first came together in Austin, Texas, although three of its four original members were Californians who had played in San Diego's Dils and San Francisco's Nuns. The distance from those early punk outfits is more than geographical: Rank and File was formed to play delicately crafted cowboy rock. (Imagine if Marshall Crenshaw had been raised on a straight diet of Hank Williams.) David Kahne's production of Sundown gives a squeaky clean sound to the tuneful and tasty pop numbers, which also benefit from pretty harmonies and confident playing. Effortlessly enjoyable.

But, alas, too good to last. Long Gone Dead retains only half the band—brothers Chip and Tony Kinman (the main creative force on Sundown, writing almost all the songs)—joined by such temps as Tom Petty drummer Stan Lynch. It's hard to pin down the problem: Long Gone Dead has all the right ingredients but only a skimpy bit of Sundown's evocative magnificence. Perhaps it's Jeff Eyrich's production, which is fussier than Kahne's and partially obscures the Kinmans' melody-laden writing and rich vocals. Lacking the first LP's lost and lonesome prairie feel, Long Gone Dead is appealing but disappointing.

Hanging onto Long Gone Dead guitarist Jeff Ross, the Kinmans added a permanent drummer and kept going, but didn't release another album for three years. The loud run-of-the-mill rock production on Rank and File doesn't totally obscure the melodies and Tony's fine voice, but the band's wandering personality all but evaporates in the guitar solos, bass riffs and overeager drumming. [i]

See also Blackbird, Dils, True Believers.

ALAN RANKINE

See Associates.

RANKING ROGER

See (English) Beat, General Public.

RAPED

Pretty Paedophiles EP (nr/Parole) 1977

CUDDLY TOYS

Guillotine Theatre (nr/Fresh) 1981

Trials and Crosses (nr/Fresh) 1982

As (lower) class-of-'77 punks, these London butt-heads released a 7-inch EP of sub-Clash pop aggression which included their idiotic but hardly shocking 1:20 theme song, "Raped." Along with a name change to Cuddly Toys, the quartet dyed their hair, donned androgynous threads and began playing Bowie-style glam-rock. Despite an auspicious debut 45 (covering "Madman," the only song ever co-written by Bowie and Marc Bolan), their first album is merely a pathetic attempt to clone Ziggy Stardust; lacking anything original or clever to add, it's a total flop. Trials and Crosses, by a revamped lineup (retaining only singer Sean Purcell), tries to be more modern by adding early-'80s rhythms and keyboards, but comes up similarly devoid of creativity and substance. [i]

RAPEMAN

Budd EP (Touch and Go) 1988 •

Two Nuns and a Pack Mule (Touch and Go) 1989 •

Between the dissolution of Big Black and his career as a noise-loving record producer, Chicago's Steve Albini led this steel-edged thrash trio, whose crudely provocative name (borrowed from a Japanese comic character) contributed to the brevity of its existence. Three of the four songs on the Budd 12-inch were recorded live and loose, an unfocused batch of impressive shards that doesn't make a convincing introduction to the group.

Two Nuns and a Pack Mule (which, like Budd, has a nifty die-cut cover) fits Albini's distinctive meltdown guitar and shriek vocals into rough song forms outlined by the ex-Scratch Acid rhythm section of David Wm. Sims (bass) and Rey Washam (drums). Whether paraphrasing Sonic Youth ("Kim Gordon's Panties"), dismantling '70s rock ("Radar Love Lizard"), slowly discussing sex scenarios ("Trouser Minnow") or revving up ambiguously intended furiosities ("Hated Chinese"), Rapeman spits out sparks with the conviction of Albini's acerbic intelligence. (Both records are on a single CD.) [i]

See also Big Black, Jesus Lizard.

RAS MICHAEL

See Bad Brains.

RAT AT RAT R

Rock & Roll Is Dead, Long Live Rat At Rat R (Neutral)
1985

Stainless Steel/Free Dope for Cops & Kids EP
(Purge/Sound League) 1988

Rat at Rat R (Sound League) 1991

Rat At Rat R (you figure out the anagram, sport) was one of the brighter lights of the NYC noise-groove scene back in '83. Originally hailing from Philadelphia, the quartet was formed in '81 by poet/guitarist Victor Poison-tête, and reassembled on the Lower East Side a year or so later. Their craven guitar-crack, female bass player (Glenn Branca's cousin, Sonda Andersson), and shouty-dunty approach to tunerism soon put them in the company of Live Skull, Swans and Sonic Youth. At the time, Rat At Rat R was probably the most trad-sounding of these combos, but the group imploded before garnering much positive notice outside its neighborhood. The records combine swinging, fucked-up guitar rock with neo-artsy mouth action. [bc]

RATIONAL YOUTH

Cold War Night Life (Can. YUL) 1982

Rational Youth EP (Can. Capitol) 1983

Heredity (Capitol) 1985

Although the Montreal synthesizer trio occasionally lapses into lyrical pomposity, for the most part, Rational Youth serves up fresh sounds and workable songs that show lots of promise. A bit like early Human League but better-natured, Cold War Night Life is a well-produced LP from talented technicians with minds and hearts.

Rational Youth added a drummer and exchanged another member by the time of the major-label EP, a slick and poppy five-song 12-inch that includes a remake of the first LP's "Just a Sound in the Night" and two previews (the OMD-derived "In Your Eyes" and "Holiday in Bangkok") of the second album.

With an altogether different lineup (singer/synthesist Tracy Howe is the only holdover; ex-Klaatu guitarist Dee Long is his main collaborator), Heredity blends in more guitar for increased commercial appeal, but maintains a certain down-to-earth spunkiness that distinguishes Rational Youth from other post-Duran tech-pop bands. Flash of fame footnote: the group was later featured—on the soundtrack and in a concert scene—in an early Kiefer Sutherland movie called Crazy Moon. [i]

RATTLERS

Rattled! (PVC) 1985

Led by Joey Ramone's soundalike younger brother Mickey Leigh, New York's Rattlers take a less stylized but equally sincere approach to essential '60s pop on Rattled!, a swell LP of zesty originals and cool covers partially produced by ex-Ramone Tommy Erdelyi. The quartet uses a touch of keyboards and neat vocal harmonies to dress up simply drawn tunes like the melodic "I Won't Be Your Victim," the beat-era "Pure + Simple" and imaginary monster-movie theme song "On the Beach." An ace version of the Nightcrawlers' classic "Little Black Egg" is worth the price of admission, but the rest of the LP won't disappoint either. [i]

See also Lester Bangs.

RAUNCH HANDS

El Rauncho Grande EP (Relativity) 1985

Learn to Whap-a-Dang with the Raunch Hands (Relativity)
1986

Payday (Crypt) 1989

Have a Swig (Crypt) 1990

In their mid-'80s heyday (such as it was), New York's Raunch Hands were retro-rock representatives of that presumed golden age of sleaze, the mid-'50s to mid-'60s. Thus El Rauncho Grande offers neo-rockabilly, neo-R&B and even neo-Mex, all filtered through the band's beer-heightened (lowered?) sensibilities. Learn to Whap-a-Dang is less quaint than the EP, and its denser band sound helps the Raunch Hands barrel through their own R&B: Raucous & Bawdy. Mike Chandler isn't much of a singer, but attitude counts for a lot here, and guitarist Mike Tchang's occasional sax is a definite plus. Too bad their originals (about half of each record) can't match the '50s obscurities for sheer mindlessness—not counting Whap-a-Dang's "Kangaroo Juice," an "original" stolen from Eddie Cochran.

On following recordings the band increased its songwriting contributions, with mixed results. The last thing the Raunch Hands' chosen genre needs is ambition, and Payday sometimes chokes on it; thus "Detox Moon," an over-five-minute (!) wino response to the Stones' "Moonlight Mile." The schoolyard couplets of "Bottle-Now!" (in praise of cheap booze) and immature humor of "Hare-Raisin'" (in praise of the Raunch Hands' hapless career) prove that less is definitely more.

Which may be why Have a Swig is under a half-hour long. Highlights here include a lascivious stomp, "Everybody Loves Yo' Mama," and the less-than-existential "Naked, Naked, Naked." More power to these guys, whose gutter-view perspective has undeniable aroma and charm. [si]

See also Outta Place.

RAVE-UPS

Class Tramp EP (Fun Stuff) 1984

Town + Country (Fun Stuff) 1985

The Book of Your Regrets (Epic) 1988 •

Chance (Epic) 1990 •

At the time they were being touted as the next big thing to erupt from the LA club scene, the Rave-Ups were working in the mailroom and warehouse of A&M Records. Although launched by singer/guitarist Jimmer Podrasky in Pittsburgh, the group on the 1984 EP was a quartet he assembled in California. Class Tramp is a mighty impressive debut: a hook-laden six-song rocking pop collection that reveals Podrasky as an inventive, commercially minded songwriter with a wealth of ideas and a fresh lyrical perspective. Richly multi-tracked guitars, crisp rhythms and easy-to-like vocals buttress original tunes that deftly sidestep power pop and other pigeonholes.

Podrasky and drummer Timothy Jimenez acquired a new bassist and guitarist before recording the refined and ruralized Town + Country, a good (not great) record that gives away some of the EP's '60sish pluck to take an energetic crack at unstylished Southwestern twang and winds up sounding a shade or two less distinguished than before. Pedal-steel master Sneaky Pete Kleinow plays on two tracks. The record still manages a fair amount of variety: "Remember (Newman's Love-song)" is almost a bluegrass breakdown done as a rock song, while "Positively Lost Me" (one of two songs the band performed on camera for Pretty in Pink; A&M graciously left the tunes off the soundtrack LP) tells of a broken relationship with only a mild country touch. The lighthearted Beach Boys car-song parody of "In My Gremlin" harks back to Class Tramp; Dylan's "You Ain't Goin' Nowhere" becomes an uptempo rocker.

The Rave-Ups had legal problems getting off Fun Stuff and couldn't find the record industry's on-ramp for a long while. Three years passed before Epic issued The Book of Your Regrets, a downcast but determined effort. Guitarist Terry Wilson takes a more prominent role here, co-writing most of the material with Podrasky and expanding his instrumental contribution to include mandolin, keyboards and harmonica. While retaining a glimmer of the previous LP's country inflection, this well-produced (by David Leonard) record leans towards the textured, harmony-laden sound of West Coasters like Translator, Peter Case and Wire Train. Consistently invigorating and remarkably original, The Book of Your Regrets signals the Rave-Ups' unyielding vitality and creative resources.

The uneven Chance (named after Podrasky's infant son, whose photograph appears on the album cover) repants the previous album's strong western folk-rock sound with a mild '60s psychedelic overcoat and a more optimistic view of life. Despite occasional clunkiness in the writing and performances, Chance has the surging "She Says (Come Around)," the Televisionesque "Hamlet Meets John Doe," the rip-snorting "The Best I Can't" and a few other songs with equally oblique titles to recommend it. [i]

RAW POWER

Screams from the Gutter (Toxic Shock) 1985

Wop Hour EP (Toxic Shock) 1986

After Your Brain (Toxic Shock) 1987

In an interesting bit of Euro-American hardcore fraternity, the debut album by this Italian punk band—five guys from Reggio—was recorded in Indiana and issued by a California label. On Screams from the Gutter, Raw Power plays genre creations like "Hate," "Nihilist," "Bastard" and "My Boss" with fiery punk venom, helpfully singing them in English. (The cassette adds the contents of Wop Hour, a subsequent four-song 7-inch.)

After Your Brain offers far better production and more instrumental refinement, but Raw Power still burns up the grooves on thirteen new cuts like "You Are Fired," "We Shall Overcome," "Shut Up" and "What For." Mauro's careful diction makes him clearer and more understandable than many American vocalists; the two guitarists (one of them a new arrival in the band) work hard to avoid sounding routine. A powerful piece of work. [i]

RAYBEATS

Roping Wild Bears EP (nr/Don't Fall off the Mountain)

1981

Guitar Beat (PVC) 1981

It's Only a Movie! (Shanachie) 1983

DANNY AMIS

Whiplash! EP (Coyote) 1983

With so many late-'70s musicians possessing a strong sense of rock'n'roll history in addition to their overriding interest in style, the emergence of groups like the instrumental Raybeats was inevitable. Pat Irwin, Jody Harris and Don Christensen, refugees from the New York City no wave avant-garde, had been in such outfits as the Contortions and 8 Eyed Spy. Together (with a procession of bassists including, on Guitar Beat, Minneapolis' Danny Amis), they made frothy rock dance pieces, recalling the tightly structured formats of the Ventures, Duane Eddy and the Shadows. The simple melodies are defined by sparkling guitars, junky organ and wailing sax—a golden opportunity for most educated bands to condescend. But the Raybeats never did. They obviously enjoyed what they were playing, and that made their records absolutely lovable.

The Wild Bears EP offers four songs (including the Shadows' "Rise and Fall of Flingel Bunt") on a 12-inch. The UK and US versions of the peppy Guitar Beat, ably produced by Martin Rushent, differ by two tracks. It's Only a Movie! introduces electronic instruments (and ceramic destruction on "Doin' the Dishes") to remind listeners of the band's actual time frame, but also includes appropriately dated covers: Henry Mancini's "Banzai Pipeline" and Booker T's "Jelly Bread."

Amis' Overtones made one wonderful surf-rock single ("Red Checker Wagon") for Twin/Tone before he headed out East to join the Raybeats. After leaving the group, Amis continued to explore '60s guitar instrumentals on his own, recording the five evocative Mitch Easter-produced twangers that comprise the 12-inch Whiplash!. [jy/i]

See also Jody Harris, Romeo Void.

RAYMEN

Going Down to Death Valley (Ger. Rebel) 1985

Desert Drive (Ger. Rebel) 1986

Tonight the Raymen: From the Trashcan to the Ballroom (Blue Turtle) 1988

Imagine a band playing Cramps-type stuff, somewhere out in the heartland. Now imagine that heartland's in Germany, and you'll have some idea of how bizarre the Raymen are. The guitar-bass-drums-singer dementobilly combo hails from Dortmund, which has been described as Deutschland's Gary, Indiana; maybe they're not as inspired as the Cramps or Shockabilly, but fun anyhow.

The first LP is charmingly wacked-out and trashy. One leader of the hit parade is "I'm a Hillbilly Werewolf," which Hank Ray sings with as much sincerity as anyone could muster for such a song. (His heavily echoed baritone typically hits the right notes at least two-thirds of the time.) The title track is the Raymen's idea of traditional cowboy country music (where they're usually most effective) and includes suitably strange slide guitar. Axeman Martin Toulouse uses feedback, slide, fuzzbox and twang-bar to excellent noisemaking effect throughout the LP (if anything, not often enough). A so-horrible-it's-grand rendition of "Locomotion" completes the picture.

Desert Drive isn't as good. The new rhythm section is an improvement, but the material doesn't hold up. Toulouse puts down his slide and doesn't go wild as often. Ray is most fun when he's frantically stuttering and echoing every word into complete unintelligibility, which doesn't happen much here.

The third album continues both trends. There's more music (seventeen tracks on two 45 rpm discs) but less frenzy from Ray and less craziness from Toulouse (if it's he—guitar is credited to Junior Ray). When he does let it all hang out, as on "Saturn Doll," it sounds like it could well be our man. There's still some of the crew's trademark wigginess, but only on half the tracks; they do, however, take the time to bludgeon the Contours' "Do You Love Me" into complete submission. [jg]

REAL KIDS

Real Kids (Red Star) 1978 (Norton) 1991
Outta Place (Star-Rhythm) 1982
All Kindsa Jerks Live (Fr. New Rose) 1983
Hit You Hard (Fr. New Rose) 1983

TAXI BOYS

Taxi Boys EP (Star-Rhythm) 1981
Taxi Boys EP (Bomp!) 1981

REAL KIDS/TAXI BOYS

Girls! Girls! Girls! (Fr. Lolita) 1983

PRIMITIVE SOULS

Primitive Souls EP (Aus. Grown Up Wrong!) 1987

JOHN FELICE & THE LOWDOWNS

Nothing Pretty (Ace of Hearts) 1988 •

The Real Kids were one of Boston's earliest new wave bands; their debut album is full of dynamite tracks that take the trashier aspect of the Rolling Stones and couple it with the high-power guitar approach of the Ramones. Frontman (and onetime Modern Lover) John Felice not only provides tough guitar and distinctive lead vocals, he has a knack for writing clear, infectious melodies. Spin "All Kindsa Girls," "She's Alright" or "My Baby's Book" for proof.

Poor sales of the Real Kids' first LP led Felice to become a Ramones roadie, but he subsequently returned to Boston and formed the Taxi Boys, whose two EPs (each with a different lineup) carry on the Real Kids tradition with high-energy '60s garage-band rock. The production of the records might be crude, but Felice is in fine form on both. (The Bomp! release is a 12-inch, the earlier one a 7-inch pressed on pink vinyl.)

Reactivating the Real Kids with a new and improved lineup, Felice then made the dandy Outta Place. Harder yet still pop-oriented, with stellar production by Andy Paley, the record is strengthened by consistently good material and plenty of rock'n'roll spirit. After releasing the album in France, New Rose kept the Real Kids' recording career going, issuing another sharp studio LP, Hit You Hard, and the live-in-Paris All Kindsa Jerks Live, which recaps Felice's song catalogue onstage with fiery enthusiasm. The Lolita release is a Real Kids/Taxi Boys compilation.

Ex-Real Kids Alpo Paulino (bass) and Billy Borgioli (guitar) lead the Primitive Souls, whose 12-inch—two originals by each—follows the righteous path of bar-band pop'n'roll with tuneful flair and serious skill. (For the record, Paulino has the better singing voice and slightly catchier songs.)

After five years of national invisibility, Felice returned, unrepentant and embittered, with a rocking new trio and the Nothing Pretty album. Although his casual writing and punchy guitar playing is in fine shape, uncertain singing undercuts the songs' impact; Felice's attitude is, like his voice, a little worse for wear. The title track rues the loss of innocence; "I'll Never Sing That Song Again" describes a view of life as a musician that is both cynical and poignant; "Nowadaze Kids" tells the other side of the story, castigating modern audiences for lacking the rock'n'roll spirit that inspires him. Fans who fear that he's becoming too disgusted to carry on should take note of the LP's final cut, "Can't Play It Safe." [cpl/i]

REAL ROXANNE

The Real Roxanne (Select) 1988 •

Like the endless claims to popular pizzeria names—Manhattan currently boasts eleven "Original Ray's"—this young New Yorker was one contender in the 1984 "Roxanne, Roxanne" fracas, which boiled down to a two-for-all with Roxanne Shanté. By the time either woman released an album, however, there couldn't have been any less interest in the object of UTFO's romantic frustration. Nonetheless, with fine sample-heavy old-school production by the likes of Jam Master Jay and Howie Tee, The Real Roxanne is irascible nasty-girl fun, a salty set of boasts, putdowns and don't-mess-with-the-Ro' antagonism. [i]

See also UTFO.

RECKLESS SLEEPERS

See Jules Shear.

RECOIL

See Depeche Mode.

RECORDS

Shades in Bed (nr/Virgin) 1979
The Records (Virgin) 1979
Crashes (Virgin) 1980
Music on Both Sides (Virgin Int'l) 1982
A Sunny Afternoon in Waterloo (nr/Waterfront) 1988 •
Smashes, Crashes and Near Misses [CD] (nr/Virgin) 1988 •

Paying for the Summer of Love (Skyclad) 1990 •

HUW GOWER

Guitarophilia EP (X-Disque) 1984

JUDE COLE

Jude Cole (Warner Bros.) 1987 •
A View from 3rd Street (Reprise) 1990 •

Like the Motors, the Records were reborn pub-rockers, who made a giant leap into the present by leaving their history behind and starting afresh with finely honed pop craftsmanship and the full-scale record company support they had never previously enjoyed. While the Motors went for grandiose production numbers, the Records—led by ex-Kursaal Flyer drummer/songwriter Will Birch—made sharp, tuneful confections that offerred maximum hooks-per-groove in a classic Anglo-pop style not unlike the Hollies, with similarly brilliant harmonies and ringing guitars.

Shades in Bed (resequenced, retitled The Records and dressed in a completely different cover for America) is a wonderful LP, featuring song after song of pure pop with clever lyrics and winning melodies. Almost every track could have been a single; "Starry Eyes" and "Teenarama" were actually released, which left "Girls That Don't Exist," "Affection Rejected" and "Girl" as untested chart material. The English album included a bonus 12-inch, High Heels (an untitled 7-inch in the US), of the Records doing four classic tracks, including the Kinks' "See My Friends" and Spirit's "1984."

Crashes, produced mainly by Craig Leon, showcased a revised lineup, Jude Cole having taken Huw Gower's guitar slot. (Gower resurfaced a continent away in David Johansen's band around 1982.) Nothing here can match the first LP's charm except for two tracks produced by Mick Glossop—"Man with a Girl Proof Heart," written while Birch was still in the Kursaals, and "Hearts in Her Eyes," which was done better by the Searchers later that year. At best a weak rehash of the first LP, Crashes is passable, but hardly a great follow-up.

After a two-year recording gap, Music on Both Sides introduced a new five-piece lineup, with guitarist Dave Whelan and singer Chris Gent joining the surviving core of Birch, bassist Phil Brown and guitarist John Wicks. Birch produced this muddled but generally pleasant album, which sounds like Rubber Soul with a crappy rock singer. Not a great parting shot, although less annoyingly precious than their early work.

Gower's solo EP is pretty much in the Records' vein: well-crafted, unprepossessing rock-pop, but without their often-cloying preciousness. An earnest enough performer, the left-handed guitarist is a limited songwriter and not much of a singer; the EP's best track is a fascinating cover of Graeme Douglas' brilliant "Do Anything You Wanna Do," originally recorded by Eddie and the Hot Rods.

Unexpectedly, the late-'80s saw a sudden resurgence of Records records. (The original group even got back together long enough to cut a version of Brian Wilson's "Darlin'" for 1990's Smiles, Vibes, & Harmony tribute record.) A Sunny Afternoon in Waterloo—the fruits of a one-day '78 songwriting demo session—finds the Records playing simple, hard-driving Rockpilish rock'n'roll, reportedly in the hopes of selling some songs Birch had written with Dr. Feelgood, then enjoying large UK success, in mind. Although the effort was commercially unsuccessful, the loss was all Dr. F's, as the music is brilliant, a taut mixture of strong melodies and amusing lyrics about loving, drinking and driving.

Another set of demos—recorded during '78 as preparation for the Records' first album—comprise the bulk of the white-vinyl Paying for the Summer of Love. All but two of Shades in Bed's songs appear in raw—but perfectly presentable, and not drastically different—form here, alongside self-produced renditions of other early tracks ("Hearts in Her Eyes," B-sides like "Wives and Mothers of Tomorrow" and "Held Up High," and "If I Write Your Number in My Book," written for, but unrecorded by, Rachel Sweet). A delightful companion piece.

Although by no means definitive, Smashes, Crashes and Near Misses is a carefully annotated 20-song compilation containing about half each of the first two albums, a modest three-song reminder of the third, a couple of B-sides ("Held Up High" and "Paint Her Face") and previously unreleased outtakes of "I Don't Remember Your Name" and "The Same Mistakes" (two songs that appear on Crashes). In a case of rarer isn't necessarily better, the CD ends with a previously unreleased Mick Glossop-produced version of "Rock and Roll Love Letter" that isn't nearly as good as the band's 1979 single of the song.

Jude Cole, the Illinois guitarist/singer who replaced Gower for Crashes, had shaken off any vestiges of the Records' joyful power pop by the time he made his own slickly commercial heartland-rock albums. [i]

See also Kursaal Flyers.

RED BOX

The Circle & the Square (Sire) 1986 •

This fascinating London twosome takes an offbeat and rewarding direction on their first album, folding American Indian (covering Buffy Sainte-Marie in the process) and other ethnic folk influences into sophisticated modern pop creations for an unpredictable and indescribable pan-ethnic mélange. Unlike arid studio-based partnerships, Simon Toulson Clarke (vocals, acoustic guitar) and Julian Close (programming, flute, sax) make warm and varied music, much of it employing a vocal chorus which adds African color. The evocative lyrics bring a global political intelligence to the songs, making them not only appealing but affecting as well. Something like a less stern Peter Gabriel LP, this imaginative and engaging record is simply astonishing. [i]

RED CRAYOLA

Parable of Arable Land (Int'l Artists) 1967 + 1980

(nr/Radar) 1978

God Bless the Red Crayola and All Who Sail on Her (Int'l Artists) 1968 + 1980 (nr/Radar) 1979

Soldier-Talk (nr/Radar) 1979

Three Songs on a Trip to the United States

(nr/Recommended) 1984

Parable of Arable Land/God Bless the Red Crayola [CD]

(nr/Charly) 1990 •

ART & LANGUAGE AND THE RED CRAYOLA

Corrected Slogans (Music Language) 1976

(nr/Recommended) 1982

Kangaroo? (Rough Trade) 1981

Black Snakes (Sw. Rec-Rec) 1983

MAYO THOMPSON

Corky's Debt to His Father (nr/Glass) 1986

Red Crayola first surfaced on Texas' International Artists label during the psychedelic '60s. Charter member Mayo Thompson (guitar, vocals) would remain the group's mainstay throughout its checkered career, but the lineup that recorded 1967's Parable of Arable Land contained someone whose fame would not be in music: drummer Frederick Barthelme (younger brother of post-modern master Donald Barthelme), a widely acclaimed avatar of the "dirty realist" school of American fiction. Barthelme quit the group after that one album, but he and Thompson have remained close, and the writer contributed cover photos to Three Songs.

The first two Red Crayola records couldn't be more different. Parable of Arable Land is vintage psychedelia that boasts a more engaged intelligence than most of the era's aural acid baths, and its excellent songs ("Hurricane Fighter Plane" obviously influenced Pere Ubu's sound; Spacemen 3 later covered "Transparent Radiation") are punctuated by "Free Form Freak Outs," random noise excursions by a large group of Texas hippies. God Bless the Red Crayola is a considerably more subdued but equally eccentric effort, with an emphasis on very brief, acoustic-based numbers; "Ravi Shankar: Parachutist" and "Tina's Gone to Have a Baby" are among its memorable titles. (Galaxie 500 covered the LP's "Victory Garden" on a 1990 single.)

Red Crayola then faded into limbo until turning up to do sessions in 1976 with the Art & Language organization, which yielded the demos collected on Corrected Slogans; the album parallels somewhat the serious/silly music of Robert Wyatt. Largely acoustic in nature, Corrected Slogans has extremely simple songs, operatic vocals and complex lyrics that are satirical and/or political.

Exhilarated by the critical success of Pere Ubu's dada punk, Radar Records reissued Parable of Arable Land in 1978 and God Bless in 1979. Mayo Thompson and New York drummer Jesse Chamberlain reformed Red Crayola to make Soldier-Talk, aided by Lora Logic and the entirety of Pere Ubu (which Thompson later joined). Uniting Red Crayola's flower-power garage music with modernistic, fragmented arrangements and a fierce, broken beat, the album centers on cynical military themes. A challenging work.

Reuniting Red Crayola with Art & Language, Kangaroo? tones down the chaos for a musical discussion of Soviet Communist ideals and history, including the gentle, poignant instrumental, "1917." More in the style of avant-garde theater music than rock, the LP is like Brecht out of Vivian Stanshall, with impressive results. Black Snakes has more of Thompson's dramatic vocals and features Ubu's Allen Ravenstine on sax and synth. The cornerstone tracks are "The Sloths," a peculiar rewrite of a James Thurber short story (The Unicorn in the Garden), the puerile "Ratman, the Weightwatcher" and "A Portrait of V.I. Lenin in the Style of Jackson Pollock."

Three Songs on a Trip to the United States is packaged as an EP, but it's practically album length; the A-side contains the three songs themselves, while the flip is a generous chunk from a German concert featuring the stripped-down lineup of Thompson, drummer Chamberlain and synthesist Ravenstine. Both sides find the Crayola back in the sometimes crazed, sometimes obtuse psychedelic mode of the band's first Radar 7-inch, "Wives in Orbit." (The live side contains a reading of that tune that's even more frenzied than the original.) The studio side is frustratingly murky. As intriguing as it would be to hear what the Texas-born expatriate has to say about a visit to the country he left, it's impossible to make out much more than a phrase here and there. Still, it's a safe guess that "California Girl" isn't a song of praise; nor, for that matter, is "Monster." Pretty slamming stuff nonetheless and, like the rest of the Crayola's oeuvre, a genuine mind trip in almost every sense of the term. [sg/i/gk]

See also Pere Ubu.

RED CROSS

Red Cross EP (Posh Boy) 1980

Born Innocent (Smoke 7) 1982

REDD KROSS

Teen Babes from Monsanto (Gasatanka) 1984

Born Innocent (Frontier) 1986 •

Neurotica (Big Time) 1987 •

Third Eye (Atlantic) 1990 ◊

VARIOUS ARTISTS

The Siren (Posh Boy) 1980

Desperate Teenage Lovedolls (Gasatanka) 1984

Lovedolls Superstar (SST) 1986

TATER TOTZ

Alien Sleestacks from Brazil (Gasatanka-Giant) 1988

Sgt. Shonen's Exploding Plastic Eastman Band Request

Monol Stereo (Gasatanka-Giant) 1989 •

ANARCHY 6

Hardcore Lives! (Gasatanka-Giant) 1988

Originally known as the Tourists, Red Cross was formed in Hawthorne, California (home of the Beach Boys) by brothers Steven and Jeff McDonald and high school chums Ron Reyes (later of Black Flag) and Greg Hetson (a future Circle Jerk). Through various lineups, adventures and setbacks, the McDonalds have kept their group going and growing, turning Redd Kross into the bemused focus of an increasing national cult.

Red Cross' recorded debut (later reissued as a stand-alone 12-inch EP) was on The Siren, a three-band sampler LP. Although bassist Steven was barely 13 at the time, the six tracks sound surprisingly self-assured. The culturally resonant snot-punk-rock-pop selections include "Annette's Got the Hits" (which became an LA radio staple), "I Hate My School" and the B-52's-ish "Standing in Front of Poseur."

After Hetson and Reyes left, the McDonalds formed a new band and released 1982's Born Innocent, subsequently re-released under their post-legal-intervention name. The LP celebrates such wonderful pop anti-idols as "Linda Blair," "Charlie" (Manson) and Patty Hearst; although unmentioned on the sleeve and label (for fear he would come after them for royalties) the LP actually includes a cover of Manson's "Cease to Exist." The muddy sound and sloppy, uninspired playing make Born Innocent dull in spots, but guitarist Jeff's wild-eyed singing and the overall junk-is-good aesthetic make it a record of—and for—its time.

Ex-Black Flag singer Dez Cadena had already come and gone through Redd Kross by the time Geza X produced the seven-song Teen Babes from Monsanto. Running strictly on wicked irreverence, the McDonalds and drummer Dave Peterson turn the spotlight on various musical victims, and the Redd Kross living jukebox bangs out loud and convincing covers of Kiss ("Deuce"), the Stones ("Citadel"), Stooges ("Ann"), Bowie ("Savior Machine") and others, leaving "Linda Blair 1984" the sole original. A record of the ultimate bratty garage band in its element.

With Redd Kross providing most of the music, the McDonalds appeared in Desperate Teenage Lovedolls, a no-budget Super-8 psychotronic Z-movie made by LA scenesters. The soundtrack album—tracks by Black Flag and a few minor bands, as well as various interlocking permutations of Redd Kross and White Flag—is well-produced and, for the most part, a real offhand treat. With Redd Kross backing their then-manager, Joanna Spockolla McDonald (we're all McDonalds in this life), "Legend" is typical of the rocking pop that keeps the record hopping. Redd Kross offered the same service for the soundtrack album of the sequel, Lovedolls Superstar, which includes a brilliant rendition of "Sunshine Day," a Brady Bunch chestnut.

Drummer Roy McDonald (no relation) and guitarist Robert Hecker fill out the lineup card on Neurotica, the band's national underground breakout record. The LP reclaims "Ballad of a Love Doll" from the first film's score and adds such fuzzed-out folk-pop acid trips as "Peach Kelli Pop," "Janus, Jeanie, and George Harrison," "Frosted Flake" and "Ghandi Is Dead (I'm the Cartoon Man)." With harmony-heavy arrangements that occasionally suggest Shoes, Redd Kross has never sounded better—a full-fledged, mind-boggling outing that confirms their potential and makes the next record something to anticipate. (The CD appends "Tatum O'Tot," a hint of things to come.)

Following the failure of Big Time, Redd Kross didn't make another album under its own name for three years. But that's not to say the McDonalds didn't stay busy. Joined by various collaborators—including Special Guest Tater Danny Bonadue (David Cassidy's kid brother on The Partridge Family; now a successful disc jockey) and such Accessory Tots as Michael Quercio of the Three O'Clock—Steve and Jeff launched the ridiculously parodic Tater Totz with Alien Sleestacks from Brazil. Besides perpetrating such atrocities as "Give Peace a Chance," "I've Just Seen a Face," "Sing This All Together," "We Will Rock You" and "Tomorrow Never Knows," the record offers a vicious, seemingly endless version of Yoko Ono's "Don't Worry Kyoko."

The second Tater Totz album—a much more accomplished effort—again focuses on the extended Beatles family, beginning with covers of "Rain" (sung by Shonen Knife) and "Strawberry Fields Forever," but spiraling off into Lennon's "The Luck of the Irish" and "Instant Karma!," McCartney's "Lovely Linda" and a batch of Ono compositions. In an audacious bit of genetic engineering, Queen's "Bohemian Rhapsody" gets jammed together with Ono's "Who Has Seen the Rain," proving that the line between tribute and satire can sometimes be imperceptible. Ex-Runaway Cherie Currie, ex-Germ Pat RuthenSmear, members of Frightwig, the Pandoras, Celebrity Skin and others contribute to the madness. (The CD, LP and cassette all have slightly different tracks.)

In another side project, the McDonalds and several associates run punk through an ironic blender as Anarchy 6 on Hardcore Lives!, a fast'n'sloppy guitar-rock onslaught—starring Steven and "executive produced" by Jeff—that sounds like a cross between Suicidal Tendencies and Black Flag but lampoons the form and its followers in such lyrics as "Skate and Destroy," "Unite & Fight," "Drugs Aren't Great" and "Old Punks." It's hard to gauge who the audience for this is: those inclined to buy a record that looks and sounds so punk are unlikely to enjoy (or even get) the joke, and vice versa. Maybe that's the point.

With Hecker still abetting the brothers, Third Eye, Redd Kross' major-label debut—and the long-awaited follow-up to Neurotica—is a partially successful attempt to go straight (or at least straighter) for mass-market consumption. Much of the band's trademark wackiness is gone—channeled into the Tater Totz, perhaps?—replaced by disciplined musicianship, streamlined songwriting and radio-savvy production. Strangely, Third Eye's accessible pop-rock songs ("The Faith Healer," "Bubblegum Factory," "I Don't Know How to Be Your Friend," "Love Is Not Love") are pretty good, while scattered attempts to fuse the new slicked-up sound with the humor of earlier efforts—like "Elephant Flares" and "1976" (which revisits the dreaded decade with incisive passing tributes to Kiss, Cheap Trick and Elton John)—sound forced. Whether the world needs another accessible pop-rock band more than it needs iconoclastic pop-culture satirists is certainly open to question, but there's no denying that Redd Kross has made the transition to big-league recordmaking with more skill than most. [i/hd]

See also Sky Saxon.

RED GUITARS

Slow to Fade (nr/Self Drive) 1984 •

Tales of the Expected (nr/Virgin) 1986 •

PLANET WILSON

In the Best of All Possible Worlds (nr/Virgin) 1988 •

Not Drowning but Waving (nr/Records of Achievement) 1989 •

ROBERT HOLMES

Age of Swing (nr/Virgin) 1989 •

On their first major-label album, Hull's Red Guitars sound briefly like Cockney Rebel (from whom they borrow the refrain of "Sweetwater Ranch"), as well as Lloyd Cole, Bowie, Aztec Camera and Dream Academy. The quintet's light songs are pretty flimsy; guitarist Robert Holmes' vocals are likewise second-rate. While delicate and varied, arrangements and production alone can't make up for Tales of the Expected's inherent lack of raison d'être.

With two LPs behind them, the Red Guitars split. Holmes went solo, while bassist Lou Howard and guitarist/vocalist Hallam Lewis got themselves a drummer and formed the Planet Wilson. In the Best of All Possible Worlds is a strange record, a percussion-accented (but not dance-oriented) collection on which the three bandmembers occasionally seem to be playing different songs. With some of XTC's jagged rhythmic intricacy and a bit of the early Police's spare improvisation, the Planet Wilson's first LP imaginatively tests out an assortment of unfamiliar stylistic approaches, none of which really connects. Lewis' songs, lyrics and vocals are obviously all reaching for something, but it's impossible to discern just where he's heading. (The CD adds two tracks.)

Not Drowning but Waving (a phrase already in service as the name of an Australian band) doesn't shy away from discordant strangeness, but the indie-label album with a fancy die-cut sleeve is generally more focused and consistent-sounding than its predecessor. That's not to call it enjoyable: this is uncommon pop music with claws. Songs twist and turn and go all funny when they should be coalescing into accessible form; instruments shift from playing nice to spinning off the scale. The Planet Wilson is an exotic and intriguing place to visit, but I sure wouldn't live there.

Holmes' Age of Swing consists of handsome, unpretentiously sophisticated modern pop with solid melodic appeal. While lacking any distinctive artistic personality, the savvy songs (the title track is especially fine) are timelessly mainstream without being overly bland. Holmes (who also co-produced) has blossomed into a strong, plain singer with an unnerving current of Neil Diamond drama (check "American Lullaby"). The CD adds a pair of dull tracks co-produced by Ian Priestman, the album's main guitarist. [i]

RED HOT CHILI PEPPERS

The Red Hot Chili Peppers (Enigma-EMI America) 1984 •
 Freaky Styley (Enigma-EMI America) 1985 •
 The Uplift Mofu Party Plan (EMI Manhattan) 1987 •
 The Abbey Road E.P. EP (EMI Manhattan) 1988 •
 Mother's Milk (EMI) 1989 + 1990 •

Pioneers of the thrashy rock-funk hybrid that has lately come into vogue, this awesomely powerful California quartet—distinguished by Anthony Kiedis' out-there vocals and the maniacally possessed basswork of Flea (Michael Balzary)—melds floor-shaking rhythm-'n'-roll to wickedly clever songs like "True Men Don't Kill Coyotes," "Baby Appeal" and "Get Up and Jump" on their debut album. The Chili Peppers, who aren't above a little self-obsessed boasting or earnest political protest, play a thoroughly entertaining mutation of George Clinton, Was (Not Was), Peter Wolf, Sly Stone, Kurtis Blow, Sonic Youth and Wall of Voodoo. Move it, but make sure you pay attention at the same time!

Founding guitarist Hillel Slovak, who had missed the Peppers' debut LP during a stint with What Is This, returned to the fold in time for the second outing. Sagely engaging Clinton—a sympathetic soul, both musically and mentally—to produce, the Peppers made Freaky Styley more outrageous but easier to swallow as utilitarian dance-rock as well. A version of Sly Stone's "If You Want Me to Stay" shows they can play it straight; "Yertle the Turtle," based on Dr. Seuss, proves their unhinged sensibilities remain in full force. Other bits of rhythmicized doggerel ("Catholic School Girls Rule," "Thirty Dirty Birds," "Blackeyed Blonde") keep tongue in cheek and mind in the gutter. Freaky Styley is a ton of raunchy, funky fun.

Bob Dylan's "Subterranean Homesick Blues" gets a weirdly re-tempoed electro-rap overhaul on The Uplift Mofu Party Plan, a busy, casual-sounding album that divides rock and funk down the middle. On some guitar-heavy tracks ("No Chump Love Sucker," "Fight Like a Brave," "Me and My Friends"), Flea's popping bass is the only connection with the group's characteristic sound; elsewhere, familiarly repetitive rhythm grooves reaffirm the Peppers' primal commitment to butt-shaking. In "Organic Anti-Beat Box Band," the self-described Fax City 4 issue their offbeat statement of (cross) purpose: "We represent the Hollywood kids . . .

you just might slam dance." Bonus warning to prudes everywhere: "Special Secret Song Inside" is better known as "Party on Your Pussy."

Fans won't need the four previously released album cuts that comprise the four-song Abbey Road 12-inch, but the nude tribute cover is positively priceless. Sock it to 'em, Peppers!

Sobered by Slovak's fatal OD in June 1988, the Chili Pepper regrouped with guitarist John Frusciante and drummer Chad Smith to score their commercial breakthrough with Mother's Milk, a hard-driven funky concoction again produced by Michael Beinhorn and dedicated to their late guitarist. Fired by the band's relentless intensity, the cautionary anti-drug strength of "Knock Me Down" and "Taste the Pain" somehow fits in with the wanton sexuality of "Sexy Mexican Maid." In the album's best mix of song and performance, Flea's mindfuck bass work pushes the band through an overpowering version of Stevie Wonder's "Higher Ground." [i]

See also What Is This.

RED LORRY YELLOW LORRY

This Today EP (nr/Red Rhino) 1984
 Talk About the Weather (nr/Red Rhino) 1985
 Paint Your Wagon (nr/Red Rhino) 1986 •
 Smashed Hits (Red Rhino-Fundamental) 1987 •
 Nothing Wrong (Beggars Banquet-RCA) 1988 •
 Blow (Beggars Banquet-RCA) 1989 •

LORRIES

Crawling Mantra EP (Homestead) 1987

If you loved Joy Division, you'll like Red Lorry Yellow Lorry, who similarly inhabit a bleak world in which swirling guitar figures and pretentious, gloomy lyrics are the only comforts. While Joy Division was the unchallenged champ of these nether regions, Leeds' Lorries work the territory with enough savvy and intelligence (not to mention a cool suppressed-acid-rock guitar sound) to make it work. Talk About the Weather ultimately succumbs to its own murky tunelessness, but not without a fight.

After that LP, they recorded a great single, "Chance." With distorted organ drone and a rushed tempo, it sounded as if the band had located its own true voice. However, Paint Your Wagon borrows enough from Ian Curtis and Joy Division that you'd think it had been released by Factory (c. 1981), especially on cuts like "Head All Fire" and "Save My Soul." A disappointing follow-up to such a promising debut.

The back cover of the Smashed Hits singles compilation is covered with flattering bits from newspaper clippings, and the tracks really do live up to most of the praise. Most of the band's finest moments are included, such as "Hollow Eyes," "Generation" and "Chance." The guitar work is so good that it covers up the weak points, especially the vocal Curtisisms and the kickless, rudimentary rhythm section. (The CD adds two tracks.) They've changed their name back and forth between Red Lorry Yellow Lorry and the Lorries a few times recently, releasing one mini-LP (Crawling Mantra) as the latter.

Nothing Wrong is marked and almost marred by an unshifting swarm of buzzing guitar noise with just enough off-kilter harmonies to break up the drone. A developing melodic flair is apparent, but none of the material ranks with the band's best, and Chris Reed's bleak lyrics are straight out of an Existentialism 101 textbook. "Only Dreaming (Wide Awake)" is the most diverting effort, with an acoustic guitar intro and outro, a bass riveting enough to please J.J. Burnel and even a tambourine in the chorus; only Reed's deep bellowing prevents it from being a genuine pop song (maybe that's the idea).

Blow sports Ecstasy/rave cover art (after the Lories' usual black, gray and brown, bright colors are a breakthrough). Half-jumping on the acid house bandwagon, Blow takes the band a giant step forward in terms of melodicism and diversity of sound. Staying clear of the old monochromatic wall of noise, the production gives them plenty of punch and much more warmth; the space between instruments (more keyboards and background vocals this time) helps clarify the sound more than ever before. The Joy Division comparisons can finally be put to rest. [j]/dgs]

RED NOISE

See Bill Nelson.

RED TEMPLE SPIRITS

Dancing to Restore an Eclipsed Moon (Nate Starkman & Son) 1988 •

"If tomorrow I were leaving for Lhasa, I wouldn't stay a minute more ..." (Nate Starkman & Son) 1989 •

MINISTRY OF LOVE

Wide Awake and Dreaming EP (Underworld) 1987

Los Angeles quartet Red Temple Spirits skillfully mix tribal post-punk influences—mid-period Cure, Savage Republic, early (Death) Cult—with a loving dose of lysergic psychedelia (Syd Barrett and Roky Erickson are particular touchstones). Bassist Dino Paredes and guitarist Dallas Taylor coax entrancing drones and pulses from their instruments with judicious use of echo and other effects, while humanistic frontman William Faircloth (a colorful immigrant from Britain's original '60s psychedelic movement) delves into mysticism (Native American on the first album, Tibetan on the second) with a grace and passion rarely seen before.

Dancing to Restore an Eclipsed Moon is an astonishing debut. The luxurious packaging (double LP/single CD) mirrors the care put into the music, which tastefully incorporates flutes, bells and natural sounds (water, birds) to create a heady atmosphere of ritualistic ecstasy. Short catchy compositions like "Dark Spirits" and "Dreamings Ending" alternate with several long and complex pieces.

The follow-up album is far more direct, both in the melodic music and the lyrics, which turn towards external/environmental stimuli. As crystallized by the gorgeous "Dive in Deep" and an incandescent cover of Pink Floyd's "Set the Controls for the Heart of the Sun," the theme of hope for the magic and beauty of life in the face of despair remains.

Prior to the Spirits, Faircloth lent his vocal ululations to the similarly psychedelic Ministry of Love, a trio that included guitar wiz Mark Nine. Although lacking the Red Temple Spirits' brilliant chemistry, there are some great moments on the five-track EP, including

"Living in the Moment" (a showcase for Nine's e-bow mastery) and Faircloth's touching ballad, "You're Not on Your Own." [gef]

See also Jane's Addiction.

REDUCERS

The Reducers (Rave On) 1984

Let's Go! (Rave On) 1984

Cruise to Nowhere (Rave On) 1985

Quick—name a great band from Connecticut. Well, you need be stumped no longer. Just keep the Reducers in mind. This New London quartet has absorbed all sorts of styles—from Chuck Berry to Anglo-pop, glam-rock to punk—and returns them all in a solid hybrid of tunes, blazing guitars and speedy tempos. On The Reducers, they sing of "Black Plastic Shoes," "Better Homes and Gardens" and "Information Overload," painting a picture of alienation in the boonies ("Out of Step"). Polite but energetic, The Reducers introduces a band with ideas and spunk.

The title track on the better-produced Let's Go! is a great number about getting out, with a catchy, urgent chorus; the rest of the LP (which includes a raving cover of the beat classic "Hippy Hippy Shake") is equally enthusiastic and has more acute lyrics. (On "Bums (I Used to Know)" they play a churning R&B vamp while chiding themselves for "this honky imitation of the blues.") The Reducers may not be fashionable—no synthesizers or even cowpunk aspirations—but they have the spirit and the sense to keep changing and working. Their albums have an integrity and sincerity that more than compensates for any lack of stylishness. [i]

LOU REED

Lou Reed (RCA) 1972

Transformer (RCA) 1972 + 1981 •

Berlin (RCA) 1973 + 1981 •

Rock n Roll Animal (RCA) 1974 + 1981 •

Sally Can't Dance (RCA) 1974 •

Lou Reed Live (RCA) 1975 + 1981 •

Metal Machine Music: The Amine B Ring (RCA) 1975 + 1991 •

Coney Island Baby (RCA) 1976 + 1980 •

Rock and Roll Heart (Arista) 1976

Walk on the Wild Side: The Best of Lou Reed (RCA) 1977 + 1988 •

Street Hassle (Arista) 1978

Live Take No Prisoners (Arista) 1978

The Bells (Arista) 1979

Growing Up in Public (Arista) 1980

Rock and Roll Diary 1967–1980 (Arista) 1980

The Blue Mask (RCA) 1982

I Can't Stand It (nr/RCA) 1982

Legendary Hearts (RCA) 1983 •

Live in Italy (nr/RCA) 1984

New Sensations (RCA) 1984 •

City Lights: Classic Performances (Arista) 1985

Mistrial (RCA) 1986 •

New York (Sire) 1989 •

Retro (nr/RCA) 1989 •

LOU REED/JOHN CALE

Songs for Drella (Sire-Warner Bros.) 1990 •

Since he formed the Velvet Underground in 1966, Lou Reed's career has spanned several major rock upheavals, but he has always managed to be a leader not a follower, despite an iconoclastic resistance to fashion. A highly principled free-thinker, Reed has provided inspiration, direction and songs for bands with a taste for the seamier side of the rock sensibility.

Reed's influence began with the Velvet Underground's predilection for forbidden fruit—drugs, bizarre sex, suicide—in its lyrics, and raging electric chaos in its music. How could punk (much less the Jesus and Mary Chain) have ever occurred without "Sister Ray" or "Heroin" as touchstones? In his solo work, Reed has casually strayed far into heavy metal territory and experimental noise, as well as restrained, seemingly normal rock, but always with a rebellious attitude, probing honesty and unselfconscious abandon. He has always managed to remain relevant, serving as a guide for all sorts of unconventional music makers.

Lou Reed, recorded in England with session players like Steve Howe and Rick Wakeman (both of Yes!), includes previously unreleased Velvet Underground material (some of which turned up much later on VU) and the first incarnation of "Berlin." Effortlessly alternating nihilism with ironic wistfulness, the music is surprisingly lean and no-nonsense, getting Reed's solo career off the ground with a flourish.

The existence of a glam-rock New York café society in the early '70s led to an alliance between Reed and David Bowie, who co-produced Transformer with his then-sideman, Mick Ronson. Joining the legion of androgynous glam-rockers, Reed penned "Walk on the Wild Side," a chronicle of the Warhol crowd that—issued as a single—became a genuine subversive hit (and, many years later, a television jingle!). Although Transformer's music is a bit too campy, the LP is nonetheless a classic.

Fresh from his work with Alice Cooper, Bob Ezrin produced Berlin, using such players as Jack Bruce and Steve Winwood. While lyrically intense and haunting, the music is understated, almost plain. But Reed's tragic tales—like "Caroline Says" and "Sad Song"—pack an intense emotional charge. Berlin, in spite of itself, is one of his best, although not recommended for depressives or would-be suicides.

Rock n Roll Animal captures Reed onstage in New York with an unbelievably bombastic heavy metal band powered by guitarists Steve Hunter and Dick Wagner. Playing a collection of elongated hits ("Sweet Jane," "Rock'n'Roll," "Heroin") at stun volume, Reed proves he can sound as neanderthal as any arena band of the day, but his songs and singing make it powerful.

Sally Can't Dance attempts a mainstream sound with boring songs that lack fire; although a commercial success, it's one of Reed's most forgettable efforts, marking the beginning of a bad period in his career. To mark time, his next release was Lou Reed Live (more Rock n Roll Animal), followed by the truly deviant Metal Machine Music, four sides of unlistenable noise (a description, not a value judgment) that angered and disappointed all but the most devout Reed fans. If he was simply looking to goad people and puncture perceptions, Metal Machine Music was a rousing success.

Coney Island Baby and Rock and Roll Heart prefer the same unambitious restraint as Sally Can't Dance; the new wrinkle is Reed's revelatory lyrics. After years of describing a deprived life-style with a hint of defensive pride, Reed began to open up and admit personal pain and doubts. A new creative vista mired in a musical rut.

Street Hassle shows Reed somewhat revitalized—or at least moved to action—by the onslaught of his young punk apostles. More aggressive sound and new-found vocal strength power songs like "Real Good Time Together" and the scathing "I Wanna Be Black." The band is exciting, and every path pursued bears fruit.

Another live album, Take No Prisoners—recorded at New York's Bottom Line—gives Reed a chance to try his hand at being a standup comedian. The four sides include only two or three songs each; the no-name band vamps endlessly as Reed banters with the crowd, offering sharp opinions and cutting comments on a variety of subjects. Although not a great musical accomplishment, it's one of the funniest and most entertaining live albums of all time.

Reed continues to expose his sensitive side on The Bells and Growing Up in Public, using driving rock and delicate melodicism to back thoughtful lyrics and impassioned singing. A triumphant success, The Blue Mask uses almost no instrumental overdubs to get a spontaneous feel from a basic backing trio (including ex-Richard Hell guitarist Robert Quine) and features some of Reed's strongest writing in years. The portraits he paints are miserable characters living outside society; it's not clear whether or not they're fictional.

Reed found new acclaim with the band he enlisted for The Blue Mask; adding drummer Fred Maher to the core of Quine and bassist Fernando Saunders completed a perfect touring/recording unit that Reed lost no time in exploiting. Legendary Hearts could just as well have been credited to the Lou Reed Band—every song is fully developed and confidently delivered in a manner suggesting a tight, well-rehearsed unit. It ranks with any Reed record all the way back to the Velvets in substance and stands out as his strongest work in style, using the group as a powerful lens that magnifies his themes and obsessions down to the finest detail. Picking an ideal moment to sum up his career to date, Reed recorded Live in Italy with the same band—two albums of material divided almost evenly between Velvets-era songs and solo work.

For his next record, Reed decided to play all the guitar himself, yet New Sensations is anything but self-indulgent. Forsaking the two-guitar sound just throws Saunders' distinctive fretless bass playing and Reed's spare arrangements into higher relief, and they merit the attention—as do the songs, which prove that a middle-aged rock songwriter can have plenty to offer.

Mistrial is an essentially styleless observation of the times in which we live, simply played as variable-strength rock with Lou on guitar and Saunders (with a little outside assistance, including a live drummer on those tracks that don't employ all-electronic percussion) doing the rest. Reed's 1986 concerns are television ("Video Violence"), the state of world affairs ("The Original Wrapper," in which a credible funk track sets the stage for Reed to demonstrate his abilities as an urban contemporary wordsmith), emotional violence ("Don't Hurt a Woman," "Spit It Out") and personal realities ("Mama's Got a Lover" and the moving, memorably beautiful pair that close the album: "I Remember You" and "Tell It to Your Heart"). Although many of the melodies are too spare and casual to endure, lyrics are obviously what's important here; by this point, Reed's albums have a higher purpose than mere toe-tapping or bus-stop humming.

After taking a couple of years off to read newspapers, Reed reared back and fired his most ambitious verbal salvo, coalescing years of simmering outrage and frustration into New York, a tumultuous and frequently stunning outpouring of articulate commentary about the state of life in the big city—and beyond. For an hour, drummer Fred Maher, second guitarist Mike Rathke and bassist Rob Wasserman eloquently follow Reed as he talk-sings about crack addicts, child abusers, welfare hotels, racism, AIDS and much more, finishing things off with a gentle remembrance of the late Andy Warhol ("Dime Store Mystery"). As clunky as some of its modest songs and ambitious lyrics may be, this unlikely sounding masterpiece is among Reed's strongest, most durable albums. (The CD is graphics-encoded with the album's lyrics in five languages for those few who own the necessary equipment.)

Reed's next project was a sentimental collaboration with old VU bandmate John Cale on a love letter to mentor and friend Andy Warhol. Songs for Drella, presented as a chronological progression of fictitious biographical (and autobiographical) songs, is utterly fascinating for its personal reminiscences, but doesn't have much integrity as an album. Cale and Reed share the vocals, attempting to make music out of distinctly unmusical prose; the dashed-off backing on guitar, keyboards and viola is equally artless. Rather than attempt to make a record, Cale and Reed would have done better to write A Book for Drella. (The record was initially available as a limited edition CD with a velvet cover and an insert book.)

Walk on the Wild Side, Rock and Roll Diary, I Can't Stand It, City Lights and Retro are all compilations—the first of his RCA albums and the second (which has excellent liner notes by Ellen Willis) mixing Velvet Underground material (almost two sides' worth) with a spotty bunch of tracks from both RCA and Arista records. City Lights draws only from the Arista releases; Retro is all RCA, with four tracks each from Transformer and Berlin, one from New Sensations and a spotty sampling of the intervening years. There are other English and continental retrospectives as well.

See also John Cale, Fernando Saunders. [i/mf]

JUNIOR REID

See Black Uhuru.

VINI REILLY

See Durutti Column.

BLAINE L. REININGER

See Tuxedomoon.

REIVERS

See Zeitgeist.

RELUCTANT STEREOTYPES

The Label (nr/WEA) 1980

This Birmingham outfit—whose main men were future pop star Paul King and future Primitive/producer Paul Sampson—played likable reggaeified rock/pop much like another band of the same city and era, the Beat. Similarities include pointed-but-subtle lyrics that avoid clichés while covering political topics, prominent horn work, boppy dance rhythms and high musical standards. Differences include a more free-form, less-soulful approach and stricter adherence to reggae rhythms on most tunes. Comparisons aside, The Label is an ace record by a skillful, inventive band. [1]

See also Eyeless in Gaza, King, Primitives.

R.E.M.

Chronic Town EP (IRS) 1982 ●

Murmur (IRS) 1983 ●

Reckoning (IRS) 1984 ●

Fables of the Reconstruction (IRS) 1985 ●

Lifes Rich Pageant (IRS) 1986 ●

Dead Letter Office (IRS) 1987 ●

Document (IRS) 1987 ●

Eponymous (IRS) 1988 ●

Green (Warner Bros.) 1988 ●

Out of Time (Warner Bros.) 1991 ●

HINDU LOVE GODS

Hindu Love Gods (Giant-Repriase) 1990 ●

Who would ever have expected an American musical revolution to be launched from Athens, Georgia? R.E.M.'s rough-hewn guitar pop, introduced in 1981 by a stunning independent single ("Radio Free Europe"), has put them in the vanguard of a wide-reaching musical movement that relies on homegrown, populist rootsiness rather than any transatlantic inspiration. Blending Pete Buck's Byrdsian guitar playing with Michael Stipe's hazy, sometimes melancholic (but never miserable) vocals and impressionistic lyrics, plus a strong, supple rhythm section (Bill Berry and Mike Mills), R.E.M. plays memorable songs with unprepossessing simplicity and emotional depth. As hip acceptance has given way to full-fledged stardom, R.E.M. has grown less exciting but remained intelligent and committed to artistic expression (not only theirs).

The five-song Chronic Town EP, co-produced by Mitch Easter, continues the sound (if not all the rushed excitement) of the single, and boasts the remarkable "1,000,000" and the equally memorable "Carnival of Sorts (Box Cars)."

Murmur is a masterpiece, containing all the essential components of truly great serious pop music. On "Catapult," "Pilgrimage" and a reprise of "Radio Free Europe," Stipe inscrutably (but evocatively) mumbles his vocals with unmistakable passion, while the band spins haunting webs of guitar rock that are heavy with atmosphere. A completely satisfying collection, Murmur served as a guidepost for many of the bands who chose to follow R.E.M. back to the New South for inspiration.

Doomed to disappoint by comparison to the debut, Reckoning is not quite as consistent, although it contains enough equally great music to maintain R.E.M.'s reputation for excellence. "Harborcoat," "So. Central Rain (I'm Sorry)," "(Don't Go Back to) Rockville" and "Pretty Persuasion" are all wonderful, and display not only clearer production (Easter and Don Dixon) but a less hurried pace and more articulate singing.

Fables of the Reconstruction (aka Reconstruction of the Fables), produced in London by Joe Boyd, finds R.E.M. largely neglecting catchy melodicism and driving rhythms for reflective, languidly meandering numbers that lack focal points and seem to start and finish with the structured inexorability of a light switch. A number of the songs are flat-out boring, and the album in toto is vague and colorless, although not entirely bland. "Can't Get There from Here," "Driver 8" and the raucous "Auctioneer (Another Engine)" do have familiar R.E.M. attributes.

A shortage of rewarding musical ideas and an air of flagging enthusiasm on the politically minded and far too restrained Lifes Rich Pageant makes it a remote and generally ignorable chapter in R.E.M.'s inexorable march towards the big time. Excepting a totally ace cover of the Clique's psychedelic obscurity, "Superman," sung in a delicious near-whine by Mike Mills, the rushed "Hyena" and the languid "Fall on Me," the record is instrumentally dull and almost entirely uninvolving.

With Stipe opting for a brave new world of enunciation on Document, Scott Litt's dynamic co-production pushes the songs back into the world of the living, with a bright, loud sound and an infusion of much-needed rock energy. Without sacrificing sensitivity, Buck plays up a storm, pushed into high gear by Berry's walloping big beat. The entire first side is brilliant, from the maniacally intense "Finest Worksong" to the stomping horn-flecked nostalgia of "Exhuming McCarthy," a goofball cover of Wire's "Strange" and the wordily name-dropping nonsense of "It's the End of the World as We Know It (And I Feel Fine)." The back of the LP is half as good, which is to say the sound is swell but the songs aren't. Nonetheless, millions misunderstood the stinging irony of "The One I Love" and made it a huge hit single.

Dead Letter Office, a curious and amusing B-sides/rarities collection, reveals R.E.M.'s proclivity for recording covers (it contains material by Pylon, Roger Miller, the Velvet Underground and Aerosmith) and a goofy sense of humor not often heard on their albums. Buck's liner notes explain the origins of all fifteen out-takes, pisstakes and oddities, including "Walter's Theme," written to be a restaurant commercial. The CD has a bonus: the contents of Chronic Town.

Raising their commercial sights in a way the faithful never imagined possible, R.E.M. then left IRS for the greener pastures of Warner Bros., prompting the release of a greatest hits package. Eponymous (now there's a band that knows its rock criticism) is a nearly straight-forward compilation, except that it omits some crucial songs and has the original independent 45 version of "Radio Free Europe," an unused vocal take on "Gardening at Night" (from Chronic Town), an alternate mix of "Finest Worksong" and "Romance," a sound-track contribution not previously on an R.E.M. record.

The quartet's arrival into the global pop stakes, Green, is a great, artistically mature record with more good songs than any prior R.E.M. album. Dropping the familiar jangle pop and crisp rhythms, the band finds a characteristic compromise with modern rock (although several numbers are entirely acoustic) that grants the lyrics and melodies precedence over immediately recognizable presentation. Indeed, Stipe's voice is the only familiar R.E.M. feature on the catchy "Stand," the U2-ish "Orange Crush" and the measured drone roughness of "Turn You Inside Out." Buck's diverse playing has never sounded better, and piano provides him with an effective complement. "Pop Song 89"—a witty reflection on stardom's social complications—and the old-fashioned "World Leader Pretend" flesh out a brilliant collection.

Opening the stylistic doors to keyboards, strings and horns, R.E.M. challenged audience expectations a little with the ambitious but uneven Out of Time, a generally entertaining collection of obliquely romantic (as opposed to obliquely political) songs given diverse arrangements that aren't as far outside the band's usual parameters as they might at first seem. Familiarly constructed songs like "Radio Song" (with a guest appearance by KRS-One), "Losing My Religion," "Shiny Happy People" (with Kate Pierson chiming in) and "Half a World Away" effectively progress from Green's forthright presentation, while others sacrifice the band's artistic edge for the sake of flaccid conceptual meandering. "Low" sounds like a second-rate demo plus cello; "Endgame" is a baroque instrumental with Mike Mills and Michael Stipe combining on wordless pseudo-Beach Boys harmonies. Having toured extensively with the band, Peter Dinklage contributes bass or guitar to half the songs.

Hindu Love Gods, the belated issue of a 1987 studio get-together in which Buck, Mills and Berry backed singer/guitarist Warren Zevon on a well-chosen program of blues classics (with a terrible Prince cover thrown in for bad measure). Disregarding the album's general merits, it has little specific value for R.E.M. fans. The characterless playing is standard bar-band issue, and not especially adept at that: unable to locate a groove, Bill Berry clanks along haplessly throughout the LP. Thanks to the folks involved, however, this redundant exercise is the ideal modern blues album for people who bought the Robert Johnson reissue and never played it. [1]

See also Fleshstones.

RENALDO AND THE LOAF

Songs for Swinging Larvae (Ralph) 1979

Arabic Yodelling (Ralph) 1983

Streve and Sneff [tape] (Ralph) 1984

Olleh Olleh Rotcod (nr/Rotcod) 1985

The Elbow Is Taboo (Ralph) 1987

RESIDENTS & RENALDO AND THE LOAF

Title in Limbo (Ralph) 1983

Only the Residents' label would deign to sign a duo as deeply weird as Renaldo and the Loaf—in real life two Englishmen named David Janssen and Brian Poole (the latter not of '60s swingers the Tremeloes). Their bizarre studio-doctored vocals, cut-and-paste arrangements, jerky robot rhythms and alien instrumentation (among the pair's noisemakers: scalpel, metal comb, hacksaw blade, pickle jar, biscuit tins) suggest that Re-naldo and the Loaf was evolved in the Residents' image. Unfortunately, Songs for Swinging Larvae has all the madness and none of the coherence of the Residents' nutty concepts, its offbeat wit stampeded instead by rampant disorienting eclecticism. Guaranteed to clear the room of your choice.

Arabic Yodelling is roughly more of the same, a collection of Rube Goldberg home-brewed insanity recorded over a two-year period. A bit less weird for weird's sake (although hardly in danger of mass appeal), it keeps the blindly whimsical faith the Residents themselves were in the process of outgrowing. Title in Limbo, the group's joint effort with their American soul brothers, however, is not at all enticing. Streve and Sneff is an American reissue of a pre-Larvae cassette the band had previously distributed on their own.

The general worldwide overuse of electronic sampling instruments may partially explain the delightful alternate-reality sound of The Elbow Is Taboo; then again, perhaps Renaldo and the Loaf have simply advanced past musical infantilism. The songs are indeed songs; they may contain obscure, unexpected sounds and bizarre vocals, but little of it seriously impedes the spare, charming folksiness. "A Street Called Straight," a most agreeable mélange, employs dulcimer and bouzouki as well as a keyboard; the title track shuffles along on a devolved reggae beat with mandolin as a prime instrument; the vocal-less "Dance for Somnambulists" mixes in glockenspiel and guitars. Crazy, man, crazy! [df/i]

RENEGADE SOUNDWAVE

Biting My Nails EP (Mute-Enigma) 1988

Soundclash (Mute-Enigma) 1989 ◊

RSW in Dub (Mute-Elektra) 1990 ◊

Originating as DJs and warehouse party promoters, the three members of Renegade Soundwave have always shown as much enthusiasm for dance beats and studio gimmickry as for actual songs. A home in the multi-ethnic west London enclave of Ladbroke Grove has also instilled in them the love of reggae and dub that is evident from the 1986 debut "Cocaine Sex" (included, along with its successor, "Kray Twins," on the American Biting My Nails 12-inch) through to the club-oriented RSW in Dub album. Along the way, a more conventional use of vocals, guitars and dance breaks has yielded two crossover UK hit singles: "Biting My Nails" and "Probably a Robbery" (both on Soundclash).

All of which gives Renegade Soundwave an identity crisis. Unsure whether to produce rock songs, dance anthems or dub jams, they experiment with each on Soundclash (the CD of which contains two bonus tracks) and just come across confused. On RSW in Dub, which contains mostly new and totally revamped material, they do away with the vocals but still zigzag between industrial house and dub reggae. Like many products of the dancefloor, Renegade Soundwave can be inspired when working with 12-inch singles (the trio's remixes for other bands, from Inspirat Carpets to Nitzer Ebb, are easily identifiable by the dominance of bass and percussive rhythm over melody). But they have yet to demonstrate such mastery on their albums. [tf]

REPLACEMENTS

Sorry Ma, Forgot to Take Out the Trash (Twin/Tone)

1981 •

The Replacements Stink EP (Twin/Tone) 1982 + 1986 •

Hootenanny (Twin/Tone) 1983 •

Let It Be (Twin/Tone) 1984 •

The Shit Hits the Fans [tape] (Twin/Tone) 1985

Tim (Sire) 1985 •

Boink! (nr/Glass) 1986

Pleased to Meet Me (Sire) 1987 •

Don't Tell a Soul (Sire-Reprise) 1989 •

All Shook Down (Sire-Reprise) 1990 ◊

For a time the world's best rock'n'roll band—proof that those who missed the '60s could still build something great on the crass and hollow corpse of '70s music—Minneapolis' Replacements began as juvenile punks whose give-a-shit attitude masked the seeds of singer/guitarist/songwriter Paul Westerberg's self-destructive genius for injecting sensitivity into flat-out chaos. When it all clicked—volume, rawness, speed (pace and ingested substances), energy and passion—the Mats (short for Placemats) teetered drunkenly at the brink of the abyss and recklessly cracked jokes about it. Onstage and on vinyl, nothing could compare with their unpredictable excitement. But over the years, the onset of maturity and a reasonable desire for self-preservation caused Westerberg to draw the group back to the point where the latest album has almost none of the old fire.

The original foursome got written off a lot as sloppy, but only by those who chose not to see beyond the confusion. Chris Mars drummed as one possessed; spoiled teen Tommy Stinson (twelve when the band started) thumped a mean bassline; buffoonish guitarist Bob Stinson might wear a dress (or less) onstage but could alternate between ripping metal leads and achingly tender melody lines that come from his heart (if not his brain). And Paul Westerberg—too terrified to sing his soft songs—hid behind the band's noise. The Mats were one of those classic rock'n'roll combos whose music, looks and personalities fit together perfectly, the stuff of which legends are made.

The musical evidence of their creative importance was there on the first album, eighteen songs following the usual loud/fast/cynical rules with titles like "Shut-up," "Kick Your Door Down," "I Hate Music" and "Shiftless When Idle." But a slow, bluesy ode to J. Thunders, "Johnny's Gonna Die," showed depth beyond their years. The Stink EP—initially issued in a white hand-rubberstamped sleeve—went for pure driving thrash and produced some gems, including "Dope Smokin Moron," "Kids Don't Follow" and "God Damn Job." But it landed them in the hardcore bins, even though the music and lyrics are much sharper than most, mixing equal parts arrogance and self-deprecating humor.

When Hootenanny combined blues, power pop, folk, country, straight-ahead rock, surf (or, more accurately, ski) and punk in a way few hardcore bands could even imagine, people started taking notice. Stink's "Fuck School" gave way to "Color Me Impressed," a wise and soaring rock number about getting drunk and being bored by trendinistas that sounded pretty incongruous next to "Run It," a paean to beating red lights. Amid the roaring power of "Take Me Down to the Hospital" and the wacky Beatlesque collage of "Mr.

Whirly," Westerberg reached into his bag of solo heart-stoppers for a naked (yet never sappy) confession of loneliness, "Within Your Reach."

With Let It Be, the Mats became "stars," at least on the independent club/college radio circuit. The LP is more focused than anything else they'd done, boldly carrying out what they'd only tried on Hootenanny. They blended rock-pop and country shuffle on "I Will Dare," covered Kiss' "Black Diamond" and raved-up on novelty rockers like the lyrical vérité of "Tommy Gets His Tonsils Out" and "Gary's Got a Boner." Westerberg's knowledge of loneliness ("Sixteen Blue," "Answering Machine") gave way to total emptiness on the harrowing "Unsatisfied."

Critics trampled each other in a rush to claim discovery rights, Sire signed them and Twin/Tone celebrated with a cassette-only live tape—stolen from some kid bootlegging an Oklahoma show—which showed the feckless Mats at their most messed-up, playing (at least starting to play) a motley collection of their favorite covers, from R.E.M. to the Stones, Thin Lizzy to X.

The Replacements made the transition to major-labeldom with their artistic integrity intact. Ex-Ramone Tommy Erdelyi produced Tim, retaining all of the band's raggedness and devil-may-care spirit. Westerberg's tunes here are among his best ever, from a melancholy bar ballad ("Here Comes a Regular") to an obnoxiously mean-spirited anti-stewardess slur, "Waitress in the Sky." His raging insecurity shines through on "Hold My Life" ("because I just might lose it . . .") and the anthemic "Bastards of Young." "Left of the Dial" celebrates alternative radio, while "Kiss Me on the Bus" considers the romantic possibilities of public transportation. A stupendous record.

Boink!! is an eight-song UK condensation of the band's pre-Let It Be catalogue, with the added bonus of an otherwise unreleased Alex Chilton-produced cut, "Nowhere Is My Home."

When it became apparent that Bob Stinson was in danger of succumbing permanently to the band's treacherous lifestyle, the Mats fired him and proceeded to record the incredible Pleased to Meet Me as a trio. With Jim Dickinson producing and Westerberg doing all the guitar work, the group stirred up another batch of their finest brew: virile, witty rockers ("Valentine," "Red Red Wine," "I.O.U."), tender ballads ("Nightclub Jitters," "Skyway"). There's a rollicking number about "Alex Chilton," a bizarre but fabulous stab at commercial radio acceptance ("Can't Hardly Wait") in which the Memphis Horns echo a deliciously nagging guitar riff over a wicked backbeat, and "The Ledge," a tense suicide vignette musically rewritten from Hootenanny's "Willpower." On tour following the LP's release, the group unveiled a new guitarist, Slim Dunlap (ex-Curtiss A), and a far less obstreperous attitude.

Whether Don't Tell a Soul is a strong album with a few clunkers or a weak album with some great songs, the Mats' previous glories tinge the record with disappointment. (Initial impressions were strictly the latter; the record's better qualities have emerged over time.) Westerberg's arrival in adulthood has softened his outlook (while increasing his disillusionment) and reduced his desire to play blaringly loud, wild rock. But as his passions have cooled, his lyrical concerns have grown increasingly private; the songs are as strong and artistic as ever, but somehow less compelling. Arrangements which favor acoustic guitars, layers of harmony vocals and keyboards undercut the band's standard attack; Mars is consigned to keep the backbeat with a criminal minimum of rhythmic variation. "Achin' to Be," a gentle country love song, and the stately minor-key "Darlin' One" are extremely effective, as are "I'll Be You," the soaring "We'll Inherit the Earth" and "Anywhere's Better Than Here." But there's still an unsettling aloofness to the record. Rather than the previous album's reach-out-and-grab-someone impact, Don't Tell a Soul is merely an uneven collection of songs.

Compared to the stultifying All Shook Down, however, Don't Tell a Soul is positively blistering. A band album in name only, Westerberg used session players (including the three other Replacements) to craft lightweight songs that resemble the Replacements, but lack fire, content, imagination and tension. Considering the Mats' past achievements, the vocal duet with Concrete Blonde's Joliette Napolitano on "My Little Problem" is a fairly lame excuse for rock'n'roll. ("Bent Out of Shape" is the album's sole working burner, although the Stonesy "Happy Town" comes close.) While the acoustic "Sadly Beautiful" (with viola by John Cale) demonstrates how to find intensity in tranquility, the album—even a piano-based pitch for sobriety entitled "The Last"—fails to perform that feat twice. Oh momma, can this really be the end?

For Chris Mars, it was. He quit in November 1990. With a new drummer, the group hit the road soon after, playing mostly recent material to extremely favorable notices. [ep/i]

REPTILE

Ivar Bongo EP (Bad Taste) 1989

Fame and Fossils (Bad Taste) 1990 ●

Oh, those wacky Icelanders! Related to the Sugar-cubes through keyboardist Magga Órnólfsdóttir (who left in '88, prior to Reptile's album, but appears on the four-song EP), this Reykjavik quintet makes its full-length debut with a charming hubbub of marimba, banjo, violin and sax, as well as guitar, bass and drums. Fame and Fossils fuses a version of the Sugar-cubes' bizarre theatrics (I wouldn't attempt to grasp the logic of songs like "Gun Fun," "Candyfloss War" or "What Are You Up To," in which giggling Magga Stina requests the song's object to "Hit me on the forehead") to an Ordinaire-y mad-jazz orientation, coming up with a dizzying pastiche that would be equally at home in a Spike Jones tribute show or an avant-garde multi-media performance. [i]

See also Sugarcubes.

RESIDENTS

Meet the Residents (Ralph) 1974 + 1977 + 1985 ●

The Residents Present the Third Reich 'n Roll (Ralph) 1975 + 1979 ●

Fingerprince (Ralph) 1976 ●

Duck Stab EP (Ralph) 1978 + 1987

Duck Stab/Buster & Glen (Ralph) 1978 ●

Not Available (Ralph) 1978 ●

Eskimo (Ralph) 1979 ●

Nibbles (nr/Virgin) 1979

Diskomo/Goosebump EP (Ralph) 1980 •
 The Residents Commercial Album (Ralph) 1980 •
 Mark of the Mole (Ralph) 1981 •
 The Tunes of Two Cities (Ralph) 1982 •
 Intermission EP (Ralph) 1982
 The Residents' Mole Show (no label) 1983
 Residue of the Residents (Ralph) 1983
 George & James (Ralph) 1984
 Whatever Happened to Vileness Fats? (Ralph) 1984
 Assorted Secrets [tape] (Ralph) 1984
 The Census Taker (Episode) 1985
 The Big Bubble (Black Shroud-Ralph) 1985 •
 PAL TV LP (nr/Doublevision) 1985
 Heaven? [CD] (Rykodisc) 1986 •
 Hell! [CD] (Rykodisc) 1986 •
 Stars & Hank Forever (Ralph) 1986 •
 13th Anniversary Show—Live in Japan (Ralph) 1986
 Hit the Road Jack EP (Ralph) 1987
 The Mole Show Live in Holland [CD] (Hol. Torso) 1987
 (East Side Digital) 1988 •
 God in Three Persons (Rykodisc) 1988 •
 God in 3 Persons: Original Soundtrack Recording
 (Rykodisc) 1988 •
 The King and Eye (Enigma) 1989 •
 Buckaroo Blues & Black Barry [tape] (Ralph Special Products) 1989
 Stranger Than Supper (UWEB Special Products) 1990 •
 Cube-E Live in Holland (Enigma) 1990 •
 Freak Show (Official Product) 1991 •

RESIDENTS & RENALDO AND THE LOAF

Title in Limbo (Ralph) 1983

What's a Resident? Epithets abound, but anent actual identities, anyone who knows ain't talking. Transplanted cinéastes—so the story goes—from Shreveport, Louisiana to the San Francisco area who also dabble in musical experiments, the foursome (trio? duo?) has woven a remarkable cloak of secrecy. Aside from the avowed purpose of avoiding misleading and potentially divisive individual credits, this creates an attention-getting mystique which, when the limited speculation on same has been exhausted, leaves absolutely nothing to contemplate but the music itself.

The Residents led Ralph Records from cottage industry to self-sufficient label, able to sell artistically ambitious oeuvres without selling themselves out. They're also paradigmatic of limited technical and compositional ability, marshalled, along with wit and imagination, in the service of works seeking to trample sacrosanct icons and rock's boundaries.

It's evidently not in them to write distinctive melodies that don't sound utterly bizarre. When they try, the results invariably sound like someone else's—albeit distinctly distorted or perverted—which is probably one reason why the dissection and reassembly of various bits of rock tradition has been one of their fortes since early on. Also, the Residents' approach owes great debts to the early groundbreaking of both Frank Zappa and Captain Beefheart. (It was at one time rumored that the storied N. Senada, a poet/saxist who allegedly collaborated with the Residents during his brief sojourn in the Bay Area, was actually Beefheart.) All that said, the Residents are superior synthesists, and the derivations of their work can't deny the entertainingly provocative nature of their best achievements.

The first four efforts by the then-unnamed group were album-length tapes, including one which was sent (with no name on it) to a record company in the hopes of a deal and sent back to the quartet's return address, care of "Residents." Hence the moniker.

N. Senada's contribution, the concept of phonetic (re)organization, was adapted by the Residents on their first vinyl releases, the 1972 double-45 set Santa Dog and the 1974 debut album, Meet the Residents. Santa Dog's four intriguing but inchoate expressions of Residency include weird manipulations of verbal as well as musical logic, de(con)struction of familiar (in this case, Yuletide) songs and the formulation of their own "instant standard" ("Fire," aka "Santa Dog," remade in 1978 and again in 1990). The album does likewise but more so, in quality as well as quantity, alternately a sophomoric giggle and a striking, off-the-wall twist of musical mind. The Residents had arrived, but weren't yet sure quite where they were. (The LP's cover, which snidely uses the graphics of Meet the Beatles in order to trash the Fab Four, was allegedly the subject of legal threats; the album was re-released in '77 with a tamer jacket and improved sound. Issued on CD in the late '80s—as were most of the group's early records—by East Side Digital, it adds the Santa Dog tracks and reverts to the original cover design.)

On The Residents Present the Third Reich 'n Roll the band transforms hooky bits from '60s Top 40 hits into two ridiculous, funny, scary and just plain jaw-dropping-weird side-long suites, "Swastikas on Parade" and "Hitler Was a Vegetarian," intended as "revenge" for the brainwashing of American youth into acceptance of rock's trivialization (or something like that). The LP was reissued with partially censored graphics in '79 (the original cover showed a carrot-toting Nazi officer bearing a distinct resemblance to Dick Clark) and on CD in '87, with the addition of two brilliant early 45s (and their B-sides): "Satisfaction," which makes Devo's subsequent try sound like the 1910 Fruitgum Co., and the Beatles perversion, "Beyond the Valley of a Day in the Life." (Again, the CD graphics return the lurid originals.)

In 1976, the band recorded Tourniquet of Roses, but since it supposedly would have taken up three sides, Ralph subtracted one side and released the rest as Fingerprince. The four excised songs were later released as the extremely limited edition Babyfingers EP, but reinstated (in the approximate middle of the program!) on the CD. (Technically speaking, the whole thing could have fit on one vinyl disc, albeit with reduced audio fidelity; alternately, they could have removed less than sixteen minutes' worth.) The need isn't clearly programmatic either; a little instant myth-making? At any rate, while Fingerprince (like the first album) contrasts a batch of brief tracks with one lengthy piece (the "ballet" "Six Things to a Cycle"), the band had shifted into a higher gear: imagine Frank Zappa meeting Steely Dan in a very avant mood, with the results then processed through a computer programmed by a paranoid schizophrenic with a sense of humor. This also applies fairly well to the Babyfinger tracks, which include the eight-minute "mini-opera" "Walter Westinghouse." (The late Snakefinger, whose outrageous guitar graced their early tapes and "Satisfaction," guests.)

Duck Stab was originally released as a 7-inch EP—the group at its most consistently accessible—but was enlarged to album size by the Buster & Glen half (also succinctly catchy and humorous). Noteworthy here is the dominance of songs with vocals, and the emergence of the distinctive voice of a Resident who eventually became the group's only voice. A 1987 reissue of the album dropped Buster and Glen from the title; the CD of the same name appends Goosebump (the B-side suite of the Diskomo 12-inch) and a swell lyric book.

Duck Stab was evidently cut as a lightweight diversion from the sessions for the more crucial conceptual masterwork, Eskimo. That project may have gotten out of control, since its release was postponed a year. Instead, out popped Not Available, supposedly recorded just after Meet the Residents—and, according to "the theory of obscurity," never intended for release. Hooy? If new, it's the culmination of various ideas the band had cultivated; if genuinely old, a lasting influence on Residentalia to come. I'd say the latter, since most everything said to have been recorded after it seems more refined in execution, if not so grand in sweep. Can you imagine a vast epic in five sections told with the recitative cadence of nursery rhymes (a Residents vocal trademark) but sounding as though played by E.T. and family? (The Not Available CD adds five tracks from Title in Limbo, the Residents' collaboration with Renaldo and the Loaf.)

With help from ex-Mothers keyboardist Don Preston and drummer Chris Cutler (of Henry Cow/Art Bears fame), Eskimo's broad, electronically spacey sonic contours form a backdrop for what the Residents would have you believe is a re-creation of Eskimo life and culture (instrumental, but with printed narration on the jacket to explain the "stories.") It's brilliant and—yep—chilling, a most (but not totally) serious undertaking, evocative if not quite authentic. Some of its sections were reprogrammed as "Diskomo" and coupled on a 12-inch EP with a toyful look in on Mother Goose. The Eskimo CD appends the Residents' four contributions to Ralph's 1979 Subterranean Modern compilation.

They then cut an LP of 40 one-minute songs, with some celebrity helpers (Fred Frith is credited; Lene Lovich and XTC's Andy Partridge, among others, aren't). The rationale: a Top 40 song is just a minute of essence repeated three times and a commercial jingle is a minute long; ergo, "jingles are the music of America," and The Residents Commercial Album is an alternative Top 40. Cute idea for a minute but not enough justification for this gimmicky exercise. Many of the tracks boil down to a few seconds of "essence" repeated for a minute. Yet with the CD, programmability—even random shuffle sort—can bring out the gems and make it all sound better. Plus, the CD has bonus tracks: four from Residue, two great cover-version 45s ("Hit the Road Jack" and "This Is a Man's Man's Man's World" [sic]) and four more one-minute cuts: two excellent, one so what and one an okay take on the Ramones' "We're a Happy Family" done for Morgan Fisher's more imaginative brevity challenge, Miniatures.

The Mole trilogy began auspiciously with Mark of the Mole, a murky limned, yet engrossing story of the Moles, forced out of their home into sharing one with the Chubs, and the ensuing conflict between the "underground" and slick complacency. A thin story, but musically harrowing. Unfortunately, The Tunes of Two Cities suggested that the Residents had painted themselves into a corner. The narrative isn't advanced and, although its context is fleshed out, it's simply not enough. The Residents seek to convey the cultural contrast in musical terms, alternating the Moles' abrasive, industrial grind with the Chubs' offbeat yet unctuous cocktail jazz. Neither the device nor its execution, notwithstanding some swell sax by Norman Salant and guitar by Snakefinger, can justify the whole album—not by Residential standards, anyway. (The Tunes CD adds three outtakes, again inserted in the middle of the program.)

The Residents' camp was in disarray. Despite the temporary acquisition of hotshot LA management, the Residents began to reel, first from internal dissension and later from desertions by members of the Ralph brain trust.

The 1983 Mole Show LP is the Residents' own authorized bootleg of the show's groundbreaking presentation at LA's Roxy Theatre in late '82. The band then proceeded to tour Europe, and released a second album, from an '83 performance in Holland. Both present Mark of the Mole surprisingly well, with the benefit of Penn Jillette (a longtime fan and friend) providing periodic narration to clarify the story. Although the performances are basically the same, the later one is a little tighter and has clearer sound. (The early one does have an amusing Jillette ad lib, during a staged argument with the band: "I don't care who you are, you sing like Gomer Pyle.") All the same, the Residents' charming way of squirming out of having presented an unfinished work is still an evasion. Intermission is exactly as billed—"extraneous" music from the show—and the first Residents record unable to stand on its own. (Intermission later became a bonus add-on to the CD of Mark of the Mole.)

Residue collects Resident leftovers, rarities and unreleased versions. It, too, sidesteps the Mole issue, but is at least exciting and entertaining (if a bit uneven and unintegrated), relying notably on the group's patented warpige of rock clichés. That's more than can be said of their collaboration with likeminded English weirdos Renaldo and the Loaf. Just who's at fault isn't clear (it can't all be Renaldo), but the record is far less than the sum of its parts. Only one track ("Monkey & Bunny") is truly worthy of the Residents; the rest deserves to be forgotten.

Not content with one incomplete ambitious venture, the Residents then launched another: the American Composer Series, an attempt to lionize their favorite songwriters by interpreting their work. The first volume of the projected sixteen-year (!) undertaking, George & James, matches up a side each of George Gershwin and James Brown (live at the Apollo, no less—with crowd sounds) and is an excellent, typically bizarre success. Stars & Hank, the series' second volume, has some worthwhile material, but isn't up to the creative level of George & James. Its examination of Hank Williams on Side One is hit (amusing) and miss (silly); the flip's fun-house-mirror treatment of John Philip Sousa's marches could've been done as effectively in a third of the time. That's a case of the format dictating the execution, something they'd wisely never allowed to happen before.

Soundtrack albums—one of a Residents short film ('84) and the other of a Hollywood feature ('85)—are hardly the records you'd expect to offer hope for a bright Residential future, but that's just what they do. The long-rumored Vileness Fats was intended to be a full-length music video back in 1972 (!), but was later abandoned. It's hard to believe the music was recorded that long ago; the songs may date from then, but the recordings on Whatever Happened to Vileness Fats? sound of more recent vintage. And it's a good, if not major, addition to the group's canon. Even better is the certifiably recent The Census Taker, which subverts more soundtrack music genres than you can shake a stick at in brilliant Residential fashion. Could this be the band's mode of entry into the real world?

Next came The Big Bubble. The contradictory "Part Four of the Mole Trilogy" self-description suggests that the Residents don't know how to kill off the monster they've created. That much of the album within an album is entertaining is besides the point. We've mainly heard this before, and positing it as the politically charged record by the miscegenated offspring of Moles and Chubs doesn't justify its billing. The Unfab Four (or Three, or—by now most likely—Two) are doing too much tail-chasing.

The neat Live in Japan (October 1985, in Tokyo, with Snakefinger along for the ride) draws on diverse corners of the group's output, from the '84 single of James Brown's "Man's World" (not on George and James) all the way back to "Smelly Tongues" from their very first LP. They do two songs from their collaborations with Snakefinger, and even the one decent number from their ill-begotten hook-up with Renaldo and the Loaf. Several tracks from The Commercial Album are exhumed and reworked with great success.

"Hit the Road Jack," the Percy Mayfield classic popularized by Ray Charles, gets an uncharacteristically accessible Residential once-over in a "special almost dance mix" on a 12-inch that also contains one track each from three recent albums.

The ambitious God in Three Persons is an hour-long scenario of Anyresident's personal journey to awareness of the balance and relativity of maleness and femaleness, pain and pleasure, reality and illusion. (Did anyone mention that pesky old Mole trilogy?) It begins with "song stylist" Laurie Amat singing the album's credits, including an abridged music publishing ID, and proceeds to tell its story via singing and (rhymed) narration over surprisingly simple, straightforward keyboard accompaniment. (Just how simple can be judged by a listen to the Soundtrack's remixed and re-edited versions of most of God's backing tracks: this music can't stand alone any more than Intermission.) The remarkable candor with which the piece addresses lust—we're talking blunt and uninhibited here—is yet another of the record's atypical attributes. The narrative is sometimes didactic, sometimes awkward and sometimes confusing, but impressive in spite of it. After being issued initially on CD, God in Three Persons was made available as a two-LP set.

Perhaps chastened by the Mole mess, the band plotted another tripartite project, but instead of trumpeting something they might not deliver, they just went ahead and did it. First they debuted "Buckaroo Blues" and "Black Barry" as sister pieces in the summer of '89 at New York's Lincoln Center, and then they added "The King and Eye" to form "Cube-E" that fall, honing the show in subsequent European and US tours. (The Buckaroo Blues & Black Barry cassette is a live recording from San Francisco, September 1989.) These full-fledged multi-media presentations included dancers, costumes, backdrops and props. Although occasionally flat and/or bewildering, the overall impression was stunning. Here at last was the Residents' history of American pop music in three "E-Z" steps: cowboy music, black slave and reconstruction music, and Elvis (the King . . . but of what?). This was a refinement of Residential modus and a new level of artistic achievement.

It comes across on the records, too, even without benefit of the visual aspect. Reconsidering familiar western idioms, the Residents fashion them into weirdly alien—yet more universal—epics of love and desperation. Stereotypical images are turned inside out to provide disturbing angles on the African-American slave and post-slave experience. Using just some narration and a batch of Presley hits reinterpreted Residents-style, The King and Eye (a studio recording with more material than was used onstage or, consequently, included on the live Cube-E album) incisively portrays Elvis' life and work as a misguided abandonment of innocence in favor of a sad yet comedic Oedipal journey. This is the near-perfection of (some of) what they started two decades ago with Santa Dog. Bringing an utterly unique perspective to an utterly unique icon, the Residents delivered a masterpiece, possibly their most successful work yet.

The UK-only PAL TV offers excerpts from Vileness Fats and selections from a Dutch performance of the Mole show. Heaven? and Hell!, two lengthy CD-only compilations, offer plenty of good music, but no rhyme or reason in the selection other than a general division into "beautiful" (Heaven?) and "ugly" (Hell!). A random-selection CD player equipped with a complete Residents catalogue could have done just as good a job choosing material as these discs do.

Two compilations eminently worthy of attention are Assorted Secrets and Stranger Than Supper. One side of the former is an early (spring '82) live Mole show; the other contains two live-in-the-studio sessions of songs they rarely (if ever) played onstage, including material from Duck Stab/Buster & Glen, Not Available (!) and Tunes from Two Cities.

A rare public/commercial release by the band's UWEB (Uncle Willie's Eyeball Buddies) fan club—which has, since 1988, issued a bunch of otherwise unavailable Residentalia, including a studio recording of Buckaroo Blues and a four-version Santa Dog CD—Stranger Than Supper offers a tasty sampling of what lies beyond. There's an early-'90 performance of "Teddy Bear" (a song also done for The King and Eye) from David Sanborn's Night Music (where the group shared the stage with Conway Twitty), a fine squint at "Oh Susannah" that didn't make it into "Buckaroo Blues," a great New Year's Eve serenade and an eleven-and-a-half-minute medley of "Land of 1000 Dances"!

“Double Shot of My Baby’s Love,” which includes the riff that later became a major motif in God in Three Persons (plus a chunk of the narration, too). Real good stuff; it will make you want to join UWEB.

Even prior to their Night Music appearance, the Residents reached network television, through a likely door—the one that leads into Pee-wee’s Playhouse. Following artist Gary Panter (who used to do Ralph record covers) into his nutty corner of the CBS Saturday morning lineup, the Residents supplied the music for the infamous Zizybalubah episode. On another media front, the group has frequently appeared as guest protagonists in Those Annoying Post Bros. and Savage Henry, two comic book series by Matt Howarth, creator of the Mole trilogy mini-comics. [jg]

See also Hybrid Kids, Snakefinger.

MARTIN REV

Martin Rev EP (Infidelity) 1980

Clouds of Glory (Fr. New Rose) 1985

The keyboard half of pioneering New York psycho-electronic duo Suicide proves only slightly more melodic on his eccentric eponymous solo outing—all keyboards and rhythm machines, with only the occasional grunting vocal. The rich layering of synthesizer effects—at least compared to the brute minimalism of Suicide—is close to the articulate electronic orchestration of the Ric Ocasek-produced Suicide album (also released in 1980). The simple floating melody and disco rhythm-box ping of “Mari” also suggest the mantric pop quality of Suicide’s near-hit 12-inch single, “Dream Baby Dream.” More typical of Martin Rev, though, is the hellish pumping of “Nineteen 86” and “Jomo”’s industrial racket; the only thing missing is Suicide singer Alan Vega’s mad bark.

Half a decade later, Rev returned with the like-minded Clouds of Glory, pressed on red vinyl. Musical styles may have finally caught up with this minimalist electro-rhythm pioneer, but he sticks resolutely true to course here, dispensing with vocals and layering weird sound effects over sturdy sequencer lines. The gently attractive “Whisper” would have made a very pretty song were Rev to give it lyrics. [df/i]

See also Suicide.

REVENGE

See New Order.

REVERB MOTHERFUCKERS

Route 666 (Race Age) 1988

Twelve Swinging Signs of the Zodiac (Rave) 1989 ●

It’s hard not to be leery of any band that defines itself as a purveyor of New York Scum Rock, as these gents do on the cover of their second LP. (Stuff like that always makes me think of those hideous “punk fashion” window displays Macy’s had around ’77. Anybody who’d wear a $400 leather jacket with the word “PUNK” spelled out in studs across the back would just have to be an asshole, y’know?)

Anyway, the Reverb Motherfuckers combine the funny-punk tendencies of some NYC-area hardcore bands with genuinely screwy guitar-smoked huzz. Imagine a version of Shockability in which both Chadbourne and Kramer were still into Zappa and downs. Cross that horrible result with Adrenalin O.D. and you’ve got something similar to these guys’ lesser stuff. RMF does have its moments, however, and there’s no denying that Route 666’s silkscreened cover was one of the decade’s best. [bc]

REVILLOS

See Rezillos.

REVOLTING COCKS

Big Sexy Land (Wax Trax!) 1986 ●

You Goddamned Son of a Bitch (Wax Trax!) 1988 ●

Beers, Steers + Queers (Wax Trax!) 1990 ●

CHRIS CONNELLY

Whiplash Boychild (Wax Trax!) 1991 ●

PiL mixed disco beats with arty noise on Metal Box, taking a cue from Can, whose drummer (Jaki Lie-bezeit) made that band’s most far-flung journeys swing. Revolting Cocks—a highly productive collaboration between Chicago powerhouse Al Jourgensen (Ministry, etc.), Belgian producer/musician Luc Van Acker and Scotland’s Chris Connelly (his semi-industrial dance-rock group, Fini Tribe, once recorded a Can song), with contributions from assorted other brothers-in-noise, including Jeff Ward of Lard—initially followed those early PiL efforts, rather than the dozens of industrial dance outfits that sprang up in Europe throughout the ’80s. Deliberately and unapologetically abrasive (the vocals are invariably Brillo-throated), Revolting Cocks are a big heap of snarling, ugly fun.

With Richard 23 of Front 242 joining the basic RevCo pair, Big Sexy Land is diverting but unremarkable; nearly all of the material on it receives an unexpected charge on the charmingly titled double-live set You Goddamned Son of a Bitch. Cut at one Chicago show in September 1987 with a cast that includes Ministry’s Paul Barker (who co-produced) and William Rieffin, the LP benefits from refined technical abilities and the almost palpable hostility the band radiates to its audience—and vice versa.

Employing the same quintet lineup as on the live record, Beers, Steers + Queers is, to a point, RevCo’s tour de force. The title cut makes the most of the complex interaction of a set of very stiff rhythms, the base provided by a looped turntable scratch that’s sure to send your roommate off the roof. The monolithic “Get Down” is highlighted by an honest-to-god guitar solo that recalls both prime Lou Reed and prime Tom Verlaine. Alas, “(Let’s Talk) Physical,” a seven-minute CD “bonus” reduced from the album’s “(Let’s Get) Physical,” simply loops someone screaming the word “physical,” and is meant to send you off the roof.

By the time of Connelly’s solo album, the Scottish native had moved to Chicago and become a permanent member of both Ministry and RevCo. Building on the musical breadth of Fini Tribe, Whiplash Boychild is an amazing stylistic mixture of late-’70s Bowie and Iggy (accent on the former; the lead-off track could almost be an outtake from Heroes). Connelly makes the most of his deep, resonant voice, surrounding it with alternately muscular and atmospherically restrained rock music (although one hearty cabaret song is performed with just piano) of real power and subtlety. Very impressive.

[gk/i]

See also Front 242, Ministry, Luc Van Acker.

KIMBERLEY REW

See Katrina and the Waves.

REZILLOS

Can't Stand the Rezillos (Sire) 1978

Mission Accomplished ... but the Beat Goes On (nr/Sire) 1979

REVILOS

Rev Up (nr/Snatz-DinDisc) 1980

Attack! (nr/Superville) 1983

Scotland's Rezillos were a blast of fresh air compared to the more serious bands of new wave's first charge. The ex-art students were partial to an overhauled '60s look (e.g., foil mini-skirts, pop-art fabrics) and songs with titles like "Flying Saucer Attack" and "Top of the Pops." Can't Stand the Rezillos is an action-packed document of their pop/camp approach. Thrashings of the Dave Clark 5's "Glad All Over" and Gerry & the Pacemakers' "I Like It" surround "(My Baby Does) Good Sculptures," a typically loopy original.

The band flew apart not long after their album debut, leaving the live Mission Accomplished as an unsatisfactory memorial. Besides duplicating six tunes from Can't Stand, the record is plagued by near-bootleg-quality sound. Otherwise the performance is a raveup from start to finish, with five new originals and versions of the Kinks' "I Need You," Cannibal & the Headhunters' "Land of 1,000 Dances" and even Sweet's "Ballroom Blitz."

Fortunately, singers Fay Fife (real name: Sheilagh Hynde) and Eugene Reynolds regrouped with new musicians as the Revillos, and took the Rezillos' promise even further. Rev Up is filled with pastiches of '60s genres—"Bobby Come Back to Me," "On the Beach," "Secret of the Shadow," "Motorbike Beat"—and the obligatory non-originals—"Cool Jerk," "Hungry for Love," "Hippy Hippy Sheik" [sic]. The only foul touch is retitling the Rock-a-Teens' "Woo-Hoo" as "Yeah Yeah" and pawning it off as an original. But Rev Up is hilarious.

Attack!, the band's long-playing swansong, shows signs of strain. Some tunes ("Sputnick Kiss," "Man Attack!," "Your Baby's Gone") are as delightful as ever; others ("Mad from Birth to Death," the instrumental "Man Hunt") are decidedly slight. If there's another non-original besides the Exciters' "Tell Him," it's virtually indistinguishable from the rest, not only because of stylistic similarity but by the lack of songwriter credits anywhere on the album. For sheer sustained obsession with a Toontown '60s approach, though, the Rezillos deserve a tinfoil merit badge. [sj]

See also Prisoners, Shake.

MARC RIBOT

Rootless Cosmopolitans (Island) 1990 ♠

In the past few years, guitarist Ribot (who got his start in the Real Tones, a pickup band that backed NYC-visiting soul singers, including Wilson Pickett) has racked up an impressive résumé, working with talents as diverse as Tom Waits, Elvis Costello, John Zorn, Marianne Faithful and the Lounge Lizards. He's also a charter member of the Hal Willner rep company, having played on, among other things, the producer's spoken-word-and-music projects with Allen Ginsberg and William S. Burroughs.

Ribot's album (named for his band; the phrase is from a Ginsberg poem, out of Joseph Goebbels) is a pretty enjoyable hybrid of "free" styles that has a distinctly Beefheartian air at times, particularly when Ribot's alternately fluid and jagged playing goes one-on-one with Don Byron's bass clarinet. While it would be easy to live without the arch spoken vocal on an otherwise inventive cover of Hendrix's "The Wind Cries Mary," the guitar-only deconstruction of "While My Guitar Gently Weeps" is right on the money. Rootless Cosmopolitans isn't a life-changer but, as avant-garde ear candy goes, it's unusually chewy. [gk]

See also Lounge Lizards.

BOYD RICE

Boyd Rice (nr/Mute) 1981

NON

Physical Evidence (nr/Mute) 1982

Blood & Flame (nr/Mute) 1987 •

BOYD RICE/FRANK TOVEY

Easy Listening for the Hard of Hearing (nr/Mute) 1984

BOYD RICE AND FRIENDS

Music, Martinis and Misanthropy (nr/Bad) 1990 •

The first album by California conceptualist Boyd Rice (one of the first avant-garde "musicians" to use turntables as a creative tool) offers no information beyond the artist's name (embossed on the all-black cover), that it was recorded in the mid-'70s and is "playable at any speed." The droning noise slices, which are not audibly ascribable to any specific instruments, seem to consist of short tape loops layered over one another to create repetitive but varying textures (like Frippertronics, but without the guitar) that slow down and speed up on their own. Unlistenable.

Having thus cleared the decks of past achievements, Rice (aka Non) released Physical Evidence, a collection of more recent pieces, some of them recorded live. Armed with the deadpan conceptual humor of individual titles (my favorite is "(Theme from) Dark Shadows," the writing of which is, astonishingly, credited to someone other than Rice), the fifteen jarring loops and layers of shapeless (but uniformly unpleasant) noise that comprise Blood & Flame make it a sound effects record for the deeply disturbed.

Easy Listening, while fairly routine for the eccentric Rice, takes Frank Tovey—aka Fad Gadget, himself no stranger to found sounds—off on a conceptual trip far from his usual recording format. "All sounds either collected or generated . . . by non-musical appliances"—in other words, this ain't music at all, but rather repetitive, rhythmically ordered noises, mostly on the order of church bells and other things that can be struck. Not all that radical and not in the slightest bit charming, the LP (recorded in 1981) is structurally impressive but aggravating in the extreme. [i]

RICH KIDS

Ghosts of Princes in Towers (nr/EMI) 1978 (nr/Fame)

1983

After being squeezed out of the Sex Pistols, bassist/singer Glen Matlock formed the Rich Kids with guitarist Midge Ure and drummer Rusty Egan (both of whom later collaborated on Visage, with Ure eventually going on to join Ultravox), plus one Steve New. During their tempestuous year-long alliance, the Rich Kids managed only one album, ludicrously misproduced into a muffled mess by Mick Ronson. Despite abysmal sound, the band's talent emerges, and Ghosts is an extraordinary album of daring experimental rock/pop that has two utterly brilliant pieces (the title track and "Marching Men") plus a few others nearly as good. While the predominant guitar work is occasionally mundane, there are enough novel ideas and convincing songs to make this uniquely flavored project survive the audio blood-bath and emerge victorious. [1]

See also Doll by Doll, Sex Pistols, Ultravox, Visage.

JONATHAN RICHMAN AND THE MODERN LOVERS

Jonathan Richman & the Modern Lovers (Beserkley) 1977 (Beserkley-Rhino) 1986 •

Rock'n'Roll with the Modern Lovers (Beserkley) 1977 (Beserkley-Rhino) 1986 •

Back in Your Life (Beserkley) 1979 (Beserkley-Rhino) 1986 •

The Jonathan Richman Songbook (nr/Beserkley) 1980 Jonathan Sings! (Sire) 1983

Rockin' and Romance (Twin/Tone) 1985

It's Time for Jonathan Richman and the Modern Lovers (Upside) 1986 •

Modern Lovers 88 (Rounder) 1987 •

The Beserkley Years: The Best of Jonathan Richman and the Modern Lovers [CD] (Beserkley-Rhino) 1987 •

23 Great Recordings by Jonathan Richman and the Modern Lovers [CD] (nr/Beserkley-Essential-Castle Comm.) 1990 •

MODERN LOVERS

The Modern Lovers (Beserkley) 1976 (Beserkley-Rhino) 1986 •

Live (Beserkley) 1977 •

The Original Modern Lovers (Bompl) 1981

JONATHAN RICHMAN

Jonathan Richman (Rounder) 1989 •

Jonathan Goes Country (Rounder) 1990 •

At the outset of his career, Jonathan Richman was considered a radical trailblazer, precociously exploring minimalist rock years before such behavior became popular (or even acceptable). Not only was his unique approach enormously influential on later bands, early members of the Modern Lovers went on to become successful in such groups as Talking Heads and the Cars. Over the course of his recordings, however, Richman's predilection for childlike whimsy replaced the angst-ridden emotionalism of his first songs, and he eventually lost his flock by refusing to remain the same character he had been a decade earlier.

The first Modern Lovers album was cobbled together by Beserkley supremo Matthew King Kaufman from demos, the bulk of which had been produced by John Cale in 1971 when it looked as if the band would be signed to Warner Bros. Despite the fragmentary nature of its parts, The Modern Lovers is surprisingly coherent and contains all of Richman's classic creations: "Roadrunner," "Pablo Picasso," "Girl Friend," "She Cracked," etc. The stark, simple performances highlight an adenoidal New England voice that lacks everything technical but nothing emotional. One of the truly great art-rock albums of all time.

Although released shortly after The Modern Lovers, Jonathan Richman & the Modern Lovers was recorded five years later with a totally different band, and has little in common with the first LP. Not realizing the time frame, many people took this as a sign of artistic inconsistency, and were put off by such silliness as "Abominable Snowman in the Market" and "Hey There Little Insect." The record is, in fact, pretty great, blending guilelessness with such heart-wrenching pieces of honesty as "Important in Your Life." Enough of Richman's early approach carries over to temper the giddy romps, and it's a thoroughly charming, low-key album.

Rock'n'Roll takes Richman even further away from seriousness. Mixing traditional folk songs and lullabies with originals that would do Mister Rogers proud ("Ice Cream Man," "Rockin' Rockin' Leprechaun"), the ironically titled album stretched the ability of his adult fans to join in the fun. Abiding wittiness—like "Dodge Veg-O-Matic"—hedges the album's stylistic bet, but many were left wondering just where Richman was heading.

Live, recorded in England, is full of the flakiest songs in his repertoire—featherweight and best suited for very young people. The Jonathan Richman Songbook is a compilation, as is The Beserkley Years, a fine CD-only collection of eighteen classic tracks, both studio and live. The unrelated UK-only 23 Great Recordings is an even bigger anthology covering basically the same '70s material.

Back in Your Life was recorded (after a long lay-off) with two different bands, the regular Modern Lovers and a vocals/string bass/glockenspiel ensemble. The songs—which include five uniquely appropriate cover versions—are totally over the top, as fanciful and ridiculous as possible. There's nothing remotely connected to the original Modern Lovers' rock'n'roll work; comparisons to Groucho Marx's musical ventures are more relevant. Impossible to hate, this record merely defies honest enthusiasm.

Four years later, the same is fortunately not the case on Jonathan Sings!, a wonderful LP showcasing a fully revitalized Richman with an altogether new outlook. Audibly bursting with love, Richman eloquently (in his own ingeniously clumsy way) sings of "That Summer Feeling," exclaims "You're the One for Me" and rejoices at having "Somebody to Hold Me." Elsewhere, he defends the innate wisdom of infants in "Not Yet Three," offers a new look at world travel ("Give Paris One More Chance") and even extols the joys of "This Kind of Music." The new Modern Lovers—two women and three men—have a strong but understated presence that keeps Richman exciting without getting in his way. Simply put, Jonathan Sings! is one of the most uplifting albums in memory, and Richman's best since his debut.

Jonathan's stayed on the right track (with an exception) ever since, issuing one charming album after the next Rockin' and Romance (retaining two Modern Lovers from Sings) is a spartan, casually produced (to the point of sonic obscurity) affair, but songs about "The Beach," "Vincent Van Gogh" (number two in Richman's Great Painters series), baseball ("Walter Johnson," "The Fenway"), travel ("Down in Bermuda") and other winning topics are all filled with his remarkable wit and intelligence. Who else could write a paean to bluejeans that discusses the relative merits of various brands without being mistaken for a commercial? Slight demerits for the shoddy sound quality, but no complaints whatsoever about the music.

It's Time For reunites Richman with erstwhile Modern Lover guitarist Asa Brebner. The audio fidelity is better; an accordionist, producer Andy Paley's guitar work and Richman's sax tooting make for an unusual, busier-than-ordinary (relatively speaking) rock sound. "Yo Jo Jo" is a crazed instrumental raveup, the most electric thing he's done in this decade. Richman's lyrical concerns are more general than in the recent past: for every "Double Chocolate Malted" (which has a strangely cranky tone to it) or "Corner Store," there are two songs (e.g., "It's You," "When I Dance," "Just About Seventeen," "This Love of Mine") that are less specific and to a degree less captivating. A confusing (or is that confused?) album, It's Time For has the aura of a transitional project.

Never fear. Accompanied by a second guitarist and a drummer, Richman grabbed his oft-neglected saxophone and cut the magical Modern Lovers 88, an all-too-brief set of semi-electric rock tunes that hark back in composition and presentation to Jonathan Richman & the Modern Lovers. The woolly "Dancin Late at Night" and the romantic "Gail Loves Me" display a budding Holly orientation that bears more exploration; "New Kind of Neighborhood" resembles Dion; "California Desert Party," "Everything's Gotta Be Right" and "Circle I" (a delightful ode to vegetables) convert the essential ingredients of '50s R&B into airy but exciting dance-rock as only the Modern Lovers can.

As the title intimates, Jonathan Richman continues its predecessor's minimalist direction, presenting the artist accompanied only by his guitar and percussive footstomps (though an unobtrusive rhythm section pops up on two songs). The solo thing doesn't work as well on record as it does live, and the material's a bit spotty (three out of twelve tracks are instrumental covers of pop standards, one is sung in French and another in Spanish), but Jonathan Richman is not without its charms. Check out "Closer," "Fender Stratocaster" and "I Eat with Gusto, Damn! You Bet," a spoken-word verse defending Jojo's sloppy table manners.

In contrast, Jonathan Goes Country finds the singer backed by a full band of seasoned studio pros, led by producers Lou Whitney and D. Clinton Thompson (of Morells/Skeletons fame), with ingratiating results. The program is a mixture of well-chosen covers, reworkings of previously recorded Richman tunes and a few swell new originals. Rather than sounding like a gimmicky affectation, the album's faux-Nashville arrangements prove to be a perfect vehicle for Jonathan's bucolic sincerity.

The demos dredged up for The Original Modern

Lovers date from 1973 and were produced by Kim Fowley. The LP includes two versions of "Roadrunner," plus "Astral Plane," "Girlfren" and "She Cracked," as well as some otherwise unrecorded numbers. Despite thin sound it offers slightly different approaches from what surfaced on the first album. Shoddy but relevant.

[i/hd]

See also Cars, Necessaries, Real Kids, Talking Heads.

RIDE

Ride EP (nr/Creation) 1990 ●

Play EP (nr/Creation) 1990 ●

Smile (Sire-Reprise) 1990 ♢

Fall EP (nr/Creation) 1990 ●

Nowhere (Sire-Reprise) 1990 ♢

Inspired by the Manchester rave scene, this young quartet from the English university city of Oxford finished art college and began laying washes of guitar damage and catchy echoed vocals over shuffling dance beats. The tentative first EP leads off with an original entitled "Chelsea Girl" and follows it with three similar long noise-pop songs, the best of which is "Close My Eyes." The more distinctive Play has a louder, harder sound (converting the previous record's jagged squalls into a continuous thick gauze) and, on the exemplary "Like a Daydream," rich folk-rock harmonies. (As Ride's introduction to America, Smile combines the two EPs—which contain too much filler to make a strong album—on a single disc under a new title.)

Focusing on the band's vocal side but also displaying its extended dance groovability, Ride's first real album—produced with an annoyingly conscientious lack of sonic clarity—is indistinct and frequently dull, a collection of unmemorable songs given ineffectually stylized atmospheric performances on acoustic and electric instruments. While too many of Nowhere's bland tunes drag along at a lazy clip, turning up the pep-o-meter doesn't ensure any significant improvement. With the exception of the tuneful tremolo surge of "Polar Bear," the hypnotic "Vapour Trail" and the winsome "Taste," Nowhere is no big deal. [i]

STAN RIDGWAY

The Big Heat EP (nr/Illegal) 1985

The Big Heat (IRS) 1986

Mosquitos (Geffen) 1989 ●

Partyball (Geffen) 1991 ●

It's no coincidence that the lyrics on The Big Heat album (the EP is a pre-LP teaser) are printed on the inner sleeve in prose format; ex-Wall of Voodoo singer Ridgway's a pulp novelist at heart. Proffered with his exaggerated side-of-the-mouth delivery and instrumentation that reaches for maximum film noir ambience, the songs recount amazing stories of crime, war and bizarre characters in uncommon and highly engaging fashion. The Big Heat is a rare record—one that will have you as interested in the lyrical action as its substantial musical attributes.

If anything, Ridgway outdoes himself on Mosquitos, a record so chock full of atmosphere that it's nearly visual. As before, Ridgway is more of a narrator than a singer, and he shows his skill as a song- and story-writer on nearly every cut. If The Big Heat was film noir, Mosquitos is The Last Picture Show. Another essential album. [i/ds]

See also Wall of Voodoo.

RIFLE SPORT

Voice of Reason (Reflex) 1983

Complex EP (Ruthless) 1985

White (Ruthless) 1987 •

Live at the Entry, Dead at the Exit (Ruthless) 1989

Primo (Big Money-Ruthless) 1991 •

FLOUR

Flour (Touch and Go) 1988 •

Luv 713 (Touch and Go) 1990 •

Machinery Hill (Touch and Go) 1991 •

Rifle Sport are central members of Minneapolis/St. Paul's "third wave." After the Suicide Commandos/Suburbs in the mid-'70s, and the Hüskers/Replacements at the beginning of the '80s, along came bands like Soul Asylum, Man Sized Action and Otto's Chemical Lounge. These combos bloomed roughly around the time of the worldwide hardcore explosion, but none of them were the least bit doctrinaire. Rifle Sport drew on some of the "post-punk" Angloisms that colored the sound of certain Chicago groups emerging in the same period, and the band has always valued structural tension over compositional speed. The lineup has been stable for almost a decade, and in that time the quartet's sound has evolved into uniquely propulsive, but somehow low-key, guitar rock. The lyrics are sometimes opaquely personal, and the songs are more circularly mopey than ecstatically expanding.

Describing Rifle Sport as a younger version of Mission of Burma without the underlying Stooges-worship may have a bit of truth to it; the band's records document its progress and evolution in a laudable and noisy fashion. Fans of edge-heavy shuffling should find them quite winning: newcomers should start with the most recent wax and work backwards.

Bassist Pete (Flour) Conway—also a longtime member of Breaking Circus—has cut several solo discs (the first two are on one CD) that are grungier one-man-shows. The sound is reminiscent of that Big Black/Helios Creed wall-of-shit approach, crossed with Eno's early pop-whuzz. Both Flour and Luv 713 are pleasant pieces of atmospheric blanket-snuff, even if live shows in support of them have been a tad weak. [bc]

See also Breaking Circus.

ZOOGZ RIFT

Idiots on the Miniature Golf Course (Snout) 1979 (SST) 1987

Amputees in Limbo [tape] (Snout) 1982 (SST) 1987

Music Sucks [tape] (Snout) 1982

Can You Smell My Genitals from Where You're Standing? [tape] (Snout) 1983

None of Your Damn Business! [tape] (Snout) 1983

The Diseased Confessions of Moamo Milkman [tape] (Snout) 1984

Ipecac (Azra) 1984 (SST) 1987

Interim Resurgence (Snout) 1985 (SST) 1987

Amputees in Limbo, Deluxe European Edition (nr/Cordelia) 1985

Island of Living Puke (SST) 1986

Looser Than Clams . . . A Historical Retrospective (SST) 1986

Water (SST) 1987

Water II: At Safe Distance (SST) 1987

Son of Puke [tape] (SST) 1987

Nonentity (Water III: Fan Black Dada) (SST) 1988 •

Murdering Hell's Happy Cretins (SST) 1989 •

Torment (SST) 1989 •

War Zone (Ger. Musical Tragedies) 1990

Europe 1990 (Ger. Musical Tragedies) 1990

ZOOGZ RIFT & MARC MYLAR

Nutritionally Sound [CD] (Trigon) 1990 •

RICHIE HASS & THE BEATNIKS

Drummers' Hall of Fame [tape] 1985

SCOTT COLBY

Slide of Hand (SST) 1987

As imaginative and stimulating as he is irritating and vitriolic, California's Zoogz Rift (Robert Pawlikowski) is an iconoclastic original, a reactionary whose paranoia has too frequently detracted from his music's experimental pizzazz and considerable exotic charm. This might be explained by what were, for a long time, his primary intellectual inspirations: Salvador Dali's dadaist strategies and Ayn Rand's objective realism. The singer/guitarist is (too) often compared musically to Frank Zappa and Captain Beefheart, while this may have applied to his earlier recordings, the past few years have found Rift toiling prolifically in a fertile field all his own. And lest casual observers be intimidated by his scatology and other intentional offenses to good taste and community standards, let it be stated clearly that Rift is not some talentless asshole making noise for an audience of one. Although they are wildly uneven, many of his records are genuinely good.

Idiots on the Miniature Golf Course features the Micro Mastodons, a band which includes songwriter/drummer Richie Hass, a longtime Rift associate. Dedicated to Don Van Vliet, this collection of private surrealist humor, overambitiously complex writing and selfconsciously zany performances sets the tone for much of what was to follow. Another featured player on this collection is guitarist John Trubee, who has stuck it out with Rift on and off over the years, and is infamous in his own right for the classic novelty single, "A Blind Man's Penis." (The Idiots cassette adds "I Wanna Dismember You Just the Way You Are" and "Lovely Girl.")

Over the next three years, Rift issued five cassette-only albums. While SST later reissued one of them on vinyl and tape, the remaining four were left to obscurity. Amputees in Limbo and Ipecac form a paranoid pair whose emotional timbre is evident in titles like "My Daddy Works for the Secret Marines," "Art Band" ("You're nothing but a fart band"), "I Was the Only Boy at the Teen Girls Slumber Party" and "You Fucked Up." Rift's Amazing Shitheads, his band at the time, was an uncompromising group of competent yahoos in acerbic synch with their leader. (The original issue of Ipecac is a picture disc. There's an extra track on the Ipecac tape. Likewise, the SST cassette of Amputees adds an alternate version of "Eyes of Bodhidharma" and another bonus.)

Rift began to lighten up slightly on Interim Resur- gence and the charmingly titled Island of Living Puke. Cosmic etherea ("X-Ray Girls") and amusing self-analysis ("Nightclub Sequence") share space with his usual spleen ventilation.

Looser Than Clams is an, ahem, "greatest hits" LP that served as an intermission prior to Rift's H2O trilogy. By Water, his musical talents had far surpassed his ranting, although his misanthropy continues unabated. Water II is tighter yet, with synthesizers and samplers coming to the fore. The off-kilter instrumentals on Nonentity show off his idiosyncratic guitar playing to fine advantage and allow the group to simmer eccentrically in the breeze. (The CD and cassette add three tracks.)

While preparing and releasing the Water trilogy, Rift stuck together Son of Puke, a patience-defying cassette mixing samples from his collection of spoken-word ephemera and instrumental bits—a few guitar chords here, some $40 Casio keyboard plinks there—all seemingly at random. It's occasionally fun but not easy to endure for the full 45 minutes. If Rift's liner notes are to be believed, the cassette's flip side—a female vocal group carefully singing Beatles songs to the accompaniment of two jazzy electric guitarists (except for the full-scale sonic hell of "Revolution No. 9")—is by the unknown Transients and comes from a tape he discovered in a garbage bin. Hmmm . . .

Divided into a live-in-Holland side and a dead-in-Los Angeles side, Murdering Hell's Happy Cretins—a pivotal album on which Rift renounces his adherence to dada—is an absolutely delightful mixture of Zoogz's personable stage presence (the guy can really sing!) and some fine (mostly instrumental) studio work. The title track puts jolly music to one of his patented (and amusing) rants; the demento "One of Us" features Hass' wild vibraphone riffing.

Recorded a few months prior to Hell's Happy Cretins' studio side, Torment is an all-new record that marks the reappearance of saxophonist Marc Mylar (absent since Water). While the cassette adds three songs, the CD packs in an entire unreleased album entitled United We Fall.

Given his ongoing difficulties with the American record industry, Rift has recently had to look overseas to maintain the flow of his massive output to vinyl. The weak War Zone (subtitled Music for Obnoxious Yuppie Scum) consists of the 20-minute "Kasaba Kabeza (Drop the Facades)" instrumental suite (whose final movement is dubbed "Pharquar Resolvo Kaputo Solo Resolvo Redundo Bono Honko"—an entirely apt description for this tedious horns'n'noise workout) and a side of shorter items, including a viciously funny Traveling Wilburys' spoof, "You Can Count on Us."

Unlike the ambitious sextet Rift led on the '88 tour preserved on Hell's Happy Cretins, he is joined only by a post-Hass rhythm section and keyboardist Jonathan "Mako" Sharkey on Europe 1990. This compendium of performances from Switzerland, Germany, Austria and Holland has a disconcerting undercurrent of tension and harsh sound, but does review an impressive range of material and gives Zoogz a chance to spotlight some extremely inventive guitar work.

A lot of the two-man Nutritionally Sound project consists of barely structured high-tech studio dabbling, nicely recorded sounds (including keyboards, horns, guitar, percussion, spoken and/or found vocals) that don't coalesce into any clear-cut musical form. Several of the things that most resemble songs (a nearly straight rendition of "I'm Telling You Now" with a twisted guitar solo, "Get Up offa That Thing," "All Bets Are Off") are, in fact, songs; a lot of what surrounds them, however, is just self-indulgent hooey.

Slide guitarist Scott Colby (who has also accompanied Henry Kaiser) was a frequent member of the Rift entourage up through 1986 or so, and his old trail boss returned the favor by producing Slide of Hand. This adventurous instrumental album sets Colby's bottleneck loose in a studio with such sidemen as Kaiser, John French and Willie Lapin (also a Rift vet). Since Colby doesn't come at slide guitar from a blues angle, his playing is fairly uncommon; the album is more or less jazz played like rock. [rg/i]

See also John Trubee.

WILL RIGBY

See dB's.

MARC RILEY WITH THE CREEPERS

Creeping at Maida Vale EP (nr/In Tape) 1984

Cull (nr/In Tape) 1984

Gross Out (nr/In Tape) 1984

Shadow Figure EP (nr/In Tape) 1984

Fancy Meeting God! (nr/In Tape) 1985

Four A's from Maida Vale EP (nr/In Tape) 1985

Warts 'n' All (nr/In Tape) 1985

CREEPERS

Miserable Sinners (In Tape-Last Time Round) 1986

Rock'n'Roll Liquorice Flavour (Red Rhino-Fundamental)

1987 •

Sleeper: A Retrospective (nr/Bleed) 1989

Guitarist/keyboardist Riley was booted out of the Fall in 1982, reportedly over an unseemly penchant for pop. His prolific output as a solo artist and bandleader, however, only slightly warrants such categorization. Although Riley shares his former group's taste for deadpan vocals and distorted guitar and keyboard sounds, freed of Mark E. Smith's clutches he exhibits more melodic, structured songwriting and has one foot firmly rooted in the garage punk tradition.

All three EPs are taken from sessions for John Peel's radio program and feature one of Riley's favorite lyrical gambits—taking the piss out of other groups. Creeping at Maida Vale is a great little record, with four strong songs, including "Location Bangladesh," a clever stab at bands who travel the world for exotic video locales. Four A's, equally enjoyable, contains "Bard of Woking," aimed at the people's-poet pretensions of one Style Councillor. The Cull compilation fills one side with Creeping and the other with reprises of prior, vaguely Velvets-ish singles.

Gross Out, while not breaking any new musical ground, does contain one of Riley's finest moments, "Gross." Fancy Meeting God! is an energetic, sometimes catchy and often hilarious LP, which unfortunately loses a little zip towards the end. Had it been ended together with Gross Out's highlights, the sum would have been much greater than the parts.

Warts 'n' All is a fun greatest-hits run-through recorded live in Amsterdam. As entertaining for Riley's between-song banter as it is for great songs (including Eno's pre-ambience "Baby's on Fire"), it can serve as a very good introduction to the uninitiated.

Miserable Sinners and Rock'n'Roll Liquorice Flavour both drop Riley's name (even though he's still obviously the leader) and employ Mekon/Three John Jon Langford in the producer's chair. It is on these two LPs that the Creepers are at their peak. The sound on Miserable Sinners is a dense swirl of guitars, but the real change is in the lyrical approach, which has gone from satiric fun-making to introspective and self-referencing. "I strive to be original/have my own sound/I don't run my VU records/into the ground," sings Riley.

Liquorice Flavour follows suit with clever but serious self-examination, again tipping a hat to influences (and including a brilliant cover of the Pretty Things' '64 classic, "Rosalyn"). The Tom Waits-like piano ballad "Sweet Retreat" states "You don't have to listen to Swordfishtrumbone [sic] . . . but it helps." The LP has a down-home feel—not unlike the Mekons—on several tracks, giving it more textural and stylistic variety than its predecessors. (The artsy, spoken "Derbyshire" almost sounds like Sonic Youth.) It's only reasonable that the group should dissolve after releasing their finest record.

Unfortunately, precious little has been heard from Riley since the breakup, although he did contribute to the 1988 Johnny Cash tribute, 'Til Things Are Brighter, playing with his Mekon pals. The following year, Sleeper: A Retrospective was released, a four-sided, history-spanning collection reprising material from all the studio records save one (Fancy Meeting God!). With such highlights as all of Shadow Figure, three of the Four A's and about half each of the final two albums, Sleeper is a very useful sampler, and an effective demonstration of Riley and company's musical development. Now if he'd only get back to work.

See also Fall. [dgs]

PENNY RIMBAUD & EVE LIBERTINE

See Cross.

RINGLING SISTERS

See jScream'n' Sirens!

RIP RIG + PANIC

God (nr/Uh Huh-Virgin) 1981

I Am Cold (nr/Virgin) 1982

Attitude (nr/Virgin) 1983

FLOAT UP CP

Kill Me in the Morning (Upside) 1985

MARK SPRINGER

Piano (nr/Illuminated) 1984

One of the Pop Group's numerous offshoots, Rip Rig + Panic was a jazz-funk fusion band that left art-punk behind musically but retained a similarly irreverent sensibility. Named after a Roland Kirk LP, the band appropriately featured saxophone/piano free-for-alls. They were not as anarchic as their jazz inspirations, though, repetitive bass licks (Sean Oliver) and stable percussion (Bruce Smith) are great aids for more centrist listeners.

The band's most appealing aspect is its high-spiritedness. Beyond absurd titles, Rip Rig + Panic leaps around stylistically from (short) track to track. Tranquil piano (Mark Springer) solos and silly chats provide respite from screeching sax (Gareth Sager), Arabic and Far Eastern touches and hard-edged vocals (a very young Neneh Cherry and, on God, ex-Slit Ari Upp). Attitude, the band's most accessible album, comes closest to normal songs, while maintaining a zany eclecticism. Far from forbidding, Rip Rig + Panic keeps the show rolling with deft musicianship and odd-ball humor.

In late 1983, Rip Rig + Panic reorganized as Float Up CP; Sager (playing guitar and keyboards) and Oliver co-produced the sextet's sole album. The material on Kill Me in the Morning is straightforward funk/soul/jazz, with the rough edges left intact in just the right places. But this outing lacks the diversity of the previous band's work, and Cherry is its only star: she sings up a storm, even when the sexual metaphors ("Chemically Wet," "Joy's Address") get a bit trite. The band chugs along behind her with energy and panache, but there's nothing unique or catchy enough on Kill Me in the Morning to make a lasting impression.

Springer made a solo record. Cherry went on to huge stardom under her own name. Sager formed Head. Oliver, who co-wrote a 1987 hit ("Wishing Well") and did sessions for Terence Trent D'Arby, died of sickle cell anemia in March 1990. [si/dgs]

See also Neneh Cherry, Head, Pop Group.

UTES OF SPRING

Rites of Spring (Dischord) 1985

All Through a Life EP (Dischord) 1987

Led by singer/lyricist Guy Picciotto, Washington DC's Rites of Spring—which broke up in '87, leaving him to help found Fugazi—was an extraordinary punk band. Part of a dubious emo-core (emotionally charged hardcore) mini-movement, the quartet enveloped articulate sentiments in a relentless rush of rhythm and melody that was simultaneously pulverizing and delicate. Rites of Spring is a staggeringly great record, with excellent sound, crisp phrasing and evocative songs.

Unfortunately, while Rites of Spring plays with the same force and vigor on the four-song All Through a Life 7-inch, the mix reduces the band's blasts to artsy whimpers. Where the lyrics were formerly reflective and personal, here they're intimate nonsense. [icm]

See also Fugazi.

BRIAN RITCHIE

See Violent Femmes.

RITUAL

See Cult.

RITUAL TENSION

I Live Here (Sacrifice) 1986

I Live Here/Hotel California (Sacrifice) 1987 ♀

The Blood of the Kid (CBGB-Celluloid) 1987 •

Expelled (Safe House) 1991 •

MARC SLOAN

Yeow (Little Animal) 1985

GAWK

Lure of the Oxowl [tape] (Sacrifice) 1989

I Live Here is a challenging debut from a band that was somewhat overlooked in the rush to gush over such New York noise scene contemporaries as Sonic Youth, Live Skull and Swans. The links are there, both stylistic and genealogical (Ritual Tension's vocalist drummed on Greed and Holy Money), but this quartet writes to its own noisemaker. On the best material (like the gripping "Tightrope" and the scathing "Social Climber"), Ivan Nahem offers an alienated, surreal persona, his voice a cool monotone rising to a frantic bray, while his brother Andrew spews piercing, Rowland S. Howardian drone-guitar. The rhythms are unpredictable and convoluted; Ubuesque arrangements play havoc with traditional songcraft. (The tape and CD mix in the three songs from a subsequent EP, including a totally out-there devolution of the Eagles' "Hotel California.")

Live at CBGB, The Blood of the Kid presents Ritual Tension in a most conducive atmosphere. More intense than on I Live Here, the band presents some great new material, like the throbbing "New Super," the tempestuous "Devil Dog" and a primer of paranoia, "Oh I See."

Ritual Tension has been an on-again, off-again proposition the last few years. Recorded in 1988, the excellently self-produced Expelled is the finest display yet of the band's offbeat musicianship. The dissonance is so vibrantly arranged and performed that it actually becomes catchy.

Bassist Marc Sloan has kept himself busy during Tension downtime with a multitude of projects, including a stint in the False Prophets. While the solo Yeow predates Ritual Tension, Lure of the Oxowl finds him collaborating with Reed Ghazala under the Gawk moniker. The all-instrumental cassette ranges from ambient classical to avant-rock, played on Sloan's usual bass-with-effects and such instruments as kalimba, bamboo flute, ravanastron, er hu, cello and "electronic insects."

See also Swans. [gef]

DARREN ROBBINS

Darren Robbins Steals Your Girlfriend [CD] (Like) 1988 •

Chicago singer/songwriter Darren Robbins (no relation)—with production, playing and songwriting assistance by Graham Walker (and, in a lesser capacity, the two other Elvis Brothers)—makes a sterling debut with this sprightly collection of pure-pop/rock tunes. Robbins has a versatile voice and an engaging lightweight musical personality; making the most of simple ingredients and crude facilities, he comes up with a high percentage of winners here, including drummer Brad Steakley's sardonic "Get Out of My Life (I Can Mess It Up Myself)," Walker's magical "Try for a Miracle" and Robbins' own plaintive "Fire from a Stone" and "Travel Long My Wanderin' Heart." As much a showcase for the star's solid skills as a tantalizing indication of what the Elvis Brothers could be doing if they were still making records, Steals Your Girlfriend is a nifty delight. [1]

See also Elvis Brothers.

TOM ROBINSON BAND

Power in the Darkness (Harvest) 1978

TRB Two (Harvest) 1979

Tom Robinson Band (nr/EMI) 1981 (nr/Fame) 1982

TOM ROBINSON

North by Northwest (IRS) 1982 •

Cabaret '79 (nr/Panic) 1982 •

Atmospherics EP (nr/Panic) 1983

Hope and Glory (Geffen) 1984

Still Loving You (nr/Castaway) 1986 •

Midnight at the Fringe (nr/Dojo) 1987 •

The Collection 1977-1987 (nr/EMI) 1987 •

Back in the Old Country (nr/Connoisseur Collection) 1989 •

Last Tango (Ger. Line) 1989 •

SECTOR 27

Sector 27 (IRS) 1980

TOM ROBINSON & JAKKO M. JAKSZYK

We Never Had It So Good (Fr. Musidisc) 1990 •

In 1975, Tom Robinson escaped from the ashes of Cafe Society, a London folkiepop outfit produced by Ray Davies, to become a highly visible rock band-leader, championing various radical causes through music. Signed to EMI in the wake of that label's disastrous liaison with the Sex Pistols, Robinson's avowed homosexuality and uncompromising political stance made him an extremely controversial figure. Luckily, a brilliant (and surprisingly non-topical) first single, "2-4-6-8 Motorway," and a riveting album made the band internationally successful, affording the singing bassist the opportunity to be a real rock activist—spearheading Rock Against Racism—rather than merely a complainer. But a myopic outlook and limited musical range drew Robinson into a morass of sloganeering and overbearing self-righteousness that forced a major career rethink after only two LPs.

Power in the Darkness contains track after track of impassioned, heartfelt political anger, funneled through articulate lyrics and Danny Kustow's roaring guitar figures. The memorable songs seethe with honest conviction and convert rock energy into anthemic power. (The American release originally contained a bonus seven-song disc, compiling live tracks from an English EP and both sides of the "Motorway" single.)

TRB Two was produced by Todd Rundgren and basically echoes the style and content of its predecessor, but with a more mainstream sound and fewer rough edges (not really an improvement). Robinson's alternate approach—slower numbers played at a bouncy shuffle perfect for in-concert singalongs—does improve with Todd's treatment. This brace of polemics isn't as striking as Robinson's first, but fans of Power in the Darkness won't find anything obviously missing here (except perhaps drummer Dolph Taylor and keyboardist Mark Ambler, who had both been replaced). Tom Robinson Band is a compilation.

After the TRB collapsed, Robinson formed Sector 27 and refocused his efforts on personal relationships rather than politics. With a new lineup—notably including a bassist, which allowed Robinson to concentrate on singing—the restrained album has some winning songs, although none with the same immediacy as before.

Recorded in Hamburg with only producer Richard Mazda and a drummer, North by Northwest is a mature and subtle album. Featuring material co-written with Peter Gabriel and a cover of a Lewis Furey song, Robinson explores various sophisticated settings and succeeds in making a pleasantly slight record, marred only by an agonized (and agonizing) song of love lost, “Now Martin’s Gone.”

Cabaret ’79 is a live recording made shortly after the original TRB’s dissolution; it includes Robinson’s confrontational signature tune, “Glad to Be Gay,” as well as a reading of Noel Coward’s “Mad About the Boy,” which resulted in some legal problems between Robinson and Coward’s estate. The Collection is a useful compilation (with liner notes by the artist) of the band’s best tracks, drawing on singles and EPs for items like “Don’t Take No for an Answer,” “Glad to Be Gay” and “Motorway.”

Turning over a new page, Robinson then began a successful era of plainly commercial rock, captured on the Atmospherics EP (parts of which were incorporated onto the subsequent LP) and Hope and Glory. He’s certainly capable of writing and recording skillfully routine music; it just doesn’t make for very interesting listening: “War Baby” and a terrible version of Steely Dan’s “Rikki Don’t Lose That Number” were inexplicable hits. Robinson’s sincerity and commitment are obvious, but mediocre singing and bland arrangements keep Hope and Glory from being anything but ordinary.

Robinson has continued making records with no notable commercial (or critical) success ever since. Last Tango is a live album. [i]

ROCK AND HYDE

See Payolas.

ROCKATS

Live at the Ritz (Island) 1981

Make That Move EP (RCA) 1983

LEVI AND THE ROCKATS

At the Louisiana Hayride (Posh Boy) 1981

LEVI

The Fun Sessions EP (PVC) 1983

The Rockats, hybrid English/American rockabilly specialists, were formed by singer Levi Dexter, whose appreciation of ’50s American rock infused the band with a real traditionalist ethic. They made only one record together before splintering; bassist Smutty Smiff subsequently kept the Rockats’ name alive. Louisiana Hayride, recorded live in Shreveport, Louisiana in 1979, bristles with feeling but lacks something in recording quality, especially as regards the mix. And if there was an audience at that gig, no one bothered telling them to clap.

Live at the Ritz, cut in New York over a year later, is a much slicker affair—a premonition of the Stray Cats but without a magnetic personality like Brian Setzer. With Levi gone and a new lineup in place, the playing’s fine, the sound quality is great and the tunes all sound like Johnny Cash should be singing ’em. (One of the new members—guitarist Tim Scott—went on to a solo career and later formed the Havalinas.)

Make That Move, with a new guitarist and drummer in the quintet, attempts to effect a stylistic escape. Produced by Mike Thorne, one side isn’t rockabilly at all; keyboards are used to build an energetic but characterless soup. On the flip, the overbearing “Go Cat Wild” contains more drums than all of the Stray Cats’ records put together. Only the title song and “Never So Clever” recapture the band’s original sound with a glimmer of the old spirit.

Dexter, for his part, sticks to the straight and narrow on The Fun Sessions. Sharing production with Richard Gottehrer and employing a basic ’billy trio, he hiccups his way through five cool tracks exploding with understated energy. Not innovative by any means, but his earnest copies beat the Rockats’ boring originals any day. [i]

See also Havalinas, Tim Scott.

ROCKET FROM THE TOMBS

See Peter Laughner.

ROCKPILE

Seconds of Pleasure (Columbia) 1980 •

Rockpile, the top-rank rock’n’roll group Nick Lowe and Dave Edmunds formed in the late ’70s, played on solo records by both men and backed each on tours. A year before breaking up, the quartet—which also included drummer Terry Williams and guitarist Billy Bremner—had its sole moment in the vinyl spotlight, and came up with an album that is every bit as exhilarating as anything either Lowe or Edmunds has done on his own. Obvious influences on Seconds of Pleasure include the Everly Brothers (“Now and Always”) and Chuck Berry (his own “Oh What a Thrill”); the blues “A Knife and a Fork” and the medium-tempo “When I Write the Book” are rare respites. Besides everything else, the album has the extra bonus of guitarist Billy Bremner singing the rollickin’ “Heart” and Rockin’ Sidney’s “You Ain’t Nothin’ but Fine.” Throughout, the band delivers the hard-partying, good-time music we’ve come to expect from Lowe and Edmunds. Initial copies of the LP included a 7-inch single, Nick Lowe & Dave Edmunds Sing the Everly Brothers, with renditions of “Take a Message to Mary,” “When Will I Be Loved” and two more classics—all later appended to the CD. [si]

See also Billy Bremner, Dave Edmunds, Nick Lowe.

PAUL ROESSLER

See D.C.3.

HENRY ROLLINS

Hot Animal Machine (Texas Hotel) 1987 •

Big Ugly Mouth (Texas Hotel) 1987

Sweat Box (Texas Hotel) 1989

HENRIETTA COLLINS AND THE WIFEBEATING CHILDHATERS

Drive by Shooting EP (Texas Hotel) 1987 •

HENRY ROLLINS/GORE

Live (Hol. Eksakt) 1987

ROLLINS BAND

Life Time (Texas Hotel) 1988 •

Do It (Texas Hotel) 1988 •

Hard Volume (Texas Hotel) 1989 •

Turned On (1/4 Stick-Touch and Go) 1990 •

WARTIME

Fast Food for Thought EP (Chrysalis) 1990 •

Since the dissolution of Black Flag in 1986, singer/lyricist Henry Rollins has pursued a dual existence as a published poet (by the time Black Flag broke up, he was already a seasoned veteran of the spoken-word tour circuit) and leader of his own hardnosed band, producing powerful, driven rock as a platform for his ferocious vocals.

With cover art by Mark Mothersbaugh, Rollins' first solo effort, Hot Animal Machine (recorded in the UK in late '86) gets off to an explosive start with "Black and White" before sailing into a paranoia-tinged trio ("Followed Around," "Lost and Found," "There's a Man Outside") that keeps up the frenzied pace. The LP occasionally lapses into silliness ("A Man and a Woman," the bluesy, cliché-riddled "Crazy Lover"), but provides some neat covers (Suicide's "Ghost Rider" and the Velvet Underground's "Move Right In").

Recorded during the Hot Animal Machine sessions and inexplicably credited to Henrietta Collins and the Wifebeating Childhaters (band members are rechristened with female monikers; Henry Rollins gets guest billing), Drive by Shooting kicks off with the title track, a novelty number about Los Angeles gang warfare replete with surf/car song appropriations (guitar line courtesy of "Wipeout"). The EP also boasts a solid rendition of Wire's "Ex Lion Tamer" and a pretty funny (albeit tasteless) send-up of Queen's "We Will Rock You" called "I Have Come To Kill You." To prove his fallibility, Rollins includes two total throwaways: "Hey Henrietta" and "Men Are Pigs." (One CD combines the EP with Hot Animal Machine, adding a previously unreleased live track.)

The spoken-word Big Ugly Mouth was culled from various 1987 speaking engagements around the country. In an uncharacteristic display of humility and sensitivity, Rollins discourses on a variety of subjects, including social and racial injustice, child abuse and sexual harassment. In a more humorous vein, he tackles masturbation, birthdays and advertising—just for starters. Sweat Box is more poetry from the mouth of Rollins—three albums' worth.

Recorded at Toronto's El Mocambo club in May '87, Rollins shares the Live album with a side of performances by Dutch thrash-rock trio Gore. Testing out the newly formed Rollins Band—guitarist Chris Haskett of the previous lineup plus a rhythm section drawn, oddly enough, from ex-Black Flag bandmate Greg Ginn's Gone—Henry runs roughly through material from Hot Animal Machine and a preview of the as-yet-unrecorded "What Am I Doing Here?" While not the most effective setting, the tracks are strong and well-played.

Alienation is the unifying lyrical theme on Life Time, the first studio album by the still-running Rollins Band. "Burned Beyond Recognition," "What Am I Doing Here?" and "There's Nothing Like Finding Someone When You're Lonely to Make You Want to Be All Alone" all get the point across. (A typical lyric: "I hate the world that I think hates me/Punch holes in the wall you know that hurts me/I feel dark and cold and alone, it burns me/Wish someone would come and touch me.") Musically, it's Rollins' most adventurous project. Without compromising the band's sheer force, straightforward rock stylings give way to more experimental song structures, jazz-inflected bass lines and tricky time changes. (The CD adds four live tracks recorded in Belgium.)

While the live side (recorded later in '87 in Holland) of Do It is pretty similar in content and delivery (not sound: this is much clearer) to Rollins Band's side of Live, the album's three studio tracks (produced by Rollins' DC homeboy, Ian MacKaye) are killer. Starting with a powerful version of the Pink Fairies' classic urge to action "Do It," there are two other covers: "Move Right In" (incorporating "In-a-Gadda-Da-Vida") and Richard Berry's R&B-styled "Next Time," both benefiting from Rollins' dramatic vocals and Haskett's over-drive guitar.

Rollins is in an existential funk on the seven-song Hard Volume, announcing (in "What Have I Got") that "I've got a wantless need . . . I am a clenched fist/Looking for a wall to kiss" and discovering (in "Down and Away") that "I am the last place that I want to be." Oddly, the rest of the band seems unaffected by any such feelings of angst, and the music—a well-organized rock juggernaut—thunders along as if all were well in the world.

Documenting the group's 1989 European tour, Turned On catches a November show in Vienna, a lengthy set that includes material from Hot Animal Machine up through Hard Volume, including another version of "Do It." Rollins is his usual balls-to-the-wall self, and Haskett is in rare form, spewing out sizzling solos that carom around various '70s hard-rock styles.

Wartime is a vaguely political side project by Rollins and Rollins Band bassist Andrew Weiss. The latter produced and played the music (an overpowering grungeheap of percussion, distorted guitar, samples and blustery fuzz bass) over which Henry delivers his demands for freedom, peace and truth. Fast Food for Thought includes four originals and a cover of the Grateful Dead's "Franklin's Tower." [rj/l]

See also Black Flag, S.O.A.

ROMANTICS

The Romantics (Nemperor) 1980 •

National Breakout (Nemperor) 1980

Strictly Personal (Nemperor) 1981

In Heat (Nemperor) 1983 •

Rhythm Romance (Nemperor) 1985 •

What I Like About You (And Other Romantic Hits)

(Epic Associated) 1990 φ

ROMANTICS AND FRIENDS

Midwest Pop Explosion! (Quark) 1980

Once upon a time, Detroit's Romantics were the band the Knack always wanted to be, hammering out a few essential chords while the singer wailed out inconsequential lyrics about girls. They played fast, loose and tough but, unlike the Knack, weren't obnoxious. This is the kind of band that would have been happy jamming to "Louie, Louie" or "La Bamba" all night if they hadn't been able to devise their own alternatives.

The Romantics' 1980 debut and National Breakout capture that era beautifully. Silly red leather suits notwithstanding, The Romantics shows the boys at their most raucous, crashing through "What I Like About You" (their best-ever track, sung by drummer Jimmy Marinos) and other dance-floor pips. The optimistically titled second LP continues in the "Twist and Shout" vein, highlighted by "Tomboy" and "Stone Pony" (Besides tracks by Stiv Bators, Nikki & the Corvettes and the Singles, Midwest Pop Explosion! contains both sides of the Romantics' 1978 Bomp! single and two other pre-'80 efforts.)

Strictly Personal, the panicky response to disappointing sales, finds the Romantics switching from powerful pop to soulless arena-rock. All broad, exaggerated gestures and no charm. Sad. In Heat wiped away the tears, elevating the band into the Top 10 with the execrable "Talking in Your Sleep" and the far more likable "One in a Million." Having hit the heights, Marinos left the group; the others hung in to make Rhythm Romance, another likably dumb batch of pop songs culminating in a credibly rootsy version of "Poison Ivy."

The 1990 compilation brings together the quartet's two hits, the title track and seven additional album selections, paying special attention to In Heat. Adding a deeply weird commercial postscript to the Romantics' career, "What I Like About You" wound up being used in a Bud Light TV spot. Is that post-punk or what?

[jy/i]

ROMEO VOID

Its a Condition (415) 1981

Never Say Never (415-Columbia) 1982

Benefactor (415-Columbia) 1982

Instincts (415-Columbia) 1984

DEBORA IYALL

Strange Language (415-Columbia) 1986

Walloping big-beat riffs with snaky sax and darkly intelligent lyrics characterize this San Francisco area dance/think combo. Native American artist-and-poet-turned-vocalist Debora Iyall uses her smoky, conversational voice to wax reflective on love and lust in these modern times; consistent with the band's name, she sings not only of situations where love is absent, but also of when it should be absent.

Its a Condition introduced Romeo Void's unique blend of jazz, funk, rock and confrontational poetry in its formative stages, the music a bit tentative and unfocused, especially in contrast with Iyall's hard-edged lyrics. Never Say Never, a four-song EP co-produced by Ric Ocasek, gained the group significant airplay and sales, leading to the link between San Francisco independent 415 and the CBS megalith. It's consequently no surprise that a truncated version of "Never Say Never" opens up Benefactor; as it turns out, that song proved to be more of a stylistic mold than might be considered healthy.

The most fully realized record of the bunch, Instincts boasts David Kahne's rich, full-blooded production, top-notch playing and reprises of various stylistic avenues. "Just Too Easy" resembles "Never Say Never" and pairs Ben Bossi's ace sax work with Iyall's sardonic, spoken monologue; "A Girl in Trouble (Is a Temporary Thing)" touches a poppier, more melodic side; "Six Days and One" reverts to a spare, mainly rhythmic approach. Mixing strength with beauty, Romeo Void makes very special dance music for the mind.

A strange blend of unlikely people creating rather unsurprising music, Iyall's solo album was produced by Pat Irwin, once a Lydia Lunch collaborator in 8 Eyed Spy and later a Raybeat. The cast includes Irwin (clarinet, sax, guitar, synth), Richard Sohl (pianist in the original Patti Smith Group) and others; Ben Bossi (sax) and Aaron Smith (drums) of Romeo Void also participate. Iyall obviously takes her poetry seriously; unfortunately, Irwin (co-writer of six tunes here) leads the musicians through underwhelming, blandly faceless rock backing that pointedly lacks Romeo Void's atmospheric. [rnp/i]

SKID ROPER AND THE WHIRLIN SPURS

See Mojo Nixon and Skid Roper.

ROSA LUXEBURG

Puri Puri (Jap. School) 1986 •

II (Jap. Midi) 1986 •

Why this excitable Japanese art-rock dance quartet named itself after a historically significant German Marxist is a mystery, but it would seem from the group's first two albums that David Byrne is probably their philosopher of choice. The tightly strung but casually off-beat Puri Puri lays scratchy guitars and giddily enthusiastic vocals into jittery rhythms that alternately suggest Talking Heads, the Suburbs and early B-52's. Despite the Japanese lyrics, horn/percussion accents, tropical/Latin influences and the band's non-stop exuberance all help translate this diverse platter of fun into a universal language.

Rosa L. relaxes a little on the wonderful II, focusing all of its energies into ensuring that no two songs sound anything alike. The album leads off with a twisted ska number and then shifts into a raving R&B rocker that features a wall-climbing guitar solo. From there, anything goes: Sly Stone boom-laka-laka-lakas, garage rock, wailing harmonica, California surf-pop, an acoustic guitar tune that revs into a major workout, a choral song accompanied by electronic sound effects, etc. Wheee! If the words on II are half as inventively weird as the music, I'm dying to know what they mean. [i]

KRISTI ROSE AND THE MIDNIGHT WALKERS

Some People (Rounder) 1986 •

High-voltage country-western rock from New York: powerhouse singer Rose, backed by a loud trio that boasts ex-Television bassist Fred Smith, belts out twangy Nashville-styled originals and a couple of classics on this energetic debut. Rose's bracing voice takes after Wanda Jackson and is the most notable ingredient here; the Midnight Walkers wander between polite country backing and near-punk aggression. The Uptown Horns help out on a couple of tracks. [i]

MICHAEL ROSE

See Black Uhuru.

DAVID ROTER METHOD

Bambo (Unknown Tongue) 1987

Beauty of the Island (Unknown Tongue) 1989

A friend of—and occasional songwriting collaborator with—the Blue Öyster Cult and Del-Lords and other vaguely related New York-area outfits (erstwhile rock crit Richard Meltzer being the spiritual center of this family), David Roter brings an artless voice and the soul of a standup comedian to incisively funny moderate-rent records that alternate topical satire and personal complaints. After making a minor cult-single splash with 1979's "I Think I Slept with Jackie Kennedy Last Night," Roter cut two albums with skilled small-scale rock-pop accompaniment by assorted Cult-ists and Del-Lords, as well as musical associates of David Johansen.

Bambo has amusingly irreverent biographies of Sonny Liston, Mussolini and Joan Crawford (a song first recorded by the Cult), a wry love letter to an ex-wife and the titular epic in which forest creatures turn the tables and go ballistic against hunters. Beauty of the Island repeats "My Ex-Wife," "Sonny Liston" and "Adopt Me" (co-scribed by Meltzer), appending some clever current-events reports on the Big Apple ("New York, New York," "Beauty of the Island"). [i]

See also Del-Lords.

ROTTERS

Presumed Dead—In Japan (Baka) 1989

Blindly idolizing the Sex Pistols et al., Santa Barbara's Rotters knowingly baited the censors in 1978 with their first 45, "Sit on My Face Stevie Nix" b/w "Amputee," which garnered considerable press when it was instantly banned from LA record stores and radio. One of the most slavishly imitative tributes to pure '77 UK punk ever recorded in America, the record features faux-Brit vocalist Nigel Nitro (Mike Rogers) singing "Sit on my fiiicee"/"I dowanna be no amputeeyuh." The Rotters broke up in 1980 but got back together a few years later; 1984 compilation tracks and an unreleased EP of the time evinced no softening of subject matter ("I wanna fuck a new wave slut"/"My penis hurts"). The new lineup was no more nor less contemporaneously punk than the last, although guitarist Phester Swollen (Tom Chartier) had obviously learned a trick or nine in the interim, exploding forth with manic fills and electrocution leads betwixt the music's rote hardcorisms.

Absent for another five years, the newest Rotters resurfaced, bearing a debut LP that—a full decade after the first single—includes numerous songs from the band's beginnings. Recorded live-to-4-track in Japan (where the band had reassembled with a local drummer), Presumed Dead is, oddly, even more garagey and sloppy than the early stuff, showcasing a band as carelessly noisy and artlessly annoyed as any in the original (new) wave, elevated by guitar playing so rampant and excessive as to virtually reinvent heavy metal. A classic. [ab]

MIKEL ROUSE

See Tirez Tirez, Tuxedomoon.

KEVIN ROWLAND

See Dexy's Midnight Runners.

ROXY MUSIC

Roxy Music (Reprise) 1972 (Atco) 1977 (EG-Reprise) 1989 •

For Your Pleasure ... (Warner Bros.) 1973 (Atco) 1977 (EG-Reprise) 1989 •

Stranded (Atco) 1973 (EG-Reprise) 1989 •

Country Life (Atco) 1974 (EG-Reprise) 1989 •

Siren (Atco) 1975 (EG-Reprise) 1989 •

Viva! (Atco) 1976 (EG-Reprise) 1989 •

Greatest Hits (Atco) 1977 •

Manifesto (Atco) 1979 (EG-Reprise) 1989 •

Flesh + Blood (Atco) 1980 (EG-Reprise) 1989 •

The First Seven Albums (nr/EG-Polydor) 1981

Avalon (Warner Bros.) 1982 •

The High Road EP (Warner Bros.) 1983

The Atlantic Years 1973–1980 (Atco) 1983 •

The Early Years (nr/EG) 1989 •

The Later Years (nr/EG) 1989 •

Heart Still Beating (EG-Reprise) 1990 •

ROXY MUSIC/BRYAN FERRY

Street Life: 20 Greatest Hits (nr/EG) 1986 (EG-Reprise) 1989 •

The Ultimate Collection (nr/EG-Virgin) 1988 •

ANDY MACKAY

In Search of Eddie Riff (nr/Island) 1974

Resolving Contradictions (nr/Bronze) 1978

Arguably the most influential rock group of the '70s, Roxy Music's impact has only grown in the years since the punk return-to-the-basics ethos gave way to a growing interest in high style, fashion and musical sophistication. The "new romantic" movement and the synth fops would have had no historical traditions to follow were it not for the pioneering efforts of Bryan Ferry, Brian Eno, Phil Manzanera, Andy Mackay, Paul Thompson and their various cohorts. Even though Roxy Music grew pale and timid in its later years, the recorded work (not to mention the countless side projects in which the various members have participated) stands as a seminal wellspring of nonconformity and successful art-pop experimentation.

With the release of their first LP (produced by King Crimson lyricist Pete Sinfield after the departure of original Roxy guitarist Davy O'List, formerly of the Nice), the fledgling sextet revolutionized rock—trashing concepts of melodic conservatism, ignoring the prevalence of blues-based and otherwise derivative idioms and denying the need for technical virtuosity, either vocally or instrumentally. The flamboyantly bedecked poseurs pre-saged such low couture iconoclasts as the New York Dolls and all the glamsters who followed; the music mixed all sorts of elements into a newly filtered original sound that set the stylish pace. The tracks—Ferry-penned fantasies like “Re-make/Re-model,” “2 H.B.,” “If There Is Something” and the group’s monumental debut, “Virginia Plain” (a 45 not on the original album, but added to later editions)—are at once amateurish and highly developed, brilliant blunders that took some acclimation to fully appreciate. As much as the music, the album’s kitsch graphics were also widely imitated.

For Your Pleasure, another enduring classic (with the second of Roxy’s many bassists), refines and magnifies Roxy’s style with equally amazing material: “Do the Strand,” “Editions of You” (the album’s punchy rock single), “In Every Dream Home a Heartache” and the obsessive nine-minutes-plus “Bogus Man.”

Brian Eno departed after the second album, and ex-Curved Air violinist/keyboardist Eddie Jobson (a session man on Ferry’s solo debut earlier that same year) joined, either precipitating or merely participating in the successful stylistic downshift of Stranded. Without Eno’s “treatments,” the third album (produced by Chris Thomas) has more subtle sound, favoring piano and restrained, stately songs such as the haunting “A Song for Europe” (one of two songs co-written by Manzanera), “Just Like You,” “Psalm” and the second segment of “Mother of Pearl.” Demonstrating the group’s continuing ability to rock, “Serenade” and “Amazona” do it with dignity, while only the beginning of “Mother of Pearl” and the whirlingly chaotic “Street Life” dances around the manic fringe.

Roxy’s best LP, Country Life, ran into trouble over its revealing cover photo—some American copies were shrink-wrapped in opaque green plastic; later the artwork was changed to remove the bra’n’panties-clad models and leave only the foliage. Regardless, the ten tracks—a smooth integration of the band’s divergent stylistic designs—are exemplary and of consistent strength, making it a virtual greatest-hits album of new material. Highlights: “All I Want Is You,” “Out of the Blue,” “The Thrill of It All,” “A Really Good Time,” “Three and Nine,” “Prairie Rose.”

Reuniting with Chris Thomas, Roxy made the disappointingly dull Siren (with Jerry Hall crawling on the cover), closing the studio book on their first era. The record contains some great tracks (“Love Is the Drug,” “Both Ends Burning,” “Sentimental Fool”), but an overabundance of forgettable numbers substantially diminishes its value. Roxy then went on sabbatical, with only the one-disc live document (the Eno-free Viva!, recorded in ’73, ’74 and ’75 with three different bassists and a fine selection of songs given decisive, powerful performances) and the absolutely essential Greatest Hits collection issued during the two-year gap.

In 1978, Ferry, Manzanera and Mackay reactivated Roxy Music, making three more group albums with various temporary sidemen. But it was never the same. Cooling down from where Siren left off, Roxy Music had become—whether through maturation, skill or fatigue—a pale, genteel imitation of its old self. Although there are a few brilliant (at least presentable) tracks on each album, the lack of conviction and adventurous spirit makes all three less than compelling for fans of the group’s early work. Fortunately, these records neither embarrass nor contradict the Roxy legacy; this period (subsequently proving to be the group’s last and, in America at least, most successful) is separate and, though not equal, at least estimable.

The self-produced Manifesto has “Dance Away,” “Still Falls the Rain” and “Angel Eyes” to recommend it, but is still easy to live without. The inferior Flesh + Blood (Roxy’s first album without Paul Thompson, who resurfaced years later in, of all places, Concrete Blonde) is more like a Ferry solo record, with session men playing humorless covers of “In the Midnight Hour” and “Eight Miles High.” Even the best originals are unoriginal and fainthearted: the Cars-ish (now there’s irony for you) “Over You,” the schmaltzy (but catchy) “Oh Yeah” and the funky “Same Old Scene.”

Regaining its self-esteem if not its power, Roxy made Avalon more like Manifesto, a careful blend of air and beat that amounts to a sparkling if meaningless dance record for would-be sophisticates. Unassailably well made and even occasionally engaging, the worst that can be said of songs like “More Than This,” “The Space Between,” “Avalon,” “Take a Chance with Me” and “The Main Thing” is that they’re too quiet and that the lyrics lack bite. Those who came upon Roxy late probably reckon it’s their best album.

An otherwise needless compilation, The Atlantic Years, skims the cream from Manifesto and Flesh + Blood onto one disc, adding two earlier cuts (also on Greatest Hits).

In 1981, all of Roxy Music’s studio albums to that point—seven in all—were repackaged as a boxed set; add in Avalon, and you’ve got the works. The Early Years and The Later Years also box six of the original albums: the first three in one, and the last three in the other. (What would be wrong with a complete reissue package for once?) The two-record Street Life and the overlapping single-disc Ultimate Collection each mix tracks from the group and Ferry’s solo career.

The High Road, a 12-inch ostensibly recorded live in Glasgow, offers an odd four-song program and a running time of nearly half an hour, as a ten-person lineup walks through Neil Young’s “Like a Hurricane,” John Lennon’s “Jealous Guy” and two Ferry tunes. The playing is, of course, great and the sound magnificent—only the band’s crucial personality is absent. Exactly the same can be said of Heart Still Beating, recorded in France at a massive open-air concert in mid-1982. (In fact, given the amazing similarity of the EP’s four songs to their performances on the album, it seems very likely that The High Road actually hails from the French date.) Notwithstanding Manzanera’s searing work (especially on “Out of the Blue” and his own “Impossible Guitar” instrumental) and Ferry’s suave showboating, this one is mostly for Avalon fans.

Roxy Music ceased to exist after 1983. Ferry resumed his solo work with a new album in mid-’85; Manzanera and Mackay formed a new trio called the Explorers and have worked on numerous other projects.

As big a long-term disappointment as Ferry’s and Manzanera’s extra-Roxy careers have been, Andy Mackay’s individual efforts reached the blandness plateau way ahead of the pack. His mildly diverting first showcase, In Search of Eddie Riff is a mostly instrumental outing enlivened only by a sweaty saxual interpretation of Richard Wagner's "Ride of the Valkyries" and several more-traditional covers. Otherwise, it's merely a display of his technical abilities.

His next big project was to write and produce two albums' worth of pop music for Rock Follies, a neat '70s British TV show about a female singing trio. They're neat, but clearly work for hire. By the time of the Asian-oriented Resolving Contradictions, Mackay had banished any trace of wit: the record is a snooze. However, on a literary front, Mackay wrote a useful 1981 text (Electronic Music) on the development of electronic music. [1]

See also Concrete Blonde, Brian Eno, Explorers, Bryan Ferry, Phil Manzanera, Yukihiko Takahashi.

ROYAL COURT OF CHINA

Off the Beaf'n Path (Desperation) 1986

The Royal Court of China (A&M) 1987 •

Geared & Primed (A&M) 1989 •

SHAKERS

Living in the Shadow of a Spirit EP (Carlyle) 1988

Nashville's Royal Court of China (formerly known as the Enemy) play it hot and sloppy on their independent-label debut, a vivacious seven-song mini-album that fills out Joe Blanton's songs with swirls of wild-eyed guitar to counterbalance his dramatic singing. The quartet's ripping cover of the Yardbirds' "Heart Full of Soul" indicates one influence on their garage-rocking Southeastern pop, but it's only one of several. A fine informal introduction to a promising band with a cool sound.

As if the group's meaningless name weren't misleading enough, the artwork on their 1987 album furthers the stylistic obfuscation. The Royal Court of China shows impressive instrumental and studio facility, but cuts back on the youthful energy a tad too much. While there's no shortage of melodies or guitars, some of the songs fade towards repetitive anonymity, veering into an undistinguished Byrds-country sound. The Royal Court may have escaped the bar band wilderness for a brighter, smoother future, but they need to find something more compelling to replace the immediacy they've lost.

The blustery hard rock on the Vic Maile-produced Geared & Primed wasn't quite what I had in mind. With a new guitar player and bassist, the RCC became a fairly convincing dirtbag band, but Blanton's hoarse shout doesn't cut the mustard and the songs are a hair too complex to suit such rugged treatment.

Rather than follow the Royal Court down the Marshall stack route, the two defectors got themselves a female vocalist, formed the folk Shakers and released a four-song 12-inch, Living in the Shadow of a Spirit, on a local Nashville label. [1]

ROYAL CRESCENT MOB

Land of Sugar EP (No Other) 1986

Omeria (Moving Target-Celluloid) 1987 •

Something New, Old and Borrowed (Moving Target-Celluloid) 1988 •

Spin the World (Sire) 1989 •

Midnight Rose's (Sire-Warner Bros.) 1991 •

This quartet from Columbus, Ohio takes punk-funk to its logical extreme, combining a strongarm/goodfoot rhythm section with a guitarist (by the name of B) weaned on both James Brown and the Stooges, and a passionate harmonica-blowing singer (David Ellison). The results are pretty excellent: the casual vamps display an irreverent sense of humor and rock like crazy, drawing on two lifetimes of musical tradition for a blast of unstereotyped dance noise. The poorly recorded but enthusiastic six-song Land of Sugar (with an early drummer) contains both the original version of RCM's quintessential original ("Get on the Bus," a goofy lyrical sensibility applied to a sloppy funk workout) and a characteristic disco cover (the Ohio Players' "Love Rollercoaster")

Omeria boasts a brilliant rendition of "Get on the Bus," covers of the OPs ("Fire") and James Brown ("Payback") and a bunch of ass-shaking originals that either rock tight or fall apart with equal panache.

Something New, Old and Borrowed (aka S.N.O.B.) reprises Land of Sugar in its entirety, adding five ostensibly live performances (including Led Zep's "Immigrant Song" and a straight rocker called "Marv Diamond") and two new studio recordings ("Happy at Home" is a classic).

Reaching the majors, the Mob tightened its instrumental wig and reduced funk to a smaller component of its personality, making Spin the World good and credible, but only as far as it goes. Co-produced with ferociously hot sound by Richard Gottehrer, the album has unprecedented variety, from mighty hip-hop ("Big Show") to thrusting dance power (the zany "Silver Street") to '60sish rock'n'roll ("Stock Car Race") to annoying jazzy doodles ("Corporation Enema"). All in all, the Mob survives the big-league transition adequately (the lyrics are especially cool) but the group could have made more of the opportunity. In a strange bit of in-state cultural poaching, "5 More Minutes" borrows its hook from Jo Jo Gunne's "60 Minutes to Go."

While Midnight Rose's still shows some versatility in the stylistic bullpen, the album downplays the funk even further and aims for a more integrated rock-with-a-beat sound, concentrating the Mob's efforts on song-writing more than showboating. The results are uneven, although never less than entertaining; the record is good fun, if not quite an intense treat. Whether Ellison is telling a sorry story of justice miscarried ("Big Mistake"), painting a sympathetic portrait of yuppiedom ("Pretty Good Life") or ruminating on a damaged proboscis ("Drunkard's Nose"), Mr. B (as he's billed here) colors the songs in with cogent flashes of aptly aimed guitar as the rhythm section sets the rhythmic clock in motion. [1]

ROYAL MACADAMIANS

Experiments in Terror (Island) 1990 •

DAVITT SIGERSON

Falling in Love Again (ZE-Island) 1984

Prior to becoming the president of Polydor Records in 1991, music critic/record producer Davitt Sigerson had an occasional career as a songwriter and singer. Six years after making a lyrically clever but musically bland solo album scorched with his unpleasantly raspy vocals, Sigerson formed a quartet with keyboardist Bob Thiele Jr. (a sideman on Falling in Love Again) and created an arty and idiosyncratic mixture of jazz-and-funk-inflected tunes given a surrealist spin. Experiments in Terror is a descriptive mind-movie soundtrack with cryptic vocal passages in place of character dialogue. The electronic music and disembodied texts are reminiscent of Will Powers, but the Macadamians stimulate a wider variety of moods, using source material as far-ranging as George Jackson's Soledad Brother prison memoir. A concentration camp and the twisted, oppressive minds that run it—clinically described in the lyrics of "Arbeit Macht Frei"—are echoed in the pounding drums, crunching guitar and distorted solos. Intriguing and provocative. [i/rs]

RUBBER RODEO

Rubber Rodeo EP (Eat) 1982

Scenic Views (Mercury) 1984 •

Heartbreak Highway (Mercury) 1986

Armed with the slogan "It don't mean a thang if it ain't got that twang" inscribed in the vinyl, the six-song Rubber Rodeo 12-inch helped announce/advance the development of country-punk. The band hailed from Rhode Island, but that didn't stop it from dressing in Nashville finery and forging a fun and different mix with synthesizer, fiddle, organ and pedal steel guitar. While the originals (especially "How the West Was Won") are bouncily tuneful and heartfelt, a cover version of Dolly Parton's "Jolene" comes off a bit like Heart without the arena pomp.

Following a three-song 12-inch most notable for its inclusion of the theme from "The Good, the Bad and the Ugly," Rubber Rodeo misplaced its personality and emerged on Scenic Views playing disappointingly plain dance-rock, the mild pedal steel coloration notwithstanding. Only the vocals—by Trish Milliken and Bob Holmes, sometimes together—serve to distinguish the group at all. "The Hardest Thing," which most recalls the band's early Great Plains ambience, is the LP's strongest song.

Heartbreak Highway (produced by Ken Scott) is much better, but still leaves one wishing the band's records were more colorful and gimmicky. Rubber Rodeo's urban cowpoke image remains stronger than its musical personality here, although some of the songs (the title track, "Maybe Next Year," a radical cover of Fred Neil's grotesquely sappy "Everybody's Talkin'" and an instrumental called "The Civil War") have a redeemingly jaunty air of good-humored kitsch. [i]

RUDIMENTARY PENI

Rudimentary Peni EP (nr/Outer Himalayan) 1981

Farce EP (nr/Crass) 1982

Death Church (nr/Corpus Christi) 1983

The EPs of RP (nr/Corpus Christi) c. 1987

Cacophony (nr/Outer Himalayan) 1988

This London hardcore trio from the Crass family always stood apart from the generic anarchist legions, more like a UK counterpart to the Minutemen. The eponymous 7-inch EP is rough going, as the band is tight but tuneless; Nick Blinko's screeching vocals obscure heartfelt lyrics skewering complacency. A bit of rhythmic variety suggested promise, however, and the second EP benefits from better production, fascinating sleeve artwork and some mini-masterworks of alienated vitriol. Both were later paired and reissued as The EPs of RP.

Things come together on Death Church, with venomous lyrics ripping through loud and clear (as they should, given titles like "Vampire State Building" and "Alice Crucifies the Paedophiles"). While the songs are not exactly hook-laden, this is quite melodic for the genre. Tempos run from moderate metal through Pistolian thrash to hyperdrive blur. An intelligent, exciting and highly recommended album.

Bassist Grant Brand's long but successful battle with cancer meant hibernation for Peni during the mid-'80s. By the end of the decade, however, the trio was back with a radical piece of work. Cacophony features a staggering 54 songs (the first album had a mere 20) in about 45 minutes, many only a few seconds long. The trend towards melodicism continues (brief fragments like "The Old Man Is Not So Terribly Misanthropic" are quite catchy), though they remain as cagey, intense and weird as ever. The lyrics abandon politics, dwelling almost wholly on the life, death and work of horror writer H.P. Lovecraft. Peni spin surreal rants like "Nightgaunts" in a sort of obsessive tribute, interspersed with rugose instrumentals such as "Sunset for the Lords of Venus." With Blinko's vocals frequently Darth Vaderized by a harmonizer, the album's sensibility comes close to Monty Python's black humor—"New England Tombstone Inscriptions" runs off a morbid litany of same, while "A Great Gnashing of Teeth" is exactly that. Cacophony is one of the strangest albums ever made—a Trout Mask Replica for the hardcore age—but the rewards of close attention are ample. [dgs/gef]

CLINT RUIN

See Foetus Inc.

RUMOUR

Max (Mercury) 1977

Frogs Sprouts Clogs and Krauts (Arista) 1979

Purity of Essence (Hannibal) 1980

It's tempting to compare the Rumour's relationship with Graham Parker to the Band's with Bob Dylan. Highly respected but unsuccessful bar band (Brinsley Schwarz and Ducks Deluxe versus the Hawks) hooks up with talented singer/songwriter (Parker versus Dylan) to create some of the decade's best music ('70s versus '60s). Of course Parker is not Dylan, and Max, the Rumour's first LP on their own, is not Big Pink, although they would obviously have loved it to be. Often enough, the Rumour (Brinsley Schwarz, Bob Andrews, Martin Belmont, Andrew Bodnar, Steve Goulding) captures the sound of the Band, minus Robertson's lyrical profundity. What's really strange is that the Rumour is far more natural and interesting as a minor-league Band (on great tracks like "Hard Enough to Show," Nick Lowe's "Mess with Love" and a sublime Band-like arrangement of Duke Ellington's standard "Do Nothing

'Till You Hear from Me'') than when attempting to forge their own identity on the subsequent albums. Max may not be terribly original but it is utterly enjoyable.

Frogs, on the other hand, seems to be an attempt to recast the Rumour in a vein that conforms more with Stiff's offbeat image. As a clever pop-oriented band, the Rumour succeeds mainly in sounding stiff, with only a couple of songs ("Emotional Traffic," "All Fall Down") standing out from other failed experiments.

Purity of Essence succeeds in recapturing some of the looseness of Max. The band had been reduced to a quartet with the departure of Bob Andrews, whose voice—the group's best—and keyboards are missed. Even so, the album has its moments, although they mostly come on non-original material. While lacking a real frontman and strong material of its own, the Rumour is talented enough to make enjoyable (if not hit) records. [ds]

See also Graham Parker.

RUNAWAYS

The Runaways (Mercury) 1976
Queens of Noise (Mercury) 1977
Live in Japan (nr/Mercury) 1977
Waitin' for the Night (Mercury) 1977
And Now . . . the Runaways (nr/Cherry Red) 1979
Flaming Schoolgirls (nr/Cherry Red) 1980
Little Lost Girls (Rhino) 1981
The Best of the Runaways (Mercury) 1982 •
I Love Playing with Fire (nr/Laker-Cherry Red) 1982

Opinion is still divided on the Runaways' place in the musical universe. To many, they were the first all-girl (instrument-playing) rock band to matter, spiritual godmothers to the Go-Go's and Bangles, and seminal punk rockers to boot. Others see them as nothing more than a pre-packaged peepshow whose heavy metal-cum-glitter approach was dated from the very start.

Here are the facts: LA teenagers Joan Jett (whose love of T. Rex and Suzi Quatro inspired her to learn guitar) and drummer Sandy West decided to form a band with encouragement (and eventual management) from Kim Fowley. The band that recorded The Runaways was a combination of raw garage-band playing and brassy, high-school-bad-girl sexuality typified by their unofficial anthem, "Cherry Bomb."

By the time Queens of Noise (a decided improvement over the debut) was released, trouble was fomenting; although Cherie Currie was the "official" lead singer, Jett wound up taking the microphone on six of the ten songs. Things came to a head when, after a tour of Japan (documented on the Live in Japan album), Currie and bassist Jackie Fox quit the band. Vicki Blue was hired as a new bassist, and Jett took over the reins for good.

Except in Japan, the Runaways never made any real commercial inroads. Many saw them as inept puppets—merely another Fowley hype—and refused to take the music seriously. Waitin' for the Night did nothing to alter that. The album came out just as modern-day punk was emerging, and Jett (if not the rest of the band) readily latched onto the scene to the extent that Steve Jones of the Sex Pistols contributed one song ("Black Leather") to And Now . . . The Runaways. But West and guitarist Lita Ford wanted to go in a more heavy metal direction, and the album would prove to be their last.

Posthumous notes: Flaming Schoolgirls is a standard odds and ends compilation of live tracks and studio outtakes, while Little Lost Girls is actually And Now . . . The Runaways re-released as a picture disc. The Best of the Runaways and I Love Playing with Fire are further recaps of various material. As for the band members, Lita Ford has become a huge metal star under her own name; Laurie McAllister (who held down the bass spot in the band's waning months) ended up in another all-girl Fowley project, the Orchids. After several film roles and failed attempts at making it both as a solo act and with her sister Marie, Currie married Toto guitarist Steve Lukather. And we all know where Joan Jett's love of rock'n'roll got her. [rnp]

RUN-DMC

Run-DMC (Profile) 1984 •
King of Rock (Profile) 1985 •
Raising Hell (Profile) 1986 •
Tougher Than Leather (Profile) 1988 •
Back from Hell (Profile) 1990 •

AFROS

Kickin' Afrolicious (JMJ-RAL-Columbia) 1990 •

Besides all its other accomplishments, this trio from Hollis, Queens was the first to succeed in doing what no other black artist (with the exception of Grandmaster Flash, briefly) had done before: make white people listen to rap in large numbers. After building a core hip-hop audience via several smart and witty singles ("Sucker M.C.'s" and "It's Like That"), Run-DMC made "Rock Box" (included on the first album), a bold step that lifted them into a league all their own. Melding a simple bass riff to the thunderous rhythm tracks that provided the entire accompaniment for their early raps, the song's coup de grâce is blazing rock guitar, played by Eddie Martinez (for a while an adjunct member of Blondie). The perfect combination—verbal acuity and theatrical drama matched by an inexorable pounding beat and the power of electric guitar—made the single huge, setting the stage for a whole meeting of the races that has helped chip away the barriers that kept "black music" and "white music" segregated all through the '70s.

Run-DMC contains all the early hits and is an utterly essential record. Even though the repetitious rhythms get tiring if you're not in the dancing mood, the funny, perceptive interwoven raps remain captivating centers of attention. King of Rock takes some chances—like a reggae/rap blend long before such things were common—while repeating the functional formula of "Rock Box" on the title track, which simply inverts the riff and recasts the rap. Without peer in pop hip-hop, Run (Joseph Simmons), DMC (Darryl McDaniels) and DJ/musician (and later rapper) Jam Master Jay (Jason Mizell) demonstrated enormous potential, and this was only the beginning.

Co-producers Russell Simmons and Rick Rubin add characteristic rock-funk touches to Raising Hell—like the "My Sharona" riff in the Beastie Boyish "It's Tricky" and the chart-topping hybrid cover of Aerosmith's rap-like "Walk This Way" (with Steve Tyler and Joe Perry contributing). On the downside, most of the rhymes are nothing special, making the commendable racial consciousness of "Proud to Be Black" stand in strong contrast to the litany of typical "I'm Run/He's DMC" business, the commercial culturalisms contained in "My Adidas" and the predictable words of "Dumb Girl." Overly spartan backing—simple beats (some of which actually sound man-made) and Jay's percussive turntable action—hurt some of the tracks (especially since the group has proven itself equal to more active and complex arrangements). More familiar than inherently exciting, Raising Hell could still use some more heat. Regardless, the record sold millions, elevating Run-DMC (alongside L.L. Cool J and the Beastie Boys) to the top echelons of the pop world.

Preceding (if scantily related to) the film for which it's named, Tougher Than Leather is much better, a self-assured three-dimensional superstar record with a dense, rock-influenced sound that's become as distinguishable as the crew's trademark verbal jousting. Sampling classic records and building original songs around them, the trio grabs the Monkees' "Mary, Mary" and turns it into a hysterical putdown, while the Temptations' "Papa Was a Rollin' Stone" becomes "Papa Crazy," the same paternal disenchantment given a modern chop job. (Bites of James Brown, Malcolm X, Led Zep—even old Run-DMC—crop up as well.) At the record's strangest, Run, DMC and Jay (affecting snooty accents) rap over a mock-Dixieland band. Throughout, the witty writing, deft delivery and riotously crowded production make Tougher Than Leather a progressive and peerless statement of the art that neither excludes nor panders to any audience segment.

Facing potential obsolescence—due to rap's massive popularity, the platinum proliferation of soft-headed rappers unworthy of lacing the trio's Adidas and the raised ante of sex and language—the once-lighthearted Run-DMC aggressively (a little too aggressively) reinvented itself as a serious organization on Back from Hell, a tough, rugged album that holds its own against the crew's onetime disciples. With a new emphasis on solo vocal performances (by all three) and few of the band's familiar sonic traits, the largely self-produced record bears little resemblance to Run-DMC's prior works, but the up-to-date tracks are no less dynamic or effective for it. With power and intelligence (not to mention plenty of swear words), the deadly "Pause," "Word Is Born," "Back from Hell," "The Ave." and "Kick the Frama Lama Lama" all speak bluntly and sharply to the black community about social problems. For contrast, the sexy "Bob Your Head," "Party Time" and D's silly reggae-rhythm fragment "P Upon a Tree" keep things from getting too heavy.

While raising his creative profile within Run-DMC, Jason Mizell has also begun doing side projects on his own JMJ label. The Afros' album, which he co-wrote, co-produced and does a bit of vocalizing on, is a frivolous, overlong rap/soul romp (partly delivered in a theatrical pimp whine) through a jokey world of women and hairdos—or, in the record's vernacular, "hoes and fros." Thin humor doesn't excuse the exaggerated misogyny; the promising idea of lampooning '70s culture in rap evaporates early on, and Kickin' Afrolicious

(which occasionally veers self-consciously towards Digital Underground before taking an incongruous Public Enemy-style turn on "Federal Offense") winds up annoying or dull more often than funny. [i]

RUN WESTY RUN

Hardly Not Even (SST) 1988 •

Run Westy Run (SST) 1988 •

Green Cat Island (Twin/Tone) 1990 •

Stylistically dissimilar to all of Minneapolis' other post-punk guitar bands, Run Westy Run restlessly ambles down its own path, casually playing around the edges of noisy blues, dissonant rock, chunky funk and twisted country. Despite frequent displays of substantial imagination, it took the energetic quintet a while to distill a personality from those bright ideas.

Produced by Pete Buck and Grant Hart (with no audible debt to either R.E.M. or Hüsker Dü), Hardly Not Even is mostly a showcase for Kirk Johnson's literate lyrics and dramatic vocals, plus the band's complementary guitarists. Repeatedly shifting rhythmic and loudness gears, the songs are gutsy but tuneless, with too many one-chord vamps blunting the better efforts.

The first half of the self-produced Run Westy Run shows another side of the Westies: clearer, lighter-weight sound and melodic, folk-inflected songs, played in a warm-rush haze with wozy gang vocals. On the muddy flipside, the group indulges a fondness for early-'70s slop-rock, riffing up a Stookey storm of thick guitar drive and even making up their own Led Zep song ("Gee").

With time out for a pair of folksy lullabies ("Kiss the Night," "So Long") and a couple of other exceptions, the excellent Green Cat Island (co-produced by Buck again) organizes memorable rock tunes around the band's dynamic gods-of-thunder citations. Guitarists Terry Fisher (billed here as Terrance James) and Kyle (Jay) Johnson repeatedly whip off exciting vintage tributes to Aerosmith, the Stones and others, driving taut modern songs that finally get to the core of Run Westy Run's talents. [i]

PAT RUTHENSMEAR

Pat RuthenSmear (SST) 1988

DEATH FOLK

Deathfolk (New Alliance) 1990

In a strange case of artistic abdication, ex-Germers (and occasional Tater Tot) guitarist Pat RuthenSmear (in punk's heyday, his surname was simply Smear) composed virtually all the music and sings (with a pronounced lisp and almost no melodic sense) lead on his eclectic solo album—but only co-wrote two lyrics, one of them retrieved from his late bandmate, Darby Crash. Working with DC3 keyboardist Paul Roesler, a drummer and a few guests, RuthenSmear takes an unpredictable and frequently enjoyable weird romp (showcasing a variety of accomplished guitar styles) through Cheap Trick rock-pop, swinging nightclub jazz, Barrett-like acoustic songs, even psychedelic dance-rock.

RuthenSmear and guitarist Gary Jacoby of Celebrity Skin go the Chad & Jeremy acoustic route on the casual and enthusiastic Deathfolk, jointly singing and strumming an amusing mixture of adolescent humor (“Monkey Brains,” “Rad Man”), rude sex (“Yellow 1,” “Typical Girl”) and the only appropriate Queen song (“’39”). The last three numbers (loud punk, a jokey pirate rendition of Jacques Brel’s “Amsterdam” and a bass’n’drums workout with haunted house vocals) ruin the mood, but the rest of the record is good for a tuneful laugh or two. [i]

See also 45 Grave, Germs.

PAUL RUTHERFORD

See Frankie Goes to Hollywood.

RUTS

The Crack (Virgin Int'l) 1979 (nr/Virgin) 1988 (Blue Plate) 1991 •

Grin & Bear It (nr/Virgin) 1980

The Peel Sessions EP (nr/Strange Fruit) 1986

The Ruts Live (nr/Dojo) 1987

Live and Loud!! (nr/Link) 1987

You Gotta Get Out of It (nr/Virgin) 1987 •

The Peel Sessions Album (nr/Strange Fruit) 1990 •

RUTS D.C.

Animal Now (nr/Virgin) 1981

Rhythm Collision (nr/Bohemian) 1982

RUTS DC AND THE MAD

PROFESSOR

Rhythm Collision Dub Vol. 1 [tape] (ROIR) 1987

On The Crack, the Ruts meld the Pistols' instrumental attack with leader Malcolm Owen's Strummeresque bellow; while less inspired than either of those bands, the Ruts started out with far more finesse (including nimble bass). True to their early association with reggae collective Misty in Roots (sponsor of their first 45), the Ruts often incorporated reggae riffs—adeptly, not heavy-handedly and without missing a single roughshod 4/4 stride. Simple, straightforward political lyrics are heartfelt but not strident.

The late-'80 Grin & Bear It compilation is odds-'n'sods and sounds it, but the LP does contain an assortment of minor gems (including their pre-Virgin debut 45, live sides, etc.), highlighted by brilliant career-high-point single “Staring at the Rude Boys.” In short, a fitting tribute (as intended) to Owen, dead of an OD four months previously.

As Ruts D.C. (for da capo) the remaining three made saxist/keyboardist Gary Barnacle a full member. On Animal Now, personal themes of self-doubt and angst (“Despondency,” anyone?) get equal airing with the usual attacks on hypocrisy and social manipulation. It's often gripping, but undercut by a tendency to infuse intrusive jazz-funk touches.

Minus Barnacle (who departed for session work and Leisure Process), the trio—along with the Mad Professor, a British reggae producer—cut Rhythm Collision, an LP of funk-inflected reggae in ready-made dub form, akin in concept to Dennis Bovell's I Wah Dub. It's a sharp, sometimes powerful, sometimes catchy piece of work, with saxist Dave Winthrop (ex-Secret Affair) and one Mitt (harmonica) supplying additional shades to the dark-hued mood. In 1987, the long-deleted record was reissued on cassette, with a credit that played up the reggae connection, as Rhythm Collision Dub Vol. 1.

Although Ruts D.C. stopped working in 1983, archival releases keep on appearing. Joy Division and the Ruts were BBC DJ John Peel's two favorite bands, so it's fitting they've both been remembered in the Peel Sessions EP series. The Ruts' artifact from May 1979 unfortunately doesn't debut any long-lost material, and the versions sound too similar to the tracks on The Crack to get worked up about it, but it nevertheless documents a great band.

The Ruts Live and Live and Loud!!, on the other hand, fail to document anything. Though both are legal releases, they sound like bootlegs; the muddy audio falls far short of capturing what was an explosive live band. In particular, Live and Loud gets the concert right, but used the wrong tape: the live track recorded at the Marquee on the UK edition of The Crack sounds great, but the same concert, as presented here, is of dodgy quality. Until a true live artifact can be excavated and released, these two are for scholars only.

While filled with inarguably great music, the CD-only You Gotta Get Out of It, is one screwed-up package. The material (all of The Crack plus half of Grin and Bear It) is haphazardly intermingled, “West One” (the band's epic swan song) is twice listed as “West On” and the notes confuse the two LP titles, incorrectly identifying the tracks' original sources. Bizarrely, the same label that released the Ruts' albums in the first place is responsible for this inexcusable mess. Perhaps to correct its folly, Virgin later issued a proper CD of The Crack with the original sleeve artwork, following its twelve songs with the three B-sides (including the Damned-inspired “I Ain't Sofisticated”) omitted from Grin & Bear It.

The Peel Sessions Album renders the series' EP obsolete, adding two sessions of far more archival merit that offer genuinely different views of familiar songs. The “Savage Circle” here blisters with a more staccato attack; “Dope for Guns” is far faster and meaner; “In a Rut” gets entirely new treatment. A sterling document of the second punk wave's most explosive band, one still admired and influential—Fugazi, Dag Nasty and the Effigies all do covers. [jg/jr]

S S S S S S S

SACCHARINE TRUST

Paganicons (SST) 1981
 Surviving You, Always (SST) 1984
 Worldbroken (SST) 1985
 The Sacramental Element [tape] (SST) 1986
 We Became Snakes (SST) 1986
 Past Lives (SST) 1989 •

JACK BREWER BAND

Rockin' Ethereal (New Alliance) 1990 •

Too early to be post-hardcore but too uncommon for any simple classification, this Southern California quartet doesn't try to create a blizzard of noise—they go at it more artfully, but with equally ear-wrenching results. On Paganicons, singer Joaquin Milhouse Brewer tunelessly barks lyrics (as in "We Don't Need Freedom" and "A Human Certainty") that aren't bad in a pretentious mock-intellectual vein; the music is loudly abrasive, but with spaces and dynamics largely uncommon to the genre.

From Brewer's back cover credit of "vocals and sermons" to his complex, provocative lyrics (despite numerous misspellings on the lyric sheet), Saccharine Trust—guitarist Joe Baiza plus a new rhythm section—takes an abrupt religious turn on Surviving You, Always. "Yhwh on Acid," "Lot's Seed," "Remnants" and "Our Discovery" all contain biblical imagery and religious references, but in a context that obscures and reorients the themes well beyond easy recognition and comprehension. Musically, Sac Trust uses the punk idiom like avant-jazz, liberating the vocals to function semi-independently as blurt poetry, while the band goes through tight formation riffs that are carefully structured but not really within traditional song form. Sophisticated, and engrossing once you get past the daunting attack. (The first two albums were later joined as The Sacramental Element cassette.)

Proceeding further into the experimental realms generally reserved for the "new music" folks, Saccharine Trust attempted something really unusual with Worldbroken. The LP was not only recorded live, it was improvised on the spot! Joined by ex-Minutemen bassist Mike Watt, Brewer and two surviving sidemen rise to the challenge, producing a loose but controlled-sounding jam record (no punks here) that reveals its total extemporaneousness only in the rambling narrative of Brewer's lyrics.

On the jazzy We Became Snakes, a five-piece lineup (with sax and a new bassist) returns to the old-fashioned way: write 'em, rehearse 'em and then record 'em. Watt produced the record, which again reflects Brewer's religious fixation. The sonic formula includes syncopated rhythm vamps, lots of riffy solos on sax and guitar and dramatic vocal recitations. Imaginative and far-reaching, if not exactly enjoyable or accessible.

Over the course of 75 gripping minutes (gleaned from a vault stocked with seven years' worth of live tapes made by machines of wildly differing audio quality), Past Lives paints a slightly more complete (if less stark) picture of Saccharine Trust's awesome live capabilities as both inward-looking improvisers and kick-out-the-jams shamen. Quick cuts between the two facets that also crisscross chronological "order" create some jarring juxtapositions, but that's probably the idea. Only one song is repeated from Worldbroken; the seven tracks that are otherwise unavailable include one rare glimpse of the band, (spiritual) lampshades on heads, ripping through Black Flag's "Six Pack."

Freed from freedom's shackles, Brewer created a brooding, cohesive solo album of surprisingly concise, typically dark guitar rock. Though he's still as obsessive/compulsive as anyone tilling rock-poetry's increasingly infertile soil, Brewer seems to have toned down his more hysterical Elmer Gantry approach—even when petitioning the Lord. You'll only wince once (upon hearing the cover of the Doors' "Peace Frog," a reprise from Past Lives) over the course of the many listens you'll need—and want—to breathe in this essence rare. [i/dss]

See also Joe Baiza & the Universal Congress Of, Slovenly.

SADE

Diamond Life (Portrait) 1984 •
 Promise (Portrait) 1985 •
 Stronger Than Pride (Epic) 1988 •

The '80s British trend towards mild jazz/Latin-inflected pop music (Carmel, Everything but the Girl) found its first globally successful proponent in Sade. A stunningly beautiful Nigerian raised in England, Sade Adu writes (the lyrics are hers alone, the music mostly co-written with Stuart Matthewman, the sax/guitar player in her trio) and performs mellifluous, thoughtful tunes with aplomb and jazz leanings that seem to derive from a wholly different era. Despite the music's obvious stylization, Sade's almost colorless voice exudes little personality; her strength is a cool timbre that conveys dispassionate wisdom.

Somehow avoiding both nostalgia and schmaltz, Diamond Life is an anomaly: nothing about it would turn off Andy Williams fans, but self-consciousness legitimizes it to a rock audience. "Hang on to Your Love," "Sally," "Smooth Operator" and "Your Love Is King" are the standouts, evoking chic nightclub society of the '60s. (In fact, the first of those tracks includes the very noticeable sound of glasses clinking.) The perfect soundtrack to your Laurence Harvey dreams, and a very alluring pop record.

Promise is slightly drier and less cozy, but the nine songs are every bit as good. Economical arrangements make each carefully placed rim shot and guitar twang count on such excellent songs as "Is It a Crime" and "Sweetest Taboo." (In England, a dual CD of the first two albums was released.)

On the other hand, weak material, pale singing and Sade's effete production/arranging leave Stronger Than Pride well off the mark, a dignified but slack collection of adult love songs with little of the fashionable élan that invigorated her first two albums. [i]

SAD LOVERS AND GIANTS

Epic Garden Music (nr/Midnight Music) 1982 •
Feeding the Flame (nr/Midnight Music) 1983 •
In the Breeze (nr/Midnight Music) 1984
Total Sound (nr/Midnight Music) 1986
The Mirror Test (nr/Midnight Music) 1987 •
Cow Boys EP (nr/Midnight Music) 1988
Les Annes Vertes (nr/Midnight Music) 1988

This quintet, which originally came from Watford—near London, but evidently insulated from that city's turbulent trendiness—resembles a cross between R.E.M. and a garage-spawned analogue of Dark Side of the Moon. Tristan Garel-Funk plays jangly guitar, almost all of it arpeggio chorded (à la Byrds/Searchers), and David Woods adds texture and melody with sax and keyboards, eventually growing more sophisticated in sound and shading, if not technique. The songs canter at new wave uptempo or a more brooding mid-speed, but the music is moody and contemplative. Vocals by one Garce Allard aren't trendily emotive, instead possessing the kind of quiet gravity that makes overstatement unnecessary, even with lyrics of hurt or anger.

While Epic Garden Music is pretty much what its self-satiric title suggests, it also boasts several excellent crystallizations of the group's style. Feeding the Flame, after an abrasive opening, is much quieter, a less immediate and ultimately more distressing record. (Both CDs contain numerous bonus tracks.)

The group dissolved around the end of '83, but resumed activity in 1985. Before the release of any new material, however, a pair of artifacts from the original lineup appeared. In the Breeze contains alternate versions of some tracks (several are from a John Peel session) plus a few unreleased rough gems; it's almost as essential as the first LP, although the three songs the two discs share are presented in earlier, rawer takes here. The seven-song Total Sound is a mini-album recorded live in Holland for a radio broadcast.

On The Mirror Test, Allard and original drummer Nigel Pollard are joined by a completely new guitar/bass/keyboards axis, not to mention new songwriting partners for Allard. Sad Lovers are a smoother crew this time around and, although the LP does resemble the band's previous sound, the music is pleasant without being quite so memorable; the lyrics are generally less poignant. Yet, as with all of their records, each listening reveals more. (The CD has a revised sequence and four bonus tracks.)

The Cow Boys EP contains remixes of two early singles (1982's "Lost in a Moment" and 1983's "Cow Boys"), a live version of another oldie and a song lyrically overhauled from The Mirror Test. [jg]

GREG SAGE

See Wipers.

SAINTS

(I'm) Stranded (Sire) 1977 •
Eternally Yours (Sire) 1978 •
Prehistoric Sounds (nr/Harvest) 1978 •
Paralytic Tonight Dublin Tomorrow EP (Fr. New Rose) 1979 •
Prehistoric Songs (Fr. Harvest) 1981 •
The Monkey Puzzle (Fr. New Rose) 1981 •
Out in the Jungle ... (nr/Flicknife) 1982 •
A Little Madness to Be Free (Fr. New Rose) 1984 •
Live in a Mud Hut (Fr. New Rose) 1985 •
Best of the Saints (nr/Razor) 1986 •
All Fools Day (TVT) 1987 •
Prodigal Son (TVT) 1988 •
Scarce Saints (Aus. Raven) 1989 •
Box Set (Aus. Mushroom) 1989
The New Rose Years (Fr. Fan Club) 1989 •
Songs of Salvation 1976–1988 (Aus. Raven) 1991 •

CHRIS BAILEY

Casablanca (Fr. New Rose) 1983 •
What We Did on Our Holidays (Fr. New Rose) 1984 •

Every decade's snotty kids are the same, as Brisbane, Australia's Saints handily prove. These punks emerged in '77 with a raw, driving sound recalling the Pretty Things of more than a decade earlier. On (I'm) Stranded, Chris Bailey sings with the same irritable snarl that band's Phil May had back when he was considered competition for Mick Jagger. The rest of the Saints (guitarist Ed Kuepper, drummer Ivor Hay and bassist Kym Bradshaw) respond in kind, issuing sheets of rough, gray rock'n'roll noise, including the title track, a pioneering international punk hit.

Eternally Yours refines the attack without diminishing the impact, boasting tighter playing and even a horn section. Highlights include the cynical outburst of "Know Your Product" and "Run Down," the kind of putdown bands like this have to do well to maintain credibility. With consistency and tasteful variety (handling sharp acoustic ballads as well as the standard burners), the LP is deservedly regarded as a punk classic, and even yielded a UK Top 40 single, the searing "This Perfect Day."

On Prehistoric Sounds, the Saints abandoned punk (for good) in favor of a brooding, bluesy, R&B-flavored style they've been expanding on since, best characterized by the melancholy and hypnotic "All Times Through Paradise." Though a bit of a downer compared to the meteoric energy of the first two LPs, and containing claustrophobic bits of paranoia like "Brisbane (Security City)," a succinct condemnation of boring-town inertia, and "The Prisoner," the album has a strange, soothing effect. Unfortunately, it was the last LP by the original lineup.

Chris Bailey re-emerged in 1979 with an all-new band of Saints, and debuted the group on the French-only Paralytic Tonight Dublin Tomorrow EP, the first-ever release on the now mighty New Rose label. There's hornwork on several of the five tracks, but the rip-roaring energy drive finds these Saints working into something like punked-up Chicago blues.

Prehistoric Songs collects highlights from the preceding albums, along with various singles. Hearing a bunch of their ragged cover versions in succession can be unsettling, but it's also thrilling, in a sick way, to witness "River Deep, Mountain High," "Kissin' Cousins," "Lipstick on Your Collar" and Otis Redding's "Security" being put through the meatgrinder. Not for the fainthearted or tradition-minded.

The Monkey Puzzle continues to develop the new Saints' tone. Although this lineup is not nearly so abrasive as the original band, the devotion to rootsy non-nonsense rock'n'roll remains undiminished. See the buoyant cover of "Dizzy Miss Lizzy" for details. (The CD appends Paralytic Tonight.)

Out in the Jungle finds Bailey at his most polished, handling brooding ballads and horn-laden rockers with impressive aplomb. Although still a superlative growler, much of the exhilarating edge of previous Saints classics has been unduly muted by professionalism. Brian James, then in the Lords of the New Church, guests on guitar.

Bailey recorded his first solo album, Casablanca, in Paris; accompanying himself only on simple guitar (acoustic/electric, double-tracked in spots), he sings like a folk/blues troubadour. The songs are mixed in quality—from a straight reading of Jimmy Reed's "(Take Out Some) Insurance on Me" to the pretty "Wait Till Tomorrow"—and, lacking domineering rock power to drive them, have a tendency to drift a bit. Nonetheless, some of the songs are quite strong, and gain urgency from the stark presentation.

What We Did on Our Holidays followed: half acoustic solo, half backed by a full band. With the exception of one original ("Wait Till Tomorrow" again, retitled "Ghost Ships"), this album is all covers: folk/blues on the acoustic side and Sam Cooke, Marvin Gaye, Wilson Pickett, etc. on the electric side. A good workout for Bailey's rich voice, which is obviously growing deeper with age. (The CD adds eight of Casablanca's twelve songs.)

Bursting with fresh enthusiasm, Bailey then reassembled the Saints, and made two studio albums that are the crowning achievement of a long career. A Little Madness to Be Free reveals him to be a consummate arranger, as violins, cellos, trumpets, you-name-it fill the record without cluttering up the sound. "Ghost Ships," "Down the Drain" and "The Hour" are lush, yet powerfully dramatic.

All Fools Day, the Saints' first US release in nine years, is more of the same formula, only even better. Recorded at Rockfield Studios in Wales with Hugh Jones producing, the LP even features the return of original drummer Ivor Hay and a batch of the strongest Saints material ever, particularly on Side One. With more strings, horns and soul/blues influences than ever, it's a brilliant and inspired work.

After two phenomenal albums in a row, Prodigal Son is a bit of a step back, although Bailey's singing and a batch of characteristically good songs make it worth a good listen. With a variety of alumni on hand, the backing is familiar and simple, approximating past successes on the best tracks ("Grain of Sand," "Before Hollywood" and "Fire and Brimstone"). But two substitutions on the US edition (an ill-advised new recording of "Ghost Ships" and a dull cover of the Easybeats' "Music Goes Round My Head" done for the Young Einstein soundtrack) and lackluster commercial production (by Bailey and Brian McGee) drag the LP down enough to make it the least significant in the group's large catalogue.

Live in a Mud Hut is an official bootleg of sorts, taken from a 1984 European tour. The recording quality is fair, but the LP is best avoided by all but fans who already own the studio versions. The performances range from flat to buzzed, but the biggest problem is the lack of a horn section or any other embellishments. (Live in a Mud Hut is appended to the CD of A Little Madness to Be Free.)

Best of the Saints is hardly a best-of at all, as its track selection almost mirrors that of the previous greatest hits anthology, Prehistoric Songs. However, as the early Saints LPs are largely out of print, it can serve as a useful introduction.

Likewise, Side One of Scarce Saints isn't scarce, merely a reprise of much of the same early material as Prehistoric Songs and Best of the Saints. Side Two, however, is a 1981 live set from London's Dingwalls, presumably by the lineup that made Monkey Puzzle. Despite a preponderance of punk standards, the tracks showcase the group's later rock'n'roll side, and is much better than Live in a Mud Hut. The final track is a '77 recording from a Sydney gig, a razor-sharp runthrough of "Nights in Venice."

The New Rose Years is an appealing sampler covering 1980-'84, the years when a lot of early fans lost touch with the band. The overall quality is excellent, and offers an effective précis of the three superb albums and one EP from which it was primarily culled. (There's a smattering of tracks from Live in a Mud Hut, singles, etc.) The CD adds five more tracks from related sources.

If your pockets are deep and your Saints collection lacking, the Australian boxed set offers a tidy vinyl package with a tempting lure for even the most diligent collectors: the eight studio albums (including, oddly, the American version of Prodigal Son, which was subsequently released in Australia), Scarce Saints and a disc of post-'85 outtakes that are not otherwise available. [jy/i/jr]

See also Laughing Clowns.

ST. VITUS DANCE

See Echo & the Bunnymen.

RYUICHI SAKAMOTO

Thousand Knives of Ryuichi Sakamoto (Jap. Alfa) 1978

(Hol. Plurex) 1982 •

B-2 Unit (nr/Alfa-Island) 1980 •

Merry Christmas, Mr. Lawrence (MCA) 1983

Illustrated Musical Encyclopaedia (Jap. School-Midi) 1984

(nr/10) 1986 •

Esperanto (Jap. School-Midi) 1985 •

Miraiha Yaro (Jap. School-Midi) 1985 •

Adventures of Chatran (Jap. School-Midi) 1986 •

Media Bahn Live (Jap. School-Midi) 1986 •

Koneko Monogatari (Jap. School-Midi) 1986

Aile de Honneamise—Royal Space Force (Jap. School-Midi) 1987 •
Neo Geo (Epic) 1988 •
Coda (Jap. Midi) 1988 •
Risky EP [CD] (Jap. CBS-Sony) 1988 •
Playing the Orchestra [CD] (Virgin) 1989 •
A Handmaid's Tale (GNP Crescendo) 1989 •
Beauty (Virgin) 1990 •
The Sheltering Sky (Virgin Movie Music) 1991 ◊

RIUICHI SAKAMOTO FEATURING ROBIN SCOTT

Left Handed Dream (Epic) 1981 •
The Arrangement (Jap. Alfa) 1990 •

VARIOUS ARTISTS

Piano One (Private Music) 1986 •

RYUICHI SAKAMOTO, DAVID BYRNE AND CONG SU

The Last Emperor (Virgin Movie Music) 1988 •

Keyboardist Sakamoto did his first session work during his post-graduate studies of electronic and ethnic music at the University of Art of Tokyo in the mid-'70s. He continued after getting an MFA and, in 1978, released his first solo album, Thousand Knives. Presaging his work with Yellow Magic Orchestra (which he formed later that year), the record consists of electronic disco, commendably quirky for the time it was recorded but now largely dated, with some unnecessary guitar soloing—the chief guest performance on the disc, since almost everything else was played by Sakamoto. Only surreal environment-conjuring on one track and musical cross-pollination on another hint at the avant-garde and world music aspects of Sakamoto's later work.

While with YMO, he made B-2 Unit with the help of British reggae musician/producer Dennis Bovell and XTC's Andy Partridge. Though not throwing up as many sparks with them as might have been expected—what might he do with Bovell now?—it clearly shows him to be an adventuresome oddball rather than a trendy studio hack.

On 1981's Left Handed Dream, Sakamoto effectively draws out and integrates his collaborators (Robin "M" Scott and Adrian Belew, as well as both YMO cohorts), who in turn get the best out of him. The LP varies from slippery, fractured funk to a duel between a grim, darkly atmospheric drone and assorted percussion; it consistently scintillates, though sometimes in a curiously offhand way. (In 1990, The Arrangement reissued the tracks featuring Scott—about half the album—plus several more, evidently outtakes of the original session.)

Merry Christmas, Mr. Lawrence is the soundtrack to a film starring Tom Conti, David Bowie and Sakamoto, who performed the entire evocative synth score alone (save a vocal of dubious worth by David Sylvian in an alternative version of the main theme). He more recently acted in The Last Emperor (1987), also contributing half of the suitably atmospheric soundtrack album. (The score won an Oscar.) The disc's only memorable music is Sakamoto's main theme (with its surprisingly European feel), which he explores through much of his side.

Both films' music appeared later in other forms. Coda reprises the first seven tracks of Mr. Lawrence, while Playing the Orchestra is a live symphonic rendering of music from The Last Emperor, followed by an equally in-depth investigation of about a third of Mr. Lawrence, capped by the restatement of the Last Emperor theme. Lovely, warm, spacious and extremely tough to obtain: a limited-edition CD release in a gorgeous decorated box, with a bonus CD-3 featuring a trio of non-movie tracks.

Esperanto is an abridged version of Sakamoto's end of a dance performance collaboration with New York choreographer Melissa Fenley. Adventures of Chatran and Koneko Monogatari are also movie scores, the latter for one of Japan's biggest-ever box-office flicks; Honneamise is his score for an animated sci-fi film. Piano One consists of solo acoustic piano pieces by four artists, including Sakamoto and Eddie Jobson.

Illustrated Musical Encyclopedia (originally released in 1984 in Japan, as Ongakuzukan) opens with "Field Work," a low-key dance-rock joint venture with Thomas Dolby that was also released as a single; it's immediately likable but unrelated to the feel of the rest of the record. The LP's title states an idea Sakamoto has toyed with since Thousand Knives: combining pieces of Eastern and Western musics so they're not readily identifiable yet complement each other as part of an organic whole. He sometimes crosses the line into pretentious piano muzak when meddling with European "classical" music, but it's a mostly worthwhile attempt, if it does require patience to absorb the subtler angles. (He explores all this more ambitiously—and successfully—on Neo Geo.)

Three tracks on Miraiha Yaro (aka Futurista) have conventional melodies—almost reminiscent of TV themes—but tricked up with oddball, loud and/or abrasive synth arrangements (as if to counterweight the tunes' prettiness). "Milan 1909" is an electronic curator's narration on the Futurist art movement, over restrained keyboard; "Verso lo schermo" is electro-disco-opera, with Italian lyrics; "Water Is Life" is a wall of music chopped up and distorted, along with a voice slowed to a deep slur. Helpers include vocalist Bernard Fowler, guitarist Arto Lindsay, Sakamoto's wife Akiko Yano (some Japanese lyrics) and saxist Maceo Parker (of James Brown fame). Not as engaging as it is impressive, but almost. Media Bahn is a double live LP of a subsequent tour in support of the album; Sakamoto is aided by Fowler and percussionist David Van Tieghem.

Neo Geo is Sakamoto's biggest all-star affair, boasting Van Tieghem, drumming by jazz star Tony Williams and reggae heavyweight Sly Dunbar, bassists Bootsie Collins and Bill Laswell (also Sakamoto's co-producer/writing partner here) and, on one track, a strangely simpatico Iggy Pop vocalizing his own thoughtfully dramatic lyrics. Sakamoto spends the rest of the album carrying forth the Illustrated Musical Encyclopedia experiments, which get most exciting when he tries weird intertwinings of Japanese music and rock/funk. The LP's highlights are among Sakamoto's best work. (Risky is a CD-V of five Neo Geo tunes, four of which have visual contents for those equipped with videodisc players.)

With Beauty, Sakamoto really becomes the Quincy Jones of alternative music. His all-star cast includes Arto Lindsay (no guitar, only vocals and poem reading), Robbie Robertson (Sakamoto co-wrote songs for Robertson's second solo LP), Sly Dunbar and—would you believe—Brian Wilson singing backup to Robert Wyatt's lead on the Stones' "We Love You"? Although more exciting on paper than it turns out to be in the grooves, that's not so bad a thing. About the only celebrity who retains much identity here is Youssou N'Dour, with various vocal embellishments and a lead vocal on "Diabaram" (which he co-wrote); otherwise it's Sakamoto's show (he even sings lead in English for the first time) as he deftly injects Japanese, Arabic, Indian and African elements into western pop musics. It's not as exciting—or as decisively successful—as Neo Geo, but its sophisticated synthesis is both pleasant and A-for-effort admirable.

A Handmaid's Tale and The Sheltering Sky are both critically and commercially unsuccessful movie adaptations of well-received novels, the former by Margaret Atwood and the latter by Paul Bowles; Sakamoto did the scores for both. For the latter, his compositions—mostly played by the London Royal Philharmonic Orchestra—are somewhat repetitive but evocative, with a main theme vaguely reminiscent of his Last Emperor theme. Half of The Sheltering Sky album has little or nothing to do with Sakamoto: three tracks are by composer Richard Horowitz and there are several striking samples of North African music and a couple of period pieces.

See also Yellow Magic Orchestra. [jg]

SALAMANDER JIM

See Beasts of Bourbon.

WALTER SALAS-HUMARA

See Silos.

SALEM 66

Salem 66 EP (Homestead) 1984

A Ripping Spin (Homestead) 1985

Frequency and Urgency (Homestead) 1986

Your Soul Is Mine, Fork It Over [CD] (Homestead) 1987 •

Natural Disasters, National Treasures (Homestead) 1988 •

Down the Primrose Path (Homestead) 1990 •

Led by two Massachusetts singer/songwriters, Salem 66 plays generally delicate electric guitar music that embraces folk more than rock traditions. The trio's six-song debut EP—produced by Neighborhoods guitarist David Minehan—has plenty of poetic ambience and some surprisingly complex arrangements, but consistent jangly-treble sound makes it hard to stay engrossed, and occasional bum notes also interrupt the mood. Guitarist Judy Grunwald and bassist Beth Kaplan both sing, but their voices don't harmonize all that well. Needs work.

With the arrival of a new guitarist, the Salems became a quartet for A Ripping Spin, a full-length LP also produced by Minehan. The songs and playing are better, but the vocals are still hit-and-miss. Kaplan takes an indecisive approach to the issue; Grunwald's gurgly warble can also be a trial. The brief "Fragile" shows their potential, but other tunes are less mellifluous.

A guitarist switch brought Stephen Smith into the lineup for Frequency and Urgency, which resulted in noticeably improved music on the Ethan James-produced album. With stronger, more assured playing, the simple pop-rock provides a firm basis for the alternating 50-50 mix of sensitive, occasionally offbeat tunes written and sung individually by Grunwald and Kaplan. The latter's lighter tone and smoother delivery is generally more attractive here, but neither is remotely qualified to be a lead singer.

Your Soul Is Mine, Fork It Over is a CD-only compilation—seventeen selections from the first three records plus "Across the Sea," a 1984 single.

Taking another instrumental step forward, Natural Disasters, National Treasures finds Kaplan and Grunwald ably supported by a different guitarist and a new drummer. The Salems' productive relationship with James results in the most accomplished and appealing sound of their career; amazingly, Kaplan's vocals are nicely Bangleish and Grunwald's are slowly approaching adequacy as well. (Caveat to Eddy Grant fans: the "Electric Avenue" here is a different song entirely.)

Stylistic tensions surface on Down the Primrose Path. Amid some of their most unpalatably pretentious lyrics in years, surprisingly loud arrangements all but overwhelm Kaplan and drive Grunwald to sing worse than usual. A few songs (the inquisitive "Bell Jar" and "Primrose Path," for instance) are treated gently, but the band's overriding readiness to rock this time out leaves them sounding wan and stranded. [i]

KIM SALMON AND THE SURREALISTS

See Scientists.

SALVATION ARMY

See Three O'Clock.

SAMHAIN

See Misfits.

SATIVA LUVBOX

See Kommunity FK.

FERNANDO SAUNDERS

Cashmere Dreams (Grudge) 1989 •

A pair of Saunders' past employers—Marianne Faithfull and Lou Reed, who also co-wrote a song—offer generous endorsements on the back cover of the bassist's solo debut (no word from Jeff Beck or John McLaughlin, however), but that doesn't make this bland record sound any better. Saunders has a nice enough voice and acquits himself on a number of instruments (the main assists are from a drummer, synthesists and hornmen), but the material and performances are about as deep and exciting as Toto—who actually collaborated on two tunes. [i]

JIM SAUTER, DON DIETRICK, THURSTON MOORE

See Sonic Youth.

SAVAGE REPUBLIC

Tragic Figures (Independent Project) 1982 + 1987 •
Trudge EP (Bel. Play It Again Sam) 1985
Ceremonial (Independent Project) 1985 •
Live Trek 1985–1986 (Nate Starkman & Son) 1987
Jamahiriya (Fundamental Music) 1988 •
Customs (Fundamental) 1989 •
Live in Europe 1988 (Bel. Fundamental) 1990 •

17 PYGMIES

Hatikva EP (Resistance) 1983 (It. Viva) 1988
Jedda by the Sea (Resistance) 1984
Captured in Ice (Resistance) 1985
Welcome (Great Jones-Island) 1988 •

Originally named Africa Corps, Los Angeles' Savage Republic got its start at UCLA, where Jeff Long, Bruce Licher, Mark Erskine and Jackson Del Rey (Philip Drucker) were attending school. The twin-bass lineup (plus some outside assistance) yielded an arty, industrial ensemble which serenaded cement walls with lightly droning grates of monotone guitar, exotic percussion and noisy, ranted vocals. The band changed their name to avoid confusion with the East Coast Afrika Korps (and the implied affiliation with the Nazi-punk fad of the time) a week before releasing their debut album, Tragic Figures. (Their records' unique graphic look was the result of a school project that gave Licher access to an antique letterpress.)

A combination of industrial drone with deep machine-like swaths of dragging bass, Halloween horror-movie screams and some of the most delightfully tribal and tropical percussion found on disc, Tragic Figures also introduced a touch of Arabic cat slink that would show up more prominently in later work. When keyboardist Robert Loveless joined, the quintet's sound turned from frantically abrasive to almost meditatively cool.

Drucker and Loveless launched a side band, 17 Pygmies, to delve into lighter, more melodic music than Savage Republic. Retaining the group's tribal percussion and Arabic feel, they added electronic keyboards for Hatikva, an EP which crosses Emerson, Lake & Palmer's "The Sheriff," a spaghetti western soundtrack and a Caribbean rhythm fest. Only a thousand copies were originally pressed, but it was reissued by an Italian label.

In the midst of recording a second album at the end of 1983, Savage Republic split up; Drucker and Loveless, under the 17 Pygmies name, completed the record, which was released as Jedda by the Sea. The Pygmies went on to record Captured in Ice, an even more pop-oriented album which features lilting electronic keyboards, clearly sung female vocals, new wave "oooohh-oooohh"'s, sometimes crisp, dance-club drumming and synthesizers.

Licher and Erskine reformed Savage Republic. The ambient, almost meditative Trudge EP came out in Europe only. A crawling, building excursion into the avant Arabic surf textures the band had been exploring live, it lopes through a kind of Western movie soundtrack with some limited vocalizations but no lyrics. The abrasive edge that was engraved in the music from their industrial days is gone, leaving only the racing adrenaline that accompanied it, the clank and clatter of clay-pot percussion accents. At times, there's a processional majesty that hints at what Savage Republic's completion of the Jedda tracks might have sounded like.

Almost the same week as Trudge was released, the Republic came out with Ceremonial in the US. With Loveless back in the band (here a sextet), the album showcases a pop and melodic side with gentle male and Pygmies-like female vocals and only a hint of the Savage's banana Republic feel. There are even keyboards, mandolin, wind chimes and a dulcimer hidden in the (almost) lush and relaxed grooves. (Tragic Figures and Ceremonial were later issued on one CD.)

Live Trek (1985–1986) is most like Trudge in texture, reworking the material from their earliest industrial days to excise the abrasion. It would make a good introduction for anyone who has not heard the band.

Jamahiriya continues to fuse their past into their future with a sound that reflects and melds all of their evolutions onto one disc. Jackson Del Rey is back in the lineup, but Loveless is gone. The CD version of the disc includes three instrumental remixes of vocal album tracks.

Meanwhile, 17 Pygmies—now a Drucker/Loveless trio with singing poet Louise Bialik—signed to a major label and released Welcome, a ambitiously complex mixture of music and theater (by guest speaker Charles Schneider), assembled into a diverting program loaded to the teeth with provocative ideas and sounds.

Recorded as a quintet, Savage Republic's latest studio LP undertakes another fascinating cultural expedition, with mixed results. In an audio analogue to visiting six countries in three days, Customs juxtaposes polite Arabic and Greek influences—mostly expressed through the use of ethnic instruments, although "Song for Adonis" really sounds the Mediterranean part—with merciless noise ("Rapeman's First EP" matches the funny title with an appropriately violent sonic physis) and found-sound ambience. Overall, Customs (I think we're talking border checkpoints, not habits here) is a dizzying blur, but not an unpleasant trip. [e/i]

SKY SAXON

Sunlight & the New Seeds (Expression) 1976
Stars New Seeds Live at the Orpheum Theatre (Sunbow) 1977

In Love with Life (Expression) 1978
Lovers Cosmic Voyage (Golden Flash) 1978
Bad Part of Town (Fr. Eva) 1982
New Fruit from Old Seeds: The Rare Sky Saxon Volume One (Archive Int'l Productions) 1983
Starry Ride (nr/Psycho) 1984
Masters of Psychodelia (Fr. New Rose) 1985

SKY "SUNLIGHT" SAXON AND PURPLE ELECTRICITY

Private Party (Voxxx) 1986
SKY "SUNLIGHT" SAXON AND FIREWALL

A Groovy Thing (Fr. New Rose) 1986
Destiny's Children (PVC) 1986
... In Search of Brighter Colors (Fr. New Rose) 1988
World Fantastic (Skyclad) 1988

If Henry Rollins incarnates all the smoldering hatred and intensity of familyman Charlie Manson, then Sky Saxon—the legendary leader of LA's protopunk

Seeds—is a self-made construct of all the qualities Rollins discarded: drug-addled, hippie mystical, stuck in the '60s, inconsistent and unfocused. The above discography is a necessarily abbreviated listing of Saxon's activities and does not include most of the countless (and endless) cult chants from his days as a late-'70s Hawaiian guru (pressed in editions of as few as two, some on 8-track tape only) or cult-refugee material (the Alright Family Band).

New Fruit is exactly what the subtitle claims: a collection of obscurities beginning with the squeaky-clean (ex-Little Rascal Darla Hood was part of the original entourage) doo-wop-derived '62-'63 teen pop of Little Richard Marsh, including a song with the Rivingtons on backing vocals. Missing his debut single, the sole AIP volume is nonetheless a more complete version of the Eva retrospective, skirting the familiar late-'60s Seeds years (with one '67 selection) and interview recorded in distant shoebox mono from a live broadcast, through to the '70s Seeds—not appreciably different in content or approach from the '60s version (albeit angrier and heavier on a pair of raging punk ravers)—until the final two tracks, when suddenly they kick into wah-wah overdrive and unexpectedly veer into sheetmetal blues (as practiced by Frijid Pink or the Frost). Fade out the '70s.

Fade in the '80s, with Sky now on Psycho, the foremost British acid-casualty label, sandwiched between Deviants reissues and Crystallized Movements freakouts. Joined by a stellar cast culled from Iron Butterfly, Fraternity of Man and Steppenwolf (the latter represented by Mars Bonfire), Starry Ride reaches into Sky's head and pulls out a set of genuine plums: sharp if formulaic Seedspunk framing a worldview no less oblique than Roky Erickson's, as illustrated most emphatically on the side-long "24 Hour Rocker," a minor riff-plus-variations repeated live beneath scream-of-consciousness ranting and rave.

A Groovy Thing documents his studio excursions in LA under the "Firewall" moniker, with sideman moonlighting from the Dream Syndicate, Plimsouls and Droogs, all Phil Spectorized (by co-producer "Marcus Tybalt," longtime Jekyll to Saxon's Hyde) for maximum sonic dressing, minimal riffing and left-field vocalizing (the Seeds legacy). Destiny's Children puts the same songs in a new order (with inferior artwork), while In Search of Brighter Colors updates Saxony to a less anxious, more moody plane befitting California's then-crumbling garage scene, closer aurally to the Seeds than anything since 1971. Goofily poppy, it hit the US racks as World Fantastic, minus the lesser songs and joined by a number of unreleased crosseyed neo-classics dredged from Sky's days amidst the California underworld.

Voxx caught the rebounding Sky on a four-song 1986 7-inch shared with soothing/scathing psych punks SS-20, whom the aging guru had first augmented/sabotaged (according to one's point of view) onstage during his unexpected resurgence in Hollywood in the early '80s, when he would climb up unannounced to join every single band of the then-popular garage contingent spearheaded by Greg Shaw's Voxx label and Cavern Club. Originally a kick, it quickly became a drag to the young Beatle-booted hipsters, and a band called Purple Electricity was cooked up as a stake through Sky's hollow heart. Featuring the McDonald brothers from Redd Kross and Primate Brian Corrigan on drums, the intent was to daze and confuse Mr. Saxon, as well as any sycophants still blindly following. Drawing heavily from familiar '70s metal tunes, the blatantly unrehearsed music of the March '86 show documented on Private Party is matched with a disconnected and distracted Sky, recorded in glorious walkmanorama. Just to cap off this travesty, all of the songs—including indisputable covers—are credited to SS Saxon. [ab]

See also Red Cross.

SCATTERBRAIN

See Ludichrist.

SCENE IS NOW

See The Scene Is Now.

PETER SCHERER

See Arto Lindsay/Ambitious Lovers.

PETER SCHILLING

Major Tom (Coming Home) EP (Elektra) 1983

Error in the System (Elektra) 1983

Things to Come (Elektra) 1985

The Different Story (World of Lust and Crime) (Elektra)

1989 •

Back when German music was affectionately referred to as "krautrock," it seemed as if spacey progressive experimentalism was the only kind of music Teutonic youth could play. Since that era, the nation's stylistic scope has widened considerably and been exported to global popularity as well. So there's something nostalgic and heartwarming about the sci-fidom of Peter Schilling's left-field hit single, "Major Tom (Coming Home)," which essentially copies the story of David Bowie's "Space Oddity" into a modern electro-pop setting. The 12-inch offers the single four ways: English, German, instrumental and an eight-minute John Luongo remix. The song sounds best auf deutsch.

Error in the System contains "Major Tom (Coming Home)" sung in English, a plodding instrumental called "Major Tom Part II" and a German version of "Silent Night, Holy Night" (with new lyrics), as well as fake reggae and a bunch of needless "Major Tom" soundalikes. Throughout, Schilling's almost accentless multi-tracked vocals are blandly sweet, and the metronome-powered electro-bubblegum is pleasant if shallow. A full album of this synthetic weightlessness is more than enough; briefer doses aren't at all painful.

Things to Come proves the narrow limits of Schilling's appeal. At best, a few songs echo his hit; otherwise, it's a tedious and unoriginal bore. If that much repetition wasn't enough, eight tracks from Error in the System and Things to Come were later recombined (with the addition of one new song) to form The Different Story. [i]

FRED SCHNEIDER & THE SHAKE SOCIETY

See B-52's.

SCHNELL FENSTER

See Swingers.

SCHOOLLY D

Schoolly-D (Schoolly-D) 1986

Saturday Night!—The Album (Schoolly-D) 1987 (Jive) 1987

The Adventures of Schoolly-D [CD] (Rykodisc) 1987 •

Smoke Some Kill (Jive) 1988 •

Am I Black Enough for You? (Jive-RCA) 1989 •

One of the earliest and most influential proponents of gangster rap, Philadelphia's Schoolly D (Jesse Weaver) has built a career on dispassionate reports from the grittier side of inner-city life. As troubling as the entertainment value of rhymes that discuss gun possession, drug use and street violence without any negative context (or clear-cut fictionalization) may be, Schoolly argues that people take his lyrics too seriously. (After NWA semi-politicized the issue, it took the Geto Boys to rekindle the debate over the way such raps are meant and perceived.) In any case, the uncompromising rapper offers a deromanticized streetwise corollary of urban-reality filmmaking.

Ably supported by his sidekick DJ Code Money's uncomplicated rhythm tracks, Schoolly began by releasing a pair of albums on his own label. Schoolly-D contains "PSK—What Does It Mean?" (Parkside Killers, a local gang), "Gucci Time" and "I Don't Like Rock'n'Roll," a scratch-happy warning to long-haired freaks: "be on your guard." The more ambitious and unsettling Saturday Night! has "We Get III" (the Beastie Boys were allegedly greatly influenced by seeing Schoolly perform), "Do It Do It" (complete with children's chorus singing "Who's afraid of the big bad wolf?"), "It's Krack" and the title track. After Jive picked up on Schoolly, the label reissued Saturday Night!, with three extra tracks: "Housing the Joint" (which quotes Sly Stone), "Parkside 5-2" and "Dis Groove Is Bad." The Adventures of Schoolly-D combines the contents of both records (in their original configurations) and adds an extra cut.

Schoolly's arrival on a major label (or maybe it's just the handsome back-cover photo) shifts the context of his raps, removing their intimidating credibility and leaving a lot of empty-sounding big talk instead. Without the aura of reality, Smoke Some Kill lacks emotional impact; Schoolly's not the most dynamic MC here, and the repetitiveness of his simple beats and samples does nothing to charge up the record. Despite a lot of cussing and such cold topics as "Smoke Some Kill," "Mr. Big Dick" and "Same White Bitch (Got You Strung Out on Cane)," Smoke Some Kill is no heavy scene.

Shifting his image from street crime to black power, Schoolly gets back in the groove on Am I Black Enough for You?, a loud and proud album of slamming tracks that use spoken word bites (political speeches, Star Trek dialogue, Richard Pryor crack-horror routines) to indicate new political consciousness. Actually, the record doesn't wind up saying much of anything (a lot of the tracks are routine boasts, and Schoolly's old nastiness resurfaces in "Pussy Ain't Nothin'"), but the fact that he's moving in such a positive direction (check the inspirational chant of "Get Off Your Ass and Get Involved" or the Afrocentricity of "Black Jesus") on this strong album is encouraging and exciting. [i]

SCHRAMMS

See Yo La Tengo.

BRINSLEY SCHWARZ

Brinsley Schwarz (Capitol) 1970

Despite It All (Capitol) 1970

Silver Pistol (UA) 1972 (nr/Edsel) 1986 •

Nervous on the Road (UA) 1972

Please Don't Ever Change (nr/UA) 1973 (nr/Edsel) 1987 •

Original Golden Greats (nr/UA) 1974

The New Favourites of Brinsley Schwarz (nr/UA) 1974

Fifteen Thoughts of Brinsley Schwarz (nr/UA) 1978

Brinsley Schwarz (Capitol) 1978

It's All Over Now (nr/Charly) 1988 •

VARIOUS ARTISTS

Greasy Truckers Party (nr/UA) 1972

Many pub-rock bands of the early '70s served as launching pads for English musicians whose fame and fortune increased enormously with the advent of new wave. Along with Ducks Deluxe, Brinsley Schwarz easily takes the cake as a hotbed of talents just waiting for the right moment to burst forth. Although largely unheralded (and commercially ignored) at the time, its five members—Nick Lowe, Ian Gomm, Brinsley Schwarz, Bob Andrews and Billy Rankin—have surely proven their skill and importance many times over since the band dissolved in 1975.

Lowe's solo career and membership in Rockpile, not to mention his voluminous production credits, have made him a constant presence, a revered elder in the Church of Cool. Gomm's solo albums are more in keeping with the Brinsleys' laid-back, easy-listening country-fied pop. Confirmed sidemen Schwarz and Andrews both served in the Rumour (with and without Graham Parker) and have each produced and played alongside many other spotlight stars as well. Rankin played in a band called Tiger and has drummed on loads of records by likeminded rockers. (He and Schwarz also joined future Rumour member Martin Belmont in the last incarnation of Ducks Deluxe.)

The music on Brinsley Schwarz's albums seems at once totally removed and perfectly in keeping with the individuals' later escapades; little hints of the future keep cropping up amid the genial, American-flavored rock and mild pop. Dave Edmunds later recorded "Ju Ju Man" (a cover included on Silver Pistol) on Get It, backed by Lowe, Rankin and Andrews. The first appearance of Lowe's "(What's So Funny 'Bout) Peace, Love and Understanding" is on New Favourites; it's since become a classic item in Elvis Costello's repertoire. Lowe's brush with American chart success, "Cruel to Be Kind," was co-written with Gomm and doesn't sound very different from some of the Brinsleys' richer pop numbers. Much of the Rumour's crisp Van Morrison swing is present in tracks like "Surrender to the Rhythm" (Nervous on the Road). You get the point.

In a nutshell, while some of the music on these albums is either dull or wimpy beyond belief—and check those embarrassing hippie pictures!—they contain enough wonderful stuff to make Brinsley Schwarz's records well worth discovering. Of discographical interest: the first two LPs are also available as an American twin set (Brinsley Schwarz) released in 1978. Original Golden Greats and Fifteen Thoughts (kudos to the latter's Maoist art direction) are compilations of tracks from the band's entire career; there's some duplication, but both have gems not otherwise found on any album. Brinsley Schwarz also contributed five cuts to the 1972 live compilation, Greasy Truckers Party.

[1]

See also Ducks Deluxe, Nick Lowe, Graham Parker, Rockpile, Rumour.

SCIENTISTS

Scientists EP (Aus. White Rider) 1979
 The Scientists (Aus. YPRX) 1981
 Blood Red River EP (nr/Au-go-go) 1983
 This Heart Doesn't Run on Blood, This Heart Doesn't Run on Love EP (nr/Au-go-go) 1984
 Demolition Derby (Bel. Soundwork) 1985
 Atom Bomb Baby (nr/Au-go-go) 1985
 You Get What You Deserve (nr/Karbon) 1985
 Heading for a Trauma (nr/Au-go-go) 1985
 Rubber Never Sleeps [tape] (Aus. Au-go-go) 1985
 Weird Love (Big Time) 1986
 The Human Jukebox (nr/Karbon) 1987
 The Sweet Corn Sessions EP (Aus. Timberyard) 1989
 A Pox on You EP (Sp. Munster) 1989
 Pissed on Another Planet EP (Aus. Timberyard) 1990

KIM SALMON AND THE SURREALISTS

Hit Me with the Surreal Feel (Aus. Black Eye) 1988
 Just Because You Can't See It ... Doesn't Mean It Isn't There ... (Aus. Black Eye) 1989 •

INTERSTELLAR VILLAINS

Right Out in the Lobster Quadrille EP (Aus. Timberyard) 1989

Perth, Australia; May 1978. An unrecorded band named the Invaders (which included bassist Boris Sujdovic, guitarist Rod Radalj, and guitarist/lead vocalist Kim Salmon) joins forces with drummer James Baker, changes their name to the Scientists and releases "Frantic Romantic," a bright little pop single. A four-track EP and a delightfully gritty LP of hard pop follow. But music life in Perth (on the far west coast of Australia, 2,500 miles of outback away from anyplace else) becomes frustrating. Baker leaves for Sydney where he meets up with fellow Perth renegade Dave Faulkner (who had been in a band named the Gurus and was then in an unnamed ensemble with fellow Perth-escapee Radalj). Baker joins the new Faulkner/Radjalj group and they name it Le Hoodoo Gurus.

September 1981: Salmon also gives up on Perth and relocates to Sydney, where he and Sujdovic create a new Scientists with a manic swamp-grunge sound. Full of dirty feedback and great swaths of nod-out guitar, Blood Red River (one of several Scientists records to be issued by Au-go-go in the UK as well as in Australia) pays homage to Suicide with pounding basslines and echo-chamber-overkill vocals, while hinting at the hypnotic fusion of '60s hookah smoke and screeching overheated guitar that bubbles through This Heart Doesn't Run on Blood and on into Weird Love to become the Scientists sound. From screaming blues-rooted mania laid over repeating circles of bass and twists of cacophony lead guitar, through the frenetic Cramps-meet-Birthday Party dirges of the Belgian-only Demolition Derby, each release nudges the band's sound a step further through a path of deep, dark, nod-out blasts until 1984 when, ever in search of someplace else, the Scientists left Australia for London, where their story begins to fall apart.

Except for Atom Bomb Baby (a mighty collection of blistering rockers recorded in London in late '84) and the very Crampy "You Only Live Twice" single (a cover of the James Bond theme), the next three Scientists releases are mostly archive material. You Get What You Deserve combines the seven-song Atom Bomb Baby and Demolition Derby with the B-side from "You Only Live Twice" as a bonus cut. Heading for a Trauma has four new songs but is otherwise a compilation of pre-Blood singles, a radio session and the Demolition Derby tracks (again). The tape-only Rubber Never Sleeps digs even further into the vaults to include live material from two of the Scientists' pre-Hoodoo Gurus lineups, as well as 1982-'83 live tracks.

Although the poudingly intense Weird Love (the only Scientists record released in the US) was—with the exception of the earlier "You Only Live Twice"—newly recorded in London (February 1986) with producer Richard Mazda, it again portrays the band's music as history by consisting entirely of old material, including such tracks as "Demolition Derby," "Atom Bomb Baby" and "Nitro" (originally on This Heart).

By The Human Jukebox, only guitarists Salmon and Tony Thewlis remained from the Australian band. A dreary album lacking the searing frenzy that gave the Scientists their impact, Jukebox's repetition comes off as industrial rather than mesmerizing; Salmon's vocals are flat and droney as if he'd taken lessons from a reject from Lou Reed High.

In 1989, the "Frantic Romantic" single and the 1979 EP recorded in Perth's Sweet Corn Studios were compiled and reissued as the Sweet Corn Sessions, a six-track EP. That same material was later reissued again with different artwork as Pissed on Another Planet, taking its name from one of the cuts.

Despite the Scientists' demise, the band's archives continue to be raided. In 1989, the Spanish fanzine La Herenica issued a four-track EP featuring alternate versions of "Swampland," "Nitro," "Solid Gold Hell" and "A Pox on You" along with its 72-page all-Scientists issue.

Since the Scientists, Salmon and his new band, the Surrealists, have been churning out wild and frenzied rock music: untamed, primal and filled with frenzy. Like the Scientists, the new group uses the mantra of repetition to suck listeners into its groove. Sometimes it's a nightmare; other times (as in Just Because's cover version of "Je t'Aime") it's just a wet dream. But the music is always imbued with a fine and tortured spirit. Alternately funky and bluesy/rooty but always based on the scrapes and squeals and manipulations of hard, electric guitar, the records are, above all, rock'n'roll. (Not content to limit his creativity to just one group or perspective at a time, Salmon has more recently released a solo single, "Lightning Scary" that couples '60s AM radio-style pop with rap.)

Following the Scientists, Tony Thewlis assembled the Interstellar Villains, whose 12-inch EP (Right Out in the Lobster Quadrille) is a psychocandied fusion between pop and pound. More twisted than the mid-'80s paisley but not a self-indulgent space-rock ramble either, Lobster grafts American roots rock to British production styles, putting its pop proclivities across in a more cleanly textured surface than American garage bands working the same tradition, but with more guts than the glossier Brits. [e]

See also Beasts of Bourbon, Hoodoo Gurus.

ROBIN SCOTT

See M, Ryuichi Sakamoto.

TIM SCOTT

Swear EP (Sire) 1983

The High Lonesome Sound (Geffen) 1987 •

Ex-Rocat guitarist Scott pounds out some of the dumbest dance-rock ever on the five-song Swear, produced by Richard Gottfeller. Joined by ex-Holly and the Italians bassist Mark Sidgwick and future Beat Rodeo drummer Lewis King (with one guest vocal by Jane Wiedlin), Scott's inadequacy as a singer and writer are made abundantly clear on the moronic title song and "Good as Gold"; elsewhere, he's just a bland and forgettable rocker.

So much for stylistic consistency: The High Lonesome Sound is unconvincing predigested commercial country and cowpunk. Mitchell Froom produced and played the keyboards; Elvis Presley sideman Jerry Scheff is the bassist; David Hidalgo of Los Lobos adds accordion and backup vocals; the redoubtable James Burton even takes a nice dobro solo on "Release." Give Scott points for improved vocals and bland inoffensiveness, but that's about all. [i]

See also Havalinas, Rockats.

SCRAPING FOETUS OFF THE WHEEL

See Foetus Inc.

SCRATCH ACID

Scratch Acid (Rabid Cat) 1984

Just Keep Eating. (Rabid Cat) 1986

Berserker EP (Touch and Go) 1987

This potent Austin, Texas quartet started out with a remarkably unsettling outlook and wound up—at least the members did following the band's dissolution—playing a crucial role in the development of late-'80s noise rock that has taken deep root in the industrialized Midwest. The eight intense songs on Scratch Acid live up to their abrasive promise, powerfully and painfully muscling around just on the edge of listenability, with only sometime-Big Boy Rey Washam's strong drumming to anchor walls of guitar noise and (ex-Toxic Shock) David Yow's hysterical shriek-singing. In spots, relative restraint and organization prevail, and the record succeeds in conveying something; elsewhere, an overdose of PiL/Birthday Party takes hold and you get nothing but chaotic, raw angst that is simply no fun at all. Some of the inspired lyrics ("Cannibal," "Monsters") are classic Mondo Cane material, but a more palatable sonic setting would have increased their impact.

Without sacrificing a jot of their psycho weirdness, Scratch Acid show a mite more focus and control on the full-length Just Keep Eating. The music is just as virulent and loud, but Yow's increased effort to be understood gives an extra kick to the demented lyrics of songs like "Eyeball," "Unlike a Baptist" and "Crazy Dan," the longwinded chronicle of a crazed murderer. Fun stuff!

Lacking the far-reaching conceptual imagination of the Butthole Surfers, Scratch Acid keep the presentation simple while reaching deep into the lyrical cesspool on the Berserker EP's six well-produced songs. Yow's raging, hysterical delivery goes nicely with the punk wash of "Mary Had a Little Drug Problem" and a perverted character study called "Moron's Moron," but the words are their most amusing element. Likewise, the festering dermal ugliness of "Skin Drips" (accompanied by a bluesy swing) and the ironic near-hardcore of "This Is Bliss" do their best work on the lyric sheet. Throughout the 12-inch EP, debauchery, vulgarity and viciousness intertwine for a truly seedy experience. [i]

See also Jesus Lizard, Rapeman.

SCRAWL

Plus, Also, Too (No Other) 1987 (Rough Trade) 1989

He's Drunk (Rough Trade) 1988 •

Smallmouth (Rough Trade) 1990 •

Columbus, Ohio's Scrawl show more enthusiasm than skill on Plus, Also, Too, a sloppy, occasionally strident indie-pop record in line with the trio's name. Although her aggressive guitar work is dandy, Marcy Mays' uncertain singing (joined in disharmony by bassist Sue Harshe) isn't equally beneficial to Scrawl's rugged melodicism, cutting sidelong through songs rather than moving them along. There's promise in the grooves, but the vocals just don't cut it. (Besides reissuing the album, Rough Trade later stuck, appended, attached Plus, Also, To on the CD of He's Drunk.)

Strings of cryptic fragments serve as the intriguing lyrics on He Drunk, a more proficient and varied follow-up. The songs are neat (besides their originals, Scrawl demolish and then rebuild the Hombres' garage-rock classic, "Let It All Hang Out," and give Felice and Boudleaux Bryant's "Rocky Top" a politely quiet reading); the instrumental work is generally solid. But while Mays and Harshe both show improvement, their voices still don't blend together very well at all.

Producer Gary Smith, who worked wonders for the Blake Babies and has done records with Throwing Muses and other neo-pop ensembles, reigned in Scrawl's discordant excesses on Smallmouth, drawing out the sturdy melodies with presentably confident vocals. Tidying up the sound might have removed the jagged corners that make Scrawl invigorating, but the trio (especially Mays' intense guitar strikes) skillfully holds its own, making songs like "Charles," "Tell You What" and "Time to Come Clean" both bracing and appealing. Evidently responding to the song's feminist content, Scrawl ends Smallmouth with a pretty piano-based cover of Eurhythmics' ironic "I Need You." [i]

SCREAMING BLUE MESSIAHS

Good and Gone EP (nr/Big Beat) 1984

Twin Cadillac Valentine EP (nr/WEA) 1985

Gun-shy (Elektra) 1986 •

The Peel Sessions EP (nr/Strange Fruit) 1987

Bikini Red (Elektra) 1987 •

Totally Religious (Elektra) 1989 •

One part Scottish, two parts English, this fierce trio (led by two ex-members of Motor Boys Motor) is well-named. Not averse to howling until blue in the face, they could very well be the prophesied saviors of static '80s pop. The Messiahs take their jaundiced love of Americana and render it into an unrecognizable hybrid of psychobilly, R&B, garage grunge and lethal punk energy.

Blistering would be a euphemistic description for Good and Gone: singer/songwriter/guitarist Bill Carter shrieks and wails his way through these six tracks in a merciless attack. The crudely worded "Someone To Talk To" (supposedly culled from a Marine drill chant), "Happy Home" and a cover of Hank Williams' "You're Gonna Change" give the Messiahs a roguish sort of appeal. Daring, foolhardy and just plain good fun. (The Peel EP dates from July of that same year and captures the band in its primal glory. Tracks include a trio of songs from Good and Gone and "Let's Go Down to the Woods," later included on Gun-Shy.)

On the title track of Twin Cadillac Valentine, the jagged edges have been smoothed down and the tune wanders amid sterile production. The three other tracks are raucous live versions of previously issued songs and provide the EP's only real signs of life.

Gun-shy contains "Twin Cadillac Valentine" and generally suffers from the same restraint. Occasional glimpses of the old form seep through, but never gain the momentum needed to sustain the effort. (Vic Maile and Howard Gray produced separately.)

Overproduction couldn't restrain a band this volatile, and Bikini Red is the triumphant outcome. An American tour after the release of Gun-shy apparently intensified the trio's love of America, because it's a consistently recurring theme throughout this entire album, produced by Vic Maile. The title song, "I Wanna Be a Flintstone," "I Can Speak American," "Jesus Chrysler Drives a Dodge" and "55-The Law" all derive from singularly American ideals and are the strongest tracks on this LP. Bikini Red is a joyous powder keg of a record that makes the transgressions on Gun-shy easy to forgive.

While Totally Religious lacks the eloquent fury of the Messiahs' best, it's not for lack of trying. Carter and crew still crash and burn, but the results are often tired, verging on generic. Great titles like "Four Engines Burning (Over the USA)," "All Gassed Up," "Watusi Wedding," etc. don't deliver on their promise. [ag/jy]

See also Motor Boys Motor.

SCREAMING TREES

Other Worlds EP [tape] (Velvetone) 1985 (SST) 1988

Clairvoyance (Velvetone) 1986 •

Even If and Especially When (SST) 1987 •

Invisible Lantern (SST) 1988 •

Buzz Factory (SST) 1989 •

Time Speaks Her Golden Tongue EP (Sub Pop) 1990

Something About Today EP (Epic) 1990 •

Uncle Anesthesia (Epic) 1991 •

BEAT HAPPENING/ SCREAMING TREES

Beat Happening/Screaming Trees EP (K-Homestead) 1988

MARK LANEGAN

The Winding Sheet (Sub Pop) 1990 •

PURPLE OUTSIDE

Mystery Lane (New Alliance) 1990 •

SOLOMON GRUNDY

Solomon Grundy (New Alliance) 1990 •

Hailing from the town of Ellensburg, Washington, Screaming Trees use psychedelia not as a stylistic affectation, but as a jumping-off point for more personal existential explorations. The quartet specializes in droning melodic rock tunes spotlighting Mark Lanegan's portentous vocals and Gary Lee Conner's inventively primitive guitar work and thoughtful, vivid lyrics.

The early efforts (Other Worlds and Clairvoyance) have their impressive moments, but mainly show the quartet grasping for a distinctive style. The Trees master that style—an imposing mix of post-punk aggression and post-hippie mysticism—on the SST albums, and each of the three discs is well worth hearing. Even If and Especially When has a slight edge thanks to the inclusion of the Trees' most infectious song, "Transfiguration."

Despite inappropriate mainstream hard rock production (by Seattle metal guy Terry Date and Soundgarden frontman Chris Cornell) that saps much of the band's sonic forcefulness, Uncle Anesthesia isn't the big-league disaster one might have predicted for these indie stars. Several attempts at diversification—like the near-power pop "Bed of Roses" and the doom-metal title track—are quite successful, but Lanegan sounds uncomfortably like Ian Astbury on "Caught Between." Three of the four songs on the Something About You EP ended up on Uncle Anesthesia.

The Trees celebrated their ascension to major-labeldom with the release of extracurricular projects by three of the band's four members (the fourth, drummer Mark Pickerel, quit the band after playing on Uncle Anesthesia).

Lanegan's The Winding Sheet is something of a revelation. The pensive cover pic gives a good indication of the album's contents: quietly intense and obviously personal songs, most of them sung over spare instrumental backup. Lanegan uses his dark, brooding voice to good effect here; the lengthy title track is particularly impressive.

Gary Lee Conner manages to sound remarkably like the Trees for about half of the Purple Outside LP, on which he sings and plays everything but the drums; the rest is mainly soft, acoustic-based pop. His brother,

Trees bassist Van Conner, leads the four-man Solomon Grundy, whose album consists mostly of solid if unexceptional thrashy rock. [hd]

See also Beat Happening.

SCREAMING TRIBESMEN

EP (Aus. no label) 1982

Move a Little Closer EP (What Goes On) 1984

Date with a Vampyre EP (What Goes On) 1985

Top of the Town EP (Aus. Rattlesnake) 1986

Bones + Flowers (Aus. Survival) 1987 (Rykodisc) 1988 •

Take Cover EP (Aus. Survival) 1989

There's nothing tribal about the sound of these Aussies, and they don't scream either. Their music is full of pop-song harmonies, including "oohh" and "ahh" background singing, jangle chords and repeated refrains. From beginnings as a post-Ramones punky ensemble (on the first four-track EP), they've gone through an assortment of members and sonic textures but all of their releases have been exercises in good old pop-rock. Move a Little Closer, a compilation of the band's first two Australian singles ("Igloo" and "A Stand Alone") could easily mix and match with a stack of mod-revival albums, while the squealer and grungier guitar chords of Date with a Vampyre (also four songs) nudge their sound closer to garage territory.

Top of the Town contains six songs by a new lineup that reveals an ongoing transition towards more mainstream pop-rock. "You Better Run" is the most impressive track, and a fair precursor to the excellent Bones + Flowers. The album launches the Tribesmen into a new international league, offering richly played rock-melody songwriting (by ex-Radio Birdman guitarist/pianist/producer Chris "Klondike" Masuak and singer/guitarist Mick Medew) that's got all the needed attributes for major stardom. Standouts: a new version of "Igloo," the wittily '60sish "Our Time at Last," the peppy Anglo-popping "Dream Away" and the Rockpiling "Living Vampire." The CD has two bonus tracks.

Despite the album's appeal and high commercial prospects, nothing much came of Bones + Flowers. By the time of the disappointing 1989 12-inch (five songs, including covers of Lou Reed and the Dictators), Medew was the only member remaining from the LP's lineup. [e/i] iSCREAMIN' SIRENS!

iFiesta! (Enigma) 1984

ROSIE FLORES

Rosie Flores (Reprise) 1987

SCREAMING SIRENS

Voodoo (Restless) 1990 ♣

RINGLING SISTERS

60 Watt Reality (A&M) 1990 ♣

Ah, the wonders of showbiz. As lead guitarist and singer for the iScream'n' Sirens!, Rosie Flores (previously of San Diego's Rosie and the Screamers) performed her share of perky throwaway power pop, the kind of junk that fairly exploded out of the woodwork in the wake of Blondie's late-'70s success. At other times, the four Sirens served up transparently fake country-rock or the entertaining bogus funk of "Mr. T Luv Boogie."

Lo and behold, three years after the halfhearted iFiesta!, Flores turned up as a "real" country artist, doing that old Bakersfield boogie on a fine solo album produced by Pete Anderson of Dwight Yoakam fame. Billy Bremner is her guitarist; Los Lobos' David Hidalgo contributes rippling accordion on "Midnight to Moonlight," a Flores tune first heard on iFiesta!.

With only vocalist/songwriter Pleasant Gehman and bassist Miiko Watanabe returning from the first album, a new set of Sirens made the personality-free Voodoo, a stinky, poorly sung collection of coy songs about sex and romance.

The Ringling Sisters—a sextet whose first album is a diverse jazz/folk/rock/country collection produced by Lou Adler—includes Gehman and Annette Zilinskas (Bangles/Blood on the Saddle). With amusing spoken interludes and uneven songwriting on a broad variety of topics, 60 Watt Reality is an intriguing, odd and occasionally stimulating LP. Best tracks: "Way Out West" and "Kimberly Rose," both of which have lyrics by Gehman and music by guitarist/bassist Gary Eaton. [j/y]

SCREECHING WEASEL

Screeching Weasel (Underdog) 1987

Boogadaboogadaboogada! (Roadkill) 1989

Playing skillful unstylized punk with goofy suburban lyrics, this funny Chicago-area quartet makes no bones about its likes and dislikes on Screeching Weasel, a 27-song debut. Besides covering the Oscar Mayer weiner theme, singing odes to cows and convenience stores, vocalist/punkzine columnist Ben Weasel leads his group in terse attacks on TV talk-show hosts, California and assorted cultural archetypes ("Clean-Cut Asshole," "Jockpunk," "Hardcore Hippie," "Liar"). The Weasel may sound generic, but there's a superior intelligence at work here.

The shredded-speaker guitar sound of Boogadaboogadaboogada! is a shame, as the witty group moves into more tuneful, better structured songs without sacrificing any of its incendiary punk energy. Stomping merrily through pop culture, romance and reality, the songs spit on Led Zeppelin, politics, police, paper boys and psychotherapy, stopping to cover Del Shannon ("Runaway"), quote "Wipeout" (in "This Ain't Hawaii") and send a mash note to Madonna and Sandra Bernhard. [i]

SCRITTI POLITTI

4 A-Sides EP (nr/St. Pancras-Rough Trade) 1979

Works in Progress EP (nr/St. Pancras-Rough Trade) 1979

Songs to Remember (nr/Rough Trade) 1982 •

Cupid & Psyche 85 (Warner Bros.) 1985 •

Provision (Warner Bros.) 1988 •

Originally an arty conceptual trio from Leeds, Scritti Politti underwent a number of drastic developmental changes on the way to becoming, ultimately, a slick vehicle for Welsh-born singer Green Gartside. By the time Scritti Politti released its long-awaited first album in 1982, Green had pulled the band from its early experiments (on the A-Sides EP and the Peel session released as Works in Progress) through a phase of alluring synth-pop and into a souled-out revamp of early T. Rex, minus Bolan's unique sword-and-sorcery outlook. Songs to Remember is an unassumingly warm and charming set, with boppy beats, quirky tunes and abundant catchy goodwill. While Green's obvious song-writing mastery and affecting voice make every song appealing, a few—"Asylums in Jerusalem," "Faithless" and "The Sweetest Girl"—are absolutely wonderful.

Subsequently shedding the pretense of a band, Green moved himself to New York, where he turned to high-sheen soul music as his life's work. With venerable producer Arif Mardin, Material drummer Fred Maher and other heavyweights, the entirety of Green's output for the following two years was a 1984 12-inch, which nonetheless established him as a brilliant (if unprolific) pop craftsman. "Wood Beez (Pray Like Aretha Franklin)" and "Absolute" are stunning, traditional musical values given up-to-date modern stylings.

Green consolidated his triumph by including both songs on Cupid & Psyche 85, only the second Scritti Politti album in six years. Recorded and produced in the main with Maher and keyboardist David Gamson but featuring numerous other musicians, the painstakingly well-crafted record is unfailingly pleasant. Nonetheless, only "The Word Girl" approaches the engaging excellence of the two singles.

Three years later, Gartside, Gamson and Maher finished Provision, another meticulous studio exercise that takes a lighthanded approach to bouncy pop soul. Loads of backing singers do their best not to upstage Gartside's wispy voice, but the cushiony cloak of suavely boring, repetitive material is all it takes to thwart his reedy efforts. In a brief break from the album's numbing reliance on electronic technology, Miles Davis drops in to contribute a thin-sounding trumpet solo to "Oh Patti (Don't Feel Sorry for Loverboy)." The CD adds two extra tracks. [jw/i]

SCRUFFY THE CAT

High Octane Revival EP (Relativity) 1986

Tiny Days (Relativity) 1987 •

Boom Boom Boom Bingo EP (Relativity) 1987

Moons of Jupiter (Relativity) 1988 •

This Boston combo plays good-natured countryish rock with a romantic streak—sometimes a bit too ephemeral for its own good, but always unpretentiously enjoyable. Frontman Charlie Chesterman sings the surprisingly witty lyrics (all five Scruuffy's write) in an earnestly bemused drawl, and the band plays in an amiably rollicking—if not particularly individual—style that's well-suited to their modest musical goals.

Both the six-song High Octane Revival (produced by Dave Minehan of the Neighborhoods) and Tiny Days (produced by ex-Waitress Chris Butler) are consistent funfests, with such winning numbers as the former's "Tiger, Tiger" and "40 Days & 40 Nights" and the latter's "Shadow Boy" and "My Fate Was Sealed with a Kiss." Multi-instrumentalist Stona Fitch left after Tiny Days, but the loss isn't evident on the inconclusive Boom Boom Boom Bingo, two new studio tracks (including the wonderful busted-heart kiss-off "You Dirty Rat") plus three live tunes, among them a decent cover of Del Shannon's "Runaway."

Produced by Jim Dickinson, the band's final album, Moons of Jupiter, is characteristically well-played and typically tuneful, but with a poignant sense of melancholy that suffuses even cheery-sounding numbers like "Capital Moonlight," "I Do" and "Betty Drops In." A bittersweet farewell.

Scruffy the Cat did make one more vinyl appearance with "Love Song #9," one side of a joint single with the Young Fresh Fellows, on the Cruddy Record Dealership (i.e., PopLlama Products) label. [hd]

SECRET AFFAIR

Glory Boys (Sire) 1979

Behind Closed Doors (Sire) 1980

Business as Usual (nr/I Spy-Arista) 1982

The Peel Sessions EP (nr/Strange Fruit) 1988

Secret Affair were the mod revival's top dogs because they forged a distinctive sound that didn't simply pick up where the Jam (or Who) left off. Ian Page's mellifluous vocals and Dave Cairns' plangent guitars spearheaded the band's enthusiastic drive, hampered only by occasionally stiff drumming; the consistently above-average tunes of Glory Boys get an extra fillip by the sporadic addition of horns. What grates, though, is the pushy, overstated rhetoric, especially in light of the would-be movement's brief, faddish existence.

The instrumental attack on Behind Closed Doors is tighter and the lyrics—though still pretentious—arty on a more personal level. At least half of the songs are excellent. By the time of Business as Usual, though, the Affair was a big fish in an evaporated neo-mod pond. The group could hardly maintain its self-important image, and with it went the creative spark. The album, while smoother than ever before, is as journeyman-like as its title suggests. [jg]

SECTOR 27

See Tom Robinson Band.

JONATHAN SEGEL

See Camper Van Beethoven.

SELECTER

Too Much Pressure (Chrysalis) 1980

Celebrate the Bullet (Chrysalis) 1981

Selected Selector Selections (Chrysalis) 1989 •

The Selecter—an interracial, multinational seven-piece—emerged from the same Coventry scene that gave birth to the Specials; founder Neol Davis was in on the creation of 2-Tone, the label which in turn ignited the entire neo-ska movement in England. The company's first release was a Specials 45; its flipside was an instrumental credited to and entitled "The Selecter" which had, in fact, been recorded by Davis and Specials drummer John Bradbury some months earlier. When the A-side became a hit, interest in the Selecter also grew, and Davis was obliged to recruit musicians and start up the group. With the gifted Pauline Black handling most of the lead vocals, the Selecter sounded like no other band in the genre; they employed the same upbeat rhythms, but added a much poppier and individual touch, much of it due to Black's style and influence.

Too Much Pressure is bursting with great songs like "On My Radio," "Three Minute Hero," "Time Hard" and the title track. Davis wrote much of the material, but contributions from other sources—within and without the lineup—add further variety. As the playing hops along, with a horn section added in spots, Pauline Black, shining with enormous vocal talent, continually provides the spark.

Celebrate the Bullet has little of the first LP's brilliance; although the performances don't lack anything tangible, the songwriting is vastly less inspired and none of the anti-trendy cleverness so vital to the previous album's uniqueness can be discerned. The Selecter dissolved soon after; Black did several solo singles and some acting.

Lacking both rarities and liner notes, Selected Selecter Selections contains, more or less, the nine best songs from the first LP and the five best from the second. [i]

SEMANTICS

See Elliott Sharp.

SENDERS

Seven Song Super Single (Max's Kansas City) 1980

Do the Sender Thing (Midnight) 1989

BACKBONES

The Backbones (Midnight) 1986

Although the '70s Senders never broke out of the New York club circuit, the unreconstructed rock'n'roll quartet left behind the Seven Song Super Single as a delightful, all too brief, memento. The rambunctious blend of originals and oldies (Little Richard, Howlin' Wolf et al.) disproves the conventional wisdom that classicism has to be stuffy; the energy level here matches that of the Ramones in their prime. Bands will continue in R&B and rockabilly no matter what the wave, but few will match the verve of the Senders.

In the mid-'80s, Senders singer Philippe Marcade led the Backbones, using a saxophone player to spice up rough'n'ready soul covers (Ike Turner, Chips Moman, Jerry Ragovoy) and exciting '60s-styled rock originals on the powerpacked album, which captures the music's feel as well as its sound.

A few years later, the Senders—three old members plus a new bassist—reconvened. Recorded live at CBGB in August 1988, Do the Sender Thing is a tight, driving rock'n'roll/blues record (kudos to guitarist Wild Bill Thompson) in the Dr. Feelgood/Little Bob Story vein. Only problem: the performances are much hotter than the sound. [jy/i]

WILL SERGEANT

See Echo & the Bunnymen.

SERVICE

Zebu EP (Pravda) 1985

America's Newest Hitmakers (Pravda) 1986

George's Duty-Free Goulash (Pravda) 1987

In Nonsense Is Strength (Pravda) 1988

Head vs Wall (Pravda) 1990 •

NEW DUNCAN IMPERIALS

Hanky Panky Parley Voo! (Pravda) 1990 •

Chicago's Service made its longplaying vinyl debut—following a couple of cassette-only releases and a four-song EP—as a guitar'n'keyboards quintet (guests add sax, trombone, tuba and fiddle), armed with wry material about such topics as sobriety ("Straight Song") and marriage ("Ring Gets Tighter"), all skillfully delivered in modest pop-rock-country arrangements topped off by David Briggs' sardonic voice.

The blue-vinyl George's Duty-Free Goulash, released in a clear plastic cover with a "Basic Side" and a "Bonus Side," is rushed in tempo and semi-punky in tone. Indicative of the Service's open-ended stylistic view, "Defeated" runs together a new wavy melody, skating rink organ and the lonesome wail of harmonica; "You'll Come Back," however, is swanky cocktail piano jazz. Somehow, the strong melodies and textures hold it all together.

Several Servicemen stayed home when the group began work on its next album. The excellent In Nonsense Is Strength finds the group reduced to a quartet, with guitarist/songwriter Rick Mosher and keyboardist Kenn Goodman (proprietor of the Pravda label) sharing the vocals. The resulting album of passionate post-garagepunk (plus organ and tuba) has great material and dynamic performances that pour on the electric energy but never get out of control. At times ("If You Will, I Will") resembling the Replacements, elsewhere ("Honesty Defends") following an unselfconscious '60s path, Nonsense is anything but. (The cassette contains a bonus track.)

Recorded during another lineup change, the lighter-sounding Head vs Wall features no less than four separate bassists (the former, the future and two fill-ins) and Mosher's Westerbergian melodies. Besides the serious pop/rock goods, Head vs Wall features a remake of "El Amigo" (from George's Duty Free Goulash) and a '70s-styled hard-rocker entitled "Hogfat" ("because it sounds like Foghat, that's why").

With the Service dropping humor from its standard repertoire, the task of acting stupid falls to the band's entertaining three-man alter-ego, the New Duncan Imperials. Using a mixture of rudimentary country rock, simplified Cheap Trick and similar energetic guitar vehicles, the rambunctious 23-song Hanky Panky Parley Voo! offers cheap jokes ("I'm Schizophrenic (No I'm Not)," "Born to Be Hit"), scattershot satire ("Jimi Page Loves Country"), covers of Buck Owens, Hank Williams and Hasil Adkins, trashy romance ("6-Pack of Love") and celebrations of essential products ("Jägermeister" and "Velour!"). As serious as a warm seltzer bottle, but a whole lot safer for the stereo. [i]

BRIAN SETZER

See Stray Cats.

SEVEN SIMONS

Clockwork (Dog Gone) 1988

Gently defying the predictability of jangle-pop quartets from Georgia, Athens' Seven Simons (who lost an early drummer to Drivin' n' Cryin') have enough original ideas about guitar texture, melody, vocal stylings and drumming to lift Clockwork well above the ranks of genredom, lacking only the sense of mystery that might ensure high scene credibility. From decisive tomtom power to a modest backbeat, Mike Zwecker kicks the beat with subtle variety; guitarist/songwriter Keith Joyner likewise shifts from near-gothic pinging density to simple folk-rock strums. With the added benefits of Nat Webb's engaging vocals, the open-faced Clockwork is just like every other New South debut album—only better. [i]

17 PYGMIES

See Savage Republic.

SEVERED HEADS

Blubberknife [tape] (Aus. Terse Tapes) 1983
 Since the Accident (nr/Ink) 1983 (Can. Network) 1989 •
 Dead Eyes Opened EP (Can. Network) 1985 (Network) 1990 •
 City Slab Horror (nr/Ink) 1985 (Can. Network) 1989 (Network) 1990 •
 Clifford Darling, Please Don't Live in the Past (nr/Ink) 1985 •
 Come Visit the Big Bigot (Can. Network) 1986 (Network) 1990 •
 Bad Mood Guy (Can. Network) 1987 •
 Bulkhead (Can. Network) 1988 (Network) 1990 •
 Rotund for Success (Network) 1989 •

This cheerfully obscure Australian chaos group manipulates tapes, found sounds and assorted electronic gear—essentially any audio source that isn't quite a traditional musical implement—to squeak and plunk out synthetically rhythmatized fogs of craziness. Not really a noise machine, Severed Heads generally stays on the safe side of unpleasant, but sometimes sacrifices accessibility in a jumble of competing sounds.

Starting out on their own Terse Tapes label in 1980, Severed Heads—at the time Garry Bradbury, Paul Von Deering and Tom Ellard, collectively credited with tape recorders, drum programming, sequencers, turntables, televisions, etc., plus a guitar player and sporadic guest vocals—hooked up with England's Ink Records and made its longplaying European debut with Since the Accident, an alternately entertaining and irritating experimental patchwork of kitchen-sink sonics that occasionally reveals a strong Eno influence. City Slab Horror is more accomplished and conceptually conventional ("4.W.D." is dissonant electro-pop with a proper melody and lyrics), although the audio ingredients that layer songs like the onomatopoeic "Spitoun Thud" and the maddening "Bladders of One Thousand Bedouin" are still drawn from a uniquely bizarre world. Belatedly released on individual CDs, Since the Accident and City Slab Horror comprise a retrospective set that divvies up the tracks from Blubberknife, an intermittently worthwhile but more often underwhelming exploratory effort that uses synthesizers and spoken-word vocals.

Clifford Darling is a double album of early outtakes, dating from 1979 to 1983.

The Dead Eyes Opened EP consists of remixes of the title track (a 1983 UK single), "Petrol" (a 1985 single) and "We Have Come to Bless This House," along with two new songs. (All five tracks later appeared as bonuses on the Big Bigot CD.)

Come Visit the Big Bigot reveals development of a strong and cogent (treated) vocal electro-pop sensibility amid more familiar hubbub that might have been created by Martians armed only with Eno's Here Come the Warm Jets and Orchestral Manoeuvres' first LP for templates. At the record's high point—"Phantazized Persecutory Breast"—the Heads (Ellard, videosynthesist (?) Stephen Jones, drum/computer programmer Obereta Kvojin and Topsy Ke-Evil, credited with "choir control") build an oddly shaped sound castle of conflicting rhythms, left-field effects, amusingly treated vocals and crisply pinging sequencers. Stimulating if you don't get too involved.

Bad Mood Guy continues to reduce the polyphasia, centering the tracks with stable tempos and reasonably sturdy song structures, keeping the distracting gimmicks back in the mix until needed. Something like lightweight Cabaret Voltaire or a hyperactive DJ collective spinning five records simultaneously, this Severed Heads outing draws within spitting distance of conventional music.

Bulkhead is a handy ten-song compilation: tracks from the four preceding albums plus a few non-LP cuts. The American CD adds a remix of "Greater Reward," a 1988 single (subsequently included on Rotund for Success) that opens the collection.

Reduced to a duo of Ellard and Jones but bolstered by sampling technology, Severed Heads jettisoned willful weirdness and moved into politely presentable synth-dance-rock on Rotund for Success, an unnervingly plain-sounding and faintly dated record that could almost be by Blancmange. Ellard's lyrical sensibility is typically off-kilter and flashes of a twisted mind do erupt now and again in the mix, but the diminution of musical disturbance and the elimination of the band's creative challenge is most disturbing. [i]

SEX CLARK FIVE

Strum & Drum! (Records to Russia) 1987
 Battle of Sex Clark Five (Bloodmoney) 1989 •
 Ketchup If You Can EP (Records to Russia) 1991

Natives of a state not widely known for its post-punk underground, Huntsville, Alabama's Sex Clark Five probably get a lot of suspicious questions about their name which, of course, has nothing whatsoever to do with the collegiate quartet's deft music: light, faintly Celtic folk-pop with literate, sometimes political (and not sexual politics, either) lyrics and serviceably artless vocals by guitarist/songwriter James Butler and bassist Joy Johnson. Despite some halfbaked material, weak drumming and the everpresent danger of earnestness about to turn precious, Battle is full of likable, economical ditties like "Girl I Like," "Liberate Tibet" and the succinctly self-explanatory "Ballad of Sex Clark Five."

The 7-inch EP (on red vinyl) has four new songs that—with the chaotic title track's exception—neatly fall into the Windbreakers' realm of deep Southern pop. [i]

SEX GANG CHILDREN

Naked [tape] (nr/Sex) 1982

Beasts EP (nr/Illuminated) 1982

Sebastiane EP (nr/Illuminated) 1983

Song and Legend (nr/Illuminated) 1983 (nr/Dojo)
1986 •

Beasts (nr/Illuminated) 1983 (nr/Dojo) 1986

Sex Gang Children (nr/Sex) 1983 (nr/Arkham
House-Jungle) 1987

Ecstasy and Vendetta Over New York [tape] (ROIR) 1984

Re-enter the Abyss (The 1985 Remixes) (nr/Dojo) 1985 •

Nightland (Performance USA 83) (nr/Arkham
House-Jungle) 1986

ANDI SEX-GANG

Ida-ho EP (nr/Illuminated) 1985

Blind! (nr/Illuminated) 1985

Arco Valley (nr/Jungle) 1989 •

DIRTY ROSEANNE

Dirty Roseanne EP (lt. D.E.A.) 1986

London's fervent Sex Gang Children were all the rage of the English underground in 1982-'83, spearheading the positive-punk movement which mixed the raw energy and commitment of punk rock with the dark theatrics of goth. Sex Gang's individual parts resemble a mélange of the Banshees, T. Rex, Bowie, UK Decay, Sex Pistols and Adam and the Ants, yet the whole really resembles none of the above. Dave Roberts' droning, spiny bass work is the music's dominant feature of the music (practically a lead instrument), battling with Andi Sex-Gang's androgynous, high-pitched vocals, Terry Macleay's scratchy/chiming guitar overlays and Rob Stroud's tribal drum patterns. Like many enthralling substances, their music—with its breathtaking shifts in tempo and mood—can be hard to digest at first, but there's addiction in its opulent din.

The Beasts EP, weakly produced by UK Subs guitarist Nicky Garratt, still manages to engrave the band's doomy energy on wax through such anthems as "Sense of Elation" and "Cannibal Queen." The LP of the same name is a compilation, adding several later singles, B-sides (including the entire Sebastiane EP) and dub mixes.

Song and Legend is a landmark in gothic/post-punk, holding forth with an unequalled baroque fury. While the title epic and "Shout and Scream" epitomize the band's out-of-the-galaxy song structures, "Sebastiane"'s swooping strings flirt with classical motifs and the tom-tom mantra "Draconian Dream" has the aura of ancient folk musics. Andi's unique lyrics jumble up obscure historical references, political anomie, sexual/religious imagery and more. Producer Tony James smothers everything (especially a remake of "Cannibal Queen") in tons of echo, giving the album a haunting, catacomb sheen. (James also explored the band's taste for dub, creating spacey B-side remixes and ambient/experimental flotsam used as segues and codas.)

Sex Gang Children's well-deserved rep as a killer live band spurred the release of numerous live albums and tapes. Naked is one rare cassette worth searching out. Though the sound quality is mediocre, the buzzed performance is from the band's very early pre-Beasts days, and two otherwise-unreleased tracks ("Soldier" and "People with Dirty Faces") are well worth a listen. The eponymous live album, also released on the band's label, is a slightly muddy set recorded at London's Lyceum (plus several tracks from a gig in Glasgow) during a spring '83 tour.

Ecstasy and Vendetta over New York, a cassette recorded at the Peppermint Lounge in December '83, documents the Sex Gang's overture to America. The sound is loud and crisp, capturing the regal excitement of the group at their musical and popular peak. Nightland is also from the same tour (though not the same gigs). The two albums are fairly interchangeable, with the cassette offering more songs and better audio quality. Both boast terrific performances of Edith Piaf's "Les Amants d'un Jour," the haunting single, "Mauritia Mayer," and three new tunes, not to mention acrobatic drum work by Raymondo, late of the Death Cult. (The two bands had swapped drummers.)

Dave Roberts left shortly thereafter (later performing with Christian Death and recording as Car Crash International), replaced by the even more talented Cam Campbell. Subsequent record releases used Andi's name, with the band credited as the Quick Gas Gang. Their first issue was a studio 45 of "Les Amants," followed by an album. Blind! is the most fully realized Sex Gang work, dominated by Campbell's gliding, intricate bass lines and Andi's heightened sense of ornate melody. From excellent studio versions of songs debuted on Ecstasy through the funky burlesque of "Ida-Ho" and two touching ballads ("Last Chants for the Slow Dance" and a rendition of the Poison Girls' "I've Done It All Before"), Blind! is brilliant, lushly layered and grandiose. Highly recommended.

The Quick Gas Gang soon evaporated, leaving Andi in limbo. Re-Enter the Abyss, a shoddy piece of hack work, didn't help matters. A selection of the Sex Gang's best material is subjected to totally unnecessary—and for the most part, ludicrously out of balance—remixes. Skip it.

A holiday in Italy spawned Dirty Roseanne; the four-song EP finds Andi and keyboardist Piero Ballegi experimenting with more offbeat styles, from classic Elton John/Marc Bolan-style British pop with soul strings on "Search Your Soul" to the deft balladry of "Nebulous Canaan." In 1987 Andi issued a three-song EP ("The Naked & the Dead") from the soundtrack to '85 horror flick Phenomena (released in America as Creepers, minus the Andi tracks).

Andi's impressive comeback, Arco Valley, was produced by onetime guitar hero Mick Ronson (who also plays on it). Even if he hasn't messed with makeup in fifteen years, the former Spider from Mars adds (at least spiritually) to the glam feel that pervades this diverse album. The bopping numbers that sound uncannily like prime T. Rex ("7 Ways to Kill a Man") are loads of fun. While some of the attempts at dance-pop ("Rock Revolution") are too cloying, measured, melodic creations ("Belgique Blue") in the Blind! mold are to be savored. And what would a Sexgang album be without another version of "Les Amants"? [gef]

SEX PISTOLS

- Spunk (nr/Blank) 1977
Never Mind the Bollocks, Here's the Sex Pistols (Warner Bros.) 1977 •
The Great Rock'n'Roll Swindle (nr/Virgin) 1979 •
Some Product Carri On (nr/Virgin) 1979
Flogging a Dead Horse (nr/Virgin) 1980 •
The Heyday [tape] (nr/Factory) 1980
The Mini Album EP (nr/Chaos) 1985 (Restless) 1988 •
The Original Pistols Live (nr/Receiver) 1985 •
Live Worldwide (nr/Konexion) 1985
Best of the Sex Pistols Live (nr/Bondage) 1985
Anarchy in the UK Live (nr/UK) 1985
Where Were You in '77 (nr/77) 1985
Power of the Pistols (nr/77) 1985
We Have Cum for Your Children (Wanted: The Goodman Tapes) (Skyclad) 1988 •
Better Live Than Dead (Restless) 1988 •
The Swindle Continues (Restless) 1988 •
Anarchy Worldwide (nr/Specific) 1988 •
Cash for Chaos EP (nr/Specific) 1988 •
Pirates of Destiny (I Swirled) 1989 •
The Mini Album Plus [CD] (nr/Chaos) 1989 •
Live and Loud!! (nr/Link) 1989 •
No Future U.K.? (nr/Receiver) 1989 •
Live at Chelmsford Top Security Prison (Restless) 1990 •

THE ORIGINAL PISTOLS/NEW YORK DOLLS

- After the Storm (nr/Receiver) 1985 •

SID VICIOUS

- Sid Sings (nr/Virgin) 1979 •
Love Kills NYC (nr/Konexion) 1985

Although their importance—both to the direction of contemporary music and more generally to pop culture—can hardly be overstated, the Sex Pistols did not make their stand primarily on albums. In fact, the massive discography notwithstanding, the Pistols made only one actual studio album during their fourteen-month existence (November 1976 to January 1978). In a textbook McLuhanesque example of the media being the message, the quartet's impact did not result from vast commercial success; against the general rock tide, most of their revolutionary work was released on 7-inch singles.

Fulfilling an essential and immaculate role as martyrs on the new wave altar by logically self-destructing (and politely waiting until no one was paying much attention before descending into typical wasted rockstardom) rather than falling prey to standard rock'n'roll conventions, the Pistols and manager/provocateur Malcolm McLaren challenged every aspect and precept of modern music-making, thereby inspiring countless groups to follow their cue onto stages around the world. A confrontational, nihilistic public image and rabidly nihilistic socio-political lyrics set the tone that continues to guide punk bands. On top of everything, the Pistols made totally unassailable and essential electric music that has stood the test of time, and sounds just as exciting and powerful today as it did way back when.

Populated by such classics as "Anarchy in the UK," "God Save the Queen," "Pretty Vacant" and "No Feelings," Never Mind the Bollocks, Here's the Sex Pistols is an epiphany. Prototypical punk without compromise, it includes almost everything you need to hear by the Sex Pistols. Oddly, at the time of its release, the LP was a disappointment in light of sky-high expectations. Four of the tracks had already been released as singles; many others had circulated on well-known album-in-progress bootlegs, like Spunk. Now, of course, as the best recorded evidence of the Pistols' existence, it almost defies criticism. Paul Cook, Steve Jones, Johnny Rotten (Lydon) and Sid Vicious (plus Glen Matlock, the original musical architect and songwriter, who was sacked early on, allegedly for liking the Beatles) combined to produce a unique moment in rock history and Bollocks is the evidence. (The American release adds "Sub-Mission," changes the track sequence and alters the artwork; the 1985 British CD also contains the extra track.)

The Great Rock'n'Roll Swindle, the soundtrack to the band's amazing bio-pic posthumously banged together into semi-coherent form by Julien Temple from a number of aborted film projects, exists in three forms: a one-disc album of highlights and two slightly different full-length two-record collections. In any case, it's a semi-connected batch of songs by various bands (not just the Pistols) that's just full of surprises, fun and strange goings-on. There are regular Pistols tracks—some with vocals by Sid, Steve Jones and Eddie Tudorpole taking the departed and uncooperative Rotten's place—as well as live performances, studio outtakes, symphonic renditions, a surprisingly great disco medley, McLaren's first vocal foray and much more. A bit lighthearted (and lightheaded), but with loads of sharp music. The single-record extract has most of the prime material, but either full dose is highly recommended. (The CD contains the whole shebang.)

Some Product Carri On is for diehards only, scraping the barrel for radio interviews and commercials—audio vérité for idiots whose interest in the Pistols has more to do with sociopathic fascination than pop culture. However gratuitous and unnecessary as it may be, the album shows careful assembly and is wickedly funny in spots—good for one embarrassing listen then straight into the trash compactor.

While Some Product is completely expendable, Flogging a Dead Horse—wretched back-cover scatology aside—provides the commendable service of compiling seven ace 45s (both sides of each) into one handy Pistols primer. From "Anarchy in the UK" to "The Great Rock'n'Roll Swindle," all of their greatest moments are delivered. If you don't have a complete set, this record catches you right up; for newcomers, the LP is a must-have. The Heyday is a cassette-only collection of interviews with Lydon, Cook, Jones and Vicious.

In 1985, a flood of new Sex Pistols records—legal, dubious and plainly unauthorized—began appearing. The Mini Album (issued in the US three years later and then expanded in the UK and re-released as the CD-only Mini Album Plus) consists of a half-dozen early album outtakes (July '76, with Matlock), probably from the same studio supply as those issued on Spunk. The Original Pistols Live, with liner notes by producer Dave Goodman, records a 1976 gig with moderate fidelity and a lively mix. Live Worldwide is a compendium of a dozen cuts from various shows. Cash for Chaos and Anarchy Worldwide are mixtures of live takes and studio outtakes. The Pistols' side of After the Storm contains four muddy live cuts—"Anarchy," "Pretty Vacant," "Liar" and "New York"—from a '76 gig at Burton-upon-Trent.

For those interested in bootleg-quality concert material from unspecified shows, Live and Loud!! reproduces almost the entire first album (although it omits "Sub-Mission" and "Liar" and includes "I Wanna Be Me" and "Belsen Was a Gas") in what sounds like a surprisingly cogent and well-played single show. (The CD adds a bonus track.)

The low-fi/high-energy Better Live Than Dead documents another pre-Sid concert with selections from the Pistols' non-original repertoire—"Substitute," "Stepping Stone," "No Fun"—alongside their own classics. Fascinating and reasonably well-mastered, We Have Cum for Your Children is a motley but meaningful packet of oddities and endities: the notorious "Filth and the Fury" Bill Grundy television interview (1 December 1976), radio spots, live and for-broadcast recordings and an intriguing assortment of studio rehearsals and outtakes. Although it contains "Pretty Vacant," "Submission," "EMI" (mistitled, perhaps intentionally, "Unlimited Supply") in versions that are, or at least closely resemble, the ones on Spunk, the LP's main value lies in clear recordings of the otherwise unissued "Suburban Kid" (just a variation on "Satellite," the B-side of "Holidays in the Sun"), "Revolution in the Classroom" (with vocals that sound more like a bad imitation of Rotten than the real thing) and Cook'n'Jones' "Here We Go Again."

Jointly billed to the Sex Pistols and Ex-Pistols, The Swindle Continues is a similar (and overlapping) studio compilation with a side of first-album rehearsals, demos and outtakes (with one actual B-side, "No Fun," stuck in as a ringer) and a side of post-split items, mostly by Cook and Jones. There's the fabulous "Silly Thing" (a '79 Pistols B-side with Jones doing lead vocals), an absurd acoustic version of "Anarchy in the UK" from a French single, a hysterical disco-mix medley-of-hits called "Sex on 45" and much less. The sound is a shade below good and the total lack of credits an annoyance, but the LP title precludes any such carping. Ever had the feeling you've been conned?

An entertaining soundtrack to a nonexistent scrapbook, the haphazardly edited Pirates of Destiny jumps from interview bites to live Sid-era tracks and studio outtakes (but who really cares about an unused backing track for "Pretty Vacant"?), with an Australian LP ad, the otherwise unissued "Schools Are Prisons" (a different song from "Revolution in the Classroom," with a truly Rotten vocal) and a classic pox-on-punk speech by a London government official for good measure. Most of Side Two is given over to "alternate mixes" of Swindle's live-in-the-studio covers ("Substitute," "Roadrunner," "Whatcha' Gonna Do About It?," etc.) that sound like they were recorded on a cheap cassette machine during a rehearsal.

No Future U.K. ("released with kind permission of Glen Matlock, Steve Jones and Paul Cook") consists of late-'76 demos and outtakes of the Pistols' original repertoire: most of Bollocks and the preceding singles. The sound quality is better than the slow, rudimentary performances, few of which have the electric juice the songs ultimately received. "No Feelings" is striking, as are one of the two renditions of "Anarchy" (the other is appallingly weak), "No Fun" and a take on "Liar" that sounds more like Generation X.

Had Matlock's 1990 autobiography, I Was a Teenage Sex Pistol, not confirmed the fact that the Pistols did indeed play a 1976 prison gig, few would have believed that Live at the Chelmsford Top Security Prison wasn't just a sensationalist fraud. Indeed, the crowd noises are obviously fake. Adding to the album's suspect nature, "producer" Dave Goodman's liner note recollection of the gig mentions that the band opened with "Anarchy"—but the song appears next to last on the record. Regardless of its source(s), the album—a rare coincidence of great playing and pretty clear sound (save for Rotten's singing, which comes and goes in the mix)—is one of the better post-Pistols items to surface.

Sid's post-Pistols album is a classic piece of campy horribleness, a miserable-sounding live record of one of his New York rent-party gigs. The doomed bassist teams here with ex-Doll Jerry Nolan's band, the Idols, for a pathetic performance of punk standards that's depressing and morbid. Love Kills NYC is a similar record, issued during the Pistols unexpected vinyl onslaught. There have been others. [i]

See also Chequered Past, Chiefs of Relief, Steve Jones, Malcolm McLaren, Public Image Ltd., Professionals, Rich Kids.

S'EXPRESS

Original Soundtrack (Rhythm King-Capitol) 1989 ●
Intercourse (Sire) 1991 ☐

Trained neither as a musician or producer, Mark Moore was instead a young DJ deeply involved in Britain's dance scene. In the spring of 1988, his aggressively erotic British No. 1 hit "Theme from S'Express," along with debut hits by Bomb the Bass and Coldcut, opened the doors for a whole legion of young DJs to not just play, but provide, the music for the forthcoming acid house explosion.

Much of Original Soundtrack—a remarkably self-assured debut—harks back to '70s disco, as titles like "Superfly Guy" and "Pimps, Pushers, Prostitutes" would indicate. It could be argued that S'Express has little relevance to the history of rock'n'roll, but it can't be denied that the group played a major role in diverting a nation's youth away from guitar-driven songs and towards beat-heavy dance collages. [tf]

LAKIM SHABAZZ

Pure Righteousness (Tuff City) 1988
The Lost Tribe of Shabazz (Tuff City) 1990 ●

Despite his extreme Five-Percent Nation (of Islam) militancy, this dynamic young Afrocentrist—ably produced by DJ Mark the 45 King (Queen Latifah, etc.)—takes surprisingly little advantage of his first vinyl platform, spending nearly the entire record on crisply delivered but politically insignificant boasts and messages about the importance of knowledge. The Newark, New Jersey native does drop a little obscure racial science here and there, praising Allah and namechecking Minister Farrakhan, but the album is hardly likely to send moderates running for the hills.

On the other hand, The Lost Tribe is largely given over to critical analyses of African-American oppression and discourses on Five-Percent history and religious theory. Ignoring the ethical contradictions in such tracks as the rational "Need Some Lovin'" and the violently uncharitable "When You See a Devil Smash Him," Shabazz—author of a most untypical rap to "Ladies"—seems like a serious young professor who hasn't quite mastered his lessons [i]

SHAGGS

Philosophy of the World (Third World) 1969 (Red Rooster-Rounder) 1980 •

Shaggs' Own Thing (Red Rooster-Rounder) 1982

There's always room for dada in rock, and New Hampshire's three Wiggins sisters virtually define ingenuous amateurism on their first album, a home-brew oddity originally released in 1969. This startling treatise tears down every skill-related barrier that generally precludes musically unskilled children from making records and boasts that perennial candidate for worst song of all time, "My Pal Foot Foot." Philosophy of the World is truly inspired awfulness: incompetent drumming totally unrelated to the song under attack, two not-quite-tuned guitars and clumsy vocals offering Hallmark card platitudes. In toto, a triumph!

After reissuing the first album, NRBQ's Red Rooster label saw to the Shaggs' creation of another batch of tunes, this time making a concerted effort to achieve a semblance of musical acceptability. To that end, another Wiggins was brought in to play bass, the selection of material encompasses some non-originals, and both the sound and playing is several hundred times improved. (The benchmark is a swell remake of "My Pal Foot Foot.") Shaggs' Own Thing gives up a lot in terms of ear-wrenching misery, achieving instead a simple Jonathan Richman-like sweetness—a piece of true rock primitivism. [i]

SHAKE

Shake EP (nr/Sire) 1979

SWALK

The Way We Were EP (nr/Disposable) 1985

When the Rezillos split into vocal and instrumental factions, the latter became Shake. A trio led by guitarist Jo Callis (who'd penned 90 percent of the Rezillos' originals), and later including Troy Tate, Shake overreacted to their ex-bandmates' frivolity by playing their loud'n'fastisms deadpan on this 10-inch. Second mistake: Callis let the other two write. Third mistake: dull sound. Smart move: breaking up. Smarter move (for Callis): joining the Human League.

SWALK, a quartet featuring Callis after his superstardom sojourn in Human League plus the Rezillos/Shake's old drummer, wanted to revive glitter-rock really badly—and did so, really badly. In all fairness, "No Shame" is goodish Gary Glitterism, but doesn't justify the rest of the ordeal (or a "dub" version, either). [jg]

SHAKERS

See Royal Court of China.

ROBBIE SHAKESPEARE

See Sly & Robbie.

SHAKESPEAR'S SISTER

See Bananarama.

SHAMEN

Young Till Yesterday EP (nr/Moksha) 1986

Drop (Communion) 1987 •

What's Going Down? EP (Moksha-Communion) 1988 •

Strange Day Dreams (lt. Moksha-Materiali Sonori) 1988

In Gorbachev We Trust (nr/Moksha-Demon) 1989 •

Phorward EP (nr/Moksha) 1989 •

En-Tact (nr/One Little Indian) 1990 •

Forerunners (and side-runners) of the acid-house movement, Aberdeen's neo-psychedelic Shamen trip back to the spacey side of 1967 British rock with scrappy production, tremolo guitars, whining mellotrons and echoed vocals, suggesting 1967 Who, 1968 Pink Floyd, the Move, Tomorrow and others without specifically quoting anyone. Except for a few songs that lean towards less colorful folk-rock and aren't as bewitching, Drop is adventurous and entertaining stuff that easily outclasses most neo-psychedelic wannabes with abundant invention and élan. In a brilliant piece of unintentional subversion, a Scottish brewery—completely missing the song's lyrical intent—chose the LP's "Happy Days" (an ironic protest against the Falklands War) for use in a massive TV ad campaign. The US edition of Drop removes "Do What You Will" and "The Other Side," adding "Strange Days Dream."

Undoubtedly affected by the late-'80s doings in Manchester, the Shamen adopted a stronger rhythmic stance on What's Going Down? With a nod to hip-hop electronics, the group builds a devastating beat under the Carnaby Street vocals and squiggly guitar noise of "Christopher Mayhew Says," while "Knature of a Girl" adopts the now-standard stutter shuffle of countless rave records, and "Shitting on Britain" finds an exciting midpoint. Rounding off the 12-inch, there's the boring title song, a crazed cover of the 13th Floor Elevators' (by way of Television) "Fire Engine" and a remake of "Happy Days."

The Italian-only Strange Day Dreams compilation is brilliant, offering a complete view of the group's best work. The program includes Drop's "Something About You" and "Do What You Will," a live "Strange Days Dream," retitled remixes of two What's Going Down? cuts (one augmented, the other dismantled), "Fire Engine," three atmospheric Syd Barrett covers (two of them from the 1986 EP, which also contained a pair of Drop previews and the original "Strange Days Dream") and "Grim Reaper of Love." Especially in light of the Shamen's disappointing subsequent adventures, this is the LP to own.

Following many of their English psychedelic counterparts from A(cid) to E(cstasy)—a name mentioned more than once on the album—the Shamen reoriented themselves to play simplified dance rock on the pointedly political but boringly de-Shamenized In Gorbachev We Trust. (The cover shot of the Soviet leader in a crown of thorns is genius.) "Adam Strange" and, to a lesser degree, "Raspberry Infundibulum" stick to the band's familiar backwards-guitar rock guns, but the rest of the sparsely furnished album (including an unrecognizable house cover of the Monkees' "Sweet Young Thing") amounts to electronic percussion, bass, vocals, spoken word actualities and sound effects. Deconstructing the music allows lyrics to come through clearly, however, and that's a boon, especially on the anti-nuclear "War Prayer." (The CD and cassette have extra tracks.)

The 10-inch Phorward (initially packaged with a bonus 7-inch) completes the Shamen's devolution: the six new songs are stark, monotonous clatters of synth drums and chanted vocals . . . music for leaving the room. [i]

SHAM 69

- Tell Us the Truth (Sire) 1978
- That's Life (nr/Polydor) 1978
- The Adventures of Hershman Boys (nr/Polydor) 1979
- The Game (nr/Polydor) 1980
- The First, Best and Last (nr/Polydor) 1980
- Angels with Dirty Faces: The Best of Sham 69 (nr/Receiver) 1986
- Live and Loud!! (nr/Link) 1987
- Live and Loud!! Volume 2 (nr/Link) 1988
- Volunteer (nr/Legacy) 1988 •
- That's Live EP (nr/Skunk) 1988 •
- The Best of & the Rest of Sham 69 Live (nr/Receiver) 1989 •
- The Complete Sham 69 Live (nr/Castle Classics) 1989 •
- Tell Us the Truth/That's Life (nr/Receiver) 1989
- The Adventures of Hershman Boys/The Game (nr/Receiver) 1989
- Sham's Last Stand (nr/Link) 1989 •
- Live at the Roxy (nr/Receiver) 1990 •

The archetypal working class ramalama dole-queue band, deliverers of socio-political bromides over blazing guitars, Sham 69 (the name, and the band, came from Hershman, a town on London's southern fringes) had a bad case of arrested development. Their populist slogans were ultimately chanted like football cheers and taken seriously only by the enormous British Sham army. Arguably their best single, "Hurry Up Harry" is about the importance of "going down 'a pub." Lead singer/lyricist Jimmy Pursey was earnest enough, and the band simple and basic: although their records are of no lasting import, Sham became the most popular UK punk band of their time, scoring five Top 20 singles.

The first LP sidesteps the issue of decent production by having one side with none at all and the other recorded live. The sound, oddly enough, isn't so much derived from the Clash and Pistols as it is from the Dolls, Heartbreakers and Ramones. (It's hard to judge how much of that is by design and how much is due to sheer incompetence.) More than any of those, Pursey's Cockney yelling tabbed him as the Anykid who could, but it's also true that almost any kid could have written the LP in his sleep.

That's Life offers more of the same, while enlarging on an idea heard briefly on Tell Us the Truth: inserting narrative slice-of-life dialogues (kid vs. parents, boy and girl, boy and girl's boyfriend, etc.) between songs. All told, a funny punk LP which features "Hurry Up Harry" and the anthemic "Angels with Dirty Faces," both hit singles.

Pursey worked up some "poetic" lyrics for Hershman Boys; this, plus the increased use of keyboards (played by Pursey's co-producer, Peter Wilson) meant that Sham was nearing the stage of early Boomtown Rats, complete with a surprising cover of the Yardbirds' classic "You're a Better Man Than I." A break with the punk scene, but no less aggressive than usual. (Although it wasn't issued in the States, American Polydor imported the LP and distributed a few copies as if it were a domestic release.)

By The Game, Sham's playing and lyrics had sharpened to the point of respectability, with the strongest material (the single "Give the Dog a Bone" in particular) of all their LPs. However, having perfected their narrow craft, there was nothing to do but disband, which they did soon after. The First, Best and Last compilation does include some non-LP singles (but not their first, from '77, on Step Forward) plus a limited-edition bonus live EP.

Live and Loud!!, a scorching live album recorded in 1979 and released eight years later, dwarfs Sham's studio catalog. Featuring their best, most mature (Hershman Boys/The Game) lineup, the LP is an ideal distillation of material from the first three albums, played with fire and confidence. It's odd that the truly essential Sham LP—their finest moment and the only record that could put to rest their reputation as a sloppy, by-the-numbers punk circus—would emerge so late in the game.

Immense UK sales of Live and Loud!! led to Volume 2 (though redundant, it's more of the same quality; That's Live is a five-song live EP on a subsidiary of the same label) and the 1987 reformation of the group. Unfortunately, their two singles, Volunteer LP and a brief, aborted '88 US tour (they'd snuck over to play without work permits) reveal that the new Sham is nothing like the old: Pursey and original guitarist Dave Parsons attempt a fifth-rate Beastie Boys rap/metal/boogie-down trip. While there's something to be said for resurrected groups who don't simply trade in nostalgia, Sham '88 is totally banal and contemptible.

Besides a straightforward hits compilation (Angels with Dirty Faces), late-'70s Sham artifacts continue to surface. A document of the band's 1979 farewell gig at London's Rainbow, Sham's Last Stand rehashes the same material as its two predecessors. Although not as good as the first Live and Loud!!, it's an emotional, last-chance gas. (The CD adds bonus tracks.)

Live at the Roxy is one concert record too many. Though not as embarrassingly awful as the Buzzcocks' Live at the Roxy, neither is it any good. Worse, it's the same old songs with an original '77 lineup far inferior to the later Shams of the Link live albums. What's more, the live side of Tell Us the Truth (featuring the same musicians) blows this away. Only those with real time to kill will make it to the ill-advised cover of "Day Tripper." Boring and unnecessary.

In 1989, Receiver repackaged Sham's first four LPs as two double (vinyl!) albums. [jg/jr]

See also Angelic Upstarts, Cockney Rejects, Jimmy Pursey, Wanderers.

SHANGO

See Afrika Bambaataa.

ROXANNE SHANTÉ

Bad Sister (Cold Chillin'-Reprise) 1989 •

At 14, pioneering female rapper Roxanne Shanté (Lolita Gooden of Queens, New York) earned her stage name and no small reputation by recording "Roxanne's Revenge" in response to UTFO's "Roxanne, Roxanne." A few singles followed, but it was five years before she cut a debut album. Produced by Marley Marl, Bad Sister includes remixes of the singles "Have a Nice Day," "Wack Itt" and "Go on Girl," balancing slow-grooving, almost mellow raps with tougher, faster ones. Shanté has a cute, coy voice that takes on an authoritative edge when she kicks into high gear. "Independent Woman," a lecture aimed at young mothers, is the album's only serious side; Shanté's at her best delivering lurid details of her encounters with men ("Knockin' Hiney," "Feelin' Kinda Horny") and other women rappers, whom she puts to shame in the title track. [kss]

See also UTFO.

FEARGAL SHARKEY

Feargal Sharkey (Virgin-A&M) 1985 •

Wish (Virgin) 1988 •

Song from the Mardi Gras (nr/Virgin) 1991 •

Following a slow start—three singles, only one of which ("Never Never," with Vince Clarke's Assembly) was any good—Sharkey's ascent from ex-Undertone to chart-topping singing sensation was accomplished with relative alacrity, thanks in large part to producer Dave Stewart of Eurythmics. Sharkey's first solo album is an uneasy pairing of his distinctive vocals and tame, mainstreamed arrangements of material from diverse sources. "A Good Heart" (written, but unrecorded, by Maria McKee) is a sturdy piece of slightly soulful pop; "You Little Thief" (by Benmont Tench of Tom Petty's band) is similarly memorable. "Love and Hate" resembles late-period Undertones, while the Sharkey version of the venerable "It's All Over Now" is simply a mistake.

Sharkey takes another giant step away from his past with Wish. The high-gloss West Coast album—production, guitar and keyboards by Danny Kortchmar; songs mostly co-written with Kootch, Waddy Wachtel and Mark Goldenberg—has characterless backing tracks that could serve any number of lame singers. The stark contrast of Sharkey's strange voice with such bland commercialism results in a listenable soul-pop-rock record with only one strong character trait. A guest turn by Keith Richards on Tench's "More Love" is wasted; except for the rousing "Out of My System," the routinely romantic songs, while competent, are entirely forgettable. [i]

See also Undertones.

SHARKY'S MACHINE

Let's Be Friends (Shimmy-Disc) 1987

KILLDOZER 85

There's No Mistaking Quality (Lucha Libre) 1984

Born as an odd post-hardcore band named Killdozer 85, this NYC quartet changed its name to Sharky's Machine after Wisconsin's Killdozer signed to Touch and Go. There's No Mistaking Quality has a decent amount of guitar-slurping (in an amped-up Gun Club style), but the rhythmic base is too frequently reliant on hardcore's polka-born time keeping.

Let's Be Friends is a much more interesting effort. The rhythms are a lot more open, the guitar heads into the kind of heat-shimmering overload associated with James Williamson's work, and the songs seem much more cohesively screwy. Without abandoning some of hardcore's more goofball tactics, Sharky's Machine managed to create a kind of noisy street rock that was both mesmerizingly complex (in a vaguely dumb way) and unlike anybody else working the same crowded genre. [bc]

ELLIOTT SHARP

Hara (Zoar) 1977

Resonance (Zoar) 1979

Rhythms and Blues (Zoar) 1980

ISM (Zoar) 1981

I/S/M:R (Zoar) 1982

Nots (nr/Glass) 1982

(T)here (Zoar) 1983

Live in Tokyo [tape] (Zoar) 1985

Virtual Stance (Ger. Dossier) 1986

In the Land of the Yahoos (SST) 1987 •

ELLIOTT SHARP/SOLDIER STRING QUARTET

Tessalation Row (SST) 1987 •

Hammer, Anvil, Stirrup [CD] (SST) 1989 •

ELLIOTT SHARP/CARBON

Carbon (Atonal) 1984

Marco Polo's Argali/Carbon: Six Songs (Ger. Dossier) 1985

Fractal (Ger. Dossier) 1986

Larynx (SST) 1988 •

Monster Curve [CD] (SST) 1989 •

Datacide (Enemy) 1990

SEMANTICS

Semantics (Rift) 1985

Bone of Contention (SST) 1987 •

In addition to his own prolific work, New York multi-instrumentalist/composer Elliott Sharp has played with, among many others, the Hi Sheriffs of Blue, Mofungo, The Scene Is Now, members of FIREHOSE (as the Bootstrappers), John Zorn and Wayne Horvitz. Although Sharp writes jarring, heavily rhythmic music using tunings and rhythms based on number systems and other schemes normally associated with contemporary classical music, there's nothing at all classical about his pounding guitar and bass rhythms or screeching bass clarinet and tenor and soprano sax. Due to its abrasive edges and sheer strangeness, Sharp's music is, for many, an unacquirable taste.

Sharp recorded Hara, a series of duets with guitarist and flutist Dave Fulton, largely to facilitate getting gigs. On Rhythms and Blues, he offers a version of R&B on electric and acoustic guitars, clarinet and saxes. (T)here consists of one solo side recorded live in Prague; the reverse features trumpeter Lesli Dalaba and percussionist Charles Noyes.

Both Dalaba and Noyes play in Carbon (a loose and shifting group of musicians Sharp uses to play his ensemble pieces): Carbon is a clear example of how Sharp organizes his music around rhythm, with melody taking a subordinate role. Most of the tracks feature Sharp on guitar, sax or clarinet, cranking out spiky rhythms while drummers pound bass drum, congas and tom-toms. Sometimes Sharp growls too. An exotic sound, straight from downtown New York.

Although Carbon is credited on Marco Polo's Argali/Carbon: Six Songs, the annotation never makes it clear just what that means in terms of personnel. In any case, the side with six songs is strong stuff. With Sharp's rhythmic reed work, plenty of percussion and strange sounds from his invented instruments, the tracks clank along on the edge of chaos, but never succumb to it. "Marco Polo," a side-long piece based on a number series, has some excellent moments, but, despite great trombone work by Jim Staley, gets a bit tedious over the course of 20 minutes.

Fractal is one of Sharp's strongest works, six shorter pieces and the long "Not-Yet-Time," which features some great rhythmic guitar work. It also showcases one of Sharp's gambits—using his hands to beat out quick harmonic patterns on a bass neck, as if it were a drum. The rhythms and textures play off each other beautifully, the whip-saw guitar and thick percussion offset by bass harmonics that sound like bells ringing. (Monster Curve is a CD-only compilation of tracks from the first three Carbon albums.)

Sharp also experiments with computers and sampling technology, and uses both extensively on Virtual Stance. The extended title track is composed of samples, some of which are fascinating and/or amusing, some of which are not. The rest of the record consists of briefer pieces: half sound like the previous two albums, while the others are slower and more textured.

In the Land of the Yahoos is Sharp's self-described pop album, meaning that he and others sing, his guitar and bass are toned down and the percussion is almost normal. An amazing LP with more variety than many of his others, it explores numerous textures and moods, dishes out surprises at every turn and displays a witty sense of humor.

Around the same time as Yahoos, Sharp turned his attentions to a new format of music, and began composing for an amplified string quartet, namely violinist David Soldier and his group. The shrill, rapid sawings of Tessalation Row (a thirteen-minute title piece plus four shorter works) make Bartók seem like a valium addict. (With the addition of two extensive—and stylistically consistent—new pieces, Tessalation Row was reissued on CD as Hammer, Anvil, Stirrup.) Although Sharp generally uses similar rhythms and tunings as on his rock albums, one movement mostly consists of the instruments' bodies being used for percussion.

Thanks to his increased skill at writing for ensembles, Larynx is Sharp's best album with Carbon. As much jazz as rock, somehow it's neither. Constructed in six sections with five interludes, the titular piece runs over both sides of the record. Four drummers play on the opening and closing sections; the Soldier String Quartet, Jim Staley and others combine to create an amazing array of textures and rhythms. But the most inspired playing comes from Sharp himself. For the last ten minutes he pounds red-hot rhythms on bass and guitar fretboards, accompanied by frenzied drumming and dissonant violin. Awesome.

Datacide combines Fractal's instrumentation with the shorter framework and polished production of Land of the Yahoos, with positive results.

Semantics is a rock/jazz power trio with drummer Samm Bennett (who sometimes plays with Carbon) and saxophonist Ned Rothenberg. The group's phenomenal debut meshes Rothenberg's rhythmic, interweaving sax lines with Sharp's forceful bass and guitar. The more chaotic and noisy Bone of Contention generally eschews the song structures of Semantics and is more on the jazz, if not the free jazz, side of the band's stylistic fusion. [sl]

See also FIREHOSE, Mofungo, The Scene Is Now.

JULES SHEAR

Watch Dog (EMI America) 1983

Jules EP (EMI America) 1983

The Eternal Return (EMI America) 1985

Demo-itis (Enigma) 1987

The Third Party (IRS) 1989 •

FUNKY KINGS

Funky Kings (Arista) 1976

JULES AND THE POLAR BEARS

Got No Breeding (Columbia) 1978 •

Fenëfiks (Columbia) 1979

RECKLESS SLEEPERS

Big Boss Sounds (IRS) 1988 •

Despite his unbeatable songwriting talents, pop stardom has proven elusive for Jules Shear. His two songs are the highlights of the Funky Kings album, but the rest of the LP is forgettable laid-back California rock.

The two Polar Bears albums are gems; Shear's breathless vocals and the cascading lyrics are perfectly matched with the rollicking playing of his three bandmates (including future star-producer/keyboardist Stephen Hague). Both albums were commercial duds, however, and a third album (Bad for Business) was rejected by the group's label and was never released.

Shear's first two solo LPs contain some of his finest songs, including "All Through the Night" and "If She Knew What She Wants" (Top 40 hits for, respectively, Cyndi Lauper and the Bangles). Watch Dog suffers from a smothering Todd Rundgren production job, but The Eternal Return—co-produced by Shear and Bill Drescher—is a complete delight. (The Jules EP contains two mixes of the non-LP "When Love Surges" and a four-song condensation of Watch Dog.)

As the name implies, Demo-itis is a collection of song demos, half recorded by Shear at home on 8-track and the rest recorded with various musicians in a full-fledged studio situation. Despite the rough edges, it's fascinating to hear these familiar songs in their early stages. Demo-itis has spontaneity and enthusiasm not heard on any of Shear's other albums.

Reckless Sleepers brought a collaboration with three new bandmates on the music (Shear still writes all the lyrics), but it's hard to discern any substantial creative change as a result. The Third Party is an interesting experiment with solo vocals by Shear and guitar accompaniment by Marty Willson-Piper of the Church. The songs are as well-crafted as ever, but a certain monotony results from Shear's unmelodic singing style (never his strongest asset) and the unvarying guitar arrangements. Providing the guitar chords along with the lyrics is a nice touch, though. [sk]

See also 'Til Tuesday.

STEPHEN SHEEHAN

See Digital Sex.

PETE SHELLEY

Sky Yen (nr/Groovy) 1979

Homosapien (Genetic-Arista) 1982

XL1 (Genetic-Arista) 1983

Heaven and the Sea (Mercury) 1986 •

As creative linchpin of the Buzzcocks, Pete Shelley perfected a pop style based on intellectualizing his emotional responses, often to humorous effect. But, as with the group, he is strongest making singles, apparently hard-pressed to sustain his energy throughout an entire album.

Shelley's first solo LP, Sky Yen, was actually recorded in 1974, long before the Buzzcocks, and demonstrates an early interest in Germanic electronic music. An exercise in simpleminded drone electronics conducted on a single oscillator rather than full-fledged electronic instruments, the album is a collectors' item of minor interest.

The post-Buzzcocks Homosapien, including the hit single of the same name, is a dance album in which Shelley takes the reins and eliminates guitars and drums as the axis of his songs. The turn to electronics doesn't signal a surrender to them, though; the songs, not the technique, remain paramount. Shelley seems to draw influence from a wide group of sources (such as the Doors and Marc Bolan), and the album cleverly sidesteps the trap of monotony that sometimes afflicted the Buzzcocks. (The US version latter replaces "Pusher Man," "It's Hard Enough Knowing" and "Keats' Song" with "Love in Vain," "Witness the Change" and "In Love with Somebody Else.")

Shelley reintroduces guitar on XL1 and downplays the electronics to create more direct, urgent dance music. "Telephone Operator" is the equal of "Homosapien," and the LP contains other solid examples of clear-headed songwriting—"If You Ask Me (I Won't Say No)" and "You Know Better Than I Know," for instance—that allow strong rhythms to predominate without obscuring the abundant musicality. The American cassette adds remixes of "Homosapien" and another song; the English tape tacks on an extra LP's worth.

Heaven and the Sea serves up more of Shelley's reflective soul-searching, but without much relish. Except for the percussion-laden "No Moon," the songs are fairly routine, and Stephen Hague's mundane production does little to distinguish them. [sg/i]

See also Buzzcocks.

SHELLEYAN ORPHAN

Helleborine (Rough Trade-Columbia) 1987 •

Century Flower (Rough Trade-Columbia) 1989 •

Bournemouth's Shelleyan Orphan, the poetic singer/songwriter duo of Caroline Crawley and Jemaur Tayle, make use of a number of guests for Helleborine, mostly playing woodwinds and orchestral strings (members of Kate Bush's band provide some bass and drums). Instead of trying to create make-believe classical music, however, the group plays pastoral folk-pop, using the winds and strings for parts that would normally be handled by standard rock instruments. Although Helleborine ultimately succumbs to its own preciousness, it is refreshing in small doses.

More blood flows through the group's veins on Century Flower, produced by Dave Allen. The opening "Shatter" has a string quartet intro, but with pounding drums; a rather gritty sax eventually joins the fun. Electric guitars even work their way onto the LP, and Crawley's vocals turn far more passionate than on the debut. (Tayle sings mostly harmonies, and his voice is on the slight side.) Century Flower doesn't exactly kick butt, but it does move along nicely with well-written songs. Everything but the Girl's art-school cousins? [dgs]

ADRIAN SHERWOOD

See New Age Steppers, Tackhead.

SHINEHEAD

Rough and Rugged (African Love Music) 1986

Unity (African Love-Elektra) 1988 •

The Real Rock (African Love-Elektra) 1990 •

Born in Jamaica, Shinehead (Edmund Carl Aiken) grew up in the Bronx, combining his two cultural heritages to become one of the first roots-rock-rappers. As a member of the early-'80s African Love Soundsystem, he surprised New Yorkers with his wacky, superb lyrical content and performance. Now signed to a major label, he has thus far endured the transition from turntable jamming to full-fledged concert tours without any compromise in his quirky vision of reality.

Shinehead's first album, released on producer Claude Evans' label, showcases a talented young rapper versatile enough to mix his musical metaphors into reggae rap ("Rough & Rugged"), American soul ("Good Love Tonight") and hybrid NYC-JA MC-style (the reggae-biographical "Hello Y'All"). From socially conscious lyrics ("Who the Cap Fits") to outright comedy, Rough and Rugged is a brilliant LP with something for everyone.

New York's raggamuffin roughneck continues to mix yankee hip-hop and yardie MC on Unity (which includes remixes of tracks like "Know How Fe Chat," "Hello Y'All" and "Who the Cap Fits" from the first album). With Run-DMC's Jam Master Jay producing three cuts (the "Come Together" Beatles rewrite of "Unity," the Sam Cooke-styled "Chain Gang" and "Truth"), and members of Roots Radics laying down musical rhythms, Shinehead rocks the house from Jamaica, Queens to Kingston, Jamaica.

The music on The Real Rock is more sophisticated in terms of technology and styling, but the songs are hit-and-miss. In the winning column, Shinehead does an impressive reworked version of Sly Stone's "Family Affair," flashes his rapid-fire lyrical style (as well as his sense of humor) on "Cigarette Breath," clings to his Jamaican birthright with "Musical Madness," delivers an inspiring sermon in "Strive" and lands a dose of reality on the title track. [aw]

SHIRTS

The Shirts (Capitol) 1978

Street Light Shine (Capitol) 1979

Inner Sleeve (Capitol) 1980

JING/CHEMICAL WEDDING

Off the Board [tape] (CBGB) 1987

JING

Jing (Three Cherries) 1989

Six Brooklynites known as the Shirts were playing Top 40 covers in local bars until they happened onto the Bowery club circuit in 1975. Abandoning the boroughs for a career in Manhattan with original material, the Shirts became a popular (if unhip) fixture on the burgeoning New York new wave scene, and went on to make three albums of totally bland hoping-for-the-mainstream rock. Singer Annie Golden went on to success as a singer/actress—in the movie of Hair, with a solo single in 1984 and on Broadway—but the Shirts are little more than a dull memory. Each of the albums has an enjoyable song or two, but there's nothing remarkable about any of them.

A decade later, Shirts guitarist/vocalist Artie La Monica (now calling himself Arthur Jing) turned up back on CBGB's stage, filling one side of a live cassette with his solo debut. Supported by a skilled quartet and bearing traces of Elvis Costello, Bob Dylan and Dion in his voice, Jing makes a credible, well-recorded showing. Four of the same songs turn up again on the eponymous studio album, a not unpleasant anachronism that has its roots in '70s new wave, Brill Building pop and the same mixture of '60s rock and soul that informed Springsteen's early records. Golden guests on three tracks. [j]

SHOCKABILLY

The Dawn of Shockabilly EP (nr/Rough Trade) 1982

(Shimmy-Disc) 1988

Earth vs. Shockabilly (nr/Rough Trade) 1983

(Shimmy-Disc) 1988

Greatest Hits EP (Red) 1983

Colosseum (nr/Rough Trade) 1984

Vietnam (Fundamental Music) 1984

Heaven (Fundamental Music) 1985

The Ghost of Shockabilly [CD] (Shimmy-Disc) 1989 •

Vietnam/Heaven (Shimmy-Disc) 1990 •

Live ... Just Beautiful (Shimmy-Disc) 1990 •

Crazed rockabilly-tinged remakes of "Psychotic Reaction" and two Yardbirds classics isn't a bad idea, especially if gonzo guitar and drums like those on The Dawn of Shockabilly are brought to bear on 'em. Taking the same tack on "A Hard Day's Night" and a country oldie, adding silly organ also makes a funny kind of sense. But guitarist Eugene Chadbourne's non-sense vocals (stupidly muffled, or in silly cartoon character styles, with at least two or three different voices per track) ruin the whole thing. Eugene shouldn't be careful with his axe, but with his mouth.

Greatest Hits takes one track each from the two preceding English records and adds a quartet of stunning live cuts, including the amphetaminized "Bluegrass Breakdown" and a nearly unrecognizable version of the Doors' "People Are Strange." The Ghost of Shockabilly CD combines Earth and Colosseum, the album on which the writing team of Chadbourne and Mark Kramer (bass/organ/production) began to flourish, with the Kramer musically embellishing Eugene's political and instrumental rants, parodies and white-trash obsessions. (The Shimmy-Disc cassette of Earth contains The Dawn of Shockabilly.)

Vietnam is a relatively grand affair, with a huge tour-diary poster and material by Arthur Lee, John Fogerty, John Lee Hooker and the Beatles mercilessly savaged by Chadbourne, Kramer and drummer David Licht.

Heaven takes the terrible trio further into the realms of the truly weird. Only three covers (Bolan, Lennon and a mystery), but such inspired originals as Eugene's "How Can You Kill Me, I'm Already Dead" and "She Was a Living Breathing Piece of Dirt" more than make up the difference. On that (bum) note, Shockabilly ceased to exist. (Shimmy-Disc later paired Vietnam and Heaven on CD and cassette.)

The posthumous live CD, Just Beautiful, is a generous 27-track plunge into the group's hyperkinetic non-stop electric vaudeville: Chadbourne wreaks havoc on an electrified rake and birdcage while Kramer and mutant-percussionist Licht fall apart in the background. Almost entirely comprised of covers, the CD includes five remixed tracks from Dawn of Shockabilly sutured in the middle. The cassette version has a dozen live tracks (from '84 and '85), the entire Colosseum LP and the five Dawn remixes.

Occasionally listenable, often more stupid than funny, Shockabilly was, if nothing else, absolutely unique. [jg/i/rg]

See also Bongwater, Carney-Hild-Kramer, Eugene Chadbourne.

MICHELLE SHOCKED

The Texas Campfire Tapes (Cooking Vinyl) 1986

(Mercury) 1988 •

Short Sharp Shocked (Mercury) 1988 •

Anchorage EP (nr/London) 1988 •

If Love Was a Train EP (nr/London) 1989 •

Captain Swing (Mercury) 1989 •

In the interests of critical fair play, let it be acknowledged that Bob Dylan also changed his name, invented (or at least outrageously embellished) his personal mythology and slyly claimed an entirely fictitious folk rootsiness with all the guile of film star. Since Michelle Shocked is no Bob Dylan, her ability to pull off the same charade only proves that you can fool some of the people all of the time. That's not to say she's not talented but, as a well-rounded pop star, her strained efforts at self-promotion and political action are dubiously credible and unforgivably distasteful in light of her pretensions of unpretentiousness.

Recorded live at a folk festival on a portable tape machine (not exactly a field recording but close enough to seem legitimately earthy), The Texas Campfire Tapes—complete with the post-production sound of chirping crickets—made the Dallas-born Shocked the darling of the British folk scene. An uncertain but ambitious singer whose style is woven of jazz, blues and rock'n'roll as much as folk, she comes off as a talented amateur with modestly appealing songs and the hint of substantial potential.

Parlaying UK success into an American record deal (which led to the Campfire Tapes' domestic issue), Shocked made her first studio album with guitarist Pete Anderson (Dwight Yoakam's producer), who provided a crisp, tasteful Nashville country bed for some of her songs. While maintaining a tenuous connection to acoustic folk with the winsome "Memories of East Texas" and Jean Ritchie's "The L + N Don't Stop Here Anymore" (the outraged protest lyrics of "Graffiti Limbo" don't quite achieve the desired effect), Shocked otherwise favors full-bodied arrangements. Hence the uptight R&B sound of "If Love Was a Train" and the glib singer/songwriter pop treatment of "Anchorage," a wonderful and affecting correspondence between old friends. And though you wouldn't know it from the jacket or label, Shocked even rocks out punkwise, joining ex-Texas politicos MDC for a hard-rocking rendition of the first album's "Fogtown." (It's the eleventh song, right after "Black Widow.")

If Short Sharp Shocked was a surprising follow-up to The Texas Campfire Tapes, the slick Captain Swing came as a real shocker. Anderson leads a band of session men in a modern evocation of '40s jazz (with horns, piano and strings) reminiscent of certain Joni Mitchell records. As a songwriter, Shocked isn't yet equipped to pull off an entire album in this style (indeed, she has to recycle one first-album tune to make ten tracks, most of which are insubstantial love songs), and her voice isn't quite up to the challenge, either. [i]

SHOES

Un dans Versailles (no label) 1975

Black Vinyl Shoes (Black Vinyl) 1977 (PVC) 1978

Present Tense (Elektra) 1979

Tongue Twister (Elektra) 1981

Boomerang (Elektra) 1982 (Black Vinyl) 1990 •

Silhouette (nr/Demon) 1984 (Black Vinyl) 1991 •

Shoes Best (Black Vinyl) 1987 ♪

Present Tense/Tongue Twister [CD] (Black Vinyl) 1988 •

Stolen Wishes (Black Vinyl) 1989 ♪

This brilliant power pop outfit from Zion, Illinois began by recording at home on a 4-track, which resulted in a self-released LP that attracted national attention and (eventually) a major-label contract. John and Jeff Murphy, Gary Klebe and drummer Skip Meyer blend electric guitar—loud, distorted and multi-tracked—with breathy, winsome vocals to create melodic rock made most impressive by the strength of three equally talented singer/songwriters.

Black Vinyl Shoes was recorded in a living room; the intricately layered guitars and vocals make that hard to believe. The songs, telling tender tales of failed romance, are catchy and instantly likable. The band also put the record in an impressive package and distributed it as a vinyl demo; in fact, it's one of the finest home-brewed releases ever, and is a much more valid piece of music than many productions by well-known bands with far greater technical resources. After the small initial pressing sold out, the album was licensed to PVC and reissued with wholly different artwork.

Black Vinyl is actually not Shoes' first album. A prior longplayer was recorded by the Murphy brothers with a previous drummer and privately issued in a minute pressing quantity. Charming but a bit rough, it sounds like a less-developed attempt at what was to come. Shoes also recorded—but never released—an album's worth of excellent tunes in 1976 under the working title Bazooka.

After signing to Elektra, Shoes recorded Present Tense in a full-scale English 24-track studio with a professional producer, but ended up sounding pretty much the same as before, only with much greater audio fidelity. Given the chance to experiment and open up their sound, Shoes opted to hold fast—lots of vocals, lots of melody, lots of fuzzed-out guitars. Another triumphant LP that probably could have been made at home without losing any appreciable amount of charm or appeal—it's Shoes' talent, not studio technology, that matters here.

Tongue Twister successfully maintains the quality level of Present Tense, but Shoes are clearly standing still creatively. Their style is honed as far as it's going to go, and they're sticking with it. Boomerang, recorded near the band's home base without a strong outside producer, suffers from inconsistent song quality and an overanxious feeling, no doubt brought on by the band's failure to catch on commercially. (Early pressings of Boomerang included a 12-inch EP, Shoes on Ice, recorded live at the Zion Ice Arena in 1981, offering six of the band's best tunes as proof of their ability to play them in public.)

Parting company with their label, Shoes retired to the studio they had built in Illinois and continued writing and recording. A trio of Murphy, Murphy and Klebe made the next Shoes album, Silhouette, released only in Europe via various licensing arrangements. The sound (incorporating more keyboards and subtler dabs of guitar) is typically exquisite, and the songs—four by each member—are fine examples of the band's seemingly effortless pop suss. A fine, relaxed return that reasserts Shoes' considerable talent.

Reacquiring the rights to their three Elektra albums, Shoes issued Shoes Best, a 22-song non-chronological retrospective of album tracks that includes one live cut from On Ice and one new tune. (P.S. I wrote the liner notes.) Continuing the reissue program, Present Tense and Tongue Twister were joined on a single CD while the entire Shoes on Ice was appended to Boomerang.

Stolen Wishes, the trio's first new album in five years (and the inspiration for an unprecedented bi-coastal tour in mid-'90), has all the hallmarks of Shoes' best work, plus synthesizer dressing on several of the irresistibly catchy tunes. Strident electronic percussion provides a strange contrast to the heavenly harmonies in "Feel the Way That I Do," while mock horns add a handsome texture to the glorious guitar pop of "Let It Go" and imitation strings quietly shade in "Love Does." The introduction of new elements into the group's exceedingly consistent sound is overdue, but Shoes' warm songs would be better served by real instruments rather than obviously fake simulations. Standouts: "Your Devotion," "Inside of You," the Help!

styled "She's Not the Same," the dour "Torn in Two" and "Love Is Like a Bullet," the song previewed on Shoes Best. [i]

SHONEN KNIFE

Burning Farm (Jap. Zero) 1983 (K) 1985
Yama No Attchan (Jap. Zero) 1984
Pretty Little Baka Guy (Jap. Zero) 1986
Shonen Knife (Gasatanka-Giant) 1990 •
Pretty Little Baka Guy + Live in Japan (Gasatanka-Rockville) 1990 •

VARIOUS ARTISTS

Every Band Has a Shonen Knife Who Loves Them (Gasatanka-Giant) 1989 •

It is tempting—though not quite accurate—to call this female trio the Japanese Shaggs. While every bit as winsomely adorable and unaffectedly strange as the Wiggins sisters, Shonen Knife brings more competence to their instruments (i.e., they get by, if barely) and a very real appreciation and grasp for goofy pop song structure (as opposed to the accidental unorthodoxy that endeared the Shaggs to Ornette Coleman fans). Finally, the Knife revels in modern Japanese obsessions with commercial/pop culture and cuteness (inclinations that allow adult women to carry Hello Kitty lunch boxes to work and while away time in discos playing rock/scissors/paper). Knife song titles include "Ice Cream City," "Flying Jelly Attack" and "Tortoise Brand Pot Scrubbing Cleaner's Theme" (a would-be jingle).

Heard by Western ears, the observations and credos uttered by guitarist Naoko Yamano and bassist Michie Nakatani (the group is rounded out by Naoko's sister Atsuko on drums) are alternately amusing and disturbing: "I like public baths" is a scream, but "I wanna be/Twist Barbie" says perhaps more than they intend to about the way Japanese women are conditioned to see themselves. The trio's songs are all ridiculously catchy (and vice versa), betraying the dual influences of the Ramones and the Beatles; almost all of them, collected from Japanese EPs and LPs, are contained on the two Gasatanka albums. (The American issue of Pretty Little Baka Guy contains a five-song 1990 concert performance; the CD and cassette replace three vinyl tracks with live efforts from 1982.) K's cassette-only edition of Burning Farm adds three songs from a Japanese compilation.

Spearheaded by the lads in Redd Kross (who have involved the Knife in Tater Totz projects and have a song entitled "Shonen Knife" on Third Eye), the trio has gained huge cult status in Los Angeles (a 1990 gig there was a major hip-scene event), prompting a local label to assemble a tribute album (Every Band Has a Shonen Knife Who Loves Them), wherein many of the band's more memorable themes are given a full-blown treatment that makes you appreciate their innocent ingenuity all the more. Christmas' brilliant cover of "Ice Cream City" is better than any of the band's recent original output, Sonic Youth's version of "Burning Farm" is sexy sinister, and there's much, much more. The single-album, double-album and CD versions all annoyingly delete and/or add tracks; you'll have to locate the double-vinyl edition to hear this book's editor (as a member of Pippi Eats Cherries) play guitar on "One Day at the Factory." [gk]

SHOP ASSISTANTS

Shop Assistants EP (nr/Subway Organisation) 1985
Safety Net EP (nr/53rd & 3rd) 1986
Shop Assistants (nr/Blue Guitar-Chrysalis) 1986
Here It Comes EP (nr/Avalanche) 1990
Big E Power EP (nr/Avalanche) 1990 •

MOTORCYCLE BOY

Trying to Be Kind EP (nr/Blue Guitar-Chrysalis) 1989
Scarlet (nr/Blue Guitar-Chrysalis) 1989 •

Along with the Jesus and Mary Chain, Edinburgh's Shop Assistants are part of a trend away from the terribly twee pop coming out of Scotland in the early '80s. Four lasses and a lad (including two drummers), the Shop Assistants are raw, catchy and utterly without pretense. Their first two EPs combine some of J&M's white-noise pop with Buzzcocks-influenced buoyancy, and—when necessary—tuneful delicacy (see Safety Net's "Somewhere in China") The four-song debut is promising; Safety Net is nothing short of brilliant.

The band's first album reprises two songs from each of the preceding releases; while it's by no means a bad record, there aren't any ideas on it that weren't already covered on the EPs. Shop Assistants is good, straightforward, tuneful rock'n'roll (and a real good party album), but too many of the tracks blend into one another.

In 1987, lead singer Alex (a woman) split to form the extremely similar Motorcycle Boy (not to be confused with the American band of the same name).

The Shop Assistants reconvened in 1989 as a four piece, but not without playing some musical chairs. Former bassist Sarah took over lead vocals, one drummer left, one took over bass duties and another arrived, leaving only guitarist David staying put (still no surnames). Despite all the changes, Here It Comes's title track pretty much picks up where the band left off, although without the old feedback blur. A cover of Half Japanese's "Too Much Adrenalin" is great retro raunch, as is the concluding "Look Out." Big E Power (these Ecstasy references are getting out of hand) is more tuneful, even if the airy-voiced Sarah sounds almost intimidated in her starring role. The title song is included twice, once as a bootleg-quality live "big flares mix" recorded in Manchester; the atonal jam would do the Velvets proud. A cover of the Beatles' "She Said She Said" is, strangely enough, not credited as such. The Shop Assistants won't change anyone's life, but it's nice to have them back. [dgs]

SHRAPNEL

Shrapnel EP (Elektra) 1984

One of the lesser lights of New York's new wave club scene, Shrapnel was a young quintet of pop-conscious metal-heads who began playing out around 1977 and clung on long enough to make this five-song 12-inch, distinguished mainly for an entertaining cover of Gary Glitter's "Didn't Know I Loved You" (Till I Saw You Rock-n-Roll) and a pair of tracks nicely produced by sometime Psychedelic Fur Vince Ely. The most notable thing about Shrapnel, however, was the subsequent career of guitarist Daniel Rey as a producer and player with the Ramones, Manitoba's Wild Kingdom and Masters of Reality. [i]

SHRIEKBACK

Tench EP (Y America) 1982
Care (Warner Bros.) 1983
Jam Science (nr/Arista) 1984
Knowledge, Power, Truth and Sex EP (Ger. Arista) 1984
The Best of Shriekback: The Infinite (nr/Kaz) 1985 •
Oil and Gold (Island) 1985 •
Big Night Music (Island) 1986 •
The Best of Shriekback Volume Two: Evolution (nr/Kaz) 1988 •
Go Bang! (Island) 1988 •
The Peel Sessions EP (nr/Strange Fruit) 1988
The Dancing Years (Island) 1990 ◊

CARL MARSH

Too Much Fun (nr/Polydor) 1989 •

Barry Andrews was a founder of XTC and later the organist in Robert Fripp's League of Gentlemen. David Allen was coincidentally replaced in Gang of Four by League bassist Sara Lee. Together with guitarist/vocalist Carl Marsh and a drum machine, Andrews and Allen formed Shriekback, a cagey dance band with solid rhythms and insidiously weird vocals. The playing is top-notch, a slithering swamp snake that oozes cool malevolence on Tench's six tracks. Shriekback abounds in originality and creativity, if not warmth. Despite changes in personnel, Andrews has remained the band's core, preserving its spirit of prickly iconoclasm and imaginative exploration.

Care is an intelligent, well-produced, spirited debut, demonstrating what every XTC fan knew all along—Andrews is one of rock's most original and musical keyboard players. Over Allen's slinky, oblique bass lines, he provides subtle shadings and clever doodles that move in and out of the mix, making this perfect for both dancing and scrutiny. Most bands with this much talent would be content to showcase their chops, but Shriekback can write a good song, too, especially the haunting "Lined Up," a unique funk concoction that sets an impossible standard for inferior but like-minded bands.

Jam Science doesn't quite match Care for sheer invention, but is nonetheless a solid, confident LP. More prominent use of drum machines, female backing vocals and string synths give the record a slick Euro-disco feel. (Released by UK Arista, this LP should not be confused with an unauthorized release of the same name on Dutch Y, which contains most of the same songs but in unfinished form. The German EP, with four of the proper album's tracks, is legit.)

Oil and Gold goes for a much harder sound, with booming, sometimes overpowering guitar and drums (most evident on "Nemesis," a big club hit and the only pop song ever to make good lyrical use of the word "parthenogenesis") When they lean toward the more ethereal colors found on Care, the results are pretty boring ("This Big Hush," "Faded Flowers"). After the LP was released, Marsh left the group, and was replaced, for one American tour, by former Voidoid guitarist Ivan Julian.

The garrulous liner notes on the next album explain it in some detail. "Shriekback celebrate the blessed dark—the place where they were always most at home. Songs to sing in your sleep . . . the shape and rhythm of two different kind of nights—nights of heat and weirdness . . . and nights incandescent with moonlight and dreams. Big Night Music is entirely free of digital heartbeats of every kind." Except for a few familiar-sounding entries, this radical departure resembles nothing in the Shriekback's previous repertoire and thus requires a real commitment to get over the shock of hearing evanescent continental delicacy and understated piano music instead of pounding dance-rock bizarritude. But do it—your efforts will be well rewarded with beauty, grace and originality. After the album, Dave Allen left to form King Swamp, making Andrews the only remaining original member.

The Infinite, the first of two British compilations, offers a solid introduction to the band's early period, excerpting Tench and Care, plus some other things. Evolution, the second volume, is more eclectic, containing tracks from Oil and Gold, Jam Science, 12-inch versions of three singles and another song from Care.

With guest star Doug Wimbish (Tackhead, etc.) playing a lot of the bass, Andrews and stalwart drummer Martyn Barker—joined by guitarist Mike Cozzi, who first appeared on Big Night Music, and two backup singers—returned to musical daylight on Go Bang!, a winning LP produced by Richard James Burgess. While the ominous undercurrent in Andrews' voice remains one of the band's best features, the kinetic arrangements (including electronic horns) are almost playful, largely picking up where Oil and Gold left off.

Shriekback disbanded in mid-1989. Martyn Barker followed Allen into King Swamp, Cozzi joined the Andrew Ridgeley Band and Andrews formed Illuminati. The final release from Shriekback—The Dancing Years—is a start-to-finish career retrospective that contains the songs you'd expect, but not in overly familiar form. Other than one new song ("White Out"), the album consists of four re-recordings (including a radically revamped "My Spine (Is the Bass Line)" and "Deeply Lined Up," which has a little something, but not much, to do with "Lined Up"), two live renditions (four on the CD) and three remixes, leaving only "Everything That Rises (Must Converge)" and "Shark Walk" untouched from their original album versions. More an intriguing coda than a convenient summary, The Dancing Years bids farewell on a typically offbeat and atmospherically entrancing note. [i/dgs]

See also Robert Fripp, Gang of Four, King Swamp, XTC.

JANE SIBERRY

Jane Siberry (Can. Street) 1981 (East Side Digital) 1991 •

No Borders Here (Open Air) 1983 •

The Speckless Sky (Duke Street-Open Air) 1985 (Duke Street-Warner Bros.) 1988 •

The Walking (Duke Street-Reprise) 1987 •

Bound by the Beauty (Duke Street-Reprise) 1989 •

This thrush-voiced Canadian has inspired comparisons with female artistes as diverse as Kate Bush, the Roches and Laurie Anderson, but Siberry is a refreshing original, combining the best aspects of singer-songwriterism and art-pop to produce music that's both artful and fun. Her eponymous debut album (reissued a decade later with upgraded packaging) finds the artist's playful humanist worldview and predilection for inventive, wide-ranging arrangements already firmly in place on smartly observed material that's by turns humorous ("Marco Polo") and darkly atmospheric ("The Strange Well"), with quietly effective arrangements that focus firmly on Siberry's delicate, yet sturdy, vocals.

On the more elaborate No Borders Here, her witty, literate compositions are well-served by imaginative, near-cinematic arrangements and production, most notably on the brilliant mini-opera "Mimi on the Beach." The subsequent Speckless Sky is even better, with impressive numbers like "One More Colour," "Vladimir, Vladimir" and "Map of the World (Part II)" effectively blending the epic and the intimate.

The Walking is airier and more abstract, with fewer obvious melodies and lyrical hooks, but it's a quietly rewarding album that shows growth and new confidence (e.g., "The White Tent the Raft," "Lena Is a White Table"). In contrast, Bound by the Beauty is relatively earthy and direct. The title song, "Everything Reminds Me of My Dog" and "The Life Is the Red Wagon" are among Siberry's friendliest and most inviting efforts to date, while "Half Angel Half Eagle" and "La Jalouse" hint at darker emotional territory. [hd]

SICK OF IT ALL

Blood, Sweat, and No Tears (In-Effect) 1989 •
We Stand Alone EP (In-Effect) 1991

Without bringing anything new to the form, this dynamic New York hardcore quartet rips through familiar fast/mosh/shout/chant maneuvers with explosive power and remarkable tightness on the clearly articulated debut. Other than a guest introduction by KRS-One, there are no surprises in the no-nonsense thrash of angry songs like "World Full of Hate," "Disillusion," "Pushed too Far" and "My Revenge."

Returning with a new rhythm section, guitarist Pete Koller and his singer brother Lou introduced their 'core rhythms to a buzzing metallic environment on the studio side of the brief We Stand Alone mini-album. Besides covering Minor Threat's "Betray," speaking out against senseless violence ("What's Goin' On") and defiantly standing up to false friends ("We Stand Alone"), the band fills out the 7-inch record (and tape) with savage live performances of four songs from the first LP. [i]

FRANK SIDEBOTTOM

Frank's Firm Favorites EP (nr/Regal Zonophone) 1985
Oh Blimey It's Christmas EP (nr/Regal Zonophone) 1985
Sci-Fi EP (Oh Supermum) EP (nr/Regal Zonophone) 1986
Christmas Is Really Fantastic EP (nr/In Tape) 1986
Frank Sidebottom Salutes the Magic of Freddie Mercury and Queen and also Kylie Minogue (you know, ... her off "Neighbours") (nr/In Tape) 1987 + 1988
Timperley EP (nr/In Tape) 1987
5:9:88 (nr/In Tape) 1988
13:9:88 (nr/In Tape) 1989
Medium Play (nr/In Tape) 1990

At first glance, Frank Sidebottom is just an idiotic soccer fan from Timperley (a town just outside Manchester) who performs inanely nasal renditions of popular songs—accompanying himself in various musical modes, from rock to acoustic piano to a rinkydink synthesizer approximation of '20s ragtime—while wearing an enormous painted papier-mâché head. But what Chris Sievey (former leader of the equally prolific punk-era Freshies) has done as Frank Sidebottom is so completely over the top, so singlemindedly weird, funny and charming that one has to marvel at the wit and intensity with which he pursues his bewildering career. As British as a sixpence and as mad as a hatter, this tireless and hilarious character offers the world (or at least the hardy members of his fan club) a much-needed blast of self-indulgent fun. And unlike so many rude, crude and lewd performers, he always remembers to say "Thank you" at the end of each song.

After outlining the parameters of his parodic career with three self-released EPs that include, respectively, covers (of the Sex Pistols, Police, Queen, etc.), holiday originals (like "Christmas in Australia") and space-themed oddities (including the Bonzo Dog Band's "Urban Spaceman" as well as the "Fireball X15 Theme"), Frank hooked up with In Tape and delivered Christmas Is Really Fantastic. Besides the inspirational title track, the EP (in its expanded 12-inch form) includes a medley of seasonals, an absurd oompah version of Roy Wood's "I Would It Could Be Christmas Everyday" and "Mull of Timperley," which allows Frank to advance his own geocentric worldview and twig Paul McCartney at the same time. Troublesome puppet sidekick Little Frank even gets a turn, closing the record with the punk-rocking "Football Is Really Fantastic."

Pictured on the cover of The Magic of Freddie Mercury and Queen (a 1987 7-inch expanded to foot-long form with extra tracks the following year) with a mustache and detached mic stand, surrounded by a constellation of Kylie Minogue faces clipped from newspapers, Frank croons "I Should Be So Lucky" and reads "Love Poem for Kylie" ("Oh Kylie Kylie Kylie, as a person you are ace/Oh Minogue Minogue Minogue, let's run away to space/I'll build a dream house next to yours, with Australian cheap labor/And you can be the girl next door, and I can be your neighbor"). The rest of the record consists of goofy Queen covers and adaptations, including "We Will Rock You," "Frank Gordon," "I Am the Champion" and "Everybody Sings Queen," which strings together the band's song titles. Fantastic.

Timperley is a conceptual tour de farce, a delicately delicious romp through the Kinks ("Timperley Sunset," with all-new regional lyrics), Bruce Springsteen ("Born in Timperley," which helps explain the town's fantasticalness: it has two post boxes!), the Troggs ("J'Taime Wild Thing in Timperley") and—for all of 27 seconds—the Monkees ("Next Train to Timperley"). As usual, Frank and Little Frank squabble about this and that between tracks.

The original concept behind 5:9:88 and 13:9:88 was to make and release the two albums a week apart, but that's not exactly how things worked out. The first, a double-LP (and somewhat revised cassette), did appear on schedule in September 1988: nearly two hours of music and chat (the two Franks engage in a lot of the latter; "The Tomb of Maurice Karmen" is sort of a homemade radio play, an echoey little excursion ("The Tomb of Maurice Kamen") which yields such useful information as the ancient Egyptian derivation of the word "formica") that runs the top-to-bottom gamut from '60s nostalgia ("It Was Nearly 20 Years Ago Today"), a jolly sea chantey ("Fantastic Sea Shanty") and the incisively Floydian "First Puppet on the Moon" to some total time-wasters.

The second half of Frank's week didn't go so well; his follow-up extravaganza ran into legal difficulties regarding Little Frank's Christmas parody of the Beastie Boys' "Fight for Your Right" and wasn't issued until the following April. Presented as a holiday trip (by train, of course), 13:9:88 begins on a merry note with the singalong "Blackpool Fool." But it quickly develops, however, that Frank has neither enough songs for an album (a problem Little Frank repeatedly mentions, much to big Frank's vexation and depression) nor a train ticket. Although Frank does make it to Blackpool, he really doesn't really have any songs, and this winds up being a largely non-musical vacation of radio-play nonsense that ends on a classical note with "18:22:88 Overture."

The 10-inch/ten-song Medium Play has no overriding concept, but this more-wonderful-than-not hodgepodge includes really fantastic interpretations of songs by Elvis Presley and the Beach Boys, Little Frank's "Tummy" rock opera and a sketchy guest rendition (on guitar and sloperatic tenor) of Duran Duran's "Planet Earth" by some dolt who belches at the end. Alongside a spiffy upending of "Twist 'n' Shout," MP's highlight is "Timperley Blues" (apologies to Eddie Cochran), which contains the following profound exchange between the artist and his sidekick (prompted by Little Frank's having fetched a pizza instead of the visa Frank wanted): "You stupid, stupid, stupid, stupid puppet." "I'd like to help you Frank, but I'm cardboard." If that makes you smile, Frank Sidebottom's your man. [i]

DAVITT SIGERSON

See Royal Macadamians.

SIGUE SIGUE SPUTNIK

Flaunt It (Manhattan) 1986 •

Dress for Excess (nr/Parlophone) 1988 (EMI) 1989 •

The First Generation (nr/Jungle) 1990 [tape] (ROIR) 1991 •

In this cynical and suspicious era, criminals—including politicians, preachers, murderers and swindlers of all persuasions—have found it easy to get away with the most outrageous transgressions by being upfront about their sins. Nothing succeeds these days like the profession of sincerity: most people, it seems, prefer a known felon to a possible liar. No matter how indefensible one's actions may be, a confident pre-emptive announcement or tearful apology evidently wipes away all evil.

Spurred no doubt by former Generation X bandmate Billy Idol's solo stardom (and possibly the successful no-music-necessary starmaking machinery of Frankie Goes to Hollywood), bassist/producer Tony James formed this colorful and sweeping multi-media hype as a post-everything adaptation of Malcolm McLaren's great rock'n'roll swindle. But instead of trying to manipulate the record industry and music-consuming public with cagey behind-the-scenes machinations, Sigue Sigue Sputnik confronted the challenge with total frankness, blithely acknowledging the naked crassness of their intentions. The sextet proved exceedingly adept at outrageous style-mongering, attracting press coverage (much of it highly unfavorable), self-marketing and favorable deal-making. Creating and selling records, however, was another matter.

Prior to the release of Flaunt It, SSS debuted with a three-version 12-inch of "Love Missile F1-11"—a ticking bass sequencer with a simple vocal, shards of guitar and piles of unpredictable sound effects, goosed with wild production tricks into a mixed trashcan of trivia that's amusing enough but bears only the scantiest relationship to music. The album, also produced by Giorgio Moroder, proffers another version of "Love Missile," following it with an utterly useless program of near-identical assemblages and other likeminded tripe that attempts to replicate the T. Rex glam-pop atmosphere with meaningless slogans and ultra-simple hooks. (Besides the obvious Bolanisms, SSS tangentially acknowledges a massive debt to Suicide with occasional cries of "Rocket USA," not-so-cleverly disguised as "Rock It Miss USA.") Despite spectacular Japanese-styled art and the distinction of being the first rock record to contain paid audio advertisements, Flaunt It doesn't go it.

The notation "This time it's music" on the front cover of Dress for Excess is almost touching, but hardly supported by the repetitive trivia contained in the grooves. Dispensing with sponsorship and toning down the samples (except on "Hey Jayne Mansfield Superstar!," which has to be a first LP outtake, "Super Crook Blues" and the armageddon fantasy, "M*A*D"), Sigue Sigue roots around its songwriting closet in search of something worthwhile to dress up, but what gets simple '50s-by-way-of-guitars-n'synths treatment here is totally worthless and forgettable. (There isn't even an attempt at originality in "Rio Rocks!," which puts cribbed lyrics to "La Bamba.")

The utterly redundant First Generation retrieves the complete Flaunt It 4-track demos (essentially the same LP, with wicked amounts of echo and none of the sonic window dressing, plus "Jayne Mansfield") and sticks on three 1990 recordings and a limp live rendition of "Rebel Rebel." At that point, neck-deep in a rising sewer, James went off and joined the Sisters of Mercy.

See also Generation X, Sisters of Mercy. [i]

SILENCERS

A Letter from St. Paul (RCA) 1987 •

A Blues for Buddha (nr/RCA) 1988 (RCA) 1989 •

Dance to the Holy Man (RCA) 1991 •

You can't keep a good Scot out of the recording studio. After his commercially frustrating experience with Fingerprinz, Jimmie O'Neill reunited with guitarist Cha Burns, formed the Silencers and went further—commercially—than his old group ever did. Not that this band purveys pop pastry: A Letter from St. Paul addresses neuroses both personal and political, set to churning guitar-based rhythms. The music's hypnotic, the lyrics compelling. "We decided we wanted to write only about serious subjects without sounding anxious," O'Neill said. Without sounding derivative of U2, the Silencers appeal to the same psychological demographic—only minus the naïveté.

The single "Painted Moon" did much to boost the Silencers' debut album. Unfortunately, history didn't speak with the succeeding A Blues for Buddha. When an album's most commercial track—pushed briefly as a single—is called "Razor Blades of Love," you're not exactly thinking multi-platinum. Despite the band's sparkling sound, O'Neill's voice and lyrics convey an unrelieved sense of doom. Apocalyptic imagery abounds, and the album winds down until left with an acoustic guitar and a drum. The music is less carefully composed than before—second-album syndrome? But the pervasive gloom is what makes A Blues for Buddha so enervating. [si]

See also Fingerprintz.

SILENT RUNNING

Emotional Warfare (EMI America) 1984

Walk on Fire (Atlantic) 1987 •

Deep (Atlantic) 1989 •

If Belfast bands are generally esteemed for their passionate intensity, someone forgot to tell Silent Running. Emotional Warfare (released abroad as Shades of Liberty) contains slick humdrum dance-rock with only Peter Gamble's Bonoesque bellow to suggest—if not generate—any enthusiasm. The pounding "Emotional Warfare" is as good as it gets, and that's not very. The eager-for-airplay Walk on Fire reduces Silent Running to a quartet (the keyboardist left) and comes on like a dull hybrid of the Fixx and Bad Company.

Recorded by a drummerless trio, Deep is the best of a sorry bunch. The first two tracks on each side are invigorating blasts of determined and confident-sounding U2-conscious 4/4 guitar rock, but elsewhere the record runs aground on Bryan Adams' soundalikes and metalhead power ballads. [i]

SILICON TEENS

Music for Parties (Sire) 1980

Whether people realize it or not, Daniel Miller has probably been as responsible as anybody (save Robert Moog) for the rise of synthesizers in modern rock, via his Mute Records, a groundbreaking single (as the Normal) and production work for Depeche Mode and many others. The illusory Silicon Teens (despite the personnel list on the sleeve) is a pseudonymous Miller studio project, offering fourteen percolating synth versions (with vocals) of such rock'n'roll classics as "Memphis, Tennessee," "Judy in Disguise," "You Really Got Me"—you get the idea. There are several originals as well, but the title says it best: a good time is guaranteed for all. The approach here is more conservative and reverent than the prior more devolutionary Flying Lizards, but the two concepts are not that far apart. [i]

SILOS

About Her Steps. (Record Collect) 1985 •

Cuba (Record Collect) 1987 •

Tennessee Fire EP (Record Collect) 1987

The Silos (RCA) 1990 •

WALTER SALAS-HUMARA

Lagartija (Record Collect) 1988 •

This New York combo's style is basically an idiosyncratic urban-bohemian variation on country-rock, with sly melodies, deceptively simple lyrics and the attractively laconic vocals of up-from-Florida frontmen Walter Salas-Humara (founder of the Vulgar Boatmen) and Bob Rupe (formerly one of the Bobs, who released a pair of neat records on Safety Net). The eight short songs that comprise About Her Steps have a laid-back charm, with the jangly "Shine It Down," the steel-guitar-drenched "4 Wanted Signs" and the slow, haunting "Start the Clock" standing out.

Cuba forges a more distinctive band personality on tracks as diverse as the incendiary "Tennessee Fire," the poignant "She Lives Up the Street," the jauntily hippieish "Mary's Getting Married" and the regretful, acoustic "Going Round." This last song makes good use of a string quartet; the rest of Cuba finds Mary Rowell's violin emerging as an integral element in the Silos' sound. The Tennessee Fire 12-inch contains the album versions of the title track and "Start the Clock," plus two previously unreleased and unremarkable numbers.

Salas-Humara's well-crafted and appealing solo album (which doesn't sound very different from the group's work), Lagartija, has contributions from Rupe and includes "About Her Steps" and "Cuba," neither of which (despite their familiar titles) have been released by the Silos. (The CD adds two songs.)

The Silos' major-label debut doesn't deviate substantially from the group's indie efforts, maintaining the earlier discs' live-in-the-studio feel and confidently unflashy instrumental attack. Rather than exploit their natural accessibility to maximize their commercial potential, Rupe and Salas-Humara seem to be taking pains to maintain the songs' scaled-down ramshackle charm, avoiding obvious hooks or gimmicks. The pair gives equal play to rockers ("Caroline," "I'm Over You," "Don't Talk That Way") and quieter tunes ("Commodore Peter," "The Only Story I Tell," "Picture of Helen"), and make like a sleepy Sam & Dave on the horn-laden "Maybe Everything." [hd]

See also Bobs, Vulgar Boatmen.

JIMMY SILVA

See Young Fresh Fellows.

SILVER CHALICE

See 45 Grave.

SIMON F

Gun (Chrysalis) 1986

Never Never Land (Reprise) 1987 •

F MACHINE

Here Comes the 21st Century (Reprise) 1989 •

Singing keyboardist Simon F was half of a mid-'80s British flop-in-the-pan called Intaferon; ex-partner Simon G is one of the guitarists on his first solo album. Gun takes its best shot right at the start, leading off with a histrionic version of the Hoodoo Gurus' indestructible "I Want You Back" complete with a blinding Steve Stevens solo, and heads downhill from there. Despite an annoying synthesizer squeal, the mock-Bowie pop of "Baby Pain" isn't bad; everything else on this half-baked, unoriginal synth-dance LP is.

Never Never Land begins with "New York Girl," which blends ticking sequencers, surging guitar chords and a wall of backing vocals: the resemblance to Billy Idol's early records is unmistakable. But so is the marked difference in vocalists. Elsewhere, Simon fails to lay a glove on funk, botches the Beach Boy allusion on "American Dream," makes assorted absurd lyrical assertions and generally bores his way through two sides of an insipid attempt to squeeze talent out of recording studio walls.

Corralling a guitarist, drummer and keyboard player, F formed F Machine and set about imitating his Idol in earnest. On Here Comes the 21st Century (the cover of which charmingly pictures a dozen infamous murderers, from Hitler to David "Son of Sam" Berkowitz: is there a rock'n'roll message here?) he assembles an overproduced collection of riffs learned from Rebel Yell, this asshole nonchalantly endorses rape and drug abuse, complains about "Too Many White People" ("Gonna get a gun, gonna kill me some/Won't that be a lot of fun") and sings lines like "I want to raise my fist/To my sexy terrorist/Escape from Czechoslovakia/Make love in the back of her daddy's car" as if such wanton stupidity actually means something. [i]

SIMPLE MINDS

- Life in a Day (PVC) 1979 (Virgin) 1987 ●
Real to Real Cacophony (nr/Arista) 1980 (nr/Virgin) 1982 (Virgin) 1988 ●
Empires and Dance (nr/Arista) 1980 (nr/Virgin) 1982 ●
Sons and Fascination/Sister Feelings Call (nr/Virgin) 1981 ●
Celebration (nr/Arista) 1982 (nr/Virgin) 1982 ●
Themes for Great Cities (Stiff) 1982
New Gold Dream (81-82-83-84) (Virgin-A&M) 1982 ●
Sparkle in the Rain (Virgin-A&M) 1984 ●
Once Upon a Time (Virgin-A&M) 1985 ●
Sister Feelings Call (Virgin) 1987
Live in the City of Light (Virgin-A&M) 1987 ●
Street Fighting Years (Virgin-A&M) 1989 ●
Themes Vol. 1: March 79–April 82 [CD] (nr/Virgin) 1990 ●
Themes Vol. 2: August 82–April 85 [CD] (nr/Virgin) 1990 ●
Themes Vol. 3: September 85–June 87 [CD] (nr/Virgin) 1990 ●
Themes Vol. 4: February 89–May 90 [CD] (nr/Virgin) 1990 ●
Real Life (Virgin-A&M) 1991 ◊

Scotland's Simple Minds once took a lot of (mostly) undeserved criticism for being arty and pretentious, but in the early days, their mix of serious/philosophical lyrics with danceable rhythms supporting oblique musical structures did make them something of an acquired taste. Often dense, occasionally discordant and gloomy, Simple Minds' music also stretches to commercial pop, an area they pursued with increasing enthusiasm and success in the '80s.

Life in a Day largely recalls Roxy Music, but also touches lightly on several forms, including pop, psychedelia and an adventurous tense/terse style they explored on subsequent albums. "Sad Affair" is modish; "All for You" has disturbing overtones of the Doors and early Jefferson Airplane; "No Cure" sounds like the Buzzcocks-meet-the-Who; "Chelsea Girl" is delightful '60s pop, complete with full orchestration.

With Real to Real Cacophony, the band lives up (or down) to the album's clever title. Excepting a couple of standouts like "Carnival (Shelter in a Suitcase)" and the haunting instrumental "Film Theme" (Simple Minds are one of the few bands that can and do create worthwhile instrumentals with real skill), Real to Real Cacophony is just like the band in the title song: "Real to real cacophony/Echo, echo on endlessly."

As soon as the needle sets down on Empires and Dance's "I Travel," it's obvious that Simple Minds have reorganized and changed direction; while not completely successful, the album is extremely atmospheric and promising, including some good dance tunes and a few more quasi-psychedelic ones ("Kant-Kino" and "Room"). Celebration is a compilation of tracks from the first three LPs.

Two discrete albums originally released as one packaged work, then reissued separately (the latter several times), Sons and Fascination/Sister Feelings Call is Simple Minds' first really good record. While still experimental, the group sounds more comfortable in the semi-funky, semi-dancey, semi-electronic groove introduced on Empires and Dance. "The American," "20th Century Promised Land" and "Love Song" are all top-drawer examples of modern dance music; "Theme for Great Cities" is another fine instrumental.

Picking up its title from that composition, Themes for Great Cities (subtitled "Definitive Collection 79–81") takes the best material from albums not then released in America—Real to Real Cacophony, Empires and Dance and Sons and Fascination/Sister Feelings Call—and presents the band much more strongly than the individual records originally did. (One notable omission: "20th Century Promised Land.")

Opening the band's commercially rewarding phase, New Gold Dream (81-82-83-84) takes another great step forward. The songs are stronger and the sound shows a definite thawing, mellowing trend, yet retains its majestic power. "Promised You a Miracle" (a soulful and dramatic dance tune), "Glittering Prize" (a warm, pretty ballad) and the panoramic title track stand out. A memorable, mature record marked by compassion and sensitivity. Drummer Brian McGee had departed, and was replaced on the LP by three different players, one of whom—Mel Gaynor—wound up joining the band.

Working with producer Steve Lillywhite, Sparkle in the Rain is another fine, affecting record with textured, intricate rhythmic rock and Jim Kerr's personable singing. Simple Minds sound firmly in control of their sound, equally capable of grand gestures and subtle nuance. The first side is great, featuring four of their best songs: "Speed Your Love to Me," "Book of Brilliant Things," "Up on the Catwalk" and "Waterfront." The flipside is less exhilarating, but does include a cover of Lou Reed's "Street Hassle."

At this point, Simple Minds' story gets complicated. Jim Kerr married Chrissie Hynde in 1984. The following year, the band had its first chart-topping hit with

"Don't You (Forget About Me)," done for the soundtrack of The Breakfast Club. Bassist Derek Forbes was replaced by John Giblin. They appeared at Live Aid. Jim and Chrissie had a baby. And Simple Minds sold themselves out on their first post-stardom LP.

Produced by Jimmy Iovine and Bob Clearmountain, Once Upon a Time is appalling, a perversion of the group's sound specifically—and most unpleasantly—geared for American radio. While Kerr still has enough self-respect to not repeat the band's hit with a sound-alike, tracks like "Sanctify Yourself," "Alive and Kicking" and "Oh Jungland" (great title) are surprisingly wretched, transparent stabs at Album Rock Radio that bear only passing resemblance to Simple Minds' prior work. In the passage from arty obscurity to arty success, Simple Minds lost their balance forever.

The sumptuous and sonically excellent live double album was recorded in Paris in 1986, a triumphant celebration of the band's enormous success. Augmented by a backing vocalist, percussionist, violinist and computer programmer, Simple Minds play the recent hits, reaching back before New Gold Dream only once—in a three-song medley on Side Four that runs together "Love Song," Little Steven's "Sun City" and Sly and the Family Stone's "Dance to the Music."

Street Fighting Years reveals Kerr neck-deep in moral righteousness, writing and performing self-important songs about Third World struggles (the title track is in memory of Victor Jara) with much the same messianic bombast as U2, substituting Stung-like pretense for Bonoesque passion. Co-produced by Trevor Horn, the album—which goes so far as to include an utterly redundant seven-and-a-half-minute remake of Peter Gabriel's majestic "Biko," complete with bagpipes—sounds spectacular, a complex wash of rhythms (Manu Katché joins Mel Gaynor in the twin-drummer attack), guitars, keyboards and strings. It's a technical achievement to be sure, but rock music on such an operatic scale isn't exactly entertaining, and the record seems distant and unapproachable. Lou Reed guest-sings on "This Is Your Land"; African percussionists add social credibility. (The CD contains a bonus, "When Spirits Rise.")

Each of the four Themes sets—an ingenious package that folds out to reveal a cross of five CDs—compiles the contents of the band's 12-inch singles from a different era. [ks/i]

See also Propaganda.

SHOXSIE AND THE BANSHIES

- The Scream (Polydor) 1978 (Geffen) 1984 •
- Join Hands (nr/Polydor) 1979 (Geffen) 1984 •
- Kaleidoscope (PVC) 1980 (Geffen) 1984 •
- Juju (PVC) 1981 (Geffen) 1984 •
- Arabian Knights EP (PVC) 1981
- Once Upon a Time/The Singles (PVC) 1981 (Geffen) 1984 •
- A Kiss in the Dreamhouse (nr/Polydor) 1982 (Geffen) 1984 •
- Nocturne (Geffen) 1983 •
- Hyaena (Geffen) 1984 •
- The Thorn EP (nr/Wonderland-Polydor) 1984
- Cities in Dust EP (Geffen) 1985
- Tinderbox (Geffen) 1986 •

- Through the Looking Glass (Geffen) 1987 •
- The Peel Sessions EP (nr/Strange Fruit) 1987 •
- Peepshow (Geffen) 1988 •
- The Peel Sessions EP (nr/Strange Fruit) 1988 •
- The Peel Sessions (Strange Fruit-Dutch East India Trading) 1991 •
- Superstition (Geffen) 1991 •

In 1976, Siouxsie Sioux (née Susan Dallion) and Steve Severin were part of the clique of steady Sex Pistols fans known as the Bromley Contingent. As Siouxsie and the Banshees, the nascent punk rock stars debuted at the 100 Club's legendary 1976 punk festival; aided by future Ant guitarist Marco Pirroni and the unknown Sid Vicious on drums, the motley crew bashed through a lengthy free-form rendition of "The Lord's Prayer," stopping only when they became bored.

From such uncertain beginnings, Siouxsie and the Banshees quickly evolved into a highly popular band, regularly appearing on the British charts despite the group's brooding, abrasive style. The Scream capsulized the first-generation sound of the Banshees: Siouxsie's icy, sometimes tuneless wail swooping over the metal-shard roar of John McKay's guitar and the brutish rhythms of bassist Severin and drummer Kenny Morris. The songs are relentlessly grim, albeit often sardonic (as in "Carcass" and their version of the Beatles' "Helter Skelter"). In a bit of artistic tampering, the American label included the almost upbeat "Hong Kong Garden" (a pre-LP 45 that punched its way into the UK Top 10), beginning the album with an unintended stylistic departure.

The Scream seems positively cheerful in light of its follow-up, Join Hands, a plodding, depressive album notable only for the commission of the band's "Lord's Prayer" butchery to vinyl. Two days into a tour to promote the album, Morris and McKay abruptly walked out; the Banshees drafted guitarist Robert Smith from opening act the Cure and ex-Big in Japan/Slits drummer Budgie and completed their concert schedule. Budgie subsequently signed on as a permanent Banshee and the group proceeded to record Kaleidoscope without a guitarist to call their own. (Guest stars John McGeoch of Magazine and ex-Pistol Steve Jones alternated guitar duties on the LP.) Kaleidoscope marked a bilateral move away from the group's original wall of noise; many of the songs are softer and more melodic (e.g., "Happy House" and the flower-powery "Christine"), and there is an increased use of framing concepts ("Red Light" is built around the whirr-click of a camera auto-winder). After McGeoch signed on permanently, they toured America for the first time.

Finally a full-fledged band again, the Banshees released the strong and satisfying Juju. Siouxsie's voice had developed into a surprisingly subtle instrument, and the technical prowess brought by Budgie and McGeoch brought power and complexity to songs like "Spellbound" and "Arabian Knights."

Also released in 1981, Once Upon a Time assembled all of the band's singles (including the otherwise non-LP "Staircase (Mystery)" and "Israel") on one record. The American Arabian Knights EP reprises the contents of a British 12-inch plus one extra tune.

A Kiss in the Dreamhouse finds the Banshees veering back into the more experimental terrain of Kaleidoscope, letting their jarring, near-pop style pass through some pretty strange permutations (like the deviant neobop of "Cocoon" and the medieval recorder stylings of "Green Fingers.") McGeoch fell ill, sat out the next tour (replaced by Smith) and decided not to rejoin the band.

Nocturne is a two-LP live set recorded (with no overdubs) at a pair of Royal Albert Hall shows in late 1983. Smith is the featured guitarist on a full-course selection from the band's repertoire, stretching back to "Switch," "Helter Skelter" and "Israel," but also drawing heavily from Dreamhouse. Awesome.

With Smith still in the lineup, Hyaena starts off with the utterly magnificent "Dazzle," a haunting blend of industrial-strength drumming and symphonic backing, with some of Siouxsie's best singing ever. The album is much more melodic, light and inviting than any of the band's others, going so far as to touch on an earlier extra-curricular excursion into jazzy stylings ("Take Me Back") and allowing piano to dominate ("Swimming Horses.") The Beatles' "Dear Prudence," a big 1983 hit single for the Banshees, also helps leaven the traditional dark intensity.

Smith was subsequently forced to flee, as being a fulltime member of two major groups had taken its toll on his health. Former Clock DVA guitarist John Carruthers replaced him. Already maintaining a rather low 1985 profile, the Banshees were set back a bit further when Siouxsie broke her kneecap during a show.

At a point where some were ready to write the band off as aging, lazy veterans, they came back in early '86 with Tinderbox, one of their strongest LPs in years. Carruthers fits in well, his rich playing stylistically similar to both Smith's and McGeoch's; the rhythm section is as steady as ever. The big plus is punk's original princess herself—Siouxsie's voice has never been so warm and tuneful as it is on tracks like "The Sweetest Chill," "Cannons" and the great single, "Cities in Dust." (Geffen's 12-inch contains a remix, an edit and two non-LP cuts. The album's British CD adds five extra cuts.)

Through the Looking Glass—an eclectic and uneven but generally entertaining album of covers—works best on the numbers which receive the most radical revamps. Crisp hornwork and a no-nonsense vocal performance focus Iggy's "The Passenger"; orchestral lushness and rock power beautify "This Wheel's on Fire." Kraftwerk's spare "Hall of Mirrors" is converted into an alluring dance drone; "Trust in Me," originally sung by a snake in Disney's Jungle Book, becomes a delirious tropical seduction. But seemingly arbitrary—mostly symbolic—choices of oldies by the Doors, Roxy Music, Sparks, John Cale and Television receive little creative comment and fall flat.

Following the Looking Glass sessions, Carruthers left and was replaced by keyboardist/cellist Martin McCarrick and ex-Specimen guitarist Jon Klein. Although Peepshow begins with an incongruous dive into techie dance music (the jokey "Peek-a-Boo"), most of this finely wrought album confidently presents the band's chilly rock persona in a more familiar setting. The haunting "Carousel" draws quietly from the band's own Kurt Weill songbook; "Turn to Stone" heightens the drama with a mild Latin flavor; "The Killing Jar" suggests Echo and the Bunnymen in more than title. In an amusingly camp turn, "Burn-Up" takes an extremely loose poke at country music, adding a harmonica solo for effect. Overall, the writing could be more durable, but the delicate understatement of Peepshow is reassuring evidence of the group's continued ambition and enthusiasm.

The two Peel Session EPs (later joined as an album and issued in the US on CD and cassette with new artwork as The Peel Sessions) date from November '77 and February '78. Although the later set still finds the group months away from recording its first album, the six songs that later appeared on The Scream (the other two—"Love in a Void" and "Hong Kong Garden"—became singles) receive strong, almost fully developed performances, distinguished by exceptionally good vocals and Kenny Morris' thundering drum anchor.

See also Creatures, Glove.

[mp/i/tr]

SISTER DOUBLE HAPPINESS

See Dicks.

SISTER RAY

Coming to Terms EP (Sad) 1985

Sister Ray Live [tape] (KX4) 1986

Random Violence (Hol. Resonance) 1987

No Way to Express (Resonance) 1989 •

To Spite My Face (Resonance) 1990 •

Except for the name, this crude garage band from Youngstown, Ohio owes little to the Velvet Underground. In fact, Sister Ray doesn't seem nearly self-conscious enough about their proletarian retro-rock to want to shoulder such heavy cultural baggage. On Random Violence, guitarists Mark Hanley and Greg Cadman rip up the floorboards with old-fashioned Midwest moxie while Sam D'Angelo has the right idea (if not the right voice) for sneery, snarly punk. (The album contains four tracks from pre-LP singles, including the four-song 7-inch Coming to Terms.)

Dropping Cadman to become a quartet, Sister Ray fills the self-produced No Way to Express with no-nonsense music and all-nonsense lyrics (like "Beef Pud," "Sex," "I Don't Want Your Sex," "Sick of Skulls," etc.). Whether these guys reckon they're capturing the '60s rebel zeitgeist or just don't know any better, such juvenile expressions of hostility just don't cut it. (The CD includes eight tracks from Random Violence.)

Sam D'Angelo and his bass-playing brother Joe get up to their old lyrical tricks on To Spite My Face, penning obvious putdowns ("Piss Off and Die"), obvious grossouts ("Worms," "Doctor #9") and original songs that use classic titles. (They recycled "A Day in the Life" on No Way to Express; this go-round includes "One Step Beyond" and "20th Century Boy.") While the energetic record has blisteringly loud sound and some stupendous Hanley guitar work, a total lack of style and atmosphere dooms Sister Ray's artless simplicity to sub-generic mediocrity. [1]

SISTERS OF MERCY

Alice EP (Brain Eater) 1982

The Reptile House EP (Brain Eater) 1983

Body and Soul EP (Merciful Release) 1984

First and Last and Always (Elektra) 1985 •

Floodland (Elektra) 1987 •
Dominion EP (nr/Merciful Release) 1988 •
Vision Thing (Merciful Release-Elektra) 1990 •

SISTERHOOD

Gift EP (nr/Merciful Release) 1986 •

GHOST DANCE

River of No Return EP (nr/Karbon) 1986
Heart Full of Soul EP (nr/Karbon) 1986
Stop the World (nr/Chrysalis) 1989 •

The Sisters of Mercy, an originally all-male Leeds group named after an order of cut-the-crap Catholic nuns, began by playing what they jokingly called heavy metal, which it sort of was; an odd (but prescient) feat, considering that the band's "drummer" was Doktor Avalanche, a rhythm generator. Andrew Eldritch has always been the band's focus: chief lyricist, co-producer of virtually every track (briefly at first with Psychedelic Fur John Ashton, then with Dave Allen of Associates/Cure fame), graphics designer and lead singer, in a deep, aptly gothic voice.

Although their pre-LP body of work amounted to several albums' worth of tracks, only two of the songs ultimately turned up on First and Last and Always. As with most of their early work, the 12-inch Alice EP (particularly its excellent title track) suffers from sub-par sound. The sound got better and the group's identity began to come into its own by Reptile House; with the issue of the brilliant "Temple of Love" single, the Sisters extended their reach to include danceable doom-rock.

The first album finally attained the group's long-sought clarity and sophistication and is nearly sublime in its pristine bleakness. (Well, Side One anyway; the flipside ain't too poor, neither.) Somewhat distanced from the original metal idea, incorporation of power-poppish guitars and dancey rhythms does nothing to place the Sisters within either category; their sonic integrity somehow remains intact. Eldritch's vocals—Jim Morrison meets David Bowie, slowed down to half-speed—are as gloriously gloomy as ever.

While advancing an anti-fashionist philosophy, Eldritch had nonetheless cultivated a posture for the band. A live German bootleg gives some indication of where he's coming from: mainly reworkings of oldies, the Sisters draw on the canons of Dolly Parton and Hot Chocolate as well as the Stooges and Stones. Regrettably, the other members of the group became, as Eldritch (only partly tongue-in-cheek) put it, "distorted little creatures with black teeth . . . set on making a career." Guitarist Wayne Hussey (who'd come to the Sisters from an early edition of Dead or Alive) and bassist Craig Adams formed the pose-heavy Mission (UK). Co-founding guitarist Gary Marx went on to form Ghost Dance with ex-Skeletal Family vocalist Anne-Marie.

There was in fact some legal wrangling over the split, making it uncertain who had the legal rights to the band's name. While this was being sorted out, Eldritch cut the Gift EP as the Sisterhood. He doesn't sing on it (presumably also for litigious reasons), but substituted tape collages and speaking by other folks, including Alan Vega. Not too hummable, but effective in conveying some serious concerns, notably the sinister dehumanization inherent in acts of terrorism.

Ex-Legal Weapon/Gun Club bassist Patricia Morrison, who'd guested on Gift, became Eldritch's only fellow Sister (so to speak) when the legal coast was clear. Eldritch had written the material for First and Last and Always half with Hussey and half with Marx; could he equal that alone?

He came through on Floodland as though he'd been writing every song by himself since the beginning. American producer/songwriter Jim Steinman oversaw two key tracks, "This Corrosion" and "Dominion," and that worked out fine too, yielding great Sisterly Grand Guignol rock. The rest is not as theatrical but, overall, it's a richer LP than the first, the tracks more maturely constructed and the lyrics more engrossing, loaded with nuance in the juxtaposition of terse, concrete observations and poetic, abstract feelings. (The CD adds two.) Dominion is an album track, two okay instrumentals and a strong version of Hot Chocolate's "Emma," which the old Sisters used to play onstage.

By Vision Thing, Tony James (ex-Generation X/Sigue Sigue Sputnik) had replaced Morrison on bass; the group had added guitarists Andreas Bruhn (who co-wrote three tracks) and Tim Bricheno (ex-All About Eve, a band with ties to the Mission). The full-bodied guitar sound is further augmented by guest axeman John Perry (ex-Only Ones)—but it's not overkill, it's all for the sake of texture and feel. Eldritch displays increased maturity and control even as he delegates more responsibility: the sound is terrific, the music is track-for-track more consistent than before and the lyrics more evocative. Eldritch's almost overwhelming sourness and dark visions are tempered by a mordant wit that cuts too sharply to dismiss, even when it occasionally sounds clever with a capital C. Varied (a couple of ballads and "More," a "Gimme Shelter"-ish collaboration with Jim Steinman) and visceral, engaging on several levels.

[JG]

See also All About Eve, Gun Club, Legal Weapon, Mission (UK).

SKEETERS

See Fetchin Bones.

SKELETON CREW

Learn to Talk (Riff) 1984 •
The Country of Blinds (Riff) 1986 •

TOM CORA

Live at the Western Front (Ger. Recommended) 1987

Its three-man lineup quickly trimmed to a less-extravagant two, Skeleton Crew regaled audiences in America, Europe and Japan with a unique and functional mix of rhythmically twisted rock, electric and acoustic noise, wittily interpolated taped voice fragments and "fake folk music." Most of the latter had a distinctly East European flavor, though one New York gig consisted entirely of folk music from around the world. Guitarist Fred Frith alternated conventional and homemade guitars, six-string bass, violin and keyboards while occasionally singing in a high-pitched voice. Tom Cora busied himself on cello as well as four-string bass and devices; both worked kickdrums with their feet as their fingers flew. They had enough material for maybe three good albums, but the fine Learn to Talk and Country of Blinds (on which the Crew expanded to include singer/keyboardist/harpist Zeena Parkins) will serve for posterity. Both albums are available on a single CD. [mf]

See also Fred Friih.

SKELETONS

See Morells.

SKIDS

Wide Open EP (nr/Virgin) 1978
Scared to Dance (Virgin Int'l) 1979 (Blue Plate) 1991 •
Days in Europa (nr/Virgin) 1979
The Absolute Game (nr/Virgin) 1980
Joy (nr/Virgin) 1981
Fanfare (nr/Virgin) 1982
Dunfermline [CD] (Virgin) 1987 •

The Skids' rise and fall revolved around Richard Jobson—singer, writer, creative dilettante. Emerging from Scotland as a promising punkish quartet playing literate and challenging rock music with anthemic proclivities, under Jobson's leadership the Skids became more and more pretentious and less and less a band, finally evaporating into the mist after a miserable fourth LP, recorded as a duo. The first three albums, however, offer a precious body of inspiring and unique rock'n'roll with obvious Scottish blood. In hindsight, it's easy to see what role guitarist Stuart Adamson (now a star in his own right with Big Country) played in defining the Skids' sound.

Wide Open, a four-song 12-inch on red vinyl, contains two inspired successes in "The Saints Are Coming" and "Of One Skin," both of which also appear on the similarly excellent Scared to Dance. Using loud guitar and semi-martial drumming for its basis, Jobson's hearty singing sounds like an 18th century general leading his merry troops down from the hills into glorious battle. Two other standouts on the LP ("Into the Valley" and "Hope and Glory") maintain the style but are different enough to keep things exciting. (The US release on Virgin substitutes two tracks and has an altered song order.)

Bill Nelson produced the Skids' (with a new drummer and bassist) second album, Days in Europa, but the match-up proved problematic. In polishing and refining the band's sound even a little, he smoothed off the vital edge. There's less gusto in the grooves, although some songs (like "Working for the Yankee Dollar," "Charade" and "Animation") shine through regardless.

While the lineup remained stable for The Absolute Game, a new producer took over the helm. Mick Glosop did a good job presenting Jobson's widening vision amidst semi-grandiose arrangements, but the blooming Jobson ego had led the band a long way from its early forthrightness. Parts of The Absolute Game are just arty pretense, but the inclusion of substantial, engaging material makes it a reasonable addition to the collection. Strength Through Joy, a bonus album of finished studio outtakes, came with early pressings—interesting, but not essential.

After a few more changes in the lineup, only Jobson and bassist-cum-multi-instrumentalist Russell Webb remained Skids. Joined by an all-star guest cast of ten, they made Joy, a failed concept album about Scotland. To call it bad is curt but realistic.

Fanfare, released after the sinking group finally (mercifully) ceased, is an excellent compilation of singles and album tracks that serves as the perfect introduction to the Skids' magic. Six years later, the Dunfermline CD appeared, reprising Fanfare (though deleting one cut) and adding seven more, only one ("Scared to Dance") of which is truly consequential.

Afterlife: Adamson formed Big Country and furthered the Skids' pan-ethnic experimentation in service of arena metal; Jobson, in between albums of pretentious poesy, formed the Armoury Show and briefly followed his former bandmate back into the rock'n'roll fray. [i]

See also Big Country, Richard Jobson, Zones

SKIN

See Swans.

SKINNY PUPPY

Remission EP (Can. Netwerk) 1984 (Netwerk) 1990 •
Bites (Can. Netwerk) 1985 (Netwerk) 1990 •
Mind: The Perpetual Intercourse (Netwerk-Capitol) 1986 •
Cleanse Fold and Manipulate (Netwerk-Capitol) 1987 •
VIVisectVI (Netwerk-Capitol) 1988 •
Rabies (Netwerk-Capitol) 1989 •
Twelve Inch Anthology (Can. Netwerk) 1990 •
Too Dark Park (Netwerk-Capitol) 1990 •

HILT

Call the Ambulance Before I Hurt Myself (Can. Netwerk) 1989 (Netwerk) 1990 •

TEAR GARDEN

Tired Eyes Slowly Burning (Can. Netwerk) 1987 (Netwerk) 1990 •

One of the most interesting bands to come from north of the border in quite a while, Vancouver's Skinny Puppy was formed by multi-instrumentalist cEVIN Key (that's how he spells it) and singer/lyricist Nivek Ogre (Kevin Ogilvie, who is not related to Puppy producer Dave Ogilvie). They have produced a large body of dark electronic music, drawing on such obvious influences as Cabaret Voltaire, Chrome, Suicide and Throbbing Gristle. Orchestration is predominantly distorted, the vocals are non-melodic and the group makes very creative use of synths and tapes. The only problem is that Skinny Puppy has often worked harder at creating a mood or a sound than writing songs and has, at times, borrowed just a little too freely from favorite bands.

There isn't much evident progress from Bites to Mind: The Perpetual Intercourse; both are filled with mildly gloomy but danceable tracks, virtually indistinguishable (instrumentally and vocally) from early Cabaret Voltaire. Production is a little better (at least the sound is a bit clearer) on Mind. The Bites CD also includes all the cuts from the prior Remission EP.

Having appeared on four Mind tracks, Dwayne Goettel (electronics/sampling) became a fulltime Puppy and helped open up the sound on Cleanse Fold and Manipulate, a finely honed album which, unfortunately, reveals precious few new musical ideas. Likewise, the lyric sheet contains no surprises—just your basic foreboding visions of a skewered world. Skinny Puppy (who are outspoken anti-vivisectionists) may not be quite as evil or demented as they seem to fancy themselves, but Cleanse Fold and Manipulate does show promise.

VIVIsectVI brings SP's views on sociopolitical matters (both human and non-human) to the forefront of their work with more conviction than ever. The cover art consists of overlaid (animal?) X-rays; tracks like "Human Disease (S.K.U.M.M.)," "Testure," "Hospital Waste" and others decry brutality against the planet and all of its inhabitants. "VX Gas Attack" (recorded in 1988) goes after Iraq long before George Bush chose up sides. The sound is bigger (especially the percussion), filled in with robotic bass lines and effective sampling.

The Puppies are joined on Rabies by Ministry/etc.'s Al Jourgensen, who provides guitar, vocal and production assistance. Although he adds some blood and guts with quasi-metal guitar, it's not enough to distinguish the LP from previous efforts. Each track varies in rhythm and tempo but, with the exception of the two shortest cuts, they all have the same feel. Minor keys, electro-beats, distorted, otherworldly voices (from tapes and band members)—so what else is new?

Too Dark Park continues in much the same mode, this time with a dense, bottom-heavy—almost symphonic—sound. The lyrics offer frightful visions of a diseased, decayed planet (apparently that's what the awful, high-school-space-cadet-style cover art is trying to convey, but the lyrics do a much better job). The overall result is pure claustrophobia—no breathing room.

12 Inch Anthology culls the A- and B-sides from four 12-inches released between 1985 and 1989. Most of the ten tracks (including two versions of "Stairs and Flowers") are non-LP, making Anthology important for completists, but it offers nothing out of the ordinary, save for a hint of humor: the old Bugs Bunny cartoon with the evil scientist and the monster is sampled on "Deep Down Trauma Hounds."

The Tear Garden is Key's side project with Edward Ka-Spel of the Legendary Pink Dots. While Ogilvie and Key performed most of the studio chores on Tired Eyes Slowly Burning, the latter co-wrote the material with Ka-Spel, creating an album that is much more sparse, clean and melodic than most Puppy work. Ka-Spel's English-accented vocals (he sounds something like Marc Almond or Syd Barrett) and the two sides' obvious musical differences make this an interesting diversion, and one that Skinny Puppy would do well to pursue further on their own.

Following Jourgensen's lead in side-project overkill, Skinny Puppy is also behind Hilt, which includes Alan Nelson (a '70s punk-rock bandmate of Key's and a longtime Puppy associate). With Key handling production (and members of Caterwaul and the Sons of Freedom making guest appearances), Nelson's thrashy contributions make Call the Ambulance rock out a bit more, but the basic ingredients of Puppydom are pretty much intact. "Baby Fly Away" has a sung (and almost catchy) melody and "Down on Mommys Farm" moves along at a busy, breakneck tempo; there are moments of lighter, warmer production than SP records. Still, Hilt is no major breakaway. (The CD adds five.) [dgs]

SKIN YARD

Skin Yard (C/Z) 1986 •

Hallowed Ground (Toxic Shock) 1988

Fist Sized Chunks (Cruz) 1990 •

1000 Smiling Knuckles (Cruz) 1991 •

JACK ENDINO

Angle of Attack (Bobok) 1990

Stuck between rock and an art place, this Seattle contingent—led by guitarist Jack Endino, whose pivotal role as the Sub Pop scene's leading producer has overshadowed his musical efforts—has borne the bridesmaid's mantle for years as others have taken turns on the city's Next Big Thing pedestal. It's hard to see why: Skin Yard is every bit as powerful (and dopey and ponderous) as anyone tilting the Northwest passage.

Positively glacial in both temperature and speed, the self-titled debut should appeal to fans of, say, Swans or Saint Vitus, but more ambulatory types may have difficulty weathering a side. (Just for laughs, the CD adds five tracks.) Hallowed Ground boasts more structure, and a drummer who can marshal the music along more effectively. Endino's great wall of wail buckles and lurches when pummeled by Daniel House's steamrolling bass. The rough'n'tumble interplay works best on the swirling "In the Blackhouse" and "G.O.D." Elsewhere (and more frustratingly on Fist Sized Chunks), singer Ben McMillan bears an uncanny vocal resemblance to Dick Smothers attempting to imitate Jack Bruce—pristine, but laden with melodrama.

Endino's solo outing is far more compelling, with a wide swath of humor ("Naive Bid for HM Stardom #2"), a good understanding of atmospherics ("Create What You Fear") and, most importantly, a strict avoidance of solo guitar excess. [dss]

NICKY SKOPELITIS

See Material.

SKUNK

Last American Virgin (Twin/Tone) 1989

Once you get past the initial resemblance to Soul Asylum, this guitar-mad young New Jersey quartet's first record reveals an amazingly diverse blend of styles and influences on their way to becoming a clearly defined Skunk sound. "(There'll Be Other Girls) Hoss," for instance, runs a Duane Allman solo into the middle of storming post-punk with uncommon chords and dangerous time shifts. With a range that covers hardcore to sweet balladry, not everything on Last American Virgin works equally well, but it's an enormously impressive and promising debut. [i]

SLAMMIN' WATUSIS

Slammin' Watusis (Epic) 1988 •

Kings of Noise (Epic) 1989 •

And slam they do! When this breathless Midwestern quintet thanks the Damned in the liner notes, they aren't kidding: their rip-snorting platter has the careening, free-for-all edge of those zany punk pioneers. It's buzzy fun with a message: "Won't Sell Out" champions integrity, while "It's Alright to Show You CARE" proves the Watusis aren't blank generation poseurs. Special kudos to Fast Frank Raven's sizzlin' sax.

Despite the title, Kings of Noise flirts with more mainstream approaches, as bluesy rockers ("She's a Rocker"), towering pop epics ("Hush") and gothic pseudo-metal ("Eight Ball") attempt to broaden the group's appeal. Those tracks are good enough, but they don't provide the sheer exhilaration of the gonzo stuff. Happily, "Madness & Mania" and "Everytown" prove the lads can still get nutso when inclined. [jy]

See also Green.

SLAM SLAM

See Style Council.

SLAPP HAPPY

See Peter Dinklage, Henry Cow.

SLAUGHTER & THE DOGS

Do It Dog Style (nr/Decca) 1978 (nr/Damaged Goods) 1989

Live Slaughter Rabid Dogs (nr/Rabid) 1979

Live at the Factory (nr/Thrush) 1981

Rabid Dogs (nr/Receiver) 1989

The Slaughterhouse Tapes (nr/Link) 1989

SLAUGHTER

Bite Back (DJM) 1980

This Manchester punk group's classic "Cranked Up Really High" was the first 45 released by that city's pioneering independent label, Rabid Records; Slaughter and the Dogs regularly gigged at London's famed Roxy Club. (They appear in the punk documentary Don Letts filmed there.) About as talented as others in the second tier of '77 punk (Adverts, Eater, Lurkers, etc.), this lot had enough juice to get through a neat string of poppy punk singles and one fine album.

Do It Dog Style, day-glo cover and all, is exciting, energetic rock'n'roll heavily indebted to the New York Dolls and Damned. Besides the band's singles—"Dame to Blame," "Quick Joey Small" (an incisive bubblegum cover with guest guitar by Mick Ronson) and the pulsating "Where Have All the Boot Boys Gone" (though not "Cranked" or "You're Ready Now")—the album includes de rigueur covers of "I'm Waiting for the Man" (fair) and the Dolls' "Who Are the Mystery Girls" (wonderful), the latter also featuring Ronson. Simple, hooky songwriting plus Wayne Barrett's endearingly zesty vocals helped distinguish the Dogs from lesser genre fare.

The band split, leaving guitarist Mike Rossi, bassist Howard Bates and future Cult axeman Billy Duffy to form the Studio Sweethearts. Slaughter reunited in late '79, replacing Barrett with ex-Nosebleeds shouter Eddie Garrity (aka Ed Banger) in time for Bite Back, a nothing platter of guitar-rock noise produced by ex-Mott the Hoople drummer Dale Griffin. Garrity makes a good try, but he simply isn't as effective as Barrett. The group quit for good in '81.

Live at the Factory (later reissued as Rabid Dogs) is a posthumously released concert disc (with Barrett) that contains renditions of the band's singles and flip-sides, as well as superior early versions of four Bite

Back tunes. Unlike the band, however, the sound quality is quite awful. A later three-song EP, mislabeled "Live in 77," documents the same show's encore: "Cranked Up Really High," "Boot Boys" and the boppy "Twist and Turn."

The Slaughterhouse Tapes is a belated scrapbook of outtakes, demos, live tracks and an interview, with studio versions of "Twist and Turn" and "White Light White Heat" to recommend it. The sound quality is flat and weak, but the music's not. It's reassuring to hear such unpretentious sincerity and hooky tunes from a band that's all but forgotten. [i/gef]

SLAVES

See F-Word.

SLAYER

Show No Mercy (Metal Blade) 1983 •

Hell Awaits (Metal Blade) 1985 •

Live Undead (Metal Blade) 1985 •

Reign in Blood (Def Jam-Geffen) 1986 •

South of Heaven (Def Jam-Geffen) 1988 •

Seasons in the Abyss (Def American) 1990 •

"Bones and blood lie on the ground/Rotten limbs lie dead/Decapitated bodies found/On my wall: your head!" Whether you find these lyrics brilliant, hilarious, moronic, repulsive or genuinely evil (or all of the above) is a nearly foolproof indication of how you'll feel about Slayer. A more hateful breed than homeboys Metallica or Megadeth, Slayer was formed in Orange County, California in 1982 from hardcore and metal roots.

Slayer hadn't ventured far from the garage before making its vinyl debut on Metal Blade's Metal Massacre III (Metallica and Voivod also debuted on the compilation series), and Show No Mercy followed soon after. While rockers from Robert Johnson to Venom had flirted vaguely with the forked one down below, Slayer took the "evil" image to realms of hitherto-unimagined overkill. Musically, the band combined the speed and power of hardcore with ultra-graphic takes on Black Sabbath's lurching riffs and lyrical subject matter. Although the production is hardly pristine, Slayer's first two albums are unquestionably among the most threatening music of their time; in coming years bands would fuse that approach with that of another extremely threatening (if completely different) American band: the Swans. (The Show No Mercy CD adds a three-song 1984 EP, Haunting the Chapel; the Live Undead CD adds several songs but this badly recorded '84 concert document still isn't worth owning.)

The unlikely figure of producer Rick Rubin then entered the picture. Although known at that point only for his pioneering work in rap, Rubin had long been sampling old metal albums, and co-produced Run-DMC's duet with Aerosmith ("Walk This Way"). Applying his lean, less-is-more production technique to Slayer's blistering aural apocalypse, Reign in Blood wields a punch, clarity and sense of doom rivaled only by Sabbath and Metallica's best. Variations on the word "death" appear in the lyrics no less than 56 times, and between "Angel of Death" (a revoltingly graphic song about Joseph Mengele) and "Jesus Saves," the album manages to offend all denominations. ("Angel of Death" 's refrain was sampled to staggering effect on Public Enemy's "She Watch Channel Zero?!", arguably the best-ever fusion of rap and metal.) A surgically precise hit-and-run attack that lasts all of 26 minutes, Reign in Blood is almost universally regarded as the ultimate speedmetal LP.

Slayer's cover of "In-a-Gadda-Da-Vida" on the Less Than Zero soundtrack was an indicator of things to come. Having established a reputation as the fastest and most extreme band in the world, Slayer did the only thing possible: they slowed down. South of Heaven's sound is even leaner, with Dave Lombardo's astonishingly innovative drumming providing an intricate framework for the sharp, angular riffs and piercing leads. Most impressively, this album grooves from end to end, and vocalist/bassist Tom Araya truly comes into his own, lofting haunting melodic refrains as well as his trademark volatile spew. The lyrics confront such real-life topics as mass-murderers, abortion and yet more Nazis. Seasons in the Abyss basically fuses its two predecessors, exploring little new territory and even repeating ideas from older songs. That said, it's still a scorcher.

While Slayer is constantly forced into the same we're-not-advocating-it-we're-just-writing-about-it corner that bedevils gangsta rappers, they continue to fill arenas with many of the same kids who idolize an equally threatening cultural icon: Freddy Krueger. [ja]

SLEEP CHAMBER

Speak in Tongues EP (Inner-X) 1982
 Speak in Tongues [tape] (Inner-X) 1982
 Sleep Chamber (Inner-X) 1984
 Trance [tape] (Inner-X) 1985
 Submit to Desire (Inner-X) 1985
 Best of the Rest [tape] (Inner-X) 1986
 Sexmagick Ritual (Austrian Trinity) 1987
 Babylon EP (Inner-X) 1987
 Spellbondage (Inner-X) 1987
 Sacred And Surreal (Austrian Trinity) 1988
 Sins ov Obsession (Ger. Fünfundvierzig) 1988 •
 Satanic Sanction (It. Musica Maxima Magnetica) 1988 •
 Sharp Spikes & Spurs (Inner-X) 1989
 Stop Being Silly, and Go to Sleep [tape] (Inner-X) 1990
 Sleep, or Forever Hold Your Piece (Inner-X) 1990 •
 Hotpants & Wet Panties EP (Inner-X) 1990
 Sirkle Zero (It. Musica Maxima Magnetica) 1990 ♠

If ever there was a group obsessed with obsessions, Sleep Chamber is it. This Boston outfit (basically the warlockish John ZeWizz aided by constantly shifting personnel) makes ritualistic industrial music that works on both a shock imagery level and on a more intellectual erotic/occult plateau. ZeWizz is mind-bogglingly prolific, having independently unleashed (in the US, Germany, Austria and Italy) over ten albums, several EPs and 45s, almost 20 cassette-only releases (only some of which are listed here) and a batch of long-form videos (many of which correspond to the records) in under a decade.

The heavy S&M content and explicit graphics (Submit to Desire's negative-exposure lesbian scene cover is a classic) have gotten Sleep Chamber banned and/or ignored—which is a shame. Not all that chaotic, the group's unique sound is more trancelike: ZeWizz's ultra-deadpan declarations, minimal electronic pulsebeats, eerie basslines, sparse synth/violin/guitar and occasional samples all serve to induce a heightened mood (sexual or otherwise). The main body of Sleep Chamber's work divides into "song"-oriented albums and dense, mostly instrumental works (Satanic Sanction, Sexmagick Ritual) reminiscent of Nurse with Wound and Current 93.

Released amid a steady stream of cassettes that began in 1982 and continued unabated through 1985, the eponymous 1984 vinyl album is primitive and distant. Submit to Desire is the band's most notorious (and intriguing) record so far, containing the anthemic "Fetish" and "Oral Maze," a tribute to cunnilingus. Spellbondage is very similar and almost as good (the prizes being the unnerving "Kiss the Whip" and another erotic epic, "Odoratus Sexualis"), while the four-song Babylon EP contains the exhilarating synth-pump of "Babes ov Babylon."

Two years in the making, Sleep, or Forever Hold Your Piece beefs up the drum machine and guitar overlays, giving Sleep Chamber a more accessible sound, comparable to Skinny Puppy. A cover of Magazine's "The Light Pours Out of Me" fits smoothly into the record's aesthetic; "A Synthetic Woman" is a remake of a track from Speak in Tongues; "A Better Way" rides on a sample from Led Zep's "Immigrant Song." Nine short fragments, called "Verbum Sapienti," fill in the grooves between each track.

The early Speak in Tongues tape is quite different from the vinyl EP of the same name. Sharp Spikes & Spurs, recorded live in Boston in 1989 (and much longer in its cassette/video form), finds Sleep Chamber exuding songs from the previous albums and the then-unfinished Sleep. Sins ov Obsession is a compilation of odds and ends, including a remix of the band's smart cover of "Warm Leatherette" and three outtakes: two instrumentals and a naughty ditty, "The Mistress." Sacred and Surreal combines three tracks (and an outtake) from Sleep Chamber with a Submit outtake and two 1983 instrumentals. In a gimmick copied from Thrbbing Gristle, Best of the Rest is a limited edition set of twelve otherwise unreleased live tapes packaged in a suitcase. [gef]

SLICKEE BOYS

Hot and Cool EP (Dacoit) 1976
 Separated Vegetables (Dacoit) 1977 (Limp) 1980
 Mersey, Mersey Me EP (Limp) 1978
 Third EP (Limp) 1979
 Here to Stay (Ger. Line) 1982 •
 Cybernetic Dreams of Pi (Twin/Tone) 1983
 Uh Oh ... No Breaks! (Twin/Tone) 1985
 Fashionably Late (Fr. New Rose) 1988 •
 Live at Last (Giant) 1989 •

DATE BAIT

I Split on Your Grave (Fr. New Rose) 1990

Led by guitarists Kim Kane and Marshall Keith, Washington, DC's Slickee Boys have been scene stalwarts for a decade and a half; through a series of lineups they developed from a punky rock'n'roll band with an affection for classic English forebears into a far more individualistic and distinctly American band with their own ideas. Featuring the vocal stylings of Martha Hull (replaced by Mark Noone shortly thereafter), the five-song Hot and Cool 7-inch antes up one Kane original and covers like "Brand New Cadillac" and the Yardbirds' "Psycho Daisies." Mersey, Mersey Me has Kane's inspiring "Put a Bullet Thru the Jukebox" as well as the Slickees' fervent cover of the Grass Roots' "Let's Live for Today." Third contains almost all originals, including Noone's brisk "Gotta Tell Me Why."

The German Here to Stay compilation recapitulates the contents of those three EPs and a pair of contemporaneous singles, adding the unreleased "Kids" as a bonus. Guileless, earnest, occasionally embarrassing, bizarre in its selection of covers (Talking Heads?), often exciting in its basic enthusiasm, Here to Stay is an unprepossessing, entertaining collection of homemade records by a developing band.

On Cybernetic Dreams of Pi the Slickee Boys play brawny, good-natured power pop. Songs like "When I Go to the Beach" (jolly surf parody), "Pushin' My Luck" and a breezy version of Status Quo's ancient "Pictures of Matchstick Men" may be a bit glib, but are loads of fun nonetheless. Uh Oh . . . No Breaks! finds the quintet plundering their own vaults to re-record their best material. No matter: all thirteen tracks display the same vim and charm of Cybernetic Dreams and scads more skill and smarts. Melodies, hooks and energy to spare, variety and clever lyrics—these boys may not be the dernier mot, but they are worthwhile.

Twelve years on, the Slickee Boys are still going strong, even if they again have to go abroad to get a record released. Fashionably Late is another winner—the rock 'n' rolling spunk of the original Flamin' Groovies crossed with the seasoned flair and solidity of the Fabulous Thunderbirds. Although a bit less varied than usual (Side 1 concentrates on driving music; Side 2 is lighter and more melodic), this is another easy-to-like outing from a natural energy resource that will, thank goodness, never be fashionable.

The Slickee Boys' live LP, recorded in France in mid-'88, finds the quintet energetically running through a retrospective program of going-stale tunes dating as far back as 1979. Tight and proficient but routine-sounding on the first side, things start heating up on the flip ("The Brain That Refused to Die," "When I Go to the Beach," "Jailbait Janet," "This Party Sucks," etc.), which kicks out the jams with fierce dispatch. Kane then left the group.

Date Bait, his new combo, takes two steps from the Slickee Boys' grinning groove, spiking its punch with sparring wah-wahs and snaky leads, emerging as a punkier and more angular purveyor of the same '60s clichés. While unquestionably heartfelt and occasionally compelling, the overall impression is that of a band nurtured on the Cramps' lesser material now flirting goodnaturedly with the trendily popular proto-metal of '70 Detroit. Covers: Troggs, Syndicats, Gary Glitter (?), Dictators . . . Stooges . . . [i/jy/ab]

See also Afrika Korps.

SLICK RICK

The Great Adventures of Slick Rick (Def Jam-Columbia)
1989 •

Living up to his nickname by having his gold-selling album zip up the charts, "Slick" Ricky Walters' career made an equally precipitous descent the following year, when a shooting incident landed the London-born Bronx MC (onetime partner of Doug E. Fresh) in jail, facing an attempted murder rap. For what it's worth, The Great Adventures—superbly co-produced by Jam Master Jay, Hank Shocklee, Eric Sadler and Walters himself—is an exceptionally effective bad-guy record, offering the vulgar misogyny of "Treat Her Like a Prostitute" and similarly reprehensible notions delivered with all the gentle sensitivity of letters to the editor of Hustler. To be fair, some of the cliché-light rhymes are fairly innocuous: indeed, the reggae-styled "Hey Young World" takes a warm, positive stand. Rick's delivery—a self-amused singsong that resembles Shock-G of Digital Underground—is also excellent, making both his idiotic mentality and his sorry fate that much more regrettable. [i]

See also Doug E. Fresh.

SLINT

Tweez (Jennifer Hartman) 1989
Spiderland (Touch and Go) 1991 •

Despite a great name, the indie-scene cred of being a Squirrel Bait offshoot and the sonic potential of Steve Albini as their producer, this Louisville, Kentucky noise-guitar quartet hasn't got much to say for itself on its first record. Employing a nifty variety of great guitar tones (from bandsaw to breezy) and songs cutely named for the members' parents and dog, the brief and roomy Tweez consists of simple, repetitive riffs over which more guitar, ambient sounds and a few spoken or shouted words occasionally intrude. Essentially a warm-up that never gets around to anything (let's be fair: "Pat" is almost a song), it's hard to imagine why these unformed scraps (recorded in '87) were released, or precisely what merit Slint imagines they have. [i]

See also Breeders, Squirrel Bait.

SLITS

Cut (Antilles) 1979 •
Retrospective (nr/Y-Rough Trade) 1980
Return of the Giant Slits (nr/CBS) 1981
The Peel Sessions EP (nr/Strange Fruit) 1987
The Peel Sessions (nr/Strange Fruit) 1989 •

Lurching into existence during the original 1977 explosion of pre-commercial London punk, the all-female Slits wrested the anyone-can-make-a-band-so-why-not-do-it-yourself ethos away from the traditionally no-women-allowed rock brotherhood and unselfconsciously paraded their stunningly amateur rock noise with support from bands like the Clash. While on the road as part of a punk package tour, the Slits were immortalized in all their primitive glory in The Punk Rock Movie. Looking back at the group's tentative beginnings now, it's clear that while the Slits may have been truly awful, they weren't much worse than many of their male contemporaries, and undoubtedly a damn sight better and smarter than some.

It was probably fortunate, however, that several years elapsed before the Slits got around to recording a debut album; by the time they reached the studio, Viv

Albertine, Ari Upp and Tessa, joined by drummer Budgie (later of Siouxsie and the Banshees) had become reasonably competent players. Spare and rudimentary, but bursting with novel ideas and rampant originality, Cut—brilliantly produced by Dennis Bovell—forges a powerful white-reggae hybrid that serves as a solid underpinning for Ari Upp's wobbly, semi-melodic vocals.

Retrospective (so-called; the LP actually has no title) is a coverless authorized bootleg consisting of early (pre-reggae) studio doodles and live tracks that should really have stayed in the can (or wherever).

Return of the Giant Slits, released originally with a bonus 45 featuring an extra track and an interview with the band (both appended to the cassette version) turned towards African, rather than Jamaican rhythms, and attempted to make the Slits slightly more commercially accessible.

The Peel Sessions EP dates from September 1977 and includes "Vindictive" as well as three previews of Cut material; the second release combines that session with a second—three more future album tracks, ending up with a bunch of random radio noise—recorded in April '78. The bracing performances have their own scratchy power, but the main value of these recordings is as further proof of the role Bovell (and time and practice) played in making the Slits a really appealing musical proposition. [i]

See also New Age Steppers, Siouxsie and the Banshees.

MARC SLOAN

See Ritual Tension.

SLOPPY SECONDS

The First Seven Inches EP (Alternative Testicles) 1987
Destroyed (Toxic Shock) 1989

Playing unassailable melody punk (New York Dolls meet the Ramones, c. 1977), this tight and talented Indianapolis junk-culture quartet has the intelligence to sing "I Don't Wanna Be a Homosexual" (the first track on Destroyed, and not one of those recycled from the four-song EP) without a trace of homophobia and the psychotronic skill to build a catchy surfpunk song out of 1964's Horror of Party Beach. When Sloppy Seconds visit the video store—to borrow dialogue from John Waters' Female Trouble or rue the removal of Traci Lords from the porno shelves—these gulcher hounds really get on to something. However, too many of the songs, despite their sturdy musical merits, are just simple Ramones derivatives ("Janie Is a Nazi," "Time Bomb," "I Want 'Em Dead") and don't offer the same degree of fun. [i]

SLOVENLY

After the Original Style (New Alliance) 1985
Thinking of Empire (SST) 1986
Riposte (SST) 1987 ●
We Shoot for the Moon (SST) 1989 ●

Originally known as Slovenly Peter, this San Francisco sextet—whose drummer, Rob Holzman, was a 1981 member of Saccharine Trust—is actually quite fastidious in its work, disregarding conservative musical convention to play down-to-earth semi-avant art-rock.

After the Original Style is crude and cheap-sounding; Steve Anderson's grad-student singing suit the pointy instrumental excursions (slide and regular guitars and keyboards, plus bits of violin, sax and clarinet), but it doesn't make for an especially enticing sonic package.

Better produced and less prone to scurrying too far out on dangerous limbs, Thinking of Empire reveals a stronger and more accessible Slovenly proffering weirdly highbrow lyrics that sound like fragments overheard in a pretentious restaurant: "My sly deluded optimism/The oversight of treachery and all its entailments." Or "I feel and find realness amid dysfunctions/ And the poverty of reverting to the norm." What would Little Richard say?

A five-man Slovenly took a wisely tempered path that led to easy appeal on Riposte, subtitled (A Little Resolve). An involving and invigorating dose of offbeat words and (mostly) melodious guitar music that fully serve each other, the band's easiest-to-like record offers stimulating coffee-house rock that doesn't dare you to hate it.

By We Shoot for the Moon (the CD of which adds an unnecessary 20-minute tape-splice song cycle-cum-free-form improvisation, "Things Fall Apart"), the quintet is cruising on potent creative juice, smoothly spewing out adventurous and energetic jazz-rock, making ambitious art-noise/found-sound experiments and nicely covering Neil Young's "Don't Cry No Tears" and the Blue Orchids' "A Year with No Head." The lyrics are still pretty annoying, but Slovenly's music—even at its fringiest—is as enjoyable as ever. [i]

SLY & ROBBIE ET AL.

Sly and Robbie Present Taxi (Mango) 1981
The Sixties, Seventies + Eighties = Taxi (Mango) 1981
Raiders of the Lost Dub (Mango) 1981
Crucial Reggae Driven by Sly & Robbie (Mango) 1982 ●
A Dub Experience (Mango) 1985
Reggae Greats (Mango) 1985
Language Barrier (Island) 1985 ●
Taxi Fare (Heartbeat) 1986 ●
Rhythm Killers (Island) 1987 ●
A Dub Extravaganza (nr/CSA) 1987 ●
The Summit (RAS) 1988 ●
Silent Assassin (Island) 1989 ●

TAXI GANG FEATURING SLY AND ROBBIE

The Sting (Moving Target-Celluloid) 1986 ●
Taxi Connection Live in London (Mango) 1986
Electro-Reggae Vol. 1 (Mango) 1986
Two Rhythms Clash (RAS) 1990

SLY DUNBAR

Simple Slyman (nr/Front Line) 1976
Sly, Slick & Wicked (nr/Front Line) 1977
Sly-go-ville (Mango) 1982

The cornerstone of contemporary roots, the nonpareil rhythm section of Sly Dunbar and Robbie Shakespeare has probably played on more reggae records than anyone else. Musical partners for many years beginning in various Jamaican studio bands, the pair founded Taxi—a production company and label that worked with many top Jamaican vocalists, including Gregory Isaacs and Black Uhuru—in the late '70s. The Taxi sound was characterized by Robbie's clean, monolithic bass lines and Sly's tasteful use of syndrums, decorating the reggae backbeat with state-of-the-art zing. The team went on to produce and play with such artists as Grace Jones, Joan Armatrading, Bob Dylan and Ian Dury. Their trademark high-tech style has become familiar (some say tired), but their modern treatments have been a significant factor in reggae's development and popularity.

Many of their own albums are surprisingly unexciting. Sly's solo records sound like dry runs, uneventful groove collections (Sly-go-ville does have one Delroy Wilson vocal). Sixties, Seventies + Eighties is not much better. Their reworkings of past and present hits (including "El Pussy Cat Ska") demonstrate why they don't sing more often. Worse still is The Sting, a collection of uninspired dance tracks and reggaefied versions of "Peter Gunn," "The Entertainer" and "The Good, the Bad and the Ugly," each more dreadful than the last. Their most consistently listenable instrumental LP is probably The Summit, where the duo (joined by a piano player) pump out a variety of straightforward yet highly textured rhythms.

Two other releases that bear their names are actually departures, experiments in crossover. Language Barrier, a superstar fusion jam produced by Bill Laswell, features everyone from Afrika Bambaataa to Bob Dylan; danceable enough, but hardly related to reggae. Rhythm Killers is the same idea, but more successful. Featuring covers of the Ohio Players' "Fire" and the Pointer Sisters' "Yes We Can Can," the LP is an unbroken song cycle, a seamless series of rap, funk, rock and reggae grooves. Again produced by Laswell, the session features Bootsy Collins, Henry Threadgill and many others; Shinehead vocalizes on "Boops! (Here to Go)." It's heavy-bottomed from start to finish, and interesting to boot.

In general, Sly and Robbie are most enjoyable on the various Taxi compilations, which also feature vocals. Crucial Reggae, which has the Mighty Diamonds' original "Pass the Kouchie," is not quite as good as Sly and Robbie Present Taxi, but both are fine introductions to the duo's playing and the Taxi roster of singers. (The British and American editions of the latter differ slightly.) Similarly, A Dub Experience (released in the Reggae Greats series) and Raiders of the Lost Dub are remix collections of backing tracks originally done for Black Uhuru, Burning Spear, Dennis Brown and others. Both are supersonic headcharges with an eerily haunting edge and should not be missed.

Less crucial are Taxi Fare, a largely instrumental collection of B-sides, and Taxi Connection Live in London. The concert LP, featuring songs by Ini Kamozé, Yellowman and Half Pint, conveys the drama and full sound of the all-star revue, but the performances are uneven.

Giving heavy bipartite endorsement to the rap-reggae fusion, KRS-One (of Boogie Down Productions) produced Silent Assassin, an ambitious undertaking with vocals by KRS, Queen Latifah, Young MC and others. "Dance Hall" is a lively and bouncy single; "Party Together" makes ingenious use of the Turtles' "Happy Together"; Latifah rules the mic on "Woman for the Job"; the CD-only "It's Me" samples Tenor Saw's "Ring the Alarm" with lyrics over a beatbox rhythm. While there are many old-time reggae rhythms sprinkled and weaved into the songs, one of the album's strongest tracks—"Under Arrest," a heavy story about an innocent man—includes no reggae.

No matter what mega stars and adventurous styles they may dally with, the Riddim Twins always return to their roots. Originally issued on their own Jamaican label, Taxi, Two Rhythms Clash is an authentic dancehall collection of singers and rhythms. In addition to some killer instrumentals by the producers themselves, there's music from Half Pint ("Cost of Living"), Little John ("Champion Bubbler") and, most impressively, Third World's Cat Coore ("Mello Cello"). [bk/aw]

SMACK

Ao Vivo No Mosh (Braz. Baratos Afins) 1985

Into a slightly postdated style blended from turn-of-the-decade new wave funk and jagged-edge guitar pop (imagine a jittery Gang of Four singing more melodically in Portuguese) this Brazilian quartet acknowledges its own culture with an occasional tropical dance rhythm. Despite the language barrier, Ao Vivo No Mosh's excitingly adrenalized playing, tuneful vocals and simply effective drumming make it something Northern Hemisphere post-punks would have no trouble understanding. [i]

SMALTS

See Minnie Pops.

PATTI SMITH

Horses (Arista) 1975 •

Dream of Life (Arista) 1988 •

PATTI SMITH GROUP

Radio Ethiopia (Arista) 1976 •

Easter (Arista) 1978 •

Wave (Arista) 1979 •

Chicago native Patti Smith was already an established poet and playwright on the New York underground literary scene when she expanded her repertoire to include rock criticism (her work appeared in Creem, Crawdaddy and Rolling Stone) and public performance, first reading her poetry and then singing with minimalist musical accompaniment provided by Lenny Kaye, veteran rock writer and would-be guitarist. Sharing Tom Verlaine's fascination with 19th-century decadent literature (like Rimbaud, Baudelaire and Verlaine), Smith drifted into the New York rock underground. Backed by Kaye and pianist Richard Sohl, she a striking single ("Piss Factory") on a private label long before such efforts were commonplace. By the time Smith signed to Arista in 1975, Ivan Kral had joined her group, sharing guitar and bass chores with Kaye, and drummer Jay Dee Daugherty had been lured away from Lance Loud's Mumps.

Horses, produced by John Cale, broke a lot of stylistic ground, thanks to Smith's wild singing and disconcerting lyrics, but it also showcased inspired amateurism in the playing and an emotional intensity that recalled the Velvet Underground at its most powerful. Too idiosyncratic to be generally influential, Horses is a brilliant explosion of talent by a challenging, unique artist pioneering a sound not yet fashionable or, by general standards, even acceptable.

With Radio Ethiopia, the Patti Smith Group made an effort to drop Horses' clumsiness in favor of a more refined, organic sound and grander artistic pretensions. Smith plays a lot of guitar on the album, and producer Jack Douglas renders the proceedings with great seriousness. Tracks like "Ask the Angels" and "Pumping (My Heart)" have a nearly routine rock sound, made special largely by Smith's untrained but expressive voice and, of course, her highly individual songwriting.

Bruce Brody replaced Sohl for Easter, and Jimmy Iovine produced the album, which contains the band's big hit single, "Because the Night," co-written by Bruce Springsteen. Having proven that they could play as well as most bands, the PSG set out to make something of their sound; Iovine did a fine job. By this point a much more mature singer, Smith sounds confident and striking and the band keeps pace.

After the success of Easter, Smith stumbled on Wave, evidently the victim of overconfidence. Todd Rundgren's production is inappropriate and Smith's lyrics are precisely self-indulgent; although songs like "Dancing Barefoot" and "Frederick" are accessible and memorable, much of the record is unfocused and halfbaked, frequently insufferable. A misguided cover of the Byrds' "So You Want to Be (A Rock 'n' Roll Star)" rings phony and selfconscious.

Smith then took an extended career breather; she bailed out, moved to Detroit, married ex-MC5/Sonic's Rendezvous Band guitarist Fred Smith and raised a family. The Smiths stayed far from the spotlight for nearly a decade, not releasing a new album until the summer of 1988. Like a lot of cherished fantasies, the reality of Dream of Life is a big disappointment. Although Smith reassembled the troops—Daugherty and Sohl (who died of heart failure in June 1990) joined Fred Smith and a few others—and wrote all the songs with her husband (who co-produced with Jimmy Iovine), you can take the record off after the uplifting opener, "People Have the Power." That fine single, which bears a passing resemblance to Starship, is the only sign of life on this bland effort. While an older and wiser Smith does her legend no serious damage here, the optimistic Dream of Life adds precious little to it. [i]

SMITHEREENS

Girls About Town EP (D-Tone) 1982

Beauty and Sadness EP (Little Ricky) 1983 (Enigma) 1988 ●

Especially for You (Enigma) 1987 ●

The Smithereens Live EP (Restless) 1987 ♠

Green Thoughts (Enigma-Capitol) 1988 ●

11 (Enigma-Capitol) 1989 ●

You like pop music? You want to hear three potential number one singles played as if the future of the world depended on making them impossibly winsome, memorable and rapturous without sacrificing any rock-'n'-roll energy or guts? Then get Beauty and Sadness, a 12-inch EP by New Jersey's Smithereens. Singer/guitarist Pat DiNizio knows exactly what it takes to write great pop songs, and his three bandmates prove they know what to do with 'em on "Beauty and Sadness," "Some Other Guy" and "Tracey's World." As a bonus, they rock-'n'-bop on "Much Too Much" and reprise the title tune as an instrumental. Top-notch. (The 1988 reissue is remixed but otherwise identical.) Girls About Town is a charming but rudimentary four-song concept single, including three originals with "girl" in the title and a cover of the Beach Boys' "Girl Don't Tell Me."

After signing to Enigma, the Smithereens wound up getting a song ("Blood and Roses") on a film soundtrack. The picture was a flop, but the tune garnered airplay and brought the Smithereens national attention. Their Don Dixon-produced album, Especially for You, benefited from the exposure and momentum, and wound up a successful chart happening. Fortunately, it's also a wonderful record, an unfancy set of memorable songs—"Alone at Midnight," "Strangers When We Meet," "Time and Time Again"—that reflect both DiNizio's sour view of romance and the quartet's sincere fandom for a number of great bands of the '60s—the Beatles, Searchers, Who and Kinks. (Suzanne Vega, with whom DiNizio had worked in an office, guests on "In a Lonely Place.")

The Smithereens was recorded live in New York City in late '86. The six selections (a perfect cover of the Who's "The Seeker" joins the group's own tunes) is flawless, the performance crisp and exciting. Smithereens drummer Dennis Diken's witty and informative liner notes are likewise exemplary.

Green Thoughts (the titular reference is to jealousy) neatly dodges the sophomore jinx, delivering another set of terrific DiNizio songs, played with the same unpretentious guitar-driven excellence. "House We Used to Live In," "Drown in My Own Tears," the countryish "Something New" and the paranoid (and proud of it) title track are especially good, but the entire record is instantly likable and hard to shake. Producer Don Dixon and Del Shannon are among the small group of guests.

Terse, tuneful and towering, 11—excellently produced by Ed Stasium with unmistakable evidence of his Living Colour work—adds considerable rock crunch to the guitar sound, while allowing DiNizio's vocals (getting attractive support from Belinda Carlisle, the Honeyys and others) to float gently above the fray. With typically great songs ("Yesterday Girl," "Baby Be Good," "A Girl Like You"), this contains some of the loudest power pop ever, erasing the Beatlesque genre's nostalgia with fully modern intensity. Neatly balancing the muscle with a quartet of quieter numbers (the baroque, Left Banke-styled "Blue Period," quaintly complete with cello and harpsichord, "Cut Flowers," "Kiss Your Tears Away" and "Maria Elena," an engaging tribute to Buddy Holly's widow), 11 is easily the Smithereens' best album. [i]

See also Young Fresh Fellows.

SMITHS

The Smiths (Rough Trade-Sire) 1984 ●

Haful of Hollow (nr/Rough Trade) 1984 ●

Meat Is Murder (Rough Trade-Sire) 1985 ●

The Queen Is Dead (Rough Trade-Sire) 1986 ●

The World Won't Listen (nr/Rough Trade) 1987 ●

Louder Than Bombs (Rough Trade-Sire) 1987 ●

Strangeways, Here We Come (Rough Trade-Sire) 1987 ●

Rank (Rough Trade-Sire) 1988 •
The Peel Sessions EP (nr/Strange Fruit) 1988 (Strange Fruit-Dutch East India) 1991 •

You'd be perfectly within your rights to hate the Smiths. No other pop music act since Jonathan Richman ever raised blatant self-absorption to such a high level. The Smiths' ability to turn shameless solipsism into incalculable stardom, however, was their entirely unique accomplishment. With remarkable consistency and integrity, Mancunian singer/lyricist (Stephen) Morrissey and company proudly represent the traditional values of selfishness, self-pity and the unbearable anguish of love. His melancholy romantic sensibility makes Elizabeth Barrett Browning sound like Nelson Algren.

The key to the Smiths' enormous success (in addition to sixteen UK hit singles, all seven of the quartet's albums went Top 10 there) was that the no-nonsense band—under the direction of brilliant guitarist/songwriter Johnny Marr—offset Morrissey's flightiness with bright and catchy music. Supported by a deft rhythm section, Marr's spare, hooky guitar created a seriously compelling underground (i.e., self-defined and uninfluenced by the existing commercial order) pop sound with a simplicity more telling than all of the singer's unwanted confessions.

The Smiths boasts ten near-perfect tunes (the US edition adds an eleventh, "This Charming Man"), over which Morrissey sings—in his wavery, defenseless voice—about the bittersweet agonies of coming out of the closet. He overindulges to the point of sounding almost like a parody of a lounge singer, but goes far enough to make it more daring than forced. With lines alternately funny ("Hand in glove/The sun shines out of our behinds") and clunky ("Does the body rule the mind/Or does the mind rule the body/I dunno"), the album dares you to resist it and then makes it very difficult to do so.

The UK-only Hatful of Hollow is a generous sixteen-track collection of singles and radio sessions which doubles The Smiths' best cuts and betters its lesser material. It also adds the tremolo-crazy single "How Soon Is Now?," which takes the heaviest art-rock dance groove since U2's "Pride (In the Name of Love)" and throws the lines "I am the son/and the heir/Of a shyness that is criminally vulgar" in its path. Quite a formidable obstacle, but the groove wins out. The Smiths in a nutshell.

Meat Is Murder is both less frilly and less appealing than prior efforts. Morrissey is nearly as dry as the rest of the band, and the whole thing sounds two-dimensional. And while anyone at all disposed towards tragic romanticism can accept some of his indulgences in that direction, who can forgive the vegetarian self-righteousness of the title track? (The US edition adds "How Soon Is Now?" to the program.)

The most dangerous gift for the chronically self-obsessed is a devoted audience, and The Queen Is Dead shows just how far Morrissey could take his outrageous neurotic fantasies. "Never Had No One Ever" is ostensibly a paean to virginal celibacy; "Frankly, Mr. Shankly" questions the benefits of stardom; "Bigmouth Strikes Again" (which goes out on a limb to claim "... now I know how Joan of Arc felt"), "There Is a Light That Never Goes Out" and "The Boy with the Thorn in His Side" obliquely address an assortment of insecurities. The band is typically astute and subtle, although Marr's guitar playing takes a relatively inconspicuous lead role.

The World Won't Listen, the Smiths' second compilation, contains singles (A's and B's) and obscurities from 1985-'86, including "That Joke Isn't Funny Anymore," "Shakespeare's Sister," "Shoplifters of the World Unite" and "Panic." The album contains one otherwise-unreleased item, "You Just Haven't Earned It Yet, Baby" (later covered to good effect by Kirsty MacColl on her Kite album).

The American-only Louder Than Bombs two-record set contains many of the same tracks (deleting those which appeared on The Queen Is Dead and two others) as The World Won't Listen, adding album tracks and single sides dating as far back as 1983. The album contains such Smiths essentials as "Hand in Glove," "Heaven Knows I'm Miserable Now," "William, It Was Really Nothing" and "Please Please Please Let Me Get What I Want." Five numbers feature ex-Aztec Camera/Bluebells guitarist Craig Gannon, who was briefly a Smith; "Ask" has backing vocals by MacColl. Amazingly, the band's stylistic consistency and musical excellence never falter, leaving the impression that these two dozen songs could have been recorded in one lengthy session. Remarkable.

Marr and Morrissey parted company in late 1987, putting the Smiths to rest with a disappointing final album, Strangeways, Here We Come. In spots, Marr's guitar takes a harder tone than ever before. Drummer Mike Joyce and bassist Andy Rourke also come on stronger than usual; strings and saxophone contribute to the crowded melodic din. Morrissey's lyrics are half-baked and more artless than usual, turning especially irksome when they substitute naked anger and disgust ("Paint a Vulgar Picture," "Unhappy Birthday") for clever snideness. The delicate "Girlfriend in a Coma" and the shimmering "Stop Me if You Think You've Heard This One Before" are the album's best tracks, and they aren't exceptional additions to the canon.

The live Rank album (recorded in London in October '86) closes the book on the Smiths' extraordinary career with a hastily paced program of songs drawn largely from The Queen Is Dead and that year's singles. While the band (augmented by Gannon) sounds great, Morrissey's singing is uneven, and the song selection leaves much to be desired.

The Peel Sessions EP—reissued on cassette and CD in the US with a different cover and a singular title—is a more exciting semi-live souvenir, containing seriously energetic 1983 versions of "What Difference Does It Make," "Handsome Devil" and two others. Unfortunately for fans, "Reel Around the Fountain" is the only cut not already released on Hatful of Hollow.

While Marr went off to record with Bryan Ferry, Paul McCartney, Talking Heads, Kirsty MacColl and others before joining the The, Morrissey prudently launched a solo career. [i]

See also Morrissey, New Order, The The.

T.V. SMITH'S EXPLORERS

The Last Words of the Great Explorer (Epic) 1981

T.V. SMITH

Channel 5 (nr/Expulsion) 1983

Tim Smith was the leader of the punk-era Adverts, who clung on long enough to make two albums in the '70s. After they expired, Smith formed the Explorers—originally a trio, but expanded to a five-piece (including an ex-Doctors of Madness bassist) by the time of the album. A far cry from the Adverts' stripped-down guitar drone, The Last Words uses synthesizer and slick musicianship to mold an engaging dance program that benefits from Smith's strong voice and inventive songwriting. There are touches of Sparks, the Only Ones, new romantics and others; a great record from a gifted performer.

Channel 5 finds Smith going it alone on a tiny indie label, with only ex-Adverts keyboard player Tim Cross, a bassist and a drum machine helping out. The LP reverts to Smith's earlier no-nonsense, no-frills sound (if not exactly Adverts-styled punk), with his guitar leading the charge. A pleasant little record with strong songs, clever production and Smith's burgeoning social conscience ("On Your Video," "War Fever"). Sharp lyrics make the spry "A Token of My Love" the best track on this entertaining (if sobering) record. [i/jr]

See also Adverts.

SNAKE FARM

See Pluzg.

SNAKEFINGER

Chewing Hides the Sound (Ralph) 1980

Greener Postures (Ralph) 1981

Manual of Errors (Ralph) 1982 •

Against the Grain (Ralph) 1983

Snakefinger: The CD Collection [CD] (East Side Digital) 1988 •

SNAKEFINGER'S VESTAL VIRGINS

Live in Chicago [tape] (Ralph) 1986

Night of Desirable Objects (Ralph) 1986 •

Although his musical career began in the early '60s and he recorded two albums in the early '70s with pub-rockers Chilli Willi and the Red Hot Peppers, guitarist Phil "Snakefinger" Lithman is best known for his association with the Residents and his resultant Ralph Records solo career. On songs like "Sinister Exaggerator" and their savage reworking of "Satisfaction," Snakefinger's deranged slidework and upside-down solos—trickily playing the wrong notes in the right places—adds an immediately recognizable deviant edge. He died of a heart ailment in July 1987; the work he left behind typifies both imagination and technical excellence.

Snakefinger's solo debut outing was "The Spot," a cutely weird little 1978 single that ended up on Against the Grain. But his first two albums pointed up Snakey's major weakness as a solo artist: even with copious musical and technical input from the Residents (who co-wrote and co-produced both), he just isn't that weird (for a Ralph act, that is). Skeletal arrangements and over-reliance on clichéd rhythm-box beats don't help, either. Nonetheless, when released as singles, a track from each—"Man in the Dark Sedan" and Kraftwerk's

"The Model"—became modest (but deserving) underground hits.

Around the time of Greener Postures, Snakefinger hit the club circuit with a backing band variously known as Bast and the Dead Residents. The presence of steady company (including Beefheart alumnus—and future Pere Ubuite—Eric Drew Feldman) makes Manual of Errors an improved listening experience; juxtaposed against (relatively) straight rock backing, Snakefinger's innate weirdness comes across as even more subversive.

Against the Grain is a thoughtful compilation of his Ralph work to date, providing the perfect entry to this unique guitarist's demi-warped world. Everything you'd want to hear is here—from "The Spot" through "Beatnik Party"—plus a great unreleased track, "I Love You Too Much to Respect You."

Armed with his new backing group, the Vestal Virgins (again led by keyboardist Feldman), Snakefinger recorded Night of Desirable Objects and the cassette-only Live in Chicago, which have no songs in common. The excellently produced record is quite good, comprising complex jazz instrumentals, a believable English fiddle ballad, unadorned a cappella gospel and typical (for Snakey) originals like "There's No Justice in Life" (which might serve as a blueprint for Oingo Boingo) and the organic "I Gave Myself to You." The live tape gives up something in audio sophistication and audio variety, but offers showy and extended new versions of such oldies as "Save Me from Dali," "Beatnik Party," "The Model" and Ennio Morricone's "Magic and Ecstasy."

The posthumous CD Collection comprises Chewing Hides the Sound (minus two songs), Greener Postures (minus one) and both sides of his 1978 single, "The Spot" b/w "Smelly Tongues." [rnp/i]

See also Residents.

SNATCH

See Judy Nylon.

SNATCHES OF PINK

Send in the Clowns (Dog Gone) 1987

Dead Men (Dog Gone) 1989 •

They're from Chapel Hill, North Carolina. Sara Romweber (ex-Let's Active) plays drums. They're on a label run by R.E.M. manager Jefferson Holt. Think you've got 'em pegged? Wrong! This loud trio is a tasty blend of Stones raunch and punk insistence, well-crafted tunes delivered with jackhammer finesse. Singer Andy McMillan is a young good-old-boy with an aching twang stuck in his throat, spurred to spill his guts by Michael Rank's barbed guitars. Need a party starter? Try "Ones with the Black" on Send in the Clowns. A good'un.

The Snatches up the grunge level dramatically on Dead Men, creating the thrilling sound of chaos in the key of E. With Rank assuming lead vocal duties from Andy McMillan (now the full-fledged bassist), the trio imitates a big-time boogie band debilitated by bad drugs. With urgent performances and a thoroughly muddy mix, the rockers seem like the prelude to world destruction, while the ballads suggest a last desperate cry for help. In other words, highly cool. [jy]

See also Let's Active.

SNEAKERS

Sneakers EP (Carnivorous) 1976

In the Red (Car) 1978

U.S. SECRET SERVICE

U.S. Secret Service EP (Moonlight) 1980

The 7-inch Sneakers EP—six quirky power pop originals engineered by Don Dixon—marked the first vinyl appearance of a seminal but little-heard band containing North Carolina rock scene VIPs Chris Stamey, Will Rigby and Mitch Easter (a guest contributor). To get the folklore out of the way, Stamey and Rigby founded the dB's; Stamey went on to a solo career; Dixon became a busy producer and solo artist; Easter is also a well-known producer, fronts Let's Active and operates Mitch's Drive-In Studio, one of the breeding labs for new American rock. The record itself has such lyrically anxious Stamey-penned elements of the legend as "Love's Like a Cuban Crisis," "Condition Red" and "On the Brink."

The 12-inch In the Red, made after Stamey had relocated to New York, was really an extended family reunion in which Stamey and Easter combine their Anglo pop/rock with brooding quasi-baroque clavinet, the saunter of a Parisian boulevardier, even some avant-gardish desperation, all with an air of sophistication received in innocence. Besides a cover of Bo Diddley's "Roadrunner," the record features five songs penned individually by Stamey ("The Perfect Stranger," "What I Dig") and Easter ("Decline and Fall," "Quelle Folie") and a brief noir instrumental.

Secret Service includes ex-Sneakers bassist Robert Keely plus other North Carolina pals who stayed put. The Dixon-produced record sounds more pro than Sneakers ever did and consequently lacks most of that band's ingratiating twinkiness. The 12-inch includes one goody ("Backseat Sinner") and three other tunes that are only fair. Easter guests on acoustic guitar. [jg/i]

See also dB's, Let's Active, Chris Stamey.

SNEETCHES

Lights Out! with the Sneetches (nr/Kaleidoscope Sounds)

1988 (Alias) 1991 •

Sometimes That's All We Have (Alias) 1989 •

Slow (Alias) 1990 •

This San Francisco-based Anglo-American quartet matches the heady artfulness of the Zombies with the giddy exuberance of the Partridge Family. Demos made as a fledgling three-piece found their way to a UK label, which proudly released the eight songs as Lights Out! The rudimentary recording quality only adds to the fresh, unpretentious appeal of beat numbers like "I Need Someone" and pretty, atmospheric tracks like "Lorelei." (The belated—and expanded—American issue adds three songs from a 1989 single, four new tracks and a Raspberries cover recorded in collaboration with Shoes.)

Sometimes That's All We Have delivers what Lights Out! only promised. Behind the engaging, sunny choruses and bouncy lovescapes lies a healthy dose of Syd Barrett-sized neuroses. The LP is bursting with brilliant production and arranging ideas: the piano and hand-clap break in the rocking "Nowhere at All," the worn-vinyl intro to "Another Shitty Day," pedal steel and finger-snapping on "Don't Turn Back," the almost campy ooh-la-la's of "In a Perfect Place." The songs by bassist Mike Levy and guitarist Matt Carges float right into your subconscious, and the band displays its muscle when you least expect it.

The addition of a second Englishman, ex-Stingrays bassist Alec Palao (dapper drummer Daniel Swan cut his teeth with the Cortinas), allowed Levy to move to guitar and gave the Sneetches a new forcefulness on the 1989 12-inch "Please Don't Break My Heart," which also includes a fired-up dash through the Monochrome Set's "He's Frank." The comparatively raw nature of that teaser, plus inspired live shows niddled with Buzzcocks or Wire raveups, hardly prepared fans for Slow, a sparse, yet somehow dreamier and darker vision of Sneetches-brand popedelia. "Heloise" and "Broke Up in My Hands" are among the bongo-driven favorites on this lovely and unusual no-fixed-decade release. [sm]

SNIVELLING SHITS

I Can't Come (nr/Damaged Goods) 1989

The hazard of anyone-can-do-it musical movements is what might get dragged in. Fortunately, the jokey Snivelling Shits—two London rock critics (singer Giovanni Daddo and guitarist Dave Fudger) and such musician friends as Steve Nicol of the Hot Rods and bassist Steve Lillywhite—were sharply skilled at smuttily satirizing the sounds of '77. As anthologized in this archival colored-vinyl document, the band's brief recording career (eight whole tracks, including the viciously irreverent "isgodaman?," originally released on a Beggars Banquet compilation LP under the name Arthur Comics?) included incisive swipes at the Sex Pistols, John Cooper Clarke ("I Wanna Be Your Biro") and the Velvet Underground. That's history for you. [i]

SIGMUND SNOPEK III

See Violent Femmes.

SNUFF

Snuffsaidbutgorblimeygvstnoneifehdidn'tthrowawobblerschachachachachachachachachachayou'regoing-homeinacosmicambience (Workers Playtime-Rough Trade) 1990 •

Taking its cue from such fellow Brits as the UK Subs and such US brethren as the Descendents, Snuff plays speedy raveups bursting with frenetic drumming and sing-songy choruses ("Some-How" and "Not Listening," in particular, stand out) on its marvelously titled debut (generally referred to as Snuff Said). Uncluttered production and the band's unbridled enthusiasm and complete lack of pretension (no "society sucks" songs here) do much to move Snuff way ahead in the hardcore sweepstakes. And dig the raucous cover of "Purple Haze," which resourcefully appropriates guest vocals from Jimi himself. The CD adds six cuts to an already worthy collection. [db]

S.O.A.

No Policy EP (Dischord) 1981

VARIOUS ARTISTS

Four Old 7"s on a 12" (Dischord) 1985

While working at an ice cream parlor in his native Washington DC, the teenage Henry Rollins (né Henry Garfield) got out his aggressions by singing for local hardcore pioneers S.O.A. (State Of Alert), which existed from October 1980 until July 1981, when Rollins joined Black Flag. The group's posthumous 7-inch EP (later reissued on a compilation with three other early Dischord 45s) offers ten very brief blasts of abrasive hardcore, primed by talented guitarist Michael Hampton's wall of riffing and Henry's fierce bark. No Policy is a most effective nervous system stimulant, and the songs are over before they have a chance to get tiresome. Years away from developing into his trademark tortured psychological introspections, Rollins' lyrics call for just violence ("Gonna Have to Fight") and explore familiar punk complaints: anti-drugs ("Lost in Space"), anti-romance ("Girl Problems") and anti-police ("Public Defender"). Interestingly, Hampton and post-EP drummer Ivor Hanson wound up working (together) in Alec MacKaye's Faith and Ian MacKaye's Embrace. [gef]

See also Henry Rollins.

SOCIAL DEVIANTS

Proof (nr/Underground Impressarios) 1967 (nr/Decca)

1969 (nr/Psycho) 1983

DEVIANTS

Disposable (nr/Stable) 1968 (Sire-London) 1969

Deviants #3 (Sire-London) 1969 (nr/Transatlantic-Demon) 1989

Human Garbage (nr/Psycho) 1984

MICK FAREN & THE DEVIANTS

Screwed Up EP (nr/Stiff) 1977

TWINK

Think Pink (nr/Polydor) 1970

Mr. Rainbow (nr/Twink) 1990

TWINK WITH PLASTICLAND

You Need a Fairy Godmother (Midnight) 1989

PINK FAIRIES

Never Never Land (nr/Polydor) 1971

What a Bunch of Sweeties (nr/Polydor) 1972

Kings of Oblivion (Polydor) 1973

Flashback: Pink Fairies (nr/Polydor) 1975

Live at the Roundhouse (nr/Big Beat) 1982

Kill 'Em & Eat 'Em (nr/Demon) 1987 (Skyclad) 1989 •

VARIOUS ARTISTS

Revelations (Glastonbury Fayre) (nr/Revelation) 1972

Although the two nations' social climates were significantly different, British youth culture of the late '60s provided the same fertile environment for the blending of radical politics, recreational drug use and rock'n'roll as America did. If the Deviants were less incendiary (both in outlook and sound) than the MC5, the loose London group was every bit as subversive, and played a crucial historical role by transmuting into the Pink Fairies and launching the genealogical and stylistic process that, alongside Hawkwind and a few other hippie hordes, kept the countercultural spirit alive in British rock'n'roll through the early '70s. In a very real sense, the Deviants—singly and collectively—played a not insignificant role in godfathering the punk era.

Founded and fronted by singer/writer Mick Farren, the Social Deviants—later just the Deviants—made three bizarre albums in two years before caving in, as such chemically polluted anti-authoritarian enterprises were wont to do, leaving behind such anthems as "Let's Loot the Supermarket," "Slum Lord" (both on the goodnaturally weird Disposable) and "The People Suite" ("We are the people who pervert your children . . . we are beyond rehabilitation . . .") and "Metamorphosis Exploration" (from the harder-rocking and spacier #3).

After the Deviants folded in 1969, Farren recorded a solo album with a short-lived Pink Fairies that featured drummer/singer Twink (John Alder, a veteran of the Pretty Things who had a momentary band with Syd Barrett that actually performed in public in 1972). When the first Pink Fairies fell apart, Twink assembled a second version with the other three ex-Deviants and recorded Never Never Land, performing two songs from it on an apocalyptic side of Revelations, the Glastonbury Fayre festival live triple-album: a terse "Do It" (later covered by Rollins Band) and 20 minutes of "Uncle Harry's Last Freak-Out." Twink then flew the coop, leaving Duncan Sanderson (bass/vocals), Paul Rudolph (guitar/vocals) and Russell Hunter (drums) to carry the Fairies flag.

Despite a fair measure of artistic confusion and the lack of a real vocalist, What a Bunch of Sweeties is an offbeat and occasionally exciting, but now totally dated, guitar-rock (plus drum solo) record. Things really got good, however, when Rudolph was replaced by Larry Wallis (a veteran of both the jazzy Blodwyn Pig and the nearly metal UFO). With Wallis singing, playing ingenious guitar and doing nearly all the songwriting (in one case, collaborating with Farren), the resulting Kings of Oblivion is absolutely amazing, a thunderous jolt of electricity with monumental melodies and bizarre sideways lyrics like "I Wish I Was a Girl," the drugged-out "When's the Fun Begin?" and "City Kids." Still brilliant sounding after two decades, Kings is a widely unknown masterpiece that stands on its own but also set the stage for Motörhead, which Wallis and Hawkwind refugee Lemmy initially formed in 1975.

Flashback is a compilation of studio tracks; although not released until '82, Live at the Roundhouse (which includes renditions of "City Kids," "Uncle Harry's Last Freak-Out" and "Waiting for the Man," among others) was recorded in 1975 by a Fairies reunion that featured Twink, Rudolph, Wallis, Hunter and Sanderson.

The Deviants and Pink Fairies names have been used for various one-offs over the years: Human Garbage, for instance, is a 1984 live recording by Farren, Wallis and Sanderson. The '77 Mick Farren & the Deviants EP is a raunchy-sounding 7-inch that includes a fun new version of "Let's Loot the Supermarket" and three other tracks, produced by Wallis and performed with Rudolph and guitarist Andy Colqhoun (then of Warsaw Pact).

Colqhoun and Wallis—as well as Twink, Hunter and Sanderson—are all on the recent Fairies reunion album, Kill 'Em & Eat 'Em. Although there's no problem with the straightforward rock music, the quintet's attempt to recapture and reglamorize the past in songs like "Taking LSD" and "White Girls on Amphetamine" is a serious drag.

As one step in Twink's late-'80s reactivation, he cut the inexcusably dull You Need a Fairy Godmother mini-album live in a Chicago club, blandly backed—on a far-ranging selection of career oldies (including the Pretty Things' "Alexander," the Pink Fairies' "Do It" and a 1978 solo tune, "Psychedelic Punkaroo") and one terrible newie ("Seize the Time")—by Plasticland. Brad Warner of Dementia 13 guests on one of the seven tracks; Twink plays drums on another, leaving lead vocals to P-land's Glenn Rehse. [1]

See also Bevis Frond, Mick Farren, Hawkwind, Motörhead, Plasticland.

SOCIAL DISTORTION

Mommy's Little Monster (13th Floor) 1983 (Triple X) 1990 •

Prison Bound (Restless) 1988 •

Social Distortion (Epic) 1990 •

Story of My Life...and other stories EP [CD] (Epic) 1990 •

Formed around the turn of the decade by singer/guitarist Mike Ness, Social Distortion established itself as a top-rank Southern California punk group in 1982 with the "1945" 45. In an era known more for West Coast hardcore (Black Flag, TSOL, Circle Jerks, Fear), this Fullerton band covered the Stones (the B-side is a red-hot "Under My Thumb") and Creedence in their live shows. Mommy's Little Monster is a near-perfect example of melodious, riffing punk, just oozing rock'n'roll suss. From the piledriving opener ("I Just Want to Give You the Creeps") to the swaggering "It Wasn't a Pretty Picture" to "Another State of Mind," Monster is a two-guitar punk-pop classic. (The CD adds "Under My Thumb" and another early track.)

Five years later, Social Distortion were among the last practitioners of this form, and Prison Bound adds a new twist. Acoustic guitars abound and Ness has obviously been listening to Johnny Cash; at least half of the LP is tinged with a country feel. "Indulgence" and "Like an Outlaw" (with cowboy yells and snapping whips) are like parts of a soundtrack for a heroic but sad Western we'll never see; there's also another Stones cover, "Backstreet Girl." Although Prison Bound lacks the all-out dynamics of Monster (credit the loss of original bassist Brent Liles and singing drummer Derrick O'Brien), it's still a maturely paced, knowing follow-up, and not just for punks.

With Social Distortion signing to a major label, many might have expected the group's third LP to ease up on the intensity. Instead, the quartet returns to the debut LP's guitar assault on such burners as the opening "So Far Away," and "She's a Knockout." The rootsy leanings of Prison Bound are still present, but far more restrained; Johnny Cash's "Ring of Fire" gets a back-to-basics reading. The rhythm section (including ex-Lewd drummer Chris Reece) finally jells, and Dave Jerden's production is just right, a striking backdrop for Ness' great vocals. This veteran punk band not only stuck to its rock'n'roll guns in a higher-stakes outing, but reached a measure of mainstream acceptance in the process. Shocking.

The Story of My Life EP combines the single version of that album track with two bracing live cuts ("1945" and "Mommy's Little Monster") and a pair of newly recorded covers: Willie Dixon's "Pretty Thing" and rockabilly legend Ersel Hickey's "Shame on Me." [jr]

SOFT BOYS

Wading Through a Ventilator EP (nr/Raw) 1978 (nr/Delorean) 1984 •

A Can of Bees (nr/Two Crabs) 1979 (nr/Aura) 1980 (nr/Two Crabs) 1984 •

Underwater Moonlight (nr/Armageddon) 1980 (nr/Glass Fish) 1990 •

Two Halves for the Price of One (nr/Armageddon) 1981 (nr/Glass Fish) 1990

Invisible Hits (nr/Midnight Music) 1983 •

Live at the Portland Arms [tape] (nr/Midnight Music) 1983 (nr/Glass Fish) 1987

From Cambridge they came, in 1976: a brilliant songwriter leading a two-guitar band that revered the Byrds, the Beatles and, most of all, Syd Barrett's Pink Floyd. Some called it the start of a psychedelic revival; the Soft Boys' verve and wild-eyed sincerity made it more of a post-psychedelic awakening.

Wading Through a Ventilator shows a promising weirdness that sets it apart from what most everyone else was doing in 1977, but reveals singer/guitarist Robyn Hitchcock as a still-embryonic songwriter. He got off a few good ones on A Can of Bees, by which time guitarist Kimberly Rew had joined the band, but the rest declines disappointingly into grating medium-metal power pop. (The album's second reissue is somewhat revised from the original, adding "Anglepoise Lamp" from a 1978 single and other tracks.)

That same year (1979), the Soft Boys recorded an uncharacteristic all-acoustic live tape—later sold by mail to buyers of Invisible Hits as Live at the Portland Arms and subsequently reissued and generally distributed on disc—which contains the most bizarre assortment of cover versions imaginable. But then cover versions were always one of the band's strong suits, from Hitchcock's intense reading of John Lennon's "Cold Turkey" on Can of Bees to his hilarious ravings on Portland Arms' "That's When Your Heartaches Begin." Also of historic interest are two Syd Barrett numbers: "Vegetable Man" on a British maxi-single (also included on the Canadian Attic issue of Underwater Moonlight) and "Astronomy Domine" on Two Halves for the Price of One. That album is actually two, with individually titled sides and cover art: Lope at the Hive was recorded at London's Hope and Anchor, while Only the Stones Remain contains otherwise unreleased oddities mixed in both chronology and quality.

The core of the Soft Boys canon, however, are Invisible Hits (actually recorded in '78 and '79) and Underwater Moonlight. Some form of insanity prevented the timely release of the former; it shows Hitchcock at his best—maturely immature and crazily serious—as he races from hearty lust ("Let Me Put It Next to You") to vulnerable harangue ("Empty Girl," "Blues in the Dark"). Few other albums capture the humor, pathos, anger and grotesquerie of man/woman so well.

Underwater Moonlight is one of the new wave's finest half-dozen albums and unquestionably its most unjustly underrated one. "I Wanna Destroy You" is a rant against war and intolerance; "Insanely Jealous" builds to a frenzy—twice; "I Got the Hots" contains some of the funniest erotic lines ever written. This album has everything—melody, power, wit, laughs and heart, not to mention a great guitar sound.

Hitchcock remains one of the '80s most unique songwriters. He later reunited with the original Soft Boys rhythm section of Andy Metcalfe (also in the reformed Squeeze) and Morris Windsor for some of his solo recordings; Rew went on to form Katrina and the Waves.

[mf]

See also Robyn Hitchcock, Katrina and the Waves.

SOFT CELL

Mutant Moments EP (nr/Big Frock) 1980

Non-Stop Erotic Cabaret (Sire) 1981 ●

Non-Stop Ecstatic Dancing EP (Sire) 1982

The Art of Falling Apart (Sire) 1983

Soul Inside EP (Sire) 1983

This Last Night in Sodom (Sire) 1984 ●

The Singles 1981–1985 (nr/Some Bizzare) 1986 ●

Singer Marc Almond and keyboardist David Ball performed a minor miracle in 1981, taking an obscure soul song and turning it into a most atypical synthesizer tune, coming up in the process with a worldwide smash hit that rode Billboard's chart for almost a year. "Tainted Love" (written by Ed Cobb but known in its version by Gloria Jones) is as passionate and desperately sleazy as Kraftwerk is cool and clean. The Almond/Ball originals on Non-Stop Erotic Cabaret don't always cut so deeply, but all offer nice, decadent fun. Among them: "Sex Dwarf," highlighted by a nagging synthesizer riff, and "Say Hello, Wave Goodbye," blatant though stirring sentimentality. Almond's breathy, insinuating vocals and Ball's surprisingly varied electronic and acoustic keyboards (kudos to producer Mike Thorne) never stand pat.

Non-Stop Ecstatic Dancing, half an hour (six tracks) of dance mixes, intends primarily to divert and manages to overcome its basic filler role. Highlights include a languid version of "Where Did Our Love Go?" and the unforgettably neurotic "Insecure . . . Me?"

It's too bad Almond and Ball didn't part ways before descending into the embarrassing self-parody of The Art of Falling Apart. With Ball's keyboards growing progressively cooler, Almond tries ever more desperately to invoke a sleazy atmosphere and just ends up sounding silly. The nadir—indeed, the worst Soft Cell effort of all time—is the pitiful ten-minute Jimi Hendrix medley of "Hey Joe," "Purple Haze" and "Voodoo Chile (Slight Return)" that comes on a bonus 12-inch 45. It's like a five-year-old trying to read Shakespeare. Soul Inside is a collection of odds and ends, including a version of "You Only Live Twice (007 Theme)," two remixes and a live radio session. This Last Night in Sodom contains further fruitless flailing, as titles like "The Best Way to Kill" and "Mr. Self Destruct" attest.

[jy]

See also Marc Almond, Dave Ball.

SOLDIER STRING QUARTET

See Elliott Sharp.

SOLOMON GRUNDY

See Screaming Trees.

JIMMY SOMERVILLE

See Bronski Beat, Communards.

SOMETHING HAPPENS

I Know Ray Harman EP (nr/Virgin) 1988

Been There, Seen That, Done That (nr/Virgin) 1988 ●

Stuck Together with God's Glue (Charisma) 1990 ◊

This Dublin quartet plays straightforward guitar-based pop-rock, refreshingly free of the '60s trappings or indie-dance copycatism of many likeminded UK and Irish contemporaries.

Arguments over the mix on the Tommy Erdelyi-produced debut album precipitated the release of a six-song live set recorded before a crowd of the converted. As it previews a couple of songs from the then-imminent Been There, the EP (named for the group's lead guitarist) is not mandatory, but it is fun.

Been There was finally released at the end of '88, remixed and containing two Vic Maile-produced tracks in place of three deletions. Unspectacularly pleasant, it announces a band that could well become a huge commercial property. The fact that Tom Dunne's vocals often bear an uncanny resemblance to Bono doesn't hurt the group's chances.

Stuck Together with God's Glue is much more assured, boasting a varied selection of songs and tougher production by Ed Stasium. With a catchy chorus and comically awkward syntax, "Hello, Hello, Hello, Hello, Hello, (Petrol)" is a certified shoulda-been hit; the sumptuously melancholy "Kill the Roses" takes things in a more textured, moody direction. Good show.

[db]

SONIC'S RENDEZVOUS BAND/ DESTROY ALL MONSTERS

Ron Asheton/Sonic's Rendezvous Band (Fr. Revenge) 1987

SONIC'S RENDEZVOUS BAND

Strikes Like Lightning (Black Adder) 1989

SCOTT MORGAN BAND

Rock Action (Fr. Revenge) 1990

By virtue of who they were, Sonic's Rendezvous were legendary long before anyone outside their hometown ever heard them. The veritable Detroit-scene supergroup consisted of Scott Morgan (ex-Rationals), Gary Rasmussen (the Up), Scott Asheton (Stooges) and Fred Sonic Smith (MC5). Officially, the band's recorded output consists of a single song, the long-rare mono/stereo 45 "City Slang." Unofficially, they made a pointed resurgence in the mid-'80s Michigan-worship years, first on a 1985 self-titled bootleg (a lo-fi dub of the original 45, followed by lower-fi live cuts that fail to disguise the fact that, yeah, SRB were worth the hoopla all along).

The split LP with Ron Asheton's Destroy All Monsters again resurrects "City Slang" from the 45 (also reissued elsewhere on a facsimile bootleg single), but with clean, sharp sound, as mean as the original. The side also includes a studio instrumental that was obviously intended for vocals and suffers for their absence, and a pair of live tunes on a par with the prior LP. An '89 bootleg (Strikes Like Lightning) culled from numerous '78-'79 gigs varies in sound quality, but the songs and performances are inarguably the best yet, with a fury and interplay only hinted at on the earlier material.

Nearly a decade later, Scott Morgan resurfaced with a somewhat well-received local 45 of Seger/Springsteen commercialism, on which the band consists of SRB minus Sonic (by then Mr. Patti Smith, with his wife's awful comeback LP in the offing). The subsequent Rock Action follows tradition by beginning with the 45 A-side (closing with its flip), spending the time between touring through Detroit soul of the sort associated with Mitch Ryder. Thankfully, flamboyant hack vocalist Kathy Deschaine (the fourth bandmember, the fifth wheel) is relegated to a minor role; nevertheless, the LP elicits a dulled demo feel, lacking the kinetic electricity conjured by the former band even on the crummiest archival bootlegs. [ab]

SONIC YOUTH

Sonic Youth EP (Neutral) 1982 (SST) 1987 •
Confusion Is Sex (Neutral) 1983 (SST) 1987 •
Kill Yr. Idols EP (Ger. Zensor) 1983
Sonic Death: Sonic Youth Live [tape] (Ecstatic Peace)
1984 (SST) 1988 ◊
Bad Moon Rising (Homestead) 1985 •
Death Valley 69 EP (Homestead) 1985
EVOL (SST) 1986 •
Sister (SST) 1987 •
Master Dik EP (SST) 1988 •
Daydream Nation (Blast First-Enigma) 1988 •
Daydream Nation EP [CD] (Blast First-Enigma) 1988 •
Goo (DGC) 1990 •

LEE RANALDO

From Here to Infinity (SST) 1987 •

CICCONE YOUTH

The Whitey Album EP [CD] (Blast First) 1988 •
The Whitey Album (Blast First) 1989 •

JIM SAUTER, DON DIETRICK, THURSTON MOORE

Barefoot in the Head (Forced Exposure) 1990

BEWITCHED

Brain Eater (No. 6) 1990

Latter-day rock 'n' roll revolutionaries have shown a marked tendency towards swift burnout. They reveal their raw vision to the world, but the world, being the philistine place that it is, turns away; the musicians move on. Sonic Youth, unlike so many of the noise bands that formed in New York at the beginning of the '80s, has had the fortitude to hold on long enough to develop its ideas well beyond the original stances. As a result, the quartet has gotten better and better, moving from cacophony to chilling beauty, arising from the underground to become its emissaries to the real rock world.

The five-song debut EP proves that a reliance on artsy posturing can get boring in an awful hurry. Rigidly defined beats (by original drummer Richard Edson, simultaneously a trumpet player in Konk and later strictly an actor) and disembodied poetic vocals (alternately by guitarist Thurston Moore and bassist Kim Gordon) eviscerate Sonic Youth's principal weapon—jangling, ringing, dissonant guitar noise. This disc is no fun.

With Bob Bert taking over the drum duties, Confusion Is Sex gives the guitars freer rein, and the result is a happily anarchic and intense mess. The tortuous "(She's in a) Bad Mood" captures its subject matter like few songs before it, and a crude cover of Iggy's "I Wanna Be Your Dog" proves that the artistes can rock. The record alternates between pulse and drone; its quiet spaces quickly get cluttered with weirdly tuned percussive guitars, often bowed or struck with drumsticks.

Kill Yr. Idols reprises two tunes from Confusion Is Sex and adds three similarly twisted tracks. Like Confusion, the EP is dark and haunting, particularly on "Early American," where the guitars ring like macabre bells.

Sonic Death, a live compilation of the band's formative years (1981 to '83), offers little song structure, primitive playing, poor sound quality and worse editing. In other words, it effectively documents the noisy breech birth of a legend.

Bad Moon Rising brings Sonic Youth into the light, and shows an enormous developmental leap. The sounds are still harsh—feedback, distortion and dissonance—but the group uses them to create a variety of effects and moods. Like many records made in 1984 and 1985, the album is a statement about America and, while avoiding the ennoblement of the mythological common man, does capture both the beauty and creepiness of the frontier west of the Bowery. The song "Death Valley 69," written and recorded with Lydia Lunch, sounds like X on a bad trip, and puts the band's screaming guitars into a straight rocker. The rest of the disc is more painterly and less propulsive; Sonic Youth gets its explosiveness from the quiet sections, where interwoven guitar parts hint at jarring disorder. The Death Valley 69 EP, its title track a reprise from the LP, also culls one track each from the previous three discs, adding the heretofore unissued anarchy of "Satan Is Boring."

Steve Shelley then replaced Bert, who went on to play with Pussy Galore and later formed a band called Bewitched. The material on EVOL is presented in more basic song structures, giving Sonic Youth more accessibility and versatility than ever before without diluting its brutal strength one iota. The band's command of its resources is so great that rackety shards of atonal guitars can sound almost catchy on tracks like "Green Light." Meanwhile, "Shadow of a Doubt" and the end of "Expressway to Yr Skull" (listed on the back cover as "Madonna, Sean and Me") both take raw, jagged sounds and blend them into a peaceful stillness. EVOL is a very impressive album wherein Sonic Youth makes the step from great noise band to great band. The CD adds a cover of Kim Fowley's "Bubblegum" that also appears on the three-song 12-inch of EVOL's "Starpower."

EVOL was a tough act to follow, but Sister proves well up to the task. Reportedly recorded on all vacuum tube equipment (mixing board and all), the album has a very warm, immediate feel, and the tonalities aren't so strange as to alienate the general public. Not that it's all polished up—far from it—but the emphasis is more on rocking out than on demonic guitar tunings or defining East Village art. Sonic Youth is simply one of the very best American bands of the decade. The CD adds the powerful and haunted "Master-Dik," with guest guitar licks by J. Mascis of Dinosaur Jr.

"Master-Dik" was subsequently recycled as the title track of a bizarre 12-inch that calls itself a single but contains (on the flip) a straight cover of "Beat on the Brat," an impromptu live swipe at "Ticket to Ride," radio interview bites and assorted musical and found-sound rubbish, all haphazardly strung together in a day-in-the-life side of Sonic stupidity.

The productive stirrings of artistic self-discovery on EVOL and Sister flowered on the double-album Daydream Nation, a full-blown and carefully sustained masterpiece that funnels all of the band's past textural explorations and instrumental resources into a staggeringly original and accessible record charged with cultural atmosphere. While putting hummable tunes and easily grasped guitar hooks into songs like "Teen Age Riot," "Silver Rocket," "Total Trash" and "Kissability," the group continues to throw off electric sparks in frenzies of urban noise. Daydream Nation is a completely satisfying blend of invitation and threat. (The CD EP is merely a four-song sampler of the LP that edits "Teen Age Riot" down from its original length.)

Finally signing to a major label, the underground superstars couldn't avoid the predictable backlash, but there's nothing about Goo that suggests sellout. (Indeed, the use of a typically crude and stupid Raymond Pettibon cover is a clear and pretentious nose-thumb at the overground.) Unfortunately, there's also very little about the record that suggests effort, imagination or inspiration. In a pre-emptive strike at the critics, the quartet seemingly overcompensated, removing most of the previous album's progress in favor of self-amused we-can-get-away-with-it nonsense, flat material and lazy playing.

Thurston's "Dirty Boots" is a dandy opener, but sounds like a Daydream Nation leftover. Things run straight downhill from there. In "Tunic," Gordon inexplicably sings lyrics about Karen Carpenter that are only five or six years past their potential morbid kitsch prime; in "Kool Thing," she numbly repeats 1990's most overused catchphrase—"I don't think so"—a bunch of times before holding an absurd aren't-we-totally-def conversation with Public Enemy leader Chuck D. Goo repeatedly strains to be the coolest shit and fails miserably.

Guitarist Lee Ranaldo's solo outing, From Here to Infinity is a challenging adventure in listening. Sonically akin to Metal Machine Music, with plenty of fuzzy drones and repetitious sounds of various descriptions, each short track (most under a minute) ends with a lock groove (the cassette version achieves the same effect by inserting extended pauses between numbers), so they can actually be very long tracks if you want. The sleeve explains that the record, pressed on grey marble vinyl, is a variable-speed 45. Difficult but rewarding.

Cicccone Youth, Sonic Youth's parodic side project with Mike Watt of FIREHOSE, issued a three-song single in 1986, a four-song sampler CD and, after numerous delays, a full LP in January 1989. Besides twiggung Madonna in covers of "Burnin' Up" (included only in its pre-single Watt solo demo form) and the 45's "Into the Groove(y)," and offering an obnoxious version of Robert Palmer's "Addicted to Love," The Whitey Album—a blithering collection of pointless self-indulgent instrumentals, fake hip-hop and spoken/manipulated ephemera—has absolutely nothing to recommend it.

Barefoot in the Head, Moore's record with the two-man sax section of a band called Borbetomagus, takes an absolutely unendurable swipe at improvised free jazz, resulting in a crude and cacophonous collection of bleats, honks and guitar slashes that seems faintly funny when it isn't simply ear-splitting. [j]/dgs/i See also Gut Bank, Konk, Lydia Lunch, Pussy Galore.

SONS OF FREEDOM

Sons of Freedom (Slash) 1988 •

From Vancouver with power: this exciting quartet plays bracing, thoughtful hard-rock with strong melodies and a dynamic rhythmic foundation. Not as metallic or intense as labelmates Faith No More, the Sons concentrate on good songs and hypnotic funk grooves that occasionally (mis)lead them into resembling the Cult. A fury of surging runs and lunging chords, bassist Don Binns dominates the sound, giving singer Jim Newton and Don Harrison—busy building an impressive dual-guitar forcefield—a real run for their place in the mix. Although the album's power (captured cleanly by producer Matt Wallace) makes it consistently striking, Sons of Freedom's best songs (e.g., "Mona Lisa," "The Criminal" and "Fuck the System," whose melody is very nearly a quote from Hair's "Aquarius") are totally cool. [i]

SOUL ASYLUM

Say What You Will ... (Twin/Tone) 1984

Made to Be Broken (Twin/Tone) 1986 •

Time's Incinerator [tape] (Twin/Tone) 1986

While You Were Out (Twin/Tone) 1986 •

Hang Time (Twin/Tone-A&M) 1988 •

Clam Dip & Other Delights EP (nr/What Goes On) 1988 (Twin/Tone) 1989 •

Say What You Will, Clarence ... Karl Sold the Truck [CD] (Twin/Tone) 1989 •

Soul Asylum and the Horse They Rode in On (Twin/Tone-A&M) 1990 •

Emerging from the Minneapolis hardcore circuit (where the young quartet was originally known as Loud Fast Rules), Soul Asylum quickly set about earning a spot in the same league as that city's two leading expunk outfits, the Replacements and Hüsker Dü. Say What You Will, produced by the latter's Bob Mould, ends their punk phase and introduces an awareness of country music and a nascent aptitude for difficult rhythms and deft vocal interplay. Dave Pirner's hoarse singing leaves something to be desired here, but the indication that he possesses real songwriting talent—especially in the wry, often self-deprecatingly depressive lyrics—is encouraging. (In 1989, Say What You Will was reissued on CD with the inclusion of five tracks recorded for, but left off, the original album. What's more, the version of "Black and Blue" on Clarence is not from the LP, but a neat 1981 memento of Loud Fast Rules' first session.)

The confident, emotionally compressed sound and material on Made to Be Broken is light years better: rich dual vocals by guitarists Pimer and Dan Murphy, supported by young new arrival Grant Young's precise, varied drumming and a wash of loudly but subtly interwoven guitars make the tuneful power of "Tied to the Tracks," "Ship of Fools," the countryish "Made to Be Broken" and "New Feelings" staggeringly original and memorable. Additionally, "Never Really Been" reveals the group's ability to convey the same wit and energy on touching (mostly) acoustic guitar ballads; Murphy displays his own songwriting ability on "Can't Go Back." The onomatopoeic "Whoa!" explodes in a breathtaking syncopated fury of incoherent shrieking and stands as one of Soul Asylum's funniest, most accomplished adventures. An astonishing, original and durable record that states the band's case most convincingly.

One highlight of Time's Incinerator—a tape-only compilation of 1980-'86 outtakes (including the first album's five missing songs), covers, concert cuts and other nonsense—is a live version of James Brown's "Hot Pants" sung by bassist Karl Mueller. Otherwise, there are a few ace studio tracks, a lot of justifiable discards and some wild bits of onstage craziness. Unessential, but a worthwhile place-keeper between albums.

While You Were Out (Sides 5 and 6 in the band's consecutively numbered oeuvre) is a disappointment that doesn't do the songs adequate justice. Chris Osgood's production is messy and uneven; the performances sound hurried and the arrangements unfinished. As evidenced on "Carry On," "No Man's Land," "The Judge," "Closer to the Stars"—complex songs filled with melody, energy and intelligence—Pimer's writing (not to mention vocals) just keeps getting better. Murphy's "Miracle Mile" is also a highlight, but the delivery here lacks the clarity and elaboration the material deserves.

A pact between A&M and Twin/Tone landed the band in a New York studio, making Hang Time with the production team of Ed Stasium (Ramones, Julian Cope, Living Colour, etc.) and Lenny Kaye (James, Suzanne Vega). Bolstered by unprecedented sonic excellence and the luxury of time to flesh out and refine their material, Soul Asylum entered the big leagues with a riff-rocking bang. The first two tracks—"Down on Up to Me" and "Little Too Clean"—surprisingly suggest a regression to the '70s chart fare of their youth, but the record abruptly rights itself with the throaty roar of "Sometime to Return" and doesn't again falter. Highlights of a consistently impressive platter are "Ode," "Marionette," Murphy's "Cartoon" (containing such typically succinct lines as "if you're cryin' in your beer you're gonna drown"), the poignant "Endless Farewell" (a wistful ballad on which Pimer plays piano) and the explosively Clashlike "Standing in the Doorway." (That song's 12-inch is worth seeking out for the "James at 16" live medley on the flip: thirteen diverse covers in just over eleven minutes.) The Hang Time CD adds "Put the Bone In," a rude canine double entendre which the group learned, amazingly enough, from the B-side of Terry Jacks' 1974 MOR hit, "Seasons in the Sun."

The six-song Clam Dip EP—whose cover shot of a nude Mueller up to his waist in party food spoofs an old Herb Alpert album sleeve—was scheduled to precede Hang Time (hence the latter's numbering as sides 9 and 10), but didn't. The enjoyable mixture of cover versions (Janis Joplin-by-way-of-Slade's "Move Over," Foreigner's "Juke Box Hero" and "Chains," a terrific Minneapolis new wave obscurity) and originals (including a topical labor song, "P-9," written and first recorded to benefit a striking local) first surfaced on an English label. By the time it was released Stateside, two of the covers ("Chains" remains) were removed, replaced by two weird SA tunes: the horror-movie "Artificial Heart" and a raving funkfest, "Take It to the Groove."

Steve Jordan (the drummer who collaborated on Keith Richards' solo LP) produced And the Horse They Rode in On, exchanging Hang Time's sharply focused studio finesse for a rawer, live sound. (Jordan, ironically, isn't as considerate of Young's superb playing as Stasium and Kaye were, and the album's drum tone is rather tin-canny.) Delicate applications of guitar effects, melodic (on Murphy's chantey-like "Gullible's Travels"), even choral bells (on Pimer's affecting piano lament, the romantic "We 3") give the honest performances extra appeal; the brilliant and varied material does the rest. With a chanted refrain and anti-suicide lyrics that acknowledge Cheap Trick, "Easy Street" is an instant SA anthem; "Veil of Tears," "Be on Your Way," "Grounded" and "Nice Guys (Don't Get Paid)," a bizarre but moral crime fantasy, are all further proof of Pimer's unpretentious songwriting genius and the band's remarkable ability to roar and sigh at the same time. A tremendous record. (Collectors' note: tape, vinyl and CD all have related but different cover art.) [i]

SOULED AMERICAN

Fe (Rough Trade) 1988 •

Flubber (Rough Trade) 1989 •

Around the Horn (Rough Trade) 1990 •

Heavy and heartfelt country'n'strychnine from this hard-touring Chicago quartet. Closer to Neil and Graham than Lefty and George, Souled American specializes in low-key grooves that gurgle and bounce with songwriter Joe Adducci's reggae-style lead bass, Jamey Barnard's slapping New Orleans-style drums and Scott Tuma's shimmering rhythm guitar, which sounds like pedal steel but isn't.

Spotting the heaviest drawls in all god's country, Adducci and co-writer/vocalist Chris Grigoroff pen original material that sounds like long-lost traditional laments. The first side of Fe (group code for "feel") focuses on an imagined rural present, while the flip dishes out a world of hurt. The group masterfully cranks up to speed on Flubber, adding a swampy undercurrent to a thick mix of inscrutable deep-South fantasizing. "Marleyphine Hank" swirls country into dub, while covers of John Fahey ("Cupa Cowfee") and, on the CD, John Prine ("The Torch Singer") lend serious roots credence, if any were needed.

Souled Am's guitarists evoke lazy New Orleans brass-band grooves on the more musically ambitious Around the Horn. While the album includes a song written by Joe's C&W-singing mom Vicki ("I Keep Holding Back the Tears"), "Six Feet of Snow," by Lowell George and Keith Godchaux, heads the band in a southerly psychedelic direction. [rg]

SOULSONIC FORCE

See Afrika Bambaataa.

SOUL II SOUL

Club Classics Vol. One (nr/10-Virgin) 1988 •
Keep on Movin' (10-Virgin) 1988 •
Vol II-1990-A New Decade (10-Virgin) 1990 •

CARON WHEELER

UK Blak (EMI) 1990 •

"A happy face, a thumpin' bass, for a lovin' race." Such is the credo of Jazzie B (Beresford Romeo), radio/club-DJ-turned-record-producer-cum-cultural entrepreneur. Never actually a group, Soul II Soul began as a floating dance happening in East London, where DJ Jazzie B played an eclectic mix of the music he loved best—hip-hop, Philly soul, dub, house and more. In the studio with collaborator/programmer Nellee Hooper and a host of players and singers, he created a sound and a shuffling beat that mixed elements of all these styles; the resultant singles, including the undeniable "Keep on Movin'," caused enough of a stir in England that it was not too much of a stretch to entitle the album that compiled them Club Classics Vol. One. (Lacking that buzz in the States, the album was released here as Keep on Movin'.)

Given the hype that accompanied its trans-Atlantic arrival, the album is shockingly spotty: one cut is repeated twice in a row, the second time featuring an execrable Jazzie B rap. ("Conscious people tend to dance" he portentously intones in a James Earl Jones-goes-dread voice.) The wonderful "Back to Life" is included only in an cappella version. Still, the overall sound of Soul II Soul, while hardly original, is quite refreshing, a soulful and equally au courant alternative to hip-hop.

In the meantime, singer Caron Wheeler, the featured vocalist on "Keep on Movin'" and "Back to Life," announced that she was embarking on a solo career. Some expressed doubt that Jazzie B could put over Soul II Soul without Wheeler's exceptionally warm and clear voice. But while she is missed, Vol. II-1990-A New Decade is actually a more consistent and cohesive album than the first. Claiming no instant classics but offering no filler either, it's enjoyable from drop to stop, and Jazzie B keeps his little happy raps bearably brief, couching them inside songs rather than making entire cuts of them.

Wheeler's solo debut, UK Blak, presents yet another mixed bag. Boasting nine (!) different co-producers, the album is eminently listenable—a groove that hardly ever lets up—but very few songs make a real strong impression. The title cut is great, tackling the ambitious topic of cultural assimilation, and Wheeler's songwriter paints her as intelligent and goodhearted. But talk about mixed messages—one minute she's staking feminist ground for her autonomous existence, and the next she's telling a lover that "I am honored to be your lady." Please, nobody introduce her to Stephen Stills. [gk]

SOUND

Jeopardy (nr/Korova) 1980
Live Instinct EP (Hol. WEA) 1981
From the Lions Mouth (nr/Korova) 1981
All Fall Down (nr/Korova) 1982
Shock of Daylight EP (A&M) 1984
Heads and Hearts (nr/Statik) 1985
In the Hothouse (nr/Statik) 1985
Heads and Hearts and Hothouse and Shock of Daylight [CD] (nr/Statik) 1986 •
Thunder Up (Can. Network) 1987 •

ADRIAN BORLAND AND THE CITIZENS

Alexandria (Bel. Play It Again Sam) 1989

It's hard to understand why this London quartet never found commercial success. At their best, the Sound's excellent neo-pop bears favorable comparison to the Psychedelic Furs and Echo and the Bunnymen. Jeopardy has a stark, beautiful quality, with the material given direct exposure rather than a production bath. Adrian Borland's vocals are sincere and gripping; the musical attack is both subtle and aggressive.

The inconsequential Live Instinct contains four songs recorded onstage in London, including renditions of the band's 1979 debut single ("Cold Beat") and a few Jeopardy songs. The recorded performances add little to the studio versions.

From the Lions Mouth builds on Jeopardy's firm foundation with a fuller sound that faintly recalls U2. Produced by Hugh Jones (around the same time he did Echo's Heaven Up Here), it's bright, dramatic and sometimes ("Fire," "Sense of Purpose," "Winning") powerful. A riveting LP—the group's best.

Pushed by their label to sound more commercial, All Fall Down is the defiant reply—a stark, barren landscape of harsh tones and dark passages. The black, clashing music makes the challenging LP an acquired taste, an ambitious, admirable exploration of the downside; not surprisingly, the record company sent the band packing.

Shock of Daylight—a six-song mini-album produced by Pat Collier—is a strong return, building melodic, dramatic songs on a gutsy bass/drums drive, overlaying guitar, keyboards and even brass to create an attractively textured and varied sound. Heads and Hearts is even better, a quilt of bright colors woven with simple care. Though it lacks the knockout punch they'd shown in the past ("Winning" or Shock of Daylight's "Golden Soldiers," for example), the record's modesty and continuous flow make it a thoroughly engaging listen, a memorable LP whose sum is greater than its parts.

In the Hothouse is a double live thriller from London's Marquee, with all the claustrophobic ambience of the club's packed space coming through on the recording. Live records this immediate sounding are hard to find. With the bulk of the material chosen from Heads and Hearts and Lions Mouth, this is a superb introduction for the curious.

Thunder Up is a middle ground between All Fall Down's emotional warfare and the later, more sensuous pop. Punching right in with one of their most exciting tracks ("Acceleration Group"), the LP is a rollercoaster ride through desolation ("Shot Up and Shut Down"), titillation ("Kinetic"), cynicism ("Prove Me Wrong") and profound beauty ("You've Got a Way"). Though the contrast can be jarring, unpredictability is a strength, and this is a bold up/down, hot/cold, built-up/knocked-down record most bands would not attempt. It was to be their last such uncompromising work; the group finally called it quits in early '88.

Borland's subsequent solo career got off to a good start with Alexandria, as he brings a variety of moods to the alternately austere, sensuous and lighthearted pop, revealing a mild Velvet Underground influence. More swimming strings and tasteful background horns add to the overall warmth of this acoustic-based, romantic LP. "Light the Sky" and "Beneath the Big Wheel" pair somber detachment with graceful chord changes; elsewhere, the deeply moving, strings-to-the-fore "Rogue Beauty" shows Borland still capable of dramatic flourish. [cpl/i/jr]

SOUND BARRIER

See Tot Taylor and His Orchestra.

SOUNDGARDEN

Screaming Life EP (Sub Pop) 1987

Fopp EP (Sub Pop) 1988

Ultramega OK (SST) 1988 •

Louder Than Love (A&M) 1989 •

Screaming Life/Fopp [CD] (Sub Pop) 1990 •

Just when you thought the '70s were over . . . along comes Seattle's Soundgarden, spearheading the Northwest's revival of that non-metal rock gulch between late-'60s innovation and late-'70s rebellion, years in which groups like Grand Funk, Led Zep and Mountain—shirtless men singing about shirtless women—dominated, erecting monuments to indiscriminate penile guitar worship with endless wank'em-crank'em solos. Remember those good old days? Well, they're back, and Soundgarden's reliving'em.

The accomplished six-song Screaming Life EP introduces Chris Cornell's Robert Plantish vocals, Kim Thayil's turgid guitar talents, Hiro Yamamoto's rubbery bass action and Matt Cameron's steady-as-she-goes drumming. While the music is happily unspecific in its derivation—the assimilation of both classic rock riffs and punk noise ("Entering" specifically quotes Bauhaus) keep things interesting—it's impossible to overlook the absurdity of Cornell's unabashed Percy tribute. (The Screaming Life encompasses the Fopp EP: three live tracks, including a remake of Green River's "Swallow My Pride," and a pointless dub mix of the titular Ohio Players cover, complete with apocalyptic found-sound drama.)

After signing to A&M, Soundgarden released an album through SST as part of the large label's plan to build a new rock/metal dynasty from the ground up.

Although still mired in the '70s, Ultramega OK is noticeably better than Screaming Life, with less self-conscious posturing and more evidence of an emerging personality. Cornell has reduced (without actually eliminating) his reliance on Plant clichés, but the traces of Ozzy Osbourne caterwauling in his voice are not a good omen. These guys can sure play, but an inadequate comprehension of what constitutes songs (a subject their archetypes, for all their failings, always understood) leaves Soundgarden in an unhealthy nudge-nudge-wink-wink relationship with the past, attempting to get by with references (the inclusion of Howlin' Wolf's "Smokestack Lightning"—just the sort of cover Led Zep would have done—is emblematic of their historical shorthand) rather than original material of real merit.

A sloppy, disorganized murk of dull sound (credit co-producer Terry Date, who seems to have captured only the slackest performances) and plodding songs which could be covers of Led Zep discards, Louder Than Love is a most ineffectual major-label debut. Thayil throws out licks haphazardly, whether they fit or not; the rhythm section does nothing beyond (more or less) keeping the beat; Cornell is in strong form but back to his old fringed-leather tricks. Even when songs begin to hit their stride with a workable groove or a pattern that moves, they fall apart on the bridge (or vice versa) A rewrite of the descending riff from "Dazed and Confused" with Jeff Beck fillips, "Uncovered" is the closest the record comes to finding and sticking with an idea that works; the chords of "Big Dumb Sex" hold together, but the lyrics are unendurably stupid. The '70s might not have been so bad after all . . . [i]

See also Temple of the Dog.

SOUP DRAGONS

Hang-Ten! EP (nr/Raw TV Products) 1986

Hang-Ten! (Sire) 1987

This Is Our Art (Sire) 1988 •

Lovegod (Big Life-PolyGram) 1990 •

This young Scottish foursome garnered a lot of initial interest because of their striking musical resemblance to the Buzzcocks. Singer Sean Dickson's falsetto whine, in front of the speedy grind of his and Jim McCulloch's guitars, made the Soup Dragons the very reincarnation of those punk-pop pioneers. An admirable point of reference, to say the least.

The four-song Hang-Ten! EP followed two well-received UK singles. The blistering title track can be aptly described as punk-surf-pop—the Beach Boys sifted through the Buzzcocks, if you will. The other songs run about the same speed, and are just as outstanding.

The American Hang-Ten! album collects the UK EP, three songs from a previous single ("Whole Wide World"), and three songs from a later single ("Head Gone Astray"). All reaffirm the band's reverence for the Buzzcocks tradition.

This Is Our Art (subtitled Useless, boring, impotent, elitist and very, very beautiful.) is a shock. The new-sound Soup Dragons are devoid of any Buzzcocks references, mutating instead into a bizarre assortment of styles: '60's garage psychedelia ("Great Empty Space"), hard rock (the Black Sabbath-sounding "Passion Protein") and Scottish funk ("King of the Castle"), to mention just a few. It's an amazing range, yet there's something insincere about these songs, which seemingly don't know when to end.

For Lovegod, the Soup Dragons' second proper album, the group abandoned any punk edge they may have once had and embraced young Britain's burgeoning Ecstasy-fueled trippy dance culture. This redirection paid off, as the funky, anthemic cover of the Rolling Stones' "I'm Free" (featuring guest toasting by Black Uhuru's Junior Reid) became a hit both in England and the States. With its odd, house-influenced rhythms and Dickson's obviously mind-expanded lyrics dominating all the other tracks, the record is nothing if not consistent. As such, it's also deeply repetitive. In small, er, doses, though, percolating ditties like "Backwards Dog" and "Kiss the Gun" are primo dancefloor fodder. (The CD adds a dub mix of the title track and the "Crotch Deep Trash" single.) [ag/db]

SOUTHERN DEATH CULT

See Cult.

SPACE

See Justified Ancients of Mu Mu.

SPACEMEN 3

Sound of Confusion (nr/Glass) 1986 (nr/Fire) 1989 •
The Perfect Prescription (nr/Glass) 1987 (Genius) 1988 •
Transparent Radiation EP (nr/Glass) 1987
Performance (nr/Glass) 1988 (nr/Fire) 1988 •
Playing with Fire (nr/Fire) 1989 (Bomp!) 1989 •
Spacemen 3 EP (nr/Fire) 1989
Taking Drugs to Make Music to Take Drugs To (Father Yod Production) 1990
Recurring (Dedicated-RCA) 1991 •

SONIC BOOM

Spectrum (nr/Silvertone) 1990 •

To bake a mind-altering cake nowadays, you've got to smash a few sugarcubes. Unlike bands who get all cutesy with the pop trappings of '60s acid-rock, Spacemen 3 are content to let the music be its own hallucinogen. At the outset, their records lay down a droning thick-pile carpet of overdriven guitar and mongoloid drumming; later on, they began exploring the equally unsettling powers of more tranquil waters. Not as self-consciously arty as Sonic Youth or as decisively melodic as the Jesus and Mary Chain, Spacemen 3 follow both stylistic poles of the Velvet Underground with more wholehearted enthusiasm than most of the group's self-appointed apostles.

Recorded as a quartet (including, for once, an on-board drummer), Sound of Confusion brings the psychedelic sound of Rugby (an industrial city near Birmingham) to bear on a mixture of bizarre covers (Glen Campbell's "Mary Anne," Iggy Pop's "Little Doll," the 13th Floor Elevators' "Rollercoaster") and originals that all sound exactly the same. Except for the clever pun of "Hey Man" (sung as if it were the homonymic gospel assent) and the bonus dynamics of "2.35," the album roars along on the precipice of monotony, with only the frequent appearance of vocals to ensure listener consciousness.

The Perfect Prescription finds Jason Pierce (guitar, organ, vocals), Sonic Boom (guitar, organ, vocals) and Pete Bassman (bass) abruptly reducing the dosage with lots of sonic space, varied instrumentation (acoustic guitar, violins, horns, keyboards) and very little percussion. Although things heat up towards the end, much of the album—like its quietly contemplative string-driven centerpiece, a cover of Red Crayola's "Transparent Radiation"—is pretty and evocative, but hardly engrossing. (The Glass cassette adds 40 minutes of bonus material, including an endless version of "Rollercoaster" and a lengthy reworking of "Starship," a Sun Ra adaptation from the first MC5 album; the Fire CD tacks on two bonus B-sides.) Transparent Radiation contains two different renditions of the title track, a distended version of the album's placid "Ecstasy Symphony," "Starship" and one other item to counter the band's tender tendencies.

Performance, recorded semi-loud and live in Amsterdam before—judging by the meager applause—an audience of three, introduces a new song ("Come Together," a blatant lift of the Who's "I Can See for Miles"), recycles favorite covers ("Mary Anne," "Rollercoaster," "Starship") and puts forth three other songs, including "Take Me to the Other Side" and "Walkin' with Jesus," respectively the darker and lighter sides (and two of the best songs) from The Perfect Prescription.

Playing with Fire is the trio's crowning achievement, a perfectly integrated mixture of trippy pop, spaced-out poetry, acoustic romance and mind-boggling guitar devastation. The album starts out gentle ("Honey"), turns explosive ("Revolution") and then settles into an obsessive drone (the tributary "Suicide") that dominates Side 2. Throughout, the Spacemen exhibit solid songwriting and careful control of their art, modulating the album's mood ring with the ease of experienced navigators. (The American vinyl edition is on colored wax; the British CD adds two live cuts. Additionally, two thousand copies of Spacemen 3, an untitled 12-inch—stock number THREEEBIE 3—containing 1988 live versions of "Revolution," "Suicide" and "Repeater," plus the uneventful drone-instrumental "Live Intro Theme (Xtacy)," were distributed free to purchasers of the British album.)

As legally dubious as its title suggests, Taking Drugs, a document of the quartet's prehistory (early 1986), resembles the first album (with which it overlaps three songs) except in the degree of sonic intensity and the sound quality. Besides songs that found their way intact onto S3 LPs, this neat artifact includes a developmental version of "Walkin' with Jesus" entitled "Sound of Confusion" and the second album's "Come Down Easy," poppy proof that the group was capable of restraint from the very beginning.

With S3 nearing collapse (Jason Pierce launched his own band, Spiritualized, in mid-1990, with an enjoyably grandiose rendition of Chip Taylor's "Anyway That You Want Me," a '66 hit for the Troggs), Sonic Boom (Peter Kember; on the first Spacemen LP he was billed as Peter Gunn) made Spectrum, an album more noteworthy for its ambitious adjustable op-art sleeve than its content. With playing assists from Jason as well as the Jazz Butcher and members of the Perfect Disaster, Sonic stays inside the one-chord amelodic vamps of Spacemen country, tightening the stylistic bond to Suicide by covering the duo's "Rock 'n' Roll (Is Killing My Life)." But the album has a serious lack of vitality. Where Sonic ought to rev things up (a few real songs would have been nice), he turns nearly subliminal, and the instrumental portion of the doomy "If I Should Die," which closes the album, floats away on strains of lighter-than-air atmosphere (A 10-inch bonus record entitled Octaves and Tremelos was offered by mail to purchasers of Spectrum.)

Surprising fans who assumed they would never work together again, Jason and Sonic did reunite for another album. The buzzing guitars and shy organ that drone gently through "Why Couldn't I See?"—the second song on the narcotically relaxed Recurring—amount to sitar-free raga-rock, laying a poppy (poppie?) bed for the vibratoed and reverbed wispy vocals. Otherwise offering an undated adaptation of '60s folkie acid-rock with elements of the Beatles, Stones and others, the lulling pleasant album—one of the most subtly retro-styled records of the current English scene—contains both sides of the Spacemen's 1989 UK single ("Hypnotized" b/w "Just to See You Smile"), an incongruous sequencer-driven dance track ("Big City"), an ominous bluesy cover of Mudhoney's "When Tomorrow Hits" and such future flashbacks as "Set Me Free/I Got the Key," the "Hang on Sloopy"-derived "I Love You" and "Feel So Sad." [i]

See also Darkside.

SPACE NEGROS

Maximum Contrast from Moment to Moment EP (Sounds Interesting) 1979

The Space Negros Go Commercial EP (Arf Arf) 1980 + 1984

Have a Lousy Xmas EP (Jingle Jungle-Arf Arf) 1981

The Space Negros Do Generic Ethnic Muzak Versions of All Your Favorite Underground Punk/Psychedelic Songs from the Sixties (Arf Arf) 1987

FAMILY FUN

Record (Eat) 1981

Before there was a Mission of Burma, two of its future founders played in this minor Boston group, alongside keyboardist/producer Erik Lindgren, a future member of Birdsongs of the Mesozoic. The 7-inch Maximum Contrast contains six offbeat offerings of experimental synth'n'tape tricks.

That same year, the original Space Negros fell apart; Go Commercial (shades of the Residents), another 7-inch with eight songs, is actually a Lindgren solo record. His upbeat pop songs—sort of a synth-happy R. Stevie Moore—are witty and sophisticated. The B-side includes a cover of the Yardbirds' "Happenings Ten Years Time Ago." The 1980 rendition of that classic took a Kraftwerkian electro-pop approach; the record's 1984 reissue replaced it with a heavy metal guitar version. Have a Lousy Xmas offers a topical foursome of laughable ill cheer originals (e.g., "Jingle Hell") played by Lindgren with Space Negro alumnus Roger Müller and others.

The windily titled album, recorded between 1981 and 1985 with a large number of instrumental contributors, consists entirely of exotically idiomatic (raga, bluegrass, Balkan, etc.) easy-listening instrumental interpretations of songs originally popularized by such venerable musical organizations as the Seeds, Who, Easybeats, Balloon Farm, Smoke, 13th Floor Elevators, Hotlegs and Tomorrow. Not as conceptually explosive as the Residents, perhaps, but delightful.

Flupper may have a gripe against Public Image for lifting their concept of a generic record sleeve, but Family Fun—a Lindgren-led quartet—has them both beat. The cover of their 1981 EP (one side of four electro-pop tunes with Sara Goodman providing folkie vocals over the slightly off-kilter backing and a side of instrumental "EZ Listening Music") mimics the no-name products in grocery stores by carrying only the word "RECORD" stenciled over "Net Wt. 4.9 Oz. (45 RPM.) 135 g." [i]

See also Birdsongs of the Mesozoic, Mission of Burma.

SPANDAU BALLET

Journeys to Glory (Chrysalis) 1981 •

Diamond (Chrysalis) 1982 •

True (Chrysalis) 1983 •

Parade (Reformation-Chrysalis) 1984 •

The Singles Collection (Chrysalis) 1985 •

The 12-Inch Mixes (nr/Reformation-Chrysalis) 1986 •

Through the Barricades (Epic) 1986 •

Heart Like a Sky (nr/Reformation-CBS) 1989 •

Viewed at the start by some as adventurous and trendsetting, the ludicrous garb and chic disco of London's Spandau Ballet were both dubious new wave developments, but spawned much replication. Head poseur Tony Hadley and his four cohorts (including songwriting guitarist Gary Kemp) found success with a heavily rhythmic brand of distant funk-rock dolled up with synthesizers and stentorian singing. Produced by Richard James Burgess, Journeys to Glory contains one great dance hit (actually, one tightly compressed riff: "To Cut a Long Story Short," their first single) and a batch of variations thereon. With the addition of horns and other reformulated moves, Diamond—issued in the UK as a set of four 12-inch singles as well as a regular single album—also produced a few more estimable British chart smashes ("Chant No. 1," "Paint Me Down"). Possessing only limited talent themselves, Spandau opened the floodgates to a wave of superior electro-dance bands who had little trouble creatively eclipsing them.

Spandau then abandoned synthesizers and high-tension funk for schmaltzy pop with soul pretensions. Working with the production team of Tony Swain and Steve Jolley, the fivesome cut True and Parade, the first yielding several attractive blends of energy, melody, warmth and stylishness ("Communication," "Lifeline") as well as some of the sappiest MOR in memory ("True," which became a global hit). Generally less wimpy-out, Parade nonetheless continues the bland chart fare, with the stylistic divergence best represented by "Revenge for Love" (good) and "Only When You Leave" (egregiously mellow).

During legal tumult between Spandau and Chrysalis, the label issued a collection of the band's singles, followed by a UK-only compilation of extended remixes.

The wretched Through the Barricades dumps the Perry Como snooze for an overheated American album-rock sound that echoes Eric Carmen, REO Speedwagon (or is it Styx?) and Billy Joel. Gary Langan's co-production (with the group) has all the earmarks of a desperate last-ditch grab at reclaiming US airplay. Kemp's songs are worthless; the echo on Hadley's melodramatic warbling (backed in maximally clichéd fashion by a female trio) only makes the whole affair more laughable.

With the cinematically inclined Kemp brothers getting good notices for their work in The Krays, Spandau's days may be numbered. But the group (no longer meriting American release—is that any way to treat a Top 5 act six years later?) hasn't given up yet. A characterless nothing whose blandly antiseptic soul, rock and funk stylings sound like an amalgam of VH-1's worst mushmongers, Heart Like a Sky's main entertainment value lies in the clumsy syntax of Kemp's greeting-card sentiments. (At random: "Two young babes in a foreign land/Draw no milk from the dusty sand/Close their eyes from the night so cold/Feel the love in their mothers [sic] hold.") Say goodnight, boys. [i]

SPARKS

Halfnelson (Bearsville) 1971
 Sparks (Bearsville) 1971
 A Woofer in Tweeter's Clothing (Bearsville) 1972
 Kimono My House (Island) 1974
 Propaganda (Island) 1974
 Indiscreet (Island) 1975
 Two Originals of Sparks (nr/Bearsville) 1976
 Big Beat (Columbia) 1976
 Introducing Sparks (Columbia) 1977
 No. 1 in Heaven (Elektra) 1979
 Best of Sparks (nr/Island) 1979
 Terminal Jive (nr/Virgin) 1979
 Whomp That Sucker (Why-Fi-RCA) 1981
 The History of Sparks (Fr. Underdog) 1981
 Angst in My Pants (Atlantic) 1982
 Sparks in Outer Space (Atlantic) 1983
 Pulling Rabbits Out of a Hat (Atlantic) 1984
 Music That You Can Dance To (Curb-MCA) 1986 •
 Interior Design (Fine Art-Rhino) 1988 •
 Mael Intuition: The Best of Sparks 1974-1976 [CD] (nr/Island) 1990 •
 Profile: The Ultimate Sparks Collection (Rhino) 1991 ◊

Ron and Russell Mael—two enormously talented wisecracks from Los Angeles—have influenced numerous bands through their own records and outside projects; it's possible to trace many contemporary musical trends back to the pair's prescient and trailblazing efforts. Although their lengthy recording career has the consistency of chunky peanut butter, some of their albums are truly wonderful in a number of stylistic modes. Sparks remain unpredictably capable of greatness each time they enter the studio.

As an art-rock quintet called Halfnelson, Sparks made their earliest, misanthropic efforts to appeal to the neurotic nouveau pop segment of 1971 America via a debut album produced by Todd Rundgren. First released as Halfnelson (by Halfnelson), it was promptly withdrawn, repackaged and reissued as Sparks (by Sparks). That original band—sort of Marlene Dietrich meets the Stooges—included Earle Mankey, who went on to become a producer (and recording artist) of some note, and his brother Jim, who later formed the chartbound Concrete Blonde. The album is a subtle and brilliant exposition of unique talent, displaying the Maels' remarkable facility for bizarre, dadaist lyrics and Russell's scaringly falsetto. The triumphant A Woofer in Tweeter's Clothing refined, energized and improved on the first LP; it's a demented blueprint of incomprehensible weirdness. Many hated them, few heard them, but none who did forgot them on the basis of this utterly individual effort. (Although not issued there at the time, the first two LPs were packaged together and reissued in Britain after the group's success.)

Moving to London and recruiting an all-new set of sidemen, keyboardist Ron and singer Russell hooked up with producer Muff Winwood and made a series of singles (many included on the first two Island albums) that turned them into enormously popular glam-pop teen idols. Mixing prolix and profoundly funny wordplay with killer hooks and a solid guitar-and-piano-based sound, Sparks were the forerunners (and, to some extent, instigators) of the skinny tie Anglo-pop revival that swept America a few years later. Two brilliant albums (Kimono My House and Propaganda) worked that irresistible formula, but the gimmicky wore thin; Indiscreet, produced pompously by Tony Visconti, has some terribly boring, unbelievably overblown numbers amidst the succinct pop smashes. Sparks were outgrowing bubblegum.

Their lock on the top of Britain's charts ended, the Maels fired their band and returned to America to begin a very bad career patch, starting with Big Beat. They benefit from a bit of leftover momentum (and perhaps material) from their previous work, but it's basically a poor homecoming. (The band for this record included head Tuff Dart Jeff Salen on guitar, ex-Milk 'n' Cookies bassist Sal Maida and drummer Hilly Michaels.) The far worse Introducing, recorded with LA session men, is Sparks' creative nadir.

The group's complex saga then began to involve Giorgio Moroder, who produced No. 1 in Heaven, converting the one-time pure-guitar-poppers into a driving Euro-disco synthesizer machine, pounding out repetitive drum-laden dance grooves. Only semi-successful, musically speaking, it does deserve credit for predated the entry of countless other rock groups onto the high-tech dance-floor. Terminal Jive, the only Sparks album not released in the US, tempers the funk but suffers a serious personality loss, the result of the Maels' co-writing too much of the material with others.

Leaving the disco behind, Sparks next began an alliance with a Moroder associate, German producer Mack. They recorded Whomp That Sucker in Munich with their first steady band since Indiscreet: David Kendrick, Leslie Bohem and Bob Haag (who also work on their own as Gleaming Spires). The songs reclaim some of Sparks' early pop wit, but with new maturity and dignity. A definite improvement, it's still a transitional record, leading the Maels out of the creative woods with some ace numbers, but they're still not at peak power.

Angst in My Pants, however, is that promise fulfilled, a top-notch collection of tunes with offbeat humor, winning melodies and excellent arrangements, displaying the benefits of touring with a band. It's the first new Sparks album that belongs alongside Woofer and Kimono. The self-produced In Outer Space features Jane Wiedlin (then in the Go-Go's) duetting with Russell on two songs, and is a mixed creative success due to songs that drag and a shortage of stunning lyrics. The equally inconclusive Pulling Rabbits Out of a Hat, produced by Ian Little, has better material, less personality and only a few outstanding tracks. Perhaps tiring of unrewarded cleverness, the album's most durable effort is "With All My Might," a syrupy ballad distinguished by its plainspoken emotionalism.

Hooking up with yet another record label (but keeping the band intact), Sparks next made Music That You Can Dance To, an aggressively loud high-energy dance record—dynamic keyboards, mock-symphonic arrangements and Bohem's bass play a large part—that has its moments (the title track, "Change," "The Scene") and its mistakes (a painful version of Stevie Wonder's "Fingertips"). Clever lyrics help, as does the Maels' inventive self-production. (In an outrageous attempt to mislead, Curb's 1990 CD reissue of the album is titled The Best of Sparks: Music That You Can Dance To.)

The patchy Interior Design was recorded in Russell's home studio with just a keyboard player and a guitarist, making it the first bandless outing since Terminal Jive. Despite a few good songs ("The Toughest Girl in Town," the dance-happy "So Important"), reliance on synthesizers leaves the album sounding choppy and monochromatic. The CD adds three songs: "Madonna," "Big Brass Ring" and "So Important."

The 1979 British compilation has the group's six hits (1974-'75) and another half-dozen tracks from the same era. Besides reprising half of Terminal Jive, the '81 French compilation includes three songs from No. 1 in Heaven, two each from Woofers and Whomps That Sucker, and the first LP's "Wonder Girl."

At 20 tracks, Mael Intuition is less a compilation of Sparks' three Island albums than a listener's digest of them. Still, the choice of omissions is not without flaws: "Talent Is an Asset"? "Who Don't Like Kids"? "How Are You Getting Home"? This is a good introduction, but it's no substitute for the original albums (nor a good excuse for their unavailability on CD). Profile is a career-spanning two-disc/two-cassette compilation of album tracks plus a few rarities. The CD configuration has eight bonus tunes. [i]

See also Concrete Blonde, Gleaming Spires, Earle Mankey, Telex.

SPEAR OF DESTINY

Grapes of Wrath (nr/Burning Rome-Epic) 1983

One Eyed Jacks (nr/Burning Rome-Epic) 1984

World Service (nr/Burning Rome-Epic) 1985

Outland (Virgin) 1987 •

The Epic Years (nr/Epic) 1987 •

The Price You Pay (nr/Virgin) 1988 •

Radio Radio EP [CD] (nr/Virgin) 1988 •

CRAZY PINK REVOLVERS

First Down! (nr/Chainsaw) 1987

Timeless Smiles EP (nr/ABC) 1987

At the Rivers Edge (nr/ABC) 1988 •

Following the stormy existence of Theatre of Hate, singer/guitarist Kirk Brandon and bassist Stan Stammers launched Spear of Destiny. Grapes of Wrath, produced by Nick Launay, unveils a straightforward guitar/bass/drums quartet; Andy Mackay-like saxophone work provides the sole distinguishing tonal component. Brandon's songs are a drag—spare, dirgey things with hopeless quasi-Scottish melodies and self-important, insignificant lyrics. Slight Nick Cave tendencies don't add enough extremism to salvage these effortlessly ignorable tracks.

One Eyed Jacks introduces a different, larger lineup (including ex-Tom Robinson Band drummer Dolph Taylor); the superior results lean alternately towards Big Country and Adam Ant. A basically inept vocalist with nothing in the way of a natural instrument, Brandon sings everything like he's rousing the troops for a final assault, a tactic that overpowers the flimsy tunes. Lacking a feel for full-blown majesty (like Richard Jobson), he's too zealous for his own good.

Co-produced by SOD and Rusty Egan, World Service is again hindered by Brandon's horrifically bad singing. He repeatedly misses notes on "Rocket Ship" and makes the lyrics on "Come Back" sound almost unpronounceable. The operatic melody of the title track exposes all of his aural inadequacies at once. With that, Brandon discharged his band, signed to Virgin and went right on doing what he's always done.

On the occasion of the band's departure from the label, The Epic Years—unceremoniously dumped on the market right on top of SOD's new LP—cherry-picks the first three albums, including five songs that were minor UK hits as singles.

Outland, which unites Brandon with ex-Ant guitarist Marco Peroni [sic], the Barnacle brothers rhythm section and producer Zeus B. Held, isn't a bad record. The advent of goth-metal groups like the Cult, Sisters of Mercy and the Mission makes marble-mouthed Brandon seem far less offensive in context; perhaps he's also improved a bit. (Naaah.) While nowhere near a desert island disc, Outland is a reasonable current example of rough'n'ready semi-political rock by a sincere, if limited, individual. (The UK CD and cassette add five bonus tracks, most of them alternate mixes of LP tracks.)

Brandon maintains his never-say-die romantic punk ethos on The Price You Pay, an album that brought him a UK Top 40 with "So in Love with You." (The CD adds two.) Radio Radio—a 3-inch CD produced by Alan Shacklock and packaged in a black matte tin—consists of the titular album track and three soundalike B-sides.

Following his departure from SOD, bassist Stan Stammers formed Crazy Pink Revolvers. [i]

SPECIALS

The Specials (2-Tone-Chrysalis) 1979 •

More Specials (2-Tone-Chrysalis) 1980 •

Ghost Town EP (2-Tone-Chrysalis) 1981

The Peel Sessions EP (nr/Strange Fruit) 1987

The Singles Collection (Chrysalis) 1991 ◊

SPECIAL A.K.A.

The Special A.K.A. Live! EP (nr/2-Tone) 1980

In the Studio (2-Tone-Chrysalis) 1984 •

STAN CAMPBELL

Stan Campbell (Elektra) 1987 •

Coventry's Specials spearheaded the British ska revival in 1979, with leader/keyboard player Jerry

Dammers also serving as head of 2-Tone, the band's trendsetting label, which altered pop culture by releasing records by Madness, the Beat, Selector and Body-snatchers.

Produced by Elvis Costello, the Specials' debut LP also boasted the assistance of an elder statesman of blue-beat, trombonist Rico Rodriguez, an original member of Jamaica's Skatalites. With the double lead vocals of Terry Hall and Neville Staples, guitarists Lynval Golding and Roddy Radiation, and an impeccable rhythm section composed of John Bradbury and Sir Horace Gentleman, the Specials were widely acclaimed as the most exciting band to emerge in 1979, and their impact continued well into the '80s.

The Specials contains such classic 2-Tone (as the sound came to be called) numbers as "Doesn't Make It Alright," "Too Much Too Young," "A Message to You Rudy" and (on the American edition) the hit single "Gangsters." Mixing socially and politically aware lyrics with infectious dance rhythms, The Specials served as a virtual blueprint for many bands to follow. A few months later, under the full Special A.K.A. handle, the band released a hot 7-inch EP—recorded live in London and Coventry—that includes "The Guns of Navarone" (a Skatalites classic in the previous decade) and a side-long medley of covers dubbed "Skinhead Symphony."

Unfortunately, their momentum foundered with the release of More Specials. The group abandoned the fresh sound of their debut in favor of a more turgid experimental approach. (More does, however, contain some prime material: "Enjoy Yourself" and, in the US, "Rat Race.") Rumors of internal strife abounded, and though the Specials managed to release the angry Ghost Town 12-inch—which went straight to number one in riot-torn Britain—the original band soon succumbed to infighting. Hall, Staples and Golding split off to form the Fun Boy Three, and other members drifted off as well.

By then it was clear that the Specials name was merely a vehicle for whatever Dammers would do, but it was three reportedly arduous years before he completed the "group" 's third album, pointedly titled In the Studio. Working with several steady associates (notably vocalists Stan Campbell and ex-Body-snatcher Rhoda Dakar, in addition to loyal drummer John Bradbury) plus a large pool of sessioneers, Dammers filled the album with disarmingly varied, largely unstylized (nothing you would really call ska) essays on serious political topics ("Racist Friend," "Free Nelson Mandela," "Alcohol") leavened by the lighthearted ("What I Like Most About You Is Your) Girlfriend." Striking but troubled, the music's easygoing bounce belies the overweening polemicism.

The Peel session, from May 1979, includes live run-throughs of "Gangsters," "Too Much Too Young," "Concrete Jungle" and "Monkey Man" by the original band. The Singles Collection has the three tracks from the Ghost Town EP, two live cuts from the '80 EP, some non-LP single sides and a lot of redundancy: album tracks that were issued as 45s.

In 1987, ex-Special Campbell released a bland soul/reggae-flavored commercial solo album. A vocal resemblance to Michael McDonald of the Doobie Brothers is only one of Stan's problems; his dull originals and underdone cover versions ("Don't Let Me Be Misunderstood," "Crawfish" and "Strange Fruit") are the others. [jw/i]

See also Colour Field, Fun Boy Three, Selector.

CHRIS SPEDDING

Chris Spedding (nr/RAK) 1976 •

Hurt (nr/RAK) 1977 •

Guitar Graffiti (nr/RAK) 1978 (Fr. Fan Club) 1989 •

I'm Not Like Everybody Else (nr/RAK) 1980 (Fr. Fan Club) 1989 •

Friday the 13th (Passport) 1981

Mean and Moody (nr/See for Miles) 1985

Enemy Within (Fr. New Rose) 1986 •

Cafe Days (Fr. New Rose) 1990 •

One of Britain's top session guitarists of the '70s (even participating in records by the furry Wombles!), Chris Spedding has had a truly aberrant solo career. A veteran of numerous outfits starting in the '60s, Spedding made several LPs under his own name before joining Andy Fraser's post-Free band, Sharks, who made two hard-rocking LPs in 1973 and '74. (Spedding also played on one of Sharks vocalist Snips' subsequent solo outings.) After that band split, Spedding released a succession of LPs that combine exquisite rock guitar with lackluster vocals and songs so vapid as to be virtually nonexistent. (On a 1970 Japanese release, he dispensed with vocals entirely.) The highlight of Chris Spedding is a novelty item called "Guitar Jamboree" which features Spedding aping various guitar heroes in a show of chameleonlike virtuosity.

We pick up the story later in 1976, however, when Spedding teamed up with the then-unrecorded Vibrators for a great single, "Pogo Dancing," the first punk dance record. Hurt, Spedding's next LP, is a more solid follow-up, thanks to Chris Thomas' crisp production. The material is generally better, and there's one outstanding number, the ominous "Lone Rider."

Guitar Graffiti finds Spedding meandering again, producing a crass attempt to cash in on his new wave credibility (legitimately established through his seminal alliances with the Sex Pistols and the Cramps, for whom he produced demos, and the Vibrators). The worthwhile track is "Hey, Miss Betty," the only one produced by Thomas; the song is a rocking homage to '50s bondage queen Betty Page.

In 1979, Spedding surprised everyone by joining the Necessaries, a New York band that included former Modern Lover Ernie Brooks. Though he kept a low profile—refusing featured billing within the group—the combination of his dark pop ditties and leader Ed Tomney's preppie sensibility never melded. Spedding added brilliant leads to Tomney's material, but his songwriting still lacked coherency, and in some instances he abandoned guitar for keyboards. Spedding split without fanfare after less than a year (he was gone by the time the Necessaries made their LP in 1981), returning to England to record I'm Not Like Everybody Else, an album of his Necessaries-era material.

Friday the 13th is a live set on which Spedding is joined by former Sharks/occasional Talking Head bassist Busta Cherry Jones and New York drummer Tony Machine. Featuring a selection of songs from all the above-listed albums, Friday the 13th was released primarily as an ersatz retrospective of his RAK material. Showing off Spedding's guitar work in the context of some extended soloing, it's the best of the lot.

Spedding does a fairly good Dave Edmunds turn on Enemy Within, mixing a few rock'n'roll classics ("Love's Made a Fool of You," "Shakin' All Over") with unprepossessing originals, filling them all with twangy guitar work and serviceable vocals that somehow resemble Mark Knopfler. "Hologram," co-written with Marshall Crenshaw, is a highlight of this likable record. [tr/i]

See also Necessaries, Vibrators.

SPEED THE PLOUGH

See Feelies.

SPHERICAL OBJECTS

Past and Parcel (nr/Object Music) 1978
Elliptical Optimism (nr/Object Music) 1979
Further Ellipses (nr/Object Music) 1980
No Man's Land (nr/Object Music) 1981

NOYES BROTHERS

Sheep from Goats (nr/Object Music) 1980

Manchester's Spherical Objects were led by Steve Solamar, a terrible singer with an intensely personal viewpoint. His songs concern typical subject matter, but utter lack of selfconsciousness invests his writing with more openness and introspection than you're probably hoping to hear.

The five Objects of Past and Parcel play simple rock that's lightweight but pleasant; Solamar's overbearing vocals spoil it. Elliptical Optimism has the same lineup and a more textured sound, featuring organ (prominently) and trumpet (occasionally). The songs are instrumentally inventive, while the vocals are less abrasive but no more interesting.

Further Ellipses takes a danceable turn, playing it smooth and rhythmic with more horns and synthesizer and less guitar. Solamar's singing continues to resemble David Thomas' but sounds too forced to be believably weird. The musical development is impressive, the songs are good, but the same old problem persists.

No Man's Land, which announces itself to be the final Spherical Objects album, has a different lineup from the previous three and sounds it. Gone are the keyboards and horns, replaced by rudimentary guitar/bass/drums plus patches of Solamar's wailing harmonica. There are some very pretty songs that are slowed down to add emotion, but overall the initial impression isn't as strong as Further Ellipses. A strange way to go out, No Man's Land is a record that slowly reveals itself to be quite lovely in spots.

With the help of Manchester indie scene fixture Steve Miro, Solamar managed to dam his stream-of-consciousness long enough to allow for the collection of the Noyes Brothers' atypically unrevealing double-LP set. More experimental than the Objects' concurrent work, Sheep from Goats owes more than a little to German groups like Can. While a few of the redundant, largely free-from-instrumentals could easily be dispensed with, there are moments worth remembering, from the amusing (an apparent Fall parody dubbed "Bo Scat Um I.D.") to the lovely (the side-long instrumental "It Seemed Like a Good Idea at the Time") to the freakishly prescient (an excursion into what sounds like modern-day computer-enhanced hip-hop christened "Byte to Beat"). [i/dss]

SPIZZ ET AL.

See Athletico Spizz 80.

SPLIT ENZ

Mental Notes (Aus. Mushroom) 1975
Mental Notes (Chrysalis) 1976
Dizrythmia (Chrysalis) 1977
Frenzy (Aus. Mushroom) 1979 (A&M) 1982
The Beginning of the Enz (Aus. Mushroom) 1979
True Colours (A&M) 1980 •
Waiata (A&M) 1981
The Beginning of the Enz (nr/Chrysalis) 1981
Time and Tide (A&M) 1982
Enz of an Era—Greatest Hits 1975–1982 (Aus. A&M) 1982
Conflicting Emotions (A&M) 1983 •
See Ya Round (Aus. Mushroom) 1984
The Living Enz (Aus. Mushroom) 1985
History Never Repeats: The Best of Split Enz (A&M) 1987 •

New Zealand's Split Enz began their recording career in pleasantly uncommercial fashion, writing gently eccentric tunes that echoed the softer side of Foxtrot-era Genesis. A compilation of demos, Mushroom's The Beginning of the Enz chronicles those earliest days and finds Tim Finn's bittersweet singing style starting to work its magic.

For Mental Notes—their first proper album—the Enz took shape as a sprawling seven-piece, including spoons player Noel Crombie. They had grown overtly weird and flamboyant, with many tunes resembling little, distorted symphonies. The effects don't always work, simply because flakiness carried past a certain point can't be taken seriously on any level. The Genesis parallel holds here as well.

By the time Roxy Music's Phil Manzanera produced the second Mental Notes, the Enz were ready for the world beyond. Bizarre carnival costumes and distorted upsweep hairdos served as colorful attention-grabbers. Tim Finn's wistful voice adds a sweet patina to disoriented and lyrically offbeat outings like "Stranger Than Fiction" and the morbid "The Woman Who Loves You."

Dizrythmia made a distinct lurch towards the mainstream, thanks primarily to the departure of co-leader/guitarist Phil Judd, replaced by Tim's brother Neil. With Tim in full command, the melodically intricate material went from coldly quirky to genuinely appealing, even cute. Highlights: the dizzy "Bold as Brass" and "Cross-words," at once bristling and ornate.

The second LP to be called Beginning of the Enz is a distillation of tracks from Chrysalis' Mental Notes and Dizrythmia.

Financial woes subsequently forced the band to work on a diminished budget. With Neil Finn contributing songs and vocals as well as guitar, the Enz cut Frenzy, poppier still and less elusive than before. It's hampered by cheap sound, but "I See Red" is a delightfully tuneful whirlwind, and "Mind Over Matter" re-creates the warmly majestic quality of the best of Dizrythmia. The US/UK version of the LP differs from Mushroom's by half.

The Enz staged a full assault on America with True Colours. They had become a cuddly pop band with sweet vocals, crackerjack melodies and hardly any strangeness. Fortunately, the material is genuinely first-rate, including the bouncily contagious "I Got You" and "I Hope I Never," a plainly melodramatic number suitable for Barbra Streisand. (As a marketing ploy, the LP was pressed on laser-etched plastic and packaged in variously colored covers.)

Although Waiata (issued in Australia under the Aborigine title Corroboree) has gorgeously haunting tracks like "Iris" and "History Never Repeats," as well as adorable ones like "Clumsy," there's a hint of blandness around the edges. The Enz show no desire to surprise here, and seem on the verge of becoming a hipper Bee Gees

Happily, Time and Tide restores the passion, adding a new sense of wonder to the palatable melodies. "Dirty Creature" (of habit), "Hello Sandy Allen" and "Make Sense of It" all merit inclusion in the Enz hall of fame, blending a gentle beauty with vaguely unsettling otherworldliness.

Conflicting Emotions is effectively the band's swan song, and it's hard to imagine a grander exit. Keeping the ethereal melodies intact, the Enz finally build up the physical side of the music to equal strength. The playing is tough and direct like never before; "Bullet Brain and Cactus Head," "I Wake Up Every Night" and others drive hard without obscuring the wholesome moralism of the lyrics. The message? Try to lead a good life. Who could quarrel with that?

The final Enz studio LP, See Ya Round is an unusually mild affair, hard to remember once it's over. However, it's of historical note as Neil Finn's warmup for his massive success with Crowded House. Big bro' Tim has flown the coop, leaving Neil in charge, with a golden opportunity to make his own mistakes and get the art affectations out of his system once and for all. Which he apparently did: compare the pale version of "I Walk Away" here with the full-bodied reading on the first Crowded House LP.

The Living Enz is a decent two-disc live set from a band not widely known for its stage performances. History Never Repeats, a lovingly assembled posthumous compilation, has swell liner notes by Cary Darling and Tim Finn and contains such Enz necessities as "I See Red," "History Never Repeats," "I Got You" and "I Hope I Never." Split Enz reunited briefly in 1989 and played an old-time's-sake show in New Zealand. [jy]

See also Crowded House, Tim Finn, Swingers.

SPLODGENESSABOUNDS

Splodgenessabounds (nr/Deram) 1981

In Search of Seven Golden Gussets (nr/Razor) 1982

Live and Loud!! (nr/Link) 1988

Drummer-turned-singer Max Splodge led this fiercely tasteless London joke which actually scored a couple of UK hits in 1980. The rest of the crew on the eponymous debut sports names like Miles Runt Flat and Pat Thetic Von Dale Chiptooth Noble. The record includes an order form for such delectables as "moulded bum logo badge" and is generally concerned with various bodily functions and scatological maladies (not to be confused with scat melodies!), with only the scantest trace of humor. Except for some clever song titles, this is utterly worthless tripe.

Splodge has stayed around the scene, joining the Angelic Upstarts (!) in the late '80s while keeping the Splodgenessabounds concept alive. The supposedly live album—recorded by a quartet in front of an obviously fake throng of cheering thousands—has some mildly funny stuff ("I Fell in Love with a Female Plumber from Harlesden NW10") amid the predictably mexcusable rubbish ("Michael Booth's Talking Bum," "Crabs," etc.). [i]

See also Angelic Upstarts.

SPOOKS

See Curtiss A.

MARK SPRINGER

See Rip Rig + Panic.

SQUALLS

Rebel Shoes (Dog Gone) 1987

No Time (Dog Gone) 1988

Although the Squalls aren't exactly immune to the Athens environment, the eclectic Georgian sextet is too unaffectedly artless in its polite pop-folk-rock to strongly resemble any of their musical neighbors. Rebel Shoes is earnestly bland, a colorless ice-breaker of no special merit; the engaging No Time has more energy, skilled musical variety and hooky melodic strength. (If only singer Bob Hay's voice didn't occasionally make the group sound like Dire Straits . . .) A Squalls style is emerging, but it's not there yet. [i]

SQUEEZE

(U.K.) Squeeze (A&M) 1978 •

Cool for Cats (A&M) 1979 •

6 Squeeze Songs Crammed into One Ten-Inch Record EP (A&M) 1979

Argybargy (A&M) 1980 •

East Side Story (A&M) 1981 •

Sweets from a Stranger (A&M) 1982 •

Singles—45's and Under (A&M) 1982 •

Così Fan Tutti Frutti (A&M) 1985 •

Babylon and On (A&M) 1987 •

Frank (A&M) 1989 •

A Round and a Bout (Deptford Fun City-IRS) 1990 •

HARRY KAKOULLI

Even When I'm Not (nr/Oval) 1981

DIFFORD & TILBROOK

Difford & Tilbrook (A&M) 1984 •

Squeeze's songwriting team of Glenn Tilbrook (melody) and Chris Difford (words) has been compared favorably to Lennon and McCartney; that's not only a reflection of their abilities but also an indication of how little real craftsmanship is found in rock'n'roll these days. Like their supposed models, Difford and Tilbrook are blessed with enormous talent which has often enabled them to get by on less than full expense of effort. What has often passed for ingenuity in Squeeze has, in fact, been little more than glibness.

A classic premature debut, Squeeze finds the five lads barreling through inconsistent material, a situation exacerbated by John Cale's cluttered production. However, "Take Me I'm Yours" and "Bang Bang" (both produced by the band) show spirit and potential.

Squeeze entered adolescence with Cool for Cats. Primary vocalist Tilbrook, a sweet triller, and the gruffer Difford show greater confidence at the mic; together, they create arresting, odd harmonies to go with their bent pop tunes. Wonderful cuts abound, including "Slap & Tickle," a sleazy synth rocker, "Cool for Cats," a modern pub-rock romp, and the cinematically inspired "Up the Junction," three minutes of working-class heartbreak that outdoes McCartney for pathos. 6 Squeeze Songs, a well-chosen mini-greatest hits, was an effort to establish the band in the US.

Squeeze grew up on Argybargy. Tilbrook and Difford had found their style and were settling into it, creating finely etched pop music with increasing intricacy. "If I Didn't Love You" is wryly awkward; "Farfisa Beat," is a delightful throwaway; "Pulling Mussels (from the Shell)" teaches a herky-jerky lesson in catchy cleverness. Any lack of commitment is outweighed by the witty humor, variety and freshness of the material. Holland then left and was replaced by Paul Carrack.

If the Beatles parallel holds, East Side Story is Squeeze's White Album. Produced by Elvis Costello and Roger Bechirian (apart from one cut by Dave Edmunds), the jumble of fourteen songs touches on everything from soul to country to psychedelia. Each tune qualifies individually as a glittering little gem, but the album lacks coherence; still, it's a dazzling tour de force. Highlights include Carrack's vocal showcase ("Tempted"), "Someone Else's Heart," a Difford excursion into sentiment that recalls the Zombies, "Mumbo Jumbo," reflecting Costello's influence, "Messed Around" (a slick piece of fake rockabilly) and the winsome "Is That Love."

Don Snow replaced Carrack as the band pulled back slightly from the elaborate excesses of East Side Story for Sweets from a Stranger, without any loss of class. "When the Hangover Strikes" conducts a leisurely trip into Cole Porter land, while "I've Returned" soars on the strength of an exuberant Tilbrook vocal and ringing guitars. But again, the record has little coherence or musical vision.

Squeeze concentrated on making albums rather than singles after Cool for Cats, so Singles-45's and Under, a compilation released soon after the announcement of the band's dissolution, serves little purpose, pleasant though it may be. As the band's selection of which LP tracks to release as 45s often seemed totally arbitrary, there's no sense of occasion. Even "Annie Get Your Gun," the one new track, isn't great.

As it was their decision to disband Squeeze and continue writing and performing together, Difford and Tilbrook surprised no one by releasing an album that, except for being funkier and even more boring, basically sounds no different from the band's lesser efforts. Joined by the rest of a Squeezelike lineup (drums/bass/keyboards) plus occasional horns and strings, the dull duo try to come on like Hall and Oates, but lack the cynical instincts to make a slick veneer interesting. "Action Speaks Faster," "Love's Crashing Waves" and "Picking Up the Pieces" are merely turgid, overproduced and lifelessly smooth.

After two years of unsatisfying divorce, Tilbrook and Difford reconvened Squeeze with original pianoman Jools (now Julian) Holland, drummer Gilson Lavis and a new bassist, Keith Wilkinson (ex-Nasty Pop). But things didn't fall into place. The Laurie Latham-produced Cosi Fan Tutti Frutti is a bland collection that generally repeats the Difford & Tilbrook laxo-soul approach to much the same (non-)effect. The utterly depressive "Last Time Forever," while sonically impressive, is a regrettably somber development for this once-giddy band.

The new Squeeze—including second keyboardist Andy Metcalfe (simultaneously serving as Robyn Hitchcock's bassist)—righted itself on Babylon and On, a confident and likable return to the band's pre-breakup sound and form. "Tough Love," "Footprints" and especially "The Prisoner" affirm Squeeze's aptitude for agreeable pop. However, dubious stabs at soul and funk (like "Hourglass" and the annoying "853-5937") fall flat, and Tilbrook's sitar playing on the insipid "Some Americans" is downright absurd.

The tragically overlooked Frank completed Squeeze's rehabilitation, bringing the group full circle to a modernized version of jaunty pub rock. Relocating its original magic with memorably inventive material and spirited delivery, Squeeze here seems exuberantly youthful, as if music-making had suddenly become fun again. From giddy celebrations of new romance ("If It's Love," "Peyton Place") to sardonic views of emotional wreckage ("Slaughtered, Guttled and Heartbroken," "Rose I Said"), the songs surge with wit and melodic energy. (And who else would write a truly sensitive song about melancholy and menstruation?) Coproduced by Tilbrook and Eric Thorngren, Frank has a relaxed, live-in-the-studio sound that makes it intimate and inviting. Easily Squeeze's best since Argybargy.

The same enthusiasm flows in A Round and a Bout, recorded live at a pair of English dates in January '90. Matt Irving (keyboards, accordion) joins the Hollandized lineup for an utterly delightful career summary, including four numbers from Frank. The brisk, non-nonsense performances work wonders, recharging everything on the program. Proof that miracles do happen: an upbeat overhaul turns the plodding "Black Coffee in Bed" into a marvelous jolt of pop soul. Even the audience-participation "If It's Love" sounds like fun.

Following his involuntary departure (after Cool for Cats), original bassist Harry Kakoulli recorded a like-minded set of dignified pop tunes. Even When I'm Not is an adequate record, although his compositions lack the clarity and crackle that typify Difford and Tilbrook's best work. [jy/i]

See also Paul Carrack, Jools Holland.

SQUIRREL BAIT

Squirrel Bait (Homestead) 1985 •

Skag Heaven (Homestead) 1987 •

The only precedent most critics could find for the manic, crackling, power-pop destruction of Louisville, Kentucky's Squirrel Bait was Husker Dü, and that myopic, ignorant comparison may unfortunately be the main way the band's music is remembered. But singer Peter Searcy's anguished delivery was like a frightened Paul Westerberg, ten years younger (and twice as animal brutish), on eighteen cups of coffee—the terrified scream of a boy being chased by an axe-murderer. With a total lack of refinement or restraint, David Grubbs and Brian McMahan's distorted guitars threatened to blow the felt right out of your speakers. An immense sonic overload with monster hooks.

The self-titled debut may be a bit too thrashy for those unused to such fast speeds, but "Sun God" into "When I Fall" pack a total power wallop. The far better, more mid-tempo Skag Heaven manages to keep this intensity and great songs coming throughout, right from the opening shocker "Kid Dynamite." An eye-opening, blasting, sweaty, over-the-edge satori not for the timid. Unfortunately, the group packed it in before its release (the members scattered to various colleges and launched other musical ventures), thereby diminishing Skag Heaven's impact and relegating Squirrel Bait to the little-known root of a burgeoning indie-band family tree. (Both records are available on a single compact disc.) [jr]

See also Bastro, Big Wheel, Bitch Magnet, Slint.

SQUIRRELS GROUP

See Young Fresh Fellows.

SS DECONTROL

The Kids Will Have Their Say! EP (XClaim!) 1982

Get It Away (XClaim!) 1983

SSD

How We Rock (Modern Method) 1984

Break It Up (Homestead) 1985

Boston's SS Decontrol was, to some minds, the most important New England hardcore band of the early '80s. With its now quaint cover shot of shiny-headed little punks charging the Massachusetts State House and such blistering, simple rockers as "How Much Art," The Kids Will Have Their Say was a pivotal event in Boston hardcore history.

Likewise, Get It Away helped define the city's straight-edge movement and remains a definitive hardcore classic. Seven quick songs on a 12-inch leave plenty of spare vinyl, but the impact couldn't possibly be any greater. From the opening "Glue," in which vocalist Springa addresses the need to hold together the straight-edge coalition, to the EP's closer, a cover of the Buzzcocks' "No Reply," guitarists Alan Barile and Francois Levesque tear open a sonic hole with a devastating metal-on-metal grind. With some predictable but astounding amateur musicianship on "Forced Down Your Throat," and "Nothing Done," as well as a fleeting flirtation with dub in "Get It Away" and "Under the Influence," SS Decontrol hit its enduring hardcore peak.

The following year, SS Decontrol (now billed merely as SSD) became one of the pioneers in the now-common shift from hardcore to thrash-metal. While the cover of How We Rock features gothic lettering and a glossy gold backing, it's not that bad a record, a consciously brainier variation on hard-rock traditions. How We Rock was, at the time, slagged by hardcore purists, but it stands as a crucial step in the evolution of underground rock.

Break It Up, the quintet's first full-length LP (and their last recording) was again trashed in some quarters for its metallic strivings, but curious rock students would do well to give it another spin. Considered from a post-Seattle vantage point, Break It Up couldn't possibly be considered heavy metal. (For one thing, it's not nearly heavy enough.) Springa's Noddy Holder rasp and the band's melodic guitar rock may have even less to do with punk than metal (except for Levesque's flashy solos), but it should be noted that this convincing take on '70s Brit-rock predates those bands commonly credited with that particular archaeological dig. [icm/i]

STAINS

Stains (SST) 1983

More than one turn-of-the-decade punk band—including the Austin, Texas group that became MDC—called itself the Stains, but the Latin-American LA quartet that issued an album (recorded in 1981) on SST is remembered as an early and skilled pioneer of hardcore's metal developments. A heavier and humorless mid-speed variation on early Black Flag, the accomplished and well-produced (by Spot) Stains has standard punk attributes but breaks the rules: guitarist Robert Becerra doesn't just play chords in lockstep with the bass, rather he works in and around the patterns and takes occasional brief solos.

A decade later, the Stains—who had evidently broken up for a number of years—resurfaced on the LA club scene playing heavy metal. [i]

CHRIS STAMEY

It's a Wonderful Life (DB) 1983

Instant Excitement EP (Coyote) 1984

It's Alright (Coyote-A&M) 1987 •

CHRIS STAMEY GROUP

Christmas Time (Coyote) 1986

One of the guiding lights of the Southeast's nouveau-pop explosion, Chris Stamey led North Carolina's pioneering Sneakers before moving to New York, recording ultra-pop records on his own label, playing with Alex Chilton and forming the dB's. Recorded while Stamey was still in that band, It's a Wonderful Life (subtitled, on the back cover in reverse type, "It's a Miserable Life") takes him far afield from the offbeat Big Star sound for which he is best known. Joined by longstanding compatriots Ted Lyons and Mitch Easter, Stamey plays mesmerizingly moody and somber tunes ("Winter of Love," "Depth of Field," "Oh Yeah!") and aggressive demi-pop ("Never Enters My Mind"). Elsewhere, he warps the lyrics of "Tobacco Road" over a nearly all-drums background ("Get a Job"), offers cynical humor about urban life in a jarring, percussive setting ("Brush Fire in Hoboken") and plays a quiet piano piece with tape effects (the aptly named "Still Life #3"). The only relatively straightforward pop song is the bitter "Face of the Crowd." Overall, a strange and unsettling album, filled with fascinating adventures and subcurrents of profound unhappiness.

Opting out of the dB's on the eve of the group's first American album, Stamey instead made his own Instant Excitement, an odd but more upbeat hodgepodge which encompasses a homely reading of John Lennon's "Instant Karma," an idyllic love song ("When We're Alone"), a frisky country-rocker and an instrumental opus, "Ghost Story." Produced by Don Dixon, the songs are somewhat more typical of Stamey's original outlook and played with little attempt to impose a style in the studio. Eclectic and a little casually underbaked, but likable and, in spots, utterly touching.

The delightful Christmas Time mini-album introduces Stamey's new combo (actually the same people credited on Instant Excitement) and marks a brief reunion with the dB's. The original songs are all seasonal: "The Only Law That Santa Claus Understood," "You're What I Want (For Christmas)," "Snow Is Falling," even a new acoustic version of the unexpectedly appropriate "It's a Wonderful Life." The attractive title track sounds a lot like Brian Wilson's reflective mode.

Stamey recorded and toured extensively with the Golden Palominos and then settled down to make It's Alright—the most emotionally lucid pop-rock album of his career—with a snazzy collection of old and new friends. Alex Chilton, Richard Lloyd, Anton Fier, Mitch Easter, Faye Hunter, Bernie Worrell and Marshall Crenshaw are among the players. The songs vary from boppy ("Cara Lee") to somber ("The Seduction") to loud ("Incredible Happiness") to idyllic ("27 Years in a Single Day") but Stamey's dry, plaintive voice invests it all equally with peerless sincerity and familiar melodic appeal.

Stamey played second guitar behind Bob Mould on the latter's first-LP tour in 1989; two years later, Stamey teamed up with ex-bandmate Peter Holsapple and made an excellent duo album. [i]

See also dB's, Sneakers.

STARJETS

Starjets (Portrait) 1979

Spunky if unoriginal, this Belfast quartet showed some promise, but not enough to really count. The album consists of simple punky rock, with added melody and restraint (plus some clever touches, like Beach Boys harmonies), but not as poppy as the Undertones. The lyrics rerun predictable subject matter—school, camaraderie, war, stardom—and the music's not strong enough to divert on its own merits. Likable but lost. Some Starjets later wound up in the Adventures. [i]

See also Adventures.

STEEL POLE BATH TUB

Butterfly Love (Boner) 1989 •

Lurch EP (Boner) 1990 •

Tulip (Boner) 1991 •

Given the shared cultural experiences of the twenty-something generation, a noisy power trio that puts a picture of Marcia Brady on the cover of its mighty debut album could be accused of demographic pandering. Fortunately, Steel Pole Bath Tub—born in Montana, based in San Francisco and including a drummer with roots in the primordial stew that belched forth Seattle's current longhairs—thrashes about with enough unrestrained fervor and animal lust on Butterfly Love to attract an audience that probably kicked in their TV screens at an early age. SPBT stretches out on the less-appealing Lurch (also included on the Butterfly Love CD), reveling in frantic guitar noise for its own sake and demolishing several of the songs with long patches of fairly pointless feedback cacophony. [i]

STEEL PULSE

Handsworth Revolution (Mango) 1978 •

Tribute to the Martyrs (Mango) 1979 •

Caught You (nr/Mango) 1980 •

Reggae Fever (Mango) 1980 •

True Democracy (Elektra) 1982 •

Reggae Sunsplash '81 (Elektra) 1982

Earth Crisis (Elektra) 1983 •

Reggae Greats (Mango) 1984 •

Babylon the Bandit (Elektra) 1986 •

State of... Emergency (Loat-MCA) 1988 •

In the mid-'70s, this young English sextet from Birmingham—inspired into existence by Bob Marley's Catch a Fire—found an affinity with the righteous rebellion of white new wavers and built its early reputation largely by touring British punk venues (as documented on live anthology records from Manchester's Electric Circus and London's Hope and Anchor). Steel Pulse's crossover appeal derives in large part from its young, modern thoughtfulness, but even more so from the group's incredible strength as one of the world's very best self-contained reggae units.

Steel Pulse's virtues include a gorgeous, multi-textured musical palette (especially on the first album and much of Caught You), intelligent lyrics (most notably on Handsworth Revolution, but also on Tribute to the Martyrs), a wondrous, sinuously propulsive beat and sweet lead vocals by Selwyn "Bumbo" Brown, who also has a nice quasi-seat style. Criticisms: the music, while always ear-enriching and heartfelt, lacks consistently memorable tunes. An increasing tendency towards preachy, trite lyrics on Caught You (retitled Reggae Fever in America) is a disappointment, since songwriting guitarist David Hinds has already shown he can do better.

If Caught You is Steel Pulse at its most pop-oriented, True Democracy has the band reaching for the most common denominator. Steel Pulse's best falls between the two extremes. Which brings us to Earth Crisis, where tasty use of synth and sharp production make it their finest, most consistent album since Tribute to the Martyrs. As for the documentary festival album, Reggae Sunsplash '81, Steel Pulse has an entire side, but never quite shakes a frustrating stiffness and artificiality. Pass it up. Reggae Greats is a compilation.

With the release of Babylon the Bandit, however, it was clear that the band's professed ideals were no longer jibing with their attempts to crack the (American) market. Protest lyrics swathed in slick, upwardly mobile production were pretty hard to take seriously, and the LP sank like a stone.

The group then left Elektra and, three years later, returned on MCA with State of Emergency. Although still fairly hi-tech, the LP isn't as aggressively slick as its predecessor, and is saved by the determined performances of uneven songs. The fiery energy that marked the group's early work still manages to come through. [jg/bk]

STEEL TIPS

Steel Tips EP (Red) 1981

Universally ignored and/or abhorred during their existence, Steel Tips were one of the few punk bands in the late '70s to wallow in and lionize actual street-level violence, as opposed to costumes and makeup. At a time when sado shock was an easily marketable commodity, this New York group trafficked in genuine physical assault, attacking their jaded tuff punk audiences. Spiralling away from the 1978 debut 45, "Krazy Baby" b/w "96 Tears" (featuring soon-to-be-infamous art and battery confrontational geek Joe Coleman on his sole recorded vocal with the group; he was generally relegated to support antagonist behind prime antagonist Tom O'Leary), the group dropped the goofy quirk of that 45 and by the '81 EP (which included a bonus 45) was playing a thicker, superficially meaner and more accomplished new wave thrum. Frontman O'Leary, a sociopathic biker with little but contempt for the thrill-seeking crowds, played the clubs like Godzilla played Tokyo; unfortunately neither he nor his band had the slightest inkling how to translate their stomp and slash into musical terms, and left behind a musical legacy no more enduring than Tuff Darts or the Shirts. [ab]

MARTIN STEPHENSON & THE DAINITIES

Boat to Bolivia (nr/Kitchenware-London) 1986 •

Gladsome Humour & Blue (nr/Kitchenware-London) 1988 (Kitchenware-London-Capitol) 1989 •

Salutation Road (Kitchenware-London-Capitol) 1990 •

Those old enough to remember Donovan's late-'60s albums, on which he combined strains of folk, rock, blues and wispy jazz with sincere, unpretentious singing, have a good reference point for Martin Stephenson and the Daintees.

Hailing from a small town outside of Newcastle (which he reputedly never left until he was 27), singer/guitarist Stephenson is a performer of extraordinary warmth and depth whose major strength is his gift for understatement. On Boat to Bolivia, he's presented in a variety of settings—from reggae to ragtime—and seems entirely at ease in all of them. At a time when music is thoroughly dominated by urban and suburban voices, many of Stephenson's songs offer a refreshing rural perspective.

Gladsome Humour & Blue tones down the stylistic eclecticism of Bolivia in favor of a darker, even more introspective approach, with strings and acoustic instruments at the forefront on most tracks. This is Stephenson's least immediate, most subtle album, though many of the songs project an almost religious intensity. Not light listening, but rewarding. (The American Gladsome is a double-vinyl/single-CD-or-cassette package that includes Boat to Bolivia in its entirety.)

Teamed up with American producer Pete Anderson (Dwight Yoakam, Michelle Shocked), Stephenson's outlook is considerably brighter—often downright celebratory—on Salutation Road. Anderson puts him in more of a rock setting than on either previous album, spicing things up with horns and background vocalists on many of the tracks—but never to the detriment of the star, who responds with some of his best performances yet. A lovely record. [ds]

STEPPEES

The Steppes (Mystic) 1984

Drop of the Creature (Vox) 1987

Stewdio (Vox) 1988

Tourists from Timenotyet (nr/Bam Caruso) 1988

Enquire Within (Vox) 1989

Harps & Hammers (Vox) 1990

Though they apparently have a substantial cult following in Europe, the Steppes remain inexplicably obscure in the States. A shame, since this far-flung quartet (singer/songwriters John and David Fallon reside in Ireland; the American rhythm section lives in Oregon and San Francisco) is easily one of the best and most distinctive combos of the current neo-psychedelic crop, combining a subtly baroque musical sensibility with an ability to pull off ambitiously original arrangements and production ideas. The Steppes capture the essence of vintage psychedelia without sounding pretentious or unduly derivative.

The band's albums have steadily grown more accomplished and impressive, from the friendly acoustic stylings of the limited-edition eight-song debut to the multi-textured mini-epics of their more recent efforts. Stewdio, Enquire Within and Harps & Hammers are all mesmerizing, extraordinarily realized works whose inventive musical settings belie their low-budget origins. Tourists from Timenotyet combines tracks from Drop of the Creature and Stewdio. [hd]

STETSASONIC

On Fire (Tommy Boy) 1986

Sally EP (Tommy Boy) 1988

In Full Gear (Tommy Boy) 1988 •

Blood, Sweat & No Tears (Tommy Boy) 1991 •

A fine example of rap's producer-oriented developmental process, Brooklyn's Stetsasonic began as a trio of rappers (Daddy-O, Delite and Fruitkwan), a keyboardist/drummer/scratcher (DBC) and two mixers (Prince Paul and Wise). The sound of On Fire is hard and spare: one-at-a-time raps over rhythm tracks (including human beat box noises) with sporadic bits of music added. Topics are likewise familiar ("My Rhyme," "Faye," "Bust That Groove"), but Stetsasonic has a decisive sound that takes full advantage of the varied voices.

Prince Paul (Huston) subsequently emerged as a talented and successful second-generation producer, working with Queen Latifah, De La Soul, 3rd Bass and others. Meanwhile, Daddy-O, Wise and DBC all gained enough studio skills to produce tracks for the diverse and marvelously entertaining In Full Gear.

As a precursor to Stef's second coming, the Sally 12-inch contains two versions of the title tune (which faintly resembles—without quoting—Wilson Pickett and Sly Stone) and three mixes of "DBC Let the Music Play," which surprisingly almost uses a rock drumbeat for its bed. The album itself adds a customized version of the Floaters' 1977 soul classic, "Float On" (with labelmates the Force M.D.'s guesting), a bottom-heavy lesson in musical geography ("Miami Bass") and a dozen more entertaining mixtures of genial hip-hop, '70s soul, amusing raps and other expressions of the group's fertile imagination.

Despite the liner notes' dubious claim that "Stetsasonic is the one and only Hip Hop Band and the future of soul music," there's no argument that the ambitious Blood, Sweat & No Tears is extraordinary, an engaging state-of-the-art album seamlessly loaded with diverse music, thoughtful and/or amusing raps and more friendly family atmosphere than an Italian wedding. With positive power and enough production and rhyming talent for three groups, the six-man crew (now including a fulltime drummer) covers a wide range of topics—from politics ("Free South Africa," "Corporate America"), social issues ("Ghetto Is the World") and autobiography ("To Whom It May Concern," "The Hip Hop Band," "Heaven Help the MF's") to peers ("Uda Man," "Do You Remember This"), a favorite fan ("Speaking of a Girl Named Suzy") and parties ("So Let the Fun Begin"). Marvelous. [i]

STEVE STEVENS ATOMIC PLAYBOYS

See Billy Idol.

TOM STEVENS

See Long Ryders.

DAVE STEWART

See Eurythmics.

MARK STEWART AND THE MAFFIA

Learning to Cope with Cowardice (nr/Plexus) 1983

MARK STEWART

As the Veneer of Democracy Starts to Fade (nr/Mute) 1985 •

Mark Stewart + Maffia (Upside) 1986 •

Mark Stewart (nr/Mute) 1987 •

Metatron (Mute-Restless) 1990 ◊

Teamed with dubmeister Adrian Sherwood and his Tackhead associates (Keith LeBlanc, Doug Wimbish and Skip McDonald), ex-Pop Grouper Stewart produces what could best be described as avant-garde reggae on Learning to Cope with Cowardice. Making a wide left turn past Sly and Robbie, the disc is dark and forbidding, with a plethora of ghostly, off-center sounds floating in and out of nowhere, rarely paying heed to musical convention. At times, things get gimmicky enough to resemble a demo disc for effects units, but Cowardice is a rewarding album with political consciousness.

Stewart's convictions push further to the fore on his second album. As the Veneer of Democracy Starts to Fade abandons reggae for a disorienting marriage of big-beat drums and dissonant electronics that is not unlike early Cabaret Voltaire. Several tracks feature taped authoritarian voices that you probably thought only existed in your nightmares.

Mark Stewart + Maffia, Stewart's first US release, is a compilation culled from those first two LPs (plus one non-LP cut), and is well worth it for those who don't have the imports. Stewart's next LP, simply titled Mark Stewart (although the same Mafia—note the new spelling—members are present), pushes funk and stripped-down metal; while Stewart and Sherwood's aural experiments work well in this context, running out of ideas doesn't deter them from letting a track go on for seven or eight minutes. The lyrics are uncharacteristically innocuous—some are even kind of smug. The CD contains a bunch of extra remixes of cuts that were already too long. Stewart is a very talented artist who should be mandatory listening for anyone who thinks using synthesizers only means sounding like the Human League, but those wishing to sample his work should go for the US compilation and leave this one alone.

By contrast, Metatron has a much warmer, more immediate feel, and the band really gets a chance to explode. The sparing and effective use of electronics leaves plenty of room for crunching guitar cascades atop a megabeat rhythm section. Stewart's lyrical visions have shifted from revolutionary politics to paranoia about late-20th-century life: "These Things Happen" is his response to a bloodthirsty "human time bomb . . . an accident waiting to happen." Musical ideas are still more or less at a premium, as riffs are prolonged ad nauseum and passed off as complete songs. The CD adds an instrumental version of the opening "Hysteria," which sounds an awful lot like Black Sabbath's "Iron Man." [dgs]

See also Pop Group, Tackhead.

STIFF LITTLE FINGERS

Inflammable Material (Rough Trade) 1979 (Restless Retro) 1990 •

Nobody's Heroes (Chrysalis) 1980 (Restless Retro) 1990 •

Hanx! (Chrysalis) 1980 (Restless Retro) 1990 •

Go for It (Chrysalis) 1981 (Restless Retro) 1990 •

Now Then . . . (nr/Chrysalis) 1982

All the Best (nr/Chrysalis) 1983 •

The Peel Sessions EP (nr/Strange Fruit) 1986 •

Live and Loud!! (nr/Link) 1988 •

No Sleep Til Belfast EP (nr/Skunk) 1988

No Sleep Til Belfast (nr/Kaz) 1988 ◊

See You Up There! (Caroline) 1989 •

The Last Time EP (nr/Link) 1989

The Peel Sessions Album (nr/Strange Fruit) 1990 •

Belfast's Stiff Little Fingers began as four exciting (if narrow-minded) sloganeers, led by raw-voiced singer/guitarist Jake Burns. SLF's debut (the Rough Trade label's first LP release) includes such classic protest punk as "Suspect Device," "Alternative Ulster" and "Wasted Life." The LP is generally regarded as a classic punk LP; its UK chart success was the spark that set off a second wave of new bands like the Ruts and Undertones.

By Nobody's Heroes, they had changed labels, acquired a new drummer (Jim Reilly) and developed a bit more subtlety in the music and lyrics. (Contravening punk's push for DIY autonomy, most of SLF's lyrics were written by Gordon Ogilvie, a journalist who later became their manager.) The title track and "Gotta Get-away" are the highlights, but "Wait and See" audaciously thumbs a collective nose at the band's detractors; a roughed-up version of the Specials' "Doesn't Make It Alright" showed SLF to be developing interests outside punk's limits. Although slicker, more sedate and half as fiery as Inflammable Material, it's a solid LP. A live set, Hanx!, served as a premature greatest hits collection, containing powerful renditions of their best material in a well-recorded concert environment, before an enthusiastic audience.

Go for It broke Stiff Little Fingers' mold, and they emerged a much different sounding band. Burns' voice is smoother and less anguished; the music, while no less energetic or committed, is more diverse and sophisticated. The title track, a memorable martial guitar instrumental, shows how far they'd come, bearing scant resemblance to their early rabble-raising roughness. Other numbers draw on reggae stylings for variety; "Silver Lining" even utilizes prominent brass.

Now Then, their least popular but most lasting LP, continues the exploration of more accessible musical turf and is full of solid rock songs that pair energy and melody with clever guitar play. With new drummer Dolph Taylor (ex-Tom Robinson Band) in the lineup, SLF sounds better than ever. Their political consciousness remains undiminished, but subtler and stronger lyrics effectively replace inchoate rage with on-target criticism.

Following the group's dissolution, the two-LP singles compilation All the Best appeared, containing 30 tracks that chronologically review their progress from raw rage to sharp power-pop. Burns later released several solo singles.

Five years later, SLF unexpectedly reformed for two UK tours (December '87 and March '88). The crowd's excited roar is the real star of Live and Loud!!, a double LP from a December London gig. After a house-on-fire version of "Alternative Ulster," SLF proves sloppier and slower than when they left off, and the choice of material clearly aims to please, with not one selection from Now Then. Nevertheless, the LP documents a triumphant, if brief, comeback of a once-great band ironically at the height of its popularity. (Link licensed Live and Loud!! to Kaz, which issued it on CD and cassette as No Sleep 'Til Belfast, also the title of a four-song live EP on a Link subsidiary; Link then brought out a competing CD of its own, identical except for the deletion of "The Only One.")

The band was unhappy with the live LP and released a far better one (See You Up There!), recorded on St. Patrick's Day '88 at London's Brixton Academy. Since the track listings are—with some notable differences—very similar, it's obviously meant to replace Live and Loud!! and, on sound quality, there's no contest. Not to be outdone, Link turned around and issued a live 12-inch (The Last Time) of three more songs from the earlier gig, including the intentionally awful Stones cover of the record's title. This appears to have been the last shot in the war of live records—for now.

The Peel Sessions album replaces the '86 Peel EP, as it combines all four songs from it with sessions from '78, '79 and '80. The versions are, in general, rawer than the familiar recordings of the same songs. In particular, second-album songs recorded first-album style are truly ear-opening, most notably an embittered, enraged "Fly the Flag" that is clearly superior to the Nobody's Heroes version. What's more, the early "Nobody's Hero" has slightly different lyrics. [i/jf]

STING

The Dream of the Blue Turtles (A&M) 1985 (A&M-Mobile Fidelity) 1989 •

Bring on the Night (A&M) 1986 •

... Nothing Like the Sun (A&M) 1987 •

... Nada Como el Sol EP (A&M) 1988 •

The Soul Cages (A&M) 1991 •

In 1985, with the Police on hiatus and heading for an unannounced fin, Sting produced a multi-platinum solo debut, The Dream of the Blue Turtles. Enlisting a seasoned collection of top-notch American players (Branford Marsalis, Omar Hakim, Kenny Kirkland and Darryl Jones), Sting attempted to distance himself from the common vulgarity of mere rock music by introducing jazz trappings to a new set of songs, including "If You Love Somebody Set Them Free," "Love Is the Seventh Wave," "Fortress Around Your Heart" and the unbelievably stupid "Russians." Despite the illustrious company and his switch from bass to guitar, Sting alone is little different than Sting in the Police: smug and pretentious. And his like-it-or-not voice is still his voice.

The four sides of Bring on the Night—recorded at several 1985 European concerts with the same sidemen—prove Sting can pull it off live. Mainly drawing on Blue Turtles, the LP also revamps old Police songs (e.g., "Driven to Tears," "I Burn for You," "Demolition Man"), giving them airy refinement and a measured gait. The sound quality is spectacular, the instrumental arrangements and performances unassailably accomplished but dull. Sting's liner notes even reveal a glimmer of self-effacing humility.

The same can't be said for the effete intellectual masturbation of Nothing Like the Sun. Even as the nouveau sophisticate sings "History Will Teach Us Nothing," his pedantic instincts and bulging ego inform the lyrics at every turn with political dilettantism, literary namedropping and prolix pseudo-profundities. Aided by a new batch of virtuosos and famous guests (Andy Summers, Gil Evans, Eric Clapton, Mark Knopfler and Rubén Blades, credited on one track with "Spanish"), Sting stretches a dozen delicate songs over two short discs, coming down off his high horse long enough to show Jimi Hendrix aficionadas a numbingly dull way to perform "Little Wing." A tedious, bankrupt and vacuous cavern of a record.

For some reason (condescension? avarice? arrogance? practice?), Sting cut Spanish-language versions of "Little Wing," "We'll Be Together," "They Dance Alone" and "Fragile" (also in Portuguese) and released the five as Nada Como el Sol, thereby allowing a sizable portion of the non-English-speaking world to join the rest of us in wondering just what he's prattling on about.

Putting down his guitar and global pretensions, Sting made his next album more personal and reflective, alternating obvious pop singles ("All This Time" sounds like the Police performing a Paul Simon song; "Why Should I Cry for You?" is an elegantly atmospheric ballad; the romantic title track touches old Police ground with new sophistication) and expansive theatrical meanderings (“Island of Souls,” “Mad About You,” “The Wild Wild Sea”) that are individually handsome but cry out for a context which the album fails to provide. With repeated references to his late father, The Soul Cages—antiseptically produced with Hugh Padgham—has solemn emotional resonance and a settled maturity unheard in Sting’s previous work, but the attempt to reconcile lofty artistic ambitions and demographic commercial desires casts a pall over the entire undertaking. [1]

See also Police.

R.J. STIPS

See Nits.

STONE BY STONE W/ CHRIS D

See Divine Horsemen.

STONE ROSES

Stone Roses (Silvertone) 1989 + 1989 •

Manchester’s Stone Roses began around 1980 as a Clash-inspired punk band called the Patrol. Joining the neo-mod scene, the group changed its name to English Rose (after the Jam song); by ’85 it had become Stone Roses, playing atmospheric guitar rock like the Chameleons. After two early singles, producer John Leckie arrived, and he helped the group combine its magnetic, charming pop with the dramatic and pulsing heights of post-punk rock. The result was a nearly flawless debut LP, released in May 1989, that launched a stylistic craze centered in Manchester.

With all the hype and hysteria, it’s easy to overlook what a solid and enduring record Stone Roses is. With his inventive ringing sound, guitarist John Squire seems destined to be the next Johnny Marr. Drummer Reni is likewise extraordinary, giving otherwise usual pop tunes an exciting kick. But it’s the songs, and Leckie’s thick, molten production, that hit home. Slowly building towards quick bursts of fire, the opening “I Wanna Be Adored” sets the tone, echoed in the equally incredible “Made of Stone.” “She Bangs the Drums” is brawling pop, while “Elephant Stone” (a Peter Hook-produced single that was added to the album’s US edition) percolates New Order-style. Best of all, the powerpacked closer, “I Am the Resurrection,” slams incessantly for the better part of four minutes, only to switch seamlessly into an overloaded funk groove with wild drumming and squealing peals of guitar feedback.

Stone Roses’ fame (if not success: several of the groups that followed in their wake have become much bigger stars) has seemingly held them back. Only two new singles appeared (the first, “Fool’s Gold,” was added to a second US version of the album) in the eighteen months following the album’s release. [jr]

STOOGES

The Stooges (Elektra) 1969 + 1977 + 1982 •

Fun House (Elektra) 1970 + 1977 + 1982 •

No Fun (nr/Elektra) 1980

Rubber Legs (Fr. Fan Club) 1987 •

What You Gonna Do EP (Fr. Revenge) 1988

Live 1971 (Fr. Starfighter) 1988

My Girl Hates My Heroin (Fr. Revenge) 1989 •

IGGY AND THE STOOGES

Raw Power (Columbia) 1973 + 1981 •

Metallic K.O. (Import) 1976

I’m Sick of You EP (Bompl) 1977

(I Got) Nothing EP (Skydog) 1978 •

I’m Sick of You (Ger. Line) 1981 + 1987 •

Iggy & the Stooges (no label) c. 1987 •

Death Trip EP (Fr. Revenge) 1987

Pure Lust EP (Fr. Revenge) 1987 •

Raw Power EP (Fr. Revenge) 1987 •

Gimme Danger EP (Fr. Revenge) 1987 •

She Creatures of Hollywood Hills EP (Fr. Revenge) 1988 •

The Stooges (Fr. Revenge) 1988

Metallic 2xKO (Fr. Skydog) 1988 •

Raw Stooges Vol I (Ger. Electric) 1988

Raw Stooges Vol II EP (Ger. Electric) 1988

Search and Destroy—Raw Mixes Vol III (Curtis) 1989

Iggy and the Stooges (Fr. Revenge) 1991

IGGY POP

I Got a Right (Invasion) 1983 (Enigma) 1985

I Got a Right (Fr. Revenge) 1987

IGGY POP & JAMES

WILLIAMSON

Jesus Loves the Stooges EP (Bompl) 1977

Kill City (Bompl) 1978 •

VARIOUS ARTISTS

Hard to Beat (Aus. Au-go-go) 1988

The Stooges, the debut LP by Iggy Pop’s self-willed band—which at the time also included guitarist Ron Asheton, drummer Scott Asheton and bassist Dave Alexander—sounds like nothing else released in 1969. Moronic lyrics and three-chord “tunes” clearly anticipate the lowest-common-denominator populism of ’70s punk. Tempos are a bit draggy, but all the ingredients for what followed are present. One of the most superficially artless records ever made.

By contrast, Fun House knowingly sucks the listener into its raucous vortex. This ingeniously constructed album starts out menacingly (“Down on the Street”) and builds relentlessly to its apocalyptic conclusion (“L.A. Blues”). Iggy’s singing—much more expressive than on The Stooges—veers from sullen petulance to primal scream on songs of adolescent solipsism. Fun House comes as close as any one record ever will to encapsulating what rock is, was and always will be about. Inspired touch: Steven Mackay’s saxophone. (No Fun, appearing between reissues of the two original Stooges albums, consists of tracks from both.)

Raw Power is another masterpiece, featuring the stinging lead guitar of James Williamson in a reorganized Stooges. (Ron Asheton had switched to bass to replace Dave Alexander.) With Williamson as co-author, Iggy’s songs are more musical (i.e., a sense of structure emerged) in their sex-and-death conflation (“Gimme Danger,” “Death Trip”). The title track and “Search and Destroy” are only two of Raw Power’s tunes to achieve classic status for staring into the abyss, guitar in hand. Heavy metal in every sense, the album marked the end of the Stooges as a band concept—Iggy hereafter received solo billing—and, effectively, the first stage of Iggy's career.

Setting the tone for the vinyl deluge that would follow a decade later, Metallic K.O. is a semi-notorious, semi-legal document of the Stooges' final concert; at the Michigan Palace, Detroit, January 1974. The band staggers towards entropy as Iggy maliciously baits the crowd, which responds in kind. There are only six songs, but more than your money's worth of bile. Highlight: a version of "Louie Louie" you've never heard before.

Kill City was salvaged from the period between the Stooges' breakup and Iggy's Bowie-inspired redemption. The songs plod, the sound is bad and the vocals—recorded on weekend leaves from the hospital where Iggy was residing at the time—are buried. The strung-out music has a morbid voyeuristic appeal if you enjoy wallowing in other people's degradation; otherwise, avoid this nasty stuff. After Kill City had gone out of print, the German I'm Sick of You album collected tracks from it, along with the '77 "I Got a Right" single and two Bomp! EPs (I'm Sick of You and Jesus Loves the Stooges) of rough but intense and worthwhile demos. The 1983 I Got a Right (and the French variation thereon) is drawn from the same pool of material, containing an entire side of Kill City; the subsequent Pure Lust offers four of the same tracks in mixes ranging from identical to wildly divergent.

In late '87, a groundswell of interest in the Stooges (fueled in no small part by the increasingly prominent and numerous Australian bands playing in Detroit-influenced post-Radio Birdman/New Race style), resulted not only in one of the first single-artist tribute projects—Hard to Beat, a double LP of mostly over-reverent Iggy-ness—but the beginning of a spate of reissues, predominately from renamed French labels previously notorious for questionable legal '60s reissues at the height of the mid-'80s garage revival.

Rubber Legs offers six '73-'74 rehearsal tracks, including "Cry for Me." Although a bit heavy on the keyboards (as are many of the "rehearsal" tapes to follow onto vinyl), the sound is good, revealing Iggy at his rawest and most powerful along with James Williamson in all his glory on such new songs as "Head On" and "Cock in My Pocket."

My Girl Hates My Heroin is one of the best of the lot. Although mostly familiar '73 rehearsal material (with the guitars are turned up and the keyboards turned down), there are a few surprises, and a studio mix of "Death Trip" that is unquestionably one of the most violent recordings ever made.

Iggy & the Stooges consists half of earlier, lower-fi studio run-throughs, three songs of which were previously unreleased in any (nominally) legit form, though "She Creatures of the Hollywood Hills" (already familiar to Hard to Beat owners, thanks to the version by the unimaginatively named Raw Power) has since turned up several times on bootlegs. The three songs that comprise the other side of Iggy & the Stooges are moderate quality live-at-the-Whiskey versions of by-now-familiar tracks. (The same recording of "Open Up and Bleed" also showed up, with far hotter mastering, on She Creatures, backing a weird and spicy para-funk rendition of the title track.) What You Gonna Do again excerpts the same show with a fairly rote take on "Gim-

m(i)e Danger," along with a minutiae-filled Ron Asheton radio interview and the obscure title song, horrendously recorded in '68 but undeniable testimony to the fury of the band even in its formative stages. For wealthy novices, five of the Revenge titles—Pure Lust, Raw Power, Gimme Danger (also available as a picture disc), She Creatures of Hollywood Hills and What You Gonna Do—were offered in a limited edition boxed set simply titled The Stooges.

Live 1971 (with the same excellent cover photo as What You Gonna Do) presents the Stooges' least documented and, to many, most intriguing phase (along with the Hawaiian guitar lineup, of course): the brief period from late-'70 to mid-'71 when Asheton and James Williamson dualed (dueled) on guitar. Unfortunately, the sound quality is by far the worst of all the recent records; muted, mushy and moribund. For collectors only.

Metallic 2xKO, the two-disc reissue of Metallic K.O., adds two previously unreleased songs (plus the previously bootlegged "Heavy Liquid"), and a brief a cappella poetic recitation of "I Wanna Be Your Dog"), supposedly from the same final gig (though exact dates of certain tracks on both versions of the LP are questionable). There's also a somewhat less biting/baiting chunk of interaction with the juiced-up audience and an unpolished, extended demo of "I Got Nothin'" (later/ previously on Kill City). Besides the title track (also said to be from that same final show at the Palace), Gimme Danger offers a considerably crisper sounding if less urgent additional cut as well as the first third of "Open Up and Bleed," backed by a bizarrely hybridized "Heavy Liquid (part one)"/"I Got Nothin'" and—oddest of all—Iggy and James (unaccompanied), paying musical tribute to James Brown.

Presumably from the same goof session come an Iggy/Williamson duet on "Purple Haze" and "I'm Waiting for My Man" (on the French Raw Power), "I'm a Man" and a percussed, drawn-out version of Dylan's "Ballad of Hollis Brown" (on Death Trip). With several duplications from previous titles, Raw Power and Death Trip are disorganized hodgepodes that mix tasty radio ads in with backing tracks lifted from the original lost Raw Power mixes.

The first two volumes of Raw Stooges offer some of the weirdest Stoogerama yet. Purportedly cheap pre-Elektra studio recordings of the songs soon to become the band's first two LPs (with a stray treat or two thrown in), the basic sound is incredibly harsh and direct, not nearly so developed or wickedly insinuating as Funhouse, yet unnervingly affecting on an even more immediate basis. The truly weird thing is how the mix in places simulates sound leakage/print-through bleeding from one groove to the next, creating weird guitar echoes and premonitory vocals throughout the set. Amazing stuff, but it's like listening to a live show with one ear in the first row and another behind the outfield scoreboard. When the elements hit an uneasy balance, as on "Real Cool Time" and "Little Doll," this is some of the very best Stooze music on record. When they clash, it still ain't too shabby, either. Volume III, the pic disc Search and Destroy, combines the famous suppressed mixes from Raw Power (as radio broadcast in a then-current promotion) with remixed and alleged CBS out-takes that ought to sound awfully familiar by now to anyone stouthearted or singleminded enough to have waded completely through the preceding. [si/i/ab]

See also Iggy Pop, Sonic's Rendezvous Band.

STOP THE VIOLENCE MOVEMENT

See Boogie Down Productions.

STRAITJACKET FITS

Life in One Chord EP (NZ Flying Nun) 1987

Hail (NZ Flying Nun) 1988 (Flying Nun-Rough Trade) 1990 •

Missing from Melt EP [CD] (Flying Nun-Arista) 1991 •
Melt (Flying Nun-Arista) 1991 •

Pretty-pop New Zealand outfits like Chills, Clean and Bats get more attention, but Auckland's Straitjacket Fits are the most intense and versatile group on Flying Nun's extraordinary roster. Where some of the other bands work in a narrow scope, the Fits alternate subtlety and hell-raising, displaying muscle here, dexterity there and quiet longings everywhere. Hooks abound, and the vocals (by guitarists Shayne Carter and Andrew Brough) are pretty yet masculine. The debut EP showcases all these strengths, with the nicely strummed "All That That Brings" contrasting the paranoid "She Speaks" and the caterwauling waltz-time "Dialing a Prayer."

The original New Zealand edition of Hail contains ten new songs; the American deletes four, replacing them with the contents of Life in One Chord. On the common tracks, Hail blasts off in fuzzy, distorted Mission of Burma-like power-rhythmed guitar buzz ("Life in One Chord"—not from the EP—is downright fierce). But there are plenty of softer touches, including a moody cover of Leonard Cohen's "So Long Marianne," the ghostly organ on "Grate" and the gentle ebb of "This Taste Delight" and "Fabulous Things." Those impressed by the American Hail are well advised to seek out the import so as not to miss the scintillating "Take from the Years," "Telling Tales," "Dead Heat" and "Only You Knew." [jr]

RICHARD STRANGE

The Live Rise of Richard Strange (ZE-PVC) 1980

The Phenomenal Rise of Richard Strange (nr/Virgin) 1981

RICHARD STRANGE AND THE ENGINE ROOM

Going-Gone (Ger. Side) 1987 (nr/Nightshift) 1988

This former Doctor of Madness made two albums of a thematic work similar in concept to the rise and fall of a demagogue chronicled by the Kinks in Preservation Act 2, but less meticulously plotted and more thoughtful in content. Only the vocals on Live Rise were recorded onstage at Hurrah in New York; the backing tracks had been cut previously and played back for the performance.

Aside from the obvious sound/production quality upgrade, the second (all-studio) version drops three numbers and adds five to flesh out the concept, and sports beefier back-up (stronger guitar plus some super sax work courtesy of ex-Secret Affair Dave Winthrop). Strange emerges as a significant artist in the vein of Ziggy-era Bowie, but tougher and minus the androgyny.

The record that marked Strange's return after a number of years is more than welcome, and more than worthwhile. Originally issued in Germany and then remixed and released by a Scottish label, Going-Gone was evidently recorded over quite some time in half a dozen studios; five of the ten tracks were produced by Dave Allen (Cure, Sisters of Mercy, etc.). Keyboardist James T. Ford co-wrote all but two tracks, co-produced (with Strange) a pair and handled "electronic hardware" on all but one. The 53 minutes of music ranges from mid-Eastern intrigue ("Damascus") to Poe-ish theatrics ("Fall of the House of 'U'") to sentimental pop ("Dominoes") to ominous, churning dance-rock ("Fear Is the Engine"). The inner sleeve bears, with no elaboration, the legend "recalled to life." No kidding. [jg]

STRANGE CRUISE

See Visage.

STRANGLERS

IV Rattus Norvegicus (A&M) 1977 (nr/Fame) 1982 •

No More Heroes (A&M) 1977 (nr/Fame) 1987 •

The Stranglers EP (A&M) 1977

Black and White (A&M) 1978 •

The Stranglers EP (Jap. UA) 1979

Live (X Cert) (nr/UA) 1979 •

The Raven (nr/UA) 1979 (EMI America) 1985 •

Don't Bring Harry EP (nr/UA) 1979

IV (IRS) 1980 •

The Meninblack (Stiff) 1981 (nr/Fame) 1988 •

La Folie (nr/Liberty) 1981 (nr/Fame) 1983 •

The Collection 1977-1982 (nr/Liberty) 1982 (nr/Fame) 1989 •

Feline (Epic) 1982 •

Great Lost (Jap. UA) 1983

Great Lost Continued (Jap. UA) 1983

Aural Sculpture (Epic) 1984 •

Off the Beaten Track (nr/Liberty) 1986

Dreamtime (Epic) 1987 •

All Day and All of the Night EP (nr/Epic) 1987 •

All Live and All of the Night (Epic) 1988 •

Rarities (nr/Liberty) 1988 •

The Evening Show Sessions (nr/Nighttracks-Strange Fruit) 1989 •

Singles (The UA Years) (nr/Liberty) 1989 •

10 (Epic) 1990 •

Greatest Hits 1977-1990 (nr/Epic) 1990 (Epic) 1991 •

HUGH CORNWELL + ROBERT WILLIAMS

Nosferatu (nr/Liberty) 1979

J.J. BURNEL

Euroman Cometh (nr/UA) 1979 (nr/Mau Mau) 1987

Un Jour Parfait (Fr. CBS) 1989 •

D. GREENFIELD & J.J. BURNEL

Fire & Water (Ecoutez Vos Murs) (nr/Epic) 1983

HUGH CORNWELL

Wolf (Virgin) 1988 •

Another Kind of Love EP (nr/Virgin) 1988 •

PURPLE HELMETS

Ride Again (Fr. New Rose) 1988

Rise Again (nr/él-Anagram) 1989 •

Formed in 1975, the Stranglers became enormously popular in Britain and Europe when they burst on the scene in 1977 with one of the first new wave albums, preceding both the Clash and the Sex Pistols to the shops by several months.

The first album was produced by Martin Rushent (who continued to work with them through 1979's live LP). Rattus Norvegicus includes both sides of the awesome debut single, "London Lady" and "(Get a Grip (on Yourself)," as well as another blunt gonad-grabbers like "Hanging Around" and "Sometimes." The violently emotional lyrics and bitterly spat vocals are supported by Jean-Jacques Burnel's almost impossibly deep-throated bass grunts and Hugh Cornwell's slashing guitar, with contrasting jolly organ sounds by Dave Greenfield providing the only relief from otherwise relentless aggression. A great album. The UK edition initially included a free single, "Choosey Suzie" b/w "Peasant in the Big Shitty."

No More Heroes continues in the same vein, but drops whatever hint of restraint may have been in force the first time around. Rude words and adult themes abound, with no punches pulled, from the blatant sexism of "Bring on the Nubiles" to the sarcastic attack on racism ("I Feel Like a Wog") to the suicide of a friend ("Dagenham Dave"). Despite the increased virulence, the music is even better than on the debut, introducing pop stylings that would later become a more common aspect of the Stranglers' character. No More Heroes is easily their best album.

The Stranglers' American label then put out a colored-vinyl 7-inch, with "(Get a Grip)" and "Hanging Around" from the first album, "Something Better Change" (from the second) and that killer songs equally powerful UK B-side, "Straighten Out."

Tricked out with gray-swirl vinyl and a limited edition bonus 45 (three tunes, including a wonderful gruff version of "Walk on By"), Black and White lacks only good songs. Except for "Nice 'n' Sleazy," most of the tracks are merely inferior rereleases of earlier work, making the LP easily forgettable. (The subsequent British CD incorporates the single's contents.)

Four gigs in '77 and '78 provided the basis for Live (X Cert). The material is all familiar, but the high-tension ambience and some choice bits of Cornwell-vs.-the-audience banter make it an effective dual-function live/greatest hits album. (The CD appends two cuts.)

Borrowing an old packaging gimmick from the Rolling Stones, original copies of The Raven sported a 3-D cover panel. Inside, a political consciousness (first unveiled on Black and White) flowered, permeating songs like "Nuclear Device," "Shah Shah a Go Go" and "Genetix." Freed from the relative mundanity of exploring interpersonal relationships, the basis of most of the Stranglers' previous lyrics, The Raven adopts a global perspective, including the scathing put-down entitled "Dead Loss Angeles." Meanwhile, "Duchess" pioneered a surprising new direction—catchy, level-headed melodic pop totally outside the group's general sound.

Released near the end of 1979, the mixed-menu Don't Bring Harry 7-inch EP (wrapped in a delightfully morbid seasonal sleeve) combines one song from The Raven, a track from Cornwell + Williams' Nosferatu album and live Stranglers' performances of two songs, including one from Burnel's Euroman Cometh.

Having lacked an American label for two years, the Stranglers signed with IRS, who assembled IV, a monogrel consisting of half of The Raven and some non-LP singles, plus one totally new track, "Vietnam." As a bonus, the album included a four-song 7-inch similar to Don't Bring Harry: an actual track from Euroman Cometh, a different Cornwell/Williams selection, "Straighten Out" and "Choosey Suzie," from the UK first album's free 45.

The Meninblack—previewed on The Raven (and IV) by a song of that name—is a hypothetical soundtrack/concept album concerning aliens with god-like powers that is essentially an attack on organized religion. There's a fair amount of non-vocal instrumental content, lots of synthesizers and other keyboards, tricky special effects and little of the Stranglers' usual thrust. Although radically different, Meninblack is a departure for nowhere. (The CD adds two.)

Without abandoning their melodic pop explorations, the Stranglers returned to topicality and forthrightness on their next LP. La Folie offers a striking juxtaposition of attractive backing and scathing lyrics. Subtle, effective, mature and energetic—but no outstanding songs.

Following a change in British labels, a catalogue compilation called The Collection appeared in 1982, including almost everything you'd want from the preceding albums, plus a couple of bonus single sides. A great introduction for neophytes and a record that should be of interest to anyone not owning absolutely everything the band has done.

A worldwide deal with Epic allowed the Stranglers to free themselves of past musical baggage and gave them a consistent American release schedule. The first fruit of that arrangement, Feline, is restrained and dignified, but also lackluster and boring. (The US edition adds the appropriately low-key 1981 single, "Golden Brown," which had also appeared on La Folie.)

Aural Sculpture is far better, containing several strong tracks: "Skin Deep," melodic rippling-organ pop that recalls "Duchess," and "Ice Queen," a simple-minded allusion to cinematic irony that has lots of neat hooks and a pleasing chorus, punctuated by brassy brass. Additionally, "Uptown" melds powerful acoustic guitar to a fractured melody and comes out like a Pete Shelley song that wasn't. Although not fully satisfying, Aural Sculpture has enough quality merchandise to make it a worthwhile purchase.

Another byproduct of their label switch was Off the Beaten Track, a thirteen-track compilation of pre-Epic B-sides and non-LP A's. Although a lot of what's on Rarities really isn't that obscure, it does delve into the recesses of the Stranglers' enormous discography for enough things most collections will be missing that it's a worthwhile investment (especially the CD, which has half a dozen bonus tracks) for serious enthusiasts. The two-disc Singles covers the band's early years (1977-'82) with all the A-sides (and a few of the B-sides) from

“(Get a) Grip (on Yourself)” to “Strange Little Girl.”

The Stranglers' steady march towards total blandness continues on Dreamtime, an unfocused time-filler that randomly touches areas that resemble Ultravox, Fleetwood Mac, Shoes, Glenn Miller and Johnny Cash, all with little enthusiasm. Accomplished but bereft of ideas or concept, Dreamtime is a soporific, characterless nightmare. There's hardly an identifiable trace of the once-great band in these grooves.

The subsequent live album—recorded at three gigs in 1985 and 1987—underscores the Stranglers' paradox. Despite their recent wimpy work, onstage—banging out such classics as “London Lady,” “Nice 'n' Sleazy” and “No More Heroes” with a horn section—they can convincingly revive the grungy electric power we used to know and love. The lengthy All Live draws heavily from recent albums; fortunately, these concert renditions improve on the songs, providing them with a little context. (Still, the notion of the Stranglers performing with acoustic guitars is not easy to accept.) Capping things off is a hearty but economical UK-hit-single studio version of the Kinks' song which the LP title paraphrases. (The CD version of the All Day and All of the Night EP adds a remix, two live tracks and something called “Viva Vlad.”)

Although Roy Thomas Baker produced the rock-'n'-rolly 10 (indeed the band's tenth studio LP), things didn't turn out all that bad. As horrifying as it is to hear this once-dynamic group reduced to covering “96 Tears” (and then penning a tune called “Too Many Teardrops” on top of it), the originals that otherwise comprise the record are pretty lively (“Sweet Smell of Success,” “Someone Like You”). Except on “Man of the Earth” and “Out of My Mind,” where he sounds like Robyn Hitchcock, Cornwell applies traces of the group's old rugged personality to simple pop melodies, as Greenfield stacks on colorful keyboard fills and a three-man horn section chips in occasionally. (Burnel is utterly out of the picture, stylistically speaking: he sings a couple of songs, but anyone could have played these bass parts.) With that album out of the way, Cornwell left the group in August 1990.

There's something to be said for Greatest Hits 1977-1990—namely, it's the first bona fide Stranglers compilation to be issued in the US. Otherwise, it half overlaps the Singles collection, proceeding from the often brilliant UA years into the paltry Epic era, as the group succumbed to commercial temptation with its rote covers and boring originals. Still, the liner notes are good and the selection of singles—at least a third of them solidly great—is evenhanded enough to make it a fair starting point for new arrivals.

Solo work: Burnel's gravel-bottom bass and guttural vocals played a crucial role on the group's early, maximum-aggression records. For his own 1979 album, Burnel made a self-indulgent political statement, complete with historical maps, slogans and polemic songs like “Euromess” and “Deutschland Nicht über Alles.” Using a rhythm box and playing almost all the instruments himself, Burnel invests the pedantic Euroman Cometh with neither musical direction nor engaging ideas, making it about as much fun as sitting through a lecture.

Teaming with bandmate Dave Greenfield, Burnel then made an album that “forms the musical basis for the film ‘Ecoutez Vos Murs’ by Vincent Coudanne.” Fire & Water takes two approaches—typical soundtrack ambience, relying on doomy keyboard effects, and songs, some with vocals. “Rain & Dole & Tea” is sung in Phil Spector fashion by a multi-tracked female vocalist; “Nuclear Power (Yes Please)” actually quotes Albert Einstein in a remarkably clumsy science lesson; “Detective Privée” is a sensuously murmured French number. It's not heinously awful, but few are likely to give it repeated spins.

For his first extracurricular outing, Cornwell co-wrote, co-produced and co-performed an album with American drummer (and former Captain Beefheart sideman) Robert Williams. The collaborative compositions on Nosferatu offer substantive lyrics, but the atonal performances sound even more dour than the early Stranglers. Two members of Devo put in guest appearances, and there are some Devo-like effects worked in but, if not for an incongruous cover of Cream's “White Room,” there wouldn't be any light relief at all. While it's nice that the pair (with some assistance from Ian Underwood) has the instrumental prowess to do it all themselves, Nosferatu requires more from the listener than it deserves (or returns).

Nine years later, Cornwell took a dull stab at playing lightweight dance-pop outside the Stranglers' sphere with Wolf. (Langer and Winstanley garishly co-produced two songs, which don't work at all.) Other than affording Hugh the audibly meaningless opportunity to play keyboards, escape his usual company and fool around in the studio with the likes of Jools Holland and ex-Tears for Fears drummer Manny Elias, Wolf stakes out no significant musical terrain and contains nothing the Stranglers couldn't have done just as well. (The EP adds three non-LP tracks to the album's lead-off song.) In retrospect, maybe he was just checking to see that he could make a solo go of it.

Whether the result of, or the impetus for, the Stranglers' penchant for covering rock'n'roll standards (or just an indication of artistic burnout), Burnel and Greenfield launched a just-for-kicks sideband with Stranglers' saxman Alex Gifford, ex-Vibrators guitarist John Ellis and Manny Elias. On two similarly titled but totally different albums, the Purple Helmets (nice name . . .) do nothing but relive the songs of their misspent youth. Whether they're playing “Woolly Bully,” “I Can't Explain,” “Over Under Sideways Down” and “Not Fade Away” (on the live Ride Again) or “She's Not There,” “Money” and “First I Look at the Purse” (on Rise Again, a slightly more accomplished studio concoction), the Helmets approach their chosen jukebox classics with the enthusiasm of teenagers and the skill of seasoned professionals. [i]

See also Polyphonic Size.

SYD STRAW

Surprise (Virgin) 1989 •

As an unknown, Straw—one of very few vocalists to whom the description “honey-throated” can be accurately applied—swiped the spotlight on the Golden Palominos' Visions of Excess from the likes of Michael Stipe, Jack Bruce and John Lydon. On Blast of Silence she provided grace notes to an otherwise confused product. Her self-produced solo debut, Surprise, boasts a guest list that suggests a hipper version of the bloated superstar processions Peter Asher used to assemble for James Taylor and Linda Ronstadt. As a result, inveterate family-tree makers now have a way to connect ex-Slapp Happy keyboardist Anthony Moore and Tom Petty sideman Benmont Tench—they're both here.

While never less than enjoyable listening, Surprise often falls victim to the diffusion that invariably attends Big International Productions. It's slackly paced, and some of the songwriting doesn't do her justice—the nonsensical, wanting-to-mean-something obscurities of "Future 40's (String of Pearls)" are obviously co-writer Stipe's, but they're annoying if you pay attention to them. On the other hand, Straw sometimes goes over the top when a lighter touch is called for—the gallows-humor wordplay of "Sphinx" would be better served by offhanded irony than belting. Still, when she hits it just right, as on Peter Holsapple's "Think Too Hard," she's absolutely undeniable. [gk]

See also Golden Palominos.

STRAWBERRY ZOTS

Cars, Flowers, Telephones (Acid Test) 1989 (RCA) 1990 ●

Despite the colorful name and day-glo artwork, smattering of righteous covers and the fact that the Albuquerque quintet originally self-released it, Cars, Flowers, Telephones has almost none of the cool character one usually expects from retro-psychedelicatronics. (Little wonder the LP was reissued by a major label and promoted as part of the imitation-Redd Kross '60s revival.) Evidently inspired by no one so much as Paul Revere and the Raiders, the Zots play pleasant collegiate power pop, like Blotto without the overt satire, and mild-mannered '60s-styled rock, using organ, wah-wah guitar and songs by the Troggs, Electric Prunes, etc. in a halfhearted stab at elusive cultural resonance. Feh. [i]

STRAY CATS

Stray Cats (nr/Arista) 1981
Gonna Ball (nr/Arista) 1981
Built for Speed (EMI America) 1982 ●
Rant n' Rave with the Stray Cats (EMI America) 1983
Rock Therapy (EMI America) 1986 ●
Blast Off! (EMI) 1989 ●
Rock This Town: Best of the Stray Cats (EMI) 1990 ♠

PHANTOM, ROCKER & SLICK

Phantom, Rocker & Slick (EMI America) 1985
Cover Girl (EMI America) 1986

BRIAN SETZER

The Knife Feels Like Justice (EMI America) 1986 ●
Live Nude Guitars (EMI Manhattan) 1988 ●

Disenchanted with modern new wave, Brian Setzer bagged his trendy New York group, the Bloodless Pharaohs, to form a rockabilly trio and abandon Long Island for London. There, the Stray Cats wowed 'em with exotic American appeal, spearheading a rockabilly revival that naturally became absorbed into new wave. Is there a moral here?

Unlike some neo-rockabillys, the Stray Cats don't care about painstaking reconstructions of moldy old recordings. They diddle around with non-originals, while Setzer's own early songs tackle topical events ("Storm the Embassy," "Rumble in Brighton"). Setzer's extended guitar soloing sometimes seems descended from jazz rather than rockabilly, but there's no faulting his skill or the group's spirit.

Gonna Ball, released about nine months after Stray Cats, finds the band moving into R&B turf. Musical veterans like Ian Stewart and Lee Allen help fill out the sound; a strong producer, like Dave Edmunds on the first album, would have helped even more. Setzer is a better guitarist than singer, and some of Gonna Ball's songs resemble the music rockabilly was revolting against.

Combining the best of both British albums and adding one new cut, Built for Speed is a good introduction to the band. The US, generally not known for humoring nostalgic musical throwbacks, sent it into the Top 5. The Stray Cats must have been doing something right.

If chart success is the yardstick, they continued to do that something on Rant n' Rave, the trio's first identical and simultaneous US/UK release, and also their last record together. Again produced by Dave Edmunds, the effervescent rock'n'roll teen rebellion of "(She's) Sexy + 17" leads the stylistic parade (with one exception—the beautiful soul ballad, "I Won't Stand in Your Way," with vocal backing by Fourteen Karat Soul) and the rest of the record falls neatly in line, recalling Eddie Cochran, Carl Perkins and the whole rockabilly-into-early-rock'n'roll era. Sure it's formulaic and derivative as hell, but timelessly enthralling and truly entertaining as well.

The Stray Cats broke up in late 1984. While his bandmates teamed up with guitarist Earl Slick and issued a run-of-the-mill rock album the following year, Brian Setzer worked with Robert Plant in the Honey Drippers and then released The Knife Feels Like Justice, a strong, varied LP that further illustrates his multi-dimensional talent. The record encompasses unembellished frontier rock ("The Knife Feels Like Justice"), wistful balladry ("Boulevard of Broken Dreams"), Cochranesque rock'n'roll ("Radiation Ranch"), soulful power pop (the autobiographical "Chains Around Your Heart"), rock bluegrass ("Barbed Wire Fence") and lots more. With tasteful restraint, Setzer checks his wilder instincts, avoiding showy guitar work, verbal grandstanding or self-parody; maturity and subtlety are the album's two most unexpected and welcome qualities.

In 1986, Phantom and Rocker made Cover Girl, an improved—credit producer Pete Solley and generally better original material—but equally pointless and bland second album with Slick. Then, prompted by a contract they wanted out of, the threesome cut a Stray Cats reunion LP, Rock Therapy, and redeemed themselves handily. With Setzer back at their helm, the rhythm section sounds good as new; amazingly, the fine record picks up exactly where Rant n' Rave left off. Setzer's old-fashioned originals blend seamlessly with fine borrowings from appropriate sources (Buddy Holly, Chuck Berry, Gene Vincent, Charlie Feathers) and contributions from his bandmates. (The only misstep is "Broken Man," a clumsy stab at bluegrass.) The spare self-production gives the record a comfortably loose feel; the exuberant air of playing for fun, free of commercial considerations, adds a magical dimension.

Where Setzer's first solo album was nearly eloquent in its artistry, Live Nude Guitars—produced in pieces by Dave Stewart, Chris Thomas and others—finds B.S. in frantic commercial overdrive, foolishly aping Billy Idol and the Romantics, mucking about in inappropriate settings and self-parodic clichés (“Rockability”?) and—now this is serious—reducing Eddie Cochran's classic “Nervous Breakdown” to modern triviality. The songs are crap, the performances routine and colorless. When Stewart begins laying on the synthetic horns and driving female backing vocals at the beginning of Side Two, you know it's time to get off this ride. (But if you stick around, you get to hear Setzer's Mark Knopfler guitar imitation in the heinous “Love Is Repaid by Love Alone.”)

The Stray Cats' next album is no great shakes, but at least Blast Off! (well-oiled to run smooth by producer Dave Edmunds) offers a modest and pleasingly simple-minded dose of the trio's standard-issue rockabilly froth. Redundant in the extreme but no less enjoyable for it, these ten slices of slap'n'widdle rewrite the group's canon (actually, “Gene and Eddie” is stitched together from the Vincent and Cochran songbooks) with no innovation but as much enthusiasm as ever.

The don't-bother-it's-just-some-old-group ten-track Rock This Town compilation starts with “Rock This Town” (the trio's first US hit) and ends with “Runaway Boys” (the Cats' first UK hit, two years earlier). In between, the obvious tunes (“Stray Cat Strut,” “(She's) Sexy + 17,” “I Won't Stand in Your Way”) join some lesser-known LP cuts (“Bring It Back Again,” “Look at That Cadillac,” “Gene and Eddie”), with nothing at all from Rock Therapy. Gone, cat, gone. [si/i]

PETE STRIDE/JOHN PLAIN

See Lurkers.

STRIPES

See Nena.

JOE STRUMMER

- Walker (Virgin Movie Music) 1987 •
- Earthquake Weather (Epic) 1989 •
- Gangsterville EP (nr/Epic) 1989 •
- Island Hopping EP (nr/Epic) 1989 •

VARIOUS ARTISTS

- Permanent Record (Epic) 1988 •

Having discovered that the Clash without Mick Jones was not a viable proposition, and that Big Audio Dynamite wasn't big enough for the both of them, Joe Strummer turned instead to film. In 1986, Strummer began working for director Alex Cox, creating “Love Kills” (the theme song for Sid & Nancy), starring in Straight to Hell (1987) and contributing to its soundtrack.

Strummer also did a credible job scoring and producing the mock-Latin music for Cox's Walker. Strummer sings the narrative “Unknown Immortal” and “Tennessee Rain” in likably rustic folk fashion, adding mostly spare, relaxing acoustic instrumentals that use guitarrron, marimba, horns and piano to evoke the film's Central American locale.

Expanding his horizons beyond director Cox, Strummer worked on the soundtrack of Permanent Record, a 1988 flick about teen suicide. One side of the LP features an assortment of bands (Stranglers, Godfathers, Lou Reed), while Strummer & the Latino Rockabilly War (a small band including ex-Circle Jerk guitarist Zander Schloss, who also played on Walker) complete the disc with four energetic vocal songs (funk/folk-rock/R&B) and an instrumental theme. The old Clashman hasn't lost his touch.

In 1989, after a large (and surprisingly effective) role in Jim Jarmusch's Mystery Train, Strummer gathered up Schloss and a rhythm section and took an all-music break to record Earthquake Weather. Although the complex lyrics are jam-packed with intriguing names and places (some explained in a glossary on the inner sleeve) from the cultural kitbag of Strummer's intelligence, the easygoing earthy music is simply lackluster. Strummer's flat self-production and the band's consciously casual approach squash any traces of life out of the songs, making this boring exercise sound like The Basement Tapes or Pat Garrett outtakes. Sloppy stabs at rock (and one Princely funk tossoff) are equally unconvincing. Both of the four-song EPs built around ordinary album tracks contain non-LP material. [i]

See also Clash.

STUMP

- Mud on a Colon EP (nr/Ron Johnson) 1985
- Quirk Out EP (nr/Stuff) 1986
- The Peel Sessions EP (nr/Strange Fruit) 1987
- A Fierce Pancake (Ensign-Chrysalis) 1988 •

This wacky British quartet plays Beefheart-inspired avant-pop with goodnatureedly surreal lyrics. The low-budget Mud on a Colon is shambolic and unfocused, with little to distinguish it from seads of less-talented UK indie combos. But the subsequent Quirk Out, smartly produced by Hugh Jones, is a delight, channeling the band's boundless energy into a more disciplined and rewarding direction. Highlights include the hiccuppy Yank-bashing caricature “Buffalo,” the quasi-vulgar litany-of-bodily-functions “Everything in Its Place” and the uncharacteristically melodic, introspective “Our Fathers.”

A Fierce Pancake (the US version reprises “Buffalo”) strips away still more surface kookiness, revealing some memorable melodies and genuinely inventive instrumental work (particularly from guitarist Chris Salmon). And, while vocalist Mick Lynch's absurdist lyrics are as full of puns and non sequiturs as ever, they're also cogent statements—as in “Chaos,” which bemoans Britain's sinking-ship economy via a metaphorical sea chantey, and “Bone,” which builds a convincing case against human evolution.

“Buffalo” also appears, in a January 1986 live version, on The Peel Sessions EP, along with three other tunes. [hd]

STYLE COUNCIL

- A Paris EP (nr/Polydor) 1983
- Introducing the Style Council EP (Polydor) 1983 •
- Café Bleu (nr/Polydor) 1984 •
- My Ever Changing Moods (Geffen) 1984

Our Favourite Shop (nr/Polydor) 1985 ●
 Internationalists (Geffen) 1985
 The Lodgers EP (nr/Polydor) 1985
 Home & Abroad (Geffen) 1986 ●
 The Cost of Loving (Polydor) 1987 ●
 Confessions of a Pop Group (Polydor) 1988 ●
 How She Threw It All Away (nr/Polydor) 1988 ●
 The Singular Adventures of the Style Council (Greatest Hits Vol. 1) (Polydor) 1989 ●

SLAM SLAM

Free Your Feelings (MCA) 1991 ◊

After six years spent growing up in public with the Jam, Paul Weller felt the need to function within a more relaxed, less restrictive framework. That in mind, he enlisted the services of former Merton Parkas/Dexys keyboard player Mick Talbot to form the Style Council, with all other needed instruments to be supplied by guests. Promising that the band would be nothing if not unpredictable, the duo then proceeded to issue a single, "Speak Like a Child," that sounded much like where the Jam left off. Another single, the funky "Money-Go-Round," preceded the four-song A Paris EP, the sleeve of which shows the pair carefully posed with the Eiffel Tower in the background, looking like a Giorgio Armani ad. Highlighted by the catchy "Long Hot Summer," the material is light, breezy summertime soul, owing as much to Weller's pretensions of some sort of continental flair as it does to obvious referents like Curtis Mayfield.

The American Introducing the Style Council combined both singles with the contents of the UK EP, although some of the numbers were remixed. Not released in England, it sold better there as an import than it did in the country of its issue.

Café Bleu and My Ever Changing Moods are equivalent LPs with slightly different tracks. (The resequenced US version replaces two minor cuts with the UK hit, "A Solid Bond in Your Heart") A scrambled assortment of soul, be-bop, cocktail jazz, rap and whatever else Weller could think of, it's simply too schizophrenic to be a good album, although it does show integrity—this band is unlikely to be guided by public demand. "Headstart for Happiness" and "The Paris Match" (this time featuring Everything but the Girl) are improved versions of previously released material; "My Ever Changing Moods" gave Weller the first US Top 30 single of his career.

The Style Council's second album was also released in alternate trans-Atlantic forms. Internationalists has a different cover than Our Favourite Shop and omits the latter's title song. Though still rather varied, the album is much more coherent than its predecessor. There are still clinkers: "The Stand Up Comic's Instructions" is clever but awkward, and the rumba-shuffle of "All Gone Away" would sound at home in a dentist's office. However, tracks like "Walls Come Tumbling Down!," "Come to Milton Keynes" and "Boy Who Cried Wolf" more than tip the scales in the record's favor. As ever, it's undeniable that Weller means every word, but the continuing trend towards a crystalline, antiseptic sound is unfortunate.

It was obvious that the Absolute Beginners film was not going to be released without a contribution from Weller, so the band rewrote "With Everything to Lose" from the second album (itself already a direct lift from "Long Hot Summer") and came up with "Have You Ever Had It Blue." Shortly thereafter, the Style Council issued a live album, Home & Abroad, a squeaky-clean, all-too-accurate collection of songs drawn from both albums as well as singles. (The UK CD adds two tracks.) Considering that the Style Council often put live version on their flip sides (see The Lodgers EP), this set seems to be mostly for those who absolutely must own everything Weller puts his name to.

By the time The Cost of Loving was released, both Weller's demi-god status in Britain and the Style Council's significance had plunged. The LP—originally issued in limited UK quantities as a set of two 12-inch 45s—is nothing more than a collection of redundant, forgettable jazz/soul trifles, played very professionally but bloodlessly, with arrangements that resemble Chicago (the band) more than anything else. The first album of Weller's career to fall completely on its face comes after a lengthy drought of particularly meritorious undertakings. Ousted by Morrissey as young England's favorite male pop icon, his creativity seems to be waning. Can a Jam reunion be far off?

Maybe not, but the Style Council's adjournment was certainly due. The trio (by this point, singer Dee C. Lee, the talented Mrs. Weller, was counted officially in the lineup) stuck together long enough to make Confessions of a Pop Group, a presentable outing with some of the irascible songwriter's grouchiest and most dispirited lyrics. Weller's general disgust at everything in sight is vitriolic and undisguised: the record's very first sound is a toilet flushing. Ending the LP's brassy soul-funk-pop portion, the nine-minute-plus title track (which bears a frightening stylistic resemblance to Tears for Fears' third album) offers a vindictive, disillusioned dismissal of modern England: "Cheap and tacky bullshit land/Told when to sit don't know where you stand/Too busy recreating the past/To live in the future." The rest of the long record is given over to "The Piano Paintings," a collection of jazzy songs with fancy vocal arrangements (the Swingle Singers guest on "The Story of Someones Shoe") and lots of work for Talbot's magic fingers. Capping things off with a grandly thumbed nose, the LP ends with a glibly pretentious ten-minute orchestral suite (complete with harp!) whose coda is a doo-wop chorus.

The Singular Adventures is a nearly complete UK singles recap, from 1983's "Speak Like a Child" through "Life at a Top Peoples Health Farm" (from Confessions). By scraping away the band's many indulgences and self-amused digressions, the cogent fourteen-track set (sixteen on tape/CD) winds up being an ideal souvenir, a stylish scrapbook loaded with great songs. By early '90, Weller was off to form the Paul Weller Movement. Dee C. Lee was fronting a band called Slam Slam (hubby co-wrote and co-produced most of the album). Can a Jam reunion be far off?

See also Jam.

[dgs/i]

POLY STYRENE

See X-Ray Spex.

STYRENES

See Paul Marotta.

SUBHUMANS

The Day the Country Died (nr/Spiderleg) 1982
Time Flies ... but Aeroplanes Crash (nr/Bluurg) 1983
From the Cradle to the Grave (nr/Bluurg) 1984
Worlds Apart (nr/Bluurg) 1985
EP-LP (nr/Bluurg) 1986
29:29 Split Vision (nr/Bluurg) 1987

CULTURE SHOCK

Go Wild! (nr/Bluurg) 1987
Onwards & Upwards (nr/Bluurg) 1988
All the Timel (nr/Bluurg) 1989

CITIZEN FISH

Free Souls in a Trapped Environment (nr/Bluurg) 1990

Unrelated to Vancouver's D.O.A.-related Subhumans, these lower-income types from England's Southwest corner were one of the original UK hardcore bands, carving a distinct niche directly between Pistol-punk and the subsequent iconoclastic thrash of Rudimentary Peni. Borrowing the aggression, belligerent tunefulness, social conscience and sneering vocal atonality of the former, they magnified each by a factor of three, releasing a series of increasingly impressive 7-inches (later gathered as EP-LP), culminating in The Day the Country Died, a deliciously dated quasi-classic of second-generation British punk.

Assiduously documenting their career with self-released and shoddily recorded live cassettes, the Subhumans' next "professional" release was the eight-song, 45 rpm Time Flies. Pointedly poking and stretching in odd directions, alternating moody doubletracked vocals or solo piano accompaniment with driving live numbers, it was a more than appropriate intro to Cradle—possibly the first post-hardcore opera. Somewhat akin to the Pretty Things' epic SF Sorrow but pared down and compressed to a single unbroken side, the increased variegation in the music (while fascinating on LP) signalled an inevitable disunion, rendering Worlds Apart a sardonic title for their last full-length outing. The Subhumans' most diverse LP interpolates echoic post-punk, pseudo-reggae, rote rock and ruttish roll. Split Vision offers their final eight tracks, actually recorded after the breakup.

Vocalist Dick Lukas formed Culture Shock, sounding in every way like the Subhumans, but with less angry verve and considerably more of a ska/reggae bias. That band's bassist then rejoined the Subhumans drummer and—after a false start—guitarist, with Lukas helming the resultant Citizen Fish. [ab]

SUBURBAN NIGHTMARE

See Dwarves.

SUBURBS

The Suburbs EP (Twin/Tone) 1978
In Combo (Twin/Tone) 1980

Credit in Heaven (Twin/Tone) 1981
Dream Hog EP (Twin/Tone) 1982 (Mercury) 1983
Love Is the Law (Mercury) 1983
Suburbs (A&M) 1986

One of Minneapolis' major musical resources, the Suburbs maintained the same lineup from their vinyl debut (and the first single on the extraordinary Twin/Tone label), via a 1978 nine-song 7-inch red vinyl EP of above-average punkish rock'n'roll, to the band's 1987 dissolution.

With their first album, the Suburbs began displaying signs of incipient greatness; singer Beej Chaney's ominous, neurotic calm providing perfect counterpoint for the band's enthusiastic playing; guitarist B.C. Allen adding tension with scrabbly rhythm and violent lead. The songs unpredictably explore real-world subjects like "Hobnobbin with the Executives" and "Cig Machine."

After demonstrating what they could do on In Combo, the Suburbs proved how well they could do it with the double-album, Credit in Heaven, a slickly delivered opus that refines the band's approach and fairly bubbles over with creative concepts, great playing and bizarre songs. The Chaney comparisons to Bryan Ferry—cool in the eye of the storm—are amplified by his blasé delivery, but the music—powered by Hugo Klaers' ultra-busy drumming—is something else, blending cool funk with nervous disco and jazzy aplomb. A highly recommended stunner, regardless of religious persuasion.

Things heated up for the Suburbs in '82, when they started attracting significant club play for a 12-inch of the song "Waiting." They included that track on the Dream Hog EP (in original and extended remix form), along with two sharp new white-funk tunes (one of them about dance music) plus a restrained near-ballad. When they signed to Mercury, the label reissued it before sending the 'Bubs into the studio to cut a new album.

The result of that maneuver, Love Is the Law, is easily their best vinyl chapter, a powerful and personality-laden set of songs that incorporate more rock than usual, as well as horns and some of their most offbeat lyrics ever. "Rattle My Bones" is brilliantly demento bebop; the superb "Love Is the Law" has the most memorable hook in the repertoire; "Hell A" took one of its verses from a Los Angeles phone booth scrawl. Love Is the Law is a great, great album.

Making the probably inevitable Prince connection via the production guidance of Robert Brent (better known as Revolution drummer Bobby Z), the Suburbs came roaring back three long years later with another powerful record, albeit one whose character is less firmly held in its musical approach than its lyrics. Gone is the antsy, skittish urgency of yore; Suburbs is utterly listenable (but not overwhelmingly unique), with equally subtle nods to both the band's traditional cryptofunk and Prince's happy-feet dance rock. Thankfully, Chaney and keyboardist Chan Poling's nastily humorous lyrics—notably on "Every Night's a Friday Night" (. . . in hell), "America Sings the Blues" and "Superlove"—are as clever as ever.

That, unfortunately, was the end of the Suburbs, although they did release a 12-inch single ("Little Man's Gonna Fall" b/w "Don't Do Me Any Favors") on a local independent label the following year. [i]

SUBWAY SECT

See Vic Godard & the Subway Sect.

CHRIS SUCH AND HIS SAVAGES

See Headless Horsemen.

NIKKI SUDDEN

Waiting on Egypt (nr/Abstract) 1982 + 1986

The Bible Belt (nr/Flickknife) 1983

NIKKI SUDDEN & DAVE

KUSWORTH: JACOBITES

Jacobites (nr/Glass) 1984 •

Shame for the Angels EP (nr/Glass) 1985

Robespierre's Velvet Basement (nr/Glass) 1985 •

Pin Your Heart to Me EP (nr/Glass) 1985

Lost in a Sea of Scarves (Ger. What's So Funny About) 1985

When the Rain Comes EP (nr/Glass) 1986

The Ragged School (Twin/Tone) 1986

Fortune of Fame (nr/Glass) 1988 •

NIKKI SUDDEN AND THE JACOBITES

Texas (nr/Creation) 1986

The Last Bandit EP (nr/Creation) 1986

Dead Men Tell No Tales (nr/Creation) 1987 •

NIKKI SUDDEN & ROWLAND S. HOWARD

Kiss You Kidnapped Charabanc (Creation-Relativity) 1987 •

NIKKI SUDDEN AND THE FRENCH REVOLUTION

Groove (nr/Creation) 1989 (Giant) 1990 •

Back to the Coast (nr/Creation) 1990 (Rockville) 1991 •

DAVE KUSWORTH

The Bounty Hunters (Swordfish-Texas Hotel) 1987

BOUNTY HUNTERS

Threads: A Tear Stained Scar (nr/Creation) 1989 (Giant) 1990 •

After dissolving Swell Maps, singer/guitarist/former rock scribe Nikki Sudden released two solo albums, Waiting on Egypt and The Bible Belt, which basically offered more of what that band had been doing. But then he formed the Jacobites—a core trio of Sudden, guitarist/singer Dave Kusworth and ex-Swell Maps drummer Epic Soundtracks (Sudden's brother), plus assorted friends—and began to sing an altogether different tune. With Kusworth co-writing the songs, Sudden promptly rid himself of all references to his previous career.

The Jacobites' records all have a similar woozily romantic format: seductive strummed acoustic guitar, a thumping, muffled rhythm section and Sudden's whining, Dylanesque vocals. (Imagine a folkie Johnny Thunders growing up in the English countryside and learning to play guitar by listening to "Knockin' on Heaven's Door" with a bottle by his side.) The group pillages idols like the Stones, Neil Young and Dylan with such loving devotion—as on "Fortune of Fame," "Where Rivers End" (both on Robespierre's Velvet Basement) and others—that their motives transcend any appearance of carbon-copy revivalism.

The duo made only two full albums, all recorded during '84 and '85. Lost in a Sea of Scarves contains outtakes from Robespierre's Velvet Basement, which was to have been a double album. The Ragged School, a consistently strong twelve-song American condensation of the UK albums, shares only three tracks with the carefully annotated and sounding-better-with-age nineteen-song Fortune of Fame (subtitled Big Hits and Stereo Landings) retrospective.

Parting company with Kusworth and switching to Creation (but retaining the band name), Sudden released Texas, relying on his brother and bassist Duncan Sibbald for primary assistance. A violinist and ex-Birthday Party guitarist Rowland S. Howard make notable appearances, giving Sudden's languid, atmospheric Southwesternisms the extra color they need to prevent sameness. (Two notable style-busting exceptions are the Velvetvety "Glass Eye" and "Such a Little Girl," both winning piles of melodic distortion.) The Last Bandit EP pairs two album tracks with two others.

A month after finishing Texas, Sudden returned to the studio and began work on the spare Dead Men Tell No Tales, which has almost no percussion and very little accompaniment of any sort for his guitar, bouzouki and dulcimer strumming. Howard and Sibbald again put in appearances and the cover still credits the Jacobites, but it's basically a solo album—and an underwhelming one at that. Only "Girl with the Wooden Leg" makes a powerful impression, as Howard's crazed guitar noises contrast with Sudden's maudlin balladeering.

Howard takes a more prominent role on Kiss You Kidnapped Charabanc, another largely drum-free record that drifts along aimlessly at quarter-speed. Nikki does the singing and Rowland provides most of the instrumentation; the duo split the songwriting.

Judging by Groove's posturing, halfhearted distorto-blues core, it's clear that Sudden continues to suffer from delusions of Keith Richardsdom. Unfortunately, his true roots show through on "See My Rider," an ostensibly rough-hewn blues that's so fey you just know he's singing about how many scarves his touring contract requires concert promoters to provide. (Groove, or at least some form of it, was originally released—reportedly without authorization—by the Italian Crazy Mannequin label, which titled it Crown of Thorns.)

The uneven and poorly organized Back to the Coast has a few really good tracks (like the Howard collaboration "Crossroads," Robert Johnson as heard by Nick Cave) in which Sudden makes a concerted artistic effort and manages to roll his pretensions into a convincing ball of transcendent rock'n'roll, but it also contains whatever else he had lying around: further lazy designs clipped from the usual cloth (where have I heard "The Last Bandit" before?), a total toss-off (the acoustic "Flower Bed Romance") and "In Your Life," a shitty-sounding slice of '60s retro-organ punkedelia that sounds like an outtake from someone else's album.

Kusworth lay low a while after leaving the Jacobites in mid-'86, spending his time recording a solo album (also credited to the Bounty Hunters, the quartet he leads) which was released the following year. Marriage is on Dave's mind on The Bounty Hunters, as several of the songs—which interlock to form a long, vague romantic narrative—make reference to weddings, rings, wives and other such symptoms of betrothal. Showing an affinity for the folk side of Johnny Thunders, Kusworth's thin voice is no dynamic instrument, but it serves the material, as do the energetic arrangements of acoustic guitar and electric rock rhythms.

Threads furthers Kusworth's quest for beauty in the underbelly. With the addition of a bevy of pastoral instruments (ranging from pocket trumpet to harpsichord), much of the material is redolent of that particular time in late-'60s/early-'70s Britain when debauchery gave way to rusticity (à la Led Zep II crossed with Blind Faith). Then again, the volume-heavy stuff could pass for Black Crowes outtakes, so go figure. [ag/i/dss]

See also Swell Maps.

SUGARCUBES

Life's Too Good (Elektra) 1988 •
Cold Sweat EP (Elektra) 1988 •
Motorcrash EP (Elektra) 1988 φ
Here Today, Tomorrow Next Week! (Elektra) 1989 •
Regina EP (Elektra) 1989 φ
Illur Arfurl (nr/One Little Indian) 1989
 Box of 12-inch singles (nr/One Little Indian) 1990
 Box of 7-inch singles (nr/One Little Indian) 1990
 Box of 6 CDs [CD] (nr/One Little Indian) 1990 •

KUKL

The Eye (nr/Crass) 1984
Holidays in Europe (The Naughty Nought) (nr/Crass) 1986

Not since the Jesus and Mary Chain made their initial assault a few years back has a band come out of nowhere to generate as much excitement and acclaim as Iceland's Sugarcubes. Drumming (by Siggí Baldursson) and guitar work point to such influences as Joy Division and Siouxsie and the Banshees and, in more delicate moments (such as "Birthday," their debut single), bits of the Cocteau Twins. They also make very interesting use of an electronically mutated trumpet and sound effects. But the Sugarcubes' main instrument is the amazing voice of lead singer Björk Guðmundsdóttir, an elfin character whose range of pitch is only surpassed by her range of emotions: one moment she's a little girl soprano, the very next she's growling like a crazed animal about to go for the kill. Singer/trumpeter Einar Örn handles some of the vocals with awkwardly accented English, but Björk's background vocals usually steal the show on those tracks.

What she sings is noteworthy as well: Freud would have a field day with the childhood/sexual metaphors of the lyrics, most of which are more interesting than those from bands whose first language is English. Life's Too Good is no letdown from the initial 45s (both are on the LP), with eleven cuts that retain a signature sound but avoid redundancy. Iceland is a country whose little-known rock scene has produced a number of rather interesting, if not earth-shattering bands. This one is the real thing. ("Birthday" and "Cold Sweat" were also issued as CD singles with numerous B-sides. The CD of the album adds six extra tracks—some sung in Icelandic—including an incredible alternate version of "Deus.")

Matching up to the debut proved a difficult challenge for the Sugarcubes on their second album. Here Today, Tomorrow Next Week! has a more mainstream sound, fewer memorable songs, blander lyrics and entirely too much of Örn's overly affected, annoying vocals. There are still special touches no other band could offer, and tracks like "Regna," "Eat the Menu" and "Nail" stand out, but there's nothing here that makes one sit up and take notice the way Life's Too Good did (and does). For a more provocative experience, try the album's alternative version, Illur Arfurl ("evil inheritance"), issued abroad under the band's native name, Sykurmolarir. The tracks are identical, but sung in Icelandic (although lyrics and titles are provided in English). The Here Today CD adds three cuts, one a dumb spaghetti western reworking of "Cold Sweat" entitled "Hot Meat."

Most Sugarcubes singles have been issued on CDs with non-LP and/or Icelandic-language tracks or alternate versions (it's always nice to see non-English speaking bands who don't ignore their own tongue.) For hardcore 'Cubes collectors, several years' worth of now-deleted singles are available in boxes, available as 7-inch and 12-inch vinyl as well as CD. The 12s and CDs are loaded with extra goodies including remixes, live takes and non-LP tracks (such as original Christmas songs).

Prehistory: In the early '80s, a band from Reykjavik's burgeoning scene—Purrkur Pillnikk—supported the Fall on the latter's Icelandic tour (during which time most of Hex Induction Hour was recorded), sporting a similarly anarchic, jagged sound. Einar Örn handled Pillnikk's lead vocals with Bragi Ólafsson on bass. When that band ended, Örn met up with Björk and formed Kukl (sometimes K.U.K.L.), joined on the second LP by drummer Sigtryggur Baldursson, formerly of Theyr.

The Eye is a dark, almost Teutonic excursion into rock chamber music; the sound is somewhat subdued, dominated by lots of woodwinds (played by Björk), bells and other pitched percussion, Einar's trumpet and heavily treated guitar. Lyrics tend towards the morbid. Holidays in Europe lies between the experimentalism of its predecessor and the off-center pop the 'Cubes would later become known for. (When Kukl broke up, Björk, Einar, Ólafsson and Baldursson formed the Sugarcubes with guitarist Thor Eldon; Reptile keyboardist Margaret Ormólfssdóttir joined after Life's Too Good.) All of the pre-Sugarcubes catalogue is recommended for fans of the band and/or experimental rock (who don't mind doing some serious record hunting). [dgs]

See also Purrkur Pillnikk, Reptile, Tappi Tikrarrass, Theyr.

SUICIDAL TENDENCIES

Suicidal Tendencies (Frontier) 1983 •
Join the Army (Caroline) 1987 •
How Will I Laugh Tomorrow ... When I Can't Even Smile Today (Epic) 1988 •
Controlled by Hatred/Feel Like Shit ... Deja Vu (Epic) 1989 •
Lights ... Camera ... Revolution (Epic) 1990 •

Every once in a while, a band previously lost in genre mire emerges from the crowd ineffably different and better than the competition. Suicidal Tendencies—a Venice, California quartet once voted both Worst Band and Best New Band by the readers of Flipside magazine—could have been just another hardcore band, but they're not. The first LP benefits enormously from clear production (by Glen E. Friedman), tight, careful playing—fast and blurry in spots, but never indistinct—and singer/lyricist Mike Muir, whose intelligence and forceful personality invest songs like “Fascist Pig” and “Suicide’s an Alternative” with wit and wisdom. Suicidal Tendencies’ other strength is a facility for sudden tempo shifts, a gambit best used on the great “Institutionalized,” a half-sung, half-recited alienation number which powerfully encapsulates all the punk sociology of Repo Man and Suburbia in four minutes. Don’t miss this one.

After the first album sold unbelievable quantities for an independent release, Suicidal Tendencies took a lot of time organizing a new lineup and recording a second next record. Following the general hardcore drift towards metal, Muir, stalwart bassist/co-writer Louche Mayorga and two new bandmembers straddle styles on the Motörhead-ish Join the Army, embracing ominous war-pigs power and blistering crap-guitar solos, but cutting it with sudden shifts into hyperspeed (or halfspeed for moshing), punk vocals and a continuing dedication to skate-punk culture. The sound isn’t great, but the playing and energy, plus Muir’s exceptionally strong singing, makes the LP worthy of the band’s exalted status.

Sharpening the band’s music into an articulate speedcore rocket, Muir and a new set of sidemen reached the major leagues with How Will I Laugh Tomorrow, a powerful and intelligent outpouring of alienation, self-examination and identification with the band and its attendant culture. Mike Clark (Muir’s songwriting partner) and Rocky George keep the guitar pressure up, while Muir delivers his reflective lyrics with typical authority. The first side is especially great, a breathless series of well-constructed explosions, from “Trip at the Bram” and “Pledge Your Allegiance” through the title track and “The Miracle,” a denunciation of idealism. The flip kicks off with a galloping instrumental (“Surf and Slam”) and includes the tuneful and catchy “One Too Many Times.” An uncommon example of what can happen to speedmetal when it’s approached with imagination and originality.

The 1989 Controlled by Hatred has two non-LP edits of the previous LP’s title track plus seven new songs in an unchecked metallic vein. Lacking the band’s usual precision and clarity, thick-sounding tracks like “Master of No Mercy” and the death-metal clichés of “Waking the Dead” wind up blurry and indistinct, with Muir’s vocals stubbornly battling the dense noise.

Cogently observing that “I’d rather feel like shit than be full of shit,” Muir roars like a wounded animal on Lights . . . Camera . . . Revolution, an electric storm so loud and bracing that tracks seem to echo over the silence after they end. As if Controlled by Hatred hadn’t happened, the band whips up a deafening guitar frenzy (turning quiet for the beginning of “Alone” and switching to funk for the first part of “Lovely”). Muir covers his standard alienation-nonconformity-loneliness topics with typical intensity, adding vague thoughts about political action (in “Give It Revolution,” he asserts that “The greatest weapon of the fascist/Is the tolerance of the pacifist”), the atmosphere of violence (“Disco’s Out, Murder’s In”) and televangelism (“Send Me Your Money”). [i]

SUICIDE

Suicide (Red Star) 1977 + 1981 (nr/Demon) 1986

24 Minutes Over Brussels (nr/Bronze) 1978

1/2 Alive [tape] (ROIR) 1981

Ghost Riders [tape] (ROIR) 1986 [CD] (Fr. Danceteria) 1990 ♪

A Way of Life (nr/Chapter 22) 1988 (Wax Trax!) 1989 •

ALAN VEGA AND MARTIN REV

Suicide (ZE) 1980 •

A mainstay of the New York rock underground since the early 1970s (thereby prefiguring Soft Cell and all the other synth-based duos as well as an entire subsequent generation of droney noisemongers), Suicide mixed Alan Vega’s blues-styled vocals and Marty Rev’s synthesizer (originally a broken-down Farfisa organ they couldn’t afford to repair). Escaping the dingy clubs of Manhattan, Suicide went on to cause riots in Europe while on tour supporting Elvis Costello and later provided the soundtrack for Werner Fassbinder’s film In a Year with 13 Moons. Often confrontational in nature, they always provoked extreme reactions by producing a unique, obsessively American electronic music of enormous and enduring influence.

Suicide (1977) is a nearly perfect relic of mid-’70s Manhattan attitudes, a portrait of society grinding down to self-destruction. Rev’s powerful minimalist repetition catapults Vega’s pained and constantly cracking voice through indictments of Vietnam mentality (“Ghost Rider”), broken romance (“Cheree,” “Girl”) and holocausts both public and personal (“Rocket USA,” “Frankie Teardrop”). Stolid and restrained, the record simmers with repressed emotion and excellent, unusual performances. Four years later, the LP was reissued with “I Remember,” “Keep Your Dreams” and “96 Tears” added, as well as a flexi-disc of Suicide live in Brussels, taken from a 1978 authorized live bootleg. Recommended, though clearly not for everyone.

Suicide (1980), the confusingly titled Vega/Rev LP, was produced by Ric Ocasek, who smoothed the sound out to an almost socially acceptable level. (These same sessions produced the duo’s zenith, 1980’s anthemic “Dream Baby Dream,” issued as a 12-inch single.) Rev’s use of electronics had grown more subtle and complex, while Vega’s vocals seem tethered and uneasy. “Harlem,” a stunning mélange of urban despair and tortured musicianship, is the album’s most affecting number.

The tape-only Half-Alive pairs one side of live material and one side of studio outtakes. Released soon after Suicide’s dissolution, it offers no breakthroughs, but stands simply as a tribute to a fine, underrated band. The live side demonstrates how much fun Suicide was in concert, despite sloppiness and Vega’s antagonism towards audiences. Ghost Riders, another live cassette, chronicles the pair’s 1981 tenth anniversary gig in Minneapolis with clear sound and a convincing performance.

Long after bands they inspired had achieved commercial rewards Suicide never enjoyed, Rev and Vega reunited to reclaim their dominion with A Way of Life. Putting Ocasek back in the producer's chair, Rev and Vega barely acknowledge their disciples' innovations, and do what they've always done together: spin atmospheric tales with throbbing sequencers and dramatic Morrisonesque vocals. No catchy hooks, no high-energy disco rhythms, no old soul covers—just Suicide, polished but uncompromised. "Jukebox Baby 96" neatly bridges the pair's past adventures, while "Wild in Blue" offers a pounding reminder of industrial dance music's pre-Ministry beginnings. [sg/i]

See also Martin Rev, Alan Vega.

ANDY SUMMERS

XYZ (MCA) 1987 •

Mysterious Barricades (Private Music) 1988 •

The Golden Wire (Private Music) 1989 •

Charming Snakes (Private Music) 1990 •

As the Police's mostly mute guitarist, Summers—whose long and winding career stretches back to 1963 and includes stints in both the Soft Machine and the Animals, not to mention sessions for Neil Sedaka—was recognized as one of rock's most versatile and venerated sidemen. Additionally, he asserted his independence by cutting two artsy instrumental records with Robert Fripp. But whatever could have possessed him—hubris? jealousy? a bet?—to write lyrics and sing on a solo album? XYZ's laughable first line: "Some sex can be better when it's on the phone." Summers' froggy, unmusical croak overshadows his extraordinary musicianship, making him sound far less talented than we know him to be.

Prudently, there's no singing on Mysterious Barricades, an attractive wash of sonic wallpaper that continues Summers' tastefully productive partnership with keyboardist and co-producer David Hentschel. Working with no outside assistance, the duo weaves translucent new age instrumentals that fade in and fade out without incident, a technically flawless reverie.

Besides scoring 1989's Weekend at Bernie's, Summers expanded his artistic horizons with The Golden Wire, another co-production with Hentschel that uses a variety of musicians (on keyboards, horns, bass, drums and woodwinds) for much-needed rhythmic muscle and textural variety. One track has a guest vocalist; Summers breaks tradition to play a bit of banjo on another.

See also Fripp & Eno, Police. [i]

SUN AND THE MOON

See Chameleons (UK).

SUN CITY GIRLS

Sun City Girls (Placebo) 1984

Midnight Cowboys from Ipanema [tape] (Breakfast Without Meat) 1986

Grotto of Miracles (Placebo) 1986

Horse Cock Phepner (Placebo) 1987

Torch of the Mystics (Majorca) 1990

They may not be girls, but this elusive trio does live in a place known as Sun City, Arizona. (It's a bit north-west of Phoenix.) Like the Meat Puppets, they seem to have been out in the heat too long. Their hallucinatory debut album contains seventeen sketchy tracks (including "Your Bible Set off My Smoke Alarm") that range from nerve-wracking noise instrumentals to avant-jazz horn fantasies to actual songs with lyrics and seemingly conscious arrangements. "Uncle Jim" offers a ranting monologue with jazz guitar and sax; "My Painted Tomb" is a raga with toy piano; "Metaphors in a Mix-master" presents free-form guitar improvisation. Bewildering, aggravating and intriguing.

Grotto of Miracles continues the group's unconventional adventures, carrying them out of the noise ghetto into the realm of airy guitar instrumentals favored by the Puppets: well-rehearsed Wes Montgomery threads and textures. (The Girls, however, don't evince any particular taste for local stylistic traditions.) The demented lyrical concepts and offbeat musical accessories (trumpet, cello, antelope bells, chimes, temple blocks, etc.) preclude any overall resemblance between the two groups, but openminded fans of the Puppets should find things of interest here. Grotto of Miracles is an ethnic stew that shows enormous creative growth.

After that relatively restrained album, it's back to perverse wild-eyed politicized insanity on Horse Cock Phepner. Forget jazzy guitar breakdowns, this record concentrates on tuneless chants and foul-mouthed expositions, performed over backing that varies from promising acoustic folk to conscientiously ugly noise. The maniacally vulgar "Nancy Reagan" is spoken over tribal chanting and drumming; Tuli Kupferberg's "C.I.A. Man" (with new lyrics by the SCG) uses only monotonic piano and a simple drum beat for accompaniment; the lengthy "Without Compare" is a collection of simultaneous conversations, a grisly refrain, a speech about history, an all-play-at-once bridge, a news report and a chaotic fade. Yeuch! Amid such delicacies (and worse—trust me), "Esta Susan en Casa?" provides the neatest alternative: a brief but convincing flash of rock salsa. [i]

SUNDAY ALL OVER THE WORLD

See Robert Fripp.

SUNDAYS

Reading, Writing and Arithmetic (Rough Trade-DGC) 1990 •

Proffering a lighter-than-air mixture of the Cocteau Twins, Smiths and Everything but the Girl, the Sundays burst on the British scene in a shimmer of catchy guitar pop and Harriet Wheeler's enchanting little-girl voice. David Gavurin builds subtle tension into wonderful tunes like "Can't Be Sure" and "Hideous Towns" by picking out trancey guitar figures in songs that cry out for a satisfying strum. Elsewhere, minor-key contemplations ("My Finest Hour") evoke a rainy afternoon feel with poetic skill. Unlike other semi-acoustic bands of this ilk, the London-based quartet has energy to spare, exploding into uplifting sweeps of melodic joy ("Skin & Bones," "I Won"), getting faintly funky ("A Certain Someone"), even raising a good cloud of mild U2-tinged guitar smoke now and again. As frosting on this brilliant debut, the band's lyrics are bizarre fragments of opaque introspection that reveal themselves slowly in Wheeler's uncommon phrasing. [i]

SURF TRIO

Almost Summer (Vox) 1986

Safari in a Living Graveyard (Moxie) 1988 (Can. Star) 1989

The Surf Trio thank their idols—Link Wray, Jon and the Nightriders, Brian Wilson, the Ventures and the Ramones—for inspiration on Almost Summer, and those names go a long way towards describing the Portland, Oregon quartet's joyful sound. Facility for Ramonesy '60s melody-punk, surf-twang, beach pop and garage-rock makes each track in this sampler of delightful retro styles a different kind of magic. Exemplary and refreshing.

The second waxing is equally great, with such resonant originals as "Hang Ten," "Go, Go, Go," "My Real World" and "Girl with No Name," all written by bassist/singer Jeff Martin or guitarist/singer Ron Kleim. The album's only disappointment is an inconsiderately rushed cover of Bobby Fuller's classic "Let Her Dance." [i]

SUSSMAN LAWRENCE

See Peter Hummelman.

BOBBY SUTLIFF

See Windbreakers.

SWA

Your Future if You Have One (SST) 1985

Sex Dr. (SST) 1986

XCIII (SST) 1987

Evolution 85-87 [CD] (SST) 1988 •

Winter (SST) 1989 •

Damaged-era Black Flag bassist Dukowski now leads this LA power-rock quartet which unself-consciously draws on the sound of the '70s for likable, if unchallenging, original mainstreamisms that stop well short of metal. Former Flagmate Greg Ginn produced the hard-driving, intelligent debut album which revolves around Merrill Ward, a singer who can really project. Sex Dr. refines the concept on a batch of new tunes, penned mostly by Ward. The lyrics are generally presentable without saying much; tight group playing lends the music—which favors Steppenwolf a bit—conviction and dignity.

Replacing guitarist Richard Ford with Sylvia Juncosa (who simultaneously led her own band, To Damascus), SWA took a radically different route on the third LP, exchanging the precisely focused rock for a noisier, chaotic smear of aggression. Despite spots of MC5-ish excitement ("Optimist," for instance), XCIII is a disappointment, with SWA's best feature—Ward's voice—partially blunted by Dukowski's blurry production and Juncosa's ceaseless garbage riffing.

Following Evolution, an unnecessary eighteen-song/70-minute CD condensation of the first three albums, SWA found itself a new guitar player (Juncosa had begun her solo career in earnest) and regained its focus on the heavy-duty Winter. A lot of the demimetal fire (new axeman Phil Van Duyne is from the Black Sabbath bore-a-hole-in-your-skull school) is lost in the cloth-eared production, but Ward gets the tritely bombastic lyrics across with more clarity than they deserve. [i]

See also Descendents, To Damascus.

SWALK

See Shake.

SWAMP OAF

See Bags.

SWANS

Swans EP 1982 (Young God) 1990 •

Filth (Neutral) 1983 (Young God) 1990 •

Cop (nr/K.422) 1984 •

Swans EP (Homestead) 1985

Greed (PVC) 1986

Holy Money (PVC) 1986 •

Children of God (Caroline) 1987 •

Love Will Tear Us Apart EP (Caroline) 1988

Feel Good Now (nr/Product Inc.) 1988

The Burning World (Uni-MCA) 1989 •

Anonymous Bodies in an Empty Room (no label) 1990

White Light from the Mouth of Infinity (Young God)

1991 φ

SKIN

Blood, Women, Roses (nr/Product Inc.) 1987 •

Shame, Humility, Revenge (nr/Product Inc.) 1988

The World of Skin (Product Inc.) 1988 •

WORLD OF SKIN

Ten Songs for Another World (Young God) 1990 •

Play the Velvet Underground's "Sister Ray" at half-speed—go ahead, do it—and you've got Swans plus a sense of humor and the possibility that, if you just adjust the speed control, everything will get good. Take away the sense of humor and the speed control, and you've got Swans. In all probability, you've also got either a high threshold for crunching pain or a splitting headache. Well, that's Swans: downtown New York arties, friends of the infinitely more imaginative Sonic Youth. Swans trudge through dragging tempos, 2/2 meters and low frequency mush, all the while howling about alienation and despair. Listening to their records isn't like banging your head against a wall; it's like banging your head against the side of a swimming pool—underwater.

Filth is all that it promises to be: squalor without catharsis. The group is so conceptually strapped to its sludge m.o. that this album is actually more formulaic than any Top 40 band. (The Filth CD contains the first EP as well.)

Cop features new album and song titles, a new label, a trimmed-down lineup and new cover art. What it lacks are new ideas. Boom. Crunch. Boom. Crunch. Where Sonic Youth makes great music that's painful to listen to, Swans offer pain without reason. But things got better.

The 1985 EP featuring "Raping a Slave" offers few changes in the actual sounds the band incorporates, but makes things more interesting by using them in previously unexplored ways. A marked improvement over previous discs, and a good lead-in to Greed, where everything finally jells. New weapons are added to the Swans' arsenal, along with a variety of seemingly inconceivable approaches: the harrowing "Fool" is almost all piano and (sung!) vocals; several songs feature female background singers (serving more as an instrument than harmony) The closing "Money Is Flesh" has a two-note trumpet part played ad nauseum. Each track is a complete work in itself, enthralling and narcotizing.

Holy Money is more or less a twin to Greed, virtually identical in cover art and musical approach (the two LPs sandwich a great single, "Time Is Money (Bastard)"). Instrumentation is back to basic guitar, bass and drums, but the introduction of female vocalist Jarboe on "You Need Me" provides an effective counterpoint to leader Michael Gira's basso profundo. The lineup was in a state of flux; eight different performers appear on this album.

Children of God is Swans' finest moment, a diverse double album of pure, primitive, naked emotion. Some cuts simply pound the listener into submission, but others (generally those sung by Jarboe), are delicate, gentle ballads, finally providing a reference point for the more thunderous numbers. The lyrics deal with religious obsession, submission and suffering—they are stated simply yet remain open to all sorts of interpretations. A unique and powerful vision.

After releasing a farethello-to-the-past live album (Feel Good Now), the Swans entered a new and more accessible career phase with a pair of slickly listenable but utterly useless covers of Joy Division's "Love Will Tear Us Apart" (apparently in a cynical bid to get college radio play) on a 1988 EP that also contains alternate versions of two Children of God tracks. The group then signed to a major label and teamed up with producer/bassist Bill Laswell. Perhaps the best Leonard Cohen record he never made, The Burning World benefits a great deal from the world-music instrumentation and structural abilities Laswell brings to it. The arrangements are uniformly strong, the gentler sounds don't strike one as a compromise and the cover of Blind Faith's "Can't Find My Way Home" is both apt and surprising. A nice one that's almost as haunting as it wants to be.

Skin is a spinoff band of Gira and Jarboe. The duo's first release, Blood, Women, Roses, is an LP dominated by Jarboe's avant-garde torch songs. The overall tone is one of quiet passion, with mostly acoustic instruments, but the occasional drum thunder will remind the listener of just who these folks are. Highlights include the mostly vocal and percussion "Come Out" and an impressive reading of Gershwin's "The Man I Love." Swans, yes, but they'll always be one of rock's ugliest ducklings.

Following a second sortie (Shame, Humility, Revenge), Skin combined both of its records (minus a few tracks) and reissued them as The World of Skin. Around 1990, Skin became the World of Skin; with Ten Songs for Another World (released on a label Gira created to release new product and reissue old Swans material), they effectively close whatever gap existed between it and the Swans. As varied as The Burning World, the album features some amusing psychedelic touches, as well as a nice-try cover of Nick Drake's "Black Eyed Dog." Pere Ubu bassist Tony Maimone and Mary My Hope guitarist Clinton Steele guest on the LP which, for all its dour subject matter, comes off lighter and less would-be monolithic than anything Gira and Jarboe have previously done.

Anonymous Bodies in an Empty Room is a live (presumably authorized) bootleg of Burning World material and two new songs. [j]/dgs/gk]

See also Circus Mort, Lydia Lunch, Of Cabbages and Kings, Prong, Ritual Tension.

DAVID SWANSON

See Pop.

MATTHEW SWEET

Inside (Columbia) 1986

Earth (A&M) 1989 •

Interesting list of musical connections for the ex-Oh-OK guitarist's solo debut, produced in NYC, Boston, London and LA by Stephen Hague, Scott Litt, Don Dixon, David Kahne and Dave Allen, among others. The Nebraskan native co-wrote three songs with Pal Shazar (ex-Slow Children) plus one each with Jules Shear and Adele Bertei; performers include Aimee Mann ('Til Tuesday), John McGeoch (Magazine, Banshees), two Bangles, Jody Harris, Mike Campbell (Petty's Heartbreakers), Valerie Simpson (Ashford and . . .), Bernie Worrell, Chris Stamey, Fred Maher and Anton Fier—again, among others. (Sweet was part of a 1987 Golden Palominos mini-tour.)

For all of this impressive name-dropping, Sweet plays nearly everything himself on two tracks, and manages to maintain a consistent feel throughout Inside, which is a bit like R.E.M. and early dB's doing sincere power-pop with keyboards. While most of Side Two is simply good, four of the five tracks on Side One are excellent.

Recording Earth in Los Angeles, Sweet diluted his England-via-Georgia sound with a dose of SoCal laid-backism. (Ironically, most of the participants are from the East Coast, mainly New York.) Dave Allen and Fred Maher co-produced with Sweet; Kate Pierson of the B-52's and Trip Shakespeare chip in backing vocals, while mucho guitar is supplied by Richard Lloyd, Robert Quine and Gary Lucas (ex-Beefheart). The album overdoses on pleasantness at moderate tempos—please, get obtrusive already! (A snappy rocker on Side Two is merely an aberration.) Not bad, but a disappointment after the promise of Inside. [jg]

See also Lloyd Cole and the Commotions, Oh-OK.

RACHEL SWEET

Fool Around (Stiff-Columbia) 1978

Protect the Innocent (Stiff-Columbia) 1980

... And Then He Kissed Me (Columbia) 1981

Blome It on Love (Columbia) 1982

The proverbial little girl with the big voice, Rachel Sweet burst out of Akron, Ohio in her early teens under the watchful eye of producer Liam Sternberg. An integral component (along with Lene Lovich) of the second Stiff Records signing blitz, Sweet recorded an impressive debut on which Sternberg figured prominently as both writer and producer. In its original English release, Fool Around is a great-sounding record that has Sweet voicing Sternberg's vision of the hip girl-child. The American version—remixed, re-ordered and with two different tracks—has less verve.

Protect the Innocent shows Sweet forsaking Sternberg's new wave-cum-country sensibility, muddling about in search of a focal point. Dolled up in black leather and singing songs that run the gamut from Lou Reed's "New Age" to Elvis' "Baby, Let's Play House" to the Damned's "New Rose," Sweet seems the victim of somebody's half-assed marketing goof.

And Then He Kissed Me is Sweet's third horse charge in the middle of a career busy going nowhere, a Spectorish stab at MOR rock. Devoid of the freshness that was her most obvious asset, the LP contains her first genuine American hit, "Everlasting Love," a duet with teen dream Rex Smith.

Blame It on Love shows signs of revitalization. Though it sounds Tom Petty-influenced, Sweet wrote the entire album's worth of catchy material. She may never regain the youthful charm of her debut LP, but at least this LP shows her regaining control over her musical direction.

The diminutive powerhouse was not again heard from until early 1988, when John Waters tapped her to record the title song of his film, Hairspray. Sweet entered the TV world in '89 with a daily show on cable's Comedy Channel and wound up (reportedly) as the voice of Barbie on a Saturday morning cartoon. [jw/i]

SWEET TOOTH

See Godflesh.

SWELL MAPS

A Trip to Marineville (nr/Rather-Rough Trade) 1979

(nr/Mute) 1989 •

Jane from Occupied Europe (nr/Rather-Rough Trade)

1980 (nr/Mute) 1989 •

Whatever Happens Next ... (nr/Rather-Rough Trade)

1981

Collision Time (nr/Rather-Rough Trade) 1982

Train Out of It (nr/Antar) 1987

Collision Time Revisited (Mute-Restless) 1989 •

JOWE HEAD

Pincer Movement (nr/Armageddon) 1981

Strawberry Deutschmark (Ger. Constrictor) 1986

The Jowe Head Personal Organizer (Ger. Constrictor)

1989

In existence for most of the '70s, England's Swell Maps proved that a group of intelligent, fearless, versatile people can record five LPs and produce little of any lasting value. Though promising at the outset, Swell Maps (from a town outside Birmingham) succumbed to preciousness and self-indulgence with depressing speed. Significantly, however, three of the Maps' four mainstays—Jowe Head (bass/vocals) and brothers Nikki Sudden (guitar/vocals) and Epic Soundtracks (drums/keyboards)—have continued to be major figures on the international independent music scene.

A Trip to Marineville, released with a bonus four-song EP, finds our embryonic cartographers dabbling in

Pistols-styled punk and more experimental noise-making, using unorthodox implements. Despite their energy and tenacious desire to produce something new, the package simply does not contain enough ideas that work. The following Jane from Occupied Europe shows the band's confidence waxing while its will to organize wanes. Since it's the desire to organize sound that fills the gap left when avant-gardists throw the rules away, this proved to be Swell Maps' undoing.

By the time of the interminable two-record Whatever Happens Next, mainly a collection of homemade cassette demos dating back to 1974, Swell Maps were rambling and floundering. Collision Time consists of about half of Jane from Occupied Europe plus an assortment of singles and other album cuts. The group broke up in 1980.

Following Nikki Sudden's success in the Jacobites, a posthumous compilation of singles and outtakes, Train Out of It, was issued. Two years later, as the group's first two LPs were reissued, Collision Time Revisited, a 27-song retrospective of rarities, singles, album tracks and unreleased efforts (with brief adulatory liner notes from Sonic Youth's Thurston Moore) appeared, putting a final cap on the Maps.

Besides playing in the Television Personalities and the Palookas, Jowe Head has made a couple of solo albums. Personal Organizer sounds like a low-budget Captain Sensible record, with casual, accented vocals (in a nice, deep voice) and casual, accented vocals. Head draws on cabaret pop, '60s cinema, dinky electronics, industrial noise and his own multicultural imagination to put together weirdities like "Sudden Showe," "Lolita" and "Nebelwerfer," a gloomy German-language number that quotes disco lyrics. [mf/i]

See also Barracudas, Crime and the City Solution, Nikki Sudden.

SWIMMING POOL Q'S

The Deep End (DB) 1981

The Swimming Pool Q's (A&M) 1984

Blue Tomorrow (A&M) 1986

The Firing Squad for God EP (DB) 1987

World War Two Point Five (DB-Capitol) 1989 •

ANNE RICHMOND BOSTON

The Big House of Time (DB) 1990 •

While the snappy first album by Atlanta's Swimming Pool Q's generally follows the Athens sound—a singular fusion of collegiate-ham artiness and post-punk desperation—the Q's add a few interesting wrinkles of their own. "Big Fat Tractor" favors "Rock Lobster" whimsicality, but "Rat Bait" is an exhilarating chip off Captain Beefheart's block with jarring rhythms and growling guitar. In "Stick in My Hand," the Q's apply a heavy blues throb and agro-folk vocal harmonies (guitarist/songwriter Jeff Calder and organist Anne Richmond Boston) to a story of Southern religious fanaticism. What's more, they have a great sense of black humor, like the comic masochism of "I Like to Take Orders from You."

The Q's play it more seriously on their second album, blending intelligent, evocative lyrics with a roaring folk-into-rock sound. When Boston sings "The Bells Ring," you feel like you're on the Trailways bus with her, escaping from romance, with a walkman turned up full-blast. When Calder sings "Pull Back My Spring," you can tangibly sense the tension. Armed with excellent, semi-regional songs and great flexibility in arranging and singing them, the quintet fills the LP with honest, heartfelt music that has inherent strength not reliant on volume or dance beats.

Blue Tomorrow is even better, evidencing the band's growing confidence and burgeoning songwriting skill. Mike Howlett's production finesse adds the audio definition and power their records previously lacked; the Q's take the opportunity to stretch their stylistic range further afield than ever before. Boston's vocals are exquisite—Linda Ronstadt meets Wanda Jackson and Sandy Denny—and songs like "Now I'm Talking About Now," "Pretty on the Inside" and "More Than One Heaven" show them off to best effect. (For aficionados, a brand new version of "Big Fat Tractor" demonstrates how far they've traveled since that first LP.)

Back on DB Records, the Q's next issued a rocking, Cheap Trickish single, "The Firing Squad for God," joined on a 12-inch by four diverse items recorded between 1982 and '86. Although she designed the cover (and plays pedal steel on "Working in the Nut Plant," the oldest track), Boston is gone from the band, leaving a stronger but less sensitive quartet.

"The Firing Squad for God" is included as one of two bonus tracks on the CD version of the unjustly neglected World War Two Point Five. Even without Boston (who nonetheless designed the swell cover), it's a fine record—an audacious song cycle outlining the spiritual downslide of post-WW II America. With equal proportions of humor ("The Lord of Wiggling," "Sweet Reward") and sadness ("1943 A.D.," "The Common Years," "More Often Than Never"), the songs convey a tragic sense of loss, and mark Calder as an increasingly accomplished tunesmith and conceptualist. Additionally, the underrated Bob Elsey's guitar work is more inventive than ever.

The Q's toured in 1989 with Windbreaker Tim Lee standing in for longtime bassist J.E. Garnett, who'd left to join a reformed Atlanta Rhythm Section (!). More recently, Calder has been dividing his musical attentions between the Q's and the Supreme Court, a collaboration with veteran avant-guitarist Glenn Phillips (an occasional Q's guest).

Meanwhile, Boston returned from self-imposed musical exile with The Big House of Time, a strong solo effort that reveals her as a mature, confident pop stylist. In addition to tuneful new songs by her ex-Coolie husband Rob Gal (who also co-produced and played guitar) and a new Calder tune, Boston breathes life into familiar material by John Sebastian, John Hiatt and Neil Young.

[df/i/hd]

STEVE SWINDELLS

See Hawkwind.

SWINGERS

Picking Up Strangers (Aus. Mushroom) 1982
Counting the Beat (Backstreet) 1982

VARIOUS ARTISTS

Starstruck (A&M) 1983

PHIL JUDD

Private Lives (Aus. Mushroom) 1983

The Swinger EP (MCA) 1983

SCHNELL FENSTER

The Sound of Trees (Atlantic) 1990 ◊

Leading the three-man Swingers up from Down Under, ex-Split Enz guitarist/composer Phil Judd rejected his earlier, convoluted melodicism for a still-quirky but more compact, abrasive approach, with phenomenal results. Judd's eccentric mental mixmaster spews out the clichés of mid-'60s Anglo-rock (Beatles, Stones, Who, Kinks) wackily updated, unreal and askew. His Dave Davies-as-young-schizo vocals (often abetted by glibberish fasettes) deliver lyrics almost too rock-song-banal to believe, surrounded by twangy guitars that resemble so many layers of electrified rubber bands. (The band performed selections from both of their LPs in the 1982 movie Starstruck, the soundtrack album of which contains Swingers tracks not found on Counting the Beat.)

Following the Swingers, Judd made a solo album, the Australian-only Private Lives, partially produced by Al Kooper. Although the cover is nicely surreal, the American EP that draws five songs from it shows no audible vestiges of his once-eccentric outlook, instead offering forgettable missives from the mainstream. Ironically, the album's six superior tracks—deemed unfit for American consumption (and co-produced by Judd)—reveal that the old goofball still has a few aces up his sleeve.

A bunch of years later, Judd made an unexpected and quite welcome return as the leader of Schnell Fenster (huh?), a quartet that includes old Enz-mates Nigel Griggs (bass) and Noel Crombie (drums). This overlooked gem finds Mr. J as appealingly warped as ever, playing the excitable boy to the hilt on askew anthems and fractured funk. Spooky, funny and haunting.

See also Split Enz.

[tr/jy]

SWING OUT SISTER

It's Better to Travel (Mercury) 1987 •

Another Non-Stop Sister (Jap. Mercury) 1987 •

Kaleidoscope World (Fontana) 1989 •

Quite unlike most of the groups emerging from Manchester in the late '80s, Swing Out Sister follow the path of such neo-smoothies as Everything but the Girl and Sade: jazzy, horn-colored pop that puts an '80s techno veneer to the smoky aroma of late-'50s nightclubs. The first album introduces the trio: Martin Jackson (Magazine's original drummer and a later member of the Chameleons), keyboardist Andy Connell (formerly of A Certain Ratio) and Corrine Drewery (ex-Working Week). Drewery's cool, dry vocals perfectly suit such appealing, uptempo creations as "Breakout," "Fooled by a Smile" and "Twilight World." Unfortunately, the songwriting is inconsistent: if all the material were of the same quality, It's Better to Travel would be an out-and-out joy. (Another Non-Stop Sister matches three new tunes with five remixed album tracks)

Recording the second album as a duo (although Jackson did some drum programming, he's out of the band), Connell and Drewery revealed their Jimmy Webb jones. Interestingly, while they got the real McCoy in to arrange and conduct the orchestra for two songs, those aren't the tracks that most resemble the 5th Dimension or "MacArthur Park." ("You on My Mind" wins that award; Webb's work on "Precious Words" sounds more like Burt Bacharach.) By employing Webb's approach but cutting down the syrupy excess, Swing Out Sister reinterpret a corner of '60s pop without any sour aftertaste. Indicating one stylistic formula SOS should abandon, "Waiting Game" mixes electronic dance percussion with strings. The arrangement ill suits Drewery's voice—despite a passing visual resemblance, Lisa Stansfield she's not. [i]

SWOLLEN MONKEYS

After Birth of the Cool (Cachalot) 1981

Every rock generation has its hip hommen. As an outgrowth of Ohio's Tin Huey/Waitresses axis, the Swollen Monkeys (which featured Ralph Carney of the Hueys and Mars Williams, later of the Psychedelic Furs, as well as future Shimmy-Disc supremo Mark Kramer on "noisy tape loops") brought an anarchic new wave sensibility to horn-happy Spike Jones-influenced tooting. Produced by Hal Willner, After Birth of the Cool is a three-ring circus of kinetic instrumentals and loopy vocal songs, more silly than serious and plenty fun. If They Might Be Giants had been around a few years earlier, the Swollen Monkeys would have definitely been their horn section. [i]

SYLVAIN SYLVAIN

Sylvain Sylvain (RCA) 1979

'78 Criminals (Fr. Fan Club) 1985

SYL SYLVAIN AND THE TEARDROPS

Syl Sylvain and the Teardrops (RCA) 1981

To hear Syl Sylvain nowadays, you'd never guess he was once a member of the dreaded, subversive New York Dolls. For one thing, he's an absolutely winsome singer, the perfect punk-with-a-heart-of-gold who seems to be striking an "aw, shucks!" pose at the mic. For another, his records are glistening, rocking pop with no hard edges, plenty of ingratiating melodies and lots of pizzazz. One of the fun things about Syl is trying to spot all the elements his eclecticism has absorbed. Over the course of these two LPs, he borrows from salsa, Tom Petty, Phil Spector, Gary Lewis and the Playboys and many more.

Sylvain's solo debut features the breathless "14th Street Beat," an ode to the Big Apple; the better-focused follow-up (with different musical associates) heightens the romantic angle with such tunes as "I Can't Forget Tomorrow," "Just One Kiss" and "It's Love." Pure charm.

'78 *Criminal*s is a compilation of singles Sylvain did with various bands, including the Criminals, following the Dolls' collapse. [jy]

DAVID SYLVIAN

Brilliant Trees (nr/Virgin) 1984 •

Alchemy—An Index of Possibilities [tape] (nr/Virgin) 1985

Words with the Shaman EP (nr/Virgin) 1985 •

Gone to Earth (Virgin) 1986 •

Secrets of the Beehive (Virgin) 1987 •

Weatherbox [CD] (Virgin) 1989 •

DAVID SYLVIAN AND HOLGER CZUKAY

Plight & Premonition (Venture-Virgin) 1988 •

Flux + Mutability [CD] (Venture-Virgin) 1989 •

Unfairly characterized as a poseur since his earliest days with Japan, David Sylvian's obtusely alluring music and muse rendered him one of the most distinctive and influential artists of the '80s. Besides his own work, Sylvian has collaborated extensively with escapees from the rock world (Ryuichi Sakamoto, Holger Czukay, Robert Fripp, Bill Nelson) as well as jazz figures (including horn players Jon Hassell, Kenny Wheeler and Mark Isham).

Sylvian's solo career began shortly before Japan split in '82, when he released the first of two singles with Sakamoto (the second, 1983's "Forbidden Colours," was part of the soundtrack for the dreary Merry Christmas Mr. Lawrence) very much in the late-Japan style. With assistance from former bandmates Steve Jansen (Sylvian's brother; the family name is Batt) and Richard Barbieri, Brilliant Trees expands and refines that approach; contributions from Czukay, Sakamoto and Hassell emphasize Sylvian's growing immersion in jazz and more esoteric musics, most successfully on "The Ink in the Well" and the less structured second side.

Sylvian then embarked upon a perplexingly complicated multimedia project. He made a Japanese video documentary called Preparations for a Journey (from which a 20-minute short entitled Steel Cathedrals was released) based on an exhibit of his photographs (later assembled into a lavishly-packaged book, Perspectives); the video's ephemeral (some might say near-comatose) ambient music was issued as a cassette (Alchemy—An Index of Possibilities), extracts of which became an EP (Words with the Shaman). Now that's maximizing creative effort.

The ambitious double-LP Gone to Earth marks a more substantial departure in technique. Although Jansen and Barbieri participate, Sylvian pursues a sparser, more natural setting, as the strong presence of Fripp, Nelson and Wheeler moves the music further and further out. While some parts are sharply and jarringly defined, others are like Music for Airports in Antarctica. The first disc contains relatively conventional songs, contrasting the jazzy "Taking the Veil" with the languid drift of "Before the Bullfight," the grating Fripp-onance of the title track with the almost schmaltzy "Silver Moon" and "Laughter & Forgetting"—by far the most conventional "love" songs he's ever released. The second disc, which consists entirely of lulling, often rhythmless instrumentals, could safely be titled Gone to Sleep.

While pursuing a more jazz-oriented and acoustic-based direction with notable contributions from Sakamoto and Isham, Secrets of the Beehive is significantly more accessible (reaching the VH-1 audience, “Orpheus” became a near hit). Abandoning its predecessor’s spaciness, the simpler format still manages to cover nearly as much territory.

Sylvian’s two albums with Czukay feature other members of Can (as well as Markus Stockhausen) and contain long, lulling instrumentals—not unlike extensions of Gone to Earth and Secrets of the Beehive.

The subtitles of the two pieces on Flux + Mutability—“A big, bright, colourful world” and “A new beginning is in the offing”—fairly reflect their music.

Weatherbox is a lavishly packaged five-CD set that contains Brilliant Trees, an expanded Alchemy, Gone to Earth and Secrets of the Beehive, as well as an extensive and carefully detailed booklet. [i/ja]

See also Can, Japan, Ryuichi Sakamoto.

HAJIME TACHIBANA

See Plastics.

TACKHEAD

Friendly as a Hand Grenade (TVT) 1989 •

Strange Things (SBK) 1990 •

KEITH LEBLANC

"No Sell Out" (Tommy Boy) 1983

Major Malfunction (World) 1986

Stranger Than Fiction (Nettwerk-Enigma) 1989 •

GARY CLAIL'S TACKHEAD SOUND SYSTEM

Tackhead Tape Time (Nettwerk-Capitol) 1987 •

GARY CLAIL & ON-U SOUND SYSTEM

End of the Century Party (nr/On-U Sound) 1989 •

GARY CLAIL

The Emotional Hooligan (nr/Perfecto) 1991 •

The winding path of the Tackhead collective can be a confusing—if musically fascinating—adventure for even its most ardent followers. The concept originated when the members of New Jersey disco/rap label Sugar Hill's house band—Keith LeBlanc (drums, percussion, keyboards), Doug Wimbish (bass) and Skip McDonald (guitar)—collided with British dub producer Adrian Sherwood. Besides going on to work with Mark Stewart and releasing singles as Fats Comet, the collaboration's first longplaying venture into the world of overturned rhythms, deconstructed tunes and rearranged found sound was released as Major Malfunction under Keith LeBlanc's name, presumably because the drummer had already stirred much interest with his provocative cut-up dance hit of Malcolm X speeches, "No Sell Out," and a similarly conceived tribute to England's striking miners.

Enter Gary Clail, an unconventional British MC who specialized in adding twisted vocals from the mixing board during Tackhead's live shows. Tackhead Tape Time is effectively the group's second LP, with Clail rapping and chanting semi-political rants through what sounds like a megaphone. Abrasive beats, funky guitars and the frequent use of sampled speeches (Margaret Thatcher is a perennial Tackhead favorite) make for a mind-bending/butt-moving experience.

Stranger Than Fiction is again credited only to LeBlanc, but Wimbish and McDonald make frequent appearances, Clail pops up once, and Sherwood co-produced. Clearly political without ever being overtly so, the album is never less than intriguing, ranging from the pure rhythmic repetition of "Einstein" to the jazz feel of "Count This" and the eerie ambience of "Men in Capsules."

Adding Bernard Fowler as lead singer, Tackhead attempted to solidify into a proper group with its "debut" album, Friendly as a Hand Grenade. Opening and closing with the jaunty "Ska Trek," living up to the title of "Demolition House" and pursuing the by-now-familiar sardonic comments on the military with the infectious "Airborne Ranger," Friendly indeed finds Tackhead at its most coherent.

Strange Things did indeed happen on the way to a major deal. After years of tantalizing avant-garde sounds, Tackhead launched themselves wholeheartedly into the mainstream and completely lost their sense of purpose. As angry black rockers, they aren't close to Living Colour: as funky cynics, they are leagues behind Was (Not Was). As electronic experimentalists, they are not a patch on their former selves.

Gary Clail, meanwhile, remained back in Britain; while he continues to draw from the Tackhead talent pool, his vision is thankfully much clearer. End of the Century Party is dub-heavy, a white reggae record that uses vocal samples, football chants, rap and narration. Clail may be politically obsessed, but he is only occasionally dogmatic. His vegetarian rap "Beef," which reconstructs a famed Public Enemy phrase, was subsequently revamped to launch a new British record label (Perfecto) and became a minor hit. [tf]

See also New Age Steppers, Mark Stewart and the Maffia.

TAD

God's Balls (Sub Pop) 1989

Salt Lick (Sub Pop) 1990 •

8-Way Santa (Sub Pop) 1991 + 1991 •

Hey, they laughed at Leslie West, too! If you're gonna wallow in the loud dumb excesses of '70s hard rock, this slow-moving Seattle quartet—led by large-and-in-charge guitarist/growler/Idaho native Tad Doyle—gets up as good a head of steam as anyone, and with better focus and more gumption than most. God's Balls (70 percent of which is bonused on the Salt Lick CD and cassette) defines the band's face-in-the-mud perspective in songs like "Satan's Chainsaw," "Behemoth," "Nipple Belt" (something mass murderer Ed Gein actually owned) and "Boiler Room" (source of the LP's title) backing up Doyle's rugged vocals with serious sludge-guitar riff/feedback power.

Steve Albini produced Salt Lick, a dose of angry saw-toothed intensity that recasts Tad as a far noisier behemoth. In "Wood Goblins," Kurt Danielson's speeding bass sounds like a radioactive rubber band; throughout the seven tracks, Doyle and Gary Thorstensen peel off splintery guitar sounds that deserve the word "metal" more than any deathmongering glam-pussies.

8-Way Santa was withdrawn and reissued with a new cover after one of the two unwitting cover stars took exception to seeing her photo on the sleeve. [pn]

TAIRRIE B

The Power of a Woman (Comptown-MCA) 1990 ●

With a guest endorsement by Eazy-E and production on two tracks by Schoolly D, California's hip-hop blonde Madonna busts her tough-girl rhymes in an ineffectual little voice, but with a lot of heart. Armed with an uncommon persona—rejecting the culture's usual sex roles to be one of the boys who knows she's a woman—Tairrie B (it's pronounced Terry) almost gets over on sheer attitude (check "Ruthless Bitch" and "Murder She Wrote," both of which are really cool tracks), but she's doesn't quite have the juice to make most of her claims sound convincing. [i]

YUKIHIRO TAKAHASHI

Saravah! (Jap. Toshiba-EMI) 1977 (Jap. Seven Seas) c. 1989 ●

Neuromantic (Alfa) 1981

Murdered by the Music (nr/Statik) 1982

What, Me Worry? (nr/Alfa) 1982

What, Me Worry? EP (Jap. Yen-Alfa) 1982

Time and Place (Jap. Yen-Alfa) 1983

Wild & Moody (nr/Cocteau) 1985

Poisson d'Avril (Jap. Yen-Alfa) 1985

The Brand New Day (Jap. Alfa) 1985 ●

Broadcast from Heaven (Jap. EMI) 1990 ●

BEATNIKS

The Beatniks (nr/Statik) 1982

The outside projects of Yellow Magic Orchestra drummer/vocalist Takahashi (not to mention his colleague, Ryuichi Sakamoto) suggest that there was something amiss with the band's format during its existence; his solo work is far more amusing, even when the other members are involved. (They contributed half an album's worth to his solo LPs and play on lots more; Sakamoto even appears on the pre-YMO Saravah! LP.)

Takahashi's albums are far less programmatic and predictable than YMO's. He'll go from a reggae-style version of "Stop in the Name of Love" to a new-romantic soap opera to tongue-in-cheek pop powered by galloping synths to poignant soul-searching to a loopy update of Duane Eddy guitar instrumentals. He gives prominence to guitar (mostly played by YMO pal Kenji Omura, although Bill Nelson's e-bow graces much of What, Me Worry? and Phil Manzanera, bringing fellow Roxy Musician Andy Mackay along for the ride with sax and oboe, is on much of Neuromantic).

The two 1982 albums are pleasant surprises, with playing and material that's at once aggressive and arty. Murdered by the Music (from 1980 but unreleased in the West for two years) is the more goofy and eclectic. The What, Me Worry? EP features three tracks from the LP of the same name—one with Japanese lyrics this time—plus another bright original and a sprightly cover of an old German tune.

Selecting those songs that best combine melody and muscle, Time and Place is a strong live set mostly interpreting Takahashi's previous repertoire but also adding some new things (plus a version of Bacharach/David's "The April Fools"). The band giving it all a unified feel is keyboardist Keiichi Suzuki, Bill Nelson, Hajime Tachibana (ex-Plastics) and drummer David Palmer. Interestingly, Takahashi doesn't drum—he sings, plays keyboards and guitar.

Wild & Moody is an LP of pretty songs—mainly romantic, though a little lyrically offbeat—dressed (but not tarted up) in electro-dance clothing. Nothing awesome, but nearly all of it delightful.

Poisson d'Avril (the French idiom meaning April Fools) is the soundtrack of a film starring Takahashi. (A large poster of "Yuki" is included.) He was apparently seized by an urge to become Burt Bacharach; a surprisingly large amount of it is movie music, in the style of "sophisticated" '60s romantic comedy. Enh. The best of it is represented on The Brand New Day, a fairly representative survey of his Alfa material (i.e. Neuromantic through Poisson).

The Beatniks, a duo of Takahashi and Suzuki, split all the playing (including some twittery synth) and singing on The Beatniks. Suzuki's vocals are better than Takahashi's (which often resemble overly echoed mumbling). The lyrics, most in English and the rest in French, are moodier and less cogent than those on Yuki's solo LPs. Overall, a lukewarm effort. [jg]

TALKING HEADS

Talking Heads: 77 (Sire) 1977 ●

More Songs About Buildings and Food (Sire) 1978 ●

Fear of Music (Sire) 1979 ●

Remain in Light (Sire) 1980 ●

The Name of This Band Is Talking Heads (Sire) 1982 ●

Speaking in Tongues (Sire) 1983 ●

Stop Making Sense (Sire) 1984 ●

Little Creatures (Sire) 1985 ●

True Stories (Sire) 1986 ●

Naked (Sire) 1988 ●

Talking Heads—three conservative-looking refugees from the Rhode Island School of Design—first appeared on the New York Bowery circuit in mid-1975, playing on a CBGB bill headlined by the Ramones. From the outset, it was clear that, although the Heads shared an attitude and commitment to self-expression with the other bands then on the New York scene, they were charting a course all their own. That individuality, coupled with a strong adventurous streak, has resulted in both critical and commercial success for their group albums and some spin-off projects as well.

Led by the impossibly high-strung David Byrne (who has mellowed somewhat over the years), his neurotic but insightful perceptions focus the group's sensibility. The core of Talking Heads additionally consists of bassist Tina Weymouth, drummer Chris Frantz (now her husband) and ex-Modern Lover keyboardist/guitarist Jerry Harrison, who joined the trio in time for their first album. Together, and enlarged at times by temporary adjunct members, the Heads have produced intellectual dance music and artistic pop of different sorts, finding numerous rewarding levels on which to function.

Talking Heads: 77 is an astonishing debut with uncomplicated, almost low-key music supporting tense, bizarre lyrics, sung by Byrne in a wavering voice. He sounds downright uncomfortable admitting rather than proclaiming the words, but that only adds to the edgy appeal of such songs as "The Book I Read," "Psycho Killer" and "Uh-Oh, Love Comes to Town."

The Heads began a relationship with Brian Eno on their second album, essentially taking him on as a temporary fifth member. On More Songs About Buildings and Food (and the two succeeding LPs), they worked a sonic overhaul, at first adding elements to the basic framework and then ultimately subsuming the foundation into a wholly new approach. Here, the use of acoustic and electronic percussion fills previous spaces; the inclusion of Al Green's "Take Me to the River" indicated the band's deep interest in "black music" and provided them with their first glimpse of Top 40 popularity. The material isn't as startlingly fresh or satisfying as on the first LP, but some of the tracks work fine. (The first two albums were later joined on one cassette.)

The collaboration with Eno shifted into high gear on Fear of Music, moving rhythm to the front on "I Zimbra," and foreshadowing the band's new direction. It's a tentative step—most of the album sounds like a refinement of More Songs—but it draws still further away from their spartan origins.

Remain in Light incorporates various outside players (Adrian Belew, Nona Hendryx, a horn section) and makes a fully realized Great Step Forward. Funk and African influences meet electronics and selfconscious intellectual artiness to produce intricate, occasionally stunning tapestries that almost abandon song structure but do make a new kind of sense. "Once in a Lifetime" and "Houses in Motion" are among the group's finest achievements, and the relationship with Eno seems at its peak. But trouble was apparently brewing, and the Heads spent the next year pursuing solo projects, leaving the band on hold and revoking Eno's guest membership.

The Name of This Band is a two-record live album which showcases the group's best material and recapitulates the stages in its development to that point. Sides One (1977) and Two (1979) feature the basic quartet in the early days; Sides Three and Four (1980 and 1981) chronicle the augmented lineup, with Belew, Hendryx, Bernie Worrell, Busta Jones and others adding a brilliant funky flavor. The Heads' second concert record is Stop Making Sense, the one-disc soundtrack to Jonathan Demme's acclaimed concert film of the same name. Not only are the performances uniformly excellent, but the selection—from "Psycho Killer" to "Once in a Lifetime" to "Burning Down the House"—again neatly recaps the various periods of their career in a concise, cohesive setting.

Speaking in Tongues, a perfectly realized synthesis of budding pop instincts, powerful atmospheric and solid dance tunes, contains some of the Heads' best work, exemplified by "Burning Down the House" and "Girlfriend Is Better." Having experimented with communal music-making, the Heads reclaimed their tight control; while there are numerous guest players, it is the Heads' album all the way. Uncovering new areas of ambition, the group commissioned noted modern artist Robert Rauschenberg to design a novel plastic package for the record (also issued with a Byrne painting on a more traditional sleeve.)

Nine simple songs played with relative restraint and the fewest sidemen they've employed in a long time, Little Creatures is ostensibly the Heads' back-to-theminimalist-roots rock'n'roll album, an escape from pan-culturalism and artistic grandiosity. (It's not.) Byrne's songs are as straightforward and non-Headsy as he can make them; considerations of mundane topics (sex, babies, television) join his typically oblique character studies and essays on being and nothingness. Were the flimsy songs sturdier, the album might have been more creatively successful; as realized, Little Creatures merely sounds careless and insignificant. "Road to Nowhere" and "Walk It Down" are the winners in a weak crop.

Although released in conjunction with Byrne's film of the same name, True Stories is not its soundtrack, but rather a new Heads LP. Again artfully exploring the complexities of modern culture in the superficially simple context of unembellished pop music, renaissance genius Byrne selfconsciously masks his awesome sophistication to sing seemingly (or so one is expected to understand) trivial ditties. Some are likable ("Love for Sale" and "Wild Wild Life," for instance) enough, but the conceptual attitude that attends its creation makes respecting True Stories impossible. Unfortunate though it may be, Talking Heads—with far-flung experimentation and groundbreaking originality under its collective belt—can't possibly sell conviction when slumming in the mundane world of tunesmiths and working musicians.

After two records of jus'-us-rock-folks, the courageous exploration (or overwhelming pretension, as you will) of Naked, recorded in Paris with Steve Lillywhite, seems reassuringly honest. Each song augments the quartet with numerous classy session players in varying combinations: ex-Smiths guitarist Johnny Marr, reggae keyboardist Wally Badarou, Pogue accordionist James Fearnley, saxophonist Lenny Pickett, etc. Horns and mountains of percussion filter a full set of oblique Byrnisms into merrily danceable exotica that's not as challenging as it is uninvolved. The CD adds "Bill"; three tracks appear in longer versions than on the vinyl LP. What's more, the CD is "graphics-ready," meaning that those in possession of the needed equipment—a CD player with a graphics output and a not-then-available decoder ($500 or so)—can watch the lyrics and real-time instrument list on a television screen while listening. [i]

See also David Byrne, Jerry Harrison, Tom Tom Club.

TALK TALK

Talk Talk EP (EMI America) 1982

The Party's Over (EMI America) 1982 ●

It's My Life (EMI America) 1984 ●

It's My Mix EP (It. EMI) 1984

The Colour of Spring (EMI America) 1986 ●

Spirit of Eden (EMI Manhattan) 1988 ●

Natural History: The Very Best of Talk Talk (EMI) 1990 ◊

History Revisited: The Remixes (EMI) 1991 ◊

Talk Talk's first album is slick, professional and lifeless, sounding as though it were programmed by British record company execs to be a synth-rock For-eigner. The London group earned some early comparisons to Duran Duran thanks to their double name, producer (Colin Thurston) and similarly superficial veneer. (The two young bands even toured England together in 1982.) But Talk Talk lacked Duran's panache. Songs by singer/keyboard player Mark Hollis (younger brother of producer Ed Hollis) are full of melodramatic angst and amateurish lyrics; his epic delivery is suitable but not overly appealing. In a cross-genre footnote, the album's best song ("Talk Talk," co-written by the two Hollises) had previously been recorded by Mark's 1977 mod-punk band, the Reaction, for Beggars Banquet's Streets compilation. (The Talk Talk EP previews The Party's Over with four selections from it.)

Things took a turn for the better on It's My Life, although Talk Talk still hadn't become an essential component of modern culture. While the title song wins the 1984 Roxy Music soundalike award, other synth-powered dance tracks like "Dum Dum Girl" reveal Hollis to be a truly mixed-up vocalist. Still, the band's creative future looked promising.

Bad bet. Except for "Life's What You Make It" and a gritty guitar solo on "I Don't Believe in You," the first side of The Colour of Spring is gruelingly slow and soporific; Side Two is sporadically more energetic, but the languid pacing still makes it an endurance challenge. Producer Tim Friese-Greene collaborated with Hollis on both material and keyboards.

Spirit of Eden continues the trio's perverse slide towards silent inertia. The album's six long tracks—which seem to begin and end at random—drift along at near-subliminal volume, with very little song structure and almost no audible signs of life. Tasteful understatement is one thing, but the delicate shadings—a choir, horns, reeds and Hollis' ginger singing—in this musical cipher don't even create any tangible atmosphere.

Given Talk Talk's patchy career, a retrospective may not be the wisest move, but record companies will be record companies. Natural History combines four tracks from The Colour of Spring, three from It's My Life, two each from The Party's Over and Spirit of Eden, adding the non-LP 1983 single, "My Foolish Friend." (That last song also appears on It's My Mix, a six-track collection of remixed singles.) The Natural History CD adds live versions of "Life's What You Make It" and "Tomorrow's Started." History Revisited is an album of remixes. [ks/i]

TALL DWARFS

Three Songs EP (NZ Furtive) 1981 (NZ Flying Nun) 1985

Louis Likes His Daily Dip EP (NZ Flying Nun) 1982

Canned Music (NZ Flying Nun) 1983

Slugbucket Hairybreath Monster EP (NZ Flying Nun) 1984

That's the Short and Long of It (NZ Flying Nun) 1985

Throw a Sickness (NZ Flying Nun) 1986

Hello Cruel World (nr/Flying Nun) 1987 (Homestead) 1988 •

Dogma EP (NZ Flying Nun) 1987

CHRIS KNOX

Songs for Cleaning Guppies (NZ Flying Nun) 1983

Monk III-AD 1987 [tape] (NZ Walking Monk) 1987

Not Given Lightly/Guppiplus (NZ Flying Nun) 1989

Seizure (NZ Flying Nun) 1989 + 1990

Song for 1990 + Other Songs (NZ Flying Nun) 1990

TOY LOVE

Toy Love (NZ WEA) 1980

Snow White had it easy. She only had to deal with seven little men who whistled while they worked. New Zealand's Tall Dwarfs not only whistle, they jingle, jangle, gurgle, grumble, grunt, sputter, bang on tables and guitars, play crumhorn, clarinet, clavinet, spoons and shake an angry bee-colony's worth of tambourine. Worse yet, as many as three times the population of White's house turn up for recording sessions: "Nothing's Going to Happen" (from Three Songs, later collected on Hello Cruel World, a sampler of the band's first four releases) features 20 different players on everything from bagpipes to cabasa (a Cuban percussion instrument).

The core of the group is Alex Bathgate and Chris Knox, formerly of seminal Auckland band Toy Love. The inspiration for Tall Dwarfs comes from somewhere between the alienated dementia of the Beatles' "Blue Jay Way" and comic horror movies on late-night TV. The Dwarfs could almost be accused of having a Simon & Garfunkel fixation for all the melodic acoustic guitars used in their early work, but then out spills a mangled masterpiece (such as "Paul's Place" from Louis Likes His Daily Dip) where tremolo overkill and Knox's simple, clear singing suggest a lovesick Irishman trapped in a bagpipe. No matter how pretty, the Dwarfs' music is always strange.

Tall Dwarfs don't have a drummer, so they use creative repetition of all sorts to provide a percussive element, from Canned Music's pitterpat pawbeats and growling monster groans (which appear in "Turning Brown, and Torn in Two") through the harsh guitar saws and scat singing loops of "The Brain That Wouldn't Die" (on Slugbucket Hairybreath Monster, also later appearing on Hello Cruel World).

Most of the group's material was recorded on Knox's home Teac with neither EQ nor expensive microphones. This is strictly primitive DIY psychedelicas with great green gobs of greasy grimy talent and monstrously surreal cover art (drawn by Knox) to match.

That same spirit of home taperism shows up most prominently when Knox is on his own. All he's got is a shy and fragile voice and two hands that can start a multi-track tape machine, tap impatiently on the table or strum an acoustic guitar. His earliest solo songs are short (few exceed three minutes, most run around or under two), sensitive and bittersweet. On Songs for Cleaning Guppies, "Sand Fly" has two voices whispering and humming against each other like a medieval madrigal harmony, while "Jesus Loves You" is an arty Chipmunk answer to "They're Coming to Take Me Away" and bears no resemblance to any hymn by the same title. "The thing that you call hope is just a legal form of dope that makes you happy," Knox recites as a pulse of music is played backward over two layers of recitatorial vocals, one at double speed, the other flatly half-whispered. Only 300 copies of Songs for Cleaning Guppies were pressed, but material from it resurfaced on Guppiplus, a companion disc to the Seizure album.

The multi-faceted Seizure (issued twice: the original cover shows Knox in zombie make-up, the second has only utilitarian yellow and black stripes) is sonically indistinguishable from a Tall Dwarfs album. It's got the Dwarfs' highly imaginative percussion and the same delightfully fuzzed-under sense of noise. It palpitates on “Wanna!”, a track that could be named “Rock & Roll Part 3” for its textural similarities to a Gary Glitter song. Seizure also continues Knox’s fascination with gentle acoustic balladery, as on the percussionless “And I Will Cry,” where his voice is multi-tracked into a warm boy-next-door lead against a sweetly soured chorus of higher harmonies. Some of Seizure is a cappella (“Voyeur”); at other times the sea of grunge is deep enough to drown in.

At the time of Seizure’s release, Knox remixed its “Not Given Lightly” for a 12-inch single (Not Given Lightly/Guppilus), the B-side of which contains ten rarities: Guppies tracks, “Indigestion” (a recitation done for a compilation) and “Wanna Die with You” (a love song of sorts) from Monk III, a 24-song cassette assembled from ’83 and ’84 works.

The 10-inch Song for 1990 couples the gentle sparseness of Knox’s early ballad-oriented work with more confident singing and better production to give his very simple voice’n’guitar songs greater richness and substance. While “Haze” is texturally akin to the Beatles’ “Blackbird,” the title cut, a sarcastic bit of patriotic cheerleading for New Zealand’s 1990 sesqui-centennial, highlights the nation’s problems with typical humble humor. Fans of such homey balladeers as Daniel Johnston or Mark Edwards (My Dad is Dead) are likely to enjoy Knox’s surprisingly feminist views on love, life and the unreality of everything.

Toy Love’s lone album is a deceptively cheerful-sounding collection that falls somewhere between power pop and new wave. Despite efforts to minimize it, the nonconformist spark that would later make the Tall Dwarfs so appealing surfaces in songs like “Frogs,” a twisted little horror story of fuzz-guitar racings and keyboard blurts interlaid with a whistle-while-you-work chorus, a cappella “Exodus” theme and sound effects (squeeze toys, coughs, objects falling to the floor, a grumbled voice) in dizzying array. The country-bouncing “Bride of Frankenstein” is a wiggling guitar ditty full of yee-haws (delivered incongruously in New Zealand accents); “Who’s at the Bottom of Your Swimming Pool?” lists dead rock stars and popular music magazines of the time to make an anti-rock-culture statement. An interesting artifact, but strictly developmental. [e]

See also Bais.

TAPPI TÍKARRASS

Miranda (Ice. Gramm) 1983

The band’s name is Icelandic for “Witch’s Kiss Ass,” but its main claim to fame is petite wailer Björk Gudmundsdottir (later of the Sugarcubes), who was the lead singer and a founding member of this appealing but limited Reykjavik quartet. Björk was only in her mid-teens when Tappi Tíkarrass released their sole LP (a six-track 12-inch had appeared in ’82). But the erotic intensity of her delivery belies her years, and she revels in the operatic zigzagging—from spookhouse cooing to hellish growling and skyscraping whoops—that has distinguished her work in the ’Cubes. Indeed, her performances here generally eclipse the music, which is haunting but melodically parched gloom-beat of the early Cure/Banshees variety. [df]

See also Sugarcubes.

TAR

Handsome EP (Amphetamine Reptile) 1989

Roundhouse (Amphetamine Reptile) 1990 ●

Beneath a thick molten stew, Chicago’s Tar spews lurching tunes that hover and circle with frozen precision. Drawing several of its members from hardcore outfit Blatant Dissent, the quartet has remnants of riled frenzy, but Tar builds its music at slower speeds. Even when the watts start flowing hard and heavy, Tar stays well within song form, favoring a solid and dense post-punk rock sound that’s a lot more generally accessible than, say, Wreck or any of the Big Black soundalikes.

On the six-song Handsome (produced separately by Steve Albini and Iain Burgess), Tar’s assault stresses churning guitars and chunky rhythms, occasionally doffing a cap to ’70s rock, elsewhere raving with post-punk intensity. On some of the jolt’n’burn songs (particularly the spiraling standout, “Mumper”) singer/guitarist John Mohr wails with an urgency that suggests Jeff Pezzati of Naked Raygun. But in “Static” and the screaming “Mel’s” (remade from an ’88 single) he establishes an anguished voice all his own

Roundhouse tones down the pace but maintains the power and intensity. Burgess frames Mohr’s vocals rather than burying them (one of Handsome’s weaknesses), revealing desperation in place of stifled anger. Though not as wind-whipped as the EP, songs like “Glass Grief” and “Les Paul Worries” showcase Tar’s agitated electric aggression. [mg/i]

TAR BABIES

Face the Music EP (Bone Air) 1982

Respect Your Nightmares (Bone Air-Paradise) 1985

Fried Milk (SST) 1987

No Contest (SST) 1988 ●

Honey Bubble (SST) 1989 ●

From the ashes of Midwest proto skate-thrashers Mecht Mensch came the Tar Babies. But these Madison, Wisconsin kids quickly outgrew the hardcore pee-wee straitjacket in which they’d been born. As far back as Face the Music, Bucky Pope’s guitar displayed a unique, lunging hard-psych quality that separated the Tar Babies from their brethren. With the eight-song Respect Your Nightmares, the band began to insert choppy, neo-funk highlights into their primal psych-punk trash (like a thinner version of Texas’ Big Boys, or the Minutemen), and that pointed them off in a whole new direction.

Although there are interludes of stoned scutter-pluck reminiscent of the Meat Puppets’ work at the time, Fried Milk is most notable for the overtness of its funk underpinnings. (People inclined to dance have been known to do so whilst this album plays.) Beginning with No Contest, they began adding horns and a techno-bop filigree that isn’t supremely appealing and tends to swamp Pope’s guitar (still the Tar Babies’ central shaft). Live shows provided evidence that the band was still capable of mind-blowing groove-excess, but their discs are less successful than the funkadelic shit they seem to be trying to emulate. Which isn’t to say that a George Clinton/Bucky Pope/Bootsy Collins/Sonny Sharrock/Sonny Murray collaboration shouldn’t be scheduled promptly. [bc]

TROY TATE

Ticket to the Dark (nr/Sire) 1984

Liberty (nr/Sire) 1985

Armed with an impressive résumé (the Index, Shake, The Teardrop Explodes, Fashion) dating back to '77, singer/guitarist Troy Tate made his solo debut with the assistance of an eclectic set of musicians, including David Balfe, Nicky Holland, Virginia Astley and Woodentop Rolo McGinty. Tate uses his attractively husky voice and substantial songwriting skill—as well as deft electronic effects and complex arrangements—to put across ten melodic songs that approach modern pop from several different directions. “Safety Net,” “Love Is . . .” and “Thomas” are the most memorable tracks on Ticket to the Dark, but most of the album is well worth hearing. An exceptionally good record.

Simply played by an unfamous guitar-bass-drums trio and produced with equally effective restraint, Liberty focuses attention on Tate's best asset, his handsome crooning. Although this sophomore LP doesn't have enough great songs (“Sorrow,” “God's Puppet” and “Tomorrow I'll Be Gone” are the highlights), the stylistic consistency and Tate's engaging personality keep Liberty appealing. Stranger-than-fiction art note: the squiggly face drawn on the back cover bears a striking resemblance to Bart Simpson, who hadn't yet been introduced to the world. [i]

TATER TOTZ

See Red Cross.

TAXI BOYS

See Real Kids.

TAXI GANG

See Sly & Robbie.

ANDY TAYLOR

See Duran Duran.

JAMES TAYLOR QUARTET

See Prisoners.

TOT TAYLOR AND HIS ORCHESTRA

The Girl with Everything EP (nr/GTO) 1981

Playtime (nr/Easy Listeners) 1981 (nr/London Popular Arts) 1988 •

TOT TAYLOR

The Inside Story (nr/Easy Listeners) 1984 (nr/London Popular Arts) 1988 •

Box-Office Poison (nr/London Popular Arts) 1986 •

Arise, Sir Tot EP (nr/London Popular Arts) 1986

Jumble Soul (nr/London Popular Arts) 1986

My Blue Period (nr/London Popular Arts) 1987 •

Menswear (nr/London Popular Arts) 1987

Scrapbook (nr/London Popular Arts) 1988

SOUND BARRIER

The Suburbia Suite (nr/Compact Organization) 1984

Tot Taylor is a Brit-popper who loves Tin Pan Alley. After EMI adjudged his band Advertising (pop-rock plus punky perspiration) to be a non-starter, Taylor convinced another commercial powerhouse to take him on but, after three 45s, GTO decided it had been a big mistake. By then, he'd discovered Mari Wilson (who'd also signed to GTO) and Vima Lindt; when he and Mari were dumped, Taylor launched his own empire, the Compact Organization. (GTO, meanwhile, has long since gone out of business.)

Tot had recorded Playtime for GTO, and arranged to take all sixteen tracks of it with him. The usual rhythm section (including the odd bit of dribbly synth) is frequently augmented by horns and strings. What saves Taylor from seeming an insufferable twit for presuming to emulate Porter, Gershwin, Rodgers and Hart, Kern, etc. is his cleverly unassuming and self-parodic word-play. Sometimes he spouts gloriously goofy rock (“I Wanna Play the Drums Tonight”—Kevin Ayers meets Sparks), but he also slips in observations on the grayness of the modern day-to-day—we are all “Living in Legoland”—for effective commentary.

The Inside Story (which Taylor pretty much plays all himself) is another delightful grab-bag; less playing time than Playtime, but otherwise nearly its equal. Taylor's flaky charm is even equal to his choice of Porter's “All of You” as an album-closer, in a treatment which sounds sincere and true to the original song.

Tot next composed a whole instrumental LP, The Suburbia Suite, for the Sound Barrier, and penned Slim Gaillard's number (plus some incidental music) for the film Absolute Beginners. Then he cut three new albums in two years! Regrettably, none of them are up to his first two. Sometimes he tries too hard to be witty; other times, songs or arrangements go on too long.

Box Office Poison might appear more impressive if it not for its illustrious predecessors. In fact its musical execution is, if anything, more facile. “Arise, Sir Tot” gently deflates his own delusions of grandeur; “Australia” is a longing toast to a place we haven't destroyed—yet; “Spoil Her” is romantic strategy that's only partly tongue-in-cheek. (The Arise EP is a 12-inch with four of the LP tracks on it.)

Recorded with lots of instrumental assistants, My Blue Period is Tot's jazz record; Aluminum Pan Alley. The aptly named “The Wrong Idea,” a strained attempt at cleverness, gets things off on the wrong foot. “The Compromising Life” is a much better notion, and its swell mute trumpet work is a well-executed example of the LP's stylistic intentions. Additionally, “A Girl Did This” ranks with his best, but Period just isn't consistent.

On Menswear, Tot went to the other extreme for a DIY approach in his modest home studio. Lyrically and arrangement-wise, he regains top form (sixteen tight little vignettes) but, melodically, his catchiness quotient is still not one hundred percent. When he's on, however, the LP ranges from good (“Trouble in Store,” as in department store) to brilliant (“Waiting for My Egg,” a procrastination anthem).

Jumble Soul is a fourteen-cut best-of, collecting some of the first three LPs plus some unalbumized 45s (including the two non-LP GTO A-sides), the title track of The Girl with Everything (the 7-inch EP also contains “Modern Wife” from Playtime and instrumental soundtrack music looking for a film). Scrapbook is a limited-edition boxed set for the true Totfan: two albums, a 10-inch EP of previously unreleased tracks, a four-song 7-inch of new tunes, a cassette of radio interviews and more. Whew! [jg]

See also Advertising

BRAM TCHAIKOVSKY

Strange Man, Changed Man (Polydor) 1979

The Russians Are Coming (nr/Radar) 1980

Pressure (Polydor) 1980

Funland (Arista) 1981

Bram Tchaikovsky was a group as well as Peter Brammell's nom de rock, but it was the lack of a similarly strong second creative force to him in the band that proved to be its undoing. The ex-Motors guitarist/bassist/vocalist had the talent to make his band work for a while, but couldn't maintain its quality alone.

Strange Man, Changed Man sounds fresh and punky (if rather trebly)—an energetic mixture of the Byrds, Springsteen and, not surprisingly, the Motors. (Nick Garvey, one of Bram's ex-bandmates, co-produced.) The LP includes three fine singles ("Girl of My Dreams," "I'm the One That's Leaving," "Sarah Smiles"); the rest of the material has also worn remarkably well.

Expanding from a trio to a quartet and doing the production themselves, Bram (the band) came up with a sophomore effort (The Russians Are Coming, retitled Pressure for the cold-war-minded USA) that improves the sound but has far less consistent songs, with writing divided among various combinations of the members.

Subsequent personnel shifts left Bram (the man) with neither satisfactory writing partners nor an alternate (or harmony) vocalist to shore up his own shortcomings. An attempt to pursue several ill-advised directions makes Funland (production again by Garvey) lifeless. The only times Bram's tepid vocals cut loose are on the oft-covered "Breaking Down the Walls of Heartache" and an old Motors B-side, "Soul Surrender," recorded as an afterthought by Bram, Garvey and deputized drummer Hilly Michaels. [jg]

See also Motors.

TEARDROPS

Final Vinyl (nr/Illuminated) 1980

Buzzcocks bassist Steve Garvey was a Teardrop; the rest of this Manchester outfit had ties to the Fall and other local legends. Final Vinyl is very inconsistent—too much mucking about in the studio ruins the decent tracks with spurious talking and noises—but there is some fine music here that hovers between the Buzzcocks and the Sex Pistols. [i]

TEAR GARDEN

See Skinny Puppy.

TEARS FOR FEARS

The Hurting (Mercury) 1983 •

Songs from the Big Chair (Mercury) 1985 •

The Seeds of Love (Fontana) 1989 •

OLETA ADAMS

Circle of One (Fontana) 1990 ♠

One of the '80s' most astonishing debuts, The Hurting introduces Tears for Fears—Roland Orzabal (vocals, guitar, keyboards) and Curt Smith (bass, vocals, keyboards)—and their intensely dour, introspective worldview. Grounded in Janovian primal scream theory and other aspects of modern psychology, Orzabal's songs discuss only somber topics of deep pain and sorrow. Like their titles ("The Hurting," "Mad World," "Start of the Breakdown," "Watch Me Bleed"), the lyrics are more often depressed than angry. Odd fare for hit records with teenybop appeal to be sure, but occasionally anxious vocals and the eclectic, often remarkable music belie the dark thoughts being conveyed. It's disconcerting to find yourself humming along with such misery, but The Hurting is an excellent, mature record.

Over two years in the making, Songs from the Big Chair finds Tears for Fears less miserable, more capable of expressing anger and well on their way to major stardom. (The LP ultimately sold nine million copies worldwide.) "Head Over Heels" (grand pop), "Everybody Wants to Rule the World" (haunting pop) and "Shout" (measured, gruff rock)—all co-written by Orzabal with others in the group—are the best three out of eight. The music is more ambitious and sophisticated, allowing a few numbers to go on too long without generating much impact, but the strong entrants are top-notch.

Emboldened by success and growing fanatical in his perfectionism, Orzabal (emerging as the group's creative heavyweight) saw The Seeds of Love through a ten-month false start, two changes of producers (TFF ended up doing it themselves with engineer Dave Bascombe) and painstaking byte-by-byte computer manipulation of the music. Rivaling Tom Scholz for the Guinness studio slowpoke record, he and Smith spent a fortune fussing over eight tracks in earnest for seventeen months. Eventually, they completed an album, a suite-like assortment of songs that—with the exception of the immediately delightful Beatles tribute, "Sowing the Seeds of Love"—are almost impenetrable in their delicate complexity and maddening density. Although she appears only on "Woman in Chains" and "Badman's Song," American vocalist/pianist Oleta Adams steals the show by injecting some soul into these absurdly overintellectualized exercises.

Returning the favor, Orzabal co-produced and played on Circle of One, fitting Adams' mature songs (mainstream pop soul originals with a theatrical bent and stirring lyrics of womanly self-determination) into tasteful arrangements that highlight the rich warmth of her voice. [i]

TENDER FURY

See True Sounds of Liberty.

TEENAGE FANCLUB

A Catholic Education (Matador) 1990 •

If Sonic Youth had spent more time listening to Neil Young as kids, they might resemble this unpretentiously shaggy Glasgow quintet, which fishes memorable hooks and involving melodies out of lazy, thick pools of overdriven guitar rock. Relaxed and rough, A Catholic Education has a wonderfully informal feel, surprisingly clear vocals, cool lyrics and simple chord-based songs (like the solemn "Everything Flows," the peppy "Critical Mass" and the anthemic "Eternal Light") that ably withstand repeated hearings. [i]

TEENAGE HEAD(S)

Teenage Head (Can. IGM) 1979 (Can. Other Peoples Music-Goon Island) 1981
Frantic City (Can. Attic) 1980
Some Kinda Fun (Can. Attic) 1982
Tornado EP (MCA) 1983
Endless Party (Can. Ready) 1984
Trouble in the Jungle (Can. Warpt) 1986
Electric Guitar (Can. Fringe Product) 1988 •

Fronted by singer Frankie Venom, this hard-rockin' quartet from Toronto owes more than its name to the Flamin Groovies—the records are full of non-stop crazed rock n' roll songs about cars, parties, girls, booze and general wanton fun, all imbued with the original Groovies' unreconstructed spirit. With nods to Eddie Cochran, Chuck Berry, Gene Vincent and other pioneers, Teenage Head races along, Gordie Lewis' guitar blazing, through numbers like "Ain't Got No Sense" and "Kissin' the Carpet" (both on Teenage Head, which was remixed and reissued), "Disgusteen" (Frantic City) and "Teenage Beer Drinking Party" (Some Kinda Fun). If they were smarter and more sarcastic, T. Head might have more in common with the old Dictators; as it stands, their sound, while hardly original, is perfect for parties held in gymnasiums. The first three records aren't hip, but they are solid, sweaty and convincingly salacious.

Given a pluralizing, name-sanitizing "s," the group lowered its hysteria level on the six-song Tornado, an ill-advised stab at maturity and commercial hard-rock acceptability. Snore. Endless Party is a live greatest-hits rundown recorded on New Year's Eve 1983.

Fortunately, the story doesn't end there. Safely removed from the Lower Fifty's crass influence, the quartet reclaimed both its spelling and sense of fun on the nifty Trouble in the Jungle. Covering Bobby Fuller, Eddie Cochran and Elvis Presley amid a variety of equally gonzo originals, the band shifts gears easily from lightly played rockabilly pop to electric punk—sometimes in the same song.

Electric Guitar has only one non-original, but self-propulsion does nothing to impede the versatile fun. "She Rips My Lips," "Can't Stop Shakin'" and "Full-Time Fool" are all vintage-flavor rockers, crisply delivered with chops and spirit; "Your Sister Used to Love Me" makes a cool milkshake of Dave Rave's relaxed surf vocals and Lewis' sizzling punk chords; "You're the One I'm Crazy For" is a spectacular Ramones imitation. Electric Guitar is convincing proof that a neat and clean garage can still rock. (Daniel Lanais plays guitar on two tracks.) [i]

TEENAGE JESUS AND THE JERKS

Teenage Jesus and the Jerks EP (Lust/Unlust) 1979

VARIOUS ARTISTS

No New York (Antilles) 1978

LYDIA LUNCH

Hysteric (nr/Widowspeak) 1986 (CD Presents) 1986 •

Teenage Jesus pushed the anything-goes/anyone-can-do-it philosophy of punk about as far as it would stretch without breaking. Formed in 1976 by onetime CBGB waitress Lydia Lunch and saxophone/conflict artist James Chance, TJ & the Jerks went beyond minimalism and atonality into what Lunch proudly called "aural terror"; the band cranked up a musical death knell over which she screamed her lyrics of fear, pain and unpleasantness. After Chance quit to form the equally abrasive but funkier Contortions, the Jerks soldiered on as a trio, leaving their sonic bloodbaths on the No New York anthology and the two Bob Quine-produced singles ("Orphans" and "Baby Doll") preserved on the 12-inch pink vinyl 1979 EP. (The group also issued a three-song 12-inch on ZE.) Lydia ranks as one of the most creatively untalented guitarists of all time; her blistering walls of noise, while completely lacking in melody or taste, possess an unremitting atavistic ferocity. Never a band to waste the audience's time, Teenage Jesus specialized in 20-second songs and ten-minute sets (which some witnesses still considered about nine minutes too long.)

The double-album Hysteric compilation contains an entire side of Teenage Jesus & the Jerks: a ten-track onslaught that pretty much recapitulates the group's oeuvre, some of it in glorious live-at-CBGB sound. Lunch went on to numerous other bands and musical alliances. Drummer Bradley Field popped up briefly as a bongo player for the Contortions; bassist Jim Sclavunos became the drummer in two of Lydia's subsequent bands, Beirut Slump and 8 Eyed Spy. [rnp]

See also James Chance, 8 Eyed Spy, Lydia Lunch.

TEEN IDLES

See Minor Threat.

DENIZ TEK

See Radio Birdman.

TELESCOPES

7th # Disaster EP (nr/Cheree) 1989

The Perfect Needle EP (nr/What Goes On) 1989

Taste (nr/What Goes On) 1989

To Kill a Slow Girl Walking EP (nr/What Goes On) 1989

Trade Mark of Quality (nr/Fierce) 1990 •

The Telescopes EP (nr/Creation) 1990

Everso EP (nr/Creation) 1990

Celeste EP (nr/Creation) 1991

Violently coupling '60s punk with a Jesus and Mary howl, Burton-upon-Trent's Telescopes originally got on the map via their debut single (presaged by a live flexi). While the title tune of 7th # Disaster only improves on the quintet's formula, the other three tracks slither tentacles into neighboring pies, demonstrating, in particular, a decidedly un-Dinosaur(Jr)-like grasp of strum/shriek dynamics. Perfect Needle goes one rung further up the ladder of iconoclasm, adding violins and slow seething tunes to the distortion, resulting in music that is no more complicated nor any less aggressive than the Stooges, yet sounds like nobody but the Telescopes.

Taste reprises "Perfect Needle" from the EP, mating it with a set ranging from gentle fury to frantic abandon. The band's control of aural mania and anger is impeccable (credit due debut-til-death producer Richard Formby), but precious little of the actual material equals preceding or subsequent EPs.

To Kill a Slow Girl Walking adds nothing to the canon save a few trumpet bleats—and more highly memorable tuneage. Trade Mark of Quality is essentially an upper-end bootlegish bit of live mayhem in the dodgy Fierce-label series also covering Spacemen 3 and the Pooh Sticks, interesting only in its glimpse of the band sans studio augmentation. While the muted live buzz is unquestionably less invigorating than their "crafted" material, the 'Scopes do manage to kick out several flavors of jam for a tense and tasty megadecibel, megadrenaline rush.

Sidestepping onto Creation, the group's next record ups the pop content two notches while decreasing the pain quotient to the same degree, allowing nuances previously buried in feedback to surface. Everso subtracts all remaining scree for a brief garage psych outing that could have graced their first two records if they'd had greater control—and politer manners—back then. Proceeding from there, the dull and faceless Celeste totally drops the band's personality and is sonically unidentifiable as the Telescopes. [ab]

TELEVISION

Marquee Moon (Elektra) 1977 •

Adventure (Elektra) 1978 •

The Blow-Up [tape] (ROIR) 1982 [CD] (Fr. Danceteria) 1990 ♪

Live, they were the ultimate garage band with pretensions—Television's influences were Coltrane and Dylan as well as Roky Erickson—but on record they achieved a polish that added genuine strength. The group evolved from the Neon Boys and initially consisted of Tom Verlaine (guitar/vocals), Richard Lloyd (guitar), Billy Ficca (drums) and Richard Hell (bass). Hell left to form the Heartbreakers with Johnny Thunders, and ex-Blondie bassist Fred Smith took over his slot. Thus constituted (and significantly reduced in fringe aggression), Television recorded "Little Johnny Jewel," a privately pressed single which many regard as a turning point for the whole New York scene.

TV signed to Elektra and released Marquee Moon in 1977. A tendency to "jam" onstage caused detractors (and, paradoxically, British fans) to refer to them as the Grateful Dead of punk, but it was the distinctive two-guitar interplay (along with Verlaine's nails-on-chalkboard vocals) that set them apart. Verlaine's staccato singing in songs like "Prove It" and "Friction" is impressive, and the long workout on the title track showed a willingness to break away from the solidifying traditions of their more self-conscious contemporaries.

Adventure was, contrary to its title, smoother and more controlled than its predecessor, but did not want for good material. "Glory," "Foxhole" and the beautiful "Days" showed the band to have a firm grip on their songwriting. Television lasted about another year before splintering. A posthumous tape-only compilation of live performances shows the band's rawer side and includes such concert cover staples as "Knockin' on Heaven's Door," "Satisfaction" and the 13th Floor Elevators' classic "Fire Engine" (listed as "The Blow Up" and credited to Verlaine, though the song is mentioned by its true name and source in the liner notes). Verlaine and Lloyd have both pursued solo careers; Ficca became a Waitress. Richard Hell released records and fronted bands under his own name after leaving the Heartbreakers. [jw]

See also Heartbreakers, Richard Hell, Richard Lloyd, Kristi Rose and the Midnight Walkers, Tom Verlaine, Waitresses, Washington Squares.

TELEVISION PERSONALITIES

Where's Bill Grundy Now? EP (no label) 1978 (Rough Trade) 1979

... And Don't the Kids Just Love It (nr/Rough Trade) 1980

Mummy Your Not Watching Me (nr/Whaam!) 1981

(nr/Dreamworld) 1987

They Could Have Been Bigger Than the Beatles

(nr/Whaam!) 1982 (nr/Dreamworld) 1986

Then God Snaps His Fingers (nr/Whaam!) 1983

The Painted Word (nr/Illuminated) 1984

Chocolat-Art (Ger. Pastell) 1985

Privilege (Fire) 1989 •

Salvador Dalí's Garden Party EP (nr/Fire) 1989

Drawing inspiration from '60s British pop and psychedelia, London's Television Personalities—led by Daniel Treacy, with schoolmate Edward Ball (also the man of the Times, to whom he became singly loyal in the early '80s) and Joe Foster (later of Slaughter Joe)—are a haphazard and amateurish band whose records offer no slick musicianship but loads of brilliantly adapted pop-art weirdness. They started out wide-eyed and Jonathan Richman-like but evolved into (and beyond) rambling, jagged space noise and various stripes of time-warped psychedelia.

Ball and Treacy began casually, recording singles together as the Television Personalities, O Level and Teenage Filmstars; Foster contributed to the vinyl minideluge as the Missing Scientists. Showing a healthy awareness for 1978's here-and-now, they released Where's Bill Grundy Now?, a 7-inch EP also known as Part Time Punks (after another of its four songs).

The TVPs (for this project, Treacy, Ball and a drummer) made their longplaying debut with And Don't the Kids Just Love It, an altogether charming and guileless version of Carnaby Street pop given a modern neurotic outlook. The cover sets the period with a collage that fits together John Steed of The Avengers and Twiggy. From a Kinksish tale of boyish admiration ("Geoffrey Ingram") to the lyrically acute "I Know Where Syd Barrett Lives," simply and softly played guitars, bass and drums support coy vocals sung in Treacy's adenoidal accent. Haunting melodies and abundant wit make the record bizarre but wonderful, far more eccentric and original than the solemn neo-mod rehashers of the same era.

Ball and Treacy then formed the Whaam! label, later renamed Dreamworld after George Michael's people took an interest. In between Times sessions (which generally included Treacy), the TVPs moved from succinct pop art and flower power to trippy psychedelia on Mummy Your Not Watching Me, a mixture of keyboards and low-budget studio effects. Although some of the songs follow the first album's art-school template ("Painting by Numbers" and "Lichtenstein Painting"), others meander through mild mind expansion, in homage to Barrett and other acid-rockers. The standout in this vein is "David Hockney's Diaries," which also demonstrates the problems inherent in adorableness trying to be spacey. The shoebox production removes any grandiosity that may have been intended, and what's left sounds mixed up and silly. If it weren't for the redeeming pop tunes, Mummy would have been a real disappointment.

Released concurrently with the announcement of the band's dissolution (actually, Ball and Treacy merely parted ways for a while; the TVPs continued apace), They Could Have Been Bigger Than the Beatles includes reprises of previously recorded songs as well as a pair of prime numbers—"Painter Man" and "Making Time"—by the '60s ultra-mod Creation, which receive affectionate and respectful (if incompetent) treatment. The album offers sixteen tracks of should-have-been-good nostalgic art-rock, but sacrifices a lot of charm with an overly heavy guitar sound. Best cut: "The Boy in the Paisley Shirt."

The Painted Word lists a four-man lineup and actually features a group photo (albeit a dark, fuzzy one) on the front cover. Musically, the TVPs have drifted off into spare, droning psychedelia and ultra-restrained rock that's hauntingly beautiful, like the most delicate moments of the Velvet Underground. While less resonantly topical than before (save for "Back to Vietnam"), the all-original songs effectively convey a melancholic sense of futility, even when superficially addressing relatively jolly topics. Highlighted by "Stop and Smell the Roses" and "Someone to Share My Life With," The Painted Word is surprisingly serious and altogether excellent.

Chocolat-Art (sarcastically subtitled "A Special Tribute to James Last") was recorded live as a trio in Germany (1984), and features simple but effective performances of such TVP classics as "Silly Girl," "I Know Where Syd Barrett Lives" (appending "I know where Paul Weller lives—'cause he's a hippie, too") and the stupendous "Look Back in Anger." The band's isn't always in tune, but you know they mean well.

Recorded as a trio with ex-Swell Maps bassist Jowe Head and drummer Jeffrey Bloom (both also participants in Slaughter Joe), the very wonderful Privilege only improves on The Painted Word with better songs, production, singing and playing. Sounding in spots very much like Pete Shelley (especially on "Sometimes I Think You Know Me Better Than I Know Myself"), Treacy is a bad-mood-guy here (witness "All My Dreams Are Dead," "This Time There's No Happy Ending" and "Sad Mona Lisa"), but he does brighten long enough for the pop-art happening of "Salvador Dali's Garden Party" (which winsomely lists all the posh celebrities in attendance). The music is brilliant—characteristically direct songs dressed up with just the right amount of keyboards—and Treacy's voice is as boyishly engaging as ever. [i]

See also Times.

TELEX

Looking for Saint Tropez (nr/Sire) 1979

Neurovision (Sire) 1980

Sex (PVC) 1981

Birds and Bees (nr/Interdisc) 1982

Looney Tunes (Atlantic) 1988 •

This Belgian synth trio—specializing in suave Euro-disco—is at once a bland dance machine and a reasonably clever techno-pop team. Deadly slow adaptations (with artificial-sounding processed vocals) of "Rock Around the Clock" and Plastic Bertrand's "Ça Plane pour Moi" make Looking for Saint Tropez amusingly noteworthy; the originals, while faster, are mundane and one-dimensional.

Neurovision takes the same approach, giving Sly Stone's "Dance to the Music" the full Telex treatment amid another batch of boring originals. (If the group's use of synthesizers weren't as dull as technically possible, their records might be a lot better.) Sex adds a novel element by employing Ron and Russell Mael as lyricists; the collaboration resembles Sparks' work with Giorgio Moroder in form, if not content. Unfortunately, Telex's languid creations lack the spunk to keep up with the warped wordplay of "Sigmund Freud's Party," "Exercise Is Good for You" and "Carbon Copy." (Birds and Bees replaces three of Sex's tracks with subsequent singles.)

Whatever Telex did during its '80s vacation, Looney Tunes is a significantly different kettle of ducks. Treading a jokey electronic path somewhere between Art of Noise, Kraftwerk and Yello, the trio concocts simple dance grooves with absurd chanted lyrics and then starts emptying its bag of sound effects, chucking in everything but you know what. Ironically, "Spike Jones"—named for someone to whom the group obviously owes a conceptual debt here—is one of the flimsy album's least inspired collages. [i]

TEMPLE OF THE DOG

Temple of the Dog (A&M) 1991 •

Yet another twist in the incestuous Seattle scene, Temple of the Dog was recorded over weekends in the fall of 1990 by vocalist Chris Cornell and drummer Matt Cameron of Soundgarden with the surviving members of Mother Love Bone. Meant as a tribute to the late Andrew Wood, the album is as good as anything either band has produced. The Temple has a rootsy side that Soundgarden doesn't touch; freed from his confining lovegodhead image, Cornell sings instead of shrieking, and exposes more sides of his musical talent than past work ever suggested. Sympathetic but laden with some harsh drug imagery, Temple of the Dog manages to address its difficult subject without getting corny or tasteless. [ja]

See also Mother Love Bone, Soundgarden.

TENPOLE TUDOR

Eddie Old Bob Dick and Gary (Stiff) 1981

Let the Four Winds Blow (Stiff) 1981

Swords of a Thousand Men (Can. Stiff) 1981

This wonderful, over-the-top crew of rowdies is led by the inimitable Edward Tudor-Pole, whose wobbly vocals lend the proper air of debauchery to the band's hard-driving arias. Eddie Old Bob Dick and Gary contains such classy trash as "Wunderbar," "3 Bells in a Row" and "Swords of a Thousand Men," replete with bizarre concepts, catchy melodies and loopy singing. The great tracks co-exist with some real dogs, but when Tenpole Tudor are on the mark, their good humor and rock energy are undeniably infectious.

Let the Four Winds Blow takes the band (up or down isn't an issue) to a new plateau, working flippant pseudo-country ("Throwing My Baby Out with the Bathwater"), mock-funk ("Local Animal"), even ersatz ballroom schmaltzola ("Tonight Is the Night"). The Canadian-only Swords of a Thousand Men picks the best tracks from both LPs and wraps them in the artwork from the second. Not for the uptight or supercilious, but John Otway fans will understand.

Sir Edward then abandoned his fulltime singing career for a series of blindingly funny cameos in such films as The Great Rock'n'Roll Swindle (in which he sings "Who Killed Bambi?" into a vacuum cleaner handle), Sid & Nancy (a great bit as a hotel clerk), Walker (a rare dramatic role), Absolute Beginners and Straight to Hell. He has also done London theater. [i]

10,000 MANIACS

Human Conflict Number Five EP (Mark) 1982 (Christian Burial Music-Press) 1984

Secrets of the I Ching (Christian Burial Music) 1983 (Christian Burial Music-Press) 1983

The Wishing Chair (Elektra) 1985 •

In My Tribe (Elektra) 1987 •

Blind Man's Zoo (Elektra) 1989 •

Hope Chest (Elektra) 1990 •

JOHN AND MARY

Victory Gardens (Rykodisc) 1991 •

Hailing from Jamestown in provincial upstate New York, 10,000 Maniacs play deceptively challenging new pop music with rustic folkly underpinnings. On the early records, singer Natalie Merchant's innocent voice skips lightly over gentle melodies while her five cohorts provide unobtrusive reggae-folk-pop backing. But on closer inspection, all is not so cozy. Warped guitars slice in and out, and Merchant's fragmented lyrics gently evoke images of a decaying society bent on violent self-destruction.

The five-song Human Conflict Number Five EP is simple and a little underbaked, but does introduce the Maniacs' early trademarks: Merchant's voice, strong, soaring melodies and, on a couple of numbers, lilting Caribbean grooves. Secrets of the I Ching offers a much stronger creative vision; the lyrics serve up tastes of Latin and Spanish, and the music ranges from screeching noise over a pop hook to almost psychedelic power calypso. Both records present difficult ideas without compromise in a most palatable manner.

(A remixed and resequenced compilation of the two records—omitting only one version of "Tension," a song done on both—was issued in 1990. Besides its value for making these rarities widely available with fine sound and informative liner notes, Hope Chest is an elementary but thoroughly credible record that blends nicely with the band's recent efforts.)

The Maniacs' major label debut codified their sound

as never before, essentially dispensing with everything except for neo-traditional electric folk. Although comparisons to Fairport Convention (Joe Boyd produced The Wishing Chair) are somewhat valid, the Maniacs' sensibility and cultural references are totally different: small-town Americana isn't rural Great Britain. Merchant's reflective, impressionist lyrics and clear, powerful singing shine on new songs like "Can't Ignore the Train" and new versions of three tunes from Secrets of the I Ching. Honest, intelligent and enthralling.

Peter Asher's slick production of In My Tribe, the band's first release as a quintet (following the departure of guitarist John Lombardo), is initially bland and off-putting, but the songs' emotional depth and Merchant's awe-inspiring voice ultimately overcome the record's dispiriting homogeneity. The realistic view of child abuse in "What's the Matter Here?" is as troubling as Suzanne Vega's "Luka"; "Cherry Tree" addresses illiteracy with poignant understanding; the cautionary "Gun Shy" is spoken directly at a brother who has newly become a soldier. For contrast, the delighted family vignette of "My Sister Rose" shares joy for its own sake and the cover of Cat Stevens' "Peace Train" offers a utopian alternative to Merchant's more realistic originals. (After Stevens joined other Muslims in calling for the violent death of novelist Salman Rushdie, the group moved to have "Peace Train" removed from the album, but their record company demurred.)

Although the Maniacs' music—no longer prominently folk-oriented—seems mired in a glib soft-rock rut, Blind Man's Zoo's literate, sturdy songs again rise through the bloodless presentation. "Eat for Two" contemplates motherhood with skepticism; "Trouble Me" addresses an elderly relative with compassion; "Hateful Hate" attacks colonialism in Africa; "You Happy Puppet" enigmatically condemns a willing victim of manipulation. Stimulating rather than overtly exciting, Blind Man's Zoo is nonetheless effective in its own way.

Victory Gardens is John Lombardo's first album with singer/violinist/co-writer Mary Ramsey. Maniacs guitarist Robert Buck and drummer Jerome Augustyniak—as well as unrelated oldtimers Ronnie Lane, Augie Meyers and Joey Molland—guest on the collection of pristine electro-folk originals whose designs are familiar but nonetheless appealing. [j/i]

TERRY, BLAIR AND ANOUCHKA

See Colour Field.

TEST DEPT.

Beating the Retreat (nr/Some Bizzare) 1984 •

The Unacceptable Face of Freedom (nr/Ministry of Power-Some Bizzare) 1986 •

A Good Night Out (Ministry of Power-Some Bizzare-Relativity) 1987 •

Terra Firma (Play It Again Sam USA) 1988 •

Materia Prima (nr/Department One) 1990

TEST DEPT. AND THE SOUTH WALES STRIKING MINERS CHOIR

Shoulder to Shoulder (nr/Some Bizzare) 1985

TEST DEPT./BRITH GOF

Gododdin (nr/Ministry of Power) 1989 •

Like that other notable contemporary band of philosophical noisemakers, Einstürzende Neubauten, Test Dept. originally eschewed all musical tradition to play stunning ultra-percussion with an industrial bent. Like their Teutonic soul brothers, this enigmatic British organization uses large metallic objects and power tools to add stark modern realism to the drum overload, but also brings more structure and rhythm to the assault.

Beating the Retreat—two 12-inch EPs comprising a single-length album—adds occasional vocal effects (not singing) that do little to vary the din, which is simply awesome in its intensity and singlemindedness. But several startling tracks take a wholly different approach, offering sparse ambient sound and effects that blithely incorporate real instruments like cello and harp. Shoulder to Shoulder, proving the band's political commitment and activism, gives half of its running time to the 90-member Welsh choir. In one truly strange exercise, the two seemingly unconnectable forces collaborate on a track.

The Unacceptable Face of Freedom, with an unwieldy fold-out cover Hawkwind would be proud of, is a powerful record, both in its potent musical attack and ongoing political convictions. Real drums seem to have replaced most of the steel-bashing, and the instrumentation also includes Fairlight-built orchestras, taped voices (speaking and singing), sequencers and bagpipes. Observations about the state of British life are angrier than ever—"Statement" features a miner giving a firsthand account of picket-line police brutality, while recurring military themes in the music drive the point home even harder.

A Good Night Out continues their forceful manifesto, although the execution has progressed from the tribal pounding of early work to ambitious performance art. Much of the LP was recorded live in London and Amsterdam in what was, judging by the cover photo, a huge multi-media extravaganza—some sort of Marxist military opera. Lyrics which continue to spew bitter, sarcastic and intelligent tirades against the domestic policies of the British Empire are more powerful than ever. Pretentious perhaps, but A Good Night Out also shows Test Dept.'s abiding commitment to their beliefs—social, political and artistic.

The only information given on the cover of Terra Firma is a brief libretto for each of the five tracks (which range from five to fourteen minutes each). Try "While the melancholy piper Alistair pipes a lament, the lovely Nadka grieves" on for size. No, you haven't picked up a Russian novel by mistake. The stories all lead to a concluding call for all world citizens to unite on firm ground (hence the title). The omnipresent drums shape four of the five cuts (the one exception being the inadvisably sung "Dark Eyes"), with other instrumentation—pianos, tapes, horns, (other peoples') voices, etc.—providing each with a distinctive signature. Another ambitious effort that only Test Dept. could have undertaken.

Gododdin is the result of another collaboration, this time with Brith Gof, a Welsh theater group, and some of the lyrics and liner notes are in that beautiful and unusual language. The performance from which the album developed is based on an epic Welsh poem, and was originally staged in an abandoned car factory in Cardiff. (It was later performed in Hamburg, Germany with sponsorship from Mobil and Philip Morris; a rather ironic capitalist twist.) Despite the militaristic theme, the music is more haunting and less bombastic than A Good Night Out. A chilling work.

The live Materia Prima, recorded around Europe between 1986 and 1989, contains much of the same material as The Unacceptable Face of Freedom.

[i/dgs]

TEX AND THE HORSEHEADS

Tex and the Horseheads (Bemisbrain-Enigma) 1984

Life's So Cool (Enigma) 1985

Tot Ziens: Live in Holland (Hol. Enigma) 1986

One of the wilder exponents of cow-punk, Tex and the Horseheads are spiritual kin to the Gun Club. And while they lean toward a very punky image (lead singer Texacala Jones dresses like a female Stiv Bator; on the first album, the bassist's name is Smog Vomit and the drummer is Rock Vodka), their playing is fairly coherent. Mixing mutant blues (even a cover of Jimmy Reed's "Big Boss Man") into the first album's punk-country-rock blender, Tex and the Horseheads have a convincingly strong sound, but are a few pints short on material.

John Doe produced the much-better Life's So Cool, an uncontrolled blues-rock riot that recalls Exile on Main Street. It starts with an uncredited quote from the old instrumental "Cat's Squirrel!" (see Jethro Tull's first LP for corroboration) and then goes on to such topics as drinking, fornication and legal tangles in songs that are substantial and thoughtfully developed. Texacala's singing shows great improvement; exciting guitarist Mike Martt and bassist J. Gregory Boaz also pitch in complementary vocals. A very impressive showing with enough bite and spit to satisfy anyone.

Thanks to poor sound and undistinguished playing, the Dutch concert documented in Tot Ziens is an incoherent blur of guitar noise and hard-to-hear vocals. Mostly recapping the band's two studio records (new tunes include "Cutie Rudy," "Go West" and Oscar Brown Jr.'s "Snake"), this live record adds nothing to the originals beyond Jones' scurrilous stage comments.

See also Divine Horsemen.

[i]

TEXAS

Southside (Mercury) 1989 •

Defying all the generic stereotypes of contemporary Scottish rock, this Glasgow quartet (whose bassist, John McElhone, was an Altered Image) plays decidedly American heartland folk-rock with inflections of country and gospel. Singer/guitarist Sharleen Spiteri has a strong, handsome voice (with no discernible accent), and the band provides crisp, agile guitar backing. But the songs—mostly Spiteri/McElhone collaborations—are bland archetypal rewrites with more commercial than artistic value. And not to get jingoist about it, the Scottish perspective adds nothing to already well-explored territory.

[i]

TEXAS INSTRUMENTS

More Texas Instruments! EP (Longhead) 1985

The Texas Instruments (Rabid Cat) 1987

Sun Tunnels (Rabid Cat) 1988

Crammed into Infinity (Rockville) 1991 •

One of the advantages of growing up musical in Texas is that you can play cowboy rock without getting all stupid and self-conscious about it. Austin's Texas Instruments don't waste a lot of time or fuss detailing their stylistic concepts, the unpretentious trio just gets on with it, delivering crisp post-punk songs in a distinctly regional dialect. Over a simple Southwestern backbeat, Dave Woody drops an occasional ZZ Top lick into his barbed wire guitar playing, the backbone of lyrically substantial, reasonably tuneful material.

Following a four-song 12-inch and a stint backing Daniel Johnston on his Continued Story cassette, TI made its unassumingly strong longplaying debut on The Texas Instruments, an album of good songs (like the garagey "Prussian Blue") and energetic arrangements that stay loud without turning abrasive. Besides putting an infrequent Dylan inflection in its own songs, the trio covers Woody Guthrie's "Do Re Mi" and gives "A Hard Ran's a-Gonna Fall" an effective rattlesnake boogie bite.

Double-dipping into the Dylan catalogue, the more temperate Sun Tunnels (again produced by Spot) includes a rendition of "You Ain't Going Nowhere" and an amusingly derivative original entitled "Watch'n It All Go Down." While only "Little Black Sunrise" goes so far as to be acoustic folk, the LP is a lot less aggressive overall, with impressive sophistication (especially rhythmic) that, on some of the harder numbers, owes a clear stylistic debt to the Minutemen. An exciting step down a promising path. [i]

See also Daniel Johnston.

THAT PETROL EMOTION

Manic Pop Thrill (nr/Demon) 1986 •

Babble (Polydor) 1987 •

The Peel Sessions EP (nr/Strange Fruit) 1987 •

Live (Mansfield) 1988

End of the Millennium Psychosis Blues (Virgin) 1988 •

Peel Sessions Album (nr/Strange Fruit) 1989 •

Chemicrazy (Virgin) 1990 •

Sensitize EP (nr/Virgin) 1990 •

The talented O'Neill brothers left the ashes of the peerless Undertones behind with few prospects for their musical future. While Feargal Sharkey began his transformation into a boring California pop chanteur, they lay low, quietly scorning the business that had shattered their teenage dreams. After several false starts, they returned, with an excellent new quintet that built on past accomplishments without revisiting them. Damian O'Neill took up bass for the Petrols; big brother Seán (previously known as John) and Derry homeboy Reámann O'Gormáin play guitar; drummer Ciaran McLaughlin and Seattle singer Steve Mack complete the band, which is politically aware, occasionally abrasive and devoutly independent.

Manic Pop Thrill is an apt title for the angry, articulate rock melodies that span the continuum from sweet balladry to PiL/Fall-like noise. Mack is a fine, controlled shouter in the Keith Relf/Steve Marriott tradition; the band's combination of slide guitars, Bo Diddley beats, wild harmonica wailing and raveup energy recalls the early Stones, Yardbirds and Velvet Underground. The utter lack of nostalgia or revivalism here suggests that, even with all the crap that masquerades as music nowadays, some things about rock'n'roll will never die. (The CD adds four tracks.)

Produced by ex-Swan Roli Mosimann, Babble puts the issues—mostly concerning religion and Irish nationalism—right up front: "Creeping to the Cross," "Big Decision," "Swamp," "Chester Burnette" and others unleash the group's vehemence and informed radical commentary. Since the lyrics aren't very specific and the single-minded music is ruggedly invigorating, agreement isn't a prerequisite to appreciation. The Petrols could benefit from a little more stylistic consistency (everybody writes, often in very different directions), but the melding of real-life anger with germane musical passion gives Babble an abrasive quality that is impossible to ignore.

The June 1985 performances on the Peel EP predate the band's first album; songs include "V2," "Can't Stop," "Lettuce" and "Blind Spot." The full-length Peel album pairs that session with a second recorded later the same year. Recorded in Los Angeles, the nifty but questionable 1988 Live mini-album (seemingly a boot, but openly distributed through legitimate channels) has covers of Neil Young's "Cinnamon Girl" and Pere Ubu's "Non Alignment Pact" alongside five of the band's own tunes, from the pre-Pop Thrill "V2" to the then-new "Here It Is . . . Take It!"

While some of the more restrained material on the stylistically scattered End of the Millennium Psychosis Blues (again produced by Rosimann) is underwhelming, tracks like "Sooner or Later," "Tension," "Here It Is . . . Take It!" and "Groove Check"—on which the band's Celtic funk-rock, complete with horns, is in full effect—are gripping. As the music shifts gears to suit their tone, the lyrics run alternately bleak, resigned and angry (a few of them, in keeping with the militant liner notes, specifically topical, the rest more generally directed). When it all clicks, the band's charging sound and fiery ideas combine to make a powerful artistic statement.

Shortly after the album's release, Seán O'Neill chose family life over the rock'n'roll jungle, and left the band. Damian returned to guitar, McLaughlin emerged as the leading songwriter and the Petrols drafted a new bassist, John Marchini, who made his debut on the Scott Litt-produced Chemicrazy. Given all the changes, it's surprising that the album sounds anything at all like its predecessors; unfortunately what remains in the absence of Seán's disconsolate moodiness and Mosimann's loud impudence is crisply presentable but emotionally defused, lyrically inadequate and blandly commercialized. While the cool "Scum Surfin'" proves that there is life after the end of the millennium, Chemicrazy is a dose of the wrong medicine.

Built around an album track and the non-LP "Chemicrazy," the Sensitize EP is a multi-format extravaganza, available (besides two two-track single configurations and a three-song 12-inch) as a CD and, with different tracks, a 10-inch vinyl platter in a box with a poster. [i]

See also Undertones.

THEE HEADCOATS

See Thee Mighty Caesars

THEE HYPNOTICS

Live'r Than God! (Sub Pop) 1989 •

Come Down Heavy (Beggars Banquet/RCA) 1990 •

Assembling a host of 1967 psychedelic fuzz-guitar stars—Blue Cheer, Cream, Jimi Hendrix, etc.—as primary influences, adding a bit of Pretty Things/Rolling Stones ambience and jamming on a frenzied Stooges/MC5 drive, this London quartet handily re-creates the pre-Zeppelin era with more flair than most. Singer James Jones knows all the right moves, as does guitarist Ray Hanson, who pulls off the neat trick of overdubbing several different specific styles in a single song. Combining four live tracks from a UK EP of the same name and four studio tracks from a pair of British singles, the American Live'r Than God! album is a swirling carpet ride of electrifying nostalgia, effectively digested and powerfully delivered. Lacking overdubs, the energetic concert side sounds rather thin and monochromatic, but such studio creations as “Soul Trader” and “Earth Blues” are mighty potent.

Just as the '60s greats gave way (commercially speaking) to junkyard knockoffs like Grand Funk Railroad, so Thee Hypnotics moved the wrong way forward on their first full-length studio LP. Abandoning the claustrophobic atmosphere and excitement of their initial pose, they opted for a bombastic and hollow '70s arena-rock sound—incorporating funk-metal and Cult-ish raunch—that frighteningly recalls such turn-of-the-decade nightmares as Bloodstone and Rhinoceros. Come Down Heavy is, pardon the cheap joke, a heavy comedown. [i]

THEE MIGHTY CAESARS

Thee Mighty Caesars (nr/Milkshakes) 1985

Beware the Ides of March (nr/Big Beat) 1985

Little by Little EP (nr/Media Burn) 1986

Thee Caesars of Trash (nr/Milkshakes) 1986

Acropolis Now (nr/Milkshakes) 1986

Live in Rome (nr/Big Beat) 1987

Wiseblood (nr/Ambassador) 1987 (nr/Hangman) 1989

Don't Give Any Dinner to Henry Chinaski (nr/Hangman) 1987

Punk Rock Showcase (nr/Hangman) 1987

Thusly, Thee Mighty Caesars English Punk Rock Explosion (Crypt) 1988

John Lennon's Corpse Revisited (Crypt) 1989

Surely They Were the Sons of God (Crypt) 1990

(THEE/WILD) BILLY CHILDISH

I've Got Everything Indeed (nr/Hangman) 1987

The 1982 Cassettes (nr/Hangman) 1987

"i remember ..." (nr/Hangman) 1987

Poems of Laughter and Violence (nr/Hangman) 1988

50 Albums Great (nr/Hangman) 1991

WILD BILLY CHILDISH AND BIG RUSS WILKINS

Laughing Gravy (nr/Empire) 1987

BILLY CHILDISH AND SEXTON MING

Which Dead Donkey Daddy? (nr/Hangman) 1987

Plump Prizes and Little Gems (nr/Hangman) 1987

Ypres 1917 Overture (Verdun Ossuary) (nr/Hangman) 1987

JACK KETCH AND THE CROWMEN

Brimfull of Hate (nr/Hangman) 1988

WILD BILLY CHILDISH AND THE BLACKHANDS

Play Cap'n Calypso's Hoodoo Party (nr/Hangman) 1988

WILD BILLY CHILDISH AND THE NATURAL BORN LOVERS

Long Legged Baby (nr/Hangman) 1989

THEE HEADCOATS

Headcoats Down! (nr/Hangman) 1989

The Earls of Suavedom (Crypt) 1990

The Kids Are All Square—This Is Hip! (nr/Hangman) 1990

Beach Bums Must Die (Crypt) 1990

Heavens to Murgatroyd, Even! It's Thee Headcoats!

(Already) (Sub Pop) 1990 •

Noted painter/woodcut artist Bill Hamper considers music a sideline, a hobby. But don't tell that to record producer Rollin Slim, or music historian/art director William Loveday (or his colleague, Chatham Jack), Jack Ketch or . . . Billy Childish. Idiosyncratic dyslexic poet of discontent and disgruntlement, Hamper organized a mutually hateful bunch into the Medway (named for a British river) poets, elevating them into the public eye and even putting the runts on vinyl before their acknowledged distaste for one another melted the union.

In addition to publishing booklets by assorted members of the Medway cartel, Billy's Hangman imprint has released a library of several dozen volumes of his own introspective/socially accusatory poems and lyrics, plus LPs by various friends and co-conspirators, as well as Link Wray and Billy's own manifold incarnations. Challenging the accepted corporate policy of attempting to sell 50,000 copies of one LP, the Childish strategy calls for absolute immediacy and absence of polish, constant inspiration (if not innovation) and the release on vinyl—in limited numbers for a decidedly limited (if insatiable and growing) audience—virtually every musical spark, no matter how bright or dull. In other words, 1,000 copies each of 50 different LPs.

Following his stints in the Pop Rivits and the Milkshakes, Billy briefly retreated to svengali status in the Delmonas, but quickly hopped back into the spotlight, and the attendant machiavellian control that had helped drive his partner M. Hampshire from the Milkshakes. As heard on its first 45 and LP, the Mighty Caesars consist of the final 'Shakes lineup minus Mickey, and sound predictably like the former band, if a bit more ragged and amped up, with one guitar substituting for two. Beware the Ides of March introduces new drummer Del (aka Graham Day of Medway stalwarts the Prisoners/Prime Movers) for a slightly more reserved and crafted set of idiopathic beat punk, with the best track excerpted for the Little by Little EP. The next two albums only hone their spew, with more of a garage pop underpinning; Acropolis Now adds Fay (organ, vocals) from Makin' Time and Sarah from the Delmonas.

Live in Rome isn't; reprising past Mighty Caesars' highlights alongside covers of the Damned, Pistols and Chuck Berry, the exuberant crowd is dubbed in, the spontaneous banter a boozy prank. Wiseblood (released on Wreckless Eric's label) is rougher (à la the debut), whereas Henry Chinaski (subtitled "Early Demonstration Recordings") offers some of their loosest and least solicitous performances of material (both familiar and unreleased) from several periods.

Punk Rock Showcase collects fourteen tracks from previous LPs, some of them duplicated on Thusly, Thee Mighty Caesars English Punk Rock Explosion, their US debut, which contains only one new item. John Lennon's Corpse Revisited (with a Sgt. Pepper "tribute" cover) is all new, all loud, all lewd, all rowdy—a rampant romp of unhinged punk trash. Surely They Were the Sons of God is yet another compilation, and the last Mighty Caesars release to date, with bassist John Agnew discovering a more lucrative career as soundman for the James Taylor Quartet, while "Del" busies himself with the Prime Movers.

Respecting the Caesars' reputation, Billy retired the name until such time as the band (which all insist has not broken up) finds time to once again play together. In the meantime, Billy has focused on various solo projects, duo projects, one-off projects and the ongoing nonspecific project known as Thee Headcoats. I've Got Everything Indeed is pure solo mono blues and rhythm, roll'n'rock in the tradition of Jimmy Reed, but reduced to absolute raw essentials. The 1982 Cassettes [sic] has far more of a demo feel, with painfully ragged tunes more in an acoustic blues vein; the home-recording hiss and screwy levels contribute to the maniacally insular feel, making it perhaps the most personal Childish LP to date, hence the "Warning! You most likely won't like this record . . ." i remember fits stylistically (if not chronologically) between these two LPs, riding the Medway rails between rural Mississippi and the urbanized Chicago sound.

Poems of Laughter and Violence is Billy in even more reduced terms, reading his often vitriolic prose alone into a microphone, accompanied only by the sound of pages being turned and liquid being guzzled. Still, this is as possessed and incensed, as naked an LP as any punk classic.

The 10-inch Laughing Gravy reunites Billy with Milkshake/Rivitt Russ, again bowing to the blues muse for a mostly relaxed, mostly acoustic set of tunes celebrating Delta traditions.

Which Dead Donkey Daddy? pairs Billy with Medway poet Sexton Ming (likeminded and similarly dyslexic leader of Auntie Vegetable and the Mindreaders and solo artist; B. Childish makes major contributions as musician and vocalist on both of his Hangman LPs), mixing elements of forgotten blues with bleary Beefheartian subversive art, plus two parts all things non-pop and four parts uncaring self-indulgence, with just a niggle of music off in the distance. Plump Prizes and Little Gems is a goofily selfconscious distillation of same, while Ypres 1917 Overture is so perpendicular as to be virtually unfathomable in its mute alleyway operatics to all but its two principals, intent on condemning all war via the microcosm of Verdun.

Elsewhere in history, incompetent British executioner Jack Ketch frequently watched his charges die of strangulation rather than snapped necks and, on at least one occasion, abandoned his beheading axe for a knife after several unsuccessful blows. Reincarnated as a Billy Childish pseudonym (with Bruce Brand and Banana Bertie, for an original Milkshakes reunion minus Mickey Hampshire), the rock on Brimfull of Hate is punk with darkly arty tendencies, riff-simple but psychotically unblinking and devoid of roll.

The Blackhands coalesced after Nicaragua's Bluefield Express declined Billy's offer of a UK release on Hangman, prompting him to record his own out-of-tune New Orleans-cum-reggae version. Returning to the blues, Long Legged Baby deposits Billy in front of Sexton Ming and Big Russ for a minor run through familiar territory.

Which brings us to Thee Headcoats. Originally Billy Childish, Bruce Brand and either Alan Crockford (of the Prisoners) or John Agnew, the band's first LP is like a more assured Mighty Caesars, with punkier punk, trashier trash and a major dollop of solid unadulterated country blues. The Earls of Suavedom is a more obvious LP that echoes past glories, but it is far overshadowed by The Kids Are All Square, which branches into new pop directions. The resurrected Delmonas are here redubbed Thee Headcoats, and new bassist Ollie Dollar has joined the revolving lineup. Catchy as poison ivy, the uniformly excellent tunes fall into any number of styles, not just the same old blueprints. Beach Bums, an augmented compilation, eschews any stylistic escapades for a pure garage LP, including several remakes with new titles and lyrics (in accepted blues tradition). Heavens to Murgatroyd (its CD "mastered directly from vinyl") bows in both directions, including new pop wonders alongside updated versions of their own and others' songs.

Released early in '91, Childish's 50 Albums Great (his fiftieth LP only by creative arithmetic) consists mostly of "hits" from various post-Milkshakes phases of his career, plus several new tracks and a Billie Holiday cover, all played raw and solo with and without guitar. Not his best.

In Billy's words: "Half the songs I steal ideas direct, the other half indirect, which is true of everyone. Sometimes I have an idea of my own . . ." [ab]

See also Delmonas, Pop Rivits, Prisoners.

THE MILKSHAKES

See Pop Rivits.

THELONIOUS MONSTER

Baby . . . You're Bumming My Life Out in a Supreme Fashion (Epitaph) 1986

Next Saturday Afternoon (Relativity) 1987 •

Stormy Weather (Relativity) 1989 •

Thelonious Monster built its rep on the LA club scene by playing lurching, shambolic club sets (featuring a seven-man, four-guitar lineup), but the thinly produced Baby . . . You're Bumming My Life Out in a Supreme Fashion does little to capture the wacked-out appeal of the Monster's live act. What you get instead is a half-assed grab-bag of styles, some of them effective and others just plain lazy, unified by self-indulgent down-in-the-gutter lyrics and frontman Bob Forrest's whiny personability.

Next Saturday Afternoon is a bit closer to conventional rock'n'roll and is the better for it, unveiling heretofore hidden strengths. The band, now pared down to a quintet (including Weirdos guitarist Dix Denney and 45 Grave bassist Rob Graves) has discovered melody, producing musically and lyrically impressive material like "Next," "Anymore" and "Walk on Water."

The John Doe-produced Stormy Weather (the CD includes all of Next Saturday Afternoon) continues the trend towards musical and lyrical discipline, with surprisingly graceful stabs at topical folk-rock on "Lena Home Still Sings Stormy Weather" and "Sammy Hagar Weekend," not to mention straightforward (and successful) readings of Tracy Chapman's "For My Lover" and Blind Lemon Jefferson's "See That My Grave Is Kept Clean." [hd]

THE PURSUIT OF HAPPINESS

Love Junk (Chrysalis) 1988 •

One-Sided Story (Chrysalis) 1990 •

The first LP from this Canadian quintet seemed like a godsend to many aging rock fans; Love Junk combines grown-up irony with obsessive adolescent lust, setting it all in a convincing, energetic hard rock-pop crunch. Lead singer/songwriter/guitarist Moe Berg's lyrics are simultaneously literate, wise, poignant and irremediably horny. The key cut on the LP is the wry "I'm an Adult Now," but that's just for starters; Love Junk is delightful and surprising from beginning to end. Berg's chord changes and structure bear the unmistakable influence of Todd Rundgren, who proved a most simpatico producer as well.

One-Sided Story is as disastrous an example of the sophomore jinx as has been heard in modern rock. Berg's observations and complaints on Love Junk could evoke any number of complex responses; here he sounds slack and whiny. His once daring wit is now received in the worst way. On the opening track, when he compares his girlfriend's amatory technique to "greasy fried noodles", well, it doesn't take a genius to guess the hungry-an-hour-later punchline. The music isn't nearly as inventive or memorable, and Rundgren's production, so apt on Love Junk, is raw to the extreme. The band deserves to bounce back though, and Berg is too talented to leave it at this. [gk]

THE SCENE IS NOW

Burn All Your Records (Lost) 1985

Total Jive (Lost-Twin/Tone) 1986

Tonight We Ride (Lost-Twin/Tone) 1988

Over a half-decade of existence, this fluid-membership gaggle of NYC bohos has developed from a marginally less political arm of Mofungo's Marxist art-terrorism into a sometimes downright goofy jug band for post-mod beatniks. Burn All Your Records might be rough terrain for diehard capitalists to navigate, but the bracing orchestration—employing more than two dozen noise-things—makes for a fascinating, if occasionally difficult, listen.

Total Jive accentuates the contributions of Mofungo's Chris Nelson (and, to a lesser extent, Elliott Sharp) and takes a more easygoing approach to both music and subject matter—at times it's almost mellow, man! With ex-dB's drummer Will Rigby and Pere Ubu bassist Tony Maimone joining the Scene, Tonight We Ride continues this progression, with Nelson blowing some surprisingly swinging trombone on the good-timey "Midnight Broil," while the entire ensemble locks into a low-key, Grateful Dead-like groove on "California," originally performed by second wave Lower East Side noisemongers I Ride the Bus [dss]

See also Mofungo.

THESE IMMORTAL SOULS

Get Lost (Don't Lie!) (SST) 1987

The members of this band have been around the block a few times. First there was the Birthday Party, from the ashes of which arose Crime and the City Solution with ex-Birthday Party guitarist Rowland S. Howard. After two years and three releases, Howard had his differences with singer Simon Bonney and left, taking his bass-playing brother Harry and drummer Epic Soundtracks (ex-Swell Maps/Jacobites) with him. Adding keyboardist Genevieve McGuckin, he formed These Immortal Souls in 1987.

Get Lost (Don't Lie!) is a 30-minute mini-LP that works as well as, if not better than, any Crime and the City Solution record. Howard can't really sing much, but this doesn't require him to: the shady lyricism which underlies all seven tracks would lose its color if sung by someone more conscious of pitch than self. McGuckin has listened to plenty of Ray Manzarek; Soundtracks turns in brilliant performances. Most of the guitar work is acoustic strumming, although Howard does allow himself to cut loose on "'Blood and Sand' She Said." A very impressive marriage of splendor and squalor. [dgs]

See also Birthday Party, Crime and the City Solution.

THE TEARDROP EXPLODES

Kilimanjaro (Mercury) 1980 (Skyclad) 1988

(Fontana-PolyGram) 1990 •

Wilder (Mercury) 1981 (Skyclad) 1988

(Fontana-PolyGram) 1990 •

You Disappear from View EP (nr/Phonogram) 1983

Everybody Wants to Shag ... The Teardrop Explodes [CD] (Fontana) 1990 •

Piano (nr/Document) 1990

Charming despite frequent bouts of pretentiousness, singer/songwriter Julian Cope (once in a crypto-band called the Crucial Three with future-Echo icon Ian McCulloch and future-Wah! man Pete Dinklage) led Liverpool's great psychedelic hope, The Teardrop Explodes, through two albums before moving on—in the midst of an aborted third—to a solo career. Cope's influences include everyone from Scott Walker to the Doors to Tim Buckley, but Teardrop's sound was better than the sum of its parts. The group's problem was Cope's scattershot approach—his songs are filled with too many amorphous, meaningless and just plain silly images—and his unanswered need for a good editor. Excesses notwithstanding, the Teardrops created some of the era's most exciting music, exerting considerable influence on succeeding generations—Morrissey and the Inspiral Carpets being just two examples of those so influenced.

Kilimanjaro is the more focused of the two albums; next to it, Wilder sounds like a debut, as whatever restraining influence the band had on Cope was removed, leaving him to write all of the songs unaided. (The original US and UK editions had different sequences and two different cuts each. The UK album was later reissued with a different cover and the addition of "Reward"; the Skyklad version uses the reissue's cover but the American track listing. The 1990 model reverts to the original cover but keeps the UK reissue's track listing. Lost in the shuffle is the excellent "Suffocate.") In any form, it's a lush, mesmerizing, appealing album, whose only problem (other than the lyrics) is that the songs—most of which have a childlike, dreamy quality—tend to float together with little individual character. But the ones that do stand out are terrific: "Poppies in the Field," "Treason," "Reward" and "When I Dream," the last providing a brush with American radio success.

While better-defined musically, Wilder is more confused lyrically, though still infused with the band's unique atmosphere. Cope's flat voice serves to provide instrumental-like color, especially on "Bent Out of Shape," "Seven Views of Jerusalem" and "The Culture Bunker." The US and UK editions had the same track listing but different sequences and covers; Skyklad again reissued the American edition and Fontana the British.

The band split up in mid-'82 during the sessions for its third LP, four songs from which were released on You Disappear from View. The EP also includes both the original recording (on the double 7-inch) and a newly recorded string-quartet version (on the 12-inch) of "Suffocate."

The four basic Disappear tracks (including a more finished-sounding recording of "The In-Psychopaedia") join seven others for Everybody Wants to Shag, a Cry of Love-style paste-up of the unfinished third LP that finds the dissolving unit as adventurous and powerful as ever. Mixing experimental material with more familiar brass-speckled pop (as well as early versions of two songs that found their way onto Cope's brilliant 1984 solo debut, World Shut Your Mouth), the album tacks on an earlier, brilliantly psychotic B-side ("Strange House in the Snow") but again no "Suffocate."

Piano compiles the band's complete pre-Kilimanjaro discography (three singles and three compilation tracks). While the first two 45s are weak enough to make one wonder what all the fuss was about, the alternate versions of "Books" and especially "When I Dream" cast a charming new light on the songs. Best of the rare material is the slinking "Camera Camera" and the paranoid "Kwalo Kawlinsky's Lullaby," basically a rhythmless interstellar dub of "Sleeping Gas."

With an album's worth of B-sides and at least two Peel sessions still awaiting circulation, the final chapter in the Teardrop/Cope reissue saga has yet to be heard.

See also Julian Cope, Troy Tate.

[ks/ja]

THE THE

Soul Mining (nr/Some Bizzare) 1983 (Epic) 1984 •

Infected (Epic) 1986 •

Soul Mining/Infected [CD] (nr/Epic) 1988 •

Mind Bomb (Epic) 1989 •

MATT JOHNSON

Burning Blue Soul (nr/4AD) 1981 + 1984

In 1981, London singer/guitarist Matt Johnson (a) recorded an EP as a member of the Gadgets, a hapless Bowie-oriented art-rock band in which he played a subordinate guitar role (and later none at all: the group continued on through the '80s, long after he had bowed out) (b) recorded an untitled electro-weird song for the seminal Some Bizzare Album compilation as the The (here a duo; a four-man lineup had issued a 1980 single on 4AD) and (c) released a sparsely arranged (read: unfinished-sounding, with percussion sorely missing) one-man-band solo album of intermittently appealing pop songs and meandering tape-collage instrumentals that revealed some intriguingly offbeat ideas (and had two songs produced by Dome) but didn't exactly establish him as a major new talent. Will the real Matt Johnson please stand up?

Apparently not. Although he has since used the The handle exclusively, Johnson's career has been nothing if not unpredictable, running from the pretty commercial dance-pop of Soul Mining to the harsh political realities of Mind Bomb.

Following Burning Blue Soul, Johnson recorded tracks for an LP (The Pornography of Despair) in a similar solo vein; it was scrapped, although some of the tracks were released on singles and others turned up as bonus cuts included with initial British pressings of Soul Mining (two on a 12-inch with "Perfect," a song done for, but originally omitted from, Soul Mining; five on cassette). The fully produced Soul Mining locates a warm and attractive medium for the The in fine songs like "Uncertain Smile," "Perfect" (added to the American edition of the album) and "This Is the Day," although Johnson's eerie vocal resemblance to Ian Anderson of Jethro Tull is a distraction. Elsewhere, though, Johnson's adventurous streak—and what sounds like the spiritual influence of Foetus—results in some weird and not altogether entertaining digressions. (A different version of "Perfect"—with David Johansen on harmonica—was released as a single.)

Three years later, Johnson returned with the ambitious and sophisticated Infected. The eight metaphorical songs—addressing sexual, social and political issues—use a studio full of notable musicians (Neneh Cherry, Roli Mosimann, Zeke Manyika, Anne Dudley and others) for a wide range of new sounds, some far more energetic than the The's previous work. So while "Heartland" recalls the low-key ambience of Soul Mining, the title track is pounding dance music, with big drums and broad-brush production; "Twilight of a Champion" is '40sish jazz noir that again suggests Foetus. Overall, however, it's surprisingly uninviting. While Johnson strains to say something important on Infected, he fails to connect on a most basic musical level. (While the world patiently awaited the The's new album, British Epic issued a joint CD of Soul Mining and Infected.)

With ex-Smiths guitarist Johnny Marr a full-fledged bandmember (along with drummer David Palmer and bassist James Eller), Johnson elevated his conceptual sights on Mind Bomb, a musically ambitious album that contemplates war, god, truth and sex to the tune of a bluesy, sample-accented soundscape that really suggests Foetus on valium. Although the whole album is powerful and provocative, the unforgettable "Armageddon Days Are Here (Again)" demonstrates an insightful acuity about religion's rising role in political conflicts.

[i]

THEY MIGHT BE GIANTS

They Might Be Giants [tape] (TMB Music) 1985

They Might Be Giants (Bar/None) 1986 •

Don't Let's Start EP (Bar/None) 1987 •

(She Was a) Hotel Detective EP (Bar/None) 1988 •

Lincoln (Bar/None-Restless) 1988 •

They'll Need a Crane EP (Bar/None-Restless) 1989 •

Don't Let's Start (nr/One Little Indian) 1989 •

Flood (Elektra) 1990 •

Birdhouse in Your Soul EP (nr/Elektra) 1990 •

Istanbul (Not Constantinople) EP [CD] (Elektra) 1990 •

Imagine, if you will, a modern all-pop update of Spike Jones and the Bonzo Dog Band crossed with the Mothers of Invention, Residents, XTC, Stackridge, Tom Lehrer and R. Stevie Moore. Contemplate the idea of a NYC-based duo with a highly sophisticated sense of absurd humor which writes, sings and plays guitar, accordion and keyboards. John Flansburgh and John Linnell—They Might Be Giants—might in fact be geniuses; their debut album is one of the greatest musical things ever, a diabolically clever and wildly eclectic collection of fully realized masterpieces that could not possibly fail to entertain even the fussiest, hardest-hearted idiot. Literate, accomplished, bursting with ideas, hooks, puns, dadaist absurdities and other neat tricks, TMBG are almost beyond belief. By conservative estimate, roughly fifteen of the first album's nineteen tracks (a revised version of the rare self-released cassette LP, subtracting eight items and adding four) are brilliant.

The 12-inch (and 3-inch CD) Don't Let's Start EP takes a remix of a They Might Be Giants highlight and appends the mild peer fun of "We're the Replacements," "The Famous Polka" (uncelebrated, but deserving of recognition) and "When It Rains It Snows," a first-cassette song omitted from the album. The title track of Hotel Detective is another LP cut, also remixed; the foot-long EP also contains three swell new songs ("Kiss Me, Son of God," "For Science" and "Mr. Klaw"), another deleted oldie ("The Biggest One") plus a bewildering phone conversation about the group.

Lincoln maintains the duo's baffling level of invention while raising the musical complexity, electricity, energy level and stylistic variety. Playing mix'n'match with their instruments, idioms and influences on eighteen songs, the Giants hit a few clinkers but also come up with such enduring gems as "Ana Ng," "Purple Toupee," "They'll Need a Crane," "Cowtown," "Piece of Dirt," "Shoehorn with Teeth," "Kiss Me, Son of God" (rearranged from the EP version) and "Snowball in Hell." Plucking intricate wordplay and uncommon melodies from some private creative ether, the pair magically continues to explore a part of the musical continuum no one else can locate.

The three no-big-deal newcomers that join the title tune on They'll Need a Crane also appear on Don't Let's Start, a British rarities compilation. So do the bonus songs from the Don't Let's Start and Hotel Detective EPs (as well as remixes of the lead tracks) and other non-LP matter, like "Hey, Mr. DJ, I Thought You Said We Had a Deal" and an irritating instrumental rendition of "The Lady Is a Tramp."

Moving to a major label for Flood brought the two Johns a vastly expanded audience as well as the predictable (and utterly undeserved) critical backlash. Another deft pogo dance on the tightrope between whimsy and self-amusement, Flood is an avalanche of bizarre ideas made mighty by the duo's gyrosopic sense of what makes a pop tune click. With improved production resources (Clive Langer and Alan Winstanley did an ace job producing four tracks; the band did the rest), the Giants sound better than ever; the material is equally top-notch. "Birdhouse in Your Soul" anthropomorphizes a nightlight; "We Want a Rock" tries to sell the idea of fake foreheads; "Particle Man" is a science lesson set to an oompah beat; the Farfisa-rock "Twisting" mentions the dB's and Young Fresh Fellows in lyrics about a spiteful ex-girlfriend. In a sudden and surprisingly serious turn, Flansburgh excoriates a bigoted jerk in "Your Racist Friend," a righteous song which does just borrow its title from the Specials' "Racist Friend."

The Birdhouse in Your Soul EP adds "Hot Cha" and "Hearing Aid" (both from Flood) as well as an amusing tune ("Ant") about nighttime paranoia. "Ant" also appears on the American Istanbul (Not Constantinople) EP, joining that uproarious geopolitical lesson (written, in what can only be called proto-Giants style, by Jimmy Kennedy and Nat Simon in 1954), a droll lecture on the subject of President "James K. Polk," a brief soul goof called "Stormy Pinkness" and a wild intercultural hip-hop mix (by Daddy-O of Stetsasonic) that turns the title track inside out. [i]

THEYR

Pagad i hel (lce. S6) 1980

Uffrymi EP (lce. Eskvimó) 1981

ldur til Fóta EP (lce. Eskvimó) 1981

Mjötvidur Maer (lce. Eskvimó) 1982

As Above (Enigma) 1982

The Fourth Reich EP (nr/Shout) 1982

Lunaire EP (lce. Gramm) 1983

While Theyr—an English approximation of untranslatable Icelandic characters—reportedly means "thaw," it took a while for this pioneering Reykjavik band, featuring soon-to-be Sugarcubes drummer Sigtryggur Baldursson, to get any heat going on record. The debut, Pagad i hel, is little more than lukewarm jazz-rock fusion with a few damp detours into new wave-ish boogie and vanilla reggae. In a word, unlistenable.

Two years (and two singles; the latter is a sharply compelling four-song 10-inch) later, Theyr was a much different—and far more compelling—band. On Mjötvi- dur Maer and its revised English-language counterpart, As Above, they kick out the punk-funk jams in the serrated, apocalyptic style of the Fall and Killing Joke. The dark, droney guitar work also shows strong traces of Bauhaus and Joy Division, while there's more than a hint of the Residents' art-rock terrorism in the weirdly distorted, declamatory vocals and idiosyncratic songwriting. The English lyrics on As Above are the only bringdown—earnest but overwrought tripe, most of which is thankfully obscured by the band's inspired musical turbulence.

They never lived up to its obvious promise. The Fourth Reich is a fine four-track EP released shortly before the group broke up in 1983. (A three-cut swansong, "Lunaire," ended the story; three tracks recorded with Jaz Coleman of Killing Joke remain unreleased.) Baldursson then joined the notorious Kukt, which eventually mutated into the Sugarcubes. [df]

See also Sugarcubes.

TH'INBRED

A Family Affair (Toxic Shock) 1986

Kissin' Cousins (Toxic Shock) 1988

Family Pack [tape] (Toxic Shock) c. 1988

BILLY ATWELL

Ferret in a China Shop ... (Bobok) 1988

Despite an image that screams it-came-from-the-swamp psychobilly, the West Virginia quartet's two albums consist of topical songs and instrumentals played in a disciplined form of sharply thrashed jazz-rock which can turn tight melodic corners on a screeching dime and make abrupt rhythm shifts amid a hailstorm of free-fire guitar power. Very much in a Minutemen/Blind Idiot God vein, A Family Affair and Kissin' Cousins (matched on the Family Pack cassette) find the sharp-witted anarchists angrily attacking Christianity, Satanism, hardcore ideologues, apathy, American policy, etc. and backing it up with crisply organized noise.

After Th'Inbred folded at the end of '87 (prior to Kissin' Cousins' release), drummer Billy Atwell worked on his solo album between stints with the Rhythm Pigs, who disbanded the following year. On Ferret in a China Shop, an impressively skilled and surprising refutation of punk, Atwell ably demonstrates what he can do with guitar, bass, keyboards and ambience instead of speed and volume. But the meandering instrumental sketches are pointless, and the fusion-rock songs bear a disturbing resemblance to junior-league Police. Atwell has the tools to go it alone, but this album doesn't explain why he should. [i]

THIN WHITE ROPE

Exploring the Axis (Frontier) 1985 •

Moonhead (Frontier) 1987 •

Bottom Feeders EP (nr/Zippo) 1987 •

In the Spanish Cave (Frontier) 1988 •

Red Sun EP (nr/Demon) 1988

Sack Full of Silver (Frontier-RCA) 1990 •

Squatter's Rights EP (nr/Frontier-Real Time) 1991

Psychedelia has nothing to do with the '60s or day-glo trousers. It is music of an altered state, and nobody sees the world with a more altered perspective than Guy

Kyser of Davis, California's Thin White Rope. He sings like the leader of the Twilight Zone house band. With a high, tangled voice that quavers between the band's sinewy slithering guitars, he has an exotic clip to his inflection that sometimes chops phrases into stabbing bits.

Thin White Rope exists in the same general Western-roots-influenced-rock genre as Green on Red or True West. On Exploring the Axis, that shows up in clean, slippery touches of country guitar work and fuzzy little edges of deeper and darker chords. "Disney Girl" lopes along with Jozef Becker's laid-back drum pulse as squealy shivers of feedback slip between the smooth flows of the melody. "Down in the Desert" marches off the disc with a martial beat and bopping intensity. Throughout the LP, Becker's drumming speeds up to heighten tension but softens when the guitars or lyrics change mood. Laid between his constant changes and the warmth of Rope's guitar (Kyser and Roger Kunkel), the twisted tales almost seem to make sense. (The cassette adds a bonus track, "Macy's Window," which was later included on Bottom Feeders. The CD adds two more, including a live radio take on Suicide's "Rocket USA.")

Thin White Rope is also mantra-minded, setting up a groove and driving down it until their amps threaten to smoke. That love of repetitive textures fueled by subtle changes begins to show up in Moonhead, giving it a smoother and more unified sound. The guitar interplay strongly suggests Television.

On Spanish Cave, the hoedown rhythms and acoustic-sounding bass of "Mr. Limpet" and the Dylan-meets-Roky Erickson narrative of "Ahr-Skidar" prove Rope aren't just country wannabes, but a band of the country. (The US and UK CDs are different. The American adds one bonus track, "Munch Eunuch"; the British appends the entire subsequent Bottom Feeders EP as well.)

Thin White Rope is also dedicated to rock'n'roll. The Bottom Feeders EP (four originals and two cover versions) puts all the dark, bluesy guitar and frog-throated vocal delivery a raunch hand could want in Jimmy Reed's "Ain't That Loving You Baby"; later on, their textures collide with a jackhammer in the loud and searing rendition of "Rocket USA" from the Axis CD. (The EP's version of Axis's "Atomic Imagery," however, is different.)

After becoming the first American indie band to tour the Soviet Union in December 1988, TWR released Red Sun, an EP which reprises the most powerful song off Spanish Cave. That track is joined by an even more chilling acoustic demo of the song with entirely different lyrics. Four affectionate cover tunes round out this pure-pleasure EP: Gene Pitney's "Town Without Pity," Marty Robbins' "They're Hanging Me Tonight," the Lee Hazelwood/Nancy Sinatra classic "Some Velvet Morning" and the instrumental "Man with the Golden Gun," all rearranged for maximum scary impact and country heart.

With the major-label release of Sack Full of Silver, Thin White Rope staked a claim as one of America's most original guitar bands. It all comes together here: Kyser's lyrics and vocals have never been so direct and shattering ("Sometimes I make burns on my arms/

'Cause it moves that feeling from my heart to my arms'), while a widened instrumental palette fleshes out the group's sound. Best of all, the arrangements break new ground on the cusp of improvisation and extended-form composition, moving from delicate acoustic sketches to howling feedback sculptures. Sound like art rock? TWR obliges the comparisons with a goofy cover of 1969's "Yoo Do Right" by Can—which turns out to be the most primal, simpleminded thing on the album. This is the sound of a truly great American rock band in its prime.

Squatter's Rights is a six-song EP of cover versions, only some of which have previously been issued on tribute albums. [e/ws]

3RD BASS

The Cactus Album (Def Jam-Columbia) 1989 ●
 The Cactus Revisited (Def Jam-Columbia) 1990 ♠
 Derelicts of Dialect (RAL- Def Jam-Columbia) 1991 ●

Two years before the talentless Vanilla Ice's watered-down pop-hop and bogus claims of street credibility made him the sorry-ass superstar of white rap, New York City's 3rd Bass—MC Serch (Michael Berin), Prime Minister Pete Nice (Pete Nash) and DJ Richie Rich—had already demolished the fantasy (a clear corollary to the blacks-can't-rock prejudice faced by Living Colour) that race should be a decisive factor in determining musical style. A brilliant pastiche of musical samples, ingenious on-target raps and found-sound junk-culture humor, The Cactus (produced variously by Sam Sever, most of Public Enemy's Bomb Squad and Prince Paul) established 3rd Bass as both legit and talented. From the hysterical putdowns of "The Gas Face" (a mark of disapproval which quickly gained widespread acceptance) to the heavy chronological drama of "Steppin' to the A.M." to the autobiographical "Product of the Environment" and "Sons of 3rd Bass" (whose bite of Blood, Sweat and Tears' "Spinning Wheel" wasn't well-received in some circles) to the title track's coy sexuality to Serch's goofy Louis Armstrong imitation of "Flippin' off the Wall like Lucy Ball," The Cactus careens wildly from solid to stupid, but hits the target often enough to be thoroughly enjoyable.

With their first album reaching gold-level sales, 3rd Bass issued a remix record, overhauling (in one case updating) the lyrics and/or sound of six Cactus tracks (including all four singles drawn from it: "The Gas Face," "Brooklyn-Queens," "Steppin' to the A.M." and "Product of the Environment"), plus the last-named's B-side, "3 Strikes 5000." Rather than just recycle old material while working on a follow-up, Revisited has substantial merit as both an extension and a summary of The Cactus. [i]

13 ENGINES

Before Our Time (Nocturnal) 1987
 Byram Lake Blues (Nocturnal) 1989
 A Blur to Me Now (SBK) 1991 ♠

This Toronto quartet plays loud rock-pop with greater artistic ambitions than most such bands, both in the literate lyrics and the broadly dynamic instrumental designs. While singer John Critchley (guitar, keyboards) and guitarist Mike Robbins write dramatic songs that cry out for intricate wide-screen arrangements, the group's reliance on simple rock tools creates an exciting tension between grand imagination and restrictive execution. (Fortunately, 13 Engines play well enough to keep the material from sounding shortchanged.) If Before Our Time has a slight edge over the Neil Young-inflected Byram Lake Blues, it's in the debut's unselfconscious sense of exploration and discovery, but both albums are well worth hearing. [i]

THIRTEEN NIGHTMARES

Shitride (Pravda) 1990

While reviving the ethos of a '60s new-left stereotype—white guilt, inchoate rage, the romance of poverty and misery—in its lyrics, this striking quartet from Lincoln, Nebraska slams three generations—the MC5, Cheap Trick and Soul Asylum—of Midwest rock into each other on the powerful Shitride. Great tunes, loose'n'lively hair-raising electric music and guitarist Gregory-David Cosgrove's ripping vocals load the album with bracing energy and an extraordinary balance of rawness and subtlety. Except for occasionally insufferable lyrics (the title track is a whiny complaint about the rock'n'roll life that goes so far as to gripe about bartenders who withhold free drinks; "E C" expresses solidarity for Eldridge Cleaver with the line "It's a white man's world for everybody but you and me"—yeah, right), this is an extremely cool record. [i]

THIS HEAT

This Heat (nr/Piano) 1979 (nr/Recommended) 1983
 Deceit (nr/Rough Trade) 1981 (nr/These) 1988
 This Heat with Mario Boyer Diekuuroh [tape] (Fr. Tago Mago) 1982

The Peel Sessions EP (nr/Strange Fruit) 1988

In 1976, Charles Hayward of Gong (and Phil Manzanera's Quiet Sun) joined with Charles Bullen and Gareth Williams to form This Heat. Though arising from art-rock and the British school of fusion jazz, This Heat quickly developed into an experimental band largely dependent on tape loops and production tricks.

This Heat covers two years of the band's history, with both live and studio cuts. They use guitar, clarinet, drums and keyboards, permuted with loops, phasing and overdubs, breaking down patterns into only faintly connected musical moments that include artificial skips and looped end-grooves. Though insolent and withdrawn, the music is adventurous and, in its own peculiar way, engrossing. The punnily titled Deceit is more coherent and raucous, yet avoids the dismal drones and cacophony of other "experimental" groups. Free of clichés, the music blends politics and intelligence, steering clear of artifice and trendiness. Austere, brilliant and indescribable.

This Heat with Mario Boyer Diekuuroh, which compiles tapes from 1977/8, features studio sessions with the Ghanaian drummer who greatly influenced their perceptions of rhythm.

Renamed Camberwell Now, the group has continued to release albums on the Swiss Recommended label; in the late '80s, Hayward issued a solo album. [sg]

THIS MORTAL COIL

It'll End in Tears (4AD-Valentino) 1984 •

Fligree and Shadow (nr/4AD) 1986 •

Blood (nr/4AD) 1991 •

Not so much a band as a hip British studio party, This Mortal Coil combines the prodigious talents of members of the Cocteau Twins, Modern English, Dead Can Dance, Xmal Deutschland and others in the 4AD label stable to produce atmospheric vignettes, drawing material from such diverse sources as Alex Chilton, Tim Buckley and Colin Newman as well as penning new songs. It'll End in Tears mixes a few instrumentals with lush vocal performances; though all rather agreeable, most of it wouldn't disturb a sleeping infant.

Fligree & Shadow is a double album, with most of the work being done by various members of Dif Juz, the Wolfgang Press and Simon Raymonde of the Cocteau Twins. Once again, it neither rocks nor rolls. Tender, light piano and string arrangements predominate; the second side is half over before any drums enter the picture. With very few exceptions (including Wire and Talking Heads covers), this is the aural equivalent of herbal tea and would probably bore your grandparents.

[dgs/i]

DAVID THOMAS AND THE PEDESTRIANS

The Sound of the Sand and Other Songs of the Pedestrians (Rough Trade) 1981

Vocal Performances EP (nr/Rough Trade) 1982

Variations on a Theme (Sixth In!) 1983

More Places Forever (Twin/Tone) 1985

DAVID THOMAS & HIS LEGS

Winter Comes Home (nr/Re) 1982

DAVID THOMAS AND THE WOODEN BIRDS

Monster Walks the Winter Lake (Twin/Tone) 1985 •

Blame the Messenger (Twin/Tone) 1987

A song stylist in the truest sense of the word, David Thomas is one of rock's few truly one-of-a-kind artists. But the Pere Ubu vocalist's first solo album came as something of a surprise. His lyrics and unusual compositions bring strangeness out of the mundane—imparting magic to everyday objects and activities—aided by an eclectic bunch: Richard Thompson, Anton Fier, Chris Cutler, Eddie Thornton, Philip Moxham and others. Each demonstrates hitherto unimagined aspects of their talents, and Thomas' otherworldly voice—animal noises transmuted into human speech—has never been more expressive. A high point of Thomas' avant-garde folk-blues-jazz-rock cultural synthesis.

Variations on a Theme, which prominently features Richard Thompson, again mixes a bit of everything—including country, jazz and blues—into Thomas' own unique style. Only two tracks on this musically sedate, almost "normal"-sounding record recall Pere Ubu's general looniness. Throughout, Thomas demonstrates genuine fascination with his subject matter, as well as an invariably novel perspective. A good follow-up, and one indicative of enormous artistic reach.

Winter Comes Home—which gives front cover billing to ex-Henry Cows Cutler and Lindsay Cooper—mixes intellectual stand-up comedy with winning performances, all recorded live in Munich in 1982. Cooper's bassoon perfectly suits Thomas' tastefully strident vocal excursions. Most notable is the title track, essentially a shaggy-dog story.

Thomas reunited with Ubu bassist Tony Maimone for More Places Forever. Along with Cutler's drums and Cooper's one-woman woodwind section, Thomas has all the backdrop he needs to gather us into his little world and cast his spell. He displays his love for things like insects and sunshine, and in "New Broom" follows some dust on its journey. Ubu fans finally get to hear the track for which Song of the Bailing Man was titled.

The new band (re)assembled for Monster Walks the Winter Lake is almost an Ubu reunion, with Maimone joined by Allen Ravenstine on synths and Paul Hamann producing. The low-key music moves more slowly than usual, with cello and strangely played accordion often the predominant instruments; the increasingly philosophical lyrics containing recurring monster metaphors. The four-part eleven-minute title track is a real treat.

Blame the Messenger was recorded with much the same lineup that reformed Pere Ubu. One listen confirms that they must have been itching to get back together; the sound and arrangements are more a throwback to the band's earlier recordings than any of Thomas' previous solo work, thanks especially to Ravenstine's electronic keyboards. The lyrical fascination this time is mostly with nature, particularly ironic when juxtaposed with such beautifully unnatural sounds. A great record. [sg/dgs]

See also Pere Ubu.

PAT THOMAS

See Absolute Grey.

MARC ANTHONY THOMPSON

Marc Anthony Thompson (Warner Bros.) 1984

Watts and Paris (Reprise-Warner Bros.) 1989 •

On his debut LP, this hard-to-categorize maverick—born in Panama, raised in California—makes slick, soulful pop music that manages to be subtle and edgy. Thompson gives free reign to his poised, slightly gritty voice in a variety of settings, from cool struttin' ("So Fine") to moody romance ("Love Cools Down") to after-hours elegance ("Coffee").

Five years later, Watts and Paris sports a nastier, more percussive edge, with in-your-face singing and dense, oddball arrangements obviously inspired by Prince. Don't miss the murky "Monkeytime," a startling attack on Paul Simon ("I taped the black man so let me be/South Africa been so good to me"), the hard funk of "In Time" and the screaming "I Never Promised." Tough and compelling, Thompson is a widely undiscovered talent on a major label. [jy]

MAYO THOMPSON

See Red Crayola.

THOMPSON TWINS

A Product of . . . (nr/T) 1981 (nr/Fame) 1983
Set (nr/T) 1982 (nr/Fame) 1984
In the Name of Love (Arista) 1982 •
A Product of . . . /Set [tape] (nr/T) 1983
Quick Step & Side Kick (nr/Arista) 1983 •
Side Kicks (Arista) 1983 •
Into the Gap (Arista) 1984 •
Here's to Future Days (Arista) 1985 •
Close to the Bone (Arista) 1987 •
The Richard Skinner Sessions EP (nr/Nighttracks-Strange Fruit) 1987
Greatest Mixes: The Best of Thompson Twins (Arista) 1988 •
Big Trash (Red Eye-Warner Bros.) 1989 •

The name notwithstanding, there are no twins and no Thompsons in this globally successful modern pop band. Once an obscure, loose collection of as many as seven Sheffield-to-London players led by singer/synthesist/songwriter Tom Bailey, the Twins pared down to just Bailey, New Zealander Alannah Currie and Joe Leeway and became one of the world's leading purveyors of occasionally adventurous, invariably danceable modern chart fare.

All six musicians credited on A Product of . . . manage to play some percussion in addition to their primary instruments—sax, guitar, keyboards, etc. The cleverness and variety of the tracks, however, eliminate any potential monotony that might have resulted from the heavy reliance on rhythm. And although the music is designed to incite maximum motion, there isn't one track that skimps on lyrical, melodic or structural depth. The album isn't uniformly wonderful, but the textures and sounds make it pleasurable and energizing. (The 1987 Richard Skinner radio session was recorded at this early stage of the band's career.)

Set adds one member (bassist Matthew Seligman) but is otherwise not very different—in cast or content—from its predecessor. Exemplified by such great numbers as “In the Name of Love” and “Bouncing,” Bailey and his cohorts prove that it is possible to make totally listenable dance music that doesn't beg suspension of critical faculties. Producer Steve Lillywhite and Thomas Dolby also pitch in, making Set a very nice record. (The Thompsons' first exposure in America came via In the Name of Love, which consists of two tracks from the first LP and eight from the second.)

Building on the popular dance sound of “In the Name of Love” (in fact, deftly quoting it on the first track, “Love on Your Side”), the three Twins emerged mature, motivated and commercially focused on their third album, Quick Step & Side Kick. Demonstrating varied and skilled songwriting and extraordinary self-contained music-making—the trio plays almost everything you hear on keyboards—the album bounces from start to finish, but no two tracks have much in common other than a good mood and a strong beat. (The American label perversely altered the title and rearranged the tracks a tad. The British cassette includes a bonus side of remixes.)

Consolidating their stardom, Into the Gap is a virtual new greatest hits album, containing “Hold Me Now,” “Doctor Doctor,” “You Take Me Up” and “Sister of Mercy,” which were all radio, chart and club staples for many months. The Twins' strength is their avoidance of repetition; the songs vary widely in tempo, style, instrumentation, subject matter and vocal arrangements. (All three sing.)

By Here's to Future Days, co-produced by Bailey and Nile Rodgers, the hit machine was starting to run on a cracked wheel. “Lay Your Hands on Me” is brilliant, but “Don't Mess with Doctor Dream” is boring. “King for a Day” is cute but overly familiar; “Tokyo” is corny. And who needed to hear a new version of the Beatles' “Revolution”? With all its ups and downs, Future Days is not significantly inferior to the Twins' best albums, but it lacks their freshness and vitality.

In April 1986, at the end of a six-month world tour, Joe Leeway left the band, reportedly to go solo, although the results have yet to surface. (He did front a band for one song in the 1989 film Slaves of New York, however.) Finally reduced to the titular duo, Bailey and Currie carried on, releasing the modest and, for the most part, likable Close to the Bone, produced by Rupert Hine. Currie's lyrics (Bailey wrote the music) take a surprisingly reflective approach here, suggesting doubt and anxiety instead of the usual oblique contemplations. “Gold Fever” bitterly attacks someone (wonder who?) for greed, saying “Now it bothers me to think that I used to call you a friend.” While spottily derivative (mostly of their own work, but “Long Goodbye” could easily be mistaken for Sting) and notably lacking the group's characteristic energy and rhythmic magic, the record proves that the Thompson factory can turn out quality merchandise even when the creative thinkers are napping.

The Twins left Arista, and the label issued a hits-heavy remix album—eight elongated dance versions more suited to the clubs where they originated than to a home stereo. Bailey and Currie took some time off from the Twins (writing and producing songs for Debbie Harry and Jerry Harrison), but their creative batteries didn't quite get recharged. Intended as an amused comment on junk culture, Big Trash is an uninspired waste of time and plastic, a lame pairing of grade-school rhymes and bland music that is, at best, self-imitative. Reduced to simplemindedness (“Kiss your wife goodbye/’Cos you know it's time to die/There are bombers in the sky”), the once-clever Twins sleepwalk through such nonsense as “Sugar Daddy,” “T.V. On” and “Salvador Dali's Car” with no apparent effort or conviction. [1]

TRACEY THORN

See Everything but the Girl.

THRASHING DOVES

Bedrock Vice (A&M) 1987 •
Trouble in the Home (A&M) 1989 •

Another bunch of informed modern pop stylists, London's Thrashing Doves mix and match their varied stylistic borrowings on Bedrock Vice. “Beautiful Imbalance” takes spectacular chart-ready flight; otherwise, Ken Foreman's vocals merely echo Tom Verlaine, Lloyd Cole and Violent Femme Gordon Gano in songs that often seem transparent attempts at imitating various Bob Dylan eras. Colorful but meaningless. Producers on the proficient quartet's minor album include Chris Thomas and Jimmy Iovine.

The restlessly diverse Trouble in the Home isn't any more original, but at least it has more vitality and some different second-hand arrows in the callow quiver. ("Another Deadly Sunset," for instance, draws from the T. Rex bop book.) But the music is still wholly lacking in purpose and conviction, and the lyrics' cagey religious references are too coy by half. [i]

THREE JOHNS

- Men Like Monkeys EP (nr/CNT Productions) 1983
- A.W.O.L. EP (nr/CNT Productions) 1983
- Some History EP (nr/Abstract) 1983
- Do the Square Thing EP (nr/Abstract) 1984
- Atom Drum Bop (nr/Abstract) 1984
- Death of the European EP (nr/Abstract) 1985
- Brainbox (He's a Brainbox) EP (nr/Abstract) 1985
- The World by Storm (nr/Abstract) 1986
- Live in Chicago (Last Time Round) 1986 •
- Demonocracy: The Singles 1982-1986 (nr/Abstract) 1986
- Never and Always EP (nr/Abstract) 1987
- Deathrocker Scrapbook [tape] (ROIR) 1988
- The Death of Everything (Caroline) 1988 •
- Eat Your Sons (nr/Tupelo) 1990 •

This casual Leeds trio—Jon Langford (guitar; also in the Mekons), John Hyatt (vocals, lyrics) and John Brennan (bass)—began by specializing in discordant socio-political guitar punk with trembling falsetto vocals; their career-long use of a rhythm machine rather than a live drummer has lent a unique tension to the group's sound. Some History compiles two singles (from 1982 and 1983) on one 12-inch, and is very much indicative of the trio's approach. Save for a surfacing maniacal edge, Men Like Monkeys and A.W.O.L. stake out more of the same turf. Hyatt's whining vocals would grate in large doses, but brevity—four songs each—keeps these two records from becoming downright annoying.

The Johns plunge headfirst into dance-rock on Do the Square Thing. Lyrically oblique and riddled with innuendo, the title track is, for these thrashers, an extraordinarily slick piece of extended dancefloor fodder. Surprisingly, it makes a stronger impression than their usual dirges.

Characteristics that might be tiresome if abused are kept judiciously in check on the Johns' first LP, Atom Drum Bop. The vocals don't wander unnecessarily, guitar lines are blindingly sharp and melodic and the production is crystalline. "Teenage Nightingales to Wax," "Firepits," "Do Not Cross the Line" and the odd ballad, "No Place," all help make this the trio's most fully realized endeavor.

The two succeeding four-song EPs both show continued growth towards tuneful pop. Without losing any of their bite, the A-sides offer incisive comments on some pretty heady subject matter: America's destructive influence on continental heritage ("Death of the European") and yuppiesque self-centered apathy ("Brainbox"). The B-sides are more jagged, and just as strong.

The World by Storm, released with a limited edition 7-inch live EP, is highly recommended. The Johns have honed their craft to seeming perfection: it will be difficult for them to improve on tunes like "King Car," "Torches of Liberty," "Demon Drink" and the pre-LP single, "Sold Down the River."

Langford's commitment to the Mekons, as well as his high demand as a producer, temporarily put the Three Johns on hold. But that didn't stop the group from releasing records. Demonocracy is a highly recommended compilation of singles and LP tracks. The equally enlightening Live in Chicago—the Johns' first American release—dates from June 1985 and contains renditions (some of them already issued on the World by Storm bonus EP) of such material as "Teenage Nightingales to Wax," "Death of the European," "AWOL" and "The World of the Workers," as well as a brief (and uncredited) version of Madonna's "Like a Virgin." Deathrocker Scrapbook is accurately described on the cassette insert as "some great fun and games recorded by a very informal the Three Johns during the 1980's." A mad dash through the Johns' back pages—live appearances, outtakes, rehearsals, acoustic one-offs, etc.—captures the three in the extremely entertaining act of being themselves. Highlights: "Conversations with Freud" and "Cheap Computer."

Although the sleeve credits utterly bollix up which cuts are from where, half of The Death of Everything was recorded live in Leeds at the beginning of '88. The rest of the tracks—including the Adrian Sherwood-produced pre-LP single, "Never and Always" (a straightforward hard-rock song that sounds like PiL)—are recent/new studio efforts. Although the Johns' range now includes thundering Glitter-rock ("Spin Me Round"), droning Fallish poetry ("The King Is Dead (Four Words Too Long)") and a neat Captain Beefheart cover, this diverse album is a bit short of the band's familiar ingenuity and fire. [ag/i]

THREE O'CLOCK

- Baroque Hoedown EP (Frontier) 1982 •
- Sixteen Tambourines (Frontier) 1983 •
- Arrive Without Travelling (IRS) 1985
- Ever After (IRS) 1986 •
- Vermillion (Paisley Park) 1988 •

SALVATION ARMY

The Salvation Army (Frontier) 1982

BEFOUR THREE O'CLOCK

Befour Three O'Clock (Frontier) 1985

One of the brightest lights of new American pop psychedelia, LA's Salvation Army debuted with an album that was liable to inspire young bands all around the world to join in the fun. The trio's melodies have the ethereal quality of a young Syd Barrett; the music is a blend of all the most colorful '60s sounds, showing the influence of such groups as the Byrds, Move, Hollies, Music Machine and others.

Following legal action by the real Salvation Army (concerns over musical competition?), the group changed its name to the Three O'Clock. (Three years later, Frontier cleverly repackaged the original album as Befour Three O'Clock.) The five songs on Baroque Hoedown have poppier vocals and equally engaging music. The addition of ex-Quick/Weirdos drummer Danny Benair also brought the quartet a harder edge. Don't miss their cover of the Easybeats' "Sorry."

Sixteen Tambourines is even better—an incredible full-length collection of chiming, memorable power pop tunes played and sung as if each track were likely to get played on every radio station coast-to-coast. Slick and inventive production by Earle Mankey delivers the songs (most co-written by guitarist Louis Gutierrez and bassist Michael Quercio) in utterly engaging style. Best numbers: "On My Own," "Jet Fighter," "And So We Run." Absolutely charming and remarkably memorable. (The CD includes Baroque Hoedown.)

In 1985, the Three O'Clock signed to IRS and released their second album. Arrive Without Travelling isn't quite as delightfully twinky as its predecessor, but it does contain enough characteristically lightheaded material ("Her Head's Revolving," "Simon in the Park") to maintain the group's standing as preeminent paisley popsters.

Ever After saw Gutierrez exit the group (he's now in Louis and Clark), to be replaced by Steven Altenberg without any major changes in the group's sound or direction. Shortly after its release, the group parted ways with IRS, spent some time in legal limbo and then signed to Paisley Park. Apparently, Prince had heard and liked them (not too surprising, since Around the World in a Day draws on many of the same influences as Three O'Clock's records), though they'd never actually met. With Jason Falkner replacing Altenberg and Ian Ritchie producing, the group recorded Vermillion, their most interesting and varied album to date, which includes Prince's (sorry, Joey Coco's) "Neon Telephone"—just right for them—a lead vocal apiece by Falkner and keyboardist Mike Mariano (both great) and Quercio's six-minute ballad, "Through the Sleepy Town." Three O'Clock broke up later that year. [cpl/i/ds]

See also Mary's Danish.

THROBBING GRISTLE

- Second Annual Report (nr/Industrial) 1978 (nr/Fetish)
 1979 (nr/Mute) 1983
 D.o.A. (nr/Industrial) 1979 (nr/Fetish) 1981 (nr/Mute)
 1983
 Twenty Jazz Funk Greats (nr/Industrial) 1979 (nr/Fetish)
 1981 (nr/Mute) 1983
 Heathen Earth (nr/Industrial) 1979 (nr/Fetish) 1981
 (nr/Mute) 1983
 Throbbing Gristle's Greatest Hits (Rough Trade) 1980
 Funeral in Berlin (Ger. Zensor) 1981
 24 Hours [tape] (nr/Industrial) 1981
 Mission of Dead Souls (nr/Fetish) 1981 (nr/Mute) 1983
 Five Albums (nr/Fetish) 1982
 Thee Psychick Sacrifice (nr/Illuminated) 1982 (nr/Dojo)
 1986
 Editions Frankfurt—Berlin (nr/Illuminated) 1983
 Once Upon a Time (Live at the Lyceum) (nr/Casual) Abandon) 1983 (nr/Obsession) 1990 •
 In the Shadow of the Sun (nr/Illuminated) 1984
 Live at Heaven [tape] (nr/Rough Trade) c. 1985
 TG CD1 [CD] (nr/Mute) 1986 •
 Raised on William S. Burroughs and Philip K. Dick, and inhabiting a science-fiction-now world of industrial depression, Britain's prolific Throbbing Gristle produced some of the most confrontational and unpleasantly fascinating music of recent years, ostensibly as a means to radicalize the listener into abandoning bourgeois romanticism for a realistic view of life.

Second Annual Report (the quartet's first release) uses mournful synthesizer drones to paint a grimly powerful vision of post-industrial, mid-depression England.

D.o.A. is brighter in tone and more polished in technique. Less cohesive than the previous album, D.o.A. places greater emphasis on live material, found tapes and individual productions by separate members of the band. The music is aggressively anti-melodic, but the spirit is powerful and the surprises plentiful. Recommended for the strong.

Twenty Jazz Funk Greats breaks away from D.o.A.'s stark bleakness in an attempted truce between the group's radical attitudes and pop music, removing the cutting edge from their calculated chaos but offering more accessibility.

Heathen Earth is a return to form, adding savagery to the mix, expanding TG leader Genesis P-Orridge's obsession with the profane juxtaposition of everyday symbols and motifs. The music is clean, vicious, sharp and occasionally displays the band's transition to energetic, if still outré, rock.

Greatest Hits, subtitled "Entertainment Through Pain" (an apt description of the band's approach), collects material from the first four albums. Recommended for a solid overview.

Funeral in Berlin and Mission of Dead Souls are live albums. The first features all previously unreleased material; the latter is a recording of the band's final show in San Francisco. Those who desire a lot more Throbbing Gristle live should check out 24 Hours, a collection of two dozen C-60 cassettes packed in a suitcase and containing most of the group's live shows. (Rough Trade reportedly also offered a suitcase set of 33 tapes around the same time. Did anyone actually buy one of these?) In 1983, however, Rough Trade bowed to public pressure and made those 33 cassettes available individually. Five Albums is more reasonably sized, a boxed set reissuing all the albums that had previously been on Fetish.

Although the group has been defunct now for years and its members (P-Orridge, Chrs Carter, Cosey Fanni Tutti, Peter Christopherson) scattered into the similarly uncommon Chris and Cosey, Psychic TV and Coil, new TG records—most of them live (how can there be anything left?)—are still being released, many only on cassette. TG CD1, however, contains 42 minutes of previously unissued instrumental studio dribblings from early '79, with reflective '86 liner commentary by the participants. [sg/i]

See also Chris and Cosey, Coil, Psychic TV.

THROWING MUSES

- Throwing Muses EP (Throwing Muses) 1984
 Throwing Muses [tape] (Throwing Muses) 1985
 Throwing Muses (nr/4AD) 1986 •
 Chains Changed EP (nr/4AD) 1987
 The Fat Skier (Sire) 1987
 House Tornado (Sire) 1989 •
 Hunkpapa (Sire) 1989 •

Dizzy EP (nr/4AD) 1989 •
The Real Ramona (Sire) 1991 •

If for no other reason, this Boston-based quartet has its reserved seat in music history for being the first American band signed to the British 4AD label. An eclectic blend of jerky guitar pop and songwriter Kristin Hersh's unpredictably eccentric vocals, the early work by Throwing Muses bears no resemblance to any other group or artist in recent memory.

The group's first two untitled releases are fairly obscure: a commonly bootlegged five-song 7-inch EP that features an early bassist and a self-released 1985 cassette that contains most of the songs that would comprise the band's first album (plus one that wouldn't get redone until The Fat Skier).

Produced by up-and-coming studio star Gil Norton, Throwing Muses (the LP) is startling; attribute the uniqueness to Hersh's remarkable singing on "Hate My Way," "Green" and "America (She Can't Say No)." Truly one of a kind. With fewer twists and turns than the album's songs, the four-track Chains Changed (with one lead vocal by Tanya Donnelly, the group's junior guitar-playing songwriter) somehow has even more impact.

College radio airplay and critical acclaim prompted Sire to sign Throwing Muses and release The Fat Skier: six songs on one side and a nearly nine-minute seventh ("Soul Soldier") on the flip. With onetime Violent Femmes producer Mark Van Hecke behind the board, the music appears to be verging on the formulaic; the record is considerably less striking than the band's prior output. It's still distinctive, but an injection of fresh ideas at this point wouldn't hurt. But House Tornado only amplifies the problems of The Fat Skier: with a minimum of musical variety, songs run into one another. What was, upon inception, avant-garde has become static and predictable.

David Narcizo's stiff drumming sets the tone for Hunkpapa, a chilly and dull record that could be by any number of contempo jangle-pop bands. Along with the uneventful material, Hersh's voice, no longer possessing any strong character, is ineffectual and a bit strident at times; the rote guitar backdrop doesn't pick up the slack. Of Donnelly's two tunes, "Angel" is actually tuneful and appealing; the other merely provides a bit of light variety.

The four-song Dizzy EP (built around a Hunkpapa track) also contains the non-LP "Santa Claus" and compelling 1988 live recordings of "Downtown" (from House Tornado) and the frenetic "Mania" (from Hunkpapa).

Produced by Dennis Herring, The Real Ramona introduces new bassist Fred Abong; the reinvigorated Muses seem comfortably settled into a functional sound, taking few chances but getting the job done with confidence, enthusiasm and none of Hunkpapa's bland aloofness. Hersh's songwriting is solid if not spectacular; Donnelly contributes two, including the gentle power-punk of "Not Too Soon." [ag/i]

See also Breeders.

THUG

See Beasts of Bourbon.

LES THUGS

Frenetic Dancing (Fr. Cournaf Movement) 1985
Radical Hysterie (Fr. Closer) 1986 (Gr. Dikeoma Diavasis) 1989
Electric Troubles EP (nr/Vinyl Solution) 1987
Dirty White Race (nr/Vinyl Solution) 1988
Electric Troubles (Sub Pop) 1989
Still Hungry (nr/Decoy) 1989

To say that France is not known for cutting-edge rock is akin to noting that elephants don't generally travel in Subarus. The French love synthesizers. They also love '50s music, like basic rock'n'roll, rockabilly and R&B. While les Thugs are French (from Angiers, to be exact), this is one elephant of a band. They sing mostly in English, sometimes in what they call yoghurt (meaningless syllables that only sound like English) with pleasantly curly French accents, and play a twin-guitar assault with nary a synth or slap bass in sight. A punk band in the very earliest sense of the word, les Thugs' records are a pre-hardcore blast of pop-rooted pounding, from the same school as the Buzzcocks.

Formed in 1984 from the ashes of a new wave band called Dazibo, les Thugs debuted with Frenetic Dancing, a four-track 7-inch (later remastered and reissued as a two-song single). Following the relatively primitive Radical Hysterie, the band made Electric Troubles, an EP that comes as close to perfection as a record can. Hard without being metallic, packed with a knock-over energy punch, it's fueled by guitars that saw and scrape, deliberately undermixed harmonic singing and pacing that won't quit. "Dead Dreams" opens with a native American recording that crossfades into an Arabic slink of fuzz guitar, then explodes in frenzy. "Bulgarian Blues" gallops with shaking percussion that sounds like a train.

Though not reaching the same heights, Dirty White Race still blows most other vinyl halfway to Jupiter. It's mixed slightly brighter, takes its guitar playing a bit more seriously (including some isolated barf-awful metal clichés) and makes fine use of dynamics. "Hedgehogs" particularly plays with the loud and soft buttons, simmering down with an angelic choir of background vocals while an accompanying guitar slinks in hard peals of chime before the band gears up for a recharged sonic assault. The American Electric Troubles album combines Dirty White Race and the Electric Troubles EP.

The Iain Burgess/Tim Lewis-recorded Still Hungry is les Thugs' most sophisticated production, but that doesn't mean more than a slight detour in getting their energy down your ear canals. With les Thugs' records, you can't lose. [e]

JOHNNY THUNDERS

So Alone (nr/Real) 1978
In Cold Blood (Fr. New Rose) 1983 •
Diary of a Lover EP (PVC) 1983
New Too Much Junkie Business [tape] (ROIR) 1983 [CD] (ROIR-Important) 1990 φ
Hurt Me (Fr. New Rose) 1984 •
Que Sera, Sera (nr/Jungle) 1985 •
Stations of the Cross [tape] (ROIR) 1987 [CD] (ROIR-Important) 1990 φ
Bootlegging the Bootleggers (nr/Jungle) 1990 •

JIMMY K

Trouble Traveller (Jap. Meldac) 1986 •

JOHNNY THUNDERS & PATTI PALLADIN

Copy Cats (Restless) 1988 •

JOHNNY THUNDERS & WAYNE KRAMER

Gang War (Zodiac-DeMilo) 1990 •

For his first solo LP, the legendary New York Dolls/Heartbreakers guitarist enlisted the aid of ex-Pistols Paul Cook and Steve Jones, some of the Hot Rods, the Only Ones and even old-timers Steve Marriott and Phil Lynott. Choosing material representative of all his prior musical phases, and aided immeasurably by co-producer Steve Lillywhite, Thunders turns in reasonably strong performances, perfectly employing his gutter guitar and New York sneer in a number of (musical) veins, including greasy R&B and a tender ballad. Not since the Dolls' two records has he sounded so lucid and involved—So Alone is Johnny Thunders at his best.

Thunders didn't release anything else under his own name for five years after that. The LP-plus-EP In Cold Blood returned him to the racks, combining five newly recorded studio tracks—with just a drummer and guitarist Walter Lure—that don't amount to much with a poor live Boston show taped in 1982. (Diary of a Lover consists of those studio cuts plus a subsequent item.) At Cold Blood's best, Thunders pounds out a stinging "Green Onions" that suggests his guitar skills aren't gone yet.

Narrated in New Yawkese by the artist, New Too Much Junkie Business offers live, demo and live-in-the-studio recordings from 1982, co-produced by Jimmy Miller, with a variety of players helping out on renditions of everything from the Dolls' "Jet Boy" and "Great Big Kiss" to a Gang War track and numbers that overlap Diary of a Lover. Most notable is "Sad Vacation," a tribute to Sid Vicious. That song also appears on the French-only Hurt Me, alongside "Eve of Destruction," "It Ain't Me Babe" and renditions of some of Thunders' best songs. (The Hurt Me CD contains five bonus tracks.)

Que Sera, Sera boasts a batch of solid new songs, a solid rhythm section (Keith Yon and Tony St. Helene), an illustrious cast of guest stars and a surprisingly easygoing, clearheaded outlook. Variety is a watchword, as Stonesy pseudo-reggae ("Cool Operator"), sneering sexist raunch ("Little Bit of Whore"), restrained reality ("Short Lives," wherein JT denounces the live-fast-die-young credo), familiar Dollsy bebop ("Tie Me Up" and "Endless Party," co-written with David Johansen) and a hot uptempo instrumental ("Billy Boy") mix gaily. In fact, the most wasted thing about this LP is the unnecessary cover shot of Thunders looking like the not-so-living dead.

Punk filmmaker Lech Kowalski shot and recorded a pair of 1982 Mudd Club shows to use in his junkie portrait feature (Gringo) but didn't, so the music for an hour of them wound up on Stations of the Cross. Backed by Lure and drummer Jerry Nolan, plus someone identified only as Talarico, a reasonably cogent JT runs through such songs as "So Alone," "In Cold Blood," "Chinese Rocks" and "Too Much Junkie Business," punctuating the lively performances with typically hysterical inter-song patter. Before ending, the tape takes an odd detour: a hotel room conversation, participants unknown, followed by a solo acoustic number.

JT the DJ returns—in assorted goofy voices—to introduce the songs on Bootlegging the Bootleggers, an uneven (and that's not just the widely varying sound quality) compilation of 1985-'89 live recordings, ostensibly drawn from assorted unauthorized albums. The old, borrowed and sloppy song selection—including "Personality Crisis," "In Cold Blood," "Sad Vacation," "As Tears Go By" and Dylan's "Joey" (the last three performed acoustic)—is great, but this isn't the ultimate concert document Thunders' solo career still deserves. (Note the editing boo-boo that swaps the spoken introductions for "Pipeline" and "Wipeout," both identified correctly on the sleeve.)

Thunders co-wrote, produced and played guitar on the bizarre Trouble Traveller, surrounding young Japanese singer/guitarist Jimmy K(urata) with such Anglo-American luminaries as Jerry Nolan, Glen Matlock, Pete Thomas, John "Irish" Earle, Martin Belmont and Bob Andrews. The modestly talented Kurata is totally out of his league here. Faced with crisp, energetic rock-'n'-roll tracks—nothing extraordinary, just top-notch Thunders issue—his echo-drenched vocals (in Japanese and imperfect English—Eddie Cochran's "Nervous Breakdown" merits especially bad pronunciation) are hopelessly lame.

Copy Cats—an accomplished joint effort with ex-Snatch vocalist Pat Palladin (who also produced the LP) and a bunch of their friends—contains swell studio covers of songs by Dion, the Seeds, Shirelles, Elvis Presley, Chambers Brothers, Screaming Jay Hawkins and Shangri-Las, among others. Sharing the spotlight for once, Thunders contributes solid musicianship, imaginative (occasionally poignant) performances and an overriding sense of well-behaved fun. Two songs (Mickey & Sylvia's "Love Is Strange" and "Let Me Entertain You") from the original UK album were deleted for the American version, which also has a different track sequence.

Another era, another partnership: the half-studio/half-live Gang War LP documents Thunders' nearly forgotten 1980-vintage sideband with ex-MC5 guitarist Wayne Kramer. Totally crap sound ruins the concert portion (mostly covers), and the studio sessions are nearly as bad. Obviously not taken from first (or even third) generation masters, there are a few significant songs ("Crime of the Century," "M.I.A."), a couple of trivial ones and the rest is vocal-less jams or incomplete backing tracks. If the original tapes could be located, there'd be a great single in here. As it stands, however, Gang War is a total waste.

Thunders died in New Orleans in April 1991. [i]

See also Heartbreakers, New York Dolls.

'TIL TUESDAY

Voices Carry (Epic) 1985 •

Welcome Home (Epic) 1986 •

Everything's Different Now (Epic) 1988 •

Boston's underground scene has spawned some excellent, adventurous bands, but 'Til Tuesday is not one of them. "Voices Carry," the quartet's one mega-hit, is a catchy (if lyrically clumsy) song that utilizes the full extent of ex-Young Snakes singer/bassist Aimee Mann's limited vocal capabilities; the rest of the band's Mike Thorne-produced debut album is surprisingly unstylish, bland and unengaging.

Armed with a Chrissie Hynde-like warble and another clutch of slow-going sensitive torch-rockers, Mann and her three bandmates issued a soundalike follow-up, produced by Rhett Davies. Although the dynamically mixed sound is technically flawless, the playing is dull and there aren't many melodies you're likely to remember. (The soaring "On Sunday" comes close.) Mann's uncertain singing and the earnest collegiate pretentiousness of her lyrics make it hard to imagine just what kind of a home would welcome 'Til Tuesday.

The fascinating results of life intruding on art, Everything's Different Now considers a sad affair from two separate angles: during and after. The Jules Shear-went title track expresses his joy at falling in love with Mann; "(Believed You Were) Lucky" puts her thoughts on their parting to his music. Romantic disappointment and loss dominate the album, through such heartfelt songs as "'J' for Jules," "How Can You Give Up?" and "The Other End (of the Telescope)," the last written and sung with Elvis Costello. The music (again produced by Davies) takes a polite back seat, supporting Mann's controlled and sincere vocals without attracting attention. [i]

TIMBUK 3

Greetings from Timbuk 3 (IRS) 1986 ●
Eden Alley (IRS) 1988 ●
Edge of Allegiance (IRS) 1989 ●

Pat and Barbara K. MacDonald are best known for their much-misunderstood fluke hit "The Future's So Bright, I Gotta Wear Shades," and for eschewing backup musicians in favor of overdubs on record and pre-recorded rhythm tapes live. But the Austin-based couple is more noteworthy for Pat's songwriting talent than for the mere novelty of their minimalist lineup. Unlike the deceptively breezy "Shades," MacDonald generally writes sardonic slices of life; his pessimism is consistently redeemed by unflagging humanity and perfectly complemented by the pair's drawing, deadpan harmonies. Despite (or because of) a fondness for mechanical percussion, the music has a homey ambience that balances frequent lyrical archness.

Greetings, surely one of the darkest albums ever to have yielded a hit single, collects some rueful snapshots of Americana ("Life Is Hard," "Just Another Movie") alongside enjoyable lighter fare ("Facts About Cats," "Hairstyles and Attitudes") with impressive results. Eden Alley trades much of that album's country twang for a more varied recording approach (e.g., "Sample the Dog" does just that). Stylistic eclecticism comes in handy on Pat's mini-morality-plays (the title track, "Dance Fever," "Rev. Jack & His Roamin' Cadillac Church"). Barbara, meanwhile, shines on her two featured cuts, "Welcome to the Human Race" and "Easy."

Edge of Allegiance (co-produced by drummer De-nardo Coleman, Ornette's son) is yet another small triumph of sane, thoughtful songcraft. The chipper "National Holiday" provides a facetiously optimistic opening to an album that paints a bemused but bleak view of an America ruled by economic inequity ("Dirty Dirty Rice"), environmental horror ("Acid Rain") and an atrophied democratic process ("Count to Ten"). [hd]

TIME

The Time (Warner Bros.) 1981 ●
What Time Is It? (Warner Bros.) 1982 ●
Ice Cream Castle (Warner Bros.) 1984 ●
Pandemonium (Paisley Park-Reprise) 1990 ●

Prince's first major male extracurricular effort, Minneapolis' six-man Time was an exceptionally fertile launching pad for several careers. Vocalist Morris Day walked away with the Purple Rain film and did well as a solo artist. Jesse Johnson went on to emulate Prince not only with soundalike records but by mentoring a number of other acts as well. Jimmy Jam and Terry Lewis became an awesomely successful writing-production team, scoring hits for/with Janet Jackson, Patti Austin, the S.O.S. Band, Force M.D.'s, Human League and many others.

The group's three original albums alternate between straight, infectious dance-funk tunes and extended jams punctuated by all sorts of silly business. Day's personality informs all the tracks, filling them with sharp-dressed sex-machine jive, but occasionally allowing a glimpse of the self-effacing chump who realizes that having an onstage valet (Jerome Benton) to hold the mirror for on-site preening is a satire on just that smugness.

Although What Time Is It? boasts "777-9311" and the pose-heavy "Gigolos Get Lonely Too," Ice Cream Castle is the best of the three, a six-track party that includes the signature dance groove, "Jungle Love," which the Time performed in a memorable Purple Rain club sequence. But loving is the Time's speciality, and Ice Cream Castle lays it on in "If the Kid Can't Make You Come" and "My Drawers." To cap off this divergent LP, the title tune is fine bubblegum funk-pop.

In 1990, a much-ballyhooed reunion brought the entire group back together, somehow coordinating these stars' broadly developed talents into a solidly entertaining record of new material that is unmistakably Time-like. Faced with the challenge of getting all those little time-release pills back in the capsule, Pandemonium comes through like a breeze, fitting Day's beseechingly egotistical humor, patented Jam/Lewis dance grooves and Johnson's psychedelic funk guitar back together as if nothing had happened. [i]

See also Morris Day, Jesse Johnson's Revue.

TIMES

Pop Goes Art! (nr/Whaam!) 1982 (nr/Artpop!) 1983 ●
This Is London (nr/Artpop!) 1983
I Helped Patrick McGooohan Escape EP (nr/Artpop!) 1983
Hello Europe (nr/Artpop!) 1984
Blue Period (nr/Artpop!) 1985
Boys About Town EP (nr/Artpop!) 1985
Go! With the Times (Ger. Pastell) 1985

Up Against It (nr/Artpop!) 1986
Times T.V. EP (nr/Fire) 1986
Enjoy the Times (nr/Artpop!) 1986
Beat Torture (nr/Creation) 1988 •
E for Edward (nr/Creation) 1989 •
Et Dieu Créa la Femme (nr/Creation) 1990 •

Led by singer/songwriter Edward Ball (original co-conspirator in the Television Personalities and numerous related endeavors under such names as O Level, Teenage Filmstars, etc.), these psychedelic poseurs set out to recapture the lightweight pop sounds of swinging England (circa 1967). If you don't mind that the Times are totally derivative and enjoy the style they lift, the group's early records are a seamlessly integrated genre heist, superb examples of successful nostalgia.

The low-budget Pop Goes Art! includes the marvelously kitsch "I Helped Patrick McGoohan Escape" (a song the group has repeatedly re-recorded) as well as appropriately devised creations like "Biff! Bang! Pow!" and the title track. (Despite its belated German-only release, Go! With the Times was actually recorded in 1980, prior to Pop Goes Art!.)

With tunes like "Goodbye Piccadilly" and "The Chimes of Big Ben," This Is London offers convincing evidence that the paisley-colored '60s are back. But the Times aren't totally unconnected to the present: the pointed lyrics of "Whatever Happened to Thamesbeat" offer lucid insight into the neo-mod revival.

After reading British playwright Joe Orton's work, Ball wrote a song based on (and titled after) Up Against It, a screenplay commissioned and discarded by the Beatles. That song turned up on the six-song Patrick McGoohan EP, along with a new version of the title track and the "Danger Man Theme."

The following year, Ball and Tony Conway of Mood Six wrote and attempted to mount a one-act theatrical condensation of Up Against It; in 1985, they co-directed a complete stage production of Orton's script, incorporating original songs Ball had written for it. Those were then issued as Up Against It, a studio LP of discrete power pop tunes that sound very noticeably like various well-known artists, including the Jam, Beatles and Bowie. As the songs are linked in a narrative logic that wants for an explanatory script, it's an okay album but not one of the Times' best. (Other than Ball's claim that Joseph Papp's people pinched the idea from him, this project is musically and practically unrelated to the subsequent off-Broadway musical of the same name, scored by Todd Rundgren.)

On the Times' first Creation LP, Ball is joined by Jowe Head (ex-Swell Map/occasional TVP) and two members of Biff Bang Pow!, including Creation boss Alan McGee. (Ball also plays in that group on occasion.) No longer beholden to any specific era and a lot less innocent-sounding than the group's old records, Beat Torture is an uneven mixture of light pop, moderate rock and heavy psychedelia. While "Department Store," the old-fashioned "It Had to Happen" and the strange "How to Start Your Own Country" are notable, too much of the record is halfbaked and disposable.

E for Edward is a Ball solo album in all but name. Although the set-up encourages too many wispy acoustic numbers of little effect, solitude seems to agree with him. Highlights of this simple but skillfully produced LP include the contemporary scene tableau of "Manchester," the witty T. Rex pisstake of "Catherine Wheel" and the wry cinematic parody of "French Film Blurred." In keeping with the album's drug-oriented title, the record closes with "Acid Angel of Ecstasy," a character study hissed over oscillating tremolo guitar. From there, it was only a drop, trip and a thump to the Love Corporation, a nom-de-dance under which Ball released a 1990 acid-house EP. [i]

See also Biff Bang Pow!, Television Personalities.

TIME ZONE

See Afrika Bambaataa.

SALLY TIMMS AND THE DRIFTING COWGIRLS

See Mekons.

TINA PEEL

See Fuzztones.

TIN HUEY

Contents Dislodged During Shipment (Warner Bros.) 1979

This sextet of eccentrics from Akron, Ohio were more eclectic and musicianly than their local colleagues. The Hueys' stunning should-have-been-a-hit version of the Monkees' "I'm a Believer" (included on the album) was inspired by Robert Wyatt's re-arrangement, and the band owes a nod to Frank Zappa as well. Yet their blend of blues, jazz and progressive rock is hilariously unique, offering up a warped vision of Middle America. For Tin Huey, "weekends in my Lay-zee Boy" (from "Hump Day") might be punctuated by the discovery of a car filled with doll heads ("Puppet Wipes"); a surreal "Chinese Circus" comes to town; they even admit to fantasies of technological megalomania ("I Could Rule the World If I Could Only Get the Parts")—later the title of a mini-LP by the Waitresses.

After Tin Huey's artistically fruitful (but commercially hopeless) one-album career ended, various members went on to pursue other projects, the most notable of which are guitarist Chris Butler's creation, the Waitresses, and multi-horn wizard Ralph Carney's Swollen Monkeys. [jg]

See also Carney-Hild-Kramer, Swollen Monkeys, Waitresses.

TIN MACHINE

See David Bowie.

TIN TIN

See Stephen Duffy.

TINY LIGHTS

Prayer for the Halcyon Fear (Uriel) 1986 (Absolute A Go Go) 1990 •

Hazel's Wreath (Gaia) 1988 •

Hot Chocolate Massage (Absolute A Go Go) 1990 •

While the brand of fragile, childlike folk-pop embraced by this New Jersey quintet has led many a sincere young combo down the garden path of pretension and preciousness, Tiny Lights possesses the talent and personality to execute the style with just the right blend of innocence and smarts, as well as a minimum of self-consciousness. In addition to a fulltime cellist (the much-borrowed Jane Scarpantoni) and a rhythm section that doubles on horns, the lineup boasts a distinctive frontwoman in singer/violinist Donna Croughn, who collaborates on the band's songwriting with guitarist John Hamilton.

Prayer for the Halcyon Fear is a delightful debut, alternately delicate ("Flowers Through the Air," "Blue Dot Cleanser") and rocking ("Zippity-Do-Dah," "Chesterfield Gorge"), with a mildly psychedelic sense of play that sets the band apart. (Inexplicably, this unpretentious, accessible record was issued in the UK by Psychic TV's Temple label.)

Hazel's Wreath lacks its predecessor's giddy sense of discovery, but is a solid mix of solemnity and abandon (often within the same song, as on "Grown-up Fish" and "The Bridge"). Following Hazel's Wreath, Tiny Lights recorded a third album, Know It You Love, but Gaia folded before issuing it.

The band recut two of the unreleased album's songs for the wonderful Hot Chocolate Massage, obviously the work of a mature, confident group that's eclectic yet consistently focused, romantic without being sappy. The combination of lilting pastoral tunes ("Moonwhite Day," "Big Straw Hat") and heavier numbers ("Wave," "After All") once again proves that sincerity needn't be dull. [hd]

TIREZ TIREZ

Etudes (nr/Object Music) 1980 (nr/Aura) 1981
Story of the Year (Bel. Crépuscule) 1983
Social Responsibility (Primitive Man) 1987 •
Against All Flags (Primitive Man) 1988 •

MIKEL ROUSE BROKEN CONSORT

Jade Tiger (Bel. Crépuscule) 1983
A Walk in the Woods (Bel. Made to Measure) 1985
 (Club Soda) 1985 •
A Lincoln Portrait (Cuneiform) 1988

MIKEL ROUSE

Quorum (Club Soda) 1984

BLAINE L. REININGER/MIKEL ROUSE

Colorado Suite EP (Bel. Made to Measure) 1984 •

The French nom to the contrary, Mikel Rouse originally formed his trio in Kansas City, relocating it to New York in 1979. As a singer, Rouse shows promise, but Etudes borrows far too much from early Talking Heads to be accused of originality and is rhythmically monotonous to boot. Following a Belgian LP release, Tirez Tirez released a 12-inch on Sire before finding an American label to put out the group's third album.

Except for bass (credit James Bergman), Rouse sings and plays (keyboards, guitars, drum programs) Social Responsibility singlehandedly; he wrote all nine songs and co-produced it as well. Not surprisingly, there's a certain sluggish insularity to the music, an audible lack of human interaction. But when Rouse's over-educated structuralism succumbs to the uplifting pop momentum, Tirez makes for attractive, intelligent listening.

Against All Flags is the first Tirez Tirez record to feature a full band, and the difference in feel (not to mention the filled-out sound) is immediately apparent. Rouse's writing here shows as much heart as craft, and the result is a batch of very engaging tunes that are still compositionally rigorous. A great pop record.

Rouse also records with a forward-thinking chamber quartet, Broken Consort. Jade Tiger shares definite affinities with the work of Steve Reich, and features a snappy but mellifluous soprano sax sound that has unfortunately been appropriated by the new age crowd. Succeeding Broken Consort records—A Walk in the Woods and A Lincoln Portrait—find Rouse growing bolder and more intricate in his compositions. While he's a composer of undeniable and substantial gifts, his work has gotten lost in the crossdrifts of contemporary classical music, not really bare-boned enough to be called minimal and too easy on the ears to attract the attention of the academic crowd. (Initially released by Belgium's Crammed Discs as part of its Made to Measure series, A Walk in the Woods was joined on CD with Colorado Suite, Rouse's joint album with Tuxedomoon violinist Blaine L. Reininger.)

Released under his own name on his own Club Soda label, Quorum is an interesting but extremely dry solo composition for Lindrum. [jy/i/gk]

See also Tuxedomoon.

TOADSTOOL

See Magnolias.

TOAD THE WET SPROCKET

Bread and Circus (Abe's-Columbia) 1989 •
Pale (Abe's-Columbia) 1990 •

Accidentally caught in the nets of a major label trawling the alternative (aka college-radio) waters for hip credibility and the next R.E.M., this mild Santa Barbara, California quartet plays perfectly competent pop without a shred of personality. Except for the silly name (borrowed from a Monty Python sketch) and a close demographic resemblance to their target audience of bright white suburban middle-class kids, Toad the Wet Sprocket is as countercultural as skim milk, and every drop as exciting. Bread and Circus reveals guitarist Glen Phillips' passing vocal similarity to Elton John; when bassist Dean Dinning joins in to harmonize, the dread ghost of California lite-rock lurks in the grooves.

With producer Marvin Etzioni adding a mature sheen and semi-acoustic restraint, Pale turns bland pop into dire singer/songwriter tepidity, underscoring the gravity of the marketers' miscalculation. Anyone who finds this stimulating needs to get out more. [i]

TO DAMASCUS

Succumb (Ringent) 1986
Come to Your Senses (Ringent-Restless) 1987

SYLVIA JUNCOSA

Nature (SST) 1988 •
One Thing (Nate Starkman & Son-Fundamental) 1989

Originally a keyboardist, LA's Sylvia Juncosa switched to guitar and formed To Damascus after leaving Leaving Trains and touring with Kendra Smith and David Roback in Clay Allison. (She also concurrently played guitar in SWA.) Succumb, her trio's ragged first album, contains undistinguished post-punk. Juncosa's a carefree, marble-mouthed singer and a solid rhythm guitarist but a sloppy soloist with few original ideas; the rhythm section does its part adequately, but no more.

The lyrics on Come to Your Senses indicate Juncosa's evocative talent for expressing alienation and disaffection in unusual ways; her organ and piano contributions leaven the much-improved hyperactive guitar smears (if not her dubious singing). The inclusion of acoustic creations with strings and things offer helpful variety but are also limited in appeal by wobbly vocals. A creative focal point and stronger songwriting would have helped, as Ethan James' co-production fills the LP with layers of energizing aggression that are left hanging like burning wallpaper.

With a new bassist and drummer in tow, Juncosa initiated her solo career with Nature, a relatively accomplished guitar demonstration, covering everything from waves of psychedelic noise to gentle acoustic fingerpicking. It's interesting to watch this burgeoning fret technician find her feet as well as her chops: "Lick My Pussy, Eddie Van Halen" makes it clear that today's guitar hero doesn't need a penis to have balls. She should really refrain from singing, however: her uncertain Onoesque warble does nothing to improve the instrumental showcases.

A change of producers and sidemen on the thick-sounding One Thing gives Juncosa new-found stylistic focus and brings her a step closer to metal. But unflinchingly horrid vocals undercut the music's larger-than-life potential. Her instrumental skills steadily improving, Juncosa desperately needs to hitch her britches to a band with a real singer and a more talented songwriter. [i]

See also SWA.

TODAY WONDER

See Laughing Clowns.

TOKEN ENTRY

Ready or Not Here We Come EP (Turnstyle Tunes) 1985

From Beneath the Streets (Positive Force) 1987

Jaybird (Hawker) 1988 •

The Weight of the World (Emergo) 1990 ◊

Formed in 1980 as Gilligan's Revenge and renamed in 1984, Queens' Token Entry has survived a number of lineup changes (drummer Ernie Parada is the only remaining original member) to become one of New York City's most versatile and respected skatepunk groups. With vocalist Anthony Comunale (now fronting Killing Time), the quartet released the 7-inch Ready or Not EP in '86: all four tracks resurfaced on the first LP, but with Timmy Chunks snagging the mic. Despite Tim's off-key moments, his exuberance propels the band, especially on "Look Around," "Over You" and "The Edge." Between bullets of unrefined energy lurks a sense of melody, streaks of tempo changes and guitarist Mickey Neal's metallic twist.

Produced by Bad Brains guitarist Dr. Know (Gary Miller), Jaybird anchors the Token Entry rhythm section and inflates the overall sound. Most of the highlights are on Side One: the raging opener ("The Fire"), the infectious chants on "The Bright Side" and the guitars that spiral through "The Whip." The flipside glides into a more basic rock groove with some psychedelics on "Pink Things" and the CD bonus track, an off-the-cuff cover of "Born to Be Wild." Sticking with Dr. Know but debuting a new bassist and a different guitar player, Weight of the World adds a bit of Chili Peppers thrash-funk to Token Entry's expanding stylistic repertoire. [mg]

RUSS TOLMAN

Totem Poles and Glory Holes (Down There-Restless) 1986

Down in Earthquake Town (nr/Demon) 1988 (Skyclad)

1989 •

RUSS TOLMAN AND THE TOTEM POLEMEN

Goodbye Joe (Skyclad) 1990 •

The (intentionally?) shoddy self-production on former True West leader Tolman's eccentric solo debut covers up any of the guitarist's potential vocal inadequacies in a blur of flat, boomy sound; there's enough echo on the rhythm section to fill the Grand Canyon. (Maybe that's where this was recorded.) Fortunately, Tolman's spirit and songwriting aptitude are strong even if the audio is weak—cheap bootleg ambience only adds to the outlaw fun.

On Down in Earthquake Town, Tolman takes the opposite extreme: such production frills as horns, girl-group singers, accordion and mandolin give the songs buoyancy and lightness. Tolman's voice is thin and twangy, like a Fender Telecaster. With songs about "Vegas," "Palm Tree Land" and other scenes from the West Coast underbelly, Earthquake Town has a kind of slouchy sleaziness, songs of slot machines and crumbling relationships.

Goodbye Joe falls somewhere between its predecessors, more polished than Totem Poles but packing more of a rock wallop than Earthquake Town. Tolman finally seems to have settled into a solo persona—a slightly nostalgic, world-weary Everyguy who's willing to let dreams and reminiscences serve as his adventures. The imagery of bends in the road and rainbows mined for pots of gold may not be new, but Tolman gives them resonance and authenticity. [i/kss]

See also True West.

ED TOMNEY/JONATHAN BOROFSKY

See Rage to Live.

TOM TOM CLUB

Tom Tom Club (Sire) 1981 •

Close to the Bone (Sire) 1983

Boom Boom Chi Boom Boom (nr/Fontana) 1988 (Sire)

1989 •

Tom Tom Club provides light refreshment for Talking Heads Tina Weymouth (bass) and her husband Chris Frantz (drums). Although their friend-filled albums appear during lulls in Heads activity, the first gained its own momentum with two popular dance tracks: "Wordy Rappinghood" and "Genius of Love." Weymouth and her three sisters' airy vocals sound delightfully innocent over steady but unthreatening rhythm. Close to the Bone continues in the same whimsical and sensitive vein (e.g., "Pleasure of Love"). Both records skirt cloyingness, saved by the Tom Tommers' self-consciousness.

Two of the four Weymouth sisters dropped out after Close to the Bone, leaving a less distinctive vocal signature. Beware the British version of Boom Boom Chi Boom Boom; the band obviously did, replacing four of its ten songs for the domestic release. The new tracks, all during the first half, build up a serious power surge without sacrificing danceability. (One of these, "I Confess," is a total overhaul of "Mighty Teardrop" from the British album.) So if you're denied the chance to hear Frantz declaim Bob Dylan's "She Belongs to Me," you still get the drummer's audacious "Challenge of the Love Warriors"—heavy breathing looped with percussion—and all the Talking Heads plus Lou Reed performing the latter's "Femme Fatale." The track-switching had no effect on Boom Boom Chi Boom Boom's US success (minimal), but considerably improved an album that, like its predecessors, is as much fun for as deep as you care to listen. (The US CD adds one bonus track.) [si]

See also Talking Heads.

TONE-LÖC

Löc-ed After Dark (Delicious Vinyl-Island) 1989 ●

Never underestimate the power of a solid left hook or the importance of a good corner man: the nagging guitar figures in "Wild Thing" (sampled from Eddie Van Halen) and "Funky Cold Medina" (both co-written by Marvin Young, aka Young MC) helped make the unmistakable hoarse voice of LA's likable Tone-Löc (Tony Smith) a radio staple in 1989 and Löc-ed After Dark the second rap album (after the Beastie Boys) to top the pop charts. The LP has both of the hits (including an unexpurgated "Wild Thing"), an ode to pot ("Cheeba Cheeba") and more of the same lighthearted party fun, all delivered with Löc's engaging good humor. [i]

TONES ON TAIL

Tones on Tail EP (nr/4AD) 1982

Burning Skies EP (nr/Situation Two) 1983

'Pop' (nr/Beggars Banquet) 1984 (Beggars Banquet-PVC) 1986 ●

Tones on Tail (nr/Situation Two) 1985

Night Music [CD] (Beggars Banquet-PVC) 1987 ●

Tones on Tail (Beggars Banquet-RCA) 1990 φ

Originally formed in 1981 as a duo of Bauhaus guitarist Daniel Ash and Bauhaus roadie-turned-bassist Glenn Campling, Tones on Tail was a generally interesting, shortlived experiment in various styles. When the parent group called it a day in 1983, Ash chose to make this modest side project a going concern, and Bauhaus drummer Kevin Haskins hopped aboard to make it a fulltime trio.

Tones on Tail, a full-length album stitched together from the band's first three records—the initial self-titled EP, "There's Only One" 45 and the Burning Skies EP (Haskins' ToT debut)—careens from languid, whispered rock to jumpy light funk to spare atmospheric soundtracks, and offers very little songwriting content, merely scanty ideas in service of largely pointless studio fiddling.

But while 'Pop'—the trio's only actual album—reveals some draggy recidivist Bauhaus tendencies, it also has real songs of modern music that show taste, delicacy and moderate imagination. "Lions," for instance, roams an attractively light synth-samba range while proffering lyrics like "Lions always hit the heights/Cause to kill it's always the easy way out." Say what? The multi-movement "Real Life" blends acoustic guitar picking with hushed vocals, angry lyrics and weird sound effects—neo-Yes? (The US version is revised, with the replacement of three tracks by subsequent singles, including "Go!," a B-side that took off in American clubs, and "Christian Says.")

Ash became unsatisfied with Campling, however, and after a US tour in the fall of '84, Tones on Tail was shelved. At this point, on the heels of erstwhile Bauhaus bassist David J.'s departure from the Jazz Butcher and the utter failure of Peter Murphy's experiment with Dalis Car, a full-scale Bauhaus reunion was planned. When Murphy backed out, the three remaining members decided to continue under the name Love and Rockets.

With the admonition "don't rock—wobble," the 72-minute Night Music CD compiles sixteen previously released items, including most of 'Pop', half of Tones on Tail, the wonderfully bent dance kineticism of "Go!" and a horrible, bootleg-quality live "Heartbreak Hotel." Three years later, the same basic assortment of tracks was repackaged, under the weary title of—you guessed it—Tones on Tail. This latest compilation (seventeen tracks on CD; the cassette adds "Rain," "A Bigger Splash" and "Means of Escape") gets the slight nod over Night Music, as it has some different tracks (replacing "Heartbreak Hotel" with the stellar single "Performance" and adding two others) and liner notes instead of a lyric booklet. [i/gef]

See also Bauhaus, Love and Rockets.

WINSTON TONG

See Tuxedomoon.

TOO MUCH JOY

Green Eggs and Crack (Stonegarden) 1987

Son of Sam I Am (Alias) 1988 (Alias-Giant-Warner Bros.) 1990 ●

Cereal Killers (Alias-Giant-Warner Bros.) 1991 φ

Bands comprised of young suburban smartalecks are frequently too clever by half, tripping over themselves in endless demonstrations of irony. This flip quartet from Scarsdale, New York, however, is just clever enough. Playing charming, melodic guitar rock (developing a surprising hip-hop consciousness along the way), TMJ carefully navigates the funny-rock straits between making jokes and being one, occasionally showing flashes of inspiration.

Despite inconsistent production, the unassuming Green Eggs and Crack (assembled from four years' worth of sessions) is a neat little pop record. In a personable boy-next-door voice, Tim Quirk sings entertaining wry odes to "James Dean's Jacket," bogus cartography ("Map Like Mine"), romance ("Bored with Love") and malt liquor ("No Beer") that are each worth a smile or three.

Sharpening both instrumental skills and songwriting wit, TMJ hit their stride on Son of Sam I Am, an accomplished rock album that mixes silly history lessons ("My Past Lives," "1964"), snotty social (un-)consciousness ("Making Fun of Burns") and a poke at fallen rock idols ("Hugo!") with an impressive melodic rewrite of L.L. Cool J's "That's a Lie" that elevates dishonesty to an art. The 1990 CD/cassette reissue substitutes a remix of "That's a Lie," removes the borrowed Bozo intro to "Clowns" and adds two: a cover of Terry Jacks' "Seasons in the Sun" and a tribute to the Mekons.

Produced by Paul Fox (who did XTC's Oranges & Lemons), Cereal Killers organizes TMJ's maturing humor and instrumental skills into presentable catchy college rock. Whether griping goodnaturedly about the unfair seductive advantage of Britons ("Long Haired Guys from England"), recounting a sorry vacation story ("Thanksgiving in Reno") or revisiting a favorite topic ("King of Beers," sure to become a frat-house classic), the band's puppy-dog personality makes Cereal Killers a lightweight smileathon. [i]

TOO $HORT

Life Is ... Too $hort (Dangerous Music-RCA) 1988 •
Born to Mack (Dangerous Music-Jive) 1989 •
Short Dog's in the House (Dangerous Music-Jive) 1990 •

Without suggesting that he's emblematic of California's early slow-to-grow rap scene, Oakland's Too $hort (Todd Shaw) is a jimmy-come-lately cliché of routine beats and halfhearted generic sex 'n' gold rhymes. While half of the debut is harmless/worthless autobiography, playboy tracks like "Pimp the Ho" and "CussWords" (on the X-rated side of Life Is ...) are crude and stupid.

Born to Mack has slightly better tracks (thanks in part to a scratch DJ on the job), but nothing more intellectually stimulating to offer than jailbait troubles (in "Little Girls") and the ever-willing big-booby fantasies of "Freaky Tales" (essentially a nasty hip-hop answer to the Nails' "88 Lines About 44 Women").

Too $hort wised up a bit on the third album, keeping his hot dog zipped up (except in the dubious joke of "Pimpology") to reveal a solid social conscience, repeatedly attacking crack (especially in "The Ghetto," a mushy soul track ruined by an absurdly sung refrain) and making a clever statement against censorship in "Ain't Nothin' but a Word to Me," a two-team performance with Ice Cube that intentionally obliterates the pair's stream of profanity with maddening beeps. [i]

TOP JIMMY & THE RHYTHM PIGS

Pigus Drunkus Maximus (Down There-Restless) 1987

Chris Morris' LP liner notes characterize Top Jimmy as a legendary live attraction in Los Angeles, a true-blue white bluesman with a wide, star-studded following. (Van Halen wrote and recorded a song about him on 1984.) Regardless of where the burly singer and his crackerjack band (unrelated to the Texas Rhythm Pigs) come from, it's easy enough to hear where they're going—straight into the history books, for playing blues and old-fashioned rock'n'roll with more electric panache and gusto than almost anyone else currently on the scene. Covering Merle Haggard, Bob Dylan, Willie Dixon and Jimi Hendrix with unwavering comprehension and equally enthusiastic sweaty abandon, these no-shit bar-busters turn their debut LP into a resounding lesson on how it's s'posed to be done. Steve Berlin produced and plays sax; guest star Don Bonebrake (of X) does most of the drumming. [i]

TORCH SONG

See William Orbit.

TOURÉ KUNDA

Touré Kunda (Fr. Celluloid) 1981 (Celluloid) 1987 •
Èm'ma Africa (Les Frères Griots) (Fr. Celluloid) 1982 (Celluloid) 1987 •
Amadou-Tilo (Celluloid) 1984
Casamance au Clair de Lune (Celluloid) 1984 •
Live Paris-Ziguinchor (Celluloid) 1984 •
Natalia (Celluloid) 1985 •
81/82 [CD] (Celluloid) 1986 •
83/84 [CD] (Celluloid) 1986 •
Karadindi (Celluloid) 1988 •

The international appeal of Senegal's Touré brothers—Ismaila, Sixu Tidiane and Ousmane—must be attributed in large part to their soothingly mellifluous voices, tones that wash over the listener like warm milk. Of course, their sultry and tasteful integration of Afro-urban and Western dance music have something to do with it too. Like traditional griot songs (they themselves belong to the artisan class), many of their lyrics consist of simple reflections on nature and family life. But after first performing on such traditional instruments as balafon and kora, they gradually integrated electric guitars and keyboards into their arrangements.

Their first album, Touré Kunda, contains beautiful melodies over reggae and Arabic rhythms, along with unobtrusive hints of rock music. Èm'ma Africa, featuring the music of Sixu and Ismaila, has a notable Jamaican influence.

Amadou-Tilo memorializes Amadou Touré, who died (reportedly from exhaustion) in 1983. The group next recorded an acoustic album of traditional songs, Casamance au Clair de Lune, before going high-tech (with Fairlight synthesizers!) under the sway of producer Bill Laswell and his studio regulars (including former Parliament keyboardist Bernie Worrell, guitarist Nicky Skopelitis and drummer Aiyb Dieng) on Natalia. The live album, recorded at various dates in Western Africa around the end of 1983, includes sparkling performances of songs from Amadou-Tilo, as well as earlier albums. The Tourés are backed by a female singer and six musicians, playing keyboards, sax, flute, guitar, bass and drums. 81/82 and 83/84 are compilations.

[rg/i]

TOURISTS

The Tourists (nr/Logo) 1979

Reality Effect (nr/Logo) 1979 (Epic) 1979

Luminous Basement (Epic) 1980

Tourists (nr/RCA Int'l) 1981

Should Have Been Greatest Hits (Epic) 1984 ●

In light of Dave Stewart and Annie Lennox's subsequent work as Eurythmics, the Tourists were remarkably low on vitality and originality, content to rehash '60s American acid and folk-rock. Symptomatic of the quintet's shortcomings, the crowning achievement of their three albums was a dull remake of Dusty Springfield's "I Only Want to Be with You."

Lennox, who later proved to be a far more expressive vocalist, here sings with strength but no character; duets with guitarist Peet Coombes (the band's primary songwriter) resemble the Jefferson Airplane. Elsewhere, the group recalls It's a Beautiful Day, the Byrds, Mamas and Papas, the Who and others. The Tourists were so busy aping others that if they had had a personality to call their own, they probably wouldn't have known what to do with it. It's a shame, because some bands have successfully absorbed and adapted these same musical prototypes with much greater élan. At their best, the Tourists could only imitate. (Proof that derivation never ends, The Tourists' mod-pop "Blind Among the Flowers" could be the stylistic blueprint for the Primitives.)

The US version of Reality Effect is actually a mixture of the band's first two British releases. Tourists (1981) and Should Have Been Greatest Hits are compilations. [i]

See also Eurythmics.

FRANK TOVEY

Snakes & Ladders (Mute-Sire) 1986 ●

The Fad Gadget Singles (Mute-Sire) 1986 ●

Civilian (Mute-Restless) 1988 ●

Tyranny and the Hired Hand (Mute-Restless) 1989 ●

FRANK TOVEY & THE PYROS

Grand Union (Mute) 1991 φ

FAD GADGET

Fireside Favourites (nr/Mute) 1980

Incontinent (nr/Mute) 1981

Under the Flag (nr/Mute) 1982

Gag (nr/Mute) 1984

The enigmatic Frank Tovey (formerly known as Fad Gadget) is a creative and unpredictable writer, singer and performer whose records all differ considerably from each other; he's an acquired taste with little consistency. After an eerie second 45 ("Ricky's Hand," on which Mute head Daniel Miller contributes synthesizer and Fad plays a "Black and Decker V8 double speed electric drill"), he released Fireside Favourites, an album that closely resembles early Human League. Except for the title track, which bounces along cheerfully, the basic mixture is dour vocals, heavy, repetitive bass lines, solid drums and odd noises. Tacky tunes like "Coitus Interruptus" only cheapen the proceedings.

Incontinent, which pursues the grubbier side of Fad Gadgetry, employs more instrumental variety and better production. Forgetting tripe like "Swallow It" and the charming title tune, some of this is interesting enough, but none is really involving; overall, the self-indulgent album rambles incoherently.

Taking a major leap towards lyrical and musical maturity, Under the Flag joins pristine production quality with a no-nonsense synth drive that could pass for dance music, and shows absorption of a mild soul influence. (Then-labelmate Alison Moyet sings on a few tracks and even adds saxophone to one.) The funky approach gives Tovey a direct and accessible sound, but that's not necessarily an accomplishment—it's hard to avoid the feeling that he's slumming in such relatively commercial seas.

By the time of his first American release, Tovey had retired his alter-ego. The lively dance-rock—solid beats, strong synth lines, spurious electronic noises and occasional guitar solos and funk bass—on Snakes & Ladders alternately suggests contemporaneous Wire and Human League, but Tovey can hardly be accused of imitating anyone. His sense of humor makes "Collapsing New People" (retrieved from the British-only Gag) a satiric treat; "Luxury" and the poetic but dull "Small World" display an unexpectedly serious and mature side.

The Fad Gadget Singles offers eleven peeks at Tovey's past, from his overlong and rudimentary 1979 debut ("Back to Nature" b/w "The Box") and "Ricky's Hand" to 1984's "Collapsing New People." Most of these tracks are available on albums, and none are particularly essential, but new fans may find it an agreeable means to sample and catch up on his import-only releases.

Hardened by its grim indictments of political strife, violence and modern urban life, Civilian sends Tovey to an adventurous land wherein percussion and triggered electronic soundmakers take the lead. Interestingly, rather than underscore the album's focus on (generally not dance-oriented) rhythm, the mix allows vocals and the scanty melody instruments a fair chance to compete. If not for Tovey's firm grip on song structure, this radical record might have turned into an endurance test. As it is, Civilian poses its intriguing challenge without discouraging participation.

Never one to repeat himself, Tovey next corralled a bunch of acoustic musicians and turned his attentions to American labor ballads. Despite the anomaly of an electronic baby strumming politely in the folk woods, the delightful Tyranny and the Hired Hand is successful on its own terms. Tovey's courageous defiance of stylistic preconceptions may not have aided his commercial career any, but he deserves credit for exceedingly fine taste in both material ("Sixteen Tons," "Joe Hill," "Pastures of Plenty," "North Country Blues") and execution. [i]

See also Boyd Rice.

TOYAH & FRIPP

See Robert Fripp.

TOY LOVE

See Tall Dwarfs.

TRAGICALLY HIP

The Tragically Hip (MCA) 1987

Up to Here (MCA) 1989 ●

Road Apples (MCA) 1991 φ

An effective blend of garage angst, country spirit and jangle-pop uplift, this badly named quintet from Kingston, Ontario made its just-left-of-center Canadian debut on an independent mini-album, later given an American release. Confident and well-articulated, "Small Town Bringdown" and "Evelyn" are sturdy and catchy pop-rock, the unchallenging sort of quality material that makes a Thursday night bar band worth sticking around to hear.

The full-length Up to Here is bigger and harder, sacrificing some of the melodic appeal for stiff-backed guitar power and pretty routine heartland rock. As a result, Gordon Downie wraps his pipes—a powerful, quivery mixture of Michael Hutchence and John Cougar Mellencamp—around songs with interesting lyrics that are more geared to arenas than taverns.

Produced by Don Smith, the bluesy Road Apples integrates the band's upwardly mobile aspirations and down-home roots with a bit more subtlety and conviction. The record is strictly commercial but frequently credible, with a smoky atmosphere and a funky swing that makes tracks like "Twist My Arm" and "Bring It All Back" (which has a killer guitar solo that sounds like Neil Young working the wah-wah pedal) uncommonly tasty. [i]

TRAGIC MULATTO

Judo for the Blind (Alternative Tentacles) 1984
Locos por el Sexo (Alternative Tentacles) 1987 •
Hot Man Pussy (Alternative Tentacles) 1989 •
Chartreuse Toulouse (Alternative Tentacles) 1990

If you aren't totally repelled by the first album's title or indescribably grotesque cover painting, you may find yourself enthralled by Tragic Mulatto's bizarre musical universe. The five members—whose names are given as Fluffy, Blossom, Flossy, Sweetums and A Piece of Eczema—collectively sing and play bass, drums, trumpet and sax. Produced with little sonic élan by Dead Kennedy bassist Klaus Flouride, parts sound like jazzy Flipper; an ominous rock rumble with jagged horn noise and dramatic vocals. Some numbers are faster and well-organized to the point where they resemble a '40s big band on bad drugs; others could be an incompetent jazz combo vainly tuning up while someone soundchecks the microphones.

A suspiciously rechristened quartet (Reverend Elvister Shanksly, Flatula Lee Roth, Jazzbo Smith and Richard Skidmark) turned up for the salacious second LP (pointedly numbered VIRUS 69), a wild honking noise party that includes such brilliantly titled scatological creations as "Swineherd in the Tenderloin," "Underwear Maintenance" (a detailed paean to menstruation) and a sex manual titled "Twerpenstein." Strangely, the music is really good, with enough structural backbone to give the songs non-satirical legitimacy. Flatula the female vocalist (who triples on sax and tuba) is wonderful, and the taste-is-no-obstacle lyrics are funnier than a poke in the eye with a sharp stick. Fans of the vulgar but hysterical could do worse than to bathe in this delectable cesspool.

Hot Man Pussy presents a disheveled roar of improvisational guitar-and-sax noise over which Fistula (for it is she) and the Rev. E. Shanksley bellow songs like "She's a Ho," "My Name Is Not O'Neill" and the outstanding Blue Velvet-quoting "Mr. Cheese." The incoherent blur of feedback and neck-wringing gets fairly numbing, but two digressions—the tuba'n'banjo closer ("The Sheriff of Weed") and Fistula's operatic vocal on "Hardcore Bigot Scum Get Stabbed"—provide welcome breaks in the action. (The CD also contains Locos por el Sexo.)

A well-rehearsed cover of Slade's "I Don't Mind" (with mondo guitar and a bit of tuba) gets Chartreuse Toulouse off to an excellent start, and the album rarely loses momentum from there, although the shrill "My Mother" and the lengthy and monotonous "Scabs on Lori's Arm" are hazards to avoid. The solidly constructed (and, except for "Bathroom at Amelia's," conceptually tamer) songs, Flatula's down-to-business Grace Slick-style singing and the quintet's ability to follow a musical road map through a squealing storm of six-string horror (shifting into acoustic gear on a couple of folk tracks!) make this psychedelic trip one of Tragic Mulatto's great adventures. [i]

TRANSLATOR

Heartbeats and Triggers (415-Columbia) 1982
No Time Like Now (415-Columbia) 1983
Translator (415-Columbia) 1985
Evening of the Harvest (415-Columbia) 1986
Everywhere That I'm Not—A Retrospective (415-Columbia) 1986

Formed in Los Angeles in 1979, this talented quartet really got rolling after moving to San Francisco. Translator's music encompasses elements of traditional folk-rock, adding modern sounds, novel ideas and cool deadpan pop—simply put, diversity makes Translator fine and often fascinating. Singing guitarists Steve Barton and Robert Darlington have a wide stylistic arsenal and each has the ability to write varied songs of quality and endurance. Heartbeats and Triggers, produced by David Kahne, is a great debut album with very few weak tracks.

No Time Like Now contains another batch of melodic and rocking tunes played with ringing guitars and attractive harmonies; unfortunately, a lot of the songs don't wash. While "Un-Along," "Break Down Barriers" and the title track keep the musical faith, "L.A., L.A." is a trite, gimmicky digression and "I Hear You Follow" is too reserved. Others are equally unprepossessing or simply plain. Stick with the first album.

Translator, produced by Ed Stasium, is for the most part a return to form. "Gravity" is as good as anything they've done; other tunes maintain a tasteful, invigorating blend of vocals, rhythm guitars and intelligent songwriting. The biggest problem here is time: for a third album, they're not really going anywhere new creatively, and commercial success still seems well over the horizon.

Perhaps that frustration explains the radically different album that followed: the one-take guitar rock on Evening of the Harvest scarcely resembles prior Translator music. To be fair, this isn't your average numbskull arena rubbish, but the muscle comes as an unwelcome shock. Each track includes (individually credited) guitar riffing, but most retain a trace of the band's melodicism amid the audio clutter.

Translator broke up in '86. The career-summing

Everywhere That I'm Not draws from all four albums, adding one otherwise non-LP bonus: a version of Jefferson Airplane's "Today." The track selection isn't ideal, but it's a fair representation of this special group's work. [i]

TRANSVISION VAMP

Pop Art (Uni) 1988 •

Velveteen (MCA) 1989 •

Little Magnets vs. the Bubble of Babble (MCA) 1991 •

Anyone harboring the illusion that American teenagers have worse taste than their British counterparts have only to note that this pathetic glam-pop band reached the UK Top 5 with its first album and topped the charts there with its second. The less offensive of the two, Pop Art is a flimsy but tuneful put-up job built around singer Wendy James' weak voice and petulant pout. Besides a lame rendition of Holly Vincent's "Tell That Girl to Shut Up," the quintet makes a charmlessly selfconscious stab at rockabilly (Sigue Sigue style), attempts to ape T. Rex, Blondie and the Primitives and generally does some of the things worthless bands with no imagination are known for.

Again jointly produced by Duncan Bridgeman and Zeus B. Held, Velveteen—which announces itself as "Born to Be Sold"—sheds any pretense of pop innocence and relies on crude-sounding programmed keyboards and deeply unoriginal music. (In the most obvious instance, "Baby I Don't Care" is "Hang on Sloopy" with different words.) James' dissolute voice is already shot to hell, and the album should be an embarrassment to all concerned. [i]

TRASH CAN SINTRAS

Cake (Gol Discs-London) 1990 ◊

Proudly reclaiming the joyous pop sound of such early-'80s Postcard bands as the Bluebells, Orange Juice and Aztec Camera, this young Scottish quintet parlays a rush of ringing guitars and rich broguish harmonies into an exceptionally good debut album. Roger Bechirian and John Leckie each produced tracks on the pristine-sounding Cake, adding an occasional light brush of cool jazz to the folksy spines of the band's witty and agile tunes. While there might be a tad too much Morrissey in "The Best Man's Fall," songs like "Obscurity Knocks," "Only Tongue Can Tell" and "Thrupenny Tears" are calling cards of a bright new talent. [i]

TREAT HER RIGHT

Treat Her Right (Soul Selects) 1986 (RCA) 1988 •

Tied to the Tracks (RCA) 1989 •

PINK CADILLAC

Pink Cadillac EP (Alpha-Media) 1983

Not quite a blues band, not exactly swamp trash and too stylized for basic rock'n'roll, this Massachusetts quartet (which features David Champagne, formerly of Shane Champagne, a Rumour-like outfit which issued several singles around the turn of the decade, and Pink Cadillac, a sharp rockabilly-cum-rock'n'roll trio) uses guitar, slide guitar, harmonica, ultra-simple drumming and exotic taste in cover versions to come up with a hybrid that bears equally faint similarity to Creedence

Clearwater and the Violent Femmes. Before ending with a James Blood Ulmer (!) number, Treat Her Right explores some intriguing terrain of its own, hindered only by lyrics that rely on tough-guy clichés and get a bit dumb in spots.

Produced by Don Gehman, the stylish and self-assured Tied to the Tracks gives Captain Beefheart's "Hit a Man" the Treat Her Right treatment and surrounds it with strong and memorable originals individually written and sung by Champagne ("Picture of the Future") and Mark Sandman ("Marie," "Junkyard"), all given added juice by Jim Fitting's wailing harp work. [i]

TREES

Sleep Convention (MCA) 1982

A one-man synth army from San Diego, California, Dane Conover (here dubbed Trees) offers a wonderful collection of modern musical ideas and clever tunes that efficiently combine up-to-date electronics with old-fashioned rock instruments, tossing in inventive production and intelligent, provocative lyrics. Sleep Convention is a stunning debut which shows remarkable originality and talent. That this record died the commercial death is not just incomprehensible, it's criminal. [i]

TREPONEM PAL

Treponem Pal (RC-Roadracer) 1989 •

Aggravation (RC-Roadracer) 1991 •

Treponem Pal hates you. And your mother, your family and, from the sounds of it, everyone and everything else as well. Hatched in a country with a weak rock history, Treponem Pal formed in Paris in 1986, taking their name from a syphilis virus. While the quartet's brutal sound is rooted in the bludgeoning, beyond-metal grind of early Head of David, Voivod and Gore, singer Marco Neves (who says, in his best broken English, that "musically we enter in the person we hate") has a terrifically distinctive slasher-movie rasp and spews some of the most aggressive lyrics you'll encounter anywhere: a track on the first album (produced by Franz Treichler of the Young Gods) is called "Soft Mouth Vagina."

Aggravation offers an even more deeply distilled breed of hate, honed by an improved five-piece lineup and sharper production by Roli Mosimann (Swans, That Petrol Emotion, etc.). Once again, the band ventures deep into the heart of darkness and emerges, dripping blood and guts, wielding an evil grin and some horrible medieval torture device, harnessing the essence of fear and loathing with a power comparable to a Butthole Surfers live show. To underscore the album's ambience, a jolting cover of Kraftwerk's "Radioactivity" actually adds warmth. [ja]

TRIFFIDS

Treeless Plain (nr/Hot-Rough Trade) 1983

Raining Pleasure (nr/Hot-Rough Trade) 1984

Field of Glass (nr/Hot-Rough Trade) 1985

Love in Bright Landscapes (Hol. Hot-Megadisc) 1986

Born Sandy Devotional (Hot-Rough Trade) 1986

In the Pines (nr/Hot-Rough Trade) 1986
The Peel Sessions EP (nr/Strange Fruit) 1987
Calenture (Island) 1987 ●
Holy Water EP (nr/Island) 1988 ●
The Black Swan (nr/Island) 1989 ●
Goodbye Little Boy EP (nr/Island) 1989 ●
Falling Over You EP (nr/Island) 1989 ●
Live Stockholm (Swed. MNW) 1990 ●

LAWSON SQUARE INFIRMARY

Lawson Square Infirmary EP (Aus. Hot) 1984

Although based in London since 1984, this quintet originally hails from Perth, Australia. Their musical influences, however, are strictly American. Occasionally augmenting standard rock instrumentation with strings, trumpet and pedal steel, the Triffids manage a spacious country blues-meets-Television sound.

Raining Pleasure is a lightweight, lilting album with some nice songs and more-than-competent playing, but self-righteous lyrics decrying promiscuity and alcohol are pretty much ruinous. The preachy "Property Is Condemned" is almost worthy of a TV evangelist's seal of approval.

Treeless Plain and Field of Glass both have more bite—"My Baby Thinks She's a Train" (from the former) sounds like the best song Tom Verlaine never wrote. (Singer/songwriter David McComb's voice bears similarity to both Verlaine and Jim Morrison.) Most of the Triffids' best early material is on Love in Bright Landscapes, a Dutch compilation.

Gil Norton's production on Born Sandy Devotional is bigger and denser than that on prior releases; while it sounds just fine and is a natural progression, one wishes that McComb's maturing songwriting talents would be allowed to stand on their own a bit more. But on the other hand, it's kind of difficult for a six-piece band (with additional backing on strings, keyboards, vibes and vocals) to be minimalist.

In the Pines strips things back down; it was recorded on an 8-track in a wool-shearing shed in the Aussie outback on a tiny budget, most of which went for beer, wine and vodka. A lot of it sounds as though it was done live, and such immediacy suits the Triffids well.

On Calenture, the band's US/major-label debut, McComb's sensitive, personal visions are again all but obscured by Norton's big league gloss; this time the band's personality barely surfaces. There are plenty of good songs here, mind you, they're just hidden.

The Holy Water EP combines the title tracks from Calenture and Raining Pleasure with "Red Pony" from Treeless Plain and the band's cover of the Beatles' "Good Morning Good Morning" from the Sgt. Pepper Knew My Father benefit album.

The Black Swan finds the Triffids scrambling to come up with something new. The first side dabbles in country, nightclub jazz, off-center doo-wop, strangely arranged funk and even pseudo-rap ("Falling Over You," also the title cut of an EP). Arrangements are jammed with incongruous drum machines, bouzouki, operatic background vocals and electric cello (?). Side Two starts off with "The Clown Prince," which attempts to combine flamenco and French café accordion music. Who told them to try so hard? Just sounding like the Triffids should suffice. Despite quality material, The Black Swan ends up drowning in its own excesses. The live LP is a career-spanner: a dozen songs recorded in Sweden in 1989.

Compleatists will want the Peel Sessions EP: three songs from May 1985. True fans should also be on the lookout for the Triffids' pseudonymous releases under the name Lawson Square Infirmary. The 1984 12-inch is a bouncy visit to informal jug-band music: six enticing original folk songs winningly performed with low-key rustic rambunctiousness. [dgs/i]

TRIO

Trio (nr/Mobile Suit Corporation) 1982

Live im Frühjahr 82 [tape] (Ger. Mercury) 1982

Trio EP (Mercury) 1982

Trio and Error (Mercury) 1983

Bye Bye (Ger. Mercury) 1983 ●

Originally issued in Germany in 1981, Trio's Klaus Voorman-produced debut album was updated to include their European million-seller, "Da Da Da ich lieb dich nicht du liebst mich nicht aha aha aha." (With the lyrics redone in English, the song was popular in dance clubs outside Germany as well.) Compared to the rest of the album, though, the minimalist hit sounds nearly symphonic; Trio is basically guitar and drums behind monotonal (but bilingual) vocals. Lyrics are obsessed with lousy relationships and steeped in black humor—sometimes just blackness without the humor. But the band's brutally primitive sound announces itself first.

The cassette-only Live im Frühjahr 82 essentially reprises the album, emphasizing guitar for a hot sound, and includes between-song raps auf deutsch. The 12-inch Trio EP consists of five tracks from the album of the same name (including six-plus minutes of the English-language "Da Da Da") plus a later single, "Anna."

After that tentative step, Trio's American label took the plunge with Trio and Error, which also includes "Da Da Da"; the new material—almost all in English—is a little more musical and only a little less downbeat. But the naïveté is charming.

With Bye Bye, Trio departed roughly the same as they entered: simple, witty and sarcastic in two languages. A '50s revivalist spirit informs the crazed guitar work of "Ich lieb den Rock'n'Roll" and a constipated "Tutti Frutti"; for those with longer memories, Trio thoughtfully includes an (almost) reverent version of "Tooralooralooraloo." Full-scale production on "Out in the Streets" renders it the most routine-sounding track Trio ever recorded; others (e.g., the catchy "Immer Noch Einmal") are as deliciously spartan as ever. [si/i]

TRIPOD JIMMIE

Long Walk off a Short Pier (Do Speak) 1982

A Warning to All Strangers (All Ball) 1986

Tripod Jimmie, an Erie, Pennsylvania trio starring ex-Pere Ubu guitarist Tom Herman, inhabits a world of hypertense vocals and simple, rough, aggressive rock noise—an underground '80s revision of the power trio concept. Recorded "live on the shore of Lake Erie,"

Long Walk's eleven numbers display traces of Television, Ubu and Talking Heads—all essentially similarly minded organizations. Powerful and disquieting.

With better production and playing, A Warning to All Strangers organizes the trio's music into a concise attack that occasionally resembles the Minutemen. As diverse as it is emotionally intense, this anxiety-ridden collection (song titles are given under the heading "List of Worries") lurches from a barking contest to a James Brown funk breakdown to gibberish without skipping a groove. Over the rhythm section's propulsive chug, Herman's thrusting guitar chords and edgily confident shout-singing emboldens the bizarrely fascinating lyrics, making Tripod Jimmie's concerns seem very real and urgent. [i]

See also Pere Ubu.

TRIP SHAKESPEARE

Applehead Man (Gark) 1988 (Clean) 1988
Are You Shakespearied? (Gark) 1988 (Clean) 1989 •
The Crane EP (A&M) 1990
Across the Universe (A&M) 1990 •

This Minnesota combo mines an eclectic strain of rustic folk-pop, with an energetically quirky sound that's bohemian without being cutesy. Applehead Man is a spunky debut, with stylishly visceral lyrics and inventive melodies. Though the band—here a trio—doesn't yet possess the expertise to do full justice to Matt Wilson's surprisingly sophisticated compositions, the songs make it clear that this is a combo to watch.

Are You Shakespearied? shows increased depth and a more distinctive musical voice. With upgraded production and the addition of Wilson's brother Dan as second guitarist, Trip developed an approach that's both far-reaching and personal; ditto for their odd, homespun harmonies.

Across the Universe is a too-rare example of an indie act benefiting musically from major-label treatment. With Fred Maher co-producing, the quartet tightens its sound while maintaining its identity. A new version of "Pearle," originally recorded on Applehead Man, demonstrates how much Trip has grown; the playing is more confident and interactive than ever, with an increased rock edge that doesn't detract from the gentle charm of "Turtledove," "Gone, Gone, Gone," "Snow Days" (sung by bassist John Munson) and "The Crane." "The Crane" was also featured on an EP released prior to Across the Universe, along with three dandy live versions of older Trip tunes. [hd]

TRISOMIE 21

Million Lights (Play It Again Sam) 1987 •
Works (Play It Again Sam) 1989 •
T21 Plays the Pictures (Play It Again Sam) 1990 •

Although Trisomie 21 (whose lineup includes a full member credited with "advice and assistance") has an extensive back catalogue of records at home, America has only recently begun enjoying the French quartet's unsettling mutation of lush techno-pop with industrial dance ingredients. Alternating discrete songs with bilingual semi-tuneless vocals and Hervé Lomppez's intriguing instrumentals, Million Lights is a continually shifting soundscape, combining keyboards, guitar, per-ussion, sound effects and other elements in a nicely moderated loud/soft pleasant/disturbing environment that never turns sonically hostile.

Works, however, is a hapless stab at suave continental electro-pop (including, in "The Missing Piece," a futile attempt to copy New Order), an awful album that downplays the group's adventurous side to showcase Philippe Lomppez's inept crooning, a laughable approximation of Maurice Chevalier imitating Bryan Ferry. Besides a tendency to drift along aimlessly, like Pink Floyd at its most dissolute, the spare and delicately atmospheric Plays the Pictures—a concept album based around movies and their music—searches out surprising contrasts through frequent use of incongruous samples. [i]

TROTSKY ICEPICK

Poison Summer (Old Scratch) 1986 (SST) 1990 •
Baby (SST) 1988 •
Trotsky Icepick Presents Danny and the Doorknobs in
'Poison Summer' (SST) 1989
El Kabong (SST) 1989 •

DANNY AND THE DOORKNOBS

Poison Summer (Old Scratch) 1985

Formed by the unification of two talented veterans of the LA indie-rock scene—ex-100 Flowers guitarist/singer Kjeihl Johansen and ex-Last keyboardist/guitarist/singer Vitus Mataré—Trotsky Icepick began life as a trio (with ex-Last drummer John Frank), striking a workable stylistic compromise between the two fraternal bands. Rather than just play airy/edgy pop (friendlier than 100 Flowers and more modern than the Last), the group hit on a Big Concept: keep the same title for every album, and change the band name instead!

Recorded two years prior to its 1985 release, Danny and the Doorknobs' clear-vinyl Poison Summer is a neat little pop record—underproduced and haphazard, perhaps, but sprinkled with good songs (like the title track) and skillfully varied arrangements. (Granted a more explanatory title, this debut was later overhauled—replacing several tracks with vintage outtakes—remixed and reissued in an inferior sleeve as Trotsky Icepick Presents Danny and the Doorknobs in 'Poison Summer'.)

The second Poison Summer, an entirely different 1986 LP credited from the get-go to Trotsky Icepick, was recorded as a quartet in which the arrival of a keyboardist allowed Mataré to concentrate on guitar. Harmony vocals and improvements on every front—studio sound, twin-guitar arrangements, melodies, lyrics—make the LP a treat, a crisply uncommercial demonstration of unstylized pop with intelligently offbeat lyrics.

Abandoning the name game and dispensing with keyboards entirely, Mataré and Johansen then drafted two new bandmates—ex-Leaving Trains drummer Jason Kahn and ex-Last bassist/guitarist John Rosewell—for Baby, a louder, thicker rock album of tuneful songs about hated crooners ("Bury Manilow"), lost loves ("Mar Vista Bus Stop," the fingerpicked folk of "Robotussin Rag") and the evils of advertising ("Don't Buy It").

Upon Kahn's departure (to join the Universal Congress Of), the Trotskys absorbed another Last alumnus (drummer Hunter Crowley, a sorry substitute) and another 100 Flowers alumnus (singer John Talley-Jones, a solid asset). Thus constituted, the quintet made El Kabong, a well-integrated blend of fascinating lyrics and intricately textured catchy guitar rock. Besides a cover of Magazine's "The Light Pours Out of Me," TI takes another swipe at rampant consumerism ("The Conveniences of Life") and explores bizarre corners of the imagination in weird character studies. (The CD has three bonus tracks.) [i]

See also Last, 100 Flowers.

TROUBLE FUNK

Drop the Bomb (Sugar Hill) 1982

In Times of Trouble (D.E.T.T.) 1983

Saturday Night Live! from Washington DC (Island) 1985

Trouble Over Here Trouble Over There (Island) 1987 •

Trouble Funk belongs to Washington DC's go-go scene. Go-go is a throwback to percussive, endless-groove funk that sacrifices structure, production and slickness for loose feeling and community involvement. The bands—basically fluid rhythm sections with a few added frills—do their thing while the musicians and audience yell a whole lot of nonsense (like "Let's get small, y'all" or "Drop the bomb!") The funk is solidly Southern, with a strong James Brown flavor and tons of sloppy percussion. In no other North American music does the cowbell play such a major role.

Chuck Brown, father of go-go, developed it from drum breakdowns which he used in clubs to link Top 40 covers. Not surprisingly, he found people were grooving more on these bridges than the songs. Go-go has grown concurrently (though not as popularly) with hip-hop, and offers a spirited group alternative to beatbox isolationism. The unsophisticated grooves began to break out nationwide in '85, and Trouble Funk were quickly established as one of the genre's leaders. (They were, however, eclipsed in 1988, when E.U. had a huge smash with "Da' Butt," a number originally created for Spike Lee's School Daze.)

Drop the Bomb is a seminal go-go album because it was released by Sugar Hill, home of the uptown rap set. Virtually all prior go-go releases were on Washington's local T.T.E.D. (aka D.E.T.T.) label. Bronx DJs used to find the discs and soak the labels off to keep audiences (and competitors) from learning what they were playing; Drop the Bomb gave everyone a chance to get go-go. It also produced two classic tracks: the title tune and the monster 12-inch, "Hey Fellas." Both are wet, sticky and great for dancing. Spin them and you're part of the party.

In Times of Trouble is like two separate albums. The two sides of studio material have nowhere near the juice of the debut. The other two contain long live jams that sum up the scene. The band maintains a low-tech groove, and the four lead singers move the jam along with a lot of assistance from the crowd. It's not like the Godfather of Soul's side-long live medleys because Trouble Funk doesn't do songs: just a hot bottom, some rolling percussion, a couple of tag phrases and a lot of audience participation. The ultimate funk spirit of these sides is intoxicating. Saturday Night continues the fun with six long, generic demi-instrumentals (and a couple of shorter shards) wisely cut live in front of an enthusiastically cooperative crowd. Cue it up and move!

The title of Trouble Over Here is prophetic, as T-Funk rides off the rails in a fit of misguided stylistic ambition. With production and performing assistance by Bootsy Collins and Kurtis Blow, the studio grooves are gussied up in defiance of the band's traditional limber unpretentiousness. The familiarly mobilizing rumble'n'-shuffle bottom is intact, but the attempt to turn the grooves into songs busies up the business and blunts the infectious impact. [j/i]

JOHN TRUBEE AND THE UGLY JANITORS OF AMERICA

The Communists Are Coming to Kill Us! (Enigma) 1984

The Deserts of Utah [tape] (Space & Time) 1985

Naked Teenage Girls from Outer Space (Restless) 1985

Strange Hippie Sex Carnival (Ger. Musical Tragedies) 1990

Best known for his inspired 1984 novelty single "A Blind Man's Penis"—a deranged spume of dada vulgarity given an inanelly straight country-western reading by one of those songs-from-your-lyrics mail-order companies—guitarist/keyboardist John Van Zelm Trubee, a frequent Zoogz Rift associate, has assembled several albums of his crank phone calls, puerile rants, rude noises and misanthropically deranged musical efforts. The Communists Are Coming to Kill Us!, which collects up odds and ends dating from the mid-'70s through the mid-'80s, is intermittently listenable but more frequently an offensive embarrassment.

Well on the way to working out his juvenile fixations, Trubee comes nearly correct on Naked Teenage Girls from Outer Space, a relatively serious jazz/rock horns'n'guitars album with perfectly reasonable—actually quite attractive—instrumentals and a few songs which manage to avoid such previously typical subject matter as genitalia and regurgitation. Even one raucous noise-fest makes some artistic sense. If not for the inclusion of a couple of obnoxious telephone pranks, Trubee's creepy past would seem to be entirely behind him. [i]

See also Zoogz Rift.

TRUE BELIEVERS

True Believers (Rounder-EMI America) 1986

Rank and File grad Alejandro Escovedo (guitar/vocals) and his brother Javier (guitar/vocals) spearheaded this unjustly overlooked band and album—a bristling brew of big-beat rock, rockabilly-influenced rhythms and sweaty ol' noise. The stomping "Hard Road," sexy "So Blue About You" and the country tang of "We're Wrong" deliver what they promise, meaning cathartic rock'n'roll that doesn't insult your intelligence. Jim Dickinson (Replacements, Panther Burns) produced. [j/y]

See also Rank and File.

TRUE SOUNDS OF LIBERTY (TSOL)

T.S.O.L. EP (Posh Boy) 1981

Dance with Me (Frontier) 1981

Beneath the Shadows (Alternative Tentacles) 1982 (Restless) 1989 •

Change Today? (Enigma) 1984 ●
Revenge (Enigma) 1986 ●
Thoughts of Yesterday 1981–1982 (Posh Boy) 1987 ●
Hit and Run (Enigma) 1987 ●
TSOL Live (Restless) 1988 ◊
Strange Love (Enigma) 1990 ◊

CATHEDRAL OF TEARS

Cathedral of Tears EP (Enigma) 1984

TENDER FURY

Tender Fury (Posh Boy) 1988 ●
Garden of Evil (Triple X) 1990 ●

True Sounds of Liberty exploded out of Long Beach in 1978 to become one of Southern California's premier hardcore bands. Their first vinyl foray is a tough, politically inspired five-song EP that bristles with excitement. Ron Emory's thrashing guitar provides a steady foundation for vocalist Jack Greggors, credited on the sleeve with "mouth and other organs." These fine songs, like "Abolish Government/Silent Majority," are super hot.

Moving from Posh Boy to Frontier, TSOL made other changes as well. For one thing, Greggors changed his name to Alex Morgon; more importantly, the group abandoned politics to join the trendy horror/shock-rock movement. Along with a cover depicting the grim reaper in a boneyard, the lyrical themes of Dance with Me are largely those of B-movie scare flicks, and nearly as much fun. While other bands have proven useless at this genre, TSOL succeed because their brutal, razor-edge sound keeps its musical conviction, regardless of the subject matter.

Volatility is a TSOL hallmark. Beneath the Shad-ows introduces a third label, an added keyboard player and a new drummer (plus a "new" vocalist named Jack Delauge taking over for Morgon). Oh, and they also sound totally different. Dropping any remaining connection with hardcore, this newly refined approach takes the group on a neo-psychedelic trip, but with bonus amounts of rock drive and character. A great record from an always surprising band.

Singer Jack Takeyourpick selected another surname (Loyd) and joined Cathedral of Tears, which issued a weirdly commercial six-song mini-album—raunchy guitars, synthesizers and a danceable resemblance to both the Cult and Dead or Alive.

The aptly named Change Today? unveils another stage in TSOL's ongoing impermanence: a new label and two new members. Stalwart guitarist Ron Emory and bassist Mike Roche are joined by Joe Wood (guitar/vocals) and Mitch Dean (drums). Fielding a whopping near-punk rock sound, the foursome is aggressive, coherent and lucid, singing shapeless, insubstantial songs that pack a sonic wallop if nothing else. Not a bad record, but not a primo effort.

Remarkably retaining both lineup and label, TSOL issued Revenge, a powerful LP that shows the group still vital and active. The mixture of Alice Cooper/Golden Earring-styled '70s arena rock and traditional LA punk (with a dollop of X-into-the Doors on the title track) could have soared with better (or at least more consistent) material, but there's nothing wrong with the self-assured, energetic performances. (Incidentally, Revenge includes a new song entitled "Change Today.")

Thoughts of Yesterday—a reissue of the first EP with the added bonus of 1982's terrific genre-defying Weathered Statues 7-inch EP and a speedier alternate version of Dance with Me's "Peace Thru Power"—is an essential document of a once-great band. Just try to keep from laughing at the embarrassingly fawning liner notes from label head Robbie Fields. (A bunch of tracks from punkrockers Pariah fill out the CD.)

By Hit and Run, TSOL's mutation from hardcore standard-bearers through progressive new wavers into tattooed blues-metal boys was complete, resulting in a record of rote fist-punchers, vigorously delivered but tired-sounding all the same. On TSOL Live (recorded at a California date in January '88), the band sloughs off a full set of Change Today-forward originals as well as who-cares covers of "All Along the Watchtower" and "Roadhouse Blues." Well-recorded, but pretty tepid.

Emory left the group during the recording of Strange Love, and Roche took a walk on the eve of its release, leaving TSOL with no original members. This John Jansen production is a joke—lame minor-league metal replete with stock leather'n'love clichés and sluggish playing.

In the late '80s, original TSOL mouthpiece (now billed as Jack Grisham) and skins-pounder Todd Barnes reappeared with a metal-gilded project of their own, Tender Fury. The eponymous debut (produced by Bad Religion guitarist Brett Gurewitz) is thin-sounding punky (but definitely not punk) rock, augmented on some fairly hooky tunes by Daniel Root's incendiary riffing and Barnes' solid drumming. In all, a not-bad effort that will come as a surprise to punkers who never thought they'd be hearing West Coast hardcore legend Grisham croon the word "baby."

Barnes and bassist Robbie Allen are conspicuously absent from Garden of Evil, Tender Fury's awful follow-up, produced by Hunt Sales. Half-written songs and Grisham's annoyingly hyperdramatic vocals sink this effort, though the title track is a catchy chunk of no-brainer hard-rock. [cpl/i/db]

TRUE WEST

True West EP (Bring Out Your Dead) 1983
Hollywood Holiday (Fr. New Rose) 1983 ●
Drifters (PVC) 1984 ●
Hand of Fate (CD Presents) 1986
West Side Story (Skyclad) 1989
TV Western EP (Skyclad) 1990
Best Western EP [CD] (Skyclad) 1990 ●

FOOL KILLERS

Out of State Plates (Mad Rover) 1989 ●

True West may have been part of California's psychedelic underground, but the Davis quintet definitely had a sound and style all its own. Drawing inspiration from Syd Barrett (the band's first release was a single of his "Lucifer Sam," reprised on the EP) and Roky Erickson, they played a frenetic, dense drone with crazed guitars and dramatic vocals.

Co-produced by guitarist Russ Tolman and Dream Syndicate's Steve Wynn, True West is a rough, marvelous record—five slices of chaos that kick out nostalgia in favor of powerful rock with a dark, threatening ambience. Echo-laden sound gives tunes like "Hollywood Holiday" and "Steps to the Door" an unsettling noise/chaos level that considerably heightens their tension. Hollywood Holiday contains the entire EP plus three more-sophisticated tracks subsequently recorded with a new rhythm section. (New Rose later included Hollywood Holiday on its CD of Drifters.)

Drummer Jozef Becker left to rejoin Thun White Rope; True West recorded the Drifters album with his not-so-good replacement. The nine new songs (reprising "And Then the Rain" from the French LP) showcase Gavin Blair's vocals as much as Tolman's inventive, original guitar work. A strikingly good record that escapes the strictures of neo-psychedelia by incorporating folk-rock ambience, Drifters retains just enough raw-edged aggression to keep things from getting unacceptably melodious. "Look Around" is the clear standout, but other numbers—"Shot You Down" and "Hold On," for instance—also marry engaging sound and arrangements to solid songwriting.

After losing Tolman (and with him their edge), True West pressed on as a quartet. Despite compensatory efforts—the countryish Hand of Fate receives valuable guitar assistance from Matt Pucci (Rain Parade) and Chuck Prophet (Green on Red)—Tolman's departure had a major negative impact on True West. The record is by no means bad, just colorless. A careful, nostalgic cover of the Yardbirds' "Happenings Ten Years' Time Ago" lacks the energy surge needed to justify the effort.

True West broke up in 1987; West Side Story is a posthumous patchwork of previously unreleased studio efforts and medium-fi live performances, including fiery run-throughs of "Hollywood Holiday" and the Stooges' "1969." While there are a few finds ("Free Men Own Guns") among the outtakes, the generally disappointing material and inadequate sound quality make this a meager career appendix.

On the other hand, the 1983 demos (produced, with clear stylistic impact, by Tom Verlaine) that are on the Best Western CD are among the band's most striking work: an intense, lead-guitar-spiked pre-Drifters version of "Look Around," a clearer second rendition of Hollywood Holiday's "Throw Away the Key" (with Becker turning in drastically improved drumming) and a fine studio take of West Side Story's "Burn the Roses." The vinyl-only TV Western (any puns left?) pairs some of those tracks with an exciting trio of live items from 1985.

Singer Gavin Blair and guitarist Richard McGrath remained together after True West and became Fool Killers. Out of State Plates adds a country undercurrent, a Stonesque side and occasional acoustic instrumentation to the remnants of True West's measured drama, but winds up slow-moving and dull, with only a handful of lively tunes to brighten the ride. [i]

See also Russ Tolman.

TRUTH

Five Live EP (nr/IRS) 1984

Playground (IRS) 1985

Weapons of Love (IRS) 1987 •

Jump (IRS) 1989 •

Leaving behind the constricted scope of Nine Below Zero's skinny-tie R&B revivalism, singer/guitarist Dennis Greaves formed the Truth and proceeded to follow the Style Council's lead in updating '60s soul (Hammond organ, doo-wop vocal backing, shingaling rhythms) for an audience unlikely to know or care that much about the originals. After the introductory Five Live EP, Playground is a fine album of intelligent, tasteful originals played with real character and a minimum of self-consciousness. Of special note: "Exception of Love," "I'm in Tune" (an exciting raveup) and the title track, a straight rocker.

Weapons of Love finds Greaves suffering from burgeoning Robert Palmer delusions and transparent commercial aspirations. The bombastic album veers wildly from one dodgy style (INXS, U2, etc.) to another, with nary a glimmer of originality or dignity. This is the Truth, eh?

If you can get past the spot-on Bryan Adams imitation and the cliché-addled lyrics, Jump isn't that bad an exemplar of easy listening commercial rock. Avoid the bombastic version of Argent's "God Gave Rock & Roll to You" (wasn't '70s radio great?); most of Greaves' originals would sound fine coming out of a car radio.

See also Nine Below Zero. [i]

TRYPES

See Feelies.

MASAMI TSUCHIYA

See Ippu-Do.

TUBEWAY ARMY

See Gary Numan.

MAUREN TUCKER

Playin' Possum (Trash) 1981

MOE TUCKER

MoeJadKateBarry EP (50 Skidillion Watts) 1987

Life in Exile After Abdication (50 Skidillion Watts) 1989 •

In 1981, original Velvet Underground drummer Maureen (Moe) Tucker released a one-woman album on her own Trash Records. The frantic guitar playing and cluttered sound on Playin' Possum could have come straight from sessions for the first Velvets album, if you can imagine that band playing "Slippin' and Slidin'," "Bo Diddley" and other oldies.

Tucker subsequently joined forces with a label run by rich'n'famous rock dilettante Penn Jillette and Florida's hardworking Velvet Underground Appreciation Society. Motley as hell but reeking with credibility and unpolished spirit, the wonderful MoeJadKateBarry EP (pressed on red vinyl) was recorded in six hours in a garage (how's that for poetic justice). Jad Fair (vocals) of Half Japanese and two young locals (on bass and guitar) join in for the 1986 date; the five songs cover VU obscurities ("Guess I'm Falling in Love," "Hey, Mr. Rain," "Why Don't You Smile Now"), a Jimmy Reed blues ("Baby What You Want Me to Do") and an impromptu instrumental, "Jad Is a Fink." In her own simple way, Tucker has kept the Velvets' legacy alive better than anyone else.

With the involvement of Lou Reed, Jad Fair, Daniel Johnston and Sonic Youth making it an historically significant reunion, as well as a profound inter-generational meeting of prophet and disciple, Tucker's loose and unpredictable Life in Exile offers a little of everything, all performed and recorded with ramshackle casualness. There's wall-rattling noise, acoustic folk ("Goodnight Irene"), rock'n'roll (a five-minute return visit to "Bo Diddley" with Sonic Youth's rhythm section), even a whispery version of Reed's "Pale Blue Eyes." Tucker's charmingly amateurish originals include a droning guitar/piano tribute to Andy Warhol. (A subsequent three-song single combines an album track and two outtakes from the sessions.) [si/i]

See also Half Japanese, Velvet Underground.

TUFF DARTS

Tuff Darts! (Sire) 1978

New York's Tuff Darts will probably be best remembered (if at all) as a résumé item for Robert Gordon, who was the glam-punk band's original singer in 1976. Although he did record as a Dart on the Live at CBGB's compilation, Gordon was long gone by the time the band made an album of its own two years later. (The band was on hold for part of that time while guitarist/leader Jeff Salen played with Sparks.)

The Darts—a junior-league rock band with a penchant for gangster clothes—had a total of two good songs, both of which are included on the LP. Otherwise, the record ranges from simply bad to truly wretched, as on the moronic "(Your Love Is Like) Nuclear Waste."

See also Robert Gordon. [i]

NIK TURNER

See Hawkwind.

TUXEDOMOON

No Tears EP (Time Release) 1978 (nr/CramBoy) 1985

Scream with a View EP (nr/Pre) 1979 (Bel. CramBoy) 1985

Half Mute (Ralph) 1980 (nr/CramBoy) 1985 •

Desire (Ralph) 1981 (nr/CramBoy) 1985 •

Divine (nr/Operation Twilight) 1982

A Thousand Lives by Picture (Ralph) 1983

Holy Wars (Restless) 1985 •

Ship of Fools (Restless) 1986

You (nr/CramBoy) 1987 •

Pinheads on the Move (nr/CramBoy) 1987 •

Suite en Sous-Sol—Time to Lose (Bel. Crammed Discs) 1987 •

The Ghost Sonata (Bel. Crépuscule) 1991 •

BLAINE L. REININGER/MIKEL ROUSE

Colorado Suite EP (Bel. Made to Measure) 1984 •

BLAINE L. REININGER

Instrumentals 1982–86 (nr/Interior) 1987

Byzantium (Bel. Crépuscule) 1987

Live in Brussels 82–86 (Bel. Crépuscule) 1987 •

Broken Fingers (Bel. Crépuscule) 1988 •

Book of Hours (Bel. Crépuscule) 1989 •

expatriate journals (Giant) 1989 •

PETER PRINCIPLE

Sedimental Journey (Bel. Made to Measure) 1985 •

Tone Poems (Bel. Made to Measure) 1988 •

WINSTON TONG

Theoretically Chinese (Bel. Crépuscule) 1985 •

Pioneers in performance-oriented synthesizer music, Tuxedomoon started out in San Francisco at the very beginning of that city's punk upsurge. The mercurial aggregate of musicians and artists later relocated to Belgium and became a leading light in the international post-rock avant-garde. Sidestepping the mistakes of many early synthesizer bands, Tuxmoon leavened their attack with sax and violin and were quick to integrate electronic percussion as a true substitute for real drums.

Prior to their Ralph records, Tuxedomoon had released singles and EPs on their own label. No Tears, a four-cut EP, is an early new wave DIY effort, which sounds coyly dated but still exciting at the time of its reissue seven years later. It was immediately obvious that Tuxedomoon was a step apart from many other bands of the era. Winston Tong had been a mime, and brought a theatrical approach to singing; plenty of synths and electronic percussion (when they were still called rhythm boxes) dominate, violin gets some use and two of the songs exceed the five-minute mark. The succeeding Scream with a View (also four songs) is noticeably more art-damaged; itemization of instrumentation cites parallel thirds guitar, vocal concept, six-part doo-wahs and CB interference. In retrospect, this release makes obvious the direction in which they were headed.

Half Mute is a balanced assemblage of pop ("What Use?"), futuristic chamber music ("Tritone") and impressionistic sound collages ("James Whale"). Desire is a generally unsatisfying follow-up, save for a sneaky parody of "Holiday for Strings" entitled "Holiday for Plywood." Divine, the score for a Maurice Béjart ballet, jettisons the synth beat that makes their best work so attractive. A Thousand Lives by Picture is a compilation of tracks previously issued on Ralph.

By the time of Ship of Fools, only Principle and singer/multi-instrumentalist Steven Brown remained from the original lineup. Trading in clever humor for selfconscious artiness (always just beneath the surface anyway), the LP falls flat on its face, especially on the second side, where the band proffers "pieces" rather than songs; titles include "A Piano Solo," "Lowlands Tone Poem" and "Music for Piano + Guitar." Flirting with both light jazz and 20th-century classical styles without getting much of a grip on either, the music is about as creative as the nomenclature.

You is a squeaky-clean, virtually bloodless record of meandering jazz-rock fusion with lots of mellow trumpet and sax riffs. Yuck. In "Never Ending Story," we're told "This is only the beginning of a long story that will take many more songs to tell." I'm not sure if I've heard it before, but I'll stop you anyway. Side Two introduces a Twilight Zone-style three-part yarn spoken with minimalist backing. Skip it.

Pinheads on the Move is a two-disc compilation dating all the way back to the band's California beginnings (the title song was their first 45) and contains singles, B-sides, rehearsals, live tracks and jingles for radio programs. Most of the material and performances date from 1977-'79, and the lengthy liner notes (an excerpt from an Italian book about the band) provide an intensive history lesson.

Tuxedomoon continues to eschew the commercial success they likely could achieve; meanwhile, the members have undertaken many outside projects. Violinist Blaine L. Reininger, Tuxmoon's co-founder, recorded Colorado Suite with Mikel Rouse of Tirez Tirez in 1984 as part of Crammed's Made to Measure series. The four-track, 28-minute mini-LP of a performance piece is similar to Philip Glass in its bright timbre and repetitive motifs but lacks Glass' technique of introducing changes so subtly that they're barely noticeable. This suite goes for a little while on one riff, then another similar one, then another and so on, often with Reininger's violin counterpoint dominating. Not a winner.

Reininger's Live In Brussels 82-86 contains defensive, descending liner notes and credits him with vocals, violin, keyboards, Captain Beefheart impersonations and snide comments. Okay. The sound—a well-played synthesized mélange, not dissimilar to early electro-pop à la Ultravox—only gets to be rough going when the vocals turn overly pretentious.

Book of Hours is an intelligent collection of songs driven by synths and guitars, but Reininger's full-of-himself voice cancels out much of what's in the plus column. An ill-advised cover of Marty Robbins' "El Paso" sounds more like a Las Vegas arrangement, and there are too many cuts with plodding tempos. Steve Brown of Tuxmoon guests.

expatriate journals is a compilation of this prolific artist's work, some of it good ("Birthday Song"), some of it weak ("El Paso" again), some of it indicative of a taste for Eurochic ("A Cafe au Lait for Mr. MXYZPTLK" and "Ralf and Florian Go Hawaiian," a song about half of Kraftwerk on holiday). Overall, an admirable showcase for Reininger's versatility.

About half of Sedimental Journey, bassist Peter Principle's first solo record (also from the Made to Measure collection), is a video film soundtrack. The one-man show is stylistically similar to the off-center pop of the first two Tuxedomoon albums—lots of mild synth dissonance with found voices drifting around. Agreeable enough, but nothing the band hasn't already accomplished.

Tong's solo album, Theoretically Chinese, features an all-star cast, including New Order's Steve Morris, ex-Magazine keyboardist Dave Formula, Jah Wobble, A Certain Ratio's Simon Topping; then-Associate Alan Rankine produced. Although literary name-dropping under the guise of inspiration is a little annoying, working with a different cast suits Tong well. The LP combines artsy dance cuts with deliberate electronic tone poems; although Tong is sometimes strangely buried in the mix, he seems in control of the proceedings. A Eurodance version of Marianne Faithful's "Broken English" concludes the album. [rmp/dgs]

See also Tirez Tirez.

24-7 SPYZ

Harder Than You (In-Effect) 1989 •
Gumbo Millennium (In-Effect) 1990 •

Although largely hidden in the sudden explosion of late-'80s thrash-funk combos, this exceptional New York quartet is virtually everything Living Colour would be if Vernon Reid weren't such an overachieving technician and Corey Glover didn't take himself so seriously. Jimi Hazel can play guitar in a variety of speed-metal, jazzbuster and post-funk styles, but spends his time contributing to the songs rather than trying to escape them with flash solos; the rhythm section moves easily from junior-gods-of-thunder to thumb-popping bass and irresistible sacroiliac adjustments. Capping it all off, singer Peter Fluid sings his lyrical mixture of African-American culture, cogent politics and punky stupidity with confidence and power.

Harder Than You is a mighty and confident debut that unabashedly pays loving respect to an influential relative ("Grandma Dynamite"), covers Black Uhuru without making a big fuss ("Sponji Reggae"), gets dumb and dirty ("New Drug"), offers a striking condemnation of the anti-democratic violence in Haiti ("Ballots Not Bullets") and rocks from wall to wall.

Employing an uninhibited stylistic palette that seems to reflect whatever springs into the Spyz's collective consciousness at any given moment, Gumbo Millennium winds up retreating to opposite corners of relatively serious hard-rock (still with pungent political/personal lyrics, but now employing a thick, hardened metal-cum-hardcore sound) and flaky digressions that don't really add up to an album. Individual tracks—like the cool fusion groove of "Dude U Knew," the ska-beat "Culo Posse" and the throbbing world report of "We'll Have Power"—are fine, but the band needs a strong outside force to focus it all into a cohesive package. Fluid and drummer Anthony Johnson left at the end of '90 and were replaced by, respectively, Jeff Broadnax and Joel Maitoza. [i]

27 VARIOUS

Hi. (Susstones) 1987

Yes, Indeed (Susstones) 1989

Approximately (Clean-Twin/Tone) 1990 •

Debuting as a flip pop-rock duo, Minneapolis' 27 Various used the magic of overdubbing to assemble a complete guitar-band sound on the amateurishly inventive Hi. Clever songs (the vituperative "Principal Percival" and "Tempermental Artist," the trippy "Venetian Blinds"), nice instrumental touches and a variety of styles (including drone mod psychedelia and Something Else-era Kinks) suggest witty possibilities but don't quite add up.

Jettisoning the first album's topical humor and haphazard approaches, singer-guitarist-songwriter Ed Ackerson and drummer Jed Mayer drafted two new members and planted their feet firmly in the '60s on the well-produced Yes, Indeed. With songs like "Feedtime for Martin" and "Stick It in and Bake It," the mild-mannered quartet's accomplished mix of lightweight garage psychedelia and offbeat Anglo-pop avoids overt nostalgia in favor of more intriguingly idiosyncratic designs.

Slimming down to a trio, 27 Various came into its own on Approximately, an ace collection of striking songs and confident performances. Most of the tracks aren't any more derivative than the Byrdsy connotation of 12-string guitars on "I Feel Damage(d)" and "Like the Poison." But "You Look a Treat" revisits the lighter side of Their Satanic Majesties Request with flair, and "The Things I Wasn't Supposed to See" takes off from a couple of Beatles songs, including "She Said She Said." More than the sum of its borrowings, Approximately knows better than to dwell entirely in the past. [i]

23 SKIDOO

Seven Songs EP (nr/Fetish) 1982 (nr/Illuminated) 1985
Tearing Up the Plans EP (nr/Pineapple-Fetish) 1982
The Culling Is Coming (nr/Operation Twilight) 1983 (Bel. Laylah) 1988
Urban Gamelan (nr/Illuminated) 1984
Just Like Everybody (nr/Bleeding Chin) 1986

One of England's most daringly experimental post-punk bands, 23 Skidoo are friendly with the members of Cabaret Voltaire; the two outfits once entertained thoughts of merging. But while 23 Skidoo's early avant-dancefloor style was similar to the Cabs', they've always maintained a closer link to both free-form improvisation and non-Western idioms, especially in their later work.

Seven Songs (which lists eight tracks, has nine and was reissued with twelve) is a near-brilliant fusion of funk, tape tricks and African percussion. The band switches gears effortlessly between different-yet-accessible dance tracks like "Vegas el Bandito," the ethnomusicology of "Quiet Pillage" and sound collages ("Mary's Operation"). Tearing Up the Plans continues in much the same vein.

On The Culling Is Coming, 23 Skidoo gets too obscure for its own good. The first side, recorded live at the WOMAD Festival, is a mish-mash of tape loops, random percussion and primitive horn honks which sound like dying animals and add up to third-rate Stockhausen. Side Two utilizes Balinese gamelans (tuned gongs of a sort) and sounds better thought-out. Urban Gamelan is a stronger album, livelier and less esoteric. As the title implies, real gamelans aren't used, but glass jugs and carbon-dioxide cylinders are. 23 Skidoo will never enjoy wide-scale popularity, but they are an earnest, disciplined band which makes uncompromising music. Just Like Everybody is a compilation. [dgs]
See also Current 93.

22-PISTEPIRKKO

The Kings of Hong Kong (Fin. Pygmi) 1987
Bare Bone Nest (nr/Spirit-Sonet) 1990

Since debuting with a 1985 single, this trio from Finland ("22-ladybug") has taken American country, blues and psychedelia as leaping-off points to much stranger experimentation. The first album is mostly infectious garage pop powered by a roller-rink Farfisa organ, except for "Don't Try to Tease Me," which re-imagines Hank Williams with a weird accent and bizarre production values. Frontman P.K. Keränen sings bad English in one of the most endearingly odd voices this side of Daniel Johnston.

Bare Bone Nest finds the band moving into surreal fractured-blues territory where Giant Sand and Captain Beefheart might be neighbors. "Shot Bayou" is a haunting nocturne with a slide guitar and waves breaking on a beach; "Round Table Blues" layers traffic sounds, tablas and a sampled Armenian duduk over an acoustic Bo Diddley jangle before segueing into a dusty Texas two-step; if that's not enough, the closing track is an extended feedback opera that purports to tell a birds-versus-bulldozers environmental story. Intoxicating and well worth seeking out. [ws]

TWINK

See Bevis Frond, Social Deviants.

TWISTED ROOTS

See D.C.3.

2 LIVE CREW

The 2 Live Crew Is What We Are (Luke Skyywalker) 1986 (Luke) 1989 + 1991 •
Move Somethin' (Luke Skyywalker) 1987 (Luke) 1989 + 1991 •
As Nasty as They Wanna Be (Luke Skyywalker) 1989 (Luke) 1989 •
As Clean as They Wanna Be (Luke Skyywalker) 1989 (Luke) 1989 + 1991 •
Live in Concert (Effect) 1990 •

LUTHER CAMPBELL FEATURING THE 2 LIVE CREW

Banned in the U.S.A. (Luke-Atlantic) 1990 •

As the catalyst for a terrifying governmental attempt to censor ostensibly obscene musical expression—making it a crime in some districts to tell a dirty story with a beat—Luther Campbell, leader of the 2 Live Crew and owner of Luke (formerly Luke Skyywalker) Records, has followed Larry Flynt into the free-speech history books as another crude sleazemonger of trivial artistic merit whose prosecution nonetheless threatens basic constitutional freedoms. What Miami's 2 Live Crew does is hardly new (check old party records by Blowfly or Redd Foxx for historical precedents), but rap's enormous word-of-mouth audience turned what should have remained a fringe novelty for Hustler readers into a massively popular (and, unfortunately, influential) pop phenomenon. Coupled with Southern fear of a black planet, that was all it took to bring the 2 Live Crew into the crosshairs of a hysterical judiciary, resulting in the group's third album being outlawed in some counties of Southeastern Florida in June 1990.

The Crew's amateurish first album sets the basic parameters: simple boomin' tracks (the Miami sound generally uses ultra-deep synth bass as the rhythmic foundation) with scratches, obvious samples and energetic dance-party rhymes, several of which crudely discuss the group's hobby (e.g., "We Want Some P—-sy!!").

Besides his improving production skills, Campbell's serious marketing savvy emerged on Move Somethin', the first 2 Live Crew record to be released in both clean and dirty versions. Brother Marquis and Fresh Kid Ice make a game effort to make the expurgated version work (actually, the rewriting isn't noticeably awkward), but it winds up being a party without a bottle opener.

An emboldened and meaner-sounding Crew reached its dubious apex on the overwhelming As Nasty as They Wanna Be double-album and its expurgated single-album extract, As Clean as They Wanna Be. Although the notorious "Me So Horny"—a catchy sexcapade built around a hooker's line bitten from Full Metal Jacket—is fairly innocuous, other numbers like “Put Her in the Buck” and “The Fuck Shop” (which uses guitar lines from Guns n’ Roses as well as the Music Explosion) are as obsessively animalistic as the most violent porno movie. That people enjoy such nauseating garbage is a really sad comment on the state of American culture. Clean adds a goofy frat-styled parody of Roy Orbison’s “Pretty Woman” and manages to do an occasionally clever job of sanitizing “Me So Horny” and reworking tracks like “The Funk Shop.” Still, the songs are about what they’re about, and the euphemisms leave little doubt as to what’s not being said.

With official attacks on Nasty turning the 2 Live Crew into a cause célèbre, the unrepentant group revamped Bruce Springsteen’s “Born in the U.S.A.” with specifically topical lyrics and used it as the lead-off track of Banned in the U.S.A., which brought Luke under Atlantic’s distribution wing. Otherwise, the album jumps back and forth between raps about the legal battle (with relevant audio actualities and fictional narration) and the Crew’s traditional paeans to bodies and boning. A very strange blend but, under such weird circumstances, probably as logical as they’re gonna be.

The live album—apparently the first-ever full-length rap concert LP—is a poorly recorded cattle call, in which Luke and the boys deliver a selection of their crudest sex raps (plus a couple of previously unrecorded sure-to-be-classics) to an enthusiastic Phoenix crowd. (Interesting choice of venue.) Regardless of the band’s ultimate place in history, the sound of an audience cheering “Head! Booty! Cock!” is unquestionably a cultural low. [i]

TWO NICE GIRLS

2 Nice Girls (Rough Trade) 1989 •

Like a Version EP (Rough Trade) 1990 •

Chloe Liked Olivia (Rough Trade) 1991 •

Two Nice Girls began in 1985 as the duo of Gretchen Phillips (vocals/guitar) and Laurie Freeloove (vocals/guitar). Joined by Kathy Korniloff (vocals/bass/guitar), they won Austin’s “Sweet Jane” contest with a gorgeous, meditative version that interpolated Joan Armatrading’s “Love and Affection” into the Lou Reed classic.

That medley appears on the trio’s delightful debut album, along with a tasteful cover of Jane Siberry’s “Follow Me” and a batch of fine Phillips and Freeloove originals. The Girls’ uncategorizable sound draws on folk, rock, bluegrass, cajun and jazz, all woven together with great warmth and virtuosity. (The sleeve credits D. Boon and Nina Simone as inspirations, along with the Shaggs, Slits and Throwing Muses.) But the group’s primary appeal lies in its angelic harmonies, wry humor and durable songwriting.

Freeloove, who had written two of the album’s highlights (“Looking Out” and “Heaven on Earth”), left the group for a solo career shortly after its release. With two new members, Two Nice Girls made Like a Version, an EP which reprises the album’s hilarious send-up of heterosexuality, “I Spent My Last $10.00 (On Birth Control & Beer)” (“My life was so much simpler/when I was sober and queer”), and adds five covers: from Sonic Youth’s “Cotton Crown” to the Carpenters’ “Top of the World.” Repeating the “Sweet Jane (With Affection)” trick, the Girls graft Donna Summer to Bad Company in “I Feel (Like Makin’) Love.”

Chloe Liked Olivia, the new lineup’s first full-length album, takes a bold but wobbly commercial step towards mainstream acceptability. By and large, the group’s ambitious adventures into rock production don’t work. While Korniloff’s folky-pop “Eleven” and “Rational Heart” receive subtle and sympathetic treatment, some of Phillips’ material goes very wrong. “For the Inauguration” is a clumsy political song that actually employs a Bush impersonator; slathering electric guitar on the lovely “Princess of Power” shows a lapse of both taste and artistic logic. New Girls Meg Hentges and Pam Barger both make positive songwriting contributions, but having four lead vocalists in the group may not be such a wise idea. [ws/i]

SEAN TYLA GANG

Yachtless (Beserkley) 1977 •

Moonproof (Beserkley) 1978 •

SEAN TYLA

Just Popped Out (Polydor) 1980

From seminal pub-rock bandleader (Ducks Deluxe) to early Stiff signee (his “Texas Chainsaw Massacre Boogie” was the label’s fourth release) to the Tyla Gang and a solo career, guitarist Sean Tyla’s been around. His three albums (the first two with a steady band of pub compadres) are hard-rocking and honest but not thrilling, despite good playing and Tyla’s sincere hoarse vocals. Yachtless is the raunchy one, full of lead guitar and aggressive drumming. Moonproof takes a subtler attack, introducing acoustic guitar and a more American sound, but no energy loss. Just Popped Out, which employs an amazing cast of pub-rock characters (including former members of Ace, Bees Make Honey, Ducks Deluxe, Chilli Willi and the Red Hot Peppers and Man) not to mention Joan Jett and Kenny Laguna, offers bitter, depressed songs given the best studio treatment of Tyla’s career. Comparisons to Bob Seger’s gritty rock don’t exactly say it, but both have a commitment to personal vision and unfancy, straightforward music. [i]

See also Ducks Deluxe.

U U U U U U U

UB40

- Signing Off (nr/Graduate) 1980 ●
- Present Arms (nr/DEP Int'l) 1981 + 1985 ●
- Present Arms in Dub (nr/DEP Int'l) 1981 + 1985
- The Singles Album (nr/Graduate) 1982
- UB44 (nr/DEP Int'l) 1982 ●
- Live (nr/DEP Int'l) 1983 ●
- 1980-83 (A&M) 1983 ●
- Labour of Love (A&M) 1983 ●
- Geffery Morgan (A&M) 1984 ●
- The UB40 File (nr/Graduate) 1985 ●
- Baggariddim (nr/DEP Int'l) 1985 ●
- Little Baggariddim EP (A&M) 1985 ●
- Rat in the Kitchen (DEP Int'l-Virgin-A&M) 1986 ●
- UB40 CCCP—Live in Moscow (A&M) 1987 ●
- The Best of UB40 Volume One (nr/DEP Int'l) 1987 ●
- UB40 (DEP Int'l-A&M) 1988 ●
- Labour of Love II (Virgin) 1989 ●

This eight-man integrated reggae outfit from Birmingham built its huge following on an independent label (the band's own DEP International) with non-Rastafarian lyrics concerning social issues—not unlike what many new wave bands addressed—and an ineffable pop sensibility. From the get-go, UB40's music has held appeal far beyond the specialized market; they are the most commercially successful self-contained reggae band in the world. Quietly percolating grooves garnished with sultry horn lines and centered around Ali Campbell's cool, Stevie Wonderesque crooning (with and without sweet harmonies) give UB40 an instantly identifiable sound—or formula, as you will.

On the early albums, even the best of the uneven songwriting—as catchy as it does get—sounds samey and is dominated by the group's style. Contrary to the lyrics' urgency, the music suggests that even when "The Earth Dies Screaming," we'll hear it calmly sipping tea in a hot tub. In the early days, the band's tunesmithing seemed to rise to the occasion only for singles (and often, surprisingly, for B-sides).

The Singles Album is UB40's best English-only LP, even though over half of it had already appeared on Signing Off. (For the quantity-minded, the latter does include a bonus disc with another 21 minutes of music.) As a matter of fact, any non-fan possessing a couple of UB 45s might hesitate before buying an album by the group.

Present Arms is notable for more prominent use of toasting (which continued on UB44) and little else, aside from two solid singles. Present Arms in Dub, though, thoughtfully attempts an alternative to the usual dub style, which is generally just vocal-less electronic fiddling of greatly variable quality. Here, UB40 drastically changed the face of its music to the point where some songs are hardly recognizable; it's nearly as though the material were written explicitly for dub treatment. A for effort.

UB44, in addition to minor alterations (more Latin percussion, sparingly applied gurgling synth), displays wider lyrical range and increased verbal acuity, but the only truly striking tune is, naturally, a single ("So Here I Am"). It's not that UB40 have little to offer; it's just that their singles are the brightest spots cut from the same relatively unvarying cloth.

The group's first live album was recorded on tour in Ireland in 1982 and features such tunes as "Food for Thought," "Tyler" and "One in Ten."

In an effort to export some of UB40's success to the States, the group's American label issued 1980-83, a selection of tracks from UB44, Present Arms and early singles. Not a bad set, but not the introduction America wanted to hear. What finally did the trick was a novelty of sorts, but one that sidestepped the band's shortcomings as songwriters. Labour of Love is an LP of cover versions, drawing on reggae (and reggaefied) hits from a number of diverse authors. Neil Diamond ("Red Red Wine"), Jimmy Cliff ("Many Rivers to Cross"), Delroy Wilson ("Johnny Too Bad") and others. The resultant variety and melodic quality make the album easily and enduringly enjoyable, a rich mine of superbly played, loving tributes.

The entirely new original material of Geffery Morgan shows a vastly more creative UB40 at work. Inventive production, intriguing rock rhythms, powerful and memorable songwriting and new outlooks all combine to make it a great record that remains rooted in reggae but is much more diverse than the form generally allows. "Riddle Me" and "If It Happens Again" are ace reggae/rock hybrids; "Nkomo a Go Go," with a propulsive dance-rock beat and wailing saxophone, shows the full range of UB40's development. A very impressive step forward from a band who already know the formula for success.

The UB40 File is a repackaging of Signing Off, with a second disc consisting of all the singles the band cut that year. (It doesn't require a detective to realize that it merely reissues—and not for the first time—everything on their original label.) Unnecessary, except for completists.

Baggariddim consists of three new recordings (the catchy "Don't Break My Heart," "Mi Spliff" and a charmingly reggaefied "I Got You Babe" sung with Chrissie Hynde) on an EP plus a seven-song album of dub mixes—with guest toasters—from Labour of Love and Geffery Morgan. The one-disc Little Baggariddim offers the three new items, plus "I Got You Babe" dub and two additional numbers.

Rat in the Kitchen is another spectacularly accomplished collection of originals that makes clear the maturity of UB40's songwriting. Lyrics concern employment and poverty; "Sing Our Own Song" vaguely discusses apartheid. (The LP includes postcards for protesting to P.W. Botha and contributing to Amnesty International.) Although no tracks particularly stand out, Rat in the Kitchen bops from start to finish with infectious warmth and top-notch musicianship.

Live in Moscow, a single disc recorded during a historic 1986 Russian tour, draws from various periods in the band's career and includes "If It Happens Again," "Don't Break My Heart," "Cherry Oh Baby," "Johnny Too Bad" and "Please Don't Make Me Cry." The performances are lively, but thin, barely adequate sound makes it more a milestone in UB40's history than an important contribution to it. The Best of UB40 Volume One compiles fourteen British hits; the CD adds four bonus tracks.

Tragedy struck UB40 in November 1987, when bassist Earl Falconer drove his car into a Birmingham factory wall, killing his brother Ray, the band's co-producer. Although he was eventually sentenced to prison for causing a death by reckless driving, he was back in the group for the recording of UB40, a lightweight, restrained new album. "Come Out to Play," "Breakfast in Bed" (another guest vocal by Hynde), the solemn "I Would Do for You" and "Matter of Time" make the most of catchy pop choruses, leaving the remaining material to just throb along pleasantly.

Moviemakers do it, so why not musicians? The sequel to the massively successful Labour of Love (which finally reached platinum status in America five years after its release) contains UB40's interpretations of reggae-identified R&B classics by Al Green, the Chi-Lites, the Miracles, John Holt and others. Although II is less convincing and harder to fit into UB40's commercial and creative arc than the first covers album, several tunes—especially "Here I Am (Come and Take Me)" and "The Way You Do the Things You Do"—ably locate that magical blend of song and style. [jg/i]

See also Pretenders.

U.K. DECAY

The Black EP (nr/Plastic) 1979

For Madmen Only (nr/Fresh) 1981

Rising from the Dread EP (nr/Corpus Christi) 1982

A Night for Celebration [tape] (nr/Decay) 1983

FURYO

Furyo EP (nr/Anagram) 1983

IN EXCELSIS

Carnival of Damocles EP (nr/Jungle) 1983

Ladder of Lust EP (nr/Jungle) 1984

Theatrical post-punks with an unfortunately short lifespan, U.K. Decay provided a crucial bridge between such art-gloom bands as Bauhaus, PiL, Theatre of Hate and Killing Joke and the anarchy-punk camp led by Crass, Rudimentary Peni and Flux of Pink Indians. Quite unlike the politico/nasty-thrash image suggested by their name, U.K. Decay had a classical bent, both in frontman Abbo's theatrical intonations (think Shakespearian) and the complex, almost stately modalities of the music.

The Black EP captures the band in an early, somewhat immature state. The four tracks are far more traditional (not to mention humorous) punk constructions than their later, highly serious work. On For Madmen Only, the band's sole album, Steve Spon's five-string guitar produces a lucid, biting wash of sound—akin to John McKay's work on the first two Banshees albums—mated to Steve Harle's tribal drum patterns. (Although he does play on some songs, bassist Marty'n "Segovia" Smith died before the LP was completed.) No matter how ambitious or full of portent the group gets, the record remains invigorating; driving and angular, and an inestimable influence on the '82 positive punk movement (Sex Gang Children, Southern Death Cult, etc.).

Rising from the Dread is a creative apex. The side-long "Werewolf" boasts ingenious hair-raising sonic effects, while the other three cuts (especially "Testament") are nearly as good. U.K. Decay went out in style with an explosive series of final concerts in December of 1982.

Three-fourths of the group appeared on The Whip compilation as Slave Drive, then soldiered on under the name Furyo the following year (with former Gene Loves Jezebel guitarist Albie De Luca in Spon's place), attempting even weightier and more baroque compositions.

Spon formed the sub-par In Excelsis, joined by two ex-members of Ritual. Though clearly reminiscent of both parent groups, In Excelsis possessed neither the cool intensity and compositional mastery of the former nor the raw potential of the latter. A few clever touches (like the bell motif in Ladder of Lust's "Bonanza") aside, the band proved a dead end. [gef]

See also Cult.

U.K. SUBS

Another Kind of Blues (nr/Gem) 1979

Live Kicks (nr/Stiff) 1980

Brand New Age (nr/Gem) 1980

Crash Course (nr/Gem) 1980

Diminished Responsibility (nr/Gem) 1981

Endangered Species (nr/NEMS) 1982 (nr/Link) 1990

Best Of (1977-1981) (nr/Abstract) 1982

Flood of Lies (nr/Scarlet-Fall Out) 1983

Demonstration Tapes (nr/Konexion) 1984

Subs Standard (nr/Dojo) 1985

Gross-Out USA (nr/Fall Out) 1985

Huntington Beach (nr/UK Subs) 1986 (nr/Revolver) 1990

In Action—Tenth Anniversary (nr/Fall Out) 1986 •

Left for Dead: Alive in Holland '86 [tape] (ROIR) 1986

Raw Material (nr/Killerwatt) 1986

A.W.O.L. (New Red Archives) 1987

Japan Today (Restless) 1988

Killing Time (nr/Fall Out) 1989 •

Greatest Hits (Live in Paris) (nr/Released Emotions) 1990

CHARLIE HARPER

Stolen Property (nr/Flicknife) 1982

URBAN DOGS

Urban Dogs (nr/Fall Out) 1983

No Pedigree (nr/Flicknife) 1985

Alongside their contemporaries, London's never-say-die U.K. Subs' 1977-vintage punk sounds old-fashioned, yet Nicky Garratt's wall-of-sound rhythm guitar and Charlie Harper's chanted/sung vocals make for highly enjoyable charged rock'n'rage. Maybe it's the familiarity of their style that makes the quartet more listenable than, say, the early Exploited; whatever the case, the Subs play high-energy, fast-paced rock with a social conscience, and that keeps them one of England's most successful punk outfits.

Brand New Age finds the Subs bemoaning alienation in the modern world (on the title track) and singing their signature tune, "Emotional Blackmail," twice. Diminished Responsibility confronts such issues as racism, rioting, gangsters, Paris, prison and urban decay. Harper's songwriting (in collaboration with various members of the band) shows lyrical growth—he's quite capable of incisive lines and spot-on humor—on Endangered Species, a fact he almost acknowledges on "Sensitive Boys"; elsewhere, the bleak terrain is littered with better-expressed and subtler observations about the world's ills. Best tune: the touching "Fear of Girls."

Flood of Lies showcases a new lineup and has a great political cartoon of Maggie Thatcher on the cover; the songs are once again more aggressive ("Violent Revolution," "Soldiers of Fortune"), but there's room for some humor as well ("Revenge of the Jelly Devils"). Gross-Out USA, the Subs' second live album (after Crash Course), recapitulates the band's career in fine raucous form with sixteen songs offered start-to-finish, just as they happened. Left for Dead does the same feat, adding to the Subs' live album legacy with a tape-only release, recorded with yet another lineup in Holland. The 23 songs overlap only a half-dozen with Gross-Out; the performance is typically incendiary and the recording quality not half bad.

Japan Today is the Subs' tenth studio album (but who's counting?), a more controlled and musical assault than usual, recorded by Harper and five sidemen, including ex-Vibrator guitarist Knox and bassman Flea from the Chili Peppers. The sound is a bit '70s hard rock, the lyrical stance broader and less clichéd as well. An improvement, but not exactly a high point in contemporary rock'n'roll.

In mid-'88, Harper and Garratt reunited (the last UK Subs album they had done together was Endangered Species) in New York to record the likable Killing Time, a crisply produced example of moderate Clash-styled guitar rock with some workable melodies and lyrics that don't take a very strong stand on cars, cities and women. Although the solemn piano/acoustic guitar tribute to Nico that ends the LP is a nice idea poorly executed, the record's overall lack of consistency—Harper shares lead vocals with Garratt and bassist Alvin Gibbs, and all three contribute to the uneven song collection—is its major flaw. (The CD adds three outtakes from the sessions.)

Harper's first solo effort is worth checking out. Unlike the Subs' all-original music, Stolen Property oddly consists of traditional garage band standards, such as "Pills," "Louie, Louie," "Hey Joe" and "Waiting for My Man."

On Urban Dogs, the not-so-super session of Harper and Knox (plus a rhythm section) plays highly charged riotpunk that sounds like a cross between early Stranglers, early Pistols and early Stooges. Alongside Knox originals (including the Vibrators' classic "Into the Future," here retitled "Sex Kick") and a couple of Harper's own raunchy numbers, there are covers of Iggy's "I Wanna Be Your Dog" and the Dolls' "Human Being," the latter complete with soundalike Thunders licks. The raunch, spirit and electricity run high from start to finish, making Urban Dogs everything a great punk record should be.

Harper, Knox and a drummer called Turkey made the turkey called No Pedigree with Anthony Thistlethwaite (of the Waterboys) adding a little sax. Unlike the Dogs' first outing, this one is, for the most part, lame and uninspired, a plodding mush of (presumably) originals and such covers as "Monster Mash," Marc Bolan's "Children of the Revolution" and the Fugs' "Slum Goddess." The only track of real note is John Lennon's "Cold Turkey," sung by two women dubbed the Raspberry Tarts. [cpl/i]

JAMES BLOOD ULMER

Tales of Captain Black (Artists House)

Are You Glad to Be in America? (nr/Rough Trade) 1980
(Artists House) 1981

Free Lancing (Columbia) 1981

Black Rock (Columbia) 1982

Odyssey (Columbia) 1983

Part Time (nr/Rough Trade) 1984

Got Something Good for You (Ger. Moers Music) 1986

Phalanx (Ger. Moers Music) 1986

Live at the Caravan of Dreams (Caravan of Dreams)
1987

America—Do You Remember the Love? (Blue Note)

1987 •

Original Phalanx (Ger. Moers Music) 1989

MUSIC REVELATION ENSEMBLE

No Wave (Ger. Moers Music) 1980

Called the most innovative electric guitarist since Jimi Hendrix, James Blood Ulmer is certainly worthy of that challenge. Joined by mentor Ornette Coleman, Ulmer introduced many to the avant-garde concept of harmolodics with the release of Tales of Captain Black, eight songs of hot funk and boiling rhythms. The production is somewhat flat and Coleman upstages him, but it's still an eye-opening debut.

The exceptionally fine Are You Glad to Be in America? features Ulmer's first vocal efforts and reveals a staggering understanding of the roots of jazz, dance music, Eastern polyrhythms and harmolodic textures in a lively sound mix. Without Coleman, Blood works with fabled electric bassist Amin Ali and the stunning sax combo of David Murray (tenor) and Oliver Lake (alto); the music fairly crackles.

No Wave is an experimental album recorded with the Music Revelation Ensemble (Ali, Murray, Lake and Ronald Shannon Jackson on drums). It's Ulmer's most inaccessible work and his least focused.

Free Lancing and Black Rock are technical masterpieces, making up in precision what they lack in emotion (as compared to Are You Glad to Be in America?). Working to expand his audience, Ulmer concentrates more on electric guitar flash, and actual melodies can be discerned from the improvised song structures (improvisation being one of the keys to harmolodics).

Odyssey takes Ulmer in a novel direction: working with just a drummer (Warren Benbow) and violinist (Charles Burnham), he builds mesmerizing but patchy fabrics of busy guitar, traversing kinetic jazz, blues, pop and rock idioms with relaxed power. Singing in an engaging rustic blues voice, Ulmer essays extremely traditional song forms. ("Little Red House" and "Are

You Glad to Be in America?" sound like Taj Mahal.) Matching the cheery cover photo, this is easily his most accessible, commercial and likable record.

Following a number of European releases (including the live-in-Switzerland Part Time) and Caravan of Dreams, an American live album recorded with Burnham, Benbow and Ali, Ulmer joined forces with bassist/co-producer Bill Laswell and Ronald Shannon Jackson (plus Nicky Skopelitis and Bernard Fowler) to make another marvelous vocal record, America-Do You Remember the Love?, that has even more to offer a mainstream audience than Odyssey. Half incisive instrumentals and half songs that skip extensive soloing in favor of a group approach with nearly constant vocals, the album unifies Ulmer's many musical abilities into a unique, mesmerizing style. Unfairly characterized as jazz by its nonetheless welcome release on Blue Note, this message of discouraged but hopeful patriotism instead offers extraordinarily adventurous pop for thinking people with soul. [gf/i]

ULTRA VIVID SCENE

- She Screamed EP (nr/4AD) 1988 •
- Ultra Vivid Scene (4AD-Rough Trade) 1988 •
- Mercy Seat EP (nr/4AD) 1989
- Staring at the Sun EP (4AD-Columbia) 1990 •
- Joy 1967-1990 (4AD-Columbia) 1990 •
- Special One EP (4AD-Columbia) 1990 •

Listen past the pretty facade of Ultra Vivid Scene to the barely suppressed screams within, and you'll find an admirably subversive mind at work. Whether performing techno-pop, ambient soundscapes or Patsy Cline covers, UVS wields the same breathless, desperate menace.

For all its attempts to be perceived as a band, UVS is still essentially Kurt Ralske, a musical prodigy of sorts from Long Island who grew up on jazz and classical music. After quitting the Berklee School of Music at 17, he bought a guitar and began playing in rock, hardcore and jazz bands, moving to London with a group called Crash (which soon did). He then formed the first incarnation of UVS and hung out with members of the Jesus & Mary Chain, My Bloody Valentine and Loop before returning to New York and signing with 4AD.

Ralske created the elaborate Ultra Vivid Scene entirely by himself, offering a disturbingly intimate glimpse into his evidently tortured soul as well as his considerable musical talents. The bittersweet juxtapositions—a beautiful melody with S&M lyrics, a bouncy pop song driven by hyper-distorted guitar—create a tension that jangles even the album's most sedate songs. Anguished yet never overbearing, soothing without turning complacent, it's one of 1988's best.

She Screamed joins the album cut with a lazy cover of Patsy Cline's "Walkin' After Midnight" and two brooding originals, while a new version of Mercy Seat transforms that song into a towering, majestic tour de force; combined with the LP version, the stalking "H Like in Heaven" and a cover of Buffy Sainte-Marie's "Codine," it makes for a devastating EP.

Joy 1967-1990 hones Ralske's pop sensibility to a surgically precise point, Hugh Jones' radio-oriented production reducing his quiet Bolanesque lisp to a whisper. It's a far more straightforward pop album than the debut (and much less disturbing), although "Praise the Low" breaks formation with a beautifully ambient neo-Celtic arrangement. The Staring at the Sun EP previewed two album tracks with a new version of "Crash" and a lilting cover of Goffin/Mann's "Something Better," both of which rival anything on Joy.

Those who feared that Ralske had replaced angst with joy were relieved by the B-sides on Special One (the album's "hit single," which shamelessly lifts the melody from Alex Chilton's "September Gurls"), revealing exactly the progress the album lacked. Sampling two of rap's most commonly employed drum beats ("Funky Drummer" and "When the Levee Breaks") on "Kind of a Drag" and a radically different version of Joy's "Lightning," Ralske integrates songs so atypical to the genre that the genericized beats work brilliantly to his advantage. [ja]

ULTRAVOX

- Ultravox! (Island) 1977
- HalHalHal (nr/Island) 1977
- Systems of Romance (Antilles) 1978
- Live Retro EP (nr/Island) 1978
- Three into One (Antilles) 1980 •
- Vienna (Chrysalis) 1980 •
- Rage in Eden (Chrysalis) 1981 •
- New Europeans (Jap. Chrysalis) 1981
- Mini-LP EP (Aus. Festival) 1981
- Quartet (Chrysalis) 1982 •
- Monument—The Soundtrack EP (nr/Chrysalis) 1983 •
- Lament (Chrysalis) 1984 •
- The Collection (Chrysalis) 1984 •
- U-Vox (nr/Chrysalis) 1986 (Chrysalis) 1990 •
- The Peel Sessions EP (nr/Strange Fruit) 1988

MIDGE URE

- The Gift (Chrysalis) 1985 •
- Answers to Nothing (Chrysalis) 1988 •

BILLY CURRIE

- Transportation (IRS No Speak) 1988 •
- Stand Up and Walk [tape] (nr/Hat Food Music) 1990

Originally lost in the gap between glam-rock and punk, Ultravox became prime movers of the electro-pop and new romantic movements when they combined synthesizer with the direct and danceable pop music of the new wave.

Ultravox!—produced by Brian Eno, Steve Lillywhite and the group—marries the flamboyance of posturism to the cold minimalism of Kraftwerk, with more than a touch of punk's roughness. John Foxx's voice is typically distant, singing lyrics that contain jumbled images expressing passive dislocation (a popular Ultravox theme). While synthesizers are in short supply, the budding Ultravox style can be noted in "Dangerous Rhythm," the oddly passionate "I Want to Be a Machine" and the classic "My Sex."

Ha!Ha!Ha! comes closer to the spirit of punk, filled with tight, straightforward rockers outlining a spirit of alienation and life free of love, companionship and comprehension. Billy Currie plays stunning electric violin and, on the climactic "Hiroshima Mon Amour," introduces full-force synthesizer into Ultravox's music, delineating the boundary between past and future. Recommended.

Systems of Romance, produced by Conny Plank, fuses the band's pop vision with spare, crystalline electronic sound. Focused both lyrically and musically on the fragmentation of experience, the album weaves a sinuous existential mood that suggests dreams and autumn nights. Highly recommended.

Vienna, also produced by Plank, was marked by the departure of Foxx and guitarist Robin Simon (who had replaced founding member Stevie Shears after the second LP); Scottish vocalist/guitarist (ex-Slik/Rich Kids) Midge Ure filled out the new lineup and took over the group. Ultravox's recast sound included a more symphonic use of synthesizer, layered in deep swells for new heights of sonic density. Vienna includes Ultravox's best hits: "All Stood Still," "Sleepwalk," "Passing Strangers" and the title track. The new approach proved highly satisfying and successful, spawning a horde of less-inspired imitators collectively referred to as new romantics.

Noting Vienna's success, Island/Antilles issued Three into One, a compilation of songs drawn from the first three albums, including "My Sex" and "Hiroshima Mon Amour."

Rage in Eden, Ultravox's last outing with Plank, finds Ure sliding into operatic vocals and pretentious lyrics, but the music—again displaying complex synthesizer patterns—is superb, with Currie, Ure, bassist Chris Cross and drummer Warren Cann blending brilliantly.

New Europeans is a Japanese compilation of B-sides from the Vienna and Rage in Eden period, added to A-sides "The Voice" and "New Europeans." Though the flip-sides are hardly top-notch, they are interesting, and the mastering/pressing provides exceptional audio quality.

The Australian Mini-LP combines two rare tracks from an early flexi-disc ("Quirks" and "Modern Love") with the contents of Live Retro, an excellent 7-inch concert EP originally released in 1978. (The Peel Sessions EP, recorded in November 1977, chronicles the same era.)

Quartet continues in much the same vein as Rage in Eden, but producer George Martin thins out the sound too much, reducing the band to a subordinate role as backing for Ure, whose lyrics are infused with religious overtones. Clear but unsatisfying.

Ultravox self-produced Lament, proving themselves quite capable of working without outside supervision. The album contains two of their finest singles, "One Small Day" and "Dancing with Tears in My Eyes," amidst a host of other suave and personable excursions. Lament further elevates Ultravox's reputation as one of the few groups to capably incorporate synthesizers and other modern conveniences into a truly unique sound.

The six-song Monument also serves as the soundtrack to a concert videocassette of the same name. The Collection is a remarkable compilation of the band's post-Foxx/post-Island singles (1980-'84): fourteen cuts, including "Sleepwalk," "We Came to Dance," "All Stood Still" and "One Small Day," all stellar examples of craft and creativity. Not a bad introduction to the group's post-Island work.

Except for a slightly increased guitar focus and the large proportion of instrumentals, Ure's one-man solo album (with a little assistance, mostly on bass and vocals) sounds enough like Ultravox in spots to unsettle his bandmates—it could easily be mistaken for a group effort. (Although few would believe they would attempt a laid-back cover of Jethro Tull's "Living in the Past"—downright bizarre, but not as awful as you might imagine.) "If I Was" has a nice refrain but trite lyrics—Ure's uncertainty quickly becomes aggravating—and goes on too long. If nothing else, this mix of familiar synth-rock and adventurous instrumentals showed how Ure would survive the end of Ultravox; perhaps The Gift hastened that eventuality.

Warren Cann quit in mid-'86 and has not been heard from since; the three remaining members deputized Big Country drummer Mark Brzezicki to finish the competent but unassuming U-Vox album. All their fire and personality seems to have evaporated. Ure's singing has never been so restrained; the bland overall sound (punctuated with brass on two big production numbers) bears only occasional resemblance to their past work, yet offers nothing especially new to replace it. "Follow Your Heart" is about as good as it gets; in an odd detour, "All Fall Down" is a folksy anti-war drinking song with accompaniment by the Chieftains.

Ultravox broke up in mid-'87, freeing Ure to complete his second solo album. Quite different from the group's work, Answers to Nothing has lots of lead guitar and puts a surprising emphasis on hyperactive bass guitar (Mick Karn, Level 42 thumbster Mark King and Steve Brzezicki do the honors; Mark Brzezicki is the album's drummer). With the exception of "Dear God" and other simple songs, Ure downplays Ultravox's reliance on synthesizers, avoiding extended keyboard chords and artificial sounds. The guest appearance by Kate Bush is more than symbolic of Ure's new aesthetic: Answers to Nothing is a relatively cerebral journey (ignore Ure's overly earnest lyrics) that pursues painterly audio art rather than pop hooks or dance rhythms.

Currie's first record—an instrumental collaboration with Yes/Asia guitarist Steve Howe—finds the keyboard/viola player mutely ambling through songlike compositions that aren't that far removed from Ultravox, although the overambitious title track is a notable exception. Lacking a structural backbone, the aimless and fragmentary "Transportation" is mostly an opportunity for Howe to show off some of his stringed instrument collection. [sg/l]

See also John Foxx, Gary Numan, Visage.

UNCLE TUPELO

No Depression (Rockville) 1990 •

Coming as close as any recent band has to translating the spirit of American folk music into the rock idiom, this St. Louis threesome plies its tales of tribulation and remorse in a style that combines an acute understanding of country-music dynamics with punky power-trio punch. Thus, the band's judicious use of mandolin, banjo and pedal steel guitar doesn't detract from the thrashy appeal of noisy cuts like "Graveyard Shift" and "Before I Break." Meanwhile, the impressive original "Whiskey Bottle," a CD-only cover of Leadbelly's “John Hardy” and the title track (a ’30s Carter family gospel tune) demonstrate surprising melodic subtlety that should serve Uncle Tupelo well in the future.

[hd]

UNDEAD

Nine Toes Later EP (Stiff) 1982
Never Say Die! (Ger. Rebel) 1986
Act Your Rage (Post Mortem) 1989

Guitarist Bobby Steele quit the Misfits in 1980 and formed the Undead, a trio that cut Stiff’s very last US release. (Its title refers to the accident that left Steele with a pronounced limp.) Never Say Die! combines the EP with two subsequent independent singles into a solid mini-LP (eight songs in under nineteen minutes). It’s gritty, rocking, catchy and angry but, like the title track, often shows a positive attitude. With a settled lineup, the Undead might have made a super live record; these documents are just as good.

An insert in Never Say Die! claimed the Undead were already in the studio recording Act Your Rage, but it took three years to finish. While Steele’s relish for performing is consistent, the sound, music and lyrics are pretty uneven, and the best isn’t exactly riveting. Even “Put Your Clothes Back On” (the LP’s best title and premise) gets an A for inspiration and a C for execution.

See also Misfits.

[jg]

UNDERTONES

Teenage Kicks EP (nr/Good Vibrations) 1978
The Undertones (Sire) 1979 •
Hypnotised (Sire) 1980
Positive Touch (Harvest) 1981
The Love Parade EP (nr/Ardeck) 1982
The Sin of Pride (nr/Ardeck) 1983
All Wrapped Up (Ardeck-Capitol) 1983
Cher o’ Bowlies (nr/EMI) 1986 •
The Peel Sessions EP (nr/Strange Fruit) 1986 •
The Peel Sessions Album (nr/Strange Fruit) 1989 •

The best band ever to come from Northern Ireland, the Undertones took a youthful adoration for the glam-rock era and gave it the stripped-down simplicity and energy of punk to create truly wonderful albums of pop/rock (and, towards the end, soul) with a difference. Their body of work reveals rapid creative growth; each album clearly shows a different stage in their development. The group’s 1983 demise, as unavoidable as it was disappointing, resulted from a lack of sustained commercial success and the inability to shake the public’s first impression of them as an Irish Ramones.

Very young Derrymen when they began in 1976, the Undertones started out writing simple, fetching melodies with lyrics about teenagehood and playing them fast and raw on basic guitars, bass and drums. With Feargal Sharkey’s unique, piercing tenor out front, songs on the first album (“Jimmy Jimmy,” “Here Comes the Summer,” “Girls Don’t Like It”) are spare and efficient pop gems that are as infectious as measles, suggesting a bridge between teenybop and punk. (The US edition—wrapped in completely different color Xerox artwork—adds the crucial “Teenage Kicks” and “Get Over You” from the band’s first two 7-inches; a limited-edition English 10-inch released at the same time combined those two tracks plus a pair from the LP.)

The Undertones broadened their scope for Hypnotised, making the sound clearer and more instrumentally distinct while offering uniquely cast lyrics telling stories and describing characters with impressive skill. Outstanding tracks include “My Perfect Cousin,” the delicate “Wednesday Week” and the gently self-mocking “More Songs About Chocolate and Girls.” Of the four original albums, Hypnotised has the best balance of sophistication and innocence.

Positive Touch introduces well-placed horns and piano (by Paul Carrack) to the sound and explores much more ambitious ground, in reflection of the band’s personal and musical maturation. While the songs are not all immediately catchy, they are ultimately rewarding, displaying numerous new sides and levels to the Undertones. An enormous artistic achievement for a band that had been playing rudimentary four-chord riff numbers a scant two years earlier.

The Love Parade EP—actually a 12-inch single with four songs on the B-side—includes three otherwise unavailable live recordings tied together with weird noises and unfathomable dialogue. Most importantly at the time, it showed the band to be newly focused on ’60s soul psychedelia.

Perhaps overly stung by their commercial problems, the Undertones made their final album with more ambition than concentration. The Sin of Pride has its brilliant moments—the soulful “Got to Have You Back” (a soul cover), “Bye Bye Baby Blue,” “Love Parade,” “Chain of Love”—but the fear of being thought of as an immature pop band drives them into low-key excursions that drift away tunelessly, and overactive horn charts bury the band’s instrumental personality. Also, the sound quality is disturbingly distant.

The English version of All Wrapped Up, the Undertones’ posthumous singles collection, has two discs and features all thirteen of their A-sides plus seventeen flips—30 magnificent cuts in all. From the entire four-song Teenage Kicks EP right up through “Chain of Love,” it’s a stirring reminder of what a truly marvelous band they were. The American version has the same gross cover photo (a female model dressed only in cured meats) but eliminates one disc and sixteen of the B-sides. Cher o’ Bowlies, subtitled “The Pick of the Undertones,” is another compilation with some overlap, but rather than concentrating on 45s, the selection of album tracks portrays the group differently.

The Peel BBC radio EP, produced by Bob Sargeant in January 1979, offers sloppy but wonderful live versions of “Here Comes the Summer,” “Family Entertainment” and two others. Combining that quartet of tracks with repeat visits in January ’80 and November ’82, The Peel Sessions Album amounts to a definitive live retrospective, following the Undertones from what the liner notes refer to as their “callow, endearingly goofy period” through their more proficient prime (“What’s with Terry,” Gary Glitter’s “Rock n’ Roll” with a nifty T. Rex coda) to a resourceful horn-free preview of the final album (“The Sin of Pride,” “Untouchable,” “Luxury”).

After the Undertones ended, Feargal Sharkey made one great 1983 single (“Never Never”) with Vince Clarke’s otherwise stillborn Assembly and then a not-so-great solo 45 ("Listen to Your Father") for Mad-ness' Zarjazz label the following year. After a third one-off single produced by Queen drummer Roger Taylor, he linked up with Eurythmic Dave Stewart and got his briefly successful solo career underway with "A Good Heart." The O'Neill brothers formed That Petrol Emotion; the rhythm section left the music biz. [i]

See also Feargal Sharkey, That Petrol Emotion.

UNDERWORLD

See Freur.

UNION CARBIDE PRODUCTIONS

In the Air Tonight (Swed. Radium 226.05) 1987 (Skyclad) 1989 •

Financially Dissatisfied Philosophically Trying (Radium 226.05-Skyclad) 1989 •

From Influence to Ignorance (Swed. Radium 226.05) 1991

Iggy Pop has always insisted that the Stooges were really a free-jazz band in rock drag. If you accept that, then you'll likely find Sweden's Union Carbide Productions to be the best—or at least the most authentic—band mining the Dee-troit vein of sonic scrunge. The first album's top tracks ("Financial Declaration," "Cartoon Animal") could play hide'n'seek on any late-'60s Michigan compilation tape you'd care to make, while the furthest out (like the epic "Down on the Beach") owe more to Sun Ra. By adding howling horns (two members double on sax) and a non-traditional rhythm section that rarely functions as just a timekeeper to the wah-wah heavy rock on In the Air Tonight, UCP neatly sidesteps any charges of revivalism.

Financially Dissatisfied sees the quintet spackling yet more tiles—both breathtaking (haunting, spare piano) and grimace-inducing (cheesy sitar)—into the tonal mosaic. There's also a little, um, post-structuralism creeping into songs like "Another Rock-'n'Roll Statement" and "San Francisco Boogie," but Ebbot Lundberg's Drano-gargling vocals keep 'em firmly earthbound. [dss]

UNITY 2

What Is It, Yo?! (Reprise) 1990 •

VARIOUS ARTISTS

Funky Reggae Crew: Strictly Hip-Hop Reggae Fusion (Warner Bros.) 1989 •

With the empowering rise of rap, New York has again become a potent conduit for Third World culture to inseminate the pop world. Making explicit the perfectly logical combination of reggae toasting and its American derivative, this duo of Sean "Cavo" Dinsmore and Lionel "Nene" Bernard (both former members of the Toasters, a prolific New York ska crew) and their band play raggamuffin hip-hop, a kinetic mix of upbeat styles that jumps easily from saxophone-driven ska to dub to turntable scratching. Although a bit glib and weak in spots (Dinsmore's not much of an MC), the diverse and imaginative What Is It, Yo?! attempts to answer the question with a marvelous bluebeat-plus original ("Shirlee") and an assortment of easily enjoyable hybrids.

"Shirlee" got its first airing on the Funky Reggae

Crew compilation, which also includes tracks by Queen Latifah and Daddy-O, Mikey Dread (co-produced by KRS-One) and Tippa Irie. [i]

UNIVERSAL CONGRESS OF

See Joe Baiza & the Universal Congress Of

UNKNOWNNS

Dream Sequence EP (Bompl-Sire) 1981

The Unknownns (Invasion) 1982

BRUCE JOYNER AND THE PLANTATIONS

Way Down South (Invasion) 1983

Slave of Emotion (Fr. Closer) 1985

Swimming with Friends (Fr. Closer) 1986

Hot Georgia Nights (Fr. New Rose) 1987 •

The Outtake Collection 1978–88 (Fr. Fan Club) 1989

BRUCE JOYNER & THE TINGLERS

Beyond the Dark (Fr. New Rose) 1990 •

Liam Sternberg, Ohio's answer to Phil Spector, produced the six tracks for Dream Sequence "in an aircraft hangar." The Unknownns play pure '60s garage rock with Mosrite guitars (displayed and mentioned on the cover for added authenticity), heaps of echo and tremolo, and incorporate various period genres (surf music, Creedence swamp choogle, psychedelia, punk) into their songs. Where Dream Sequence is slick but boring, The Unknownns shows them in greater command of their musical vocabulary and adds traces of the Animals, Yardbirds, Blues Project and the Doors to spice things up considerably. A rendition of Buddy Holly's "Rave On" ties up a neat package of heavily stylized nostalgia.

After the Unknownns, singer Bruce Joyner formed the Plantations. Way Down South abandons the literal aspects of the Unknownns' nostalgia for a more direct, unassuming sound that is still colored by weedy organ and other '60s affectations. Some of the fourteen varied numbers are catchy and well-constructed; others drag. (Appearances aside, none of the music and only the occasional lyric is particularly reflective of the land below the Mason-Dixon line.) Joyner is moderately talented but needs stronger collaborators.

A few years later, a new set of Plantations (guitarist Dave Greene being the only holdover) joined Joyner for the seven-song Swimming with Friends, which also features guest shots by Steve Wynn, John Doe, Ray Manzarek, Stan Ridgway and Sky Saxon. As lively and exciting as a wax museum, the music is formally psychedelic in nostalgic intent, but stultifyingly bland, and made worse by Joyner's vocals, which remain characterless despite liberal amounts of echo. The lurid lyrics to songs like "Deep Green Water" and "The Darkside of Your Brain" are right on the money, but nothing in the grooves fulfills the titles' atmospheric promise. [i]

UNREST

Tink of S.E. (Teen Beat) 1987

Malcolm X Park (Caroline) 1988

Kustom Karnal Blackxploitation (Caroline) 1990

Unrest is an exquisitely versatile and eclectic band from Washington DC whose one constant is vocalist Mark Robinson. Named after Henry Cow's second LP, the group formed during the heyday of Washington's hardcore scene, but Unrest's early recordings are far stranger and much more varied than anything their contemporaries produced. Tink of S.E. is far too scattered to lend itself to easy categorization, but it joins recombob-trash moves (truly fucked-up covers of both "Wild Thing" and "21st Century Schizoid Man") with the sort of intensely personal insanity that rarely gets further than an isolated cassette recorder in some miserable sap's bedroom. Each of the first album's covers were individually crafted (by a host of local artists), and the results are possessed of extremely good vibes.

Malcolm X Park follows in its predecessor's footsteps, veering through songs as disparate as "Lucifer Rising" (which sounds like a sputter-punk update of some lost Swell Maps tune) and a balls-up cover of Kiss' "Strutter." Recorded by the ubiquitous Mark Kramer, it didn't even suffer much from the unpleasant sheen that "real" studios give many underground bands. The third LP is a similarly mixed bag; the fact that it's less aggressively "out" than its predecessors led some jerks to decry it as a loss. Wise old owls realized that Unrest was merely twisting the throat of sounds more mainstream than those they'd throttled previously. What they'll do next is anyone's guess. [bc]

UNTAMED YOUTH

Some Kinda Fun!! (Norton) 1988

More Gone Gassers from the Untamed Youth!!! (Norton) 1990

From the clothes they sport and the cars they drive to the design of their record jackets and the music inside—yeah, from any angle but that of real time, the Untamed Youth are a '60s band. In an era of drum machines, Fairlights and Exposé, many might find the concept of a hotrod/surf combo from Columbia, Missouri to be frivolous or downright silly. But the fact is this hearse-driven quartet has made two LPs unrivaled in recent memory for pure dancing and drinking enjoyment. Authentic co-production by Billy Miller (Zantees/Kicks/Norton) and Andy Shernoff (Dictators/Manitoba's Wild Kingdom) captures the supercharged atmosphere created whenever the Untamed Youth fill a teen club or tavern. Why debate the modern relevance of motorbikes, girls, guitars, Pabst Blue Ribbon, bikinis, and Elly May Clampett? Their praises may have been sung before, but rarely so eloquently. [sm]

UNTOUCHABLES

Live and Let Dance EP (Twist-Enigma) 1984

Wild Child (Stiff-MCA) 1985

Dance Party EP (Stiff-MCA) 1986

Agent 00 Soul (Twist-Restless) 1989 •

A Decade of Dance (Restless) 1990 •

There were other R&B-cum-ska outfits on the LA scene at the time, but it was only the worthy Untouchables who caught Stiff's attention and wound up with a label deal on both sides of the Atlantic. Live and Let Dance introduced the band's energetic dance attack with a half-dozen exciting numbers, starting with the unforgettably catchy "Free Yourself." (One listen and you'll swear you heard it on a 1980 2-Tone single.) The 12-inch also presents solid reggae and ska in the UB40 mold; the live take of "(I'm Not Your) Stepping Stone," however, asserts real individuality.

Reprising "Free Yourself," Wild Child surrounds it with ten other strong items, including the similarly effective title track, a cool version of "I Spy (for the FBI)"—an obscurity also recorded by John Hiatt—produced by Jerry Dammers, a slice of straight rap-funk ("Freak in the Streets") and a synth-tinged rock tune ("Lovers Again"). Stewart Levine's production could be more full-bodied, but the sextet's enthusiasm and precision keep things rocking from start to finish.

With no new material forthcoming, a 12-inch compilation EP was released. Dance Party contains four remixed album tracks, including "Freak in the Street" (by Don and David Was) and "Free Yourself," a tune from the first EP and a new live funk workout.

Agent 00 Soul (titled for the Edwin Starr oldie, which the group covers blandly) reveals the Untouchables to be suffering from multiple personality disorder. On some songs they're a brassy soul revue putting hip-hop moves to Rick James sex-funk, elsewhere, they're a rocked-up reggae band. On the ska beat, there's a snappy translation of the Coasters' "Under the Boardwalk" and an inferior rewrite of "Free Yourself." Only one of the originals (the '60sish "Shama Lama," buried in the middle of the second side) is really good; while Agent 00 Soul has its moments, the album doesn't hang together at all. (The CD adds three bonus tracks.) [i]

UPSETTERS

See Lee Perry.

URBAN DANCE SQUAD

Mental Floss for the Globe (Hol. Ariola) 1989 (Arista)

1990 •

Only in the Netherlands: This vibrant pan-cultural quintet was formed in Amsterdam in 1987, by a rapper (who speaks both Dutch and Brooklynese), a bassist from the former Dutch colony of Surinam and three Dutchmen. Atop the rapping, funk bass, power chords and acoustic slide, DJ DNA adds the same wild-card element to Urban Dance Squad that Brian Eno provided in the original Roxy Music: the band never knows if it's going to be accompanied by Mongolian desert music, Benny Goodman or Chuck D. And although UDS comes from a country not widely regarded for its rock heritage, these seasoned musicians have played with everyone from Jah Wobble to Rufus Thomas. And, like Fishbone and the Chili Peppers, UDS never forgets to have fun.

For all its semiotic world-unity rap-rock possibilities, Mental Floss for the Globe has brilliant flashes but captures only some of the band's potential. While rapper Rudeboy scatters the occasional profundity amid weird slang, the band veers between stomping funk-rock and swampier bluesy grooves, letting the DJ have his day on "God Blasts the Queen" and the throbbing "Struggle for Live," one of the most successful fusions of power-riffs and techno-dance yet.

In a bizarre discographical twist, no less than four different versions of Mental Floss for the Globe exist.

The album was originally released independently in a limited pressing, licensed to Ariola in Holland and Europe, and eventually Arista in the States—replacing copyright-offending samples (including Hendrix, the Stones and Captain Beefheart) on each edition. The American version adds two hot European B-sides and drops the inane “Hitchhike H.D.” [ja]

URBAN DOGS

See U.K. Subs.

MIDGE URE

See Ultravox.

URGE OVERKILL

Strange, I ... EP (Ruthless) 1986
 Jesus Urge Superstar (Touch and Go) 1989 ●
 Americruiser (Touch and Go) 1990 ●
 Supersonic Storybook (Touch and Go) 1991 ●

With a great cartoon cover and hypnospiral label, the first 12-inch from this Chicago trio looks a lot better than it sounds. The five numbers have just enough pop backbone to hold together as songs, but they're played with the abrasive thrashings of a Small Black wannabe and produced with every imaginable sonic shortcoming. Yuch.

Jesus Urge Superstar is a little better, but the band's intriguing junk-culture pretensions are still buried too deeply within the haphazard Cheap Trick-as-guitar-throttling-noise-punks attack to make any impression. With an unpredictable mix that moves the vocals all over the place (pushing them way up front on “Dubledead” and nearly losing them entirely amid the stunguitar chaos of “Last Train to Heaven”) and the band's undefined stylistic personality, such promising titles as “The Polaroid Doll,” “Dump Dump Dump” and “Eggs”—despite occasional clever bits—go right down the tubes.

With clear production (finally) by Butch Vig, Americruiser—the CD of which includes the previous LP as a bonus of sorts—makes further improvements, bringing the group's sound into focus and toning down the Overkill overdrive to give the self-amused songs (which aren't half bad) a chance. That's not to say Americruiser's a great LP—it ain't even close, and some of it is downright awful—but at least Urge Overkill has found the on-ramp to music that may yet amount to something. [i]

U-ROY

Version Galore (nr/Trojan) c. 1973 (nr/Front Line) 1978
 U-Roy (nr/Trojan) 1974
 Dread in a Babylon (Virgin) 1975 + 1983 (Virgin Front Line) 1990 ●
 Natty Rebel (nr/Virgin) 1976 + 1983
 Rasta Ambassador (nr/Virgin) 1977
 Jah Son of Africa (Jam. Live & Love) 1977 (nr/Front Line) 1979
 With Words of Wisdom (nr/Front Line) 1979
 Crucial Cuts (nr/Virgin) 1983
 Music Addict (RAS) 1987 ●
 Line Up and Come (Tappa) 1987

With a Flick of My Musical Wrist (nr/Trojan) 1988

Version of Wisdom (Virgin Front Line) 1990 ◊

Just as dub reggae anticipated funk and rock remixes, toasters—chanting reggae DJs—prefigured rap. U-Roy (Ewart Beckford) was one of Jamaica's first DJs to graduate from sound systems to chart success in the late '60s. (Indeed, for several weeks early in 1970, he had three records—“Wear You to the Ball,” “Wake the Town” and “Rule the Nation”—atop the charts on Jamaica's two radio stations.) His signature style is plain and direct: he shrieks and chants over the instrumental tracks of other hits, interrupting and talking back to the vocals. When he first appeared, such musical antics were unprecedented on record, and he became an immediate sensation. While it can't be said that U-Roy invented toasting, he's considered the style's godfather, and an inarguable reggae pioneer.

Because U-Roy isn't very active, his records drift in and out of print. Version Galore, which collects many of his first hits, is a must, although far from definitive. Most of his available LPs, in fact, date from the mid-'70s, when he was signed to Virgin and produced by Tony Robinson. Both Dread in a Babylon and Natty Rebel are excellent samplings of U-Roy's forceful toasting, though the sound and production are smoother, less offbeat and startling than his early work. (Dread has the slight edge for featuring the wonderful “Runaway Girl” and “Chalice in the Palace.”) Crucial Cuts combines some early items with tracks from Rasta Ambassador for an odd combination of old and new styles (some hits are re-recordings) that is inconsistent but serviceable. With a Flick of My Musical Wrist is a compilation of DJ music (by U-Roy and others) from the early '70s.

U-Roy quietly resurfaced in 1987 with Music Addict, a collection of contemporary tracks produced with Prince Jazzbo. The LP finds him in fine form, toasting with authority and ease, and it compares favorably with much of his older work. The song “Jah, Jah Call You” reaffirms U-Roy's Rasta faith and reinforces the many positive messages he's delivered. Ironically, the record got lost in the flood of releases by younger and hipper DJs—U-Roy's musical descendants—and attracted little attention. Line Up and Come, produced and arranged by Tappa Zukie, surfaced around the same time as Music Addict. While there are some good tracks, this weak LP lacks U-Roy's usual punch and spice.

Version of Wisdom is an essential 20-track compilation of two landmark U-Roy albums, Version Galore and With Words of Wisdom (aka U-Roy), showcasing him at his creative peak in the '70s. Concise highlights (only one track exceeds three minutes) of this R&B-flavored cornucopia include “Your Ace from Outer Space,” “Rule the Nation,” “Version Galore,” “True Confession,” “Words of Wisdom” and John Holt's “Tide Is High.” [bk/aw/i]

U.S. SECRET SERVICE

See Sneakers.

UT

UT Live [tape] (nr/Out) 1981
 UT EP (nr/Out) 1984

Conviction (nr/Out) 1986 (nr/Out-Blast First) 1987
Early Live Life (nr/Out-Blast First) 1987
In Gut's House (Blast First) 1988 •
Griller (nr/Blast First) 1989 •

UT was formed in NYC at the tail end of 1978, after Nina Canal abandoned Robin Crutchfield's band, Dark Day. Together with Jacqui Ham and Sally Young, Canal produced rattling trio noise that was akin to that of other second generation no wavers like Information. Swapping instruments after each song, UT were more interesting to watch than many of their kith, and their sound started coming together pretty quickly. Lust/Unlust Records held a release party for their debut single in '80, but the company folded before the disc hit the streets; soon after, UT packed up and moved to London.

There they remain, enjoying a certain amount of success. The eponymous 1984 EP captures them in their original raw state. Conviction is more produced, padding some of the band's acerbic edge with a near-goth gauze. Early Live Life, recorded at various shows in New York and England between '79 and '85, offers a nice assortment of racy guitar numbers and documents a brief quartet lineup. It's really only with In Gut's House, however, that UT's recording attempts have been completely successful. This one's nearly as winning a balance of pop-conscious song-structuring and outright-croak as Sonic Youth's EVOL-period. Relatively unknown in the States, UT seems to have splintered some time after the Steve Albini-produced Griller. Which is a drag. They deserved far more hep attention than they got. [bc]

See also DNA.

UTFO

"Beats and Rhymes" (Select) 1984
"Roxanne, Roxanne" (Select) 1984
U.T.F.O. (Select) 1985
Skeezer Pleezer (Select) 1986
Lethal (Select) 1987
Doin' It (Select) 1989 •
Bag It and Bone It (Jive-RCA) 1990 •

DOCTOR ICE

The Mic Stalker (Jive) 1989 •

For a brief period in late winter 1984/5, you couldn't leave your house or turn on your radio in New York without hearing some rapper going on about a girl named Roxanne. There was "Roxanne's Revenge," "The Real Roxanne," "Roxanne You're Through," "Roxanne's Mother," "Roxanne's Brother," "Roxanne's Doctor"—even "Roxanne's a Man." Demonstrating the volatility of the dance music market, Roxanne replaced "y'all" as the word most frequently used in raps, and the term quickly passed into urban slang for an unaccommodating woman. Credit for this fad goes to Brooklyn's UTFO (Untouchable Force Organization), the trio who started it all with "Roxanne, Roxanne," a playful poke at a good-looking girl with the temerity to resist their suave attentions.

From the beginning, Doctor Ice, the Kangol Kid and the Educated Rapper (later joined by Mix-Master Ice) led a charmed life. After winning a break-dancing contest, they went on a European tour with Whodini and ultimately found themselves on the Phil Donahue Show, which led to an invite to Dustin Hoffman's daughter's birthday party. Before things could get any weirder, they released a 12-inch of the sharp and fast "Beats and Rhymes," oddly, a better rap than its follow-up, "Roxanne, Roxanne" (both cuts were included on the band's first album, along with "The Real Roxanne" and "Calling Her a Crab," subtitled "Roxanne Part 2"). The latter's lyrics aren't exceptionally clever, but UTFO created such strong personae for themselves and the stuck-up Ms. R., while isolating such a familiar problem (girl says no), that teenagers identified with them in a singular way. What the record may have lacked in raw power, it made up for in character.

The Roxanne fad ended, leaving the talented UTFO at mortal levels of popularity. The Educated Rapper sat out Skeezer Pleezer, but that didn't stop the group (produced, as ever, by Full Force) from making major artistic strides or finding new subject matter. "Where Did You Go?" and "The House Will Rock" combine rap and soulful crooning, while "We Work Hard" (a lecture on the subject of rap) has a solid funk track. The sob story of "Bad Luck Barry" is pretty funny, and chants its refrain over harpsichord!

Restored to full four-man strength, a more adult UTFO came back harder on Lethal, a sharp-sounding record with a couple of good ideas but not much lyrical imagination. Dabbling in gangster rap and performing a cross-cultural mating ritual with Anthrax (on the anti-drug title track), the crew demonstrates a desire to try new things, but otherwise this is just a trip to the old neighborhood. The record's low point finds UTFO crooning "Pull your panties down/All I want to do/Is put my unh-unh-unh in you." Smooth.

As steady as UTFO's musical progression has been, the band's rhymes have been headed in the opposite direction. Doin' It! puts more excitement and musical action than ever in the grooves (the samples are really cool, and the raps are delivered with skill and authority), but UTFO comes on too rude ("Battle of the Sexes") and too egotistical ("Cold Abrasive," "My Cut's Correct," etc.) to be enjoyable.

Staying under the Full Force umbrella, Doctor Ice's commercially minded solo debut offers a boring litany of product citations and crypto-medical boasting, occasionally delivered inna toasting style with a Jamaican accent. The woozy anachronistic soul sound of the old "Love Jones" and the album's reggae borrowings (Yellowman might want to know about "Nobody Move," credited to Doctor Ice and Full Force) give The Mic Stalker its only workable personality: the straight rap tracks are solidly redundant. [j/l/i]

See also Full Force, Real Roxanne, Roxanne Shanté.

U2

Boy (Island) 1980 •
October (Island) 1981 •
War (Island) 1983 •
Under a Blood Red Sky (Island) 1983 •
The Unforgettable Fire (Island) 1984 •
Wide Awake in America EP (Island) 1985 •
The Joshua Tree (Island) 1987 •
Rattle and Hum (Island) 1988 •

EDGE WITH MICHAEL BROOK

Captive (Virgin) 1987 •

With a unique, passionate sound, strongly individual lyrics and youthful guilelessness, Dublin's U2 made a big splash quickly. The quartet had released a few praiseworthy singles before Boy introduced them to the world at large, via such songs as "I Will Follow," "An Cat Dubh" and "Into the Heart." Powerful and emotional, singer Bono (Paul Hewson) mixes a blend of rock, Gaelic and operatic styles with the occasional yowl or yodel to lead the band's attack; guitarist Dave "the Edge" Evans largely shuns chords in favor of brilliant lead or arpeggio figures that propel and color the songs. Drummer Larry Mullen Jr. and bassist Adam Clayton provide a driving and solid (but sensitive) foundation, completing Boy's musical package, delivered to disc with great skill and invention by producer Steve Lillywhite. An unquestionable masterpiece, Boy has a strength, beauty and character that is hard to believe on a debut album made by teenagers. (Note to novice collectors: the US and UK covers are entirely different.)

Although it might have been unreasonable to expect U2 to remain pure and ingenuous indefinitely, October seems a bit overblown and oblique by comparison. Already showing signs of becoming a bit of a sensitive auteur, Bono's lyrics abandon "Stories for Boys" and adopt "Stranger in a Strange Land." Lillywhite, meanwhile, embellishes the magnificent and direct rock power with found-sound gimmicks, piano and abundantly atmospheric sensuality. October does have significant virtues: "Gloria," "I Fall Down" and "Is That All?" rank with the group's best work, and several others fall just short, mostly the result of incomplete songwriting efforts. But, in totality, not a great record.

War, on the other hand, is tremendous—an emotional, affecting collection of honest love songs ("Two Hearts Beat as One," "Drowning Man") and political protest ("Sunday Bloody Sunday," "Seconds," "The Refugee") given complex and varied, but unflinchingly powerful, treatments. The mix is uncomfortably skewed—towards the drums and, on "New Year's Day," bass—but judicious addition of violin and trumpet supports, rather than detracts from, the band's fire. (Bizarre casting note: the LP's backing vocals are by Kid Creole's Coconuts.)

Taking advantage of U2's growing rep as a commanding live act, Under a Blood Red Sky presents them on American and German stages, playing eight dynamic numbers drawn from all three albums, with awesome strength and clarity. Although billed as a mini-LP, the running time exceeds 32 minutes.

Abandoning Steve Lillywhite in the hopes of exploring new audio terrain, U2 made an unusual selection of producer and recorded The Unforgettable Fire with Brian Eno and his Canadian collaborator, Daniel Lanois. While the record's lyrical theme—largely a commemoration of Martin Luther King Jr., freedom and individual heroism in general—is both commendable and occasionally articulate, the record's success as an ambitious piece of pop music is more mixed, hitting highs—"Pride (in the Name of Love)," "A Sort of Homecoming," "Wire," the title tune (all on the first side)—as well as an embarrassing low—"Elvis Presley and America." U2's predicament is that their strength is their strength, and the more complex their aspirations, the harder to convey their passion.

One doesn't ordinarily expect to encounter an epiphany on a budget-priced disc of outtakes and ephemera, but Wide Awake in America's absolutely mesmerizing eight-minute live version of "Bad" is among U2's finest recordings, and sent me scurrying back to The Unforgettable Fire to hear what else I might have missed. Besides another live track, the EP also contains two worthy-of-release studio cuts: "Three Sunrises" and "Love Comes Tumbling." Even when these guys don't put their best forward, what they've got is still pretty amazing.

The Joshua Tree (again produced, but with less personality this time, by Eno and Lanois) helped elevate U2 into the commercial stratosphere, making them one of rock's all-time biggest—and least creatively compromised—money machines. (Whatever the shortcomings of their records, pandering is not one of them.) The LP begins magnificently, with three classic tracks ("Where the Streets Have No Name," "I Still Haven't Found What I'm Looking For" and "With or Without You") that perfectly crystallize U2's majestic essence. Each of the songs is filled with atmosphere, power, melody, instrumental invention and rock drive, yet they are all strikingly different. From there, the album turns oddly inconsistent. "Bullet in the Blue Sky" shows the danger of listening to too many Doors records; the semi-acoustic "Running to Stand Still" has mood but no presence; "In God's Country" puts the pieces together just right, with a haunting, countryish refrain; the jaunty "Trip Through Your Wires" is weird but intriguing; "One Tree Hill" sounds like a good track but collapses under Bono's Daltreyesque bellowing and Edge's distorted guitar; "Mothers of the Disappeared," while intellectually commendable, lacks a cogent musical framework. Not as good as it was popular, The Joshua Tree indicates both U2's strengths and weaknesses.

The delicate balance with which U2 had maintained its artistic equilibrium throughout the group's dizzying ascent crumbled all over Rattle and Hum, a dismaying tour film shot by director Phil Joanou in 1987. More than anything, the documentary finds the messianic Bono—no longer remotely capable of expressing anything subtle, honest or believable—awash in overwrought self-importance, a superstar painfully conscious of his position and power. From the egotistical introduction ("This is a song Charles Manson stole from the Beatles—we're stealing it back") to a hideous rendition of "Helter Skelter" through his disconcertingly authoritarian delivery of "Pride (In the Name of Love)," the half-live/half-studio soundtrack album's concert tracks convey more of Bono's burgeoning demagoguery than the band's thrilling live power. And after the bracingly direct "Desire," a catchy horn-charged tribute to Billie Holiday ("Angel of Harlem") and a bizarre collaboration with B.B. King ("When Love Comes to Town"), the new songs are not very good.

The Edge wrote the score for political kidnapping film Captive, playing and co-producing it with Michael Brook. The instrumental pieces—a variety of understated acoustic guitar/piano excursions and gripping synthesizer/electric guitar adventures—may not be extraordinary (despite the cool guitar work), but the LP earned enduring significance for featuring the album debut of Sinéad O'Connor, who sings "Heroine (Theme from Captive)."

See also Jah Wobble.

LUC VAN ACKER

Luc Van Acker (Wax Trax!) 1986
Heart and Soul EP (Wax Trax!) 1986

Belgium's Van Acker (a member of both the Revolting Cocks and Mussolini Headkick, leader of the short-lived 3 Angry Poles, etc.) is one of the few members of the Chicago/Brussels industrial axis willing to display a gentle side. The cover of his first solo album (aka The Ship) shows him smoothly decked out like a character from Fassbinder's Querelle, and the grooves inside match the image—suave, continental, but slightly off-kilter Eurodisco with a certain quaint regard for listenability. Contributors include Anna Domino and Blaine Reininger.

The 12-inch EP is a compilation of two Belgian singles, including a remix of the album's "Heart and Soul." [gk]

See also Mussolini Headkick, Revolting Cocks.

VANILLA ICE

To the Extreme (Ultrax-SBK) 1990 ◊
Extremely Live (Ultrax-SBK) 1991 ◊

No sooner had MC Hammer released his grip on the album chart's top spot than this joker came along, jet propelled by a catchy pop single, "Ice Ice Baby," built on the bass and piano intro of Queen and David Bowie's "Under Pressure." Playing both sides of the racial fence with a dual (and equally unreal) image of street tough and non-threatening all-American, this third-rate rapper reached an absurd level of popularity, a phenomenon that mainly serves to underscore the primacy of marketing and prejudice in current music.

To the Extreme isn't totally wretched (not that it's good, but there are worse hip-hop LPs to be had), and "Ice Ice Baby" has the notable pop attributes of modulated chords and a real chorus (Ice isn't the first rapper to make that move, but it is a significant and valid crossover maneuver that bears further exploration). On the other hand, the notion that this is PG-rated pap for teenboppers is completely unsubstantiated by the sex and guns lyrics; the charge that Ice has watered down the essence of rap to make it palatable to a non-black audience would seem to be the result of simple lameness more than conscious stylistic moderation. [i]

DAVID VAN TIEGHEM

These Things Happen (Warner Bros.) 1984
Safety in Numbers (Private Music) 1987 •
Strange Cargo (Private Music) 1989 •

In her bid to become the leading terpsichorean patron of avant-rock music, choreographer Twyla Tharp followed projects with David Byrne and Glenn Branca by commissioning a score from Van Tieghem, a multi-instrumentalist mainly known as a drummer in the Love of Life Orchestra and other New York experimental ensembles. Working with many local luminaries, Van Tieghem's music for Faut Accompli (released as These Things Happen) covers a wide range of styles, from African-tinged rhythms to obscure pop. The interpolation of extraneous bits of found sounds (news, animal noises, etc.) keeps things going when the music threatens to drag, which—given its subordinate role as accompanying earwork—it frequently does.

Excerpts from two subsequent ballet scores and another theatrical project appear on Safety in Numbers, as well as a pair of trans-Pacific computer collaborations with Ryuichi Sakamoto. Ultra-modern electronic equipment and ancient acoustic instruments blend harmoniously into an unidentifiable but fascinating sonic stew that favors percussion sounds more than rhythmic adventurism. Much of the album is spare and open, a well-ordered and dynamic backdrop for dances—and dreams.

Van Tieghem's unexpected (and surprisingly attractive, in a cool, Enoesque fashion) vocal performance on "Volcano Diving" is in keeping with the warm allure of Strange Cargo. Co-produced with Laurie Anderson collaborator Roma Baran and others, the record is lively and upbeat, evading wallpaper ambience with invention and enthusiasm. [i]

BEN VAUGHN COMBO

The Many Moods of Ben Vaughn (Fever-Restless) 1986
Beautiful Thing (Restless) 1987 •

BEN VAUGHN

Ben Vaughn Blows Your Mind (Restless) 1988 •
Dressed in Black (Enigma) 1990 ◊

Having outgrown Philadelphia's punk scene, Ben Vaughn's first claim to national fame came when two influential recording artists covered his songs. The Morells put "The Man Who Has Everything" on their 1982 LP, and Marshall Crenshaw did the brilliant "I'm Sorry (But So Is Brenda Lee)" on Downtown. For Vaughn, that was enough to get him a record deal.

Although his own sleepy acoustic/country rendition of "I'm Sorry" is a letdown, the rest of Many Moods is entertaining no-frills rock'n'roll, with clever lyrics, clever titles and catchy tunes. Besides penning romantic ditties, Vaughn pokes fun at the tyranny of trends ("Wrong Haircut," "I Dig Your Wig") and defines down-to-earth suburbanism ("Lookin' for a 7-11," "M-M-Motor Vehicle") with implicit satire of statemate Springsteen's epochal bombast. A trio (bass, drums, accordion) provides raucous support for Vaughn's unstylized vocals and guitar.

Beautiful Thing has a fresh, easygoing feel, but too much restraint can be dangerous: halfway through the first side, this mild record threatens to slide right off the turntable. (Flat-sounding Philadelphia, sorely deficient in highs and lows, exaggerates that impression.) The LP's other shortcomings are its lack of funny titles ("Jerry Lewis in France" is as good as it gets), the paucity of overtly clever lyrics (two exceptions being "Shingaling with Me" and "Big House with a Yard") and a decided shortage of raveups (a crazed polka called "Gimmie, Gimmie, Gimmie" and the peppy guitar instrumental "Desert Boots" notwithstanding).

Opting for the Combo-free life, Vaughn nonetheless made Blows Your Mind with instrumental and vocal contributions from his former bandmates. Where the last record's lack of energy was a drag, this one has the creative spine and sprightly production to low-key its way into the pop pleasuredome, somewhere between Jonathan Richman and Yo La Tengo. The relaxed love songs (like "She's Your Problem Now") are delightful; the vintage-styled rockers ("Darlene," the gentle instrumental "El Rambler Dorado") are lively without getting out of hand. (The CD adds three songs.)

Vaughn undertook a four-date tour of East Germany—reportedly backed by the group Pankow, although that's hard to envision—in December 1989 before releasing the star-studded Dressed in Black, whose cover, for reasons unknown, pictures Vaughn in black-face. The strongly played rock record features John Hiatt, Marshall Crenshaw, Alex Chilton, Peter Holsapple and Gordon Gano (playing violin on a slow acoustic ballad called "New Wave Dancing"). Although he runs out of wit too early to keep the record afloat, Vaughn does manage to rip through the cool title track and a great version of his old "Man Who Has Everything." After that, it's down to a Velvet Underground quote at the beginning of "Cashier Girl" (an old idea that didn't merit a return visit) and a faintly amusing ode to facial hair ("Growin' a Beard"). [1]

TESCO VEE

See Meatmen.

ALAN VEGA

Alan Vega (ZE-PVC) 1980
Collision Drive (ZE-Celluloid) 1981
Saturn Strip (ZE-Elektra) 1983
Just a Million Dreams (ZE-Elektra) 1985
Vega [CD] (Fr. Celluloid) 1989 •
Deuce Avenue (Fr. Musidisc) 1990 •

As the vocal half of Suicide, singer Alan Vega was an infuriating electronic shaman. On his own, he creates seductive, '50s-inspired music that succeeds with or without rockably revivals. Alan Vega's impact is the result of its spare instrumentation—just the singer plus Phil Hawk on guitar and drums—and deceptively simple songs. "Jukebox Babe" transcends a stuttering lyric and solitary riff to engulf its idiom and then the universe. "Lonely" should be the last word (or moan) on that subject. The rest of the album is similarly zen-like, and no less enjoyable for it.

The self-produced Collision Drive has a three-piece band and broader musical range. Besides the droning rock'n'roll of "Magdalena 82" and "Magdalena 83," "Outlaw" flirts with heavy metal rhythms and textures; "Viet Vet" is an extended narrative reminiscent of the Doors. Vega's moody lyricism has the poet's touch—sometimes heavy-handed but always his own. This recycling is creative.

Continuing Ric Ocasek's association with Suicide, the tall Car produced Vega's third solo album, which mostly abandons the simplicity of his early work in favor of propulsive keyboard-dominated drone-rock played by Ocasek and a variety of sidemen, including Ministry and the Cars' Greg Hawkes. Vega mumbles like an inarticulate offspring of Lou Reed and Jim Morrison, but Saturn Strip covers a lot of ground. "Video Babe" reasserts his atmospheric rockabilly sensibility (recall "Jukebox Babe") but with very modern accessories, while an offhand cover of Hot Chocolate's "Every 1's a Winner" closes the LP on an enigmatic, inconclusive note.

Just a Million Dreams finds Vega acquiescing in an almost routine rock milieu, produced in the main by Chris Lord-Alge. Alan's not exactly Mr. Mister, but the backing tracks are so filled with typical synth sounds, electronic rhythms and sizzling lead guitar that they provide little or no musical excitement to stimulate vocal hysteria. In fact, it's difficult at times to believe that this bland singer is actually Vega.

Despite a new collaborator, the self-produced Deuce Avenue reveals Vega deeply out of touch with musical reality—his own or anyone else's. Over Liz Lamere's "drums and machines"—impotent and dull backing electronic keyboard tracks rooted in hip-hop style—Vega offhandedly runs down shambling and pale imitations of his potent art-rock raps, expending no effort and making no impression. (Instead of doing anything that might have inspired Vega to better performances, Ric Ocasek helped with the crappy cover art.) Vega is a compilation. [si/i]

See also Suicide.

SUZANNE VEGA

Suzanne Vega (A&M) 1985 •
Marlene on the Wall EP (nr/A&M) 1986
Left of Center EP (nr/A&M) 1986 •
Solitude Standing (A&M) 1987 •
Compact Hits EP [CD] (nr/A&M) 1988 •
Days of Open Hand (A&M) 1990 •

Like Patti Smith a decade earlier, Suzanne Vega was selected from an "underground" New York scene—in this case, the post-rock neo-folk crowd that outgrew new wave for acoustic guitars and sensitively poetic lyrics—and elevated to preeminent status with a major label record deal. Singing in a cool, wispy voice, Vega resembles a mix of Joni Mitchell, Laurie Anderson and Tim Buckley. Producers Lenny Kaye and Steve Addabbo assembled a number of studio players to support Vega in discreet, restrained fashion on her first album; the unobtrusive backing presents her songs clearly and pleasingly. With memorable material and little preciousness or obfuscation, Suzanne Vega introduces a talented melodicist with plenty of potential for development.

Whatever its other merits, Solitude Standing will always be known as the album containing the enormous hit single, "Luka." Vega's offbeat first-person tale of a child-abuse victim is doubly disturbing, both for its chilling lyrics and her unclear motivation and intent. Captured with exquisitely clear sound, Vega's subtle and inventive quartet provides texture, dynamics and context for the wan tales of urban alienation, preventing her unchanging voice—soft, dry, seductive—from unduly homogenizing the sound. (Three years after Solitude Standing's release, a British production group called DNA stuck an acid house rhythm track under Vega's vocals from the album's "Tom's Diner" and wound up moving Vega—unexpectedly but not, as it turned out, unhappily—into the charts and onto the world's dancefloors.)

The Compact Hits mini-compilation puts "Luka," "Neighborhood Girls," "The Queen and the Soldier" and "Left of Center" (a fine track done for the Pretty in Pink soundtrack but not on any Vega LP) on a British CD.

Gaining confidence as a performer and as a pop star, Vega handily co-produced Days of Open Hand with her synthesizer player, Anton Sanko. The increasingly courageous songwriter tackles a variety of subjects here, from the mundanity of voting ("Institution Green") to an artfully simple and emotionally frank account of visiting a gravely ill loved one in the hospital ("Fifty-Fifty Chance"). With an uplifting catchy pop song ("Book of Dreams") and a handful of less immediate but equally engrossing tales, Days of Open Hand is a wholly successful declaration of independence. [i]

VEIL

Surrender (nr/Clay) 1985

Bryan Gregory's post-Cramps project, the aptly titled Beast, were nothing like his old group, instead attempting a gothic sound comparable to mid-period Siouxsie and the Banshees. Their three early-'80s 45s were of mixed quality, and Gregory soon dropped back into obscurity. His three bandmates, however, moved to the UK and forged ahead as the Veil, releasing an underrated album of dark pop-tones like "Manikin," "Twist" (both singles) and "Love in a Dying World" (a Beast remake). Vocalist Andrella's wispy voice and quasi-Egyptian shtick manage to charm even when some of the material does not. [gef]

VEIL

See Game Theory.

VELVET MONKEYS

Everything Is Right [tape] (Monkey Business) 1981

Future (Fountain of Youth) 1983

Rotting Corpse au Go-Go (Shimmy-Disc) 1989 •

Rake (Rough Trade) 1990 •

HALF JAPANESE/VELVET MONKEYS

Big Big Sun [tape] (K) 1986

One of the simpler pleasures of the noisy-post-new-wave thang, the Velvet Monkeys don't attach any high-brow pretensions to their love of cheesy pop clamor. Whatever irony their work possesses is strictly an afterthought. In the band's earliest incarnation, leader Don Fleming (vocals/guitar) wrote songs with time-honored trash themes ("Let's go to the drive-in tonight") and the Washington DC group played them with the requisite amounts of enthusiasm and Farfisa. Subsequent alliances with Half Japanese brought out the avant-gardisms, but nothing serious enough to catch the attention of highbrow critics, and more power to the Monkeys for that.

The 1989 Rotting Corpse compilation gathers the band's previous high points (1980-'84) into one convenient package. When the Velvet Monkeys broke up, Fleming and drummer Jay Spiegel moved to New York and formed B.A.L.L.; when that group ended, they reformed the Velvet Monkeys, enlisting such new pals as J Mascis (Dinosaur Jr.), Thurston Moore (Sonic Youth) and Julia Cafritz (ex-Pussy Galore) for the fake-'70s exploitation "soundtrack" Rake. Given Fleming's new residence and acquaintances, the album is predictably more grungy and smartass than previous Monkeys records, but an enjoyable kick nonetheless. [gk]

See also B.A.L.L., Half Japanese.

VELVET UNDERGROUND

The Velvet Underground & Nico (Verve) 1967 + 1985 •

White Light/White Heat (Verve) 1967 + 1985 •

The Velvet Underground (MGM) 1969 (Verve) 1985 •

Loaded (Cotillion) 1970 •

Live at Max's Kansas City (Cotillion) 1972 •

Lou Reed and the Velvet Underground (Pride) 1973

Squeeze (nr/Polydor) 1973

1969 Velvet Underground Live with Lou Reed (Mercury) 1974 •

VU (Verve-PolyGram) 1985 •

Velvet Underground (nr/Polydor) 1986

Another View (Verve-PolyGram) 1986 •

The Best of the Velvet Underground (Verve-PolyGram) 1989 •

VARIOUS ARTISTS

Heaven and Hell Volume One (Communion) 1990 •

Heaven and Hell Vol. 2 (nr/Imaginary) 1991 •

The Velvet Underground marked a turning point in rock history. After the release of The Velvet Underground & Nico, knowing the power of which it was capable, the music could never be as innocent, as self-conscious as before. The band's first album may have come on a bit cute with its Andy Warhol-designed banana cover—indeed, patron Warhol's name (he also "produced") was splashed around like a talisman—but singer/guitarist Lou Reed's tough songs and the band's equally tough playing owed nothing to anybody. In perverse subject matter ("Heroin," "Venus in Furs"), deceptively simple musical forms and anarchic jamming, the Velvets displayed the rebellious traits new wave bands would pick up on ten years later. Singer Nico's four vocals provide textural context and breathing space between Reed's darker visions.

With Nico gone, White Light/White Heat is almost unbearably intense. John Cale recites a gruesome little story ("The Gift") over steamy accompaniment, and Reed sings the praises of methamphetamines (the title track)—and that's the light entertainment. The second side consists of extended, feedback-wailing guitar solos ("I Heard Her Call My Name") and graphic porno-junkie tales (seventeen minutes of "Sister Ray"). The album is as morally black as its cover.

Something had to change, and when the Velvet Underground next surfaced, they sounded like a different band. Cale's departure (replaced by multi-instrumentalist Doug Yule) might have played a part, but remaining auteur Reed has since shown himself capable of wide mood swings. The music on The Velvet Underground is quiet, melodic, gentle even when it turns up the juice ("What Goes On," "Beginning to See the Light") and—who would have believed it?—moving ("Jesus," "I'm Set Free"). Only "The Murder Mystery," with its double-tracked chatter, is guilty of self-indulgence.

Lou Reed and the Velvet Underground is a bargain-bin compilation of the first three LPs.

The group started on a fourth, unreleased album before switching record companies. Sixteen years later, songs from those sessions finally surfaced officially on VU. They show the Velvet Underground stoking the rock'n'roll fire that blazed forth on Loaded: "Foggy Notion" is a timeless raveup of classical simplicity (though typically kinky subject matter). Reed recycled half of VU's material on his early solo albums, but it's charming to hear them played forcefully by a functioning band.

By 1970, the Velvet Underground was into a wholesome overdrive. Loaded may have seemed superficial in comparison to the preceding albums, but it does include Reed's twin anthems, "Sweet Jane" and "Rock & Roll." Personality conflicts, however, resulted in his leaving the group before the record's release; Yule took some of the vocals and most of the credit. Loaded's sweetness-and-light music was the Velvets' death throes.

With its creative force gone, the band shuffled along for two more years and even released a British album, Squeeze, with no original members. For new doses of the real thing, fans had to be content with live recordings of past glories. Live at Max's Kansas City is a low-fi document of the Velvets' last hurrah in the Big Apple. The band—Reed, Sterling Morrison and two Yules—is tight but mellow; three of the four songs taken from the first album were originally sung by Nico.

The two-record 1969 (from assorted late-'69 shows in Texas and San Francisco) is more interesting in its extended view of the group and choice of material. As on the Max's LP, the post-Cale band is generally relaxed—a far cry from the musical entropy of the first two albums. The Velvet Underground got its groundbreaking out of the way early. (When it arrived on CD in 1988, the album had inexplicably been separated into two individual volumes. Take your pick.)

In 1986, British Polydor released Velvet Underground, a five-album boxed set of the first three original LPs, VU and a bonus record of nine previously unavailable tracks, including an early "Rock and Roll," an instrumental "Guess I'm Falling in Love," a studio take of "We're Gonna Have a Real Good Time Together" and two versions of "Hey Mr. Rain." Sensibly, Another View was also issued separately.

Having issued the three original albums and VU on CD in 1985, PolyGram assembled a chronological one-disc studio career summation, The Best of the Velvet Underground (subtitled Words and Music of Lou Reed). What you get is half the first LP, the title track of the second, three each from the third and VU, and Loaded's obvious pair. A neat introduction, but a skimpy one.

With an entire generation of Velvets-worshipping noisemongers to choose from, the first ten contributors to what is threatened as an ongoing tribute-album series to the band are far from the most obvious. Nirvana, Buffalo Tom and Screaming Trees do the homeland honors on Heaven and Hell Volume One, leaving Ride, James (who deserve to be smacked for turning "Sunday Morning" into a song title medley), Wedding Present, Telescopes and Motorcycle Boy to interpret such classics as "Candy Says," "Run, Run, Run" and "She's My Best Friend" with varying degrees of sonic and cultural distortion. [si/i]

See also John Cale, Nico, Lou Reed, Maureen Tucker.

TOM VERLAINE

Tom Verlaine (Elektra) 1979

Dreamtime (Warner Bros.) 1981

Words from the Front (Warner Bros.) 1982 ●

Cover (Warner Bros.) 1984 ●

Flash Light (IRS) 1987 ●

The Wonder (nr/Fontana) 1990 ●

Television was the satisfying result of a clash between two disparate styles. Leader Tom Verlaine was the dreamer, playing sinuous guitar and singing in the strangled, intense voice of a young poet. Guitarist Richard Lloyd and the rhythm section of Billy Ficca and Fred Smith tended more to classic, bash-it-out rock'n'roll. When Verlaine went solo, many assumed he'd simply float off into the ozone.

Surprisingly, he managed to preserve Television's delicate balance and even add new elements on his first solo LP. Two tortured, driving mini-epics—"The Grip of Love" and "Breakin' in My Heart," a classic from the old group's live sets—blend flesh and spirit perfectly. The vividly desperate "Kingdom Come" has the honor of being covered by David Bowie on Scary Monsters—how's that for an endorsement? There's even a playful nonsense song, "Yonki Time," indicating Verlaine is using his freedom to grow.

Alas, with Dreamtime, Verlaine narrows his scope, seeming to retreat into the isolation of the familiar. There are taut, anxious tunes ("Down on the Farm"), lilting ones ("Without a Word") and an abundance of exquisite guitar licks, but it's too predictable. A performer who trades in passion can't afford not to surprise.

Words from the Front shows more daring, although—like its predecessor—it suffers from inconsistent material. "Postcard from Waterloo" proves that Verlaine can be as romantic as Barry Manilow without sacrificing keenness. "Days on the Mountain" provides perhaps the ultimate in lightheaded ecstasy, with his fluttering guitar skillfully imitating the ascension into heaven.

In some ways, Cover constitutes a return to the style of Verlaine's first LP. The songs are short and to the point, without the sometimes florid expansiveness of his previous two efforts. On the other hand, brevity doesn't discourage Verlaine from floating into the ozone—he just does it quicker. For every "Lindi-Lu," a fine jerky rocker, there's two like "Swim," a gentle evocation of airheadedness.

Co-producing Flash Light with Fred Smith, Verlaine achieves an energetic rock sound that exudes new realms of self-confidence. Meanwhile, his poetry remains characteristically brilliant. In "The Scientist Writes a Letter," a song taking precisely that form, he writes, "It's funny how attractive indifference can be/My sense of failure . . . it's not so important/Electricity means so much more to me." As Verlaine has developed and refined his music over the years, his urgent vocals and guitar playing (especially on "Cry Mercy Judge") still carry the stylistically hallmarks of his old band.

Verlaine and Smith continue their subversive tryst with contemporary rock on The Wonder, concocting muscular, superficially routine arrangements in which familiar lines of wiggly guitar and other unsettling dramatics drift in and out of range. The surprisingly cozy tone of Verlaine's self-amused vocals put his mildly offbeat lyrics in an entirely new context; combined with the music's dynamic tension, mixed signals make The Wonder an intriguing, multifaceted experience. [jy/rj/i]

See also Television.

VERLAINES

Ten O'Clock in the Afternoon EP (NZ Flying Nun) 1984

Hallelujah All the Way Home (NZ Flying Nun) 1985

(Homestead) 1989 •

Juvenilia (Homestead) 1987

Bird-Dog (NZ Flying Nun) 1987 (Homestead) 1988 •

Some Disenchanted Evening (Flying Nun-Homestead) 1990 •

Named after the French symbolist poet and fronted by a classical music student, the Verlaines are based in Dunedin, New Zealand, the same hometown as the Chills and the Clean. From the band's first single, "Death and the Maiden" (inspired by an Edvard Munch painting), through their recent releases, poetry and high art have had a large impact on singer/songwriter/multi-instrumentalist Graeme Downes' approach to rock music. Besides his anguished, mournful voice, the trio's sound is characterized by furious electric guitar strumming and deft time shifts.

The first Anglo-American release, Juvenilia, is a compilation that offers an excellent overview of the band's early career. Combining the six-song Ten O'Clock in the Afternoon EP, "Death and the Maiden" and three songs from a Dunedin scene compilation, this stunning anthology has a punkish immediacy and an almost pastoral freshness. Downes' tales of drunkards, romantics and kids on the dole are punctuated by feisty drumming and such instrumental flourishes as oboe and carnival organ.

Hallelujah All the Way Home is the group's attempt at stylistic definition and refinement. Although ambitious and pretentious (lyrics harp on the antiquated concept of the artist as exile), the album is nevertheless grounded in Downes' exquisite and inventive sense of melody. Bird-Dog is a stronger, more realized effort. Augmenting their sound with horns, strings and piano, the Verlaines craft a truly memorable album that builds from delicate, hushed ballads to explosive rock'n'roll burlesque. "C.D. Jimmy Jazz and Me," "Slow Sad Love Song" and "Just Mum" are standouts, but each track seems to surpass the one before it.

Lacking the exhilarating richness and devastating melancholy of Bird-Dog, Some Disenchanted Evening is more restrained and a bit less confident. "Jesus What a Jerk" and "The Funniest Thing" are straightforward guitar-pop—solid and listenable, but without the spark of unpredictability that elevated the band's early work. The album's coda, a piano ballad styled after Randy Newman, is actually the collection's crowning achievement; harnessing a dapper melody to a bitterly sardonic lyric about failure, it reveals new-found subtlety and clarity in Downes' writing. [kss]

VIBRATING EGG

Come on in Here If You Want To EP (Dog Gone) 1988

A 12-inch of five cool covers by an unknown band on an indie label would normally rate little notice, but Georgia's Vibrating Egg has more than just the good sense to dedicate its record to Leonard Cohen and Viv Stanshall. Raoul Duplott, the unsteady vocalist on these amiable renditions of Procol Harum's "Whiter Shade of Pale," Roky Erickson's "Bermuda," an old spiritual and two of Alice Cooper's finest, is none other than Jefferson Holt, manager of R.E.M. and founder of the Dog Gone label, surrounded by a host of pseudonymous players. (Hmm . . .) Good fun, but Holt had best keep his day job. [i]

VIBRATORS

Pure Mania (Columbia) 1976 •

V2 (nr/Epic) 1978

Batteries Included (nr/CBS) 1980

Guilty (nr/Anagram) 1983

Alaska 127 (nr/Ram) 1984

Fifth Amendment (nr/Ram) 1985

Live (nr/FM-Revolver) 1986

Recharged (nr/FM-Revolver) 1988

Meltdown (nr/FM-Revolver) 1988 •

Disco in Moscow EP (nr/FM-Revolver) 1988

Vicious Circle (nr/FM-Revolver) 1989 •

Volume 10 (nr/FM-Revolver) 1990 •

KNOX

Plutonium Express (nr/Razor) 1983

Like the Stranglers, the Vibrators were considerably older than the other bands comprising the London punk scene in 1977. A rudimentary quartet with a knack for insidiously catchy songs, the Vibrators—after a brief alliance with Chris Spedding, whom they backed on the first punk novelty record, "Pogo Dancing"—established themselves with a stream of clever pop singles that captured the minimalist energy (minus the inchoate anger) of their peers.

Pure Mania—with its soon-to-be-a-cliché color-Xerox artwork cover—is a treasure trove of memorable ditties that strip down pop in a parallel to the Ramones' streamlining of it. A brilliant record, cheerful in a loopy way and filled with great fragmentary tunes and innocuously threatening lyrics.

Recorded in Berlin (briefly the band's adopted home base), V2 features new bassist Gary Tibbs (later a Roxy Musician and Ant) and a more ambitious agenda. While some of the material is not that different from the debut LP, V2 is pretentious and overblown, following too many different cul-de-sacs to hang together.

Although trends quickly passed them by, the Vibrators trundled on until 1980. When they split up, CBS issued the Batteries Included retrospective, with such classic tunes as "Judy Says" and "Yeah Yeah Yeah." Compiling the best tracks from the first two LPs and adding a couple of other treats, it's an essential souvenir of the class of '77.

The original Vibrators (Knox, Eddie, Pat Collier and John Ellis) reformed two years later and issued Guilty, an okay diversion highlighted by the name-dropping title song and a remake of "Baby, Baby," the Vibes' classic '77 single. Though lacking the debut's full-throttle punk rush, Guilty nonetheless entertains by sheer force of its elemental melodic tracks.

That same year saw the release of a solo LP by singer and chief songwriter Knox. (He has also recorded, with Charlie Harper of the U.K. Subs, as the Urban Dogs.) Unspectacular in all departments, Plutonium Express' banal contents are telegraphed by such song titles as "Goin' Uptown" and "Love Is Burning."

Alaska 127, named after bassist/producer Collier's recording studio, is the band's best post-reunion LP. The opener, a furious rewrite of "I Fought the Law" called "Amphetamine Blue," sets the pace for the eleven songs that follow, all either likable lightweight pop or kick-ass hard rock.

The excitement began to wane by Fifth Amendment, which finds the group plugging away at midtempo rock with no distinguishing marks. Collier departed soon after to concentrate more on his bigtime career as a producer (Katrina and the Waves, House of Love, Soup Dragons, etc.), but did pop back around to remix and edit the band's live album. (His replacement was engineer/soundman Noel Thompson.) Plucking songs from all the previous LPs save for Guilty, Live shrewdly concentrates on older, greatest-hits material. And while the performances are quite good, you get the feeling these guys don't really have their hearts in it anymore. Thompson and guitarist Ellis left after Live (Ellis turned up in the 1991 edition of the Stranglers), and the band played on with two new members.

Despite the optimistic title, Recharged makes it clear the Vibrators have long since run their course. Hacking out simplistic good-timey rockers centered on stale lines like "Heart of the city/Beneath the neon light," they create something that's not totally awful but still a major drag in comparison to the good old days. Volume 10 is a slight improvement, thanks to virtuoso show-offy lead work from yet another new guitarist, Nigel Bennett, and some tasty sax. [i/db]

See also U.K. Subs.

SID VICIOUS

See Sex Pistols.

HOLLY BETH VINCENT

See Holly and the Italians.

VIOLENT FEMMES

Violent Femmes (Slash) 1983 •

Hallowed Ground (Slash) 1984 •

The Blind Leading the Naked (Slash-Warner Bros.) 1986 •

3 (Slash-Warner Bros.) 1989 •

Why Do Birds Sing? (Slash-Reprise) 1991 •

MERCY SEAT

The Mercy Seat (Slash) 1987

BRIAN RITCHIE

The Blend (SST) 1987 •

Sonic Temple & Court of Babylon (SST) 1989 •

I See a Noise (Dali-Chameleon) 1990 •

VICTOR DE LORENZO

Peter Corey Sent Me (Dali-Chameleon) 1991 •

SIGMUND SNOPEK III

Wisconsinsane (Dali-Chameleon) 1987 •

The Violent Femmes burst out of Milwaukee, Wisconsin in the early '80s, a remarkably original trio playing acoustic instruments and singing intense, personal songs with remarkable candor and love. Initially resembling a punk version of the Modern Lovers, the Femmes—Gordon Gano (vocals, guitar, songs), Brian Ritchie (bass) and Victor De Lorenzo (drums)—have grown more uncommon over the years, fixing a flexible style that resembles no other band.

On the skeletal first album, Gano's articulate passion and lyrical maladjustment combine with the charged (but not very loud) playing to convey an incredible sense of desperation and rage. "Blister in the Sun" and "Kiss Off" are typical of the anger seething in the grooves, while "Gone Daddy Gone" and "Please Do Not Go" show a more upbeat side still rooted in extreme individuality and super-ego. The disc's best couplet: "Why can't I get just one fuck?/Guess it's got something to do with luck." (There are two bonus tracks on the CD.)

Hallowed Ground takes a much different approach, displaying Gano's religious fervor and connecting with traditional American folk music. The cast includes a banjo picker and autoharp strummer, as well as a horn'n'clarinet section; the material encompasses tragic balladry ("Country Death Song"), old-timey spirituals ("Jesus Walking on the Water," "It's Gonna Rain"), mild be-bop ("Sweet Misery Blues") and demented jazz-funk ("Black Girls"). Not as pointed as the first album, it nonetheless showcases an inquisitive band deeply committed to self-expression, regardless of the consequences.

The third LP was produced by Talking Head Jerry Harrison with conscious mainstreaming intent. Of course, the Femmes at their most commercial are still pretty radical, although "I Held Her in My Arms" does sound unnervingly like Bruce Springsteen. As if to prove their omeriness, a vituperative attack on "Old Mother Reagan" and the similarly anti-authoritarian "No Killing" demonstrate an undying rebellious spirit. But it's another type of spirit that invests the bluesy "Faith" and the Stonesy "Love & Me Make Three," keeping god in the grooves alongside Marc Bolan, who gets worked over with a misbegotten Headsish version of "Children of the Revolution." The Velvet Underground fares better on "Good Friend," a Femmes original that uncannily echoes Lou Reed.

The Mercy Seat is an energetically electric album by Gano's all-gospel side group. Backing big-voiced (but mini-skirted) singer Zena Von Heppinstall in a lineup with a bassist and drummer, he plays guitar and joins the choruses of such numbers as "I Am a Pilgrim" and "I Don't Need Nobody Else (but Jesus)."

De Lorenzo co-produced and, with Ritchie, provided most of the instrumental backing on Wisconsin-sane, a loopy extravaganza from singing dairy state keyboardist/flautist Sigmund Snopek III. (Snopek's previous albums—solo and with his eponymous group, going back to the late '70s—were subsequently reissued by his new label.) While their contributions to such serio-comical Midwest maunderings as "The Rose of Wisconsin," "Thank God This Isn't Cleveland" and "I'm So Tired of Singing About the Sky" tend to be lost in the slick production, the LP is a cute theatrical diversion.

Snopek returned the favor by playing keyboards on 3, the Femmes' first new LP in three years. Settled into a comfortable creative torpor, the trio revisits familiar terrain with easy confidence and very little evident artistic ambition or effort: the loudly electric arrangement of "Fool in the Full Moon" is about the extent of the record's adventures. (The swaying jazzy feel of "Outside the Palace" and the rock beat of the vengeful "Mother of a Girl" make them 3's only memorable tunes.) Gano's songwriting and delivery have their usual odd character and some of the old passion, but the Femmes don't seem to be making much progress or impact in any direction here.

Ritchie's solo debut ("dedicated to Sun Ra, Son House and my son Silas") shows off his diverse musical interests, from topical blues to avant-garde exotica and beyond. Joined by various players, he sings and handles guitar, banjo, flute, recorder, accordion and other instruments, leaving most of the bass chores to Cynthia Bartell of Têtes Noires. (He and De Lorenzo had earlier produced her group's Clay Foot Gods LP.) Not all of the excursions work equally well, but The Blend certainly proves that Ritchie's talents extend far beyond his role in the Femmes.

Using a wide variety of instruments (from conch and ocarina to bass flute, baritone sax, Arabic tabla and kalimba), Ritchie and his four talented sidemen still manage to sound entirely organic—even a little plain—on Sonic Temple & Court of Babylon. While the folksy music has a nice rustic feel, Ritchie's lyrics are far less friendly. In an artless but adequate voice, he fires off splenetic attacks on Christianity, American mores, capitalism and someone who deceived him, taking time to praise Sun Ra and marvel at life within some Arabic castle. (Imagine the arguments he and Gano must have . . .)

With the countryfied sarcasm of "Religion Ruined My Life" and the Middle Easternisms of "2 Tongues, 2 Minds," I See a Noise repeats two of Ritchie's previous themes, but he applies far more wit, humor and imagination this time. Playing down-to-earth music—an acoustic and electric mix with easy, direct appeal—he offers wry and funny (often autobiographical) commentary on such topics as death, babies and Ernest Hemingway. Easily the best of Ritchie's three albums.

The last Femme to strike out on his own, Victor De Lorenzo sings (sort of), drums, percusses and, for one song, plays guitar and keyboards on Peter Corey Sent Me, an intriguing and thoughtfully artistic effort that resembles the Bonzo Dog Band in dada spirit, if not humor. No two tracks are alike (except perhaps in their literate, idiosyncratic lyrics and eloquently understated execution); the stylistic compote of country, noir jazz, spoken musical comedy, 12-bar African chanting, folk, Talking Headsy rock, continental balladry, etc. unfolds to reveal many delightful surprises. [1]

VIPERS

Outta the Nest! (PVC) 1984

How About Somemore? (Midnight) 1988

Not So Pretty . . . Not So New [tape] (Midnight) 1988

Nest in Peace (Skyclad) 1989

Rather than discuss the relevance or validity of the entire garage-rock-cum-psychedelic revival—bands who dress up like 1967 and play tambourines and fuzzed guitar—I'll just note that New York's Vipers were one of the leading lights of said movement. Suffice to say Outta the Nest sounds precisely like your (best/worst) memories of mid-'60s American rock, from the Seeds to the Standells to the Shadows of Knight. The Vipers write good tunes that sound properly dated and play them with equally stylized vim. The production could be better, but that's the idea. As they sing in the lead-off track, "Nothing's from Today." (Five years later, a remixed, remastered and expanded—by two LP tracks, plus a bonus 7-inch of two more—edition of the Vipers' first album was issued, in a new sleeve and on white vinyl, as Nest in Peace.)

In the meantime, a new lineup—retaining only guitarist David Mann and singer Jonithan Weiss—made an all-original-material second album, which was released in a limited edition with a bonus three-song EP and quickly reissued with a different cover. Taking its cues from both the Yardbirds and the Raiders and making blatant derivation sound like the latest invention, How About Somemore? is every bit as cool as Nest, with the added benefit of far better production. Not So Pretty . . . Not So New, a 20-track cassette of previously unreleased demos and outtakes dating from 1981 to 1985, has mediocre sound quality but loads of otherwise unavailable Vipers originals. [1]

VIRGIN PRUNES

A New Form of Beauty 2 EP (nr/Rough Trade) 1981

A New Form of Beauty 3 EP (nr/Rough Trade) 1981

A New Form of Beauty 4 "Din Glorious" [tape] (Rough Trade) 1982

A New Form of Beauty 1-4 (lt. Rough Trade) 1982

. . . If I Die, I Die (nr/Rough Trade) 1982 (Rough Trade) 1990 •

Heresie (Fr. L'Invitation au Suicide) 1982 (Fr. Baby-New Rose) 1987

Over the Rainbow (Fr. Baby-New Rose) 1985 •

The Moon Looked Down and Laughed (Touch and Go) 1986 •

The Hidden Lie (Live in Paris 6/6/86) (Fr. Baby-New Rose) 1986 •

PRUNES

Lite Fantastik (Fr. Baby-New Rose) 1988

Nada (Fr. Baby-New Rose) 1989

GAVIN FRIDAY AND THE MAN SEEZER

Each Man Kills the Thing He Loves (Island) 1989 •

PRINCESS TINYMEAT

Herstory (nr/Rough Trade) 1987

Dublin weirdoes with androgynous names and a predilection for semi-melodic rock and conceptual lyrics, the Virgin Prunes (one of whom, original guitarist Dik Evans, is the Edge's brother) released two intriguing 45s before embarking on the ambitious "A New Form of Beauty" project (the concept being the beauty of being different—and by metaphor, sounding different). Following a 7-inch (part 1), the 10-inch A New Form of Beauty 2 contains two ominously dark and abrasive assaults (including incestuous classic "Come to Daddy") plus a quieter abrasive doodle; the 12-inch Beauty 3 pairs a frightening occult opus "Beast (Seven Bastard Suck)" with a three-tune suite, "The Slow Children." The "Din Glorious" cassette features highlights from a Dublin gallery performance, mixing early PiL-style semi-songs from the three previous EPs and all sorts of taped sounds to very unsettling effect. The Italian A New Form of Beauty 1-4 lays out the entire series on two albums, making it easier to grasp the gist of the concept.

Produced by Colin Newman, If I Die offers hard-edged but delicate pop ("Ballad of the Man") and anthemic post-punk ("Walls of Jericho") contrasting challenging, longwinded opuses with skewed, angular instrumentation and ponderous vocal recitations ("Baudachong," "Caucasian Walk"). A complex band of many minds (not to mention three lead vocalists), the Prunes stake out unique ground, straddling art and mundanity with style and skill. Difficult but fascinating. The CD adds an '82 goth-dance single, "Pagan Lovesong."

Commissioned to create a work based around the theme of insanity, the Prunes came up with Heresie, a boxed set of two 10-inches. One disc shows the more experimental side of the band, varying from the dense, neo-industrial "Rhetoric" to a disc-song ditty ("Down the Memory Lane"); the other disc contains an excellent five-song set taped live in Paris. Over the Rainbow is an odds-and-ends compilation of previously unreleased and rare/compilation tracks up to 1983, highlighted by the awesome "Red Nettle" (which consists of a majestic, sampled chord movement repeated for two minutes). The CD version includes all of Heresie.

The Moon Looked Down and Laughed, produced rather unimaginatively by Dave Ball (ex-Soft Cell), is an unpalatable mishmash of Bowiesque glitter and music-hall camp. Gavin Friday's vocals are overwrought; several songs plod along painfully, going nowhere and taking forever to get there. Jim (Foetus) Thirlwell guests to little effect.

A chasm soon grew between main singer Friday, who wished to explore more romantic cabaret music, and bassist Strongman and drummer-turned-guitarist Mary, who just wanted to be a rock band. Both sides got their wishes when the Virgin Prunes called it a day in mid-'86. The Hidden Lie is an unnecessary posthumous live album, although it does contain a large percentage of otherwise unissued material. Strongman and Mary continued to release records under the truncated Prunes moniker, but with little success and limited artistic viability.

Friday went down a much different road. After taking a breather to paint, open a nightclub, record a 12-inch single of the Stones' "You Can't Always Get What You Want" with buddy Simon Carmody and explore his new roots (the cabaret tradition of Brel, Piaf and Brecht/Weill), he began an extremely promising solo career. Taking cues from Tom Waits, the mercurial crooner and his piano sidekick the Man Seezer came up with Each Man Kills the Thing He Loves. Producer Hal Willner gets the most out of the skilled ensemble (which includes guitarist Marc Ribot, bassist Fernando Saunders and drummer Michael Blair), the lush, timeless songs and Friday's voice which, finally given the spotlight denied him by the democratic Prunes, has never revealed so much emotion. A highly recommended album with passion and drama to spare.

Going by the name Princess Tiny meat, early Virgin Prunes transvestite drummer Haa Lacka Bintii has made a number of singles, collected on the Herstori album, that rival his former band in the weirdness department. [l/dgs/gef]

VISAGE

Visage (Polydor) 1980 •
The Anvil (Polydor) 1982 •
Fade to Grey—The Singles Collection (Polydor) 1983
Visage/The Anvil [tape] (nr/Polydor) 1983
Beat Boy (Polydor) 1984 •

STRANGE CRUISE

Strange Cruise (nr/EMI) 1986

Formed around cult-figure pop Steve Strange (Harrington), Visage began as a part-time group uniting the formidable talents of Ultravox's Midge Ure and Billy Currie, Dave Formula and John McGeoch (both then in Magazine) and ex-Rich Kid drummer Rusty Egan for the ultimate in dance-oriented new romanticism. Visage is filled with rich humor and sound puns in addition to solid musicianship on guitars and synthesizers; how could anyone not crack a smile over the Ennio Morricone-styled homage to Clint Eastwood, "Malpaso Man," or the self-mocking "Visa-age"? Added to the humor, the fine music automatically deflates Strange's colorful pretensions.

Unfortunately, those pretensions dominate The Anvil, wherein Strange attempts to wring every mannered drop of angst and meaning out of his lyrics and vocals. Luckily, the rest of Visage perform as strongly as ever, although in a far darker mood than before.

Continuing their dance-gear version of Heaven 17-styled electro-funk, Beat Boy finds Visage (comprising, this time, Strange and Egan joined by the Barnacle brothers and Andy Barnett) readier to rock, using plentiful guitar on the endless title track (and elsewhere) to color the inexorable rhythms and repetitious, vapid lyrics. The songs are incredibly (and annoyingly, if you're paying attention) long, but there are still eight of 'em, with a total party time of over 45 minutes.

Fade to Grey is the most concise proof of Visage's merit, compiling nine catchy slices of dance-rock (two remixed for the occasion) and an otherwise unreleased (and utterly unnecessary) cover of Zager & Evans' "In the Year 2525." "Pleasure Boys," "We Move" and "Night Train" are among the best efforts, showing that conciseness can surely be an asset.

When last heard of, Strange had formed Strange Cruise with Wendy Wu, ex-lead singer of the Photos, and released an eponymous album. [sg/i]

See also Magazine, Rich Kids, Ultravox.

VISITORS

See Radio Birdman.

VIVA SATURN

See Rain Parade.

VOICE FARM

The World We Live In (Optional) 1982

Voice Farm (Ralph) 1987

Bigger Cooler Weirder (Morgan Creek) 1991 ●

On The World We Live In, San Francisco's Voice Farm was a trio—two guys who appear on the front cover dressed only in their underpants, and a less-exposed female—employing synthesizers, vocals and acoustic percussion to weave moody instrumentals, some of which are paired with incisive, intelligent (and, in one case, horrifying) lyrics. The band's dynamic range, from hauntingly beautiful to startlingly intense, and stylistic variety—encompassing movie-music vagueness, machine noise and disco bump, as well as direct song forms—surpasses many other all-electronic bands, and makes this a totally fascinating album with nary a dull moment. Producer David Kahne did his usual ace job, and whoever thought of covering the Jaynetts' venerable "Sally Go Round the Roses" also deserves a compliment.

The radically different Voice Farm finds the group reduced to its core: Myke Reilly (keyboards/percussion/voices) and Charly Brown (vocals/keyboards). Aided by an assortment of backing singers and a guitarist, the two are firmly in vocal/song mode, pairing their rhythmic sonic adventures with witty, pointedly satirical lyrics about intriguingly offbeat modern subjects. (A relatively straight cover of the Supremes' "Nowhere to Run" doesn't add anything to the song or the record.) The accomplished assemblages overlay the dance beats with synthesized effects, found sounds, spoken-word tape manipulation and other ear-catching ephemera for a diverting album that has more club-play potential than home turntable longevity. [i]

VOICE OF THE BEEHIVE

Just a City EP (nr/Food) 1987

I Say Nothing EP (nr/London) 1987 + 1988 ●

Let It Bee (London) 1988 ●

Built around American singing sisters Tracey Bryn and Melissa Brooke, London's Voice of the Beehive is a delightful clash of two sensibilities: California girl-bop and English buzz-pop. With the exception of two tracks, the material on the two UK EPs is repeated on the band's sole album; throughout Let It Bee, principal songwriter Bryn throws together catchy guitar tunes that are at once ditzy, raunchy and ironic. She's shameless enough to add a misogynist twist to the "Beat of Love" ("There are all kinds of ways to get banged"), but she's also willing to show some vulnerability ("Sorrow Floats"). In the Beehive's lexicon of love, girls are bitches, boys are cruel and everyone's a fool: "Trust Me" is, in fact, a warning. Bryn's fascination seems to be the flipside of good times—life isn't a party, it's the slightly drunk and miserable walk home alone afterwards. [kss]

VOIVOD

War and Pain (Metal Blade) 1984 ●

RRRÖÖÖAAAARRR (Noise Int'l-Combat) 1986 ●

Thrashing Rage EP (Noise Int'l-Combat) 1986

Killing Technology (Noise Int'l-Combat) 1987 ●

Dimension Hatrüss (Noise Int'l) 1988 ●

Nothingface (Mechanic-MCA) 1989 ●

Montréal's Voivod is a thrilling anomaly, staking out a unique terrain on the postmodern frontier. While often classified as metal, what this group of French Canadian weirdoes does is better described as dark progressive rock with a strain of conceptual sci-fi.

Beginning the band's album-by-album concept—the adventures of a futuristic warrior entity called the Voivod—War and Pain is a crude, careening blast of youthful energy, post-apocalyptic Mad Maxisms and prickly power-thrash reminiscent of Motörhead. Exciting tracks like "Voivod" and "Black City" possess a raw, neo-bluesy quality that overcomes the poor production quality.

RRRÖÖÖAAAARRR takes Voivod's original style to its logical extreme/dead end, offering a homogeneous wall of cathartic riffing and Denis "Snake" Belanger's most tortured vocal articulations. While "Korgüll the Exterminator" is convoluted enough to be memorable, the rest of the album's white-noise metal is a blur that leaves no substantial impression. A change was both imminent and necessary. (The picture-disc EP consists of four tracks from the album.)

Killing Technology brought Voivod into maturity. Soaking up disparate influences (especially progressive/psychedelic rockers like Pink Floyd and Van der Graaf Generator and post-punk/industrialists like Killing Joke and Einstürzende Neubauten), Voivod formed a fresh, dissonant sound, merging metal's power with these other genres' experimental imperatives, and doing it better than anyone since Chrome. Like the Voivod himself (who, at this point, ventures into the unknown vastness of space), the album reveals a band making a successful, brave transition from primitivism to futurism. The CD and cassette include two bonus tracks.

Each subsequent release has exponentially continued this upward climb in quality and imagination. Dimension Hatrüss conceptually capsulizes the rise and fall of an alien universe, primed by complex songs that flirt with melody yet retain all of Voivod's previous energy. With the appearance of electronics and Snake's new-found singing abilities, this is an excellent album.

Nothingface is Voivod's most interesting achievement to date, showcasing a full-blown melodic sensibility, vibrant production, the integration of sampling technology, guitarist Denis "Piggy" D'Amour's increasing stature as the Robert Fripp of alternative metal and a stunning rendition of Syd Barrett's "Astronomy Domine." The haunting "Missing Sequences" is only one of many high-quality songs, all mated to the band's most serious (subjects range from ecology and alchemy to existentialism) and deftly composed lyrics yet. [gef]

VOLCANO SUNS

The Bright Orange Years (Homestead) 1985

All-Night Lotus Party (Homestead) 1986

Bumper Crop (Homestead) 1987 ●

Farced (SST) 1988 ●

Thing of Beauty (SST) 1989 •

Career in Rock (1/4 Stick-Touch and Go) 1991

When Mission of Burma ended in 1983 only drummer Peter Prescott continued to play loud rock music. On The Bright Orange Years, his trio with bassist Jeff Weigand and guitarist Jon Williams takes energetic folk-rock with sturdy Midwest melodies and overplays it into a punky mixture of Cheap Trick and Hüsker Du. The record's sound could be sharper, but there's no mistaking the talent in songs like "Jak," "Balancing Act" and "Cornfield," which pitches a noise piano solo into the mixture.

The ghost of Burma looms in Williams' mindblow guitar on All-Night Lotus Party, a less tuneful album (credit Prescott's reduced music-writing role) that is still pretty rewarding. The Suns reach into new regions with "Cans," a crypto-rockabilly raveup; "Walk Around," a Ramonesy punk rush; "Sounds Like Bucks," a distorted crypto-ballad; and "Dot on the Map," a Wall of Voodoo-styled slice of Americana gone off the deep end.

Prescott reclaimed creative control on the Suns' third album, which also unveiled a new incarnation of the trio. (Williams and Weigand left in March '87.) Although lyrics continue to reflect Lotus Party's fascination with the social and cultural mundanities of rural life, Bumper Crop more closely resembles the first LP in song, sound and style.

Adding trumpet, found-sound samples and guest contributions of sitar, violin and cello to the trio's bag of tricks, the uneven Forced has more instrumental depth, if not artistic subtlety, than the previous records, and even fits an industrial-strength noise assault ("Belly Full of Lead") into the usual roaring post-pop. But the band's melodic sense comes and goes; too many of the songs dissolve into a cacophonous blur.

David Kleiler, a guest on Forced, became the Suns' cool new guitarist (and astute songwriter) on the extremely consistent—in both style and quality—four-sided Thing of Beauty. Recommitting itself to wall-shaking tuneful overdrive, the trio antes up nineteen fine new numbers (with clearly audible clever lyrics) plus a great cover of Eno's "Needles in the Camel's Eye" that both credits and honors an obvious inspiration. [i]

See also Big Dipper, Dredd Foole and the Din.

VOX POP

See Jeff Dahl Group.

VULGAR BOATMEN

You and Your Sister (Record Collect) 1989 •

When an unpretentious band happens along with so much talent, it makes you wonder why those who have to mask their inabilities behind style and gimmicks even bother. Formed in the early '80s by future Silos founder Walter Salas-Humara, this pop quintet—based either in Gainesville, Florida or Bloomington, Indiana—was strictly a local Florida phenomenon (circulated on a pair of cassette albums) until Salas-Humara returned to produce (and guest on) You and Your Sister, a wonderful album which brought the group's semi-acoustic magic to national attention. Robert Ray and Dale Lawrence (a veteran of the Gizmos) write remarkably catchy and intelligent songs in a number of mildly inflected accents, performing them all with unadorned eloquence—and a touch of obsession—on guitar and accordion, with a polite backbeat to push them along. Buddy Holly would have been proud. [i]

See also Gizmos, Silos.

W W W W W

WAH!

Nah = Poo—The Art of Bluff (nr/Eternal) 1981
The Maverick Years '80-'81 (nr/Wonderful World) 1982

MIGHTY WAH!

Hope EP (nr/Eternal) 1983
Come Back EP (nr/Eternal-Beggars Banquet) 1984
A Word to the Wise Guy (nr/Eternal-Beggars Banquet) 1984 •

Weekends EP (nr/Eternal-Beggars Banquet) 1984
The Way We Wah! (nr/WEA) 1984
The Peel Sessions EP (nr/Strange Fruit) 1987

PETE WYLIE

Sinful (Virgin) 1987 •

One of the most significant and underappreciated groups of the punk-era Liverpool scene, Wah! (and titular variations thereon) functions as a vehicle for extrovert Pete Wylie. On Nah = Poo, Wah! sounds like Emerson, Lake and Palmer with hipper (though equally flamboyant) arrangements. Wylie sings melodramatically on stirring but superficial material like "The Death of Wah!" and "Seven Minutes to Midnight." The man may (as he intimates) be a fraud, but at least he's an entertaining one.

A Word to the Wise Guy—a full album and a bonus 12-inch—contains more of Wylie's flighty excursions into soul, pop, funk and anything else he happens across. Although not very consistent, it's an unpredictable and generally likable collection. Come Back has two versions of that ace track (also on the LP) plus a couple of other items. Weekends contains an alternate version of that album track as well as a demo for it and two other odds and ends from Wylie's sprawling career.

The Way We Wah! is a retrospective of Wylie's single successes, from "Hope," "The Story of the Blues" and "The Seven Thousand Names of Wah!" to his reading of Johnny Thunders' poignant "You Can't Put Your Arms Around a Memory."

Wylie's first-ever American release, the delightful and commercial Sinful drops the Wah! front and finally acknowledges his solo-ness. He takes credit for vocals, guitar, harmonica and "odd bits"; the only other contributor listed is vocalist Josie Jones. Colorful wide-screen production (suggestive of the Motors a bit) frames the peppy melodies ("Break Out the Banners," "If I Love You," the memorable title tune) and unpredictable lyrics ("Train to Piranhaville"), making the ambitious Sinful a rewarding, fully realized effort reflecting Wylie's unique perception of pop music and the world.

The Peel Sessions contains four Wah! songs, recorded live for British radio in August 1984. [jy/i]

WAILERS

See Alpha Blondy, Bob Marley.

WAITRESSES

Wasn't Tomorrow Wonderful? (ZE-Polydor) 1982
I Could Rule the World If I Could Only Get the Parts EP (ZE-Polydor) 1982

Make the Weather EP (nr/Polydor) 1983
Briseology (Polydor) 1983

The Best of the Waitresses (Polydor) 1990 ♠

Ohio composer/guitarist Chris Butler invented the Waitresses; fellow Akronite Patty Donahue gave the group/idea its voice. From an original germinal joke (before Butler's spell in the more avant-garde Tin Huey) and an appearance on a local Ohio compilation LP, the Waitresses grew into a well-known New York-based sextet (including ex-Television drummer Billy Ficca) churning out danceably funky pop tunes spiked with a few twists (not the least of which is Mars Williams' searing and satirical sax). Furthermore, Donahue's persona—she doesn't sing so much as carry a simultaneous conversation and tune—developed into the archetypal young, white, middle-class woman trying to sort out her identity while beset with standard societal conditioning on one hand and specious, voguish "alternatives" (the Sexual Revolution, the Me Generation) on the other. The Waitresses' combination of musical aplomb and lyrical acuity makes the first LP at once funny, sad and universally true.

The American I Could Rule the World EP contains a TV sitcom theme ("Square Pegs"), a wonderful Yuletide rap track ("Christmas Wrapping"), a live-for-TV take of an old Hueys-era Butler tune and more. The related English release, Make the Weather, is somewhat different, most notably lacking "Christmas Wrapping."

Briseology was recorded amidst serious personnel tension. (Donahue subsequently quit, was briefly replaced by Holly Vincent, but later rejoined.) Although Butler penned another batch of witty and wise songs about the exigencies of modern womanhood—perhaps less pointed, but not far removed from those on the first LP—and the playing and production are fine, the formula doesn't wear all that well. [jg]

See also Swollen Monkeys.

TOM WAITS

Closing Time (Asylum) 1973
The Heart of Saturday Night (Asylum) 1974 •
Nighthawks at the Diner (Asylum) 1975 •
Small Change (Asylum) 1976 •
Foreign Affairs (Asylum) 1977 •
Blue Valentine (Asylum) 1978 •
Heartattack and Vine (Asylum) 1980
Bounced Checks (Ger. Asylum) 1981
Swordfishtrambones (Island) 1983 •
Rain Dogs (Island) 1985 •
Anthology of Tom Waits (Asylum) 1985 •

Franks Wild Years (Island) 1987 ●
Big Time (Island) 1988 ●

Armed with one of the most distinctive voices in popular music—a gravely, smoke-scratched rasp that crosses Joe Cocker and Louis Armstrong at the end of a particularly bad bender—Tom Waits has spent the past two decades writing and performing some of the most fascinating and creatively stimulating music around. Bringing acute intelligence to a seemingly casual (and dissolute) sensibility, Waits' lyrics read as if they were written in some eerie collaboration with the likes of (depending on the LP) Mickey Spillane, Charles Bukowski or Captain Beefheart

Waits' career generically divides into two periods: the melodic, barroom jazz-poet sound of his Asylum years (1973-'80), and the harmonic dissonance of his Island releases, beginning in 1983. But within such parameters, Waits has repeatedly changed direction and kept things interesting.

The debut, Closing Time, shows the young Californian at his least confident and most vulnerable, searching for a sound but having his work whitewashed by Jerry Yester's formulaic production. While his artistry and originality are evident in such emotive tracks as "I Hope That I Don't Fall in Love with You" and "Martha," the album is polluted by attempts to shoe-horn Waits into a bland singer/songwriter mold. Overburdened by acoustic guitars and occasional backing singers, the songs don't focus enough on Tom's expressive lyrics or vocal talents.

The similar Heart of Saturday Night is entertaining, but relatively faceless. As with Closing Time, the maternal Waits sings straight melts into the mush of mid-'70s AOR. Nevertheless, the album bears the first hints of the highly stylized, jazzy, after-hours persona that would become Waits' trademark (shaped, in part, by producer Bones Howe—Waits' collaborator for the remainder of his Asylum stay) "Diamonds on My Windshield" is the first good example of Waits' narrative-lyric technique, backed only by an upright bass and high-hat/snare combo. The moving title track reveals a more emotive and intimate side—one that would prove equally significant during his Asylum years.

The double-live Nighthawks at the Diner is the quintessential pre-'80s Waits LP, portraying him as a hep and humorous sleazy nightclub act playing the fictional Rafael's Silver Cloud Lounge. The small-audience intimacy and Howe's sparing production are key factors in the LP's success. From the introspective, metaphorical "Emotional Weather Report" to the bachelor anthem "Better Off Without a Wife," Waits sells this show on sheer character. Milking his rapport with the audience for all it's worth, he throws out one-liners and local cultural references like a hip Henny Youngman. As it established a solid identity, Nighthawks was a turning point in Waits' career, and a good place for neophytes to begin.

Small Change and Foreign Affairs are, overall, his strongest Asylum releases. Both sessions were recorded and mixed live in the studio—complete with orchestra—and possess the perfect balance of compositional maturity and production expertise, allowing the strings' lush romanticism to augment the songs rather than overshadow them. Small Change contains his most fervent tracks ("The Piano Has Been Drinking (Not Me)" and "Tom Traubert's Blues"), as well as "Step Right Up," a jumpy ode to snake-oil salesmen everywhere.

Foreign Affairs tugs on the heartstrings with the piano-bar ballad "Muriel" and the music-box beauty of "A Sight for Sore Eyes"; the scat-like "Barber Shop" complements the circus-barker call of "Step Right Up." Best of all, however, is "I Never Talk to Strangers," a duet with Bette Midler, "Burma-Shave," a tale of unfulfilled dreams, comes in a close second.

Blue Valentine, while a satisfying enough album, seems a bit short on originality when set in career context. Side One, for instance, reads like a Waits how-to manual: one part strings ("Somewhere"), one part jazz poetry ("Red Shoes by the Drugstore"), one part piano ballad ("Christmas Card from a Hooker in Minneapolis"), one part colorful narrative ("Romeo Is Bleeding"), and one part sultry blues ("$29.00"). Side Two is more of the same.

Heartattack and Vine is the bluest of Waits' albums, highlighted by the Chicago-electric sound of the instrumental "In Shades" and the killer Hammond organ sound that runs throughout. A bit of this blues touches several of the other tracks (most notably the title cut and "Downtown"), reprising an infrequently used ingredient in Waits' now-consistent recipe. Also contributing to the LP's power are the raucous "Til the Money Runs Out" and the tender "Jersey Girl" (far better than Springsteen's subsequent cover).

Bounced Checks is a German compilation that overlooks Closing Time but does contain some previously unreleased tracks, including "Mr. Henry," alternate versions of "Jersey Girl" and Blue Valentine's "Whistlin' Past the Graveyard" and an amusing spoken version of "The Piano Has Been Drinking" which, recorded live in Dublin, might as well be a different song. With the subsequent release of Anthology, Bounced Checks' enduring value is in its unreleased material rather than as an Asylum collection.

Released after a long hiatus during which he changed labels, the self-produced Swordfishtrombones transforms Waits from a bourbon-drenched barfly to an autonomous and eccentric ringmaster. Gone are the romantic piano ballads and jazz trios, replaced by adventurous arrangements of creepy marimba rhythms, pleasing dissonance and creative absurdity. The album's anthem is undoubtedly "16 Shells from a Thirty-Ought-Six" in all its twisted glory; "Frank's Wild Years" and "Down, Down, Down" are also prime cuts.

Rain Dogs is Waits' best Island release; it picks up the previous LP's trail but is consistently more intoxicating. Working with the finest musicians he's ever assembled (plus guest appearances by, among others, the Uptown Horns, Keith Richards and Tony Levin), it's highly percussive, laced with quirky guitar and garnished with unusual brass. Such diverse cuts as "Cemetery Polka" (with Farfisa, trombone and parade drum), "Blind Love," (virtually a country cover of "Jersey Girl," complete with fiddle and Keith Richards' twanging) and "Jockey Full of Bourbon" (a conga-driven rumba) give it a wonderful sense of schizophrenia.

Anthology is an excellent sampler of Waits' Asylum years: thirteen of the best tracks from every album except Nighthawks.

Franks Wild Years ("Un Operachi Romantico in Two Acts") formed the basis for a stage show that toured traditional theatrical venues in 1988. In small ways, the album harks back to Rain Dogs ("Hang on St. Christopher," for instance, is akin to that album's "Clap Hands"), but in a real sense it's entirely different from any of Waits' previous work. Most importantly, it succeeds as a concept album about a character who escapes from "Rainville" to travel the world, seeing Vegas, New York and parts unknown. Waits' idiosyncratic production employs vocal treatments, chameleoning his already unmistakable voice into assorted colors and textures.

The soundtrack for the documentary film of the same name, Big Time draws most of its songs from Rain Dogs and Franks Wild Years. It also includes "Red Shoes" (an adaptation of the similarly named track on Blue Valentine) and two new cuts. "Falling Down" and "Strange Weather." As no other such collection exists, Big Time is, in a sense, a compilation, but the versions on it are so different from their studio equivalents that it's more like an adjunct to the three preceding albums.

In recent years, Waits has done quite a bit of acting, appearing in The Cotton Club (1984), Down by Law (1986), Candy Mountain (1987) and other films. [rs]

DAVE WAKELING

See (English) Beat, General Public.

WALKABOUTS

The Walkabouts EP [tape] (Necessity) 1984

22 Disasters EP (Necessity) 1985

See Beautiful Rattlesnake Gardens (PopLlama Products) 1987

Cataract (Sub Pop) 1989 •

Rag & Bone EP (Sub Pop) 1990 •

This talented Seattle-area combo produces smart, non-nonsense folk-rock. 22 Disasters and See Beautiful Rattlesnake Gardens belie their low-budget origins thanks to pointed songwriting, focused instrumental performances and Chris Eckman and Carla Torgerson's committed vocals, which energize such impressive tunes as "Laughingstock" and "Jumping Off."

The group's two Sub Pop releases (collected on a single CD) feature upgraded production and more confident playing. The full-length Cataract resonates with rueful Americana on such tracks as "Whiskey XXX," "Hell's Soup Kitchen" and "Long Black Veil" (not the traditional song), marking the Walkabouts as a distinctive band with loads of potential. The six-song Rag & Bone adds a keyboard player to the original four-person lineup, and makes good use of the expanded cast with consistently imaginative arrangements, from the honky-tonking of "The Anvil Song" to the acoustic hush of "Medicine Hat." [hd]

TODD WALKER

See Defenestration.

WALKINGSEEDS

Skullfuck (nr/Probe) 1987

Upwind of Disaster, Downwind of Atonement (Communion) 1989 •

Shaved Beatnik EP (nr/Glass) 1989

Sensory Deprivation Chamber Quartet EP (nr/Glass) 1989

Bad Orb..Whirling Ball (Shimmy-Disc) 1990 •

Led by singer Frank Martin and guitarist Robert Parker, Liverpool's Walkingseeds bring mischievous intelligence and a taste for the underside of '60s pop culture to their wanton psychedelic guitar throttles. The first album offers a noisy listen-in to the band's learning process; Upwind of Disaster, while still enthusiastically sloppy and prone to bum notes, proffers conceptually witty songs ("Imperious, Vain, Selfish and Wilful" [sic], "Louie, Louie, Louie," "28IF," named for a license plate pictured on the Abbey Road cover—now is that groovy or what?) that make strange sense and production by Kramer that keeps the roar boiling (boar roiling?) If the band's sound falls somewhere between Motorhead and the Quick-silver Messenger Service, that's seems just about where it seems headed. (The CD adds two, including a cover of the Blue Öyster Cult's "Transmaniacan MC.")

While the title track of the four-song Shaved Beatnik 12-inch embraces Seedsy American retro-psychepunk to good effect, the quartet's endless version of Cream's "Sunshine of Your Love," "New! Improved! Blue Cheer" and "Dirty Water (From a Dirty Pond)" all come rocking out of a grungier garage. Skip this one.

With production and playing by the Bevis Frond, the Walkingseeds again run haphazardly hot and cold on Sensory Deprivation Chamber Quartet (aka the Dwarf LP), an intermittently entertaining ("People of the World Rise Up and Die," a tuneful slice of political nonsense, is the best track) mini-album that contrasts acoustic guitars with tube-blowing overdrive, crude pop with brain-burrowing crunch.

Bad Orb..Whirling Ball ties up all the stylistic loose ends, hitting a noisy but clear nostalgic acid-rock stride with strong material like "Gates of Freedom," "Broken Cup," "Caged Beatnik" and the Beatles' "She Said She Said," which easily endures the rough handling. Kramer's incisive production here keeps the level of Parker's guitar distortion inside functional limits; Martin's singing is likewise less ragged—and thus more enjoyable—than usual. Except for the needless repetition encouraged by excessive song lengths, Bad Orb is a really good disc [i]

WALKING WOUNDED

Walking Wounded (Stonegarden) 1986 •

The New West (Chameleon) 1987 •

Raging Winds of Time (Chameleon) 1989 •

Hard Times (Doctor Dream) 1991 •

JERRY GIDDENS

Livin' Ain't Easy (Mountain Railroad) 1989 •

If you can get past the bombastic self-importance and drama in Jerry Giddens' voice, the rich Western folk-rock originals on the studio side of Walking Wounded's debut album are catchy, crafty and well-played. Recorded in a Hollywood club as a percussionless trio, the acoustic live side—which repeats three of the flip's studio songs and adds four more—is entirely dominated by Giddens' overzealous delivery.

Formalizing a four-man selection from the small pool that played on the first LP, Walking Wounded sounds solidly commercial but less striking on The New West. Giddens' singing isn't quite as pushy, but the material and electric arrangements aren't as memorable, so the overall progress is slight. The LP includes one song redone from Walking Wounded, the CD appends the whole thing.

Raging Winds of Time unveils a potent new lineup, including guitarists Eddie Munoz (ex-Plimsouls) and Roger Prescott (ex-Pop), in between stints together as Tram Wreck Ghosts, Chalo Quintana (Havalinas) is the LP's drummer. The tastefully charged music is quite good; unfortunately, Giddens is still the singer (although he has improved a lot) and grimly earnest songwriter (his topic here is poverty and gang violence), a concentration of creative power which restricts his talented bandmates to supporting roles. [i]

See also Havalinas, Plimsouls, Pop.

WALL OF VOODOO

Wall of Voodoo EP (Index-IRS) 1980

Dark Continent (IRS) 1981

Call of the West (IRS) 1982 •

Granma's House (nr/IRS) 1984

Seven Days in Sammystown (IRS) 1985

Happy Planet (IRS) 1987 •

The Ugly Americans in Australia* (IRS) 1988 •

ANDY PRIEBOY

... Upon My Wicked Son (Doctor Dream) 1990 •

Montezuma Was a Man of Faith EP (Doctor Dream) 1991 •

Los Angeles' Wall of Voodoo makes junk music that can be extremely entertaining as long as you don't expect too much from it. Working in the same general cinematic groove as Devo, only taking their cues from Westerns and film noir rather than science fiction, Voodoo generate a stiff (though human) sound that furnishes a vivid backdrop to Stanard Ridgway's semi-catatonic vocals. Poised uneasily between machine music and rock'n'roll, Wall of Voodoo embodies the conflict between old and new for the serious-minded: classy Halloween music that's scary, but pleasantly so.

The four-song EP includes a wacked-out version of Johnny Cash's "Ring of Fire." The band displays more polish on Dark Continent, with tunes like "Back in Flesh" and "Full of Tension" benefiting from colorfully morose guitar and keyboards.

Call of the West's execution is livelier and more articulate, but just as spooky. It contains the now-classic "Mexican Radio," which crystallizes the band's loopy approach in one memorable number.

Ridgway left Wall of Voodoo in 1983 for a solo career; the band decided to replace him and continue. The 1984 compilation album, Granma's House, contains all of Voodoo's best tracks, from "Ring of Fire" to "Mexican Radio."

Unveiling new singer Andy Prieboy and a new drummer (Joe Nanini had departed in the interim), Wall of Voodoo returned to action with Seven Days in Sammystown, their first new album in three years. Ridgway's absence forced a major rethink of the band's sound and purpose; the record is adequate, but somewhat short of character and thus un compelling. "Far Side of Crazy" (ostensibly about John Hinckley, Jr.) and a dirgey cover of the old mining song "Dark as the Dungeon" are quite good, but the rest falls short. And Prieboy's failed attempt to mimic Ridgway (on "Big City") is a major faux pas.

The vanishing Devo left a wide open field of informed weirdness, but a uniformly costumed Voodoo failed to make anything more of the opportunity. Happy Planet reveals an intact sense of humor left dangling by an utter lack of demented invention. The band works over the Beach Boys' "Do It Again," converting it to their idiom but adding nothing substantial which would make it worth hearing; the rest of the album likewise takes aim at assorted cultural artifacts but lacks the requisite inspired oddness to make the songs truly original.

The Ugly Americans in Australia* is a rambunctious live disc recorded in Melbourne and (here's where the asterisk comes in) Bullhead City, Arizona. Stripped of studio comforts, the quartet (plus keyboard guest) gamely confronts old material like "Far Side of Crazy," "Mexican Radio" and "Ring of Fire," and introduces several newbies. (The cassette and CD add "The Grass Is Greener" and "Pretty Boy Floyd.")

Prieboy's solo album starts off with a witless but powerful rendition of Canned Heat's classic "On the Road Again" (hence the LP title) but then sticks to smart, full-bodied rock with Devoesque accents and offcenter lyrics for a while. (The low point comes early on, with "Tomorrow Wendy," a totally stupid number about mortality sung with Johnette Napolitano of Concrete Blonde. Not surprisingly, she liked the song enough to cover it on her band's Bloodletting.) From there, things spin further out, as Prieboy (whose personal stylistic orientation seems more Oingo Boingo than Wall of Voodoo) kicks out the conceptual jams with macho jive ("Man Talk") set to dramatic round'em-up/move'em-out music, cocktail party chatter over a driving piano line on "The New York Debut of an L.A. Artist (Jazz Crowd)" and, on one of two CD-only tracks, an operatic extravaganza entitled "Maybe That's Not Her Head." Strange but entertaining. The EP contains three non-LP tracks, including a duet with Napolitano on "Whole Lotta Love." [jy/i]

See also Human Hands, Stan Ridgway.

WANDERERS

Only Lovers Left Alive (nr/Polydor) 1981

This brief liaison between members of Sham 69 and ex-Dead Boy Stiv Bators set the stage for the subsequent Lords of the New Church, and resulted in one album. Although begun as a Sham 69 record (with Bators replacing singer Jimmy Pursey), contracts prevented its release as such; under the Wanderers name, it attracted almost no attention.

It deserved a better fate. Presenting legible rock with a strong political bent, Only Lovers Left Alive brings together loads of influences that had never been present in either faction's background, and synthesizes a varied, well-produced angry assault that's more radical in stance than music. In any case, the album is noteworthy for including a courageous rockified version of "The Times They Are A-Changin'." [i]

See also Dead Boys, Lords of the New Church, Sham 69.

WANG CHUNG

Points on the Curve (Geffen) 1984 •

To Live and Die in L.A. (Geffen) 1985 •

Mosaic (Geffen) 1986 •

The Warmer Side of Cool (Geffen) 1989 •

HUANG CHUNG

Huang Chung (Arista) 1982

Despite the exotic name, this posh British band plays familiar post-Ultravox pop—with saxophone instead of keyboards and less of a heavy dance beat—on Huang Chung. The talented and proficient quartet lacks only an identity and the first-rate songs that might have made it memorable.

Points on the Curve unveils several major changes, including the new spelling, a different label and a slimmed-down trio lineup (no more sax), now focused on singer Jack Hues. "Dance Hall Days" has dumb lyrics but a good rhythmic sound and a strong hook; "Wait" has dumb, awkward lyrics ("evidently/there's a difficulty") but a clever arrangement with synthesized strings and chimes for punctuation. Elsewhere, they essay dance-funk and Foreigner-like pomposity. Having banished its facelessness, Wang Chung is revealed in all its mediocrity.

And then there were two. Drummer Darren Costin formed a band called Heroes which released an LP (Here We Are) in 1987. The remaining members of Wang Chung (Hues and multi-instrumentalist Nick Feldman), meanwhile, wrote and recorded the soundtrack for the movie To Live and Die in L.A.—a good title song plus lots of expendable atmospheric instrumentals.

That same slender lineup, aided by drummer/producer Peter Wolf, a horn section and a stack of backup singers, created Mosaic, another stylish and trivial synth-dance (plus the horrific ballad "Betrayal") pursuit which happened to contain one catchy and clever number, "Let's Go," and the monster hit single/video clip "Everybody Have Fun Tonight." (Which Tom Jones reportedly sang in his act for a while, changing the lyrics to "Everyone Tom Jones tonight!")

After a long vacation, Wolf shifted to keyboards and produced The Warmer Side of Cool, a smoothly bland collection of relatively restrained retreats (a little Police, a lot of Wang Chung) that can't muster a single track as irritatingly catchy as "Everybody Have Fun Tonight." Although Feldman's lyrics make Hues' sound positively brilliant, neither man has anything of substantial artistic value to offer. Only two songs—"Praying to a New God" and "What's So Bad About Feeling Good?"—are worth a fig, so you can safely turn the record off after eight minutes without missing much. I can't imagine why anyone would actually want to own this. [i]

WARSAW PAKT

Needle Time! (nr/Island) 1977

Out of London's exploding early punk scene came this novelty—an album that reached local shops within 24 hours of the start of its recording! The band wasn't anything extraordinary—just amateur working class thrash'n'bash—but the speedy creation of the record made quite a stir for a few moments. The record came packed in a mailing envelope covered with stickers and rubber stamps; the insert sheet includes a complete log of the 21 hours it took to finish. Bizarre. [i]

See also Social Deviants.

WARTIME

See Henry Rollins.

WASHINGTON SQUARES

Washington Squares (Gold Castle) 1987 •

Fair and Square (Gold Castle) 1989 •

Outfitted with uniform berets, conservative suits, black sunglasses and acoustic guitars, these three New Yorkers escaped a post-punk background (ex-rock crit Lauren Agnelli's former band was Nervus Rex; Tom Goodkind's varied career on the local scene included such '70s bands as U.S. Ape; Bruce Jay Paskow was in the Invaders) the to shoulder the untended responsibility of being the nouveau in-crowd's answer to Peter, Paul & Mary.

Despite the inexcusably pretentious folk-beatnik pose, the band's evident sincerity and their attractive harmonies give the first album its own inherent validity. But the lyrics are simpleminded, and the trio's treatment of two traditional songs isn't very nice. Ex-Television drummer Billy Ficca and producer Mitch Easter (on piano) help out.

Winningly produced by Steven Soles, Fair and Square pushes the Squares further towards a musical personality they can legitimately claim as their own. Alongside well-chosen and adequately performed covers of Leonard Cohen and Hoyt Axton (the classic "Greenback Dollar"), some of the originals are quite good. "Join Together" is a rousing populist anthem that should have circulated in the '60s; "The Other Side of Sin" rediscovers folk-rock with reedy innocence and a voice that frighteningly resembles Freddie Mercury in spots. But when the pose dominates, as in a precious tribute to Neal Casady, the whole thing goes out the window. (And why dredge up Quicksilver Messenger Service's wretched "Pride of Man"?) [i]

WAS (NOT WAS)

Was (Not Was) (ZE-Island) 1981 •

Born to Laugh at Tomadoes (ZE-Geffen) 1983 •

What Up, Dog? (Chrysalis) 1988 •

Are You Okay? (Chrysalis) 1990 •

Shattering the imaginary divisions between "black music" and "white music," Detroiters David (Weiss; sax, flute, keyboards, vocals) and Don (Fagenson; bass, keyboards, guitar) Was use undated soul and funk as a flexible backdrop for their alternately serious and sarcastic commentary. The historical problem with a lot of dance music has been its rabid dissociation from intellect; more than almost any other group, Was (Not Was) obliterates that gap. The first album's material, while drawing on such familiar sources as Grace Jones and Stevie Wonder, blends in enough humor and cleverness to make virtually every song an original gem, including the disco hits "Out Come the Freaks" and "Tell Me That I'm Dreaming" (which includes mutilated found vocals by Ronald Reagan). The remarkable cast of players is a disparate mix of rock and funk: among the many contributors are Wayne Kramer (ex-MC5), Larry Fratangelo (P-Funk), Bruce Nazarian (Brownsville Station) and Frank McCullers (Wild Cherry).

Born to Laugh at Tornadoes is a conceptual tour de force, a cavalcade of incongruous guest vocalists. Among the stars on parade: Ozzy Osbourne, Mel Tormé, Mitch Ryder and Doug Fieger of the Knack. Also in attendance: Wayne Kramer, Marshall Crenshaw, Vinnie Vincent and many others. The Was Bros. originals typically mix wisecrack/devolution lyrics with muscular soul-funk-rock, making the album enjoyable on at least three levels—powerful dance music, cleverly worded smart-aleckdom and super-session bizarreness.

Kings of cross-fertilization, Was (Not Was) have worked with an eclectic variety of artists; mostly on his own, Don Was has produced Bonnie Raitt, the B-52's, Bob Dylan and Iggy Pop. In the late '80s, they put their own group back in gear, reuniting with singers Sweet Pea Atkinson and Sir Harry Bowens and a stack of sympathetic sidemen to implement their imaginative vision of dance music. Beginning with "Somewhere in America There's a Street Named After My Dad," which has a relaxed Steely Dan feel, and ending with the mondo bizarro "Dad I'm in Jail," which owes more to the Butthole Surfers, What Up, Dog? encompasses the broad stylistic palette of the pair's past experiments and proceeds outward from there. Among the highlights: a lively overhaul of "Out Come the Freaks" with new lyrics, the hysterical "Earth to Doris," the poshly soulful "Love Can Be Bad Luck," an "Under the Boardwalk" rewrite co-penned by David Was and Elvis Costello and the funky paleontology of "Walk the Dinosaur." The resequenced CD also boasts a cushy ballad sung by Frank Sinatra Jr., a crisp cover of Otis Redding's "I Can't Turn You Loose" and two others.

Are You Okay? puts musical innovation on the back burner to concentrate on offbeat lyrics ("In K Mart Wardrobe," "I Blew Up the United States," "Elvis' Rolls Royce") and an endless stream of guest vocalists—Leonard Cohen, Syd Straw, Iggy Pop, the Roches and rapper G Love E, who puts his stamp on an otherwise straight (albeit updated) cover of the Temptations' "Papa Was a Rolling Stone." David Was' numb delivery of the spoken "I Feel Better Than James Brown" puts a bizarre twist on the sarcastic lyrics. Despite the album's narrower stylistic focus, Are You Okay? again demonstrates how dance music can be enormous, captivating fun, even for confirmed couch potatoes. [sg/i]

WATERBOYS

A Girl Called Johnny EP (nr/Chicken Jazz) 1982

December EP (nr/Ensign) 1983

The Waterboys EP (Ensign-Island) 1983

The Waterboys (nr/Ensign) 1983 (Ensign-Chrysalis)

1986 •

A Pagan Place (Ensign-Island) 1984 (Ensign-Chrysalis)

1987 •

This Is the Sea (Island) 1985 (Ensign-Chrysalis) 1987 •

Fisherman's Blues (Ensign-Chrysalis) 1988 •

Room to Room (Ensign-Chrysalis) 1990 •

The Best of the Waterboys '81-'90 (Ensign-Chrysalis) 1991 •

Edinburgh-born singer/guitarist/pianist Mike Scott formed the Waterboys in London, singing bombastic folk-rock derived in equal parts from U2, Bruce Springsteen and Bob Dylan. On The Waterboys (and its five-song American condensation, later supplanted by a belated issue of the entire LP), Scott, saxophonist Anthony Thistlethwaite, an organist and various rhythm players squeeze every ounce of drama into his preciously poetic lyrics and pseudo-epic melodies. Enough of a selfconsciously sensitive artiste to confuse extended song length and artistic depth, Scott comes off as a modestly talented blowhard.

Having reused three of the eight songs (including the Rupert Hine-produced "A Girl Called Johnny") from the early EPs on The Waterboys, two more (including the torturous I-read-a-book-so-now-I-understand-history "Red Army Blues"—all eight minutes of it!) were recycled on the wretched A Pagan Place, a horrific realization of Scott's grandiose vision. With Welsh keyboardist Karl Wallinger and a drummer joining the Scott/Thistlethwaite nucleus, the Waterboys overlay mountains of acoustic guitars, horns and vocals to build majestically Spectoresque sand castles ("Church Not Made with Hands," "A Pagan Place") that are as flimsy as Scott's sophomoric lyrics. If Jimmy Webb had happened into the studio, an ultimate remake of "MacArthur Park" would have been inevitable. (Incidentally, one of the record's backup singers is Eddi Reader, later the voice of Fairground Attraction.)

An overambitious variety of production styles—piano-based simplicity on "Spirit," vocal gimmicks and "Penny Lane" horns on "The Whole of the Moon," the Pagan Place-styled title track and the insufferable amped-up guitar rock of "Don't Bang the Drum" and "Be My Enemy"—leaves This Is the Sea an unfocused mess. Scott's melodic sense (if not his lyrics) is actually improving, although habitual overstatement makes it hard to notice.

Wallinger went off to form World Party and Scott (who had sung "Old England is dying" on This Is the Sea) moved to Ireland and formed a new band with Thistlethwaite (now playing more mandolin than sax). In a remarkable case of self-willed ethnic transubstantiation, Fisherman's Blues (which ironically includes the song "World Party") unveiled the Waterboys Mark II, a neo-traditional Irish folk-rock group. Without raising questions as to Scott's sincerity, entitlement or motivation, wholesale appropriation of a cultural that still has genuine practitioners remains a fairly dubious (albeit not unknown) basis for a band. Where the Pogues concocted an original identity from old ingredients, the Waterboys merely copy what they've heard. But in fairness, the album is entirely bad: the Van Morrison-stylings are superficially attractive, and rollicking songs like "And a Bang on the Ear," "Has Anybody Here Seen Hank?" and "When Will Be Married?" make fine use of the folk idiom. The Waterboys don't bring much originality to this music, but they imitate it well enough to get by. (The CD adds a pair of acoustic instrumentals featuring Steve Wickham on fiddle.)

Scott's identification with Ireland gets even more intense on Room to Roam, a sprightly mixture of fiddle, tin whistle, accordion, mandolin. With appropriately rustic melodies and dreamy, romantic subject matter, the Waterboys strive desperately to be a youthful pop version of the Chieftains. Scott pledges his troth to the Emerald Isle in "Islandman" (one of the album's two incongruous electric rockers; there's also a swanky ballroom ballad) and celebrates the town in which the LP was recorded. Okay, okay, we believe you! But the album's best track is a straight rendition of the genuinely traditional "Raggle Taggle Gypsy," an exercise which underscores the shortcomings in Scott's own songwriting and the overall redundancy of the group. Room to Roam—fiddle tunes notwithstanding—misses the point of folk music by a country mile. [i]

See also World Party.

JACK WATERSON

See Green on Red.

BEN WATT

See Everything but the Girl.

JOHN WATTS

See Fischer-Z.

WAVES

See Katrina and the Waves.

WAXING POETICS

Hermitage (Emergo) 1987

Manakin Moon (Emergo) 1988 •

Bed Time Story (Emergo) 1990 •

On its first album, this sturdy power pop quartet from Norfolk, Virginia had the benefit of co-production by Mitch Easter and R.E.M.'s Mike Mills (who also contributes piano on one song). Keeping things plain and simple, Hermitage eschews any strong personality or overt influences to walk a unpretentiously straightforward line through the tuneful New South.

Exchanging the casual clothes of the first album's portraits for more formal black leather jackets, the Poetics also hardened their musical stance on the nicely varied and spunky Manakin Moon. The songs are still tuneful, but lyrics about death and ghosts are matched by a semi-tough heartland rock sound with strong rhythms and gritty guitar. Displaying a propensity for offbeat covers, the Poetics take on Eno's "Needles in the Camel's Eye" and give it a credibly understated reading (The CD adds a bonus track.)

A deep and unsettling investigation of the Poetics' maturing musical obsessions, Bed Time Story ambitiously plunges into atmospheric tough-edged rock-'n'-roll and country. From such moody/edgy originals as "The Attic or the Underground" to an ominous version of Wreckless Eric's "Semaphore Signals," this provocative record is unlikely to help anyone sleep easier. The House of Freaks help out on "Jet Black Plastic Pistol"; the CD adds a live recording of "The Tram Kept a-Rollin'." [i]

WE ARE GOING TO EAT YOU

I Wish I Knew EP (nr/All the Madmen) 1987

Everywhen (TVT) 1989 •

Pop lives in the luscious textures of this snazzy London quartet. Despite the stupid name, We Are Going to Eat You have a magic formula, blending Julie Sorrel's cool, heavenly voice, Paul Harding's bracing guitar chords and catchy, other-worldly tunes, largely written by drummer Chris Knowles, once the only male in a pop-punk band called Hagar the Womb. While the 12-inch EP is decent enough, Everywhen is a gas, with "If You Believe," "Glorious" and "Each Life a Mystery" achieving a state of three-minute grace. File with Buzzcocks, Primitives, Darling Buds. [jy]

WEATHERMEN

Ten Deadly Kisses (nr/Play It Again Sam) 1987 •

The Black Album According to the Weathermen (Play It Again Sam) 1988 •

Beyond the Beyond (Bel. Play It Again Sam) 1990 (Mute) 1991 •

Besides being one of the few contemporary techno-dance bands to draw its primary synthetic inspiration from Kraftwerk, this hybrid California/European duo is nearly alone in bringing an easy sense of humor to what is, at least in a sense, industrial music. With samples and repetitive rhythmic patterns connecting the Weathermen to far more abrasive club fiends, the clever and ingratiating Ten Deadly Kisses blends light, repetitive blip-rock and loopy lyrics into a meeting between Yello pop (less the continental snootiness) and Wall of Voodoo. Neat stuff.

The Black Album is heavier, harder and crazier, a rock record played on synthesizers that produce dinky-bop squiggles as well as more aggressively weird noises. In place of the first LP's monotonous grooves, the music here moves around a lot, while the vocals run from a quietly kinky socio-sexual conversation between "Barbie and Ken" to the melodramatic sci-fi nightmare of "Twisting Doorknob" to the ominous whisper of "Punishment Park." Lurid fun that never stops grinning, The Black Album offers solace to those looking for new thrills now that Devo is out of the running.

Miles better than either of those, however, Beyond the Beyond is a hard-driving and penetrating critique of contemporary America with the engrossing qualities of a short-story collection and the humor of an underground comic. Whether attacking mindless culture ("Custom Brain"), American adventurism abroad ("Heatseeker") or televangelism ("Freedom or Slavery"), the Weathermen make their points with accuracy and abundant wit; when they shift their sights to tell odd little stories of personal degradation ("Such a Beautiful City," "California or Bust," "Muzak"), the panoply of pop culture reference points makes them even more entertaining. [i]

WEATHER PROPHETS

Almost Prayed EP (nr/Creation) 1986
Why Does the Rain EP (nr/Elevation-WEA) 1987
Mayflower (nr/Elevation-WEA) 1987
Judges, Juries & Horsemen (Creation-Relativity) 1988 •
Hollow Heart EP (nr/Creation) 1988
Temperance Hotel ... (nr/Creation) 1989 (Giant) 1990 •

As a vehicle for singer/guitarist Peter Astor, the Weather Prophets of the four-song Almost Prayed 12-inch were proponents of ultra-mild pop, exceedingly pleasant trifles with provocatively off-center lyrics. Lenny Kaye's production on Mayflower, the quartet's longplaying debut, put some starch in the Prophets' sound, bringing the rhythm section into play but keeping things tastefully light and, if anything, faintly countryish. Astor's singing is likewise more forthcoming, but Mayflower—and Why Does the Rain (a 12-inch containing an LP track, a sloppy BBC session version of "Mayflower" and a cool instrumental, "Annalea")—is still a few volts short of captivating. Only "Naked as the Day You Were Born," an organ-based three-chord number that seems to be straining towards a minor freak-out, hints that the band would not always be limited to such politeness.

Dropping guitarist Oisín Little from the lineup (although he still plays on half the tracks), the Weather Prophets made the uneven Astor-produced second album as a rocking trio. Despite a few individual exceptions (like the sublimely emotional "Born Inbetween" and the hip distorto-pop of "Hollow Heart"), Judges, Juries & Horsemen is a meandering and uninvolved indulgence in need of clear direction. One interesting item is the intense '60sish "Thursday Seems a Year Ago," in which bassist Greenwood Goulding's organ work clearly prefigures Inspirational Carpets et al.

Temperance Hotel collects up some of the Prophets' best scraps: a half-dozen charming BBC radio session tracks from 1986, four B-sides (including "Chinese Cadillac"), two demos (one a nifty version of the gospel "I Saw the Light") and both sides of a bizarre single ("Odds & Ends" b/w "Stepping Lightly on the Ancient Path") that was included in early UK copies of Judges, Juries & Horsemen. Not only is this compilation as enjoyable as either of the band's proper albums, it's no more stylistically disparate than the second. (The CD adds a pair of 1989 live recordings: "Hollow Heart" and "Chinese Cadillac.") [i]

WEDDING PRESENT

The Peel Session EP (nr/Strange Fruit) 1986 •
George Best (nr/Reception) 1987 •
Ukrainki Vistupi v Johna Peela (nr/Reception) 1988
(nr/RCA) 1989 •
Tommy (nr/Reception) 1988 •
Why Are You Being So Reasonable Now? EP
(nr/Reception) 1988 •
Janice Long Evening Show EP (nr/Night Tracks-Strange Fruit) 1988 •
Kennedy EP (nr/RCA) 1989
Bizarro (nr/RCA) 1989 (RCA) 1990 •
Brassneck EP (nr/RCA) 1990
Corduroy EP (nr/RCA) 1990

When the Smiths stepped down as England's reigning indie-pop superstars in 1987, Leeds' Wedding Present—led by semi-insufferable/semi-witty singer/songwriter David Gedge—was conveniently poised to fill the vast cultural void that created with a carefully cultivated package of music and attitude, a balance of arrogance and insouciance, archness and populism, art and artlessness. The quartet's initial work—catchy, rushed, loud guitar pop singles reeking of the Smiths, New Order and Joy Division—could not have been more certain to win the hearts and minds of self-obsessed sensitivos lost in a collegiate world of romance and books if a computer had swallowed up a decade's worth of classic records and spewed the best bits back onto tape. In a sense, the Wedding Present represents the last hurrah of the new wave, the ultimate sublimation of independence for commerce.

All that said, however, the Wedding Present have made some eminently likable records, displayed an inordinately good sense of humor and generally managed their career with wonderfully mischievous unpredictability.

After releasing a boisterous Peel Session EP (recorded in February '86), the Wedding Present named its first album—for no discernible reason—after soccer star George Best, who appears on the cover. With guitarist Pete Solowka strumming away as if his right hand were on fire and the unfussy rhythm section keeping energetic pace, Gedge delivers his offbeat flurries of small-scale perception ("Everyone Thinks He Looks Daft," "It's What You Want That Matters," "My Favourite Dress," "Shatner") in an artless semi-singing voice that, while unlike Morrissey's (especially in the avoidance of moaning), is similarly idiosyncratic and cavalier with regard to melody.

Inspired by Solowka's father and employing a guest vocalist/balalaika player and a mandolinist, the group then took a detour into traditional Ukrainian folk music (including "Those Were the Days," a 1968 hit for Mary Hopkin) on the Ukrainki Vistupi v Johna Peela LP. It's sort of fun in a let's-go-exploring sense, but the augmentation as well as the material makes it difficult to consider as part of the band's oeuvre, and the intent—genuine or simply willful—is equally hard to pin down.

The archly titled Tommy summarizes the band's first two years, with singles ("This Boy Can Wait," "Once More," the pre-LP version of "My Favourite Dress") and radio sessions from '85 and '86. The Janice Long radio session was recorded two months after the Peel tracks, some of which also appear on Tommy.

The between-albums EP of "Why Are You Being So Reasonable Now?" contains a French variation on the title track, an acoustic version of George Best's "Give My Love to Kevin," the group's contribution ("Getting Better") to Sgt. Pepper Knew My Father and another non-LP track.

It took American noise producer Steve Albini (whose four tracks were issued in the UK as Brassneck and added to the American CD and cassette of the otherwise uneventful Bizarro, a mature effort that sorely lacks George Best's breathless rush) to push the Wedding Present off its increasingly precious perch. While Gedge's offhand ruminations are still delivered in something of Ian Curtis-fan-next-door voice, the sound of Solowka burning out amplifiers presents an exciting distraction and is far more enjoyable than his usual cloying jangle. Kennedy is a 12-inch that surrounds the title tune (a Madchester-styled Bizarro preview) with three non-LP cuts. [i]

WEEKEND

See Young Marble Giants.

WEEN

God Ween Satan—The Oneness (Twin/Tone) 1990 •

The things nerdy misanthropes do when they think no one's listening. Kicking off their why-stop-at-fifteen-tracks-when-there's-still-tape-left? debut double-album with a shrieking diatribe entitled "You Fucked Up," New Hope, PA's Dean and Gene Ween (aka Mickey Melchiondo and Aaron Freeman) play around in a dada sandbox of made-up voices and devolved musical idioms for more than an hour. Fortunately, the duo's silly sonic supermarket isn't all crude, cacophonous or sophomoric: poorly disguised musical skills and a sharp sense of parodic humor make God Ween Satan (produced by Andrew Weiss of Rollins Band) an entertaining, if unpredictable, shaggy dog story that can go from delightful genius to infuriating annoyance in seconds. From the remorseless munchkin dink-pop of "Don't Laugh (I Love You)" to a funky cover of Prince's "Shockadelica," a two-line demento jazz-blues ("I Gots a Weasel") to overweight Hawkwind metal ("Mushroom Festival in Hell"), breezy reggae ("Nicole") to fake flamenco ("El Camino"), the Ween'll-eat-anything ethos confronts an enormous agenda and comes up a winner. There's even a Beastie Boys send-up ("Old Queen Cole") and an incisive nineteen-second Springsteen parody ("Old Man Thunder"). Give up? Just holler Ween! [i]

WEIRDOS

Who? What? When? Where? Why? EP (Bompl) 1979

Action Design EP (Rhino) 1980

Condor (Frontier) 1990 •

Weird World 1977-1981 Time Capsule Volume One (Frontier) 1991 •

The Weirdos were arguably the first and best entrant in late-'70s Los Angeles punk. The crunching powerhouse wallop of "Destroy All Music" (the band's first 45) and the incendiary "(We've Got the) Neutron Bomb"—a classic US punk singles—provided a convincing reply to those who dismissed the efforts of Southern California youth in 1977. Unfortunately, the quintet splintered before the Weirdos began making longer records, leaving the Denney brothers (singer John and guitarist Dix) and guitarist Cliff Roman to carry on, employing various sidemen with stellar but less poignant results.

With ex-Quick (later Three O'Clock, etc.) drummer Danny Benair, the six-song Who? What? When? Where? Why? is an appealing blend of punk, psychobilly (a bizarre cover of Hank Mizzel's '50s obscurity, "Jungle Rock") and gonzo rock with unsettling lyrics.

Action Design adds only four selections to the Weirdos' oeuvre (including a pedestrian rendition of the Doors' "Break on Through"), but "The Hideout" finds the Denneys at their most sinister, offering a lowriders' invitation to dark places. The silly "Helium Bar" is a frantically irreverent pogothon.

Although the Weirdos split soon after, the group never completely vanished. They did reunion shows throughout the '80s and made semi-regular home recordings. In '88, the Denneys formally relaunched the Weirdos. The all-new Condor features original drummer Nickey Beat (Alexander) and Cliff Roman in a part-time role, playing a bit of synthesizer and sharing bass chores with Flea (on loan from the Red Hot Chili Peppers). This inconsistent LP suffers from the long layoff, but the old flair for mildly subversive rock surfaces on such head-rushing hyper-punk zaniness as "Cyclops Helicopter" and the more conventional "Shining Silver Light."

Weird World is a compilation of early 45s, demos and other unreleased items. [jr]

See also Lydia Lunch, Thelonious Monster.

WENDY AND LISA

Wendy and Lisa (Columbia) 1987 •

Fruit at the Bottom (Columbia) 1989 •

Eroica (Virgin) 1990 ◊

On their maiden voyage away from former führer Prince, ex-Revolution guitarist Wendy Melvoin and keyboard player Lisa Coleman delivered a generous helping of smooth, likable tunes. The lyrical department is a little shakier, sometimes veering into bathos—"The Life," "Song About" (guess who). But the compositions show flashes of harmonic and structural daring, and there's no faulting Wendy and Lisa's chops: they play almost all the instruments. Respectable, if not Revolutionary.

Succeeding albums have shown Wendy and Lisa to be musically restless. Fruit at the Bottom is a virtual song cycle about falling in, out of and again in, love. Holding to that theme, the lyrics are almost simplistic, and the danceable pop-funk has little of the musically progressive tendencies of the pair's debut. The fearlessly and humorously titled Eroica, on the third hand, dives into a rococo whirlpool of textures, with deeper lyrics to match. Dense sonic layering and impressionistic imagery exude a '60s-revivalist fragrance; the ambiguous emotions the words call up are less bound to stylistic convention. And Wendy and Lisa still play almost all the instruments. More than respectable. [si]

See also Prince.

WEST INDIA COMPANY

See Blancmange.

JOHN WETTON

See Phil Manzanera, Roxy Music.

WE'VE GOT A FUZZBOX AND WE'RE GONNA USE IT

We've Got a Fuzzbox and We're Gonna Use It EP (nr/Vindaloo) 1986

Bostin' Steve Austin (nr/Vindaloo-WEA) 1986 •

FUZZBOX

We've Got a Fuzzbox and We're Gonna Use It! (Vindaloo-Geffen) 1986

International Rescue EP (nr/WEA) 1989 •

Big Bang! (Geffen) 1989 •

These four young misses from Birmingham took over-the-top hairdos, colorful clothes and a devil-may-care amateurish attitude straight into the British Top 30 with their five-song debut EP. (All of the songs are one side of a 12-inch; the flip uses the vinyl only as a medium for scratched-in portraits of the group.) Proud of their lack of instrumental prowess (rightly so—it's a main part of their appeal), WGAFWGUI simultaneously exploits and satirizes the prurient tabloid mentality on great cuts like "X X Sex" and "She." And isn't "Aaarrggghh!!!" a totally inspired title? Musically, the songs are built around rudimentary drums and guitar (yes, they do use their fuzzbox), occasional bass and unbridled enthusiasm. A real breath of fresh air.

The quartet's splendid name was truncated to just Fuzzbox for the retitled American release of Bostin' Steve Austin, which actually has music on both sides. Along with two songs redone from the EP, the well-played record includes the world's worst version of Norman Greenbaum's "Spirit in the Sky" and a bunch of new originals that waffle between Banglish girl-group harmony pop ("What's the Point," "Love Is the Slug," "You Got Me") and chanted dancebeats. In a far more professional setting, Jo's distorto guitar drones along nicely at varying levels; arrangements also feature sax and keyboards. "Preconceptions," which might have been a poppy X-Ray Spex number, ends the album on a bewildering note, instructing listeners to "pay less attention to the packaging and listen to the voice!"

After proving that they could adapt their bubblepunk to major-league record-making without sacrificing their inspired-amateur spirit, the quartet made an abrupt about-face on Big Bang!, which recasts Fuzzbox as a slick dance-pop vocal group, with the spotlight on budding sex symbol Vickie. Though the album's smooth, heavily programmed sound (no musician credits, but the women apparently did little or no playing) seems a complete repudiation of Fuzzbox's DIY roots, "Pink Sunshine," "Fast Forward Futurama" and "International Rescue" (all co-written by Liam Sternberg) are big, brassy fun nonetheless, and demonstrate scads more personality and humor than most commercial girly-pop. Still, it's sad to hear Fuzzbox go straight—though a remake of Yoko Ono's "Walking on Thin Ice" demonstrates a few remaining quirks. [dgs/i/hd]

WHAT IS THIS

Squeezed EP (San Andreas) 1984

What Is This (MCA) 1985

3 Out of 5 Live EP (MCA) 1985

Wild, muscular rock-funk with a demented outlook, LA's What Is This bears more than a passing resemblance to the Red Hot Chili Peppers, but that's no mystery—guitarist Hillel Slovak formed What Is This after leaving the Peppers, whom he rejoined after making Squeezed. Chris Hutchinson and Jack Irons (who later played briefly with Redd Kross) ride a fearsome rhythm behemoth, and Alain Johannes and Slovak both provide offbeat songs ("Mind My Have Still I" isn't even the weirdest), unnervingly mental vocals and psycho guitar licks, making Squeezed a gut'n'butt-shaking experience you won't soon forget.

Cut as a Slovak-free trio, What Is This (produced by Todd Rundgren) is a less invigorating move towards the rhythmic rock mainstream. Some of the excitement remains, but not enough. The subsequent EP adds live versions of three numbers to a pair of album cuts. [i]

See also Red Hot Chili Peppers.

CARON WHEELER

See Soul II Soul.

WHEN PEOPLE WERE SHORTER AND LIVED NEAR THE WATER

When People Were Shorter and Lived Near the Water EP

(Trace Elements) 1987

Uncle Ben EP (Shimmy-Disc) 1988

Bobby (Shimmy-Disc) 1989 •

Not quite an artsy avant-garde ensemble and not exactly a wacky party band, this Brooklyn sextet—led by singer Kim Rancourt—specializes in anarchic trashings of pop marginalia. The group's first two releases—both four-song 7-inch EPs—consist of enjoyable if somewhat aimless cover-version devilry. The first features a hopped-up rendition of Ray Davies' "Dandy" (a hit for Herman's Hermits) as well as a rock adaptation of the Gettysburg Address (!). Uncle Ben takes similar swipes at Herb Alpert, the Singing Nun, Eric Burdon and the Buoys; on the last two (Burdon's psychedelic non-classic "A Girl Names Sandoz" and the Rupert Holmes-penned Top 40 cannibalism epic, "Timothy"), WPWS&LNTW finally work up enough musical steam to endow their output with something more substantial than theoretical interest.

Bobby, the band's first full-length album, is a collection of fifteen Bobby Goldsboro covers, many of them unrecognizable as such in these interpretations. Depending on your frame of reference, it's either a deeply ambivalent treatise on the duality of popular culture or a colossal in-joke by artsy bohos with too much free time on their hands. Bobby isn't exactly an affectionate tribute, but it's not a complete joke, either. (The Bobby cassette includes the contents of Uncle Ben; the CD adds two more tracks to that pairing.)

In late 1990, Shimmy-Disc's planned release of the band's Porgy—an album of tunes from Porgy and Bess—was temporarily held up due to legal objections by the Gershwin estate and was not issued until mid-'91. [hd]

WHIRLWIND

Blowin' Up a Storm (nr/Chiswick) 1977

Midnight Blue (nr/Chiswick) 1980

This London quartet (named after a Charlie Rich Sun recording) was one of the first English rockabilly bands to emerge at a time when the music press was looking for the "next big thing" after punk. On its debut, Blowin' Up a Storm, Whirlwind—whether by design or simply limited competence—offers up a bare-bones style, with little or no concession to the advancement in recording quality since the originals. The instrumentation is semi-traditional (one lead guitar, one muted-bass-strings rhythm guitar, electric bass and snare drum) and was recorded with no overdubbing, resulting in a sound that can charitably be called thin.

While painstakingly trying to recapture the simplicity of early rockabilly recordings, Whirlwind never manages to re-create the frenzied, fiery abandon that is really what it was all about.

Midnight Blue, recorded over two years later, shows the group past its hang-ups about purity: the sound is filled-out, the drummer plays an entire kit (albeit with amazing clumsiness at times) and pedal-steel guitar even finds its way onto one track. While an improvement over the first LP, Midnight Blue still fails to present any clear reason why anybody would want to listen to it, when both the originals and far more imaginative updates like the Stray Cats are available.

A decade later, singer Nigel Dixon unexpectedly popped up as the vocalist for Paul Simonon new band, Havana 3 A.M. [ds]

See also Clash.

WHIRLYWORLD

Whirlyworld EP (Aus. Missing Link) 1980

On their four-song 12-inch (original copies of which included a bonus 45), Whirlyworld combines guitar, bass, drums and electronics—not synthesizers—to make lots of staccato noise over which Ian “Ollie” Olsen can dispense his own brand of doom and gloom. This sort of amelodic anger has to be compelling to succeed, but Whirlyworld aren’t and don’t. Surprisingly, when the pioneering Melbourne quartet (considered locally to be Australia’s home-spun Suicide) gets relatively conventional on the final track, the savagery of their ska styling does indeed make you sit up and take note.

Keyboardist Olsen, whose pre-Whirlyworld band also boasted future Birthday Party guitarist Rowland S. Howard, scored and served as musical director of the 1987 film Dogs in Space, which starred INXS singer Michael Hutchence. A reformed Whirlyworld contributed two songs to the soundtrack, one with Hutchence as their vocalist. Hutchence and Olsen subsequently launched a side project called Max Q. [jg/i]

See also INXS.

JAMES WHITE

See James Chance.

WHITE ZOMBIE

Psycho-head Blowout (Silent Explosion) 1986

Soul-Crusher (Silent Explosion) 1987 (Caroline) 1988

Make Them Die Slowly (Caroline) 1989 •

“God of Thunder” EP (Caroline) 1989

These trashy troglodytes began life as a high-density cross between the Birthday Party and Black Sabbath, just one of the noisy grunge-rock outfits common around New York in the late ’80s. But then the quartet’s brutish strain of lysergic madness bloomed into something far more distinctive.

Although the dank Psycho-head Blowout EP evinces some potential, the album isn’t gripping enough to truly terrify. On Soul-Crusher, however, corrosive monstrosities with titles like “Ratmouth,” “Drowning the Colossus” and “Scum-Kill” cower in your subconscious, pounding for release. A vague scent of the blues permeates Tom Five’s dissonant guitar scrawl, while Rob Straker sings like he has razor-sharpened tonsils —a strangled off-key yowl to rival the young Foetus or Nick Cave. In addition, his bizarre, stream-of-consciousness lyrics (a sample: “Ze wheels o’ fire/a doubleman defier/a motor and I/regenerate I am your final Pompeii/o’ etched in acid/like a shack of hate”) are the work of a finely demented mind.

Make Them Die Slowly is markedly different from its predecessor. New guitarist John Ricci, who left shortly thereafter, dispenses with Five’s squealing Beefheartisms in favor of ominous, stripped-down riffing, like the mosh segments of Slayer songs. Sean Yseult’s bass throb is nearly inaudible, weakened by Bill Laswell’s trebly production, but the songs deliver the goods, especially the almost funky “Disaster Blaster” and the viciously inexorable “Acid Flesh.”

The “God of Thunder” 12-inch more than makes up for the LP’s production inadequacies. Capturing the full grotty fury of their live gigs, the three Daniel Rey-produced tunes (a great Kiss cover, an improved remake of “Disaster Blaster” and one ace new cut) scour the pants off their other recordings. And the liberal use of samples (from Phantasm, porn flicks and Kiss Alive) points White Zombie in a colorful new direction. [gef]

BARRENCE WHITFIELD AND THE SAVAGES

Barrence Whitfield and the Savages (Mamou) 1984 •

Dig Yourself (Rounder) 1985

Call of the Wild EP (nr/Rounder Europa-Demon) 1987

Owl Owl Owl (Rounder) 1987 •

Live Emulsified (Rounder) 1989 •

Let’s Lose It (Fr. New Rose) 1990 •

The music young New Jersey native Barry White had in mind was entirely different from the bass soul cooing of his namesake so, when the Boston University student decided to shout gutbucket R&B with a swinging band, he became Barrence Whitfield. On the spectacular first album, backed by a frisky quartet of young, greasy roadhouse rockers (including a couple of ex-Lyres), he stakes his reverent claim to the priceless hipshake legacy of Screaming Jay Hawkins and other venerable titans of primal rock’n’roll. Whitfield is a tremendous vocalist with a bloodcurdling falsetto, the enthusiasm of a drunk amateur and the easy control of a seasoned pro. The Savages—especially saxman Steve LaGrega—keep pace on wacky old numbers like “Bip Bop Bip,” “Mama Get the Hammer” and “Georgia Slop,” contributing likely originals to this raw adventure that hardly seems like it was recorded in 1984.

The brief but exhilarating Dig Yourself adds a little surface sheen and showband politesse to the proceedings, but still contains a weekend’s worth of sweaty, sexy excitement. “Juicy Fruit,” “Geronimo’s Rock” and “Breadbox” fit all the pieces together in a sweet frenzy, but the remaining tracks are almost as good.

Whitfield recorded Call of the Wild, a six-song 12-inch released only in the UK, with an entirely new set of Savages, revamping the sound with piano and organ as well as a slicker, steadier rhythm section. Not as wildly thrilling as either previous record, this takes a tamer posture and reduces the fun accordingly: Ben Vaughn’s bluesy but lightweight “Apology Line” indicates Whitfield’s moderate direction here. The American Owl! Owl!

Ow! album expands the EP with four more tracks recorded around the same time. It's likable enough—this man can sing—but seriously short in the funkalcious spirit that makes the earlier ones so precious.

Some, but not all, of Whitfield's old fervor is back on Live Emulsified, an enjoyable—though only occasionally inspired—approximation of a Savages club set, recorded with some of the same sidemen in California and Texas at the end of 1987 and the beginning of '88. With a broad selection of tunes—including a bunch not previously vinylized—this may not be the great live album that Whitfield's doubtless got in him, but there are plenty of worse ways to spend 45 minutes. (The CD and cassette contain three bonus tracks.) [i/hd]

WHODINI

Whodini (Jive) 1983

Escape (Jive) 1984 ●

Back in Black (Jive) 1986 ●

Open Sesame (Jive) 1987 ●

Greatest Hits (Jive) 1990 ●

Bag-A-Trix (MCA) 1991 ♠

This trio (originally a two-man crew) from Brooklyn does something very original and exciting within the context of rap, blending in wit and variety to make entertaining records. On their debut, Jalil Hutchins and Ecstasy (John Fletcher) worked with three different producers—Thomas Dolby, Conny Plank and the Wilsden Dodgers—to come up with an '80s version of "Monster Mash" ("The Haunted House of Rock"), two bouncy history-of-rap/rap-is-good numbers ("Magic's Wand" and "Rap Machine") plus a couple of alternate versions and three more cuts. Although the moderate-tempo big-beat gets a bit numbing, the pair's sharp lyrics and straightforward delivery, plus countless bits of electronic flotsam and jetsam prevent serious tedium.

Escape brought Whodini under the talented studio wing of Run-DMC co-producer Larry Smith, who created a smooth, semi-spare sound and did a lot of the writing as well. With fewer quirky synthesizer accents, the action centers on raps about the urban nightmare ("Escape (I Need a Break)"), failed romance ("Friends") and New York's 24-hour lifestyle ("Freaks Come Out at Night"), as well as other more egocentric topics. Airy without being simple, Escape is appealing and innovative.

With Grandmaster Dee (celebrated on an Escape song) officially expanding Whodini to a threesome, Back in Black is a blunter record, with less reliance on fancy production and more concentration on varied, organic arrangements. However, while Whodini's music has gotten noticeably stronger, their lyrics are stagnant: all eight cuts cover familiar rap ground with no special outlook and only intermittent cleverness.

The centerpiece of the lively Open Sesame teams the trio with the original bad girl of rap, Millie Jackson. (A pre-LP 12-inch offers six different mixes of "Be Yourself," a busy statement against mindless conformity, a message which is reprised, after a fashion, on the LP's "For the Body.") Elsewhere along this moralistic ride, Whodini praises mom ("Early Mother's Day Card"), recommends lusty human devotion as an alternative to drugs ("Hooked on You") and touts personal responsibility ("You Brought It on Yourself"). Behind the board, Smith touches on all of hip-hop's current sonic trendsetters, from L.L. Cool J to Full Force to Rick Rubin to Run-DMC, making Open Sesame an exciting sampler of rap styles. Whodini may not have a sound of their own, but they synthesize with flair. [i]

WIDE BOY AWAKE

Wide Boy Awake EP (RCA) 1983

Ex-Ant bassist Kevin Mooney formed and led London's Wide Boy Awake, an exciting interracial quartet which only released some singles, the first two of which were collected on this eponymous American 12-inch. Hard to classify, the Wide Boys offer clever wordplay and a preponderant funk beat on "Slang Teacher," while square-dancing into wonderful country-tinged pop for "Bona Venture." Elsewhere, they try scratch cajun and dance-rock. [i]

See also Adam and the Ants.

JANE WIEDLIN

Jane Wiedlin (IRS) 1985 ●

Fur (EMI Manhattan) 1988 ●

Tangled (EMI) 1990 ●

Free of the Go-Go's, guitarist/singer/songwriter Wiedlin's first record is stylistically eclectic to a fault, and stresses goody-goody lyrical concerns too bluntly. But it's also substantial, attractive and joyously reflects her new-found artistic freedom. "Blue Kiss" is an adorable love lament; "Somebody's Going to Get into This House" is sturdy dance-rock. "Where We Can Go" could have been done by her former band, while the moody "Modern Romance" would better suit the Motels. Wiedlin isn't the world's strongest vocalist, but her enthusiasm and sincerity largely compensate.

With perky synth-pop production by Stephen Hague (ex-Naked Eye Rob Fisher played and programmed the keyboards), the similarly diverse Fur moves Wiedlin into a slickly modern mainstream, relying on her sweet, vulnerable voice to balance the impersonal arrangements. Wiedlin's aspirations to be a junior dance diva (on the pro-animal title song) and suave ballad crooner (on "The End of Love," "Whatever It Takes") are still futile; the album's only winners are bouncy fizz-pop: "Inside a Dream," "Rush Hour" and "Give!"

In 1989, Wiedlin made an adorable screen appearance as Joan of Arc in Bill & Ted's Excellent Adventure and then cut her third album. Tangled is an unsubtle attempt to make a woman—artistically speaking—of her, with an unclothed cover photograph, lusty lyrics (on the idiotic title track and "World on Fire") and loudly generic rock backing. Wiedlin's desire to shake her innocent little-girl image is understandable, but she sounds adrift and embarrassed on this charmless record.

See also Go-Go's. [i]

WILD BILLY CHILDISH

See Thee Mighty Caesars.

WILD FLOWERS

The Joy of It All (nr/Reflex) 1984

Dust (Big Time) 1987

Sometime Soon (Slash) 1988 •

Take Me for a Ride EP (nr/Chapter 22) 1988

Tales Like These (Slash) 1990 •

A guitar band from the English Midlands, the Wild Flowers mate the Ramones' breakneck speed and Television's guitar interplay with Echo & the Bunnymen's intensity and attack on The Joy of It All. Poorly recorded for a tiny label, the album disappeared quickly as, so it seemed, did the band when founding guitarist-songwriter Dave Newton left to start the Mighty Lemon Drops.

Replacing Newton with David Atherton, the quartet recorded a couple of singles during '86; adding three more tracks, that made Dust. With the exception of "A Kind of Kingdom" (which Hugh Jones produced), the recordings are again pretty awful, but the band's energy can't be denied. While the guitars play off each other with reckless abandon, Mark Alexander's bass darts in and out between them. Television is still the best reference point, especially as singer Neil Cook tends to shamelessly ape Tom Verlaine.

Sometime Soon is the Wild Flowers' first fully realized album, and it's intense from start to finish. The songs are virtually all vitriolic putdowns of the girl who left the guy behind, and Cook's vocals are so filled with bile you can almost picture the veins popping out of his neck as he sings them. The guitars bark, bite, scratch and yell at a furious pace. Angry music, ideal for people nursing a deep hurt.

The Take Me for a Ride EP features two very different versions of one of Sometime Soon's less caustic numbers (one all electric, the other featuring an acoustic lead) plus three non-LP cuts more in keeping with the album's nasty tone.

Tales Like These was recorded in California with Matt Wallace, who'd just finished the Replacements' Don't Tell a Soul. Perhaps, like the Mats, the Wild Flowers felt the need to slow down a bit; musically it's far more varied than Sometime Soon. But the subject matter hasn't changed much: either these guys really know how to hold a grudge or they're doormats for a whole procession of hellish women. Let's hope they work it out before things get too ugly. [ds]

See also Mighty Lemon Drops.

WILD GAME

See Green on Red.

WILD SEEDS

Live Is Grand (Life in Soul City) EP (Aznut) 1984

Brave Clean + Reverent (Jungle) 1986

Mud, Lies + Shame (Jungle) 1987 (Passport) 1988 •

MICHAEL HALL

Quarter to Three (Record Collect) 1990

KRIS MCKAY

What Love Endures (Arista) 1990 •

Austin, Texas' Wild Seeds had an immensely likable, tough and twangy guitar-pop sound, but the heart and soul of the band was Michael Hall's songwriting. A former music journalist, Hall took the rock'n'roll ethic of good times, lonesome trains and love gone wrong and spun it into lusciously twisted personal narratives inscribed with poetic literacy. Throughout the Wild Seeds' albums and into his solo work, Hall has cultivated the persona of an Everyman befuddled by the America gone sour; he's constantly searching for truth, justice, a wife and two kids, yet he's repeatedly thwarted by forces bigger than himself.

The first EP is a mere skeleton, with weak jangly guitars and ragged performances muffling the tunes. Hall returned with an entirely new lineup for Brave Clean + Reverent, an album so monstrously well-crafted, well-written, well-played and just plain good-feeling that it may make you wonder why you've ever settled for less. "Sharlene" is a raucous, Springsteen-style rocker about a girlfriend who just happens to be a transvestite ("my baby walks like a queen"); "A Girl Can Tell" exposes the lies in a relationship. "Shake This World," the album's closer, best sums up Hall's hopes and fears: "Now I did shake this world like a man shakes a tree/But the leaves came tumbling down and buried me."

Mud, Lies + Shame applies slightly slicker road-house production to another smart and elegant collection of songs. "Debi Came Back" and "You Will Be Married to a Jealous Man" make excellent use of Hall's trademark romantic irony, and "I'm Sorry, I Can't Rock You All Night Long" is as feisty as its title. But there's a feeling of forced democracy going on, and the album peters out towards the end; when second vocalist Kris McKay takes the reins for the closer, "All This Time," her affected country belting undercuts the aw-shucks endearment of Hall's singing.

After the Wild Seeds broke up, Arista groomed McKay as something of a folk-rock interpreter, but What Love Endures is weighed down by Barry Beckett's faceless AOR-lite production and an indistinct batch of songs (a cover of Billie Holiday's "Don't Explain" notwithstanding). Hall, meanwhile, hooked up with Walter Salas-Humara of the Silos, who co-produced Quarter to Three. Hall's songwriting is as strong as ever (especially "Congratulations" and "Roll Around Heaven This Way"), but the restrained acoustic arrangements occasionally prevent the songs from building to the emotional peaks the Wild Seeds so masterfully reached. While it's hard to argue with a guy who can turn out a line like "I want to wake at dawn, long after our best years are gone," Hall sounds as tired as an old man, as though he has finally allowed his disappointments to get the best of him. [kss]

WILD SWANS

The Peel Sessions EP (nr/Strange Fruit) 1986

Bringing Home the Ashes (Sire-Reprise) 1988 •

Space Flower (Sire-Reprise) 1990 •

Led by onetime Teardrop Explodes organist Paul Simpson, Liverpool's Wild Swans had already existed, broken up (leaving a Zoo single and a posthumously released 1982 radio broadcast), spent four years in limbo and then reformed by the time of its first album. Behind Simpson's splendid deep voice, the trio plays derivative suave-pop on Bringing Home the Ashes, artfully mixing up a blend of the The, the Smiths, Echo & the Bunnymen, Aztec Camera and others that's enticing—but unsatisfying.

With producer Ian Broudie playing guitar and organ and two guests from the Icicle Works (guitarist Ian McNabb and drummer Chris Sharrock), Simpson and stalwart bassist Joe Fearon turn mildly psychedelic on Space Flower. Flavorfully titled songs like “Vanilla Melange,” “Chocolate Bubblegum,” “Tangerine Temple” and “Melting Blue Delicious” aren't nearly as colorful as they sound, but Broudie helps give the neo-retro rock-pop a handsomely textured identity the Wild Swans—evidently destined for very modest cultural significance—can call their own. [i]

SCOTT WILK + THE WALLS

Scott Wilk + the Walls (Warner Bros.) 1980

BONE SYMPHONY

Bone Symphony EP (Capitol) 1983

Encountering the line between artistic influence and stylistic plagiarism, Scott Wilk grabbed a copy of Elvis Costello's Armed Forces and blithely pushed ahead. Parts of his record are uncannily accurate impressions; the cover design and group photo do nothing to reduce the Costello/Attractions allusion. Funny thing, though—the album is really good! If you can ignore its derivative raison d'être, you'll find powerful, well-crafted songs, impressive playing and production and an overriding sense of cohesion. An unexpected but disconcerting thrill.

With two new bandmates, Wilk switched to techno-dance in Bone Symphony, whose lame five-song EP mixes the sounds of Devo, Oingo Boingo and Ultravox without distinction. [i]

WILL AND THE BUSHMEN

Gawk (Mustang) 1987

Will and the Bushmen (SBK) 1989 •

Formed in Mobile, Alabama, but later based in Nashville, this nifty pop quartet did two inspired things on its first album: write a tributary bio-song entitled “Neil Young” (they had already eulogized Alex Chilton on a pre-LP B-side) and get Mississippi's Tim Lee and Randy Everett to co-produce three tracks. Otherwise, the modest Gawk—in the Windbreakers' style, but not as moody or as instrumentally accomplished—merely has great tunes, excellent harmony vocals (by guitarists/songwriters Will Kimbrough and Sam Baylor) and a solid dollop of the innocent spunk that greases the wheels of young talent.

Although there's nothing wrong with Will and the Bushmen, there's nothing really right about the band's major-league debut, either. Most noticeable on remakes of the three best songs from Gawk, producer Richard Gottreher fits the group's music into the tasteful kind of arrangement that—like a tomboy in her first dress—gently discourages youthful ebullience. [i]

LUCINDA WILLIAMS

Ramblin' on My Mind (Folkways) 1979

(Folkways-Smithsonian-Rounder) 1991 •

Happy Woman Blues (Folkways) 1980

(Folkways-Smithsonian-Rounder) 1991 •

Lucinda Williams (Rough Trade) 1988 •

Passionate Kisses EP (Rough Trade) 1989 •

Louisiana-born Lucinda Williams sings poignant songs in a rich, world-weary voice, drawing on blues, folk, country and rock, but resisting all pigeonholes. Her first two albums went largely unnoticed, but have been reissued in light of her growing notoriety. Ramblin' on My Mind is a warm, lively album of blues, gospel and folk covers, including three Robert Johnson songs. (The album title was shortened to Ramblin' for its 1991 re-release; a cassette edition available from Folkways in the intervening years was named Ramblin' Early Blues.)

While Ramblin' shows off Williams' affecting vocals and her roots—from the bayou to the church choir to the Opry—the more rock-oriented Happy Woman Blues proves her to be an evocative song-crafter akin to Gram Parsons and Emmylou Harris. Smoke-stained bars, open roads and a heart that never learns are well-worn subjects, but Williams rewrites them in a way that is both contemporary and uncynical.

Williams later recorded for CBS, which decided she wasn't marketably country or rock enough and dropped her. She continued touring, honing a collection of songs that became Lucinda Williams. Her second debut is a near-perfect album of originals (plus a wrenching version of a Howlin' Wolf number) played with a band led by guitarist/co-producer Gurf Morlix. This is an unflinching self-portrait of a woman with mythic powers to remake herself and the world (“Changed the Locks”), to sketch working-class portraits worthy of Tobias Wolff (“The Night's Too Long”) and to let her hair down for a zydeco romp (“Crescent City”). But mostly she's a lover; “Side of the Road” (a poetic declaration of independence within a committed relationship) and the meditative and erotic “Like a Rose” are both especially moving.

Passionate Kisses reprises that catchy, earnest plea for happiness from the album and adds tracks from her lean years: three songs recorded live at an LA radio station plus an '83 demo featuring Taj Mahal on guitar and harp. Not a place to begin, but a between-albums snack for fans. [ws]

ROBERT WILLIAMS

See Stranglers.

VICTORIA WILLIAMS

Happy Come Home (Geffen) 1987

Swing the Statue! (Rough Trade) 1990 •

By virtue of her now-ended marriage to singer Peter Case and other friends in high musical places, Victoria Williams' career has been a bit suspect in some quarters. She is, however, a deeply talented (if erratic) songwriter and possessor of a most distinctive voice. On Happy Come Home, producers Anton Fier and Stephen Soles make the mistake of burying Williams in a massive studio effort; Williams sounds like an avalanche survivor, vainly trying to climb out from under sitters, drum machines and horn sections. The pair's only stroke of insight was hiring Van Dyke Parks to do string arrangements on three songs—the album's best, especially the charming fairy tale, "TC." Parks and Williams are kindred souls: childlike, fanciful and impatient with pop formats. With luck, they'll work together again.

Co-produced by Michael Blair (percussionist and multi-instrumentalist with Tom Waits and Elvis Costello), Swing the Statue! is a vast improvement. Williams sounds like she's in control here. Her often-remarkable lyrics can be heard this time, and her rangy voice—an intoxicating blend of little-girl breathiness and old-lady crackle and wisdom that is definitely an acquired taste—is well out in front. (As is her idiosyncratic Christianity, in the gospel-country "Holy Spirit.") There are a few annoying moments, like the cutesy "Wobbling" (about a baby bird) and the repetitious, screechy "On Time." But songs like "Tarbelly and Featherfoot," with its haunting piano refrain, the wry, chilling "Summer of Drugs" and the moving "I Can't Cry Hard Enough" triumphantly unveil Williams' personal vision. [ws]

WENDY O. WILLIAMS

See Plasmatics.

JAMES WILLIAMSON

See Iggy Pop, Stooges.

MARTY WILLSON-PIPER

See Church.

WIN

See Fire Engines.

WIND

Where It's at with the Wind (Cheft) 1982

Guest of the Staphs EP (Cheft) 1984

Living in a New World (Midnight) 1986

Playing exuberant power-pop with abundant talent and a solid grounding in '60s AM radio—from merseybeat to folk-rock to summery soul—this Miami trio made a wonderful debut with the winningly unpolished Where It's At. The marvelous fourteen-song collection of beguiling originals not only re-creates the sound of a simpler time, but captures the giddy innocence of musical self-discovery, as if this were all new.

The Wind then relocated north to Queens, New York, stopping in North Carolina long enough to have Mitch Easter co-produce the six-song Guest of the Staphs at his studio. Although the charming rush of cluttered, busy arrangements and overstuffed lyrics occasionally resembles Let's Active or the dB's—especially when the rhythms turn off the main road and the guitars and vocals go on a harmonic rampage—"Delaware 89763" is a '60s raveup in the style of early Manfred Mann.

Fronting a new four-piece lineup, songwriters Lane Steinberg (vocals/guitar) and Steven Katz (vocals/bass/keyboards) mix XTC, the Lovin' Spoonful, British Invasion bands and numerous other classic antecedents on the self-produced Living in a New World, an ambitious but lighthearted pop gem of great songs, witty (occasionally funny) lyrics and pretty harmonies. [i]

WINDBREAKERS

Meet the Windbreakers EP (Big Monkey) 1982

Any Monkey with a Typewriter EP (Big Monkey) 1983

Terminal (Homestead) 1985

Disciples of Agriculture (Fr. Closer) 1985

Run (DB) 1986

A Different Sort... (DB) 1987

At Home with Bobby and Tim (DB) 1989 •

Electric Landlady (DB) 1991 •

HOWARD & TIM'S PAID VACATION

I Never Met a Girl I Didn't Like (Midnight) 1985

GONE FISHIN': MATT PIUCCI & TIM LEE

Can't Get Lost When You're Goin' Nowhere (Restless) 1986

BOBBY SUTLIFF

Another Jangly Mess EP (nr/Tambourine) 1986

Only Ghosts Remain (PVC) 1987 •

TIM LEE

What Time Will Tell (Coyote-Twin/Tone) 1988 •

Mississippi singer/guitarists Tim Lee and Bobby Sutliff gave their band a terrible name (one hopes the reference is to jackets . . .), but they do bring something distinctly unique to the power pop genre, reflecting more of an American than English influence with strange melodic turns and a ragged Southern vocal style. Following the group's introductory salvo, a 1982 debut 7-inch on their own label, Mitch Easter produced Any Monkey with a Typewriter, assisting the trio instrumentally as well. (Richard Barone of the Bongos also appears on the record.) The six-song 12-inch is amateurish but well worth hearing.

Recorded as a duo with help from Easter and others, Terminal is a brilliant raw pop-rock-folk record with insidious melodies, fuzzed-out guitars and bristly lyrics, all delivered with unselfconscious sincerity. An appropriately atmospheric version of Television's "Glory"—produced by and played with the Rain Parade—led to Lee's side projects with Parader Matt Piucci (as Gone Fishin'). (A planned outing with another Rain Parader, Steven Roback—announced as Distant Cousins—didn't actually take place.)

The engaging Run is another collaboration with Easter, who had by then become a virtual (non-writing) bandmember, and longtime associate Randy Everett. A bit less quirky than prior releases, the electrically energized pop could have been mixed more evenly, but that's not a major distraction. Although the coolest song concept is Lee's anxiety-ridden "Braver on the Telephone," Sutliff's "Visa Cards and Antique Mirrors" runs a close second.

Sutliff and Lee then went their separate ways, leaving the latter—no sign of Easter this time—alone to make the final Windbreakers' LP, which he co-produced with Everett. A Different Sort offers another striking set of unsettling lyrics, powerful, inventive playing and production, and emotional singing. From the bells on "Knowing Me" through the affecting piano on "We Never Understand" to the pained roughness of "Forget Again," Lee demonstrates his multifarious talents and abundant creativity.

The French-only Disciples recaps the Windbreakers' career up through Terminal.

The low-budget Paid Vacation LP Lee cut in 1985 with Howard Wuelfing (an ex-Slickee Boy bassist who led the Washington-area Nurses in the late '70s and then worked with Half Japanese) offers sketchy previews of three Windbreakers' songs: "Run" (from Run) and "Fit In" and "Forget Again" (from A Different Sort). Besides a cover (Tommy Hoehn and Alex Chilton's "She Might Look My Way"), the LP also contains Wuelfing singing his own originals, one of which ("The Week You Were Mine") is quite lovely. Unfortunately, muffled sound and indifferent performances limit the value of this seven-song artifact.

Lee and Piucci recorded the unexciting Gone Fishin' LP together in Mississippi in February 1986. While the arrangements mix things up effectively, the pair co-wrote only two tracks—the rest are individual efforts. The creative collaboration is unproductive: meandering acoustic doodles with electric guitar overdubs, poorly sung rock tunes and dusty pop songs that suffer from the incompatibility of their voices. The nerdy organ on the joint "Lift It Up" suggests a possibly functional period approach that is otherwise ignored on the LP.

Sutliff's first post-Windbreakers record is a wryly titled British 12-inch magically produced at the Drive-In by Easter, who also plays drums and some guitar. (On his own, Sutliff recorded one cut in Jackson, Mississippi with Tim Lee and a rhythm section.) His pretty voice, piercing guitar solos, understated keyboards and Beatlesque pure-pop sensibility combine to make Another Jangly Mess a state-of-the-art exposition on the genre. The equally spectacular Only Ghosts Remain repeats the EP's five songs and adds six more (including a spiffy cover of Richard Thompson's "Small Town Romance") of equal quality, four of which employ Wuelfing as bassist.

Lee to his own devices on What Time Will Tell (relativity speaking: members of Let's Active, the Bongos and the Wygals all lend a hand), Lee comes up with another winner. His first actual solo album, produced by dB-turned-Wygol Gene Holder, offers sparkling, occasionally beautiful guitar pop and richly resonant lyrics about romance and life (mentioning religion a bunch of times) in the South. Trimming his tendency to experiment, Lee plays his songs (and one by Faye Hunter) with straightforward arrangements and evident craft.

Sutliff and Lee reunited in 1989 to tour and record the self-produced At Home with Bobby and Tim, a solid and confident album as comfortable-sounding as its title. Although their relationship-oriented lyrics run the emotional gamut from "Just Fine" to "Ill at Ease," the pair—backed by a crisp rhythm section and keyboardist Mark Wyatt (on loan from Great Plains)—easily blend songs, winsome vocals and guitar parts like they'd never been apart. Highlights: the hostile "On the Wire," the Feelies-ish "Down to It" and the folksy "Closer to Home." (The At Home CD also contains Terminal.)

Like a pair of old Stratocasters, the Windbreakers' sound continues to gain richness and roundness with time. Produced by Russ Tolman, Electric Landlady has some of the duo's most immediate and resonant creations, played and sung with rare pop insight. Closing a circle of sorts, the Windbreakers do a new version of Sutliff's "The Devil and the Sea," a song which Tolman recorded on his '90 LP. [i]

WIPERS

Is This Real? (Park Ave.) 1979

Youth of America EP (Park Avenue) 1981 (Restless) 1990 ●

Over the Edge (Brain Eater) 1983 (Restless) 1987

Wipers (Enigma) 1985

Land of the Lost (Restless) 1986

Follow Blind (Restless) 1987 ●

The Circle (Restless) 1988 ●

The Best of Wipers and Greg Sage (Restless) 1990 ●

GREG SAGE

Straight Ahead (Enigma) 1985

Led by singer/guitarist Greg Sage, Portland, Oregon's Wipers began as a trio playing heavy rock that flirted with hardcore. The first LP is kind of primitive, allowing high velocity and volume to obscure (but not hide) a competent collection of songs with introspective and intelligent lyrics. Raw and abrasive, but well above the usual.

Youth of America, a six-song album with a transitional lineup, shows refinement and bears some resemblance to early Stranglers but for Sage's weird guitar work on some long instrumental bridges. The title track, a ten-and-a-half-minute monster, is worth noting: a simple, repetitive, colossal anthem, then (as now) the ultimate Wipers' effort.

Over the Edge is as appealing, with some of Sage's most memorable songs. The thick title track, the simmering "Doom Town" and the roaring "So Young" define the Wipers' sound—dense and methodical chunky aggression with heavy, cloudy guitar so full it gains a Hendrix-like flavor. The LP also includes the zippy "Romeo," which adds a weird country twang.

Sage recorded his solo album as a fundraiser of sorts while looking for a new label for the band. When Enigma picked up the Wipers, the label released Straight Ahead as well. Side One sounds much like the group, but Side Two is just Sage and his guitar making atmospheric space pieces—haunting and strange consciousness-expansion compositions like "Astro Cloud." The therapeutic music is so ethereal that it's over before you notice it. An unexpected, intriguing work.

Wipers is a live album which highlights a 1984 tour and includes three excellent tracks never recorded in the studio, ending with the epic "Youth of America." The sound is honest, the playing true.

Land of the Lost, the Wipers' first new album in three years, shows they didn't get rusty. "Way of Love" and "Nothing Left to Lose" add a certain spark to the charging rockers fed by Sage's fire-breathing guitar. "Just Say," on the other hand, glides on a pretty, lilting guitar line like a quiet waterfall. A strong return.

Follow Blind backsteps a bit, with more hypnotic guitar riffing and much more challenging bass parts. Perhaps the first "moody" Wipers LP, Brad Davidson's prominent bass sets up subconscious undercurrents—in much the way Joy Division once did—for Sage to sing over. “Any Time You Find” is what you might get if you plugged Sage’s solo atmospherics into the Wipers’ repetitive style. Yet another quality LP from one of America’s best-kept secrets.

The sixth and final Wipers studio album sounds familiar enough to seem like business as usual, but this is one band that went down fighting. The scorching opener (“I Want a Way”) and the tumultuous title track are typically exciting rockers, but the LP also includes one of their rare pop songs, the excellent “Time Marches On.” Even more breathtaking, The Circle’s last three tracks are unlike anything in the group’s past: the somber, slow shudder of “Goodbye Again” flows into the surprisingly tender “Be There” and then into the beautiful closer, “Blue & Red.” With that unexpectedly introspective tear, the Wipers’ long career ended.

Sage compiled the 1990 retrospective and, like many artists, favors his more recent albums. While nearly half of the tracks (thirteen on LP, sixteen on tape and CD) are from Land of the Lost and Follow Blind, there’s only one item from the seminal Youth of America. (The complete exclusion of the first LP is due to litigation.) But Sage’s sequencing is excellent, and he’s included rarities like the blistering ’78 debut single (“Better off Dead”) a long-forgotten compilation track (from Sage’s Trap Sampler) and other goodies. If not a definitive history, The Best of Wipers and Greg Sage is nevertheless a perfect introduction to one of America’s best independent-label bands. [i/jr]

WIRE

- Pink Flag (Harvest) 1977 (Restless Retro) 1989 ●
- Chairs Missing (nr/Harvest) 1978 (Restless Retro) 1989 ●
- 154 (Automatic-Warner Bros.) 1979 (Restless Retro) 1989 ●
- EP (nr/Rough Trade) 1980
- Document and Eyewitness (nr/Rough Trade) 1981 (Mute) 1991 ●
- And Here It Is . . . Again . . . Wire (nr/Sneaky Pete) 1984
- Wire Play Pop (nr/Pink) 1986
- Snakedrill EP (nr/Mute) 1986 (Mute-Enigma) 1987 ●
- The Ideal Copy (Mute-Enigma) 1987 ●
- Ahead EP (Mute-Enigma) 1987 ●
- The Peel Sessions EP (nr/Strange Fruit) 1987
- A Bell Is a Cup Until It Is Struck (Mute-Enigma) 1988 ●
- Kidney Bingos EP (Mute-Restless) 1988 ●
- Silk Skin Paws EP (nr/Mute) 1988 (Mute-Restless) 1989 ●
- It’s Beginning to and Back Again (Mute-Enigma) 1989 ●
- The Peel Sessions Album (nr/Strange Fruit) 1989 (Strange Fruit-Dutch East India) 1991 ●
- On Returning (1977–1979) (Restless Retro) 1989 ●
- Manscape (Mute-Enigma) 1990 ♪
- Life in the Manscape EP (Mute-Enigma) 1990 ●

In the beginning, this self-taught South London quartet were as much atavistic thrashers as many other bands of the time, yet they quickly honed a genuinely expressive, “minimalist” style that made them one of the most influential bands of the class of ’77, profoundly touching such descendants as R.E.M., the Minutemen, Big Black and Sonic Youth. The 21 tracks of Pink Flag show Wire still in the process of arriving at an identity—disjointed, angry, defiantly odd. Abrupt, too: as bassist

Graham Lewis described their attitude to song length, “When the text ran out, it stopped.” (This worked to chilling effect with the harrowing narrative of “Reuters.”) Yet this primitive approach didn’t prevent Wire from including two conventionally tuneful rockers (“Mannequin” and “Ex Lion Tamer”) as well as what just might be the prettiest song by any (so-called) punk band, “Fragile.” (Since Wire will not play such old stuff themselves, a New York area band named Ex Lion Tamer faithfully reproduced the LP’s songs onstage as Wire’s chosen opening act on their 1987 US tour.)

In January 1978, shortly after the release of Wire’s first album, the group recorded a John Peel session, which was issued almost a decade later. The selections include “106 Beats That” from Pink Flag, “Practice Make Perfect” and “I Am the Fly” from Chairs Missing plus the non-LP “Culture Vultures.” The subsequent Peel album adds the results of a repeat visit in September ’78, previewing tracks from 154; and September ’79.

Chairs Missing is more mature than Pink Flag, moving decisively beyond any simple punk pigeonhole with much greater scope. As on its predecessor, amid the anger of “Being Sucked in Again,” the bile of “I Am the Fly,” the neurotic anxiety of “Too Late,” even the ironic detachment of “French Film Blurred,” sat the pretty if abstruse “Outdoor Miner.”

On 154, producer Mike Thorne became more integral than on the first two LPs, acting almost as a fifth member, using keyboards and studio technique to contour the sound. That was Wire’s development—stylized and smoothed out—although still dissonant; more abstract and detached, with the venom and sardonicism more subtly conveyed. Thus refined, this brilliant groundbreaking band adjudged their experiment complete and broke up, with guitarist Bruce Gilbert and bassist/vocalist Graham Lewis creating Dome and vocalist/guitarist Colin Newman pursuing a solo career.

The 1980 EP is a bizarre 45 rpm 12-inch: one side is titled “Crazy About Love,” but the anxiety (among other things) conveyed over a haunting, repeated riff for more than fifteen minutes suggests something other than the usual meaning of the phrase. The flip is a powerhouse remake of the single “Our Swimmer” plus “Catapult 30” (strange, pulsing doings).

Document and Eyewitness, two live discs (one full-length, the other an eight-song quickie which plays at 45 rpm), owes its raunchy sound as much to Wire’s disdain of musical niceties as to dodgy recording. Audience sounds and other incidental noise are left in; for aficionados only. And Here It Is . . . Again . . . Wire is a career retrospective containing singles, album tracks and live cuts. Wire Play Pop likewise compiles seven old tracks, but limits its scope to Wire’s extraordinary, trailblazing A-sides, including “Dot Dash,” “I Am the Fly,” “Mannequin” and “1-2-X-U.”

In 1986, seemingly out of nowhere (well, Mute UK, anyway) popped the Snakedrill EP. These were indeed new tracks, but the portent was mixed; the two on the A-side (“A Serious of Snakes” and “Drill”) are engrossing, dangerous music, while the pair on the back are interesting without being eyebrow-raising impressive. If they’d gotten back together, they must have felt they had something new to say. But did they? The Ideal Copy declared Wire was plugged in again, for real. It’s a varied bill of fare, in some ways resembling a more mature Chairs Missing, with highlights ranging from the breezily melodic, rhythmically busy "Ahead" to the slow, relentlessly fearsome "Feed Me" (an awesome Graham Lewis vocal) to the topical funk (!) of "Ambitious." Perhaps it's not brilliant—maybe "merely" excellent?

The Ahead EP contains two remixes of that track, plus three live cuts, two previously unreleased, including the strange a cappella "Vivid Riot of Red." Those three live (from Berlin) cuts, as well as the entirety of Snakedrill, are appended to the CD and cassette of The Ideal Copy.

In a sense, A Bell Is a Cup is to The Ideal Copy what 154 was to Chairs Missing—a stylized set of dreamscapes and consciousness streams (though it's not as musically sedate as Newman's own Commercial Suicide). Some of it has extensive lyrical wordplay, with the accent on play (a new attitude for Wire that Newman developed on his own singing fish LP); a prime example is "Kidney Bingos," which also happens to be one of the most melodious tracks Wire's ever recorded. Other tracks offer vignettes, yet the subjectivity of view, with its associative images, is continually emphasized. It's arguably Wire's most ruminative album, and while immersion in it won't, as "Silk Skin Paws" suggests, "wring your senses"—that's more a job for Chairs Missing—it will twirl your lobes a time or two. An album to live with. (The five-song Kidney Bingos EP includes live-in-London takes of "Drill" and "Over Theirs," as well as two versions of the brooding, intense "Pieta," which deserved to be on the LP but would not quite have fit in.) The Bell CD adds the four extra items from Kidney Bingos, which is also available on a separate 3-inch CD.

The Silk Skin Paws EP consists of three numbers from Bell Is a Cup in remixed or alternate versions plus the otherwise unreleased "German Shepherds."

Various releases made 1989 a big year for re-evaluating Wire's work. On Returning is a 31-track redaction (22 on LP and cassette) of the group's EMI years; while the selections are arguable, a dilettante would prefer one of the previous collections and a fan would own the original albums. (On Returning does include the non-LP singles "Dot Dash" and "A Question of Degree.") The live-in-the-studio Peel LP includes three sessions' worth: early '78 (one track from the first LP, two from the second and the otherwise unreleased "Culture Vultures"), late '78 (four tracks from 154) and late '79 ("Crazy About Love"). Interesting but not essential.

It's Beginning to and Back Again (aka IBTABA) began as live recordings (from Chicago and Portugal), but the tracks were subsequently rebuilt almost totally in the studio. Whatever was intended at the outset, all that's left from the original live takes on some of the tracks is room ambience! Five songs from Bell and Copy (plus the non-LP B-side "German Shepherds") are all notably improved here, with more authority, punch, breadth—you name it. The other four songs—including the single, "Eardrum Buzz," which appears in two different versions—are also excellent.

As Pink Flag was the band's perverse take on punk, Manscape is its subversion of alternative dance-rock. Busy syncopated rhythms amid synthetic keyboards—sometimes providing strings and horns—predominate. Lewis takes a more active role in singing, yet that doesn't mean an escalation of sonic abrasiveness. While the textures are fairly conventional, they're still unsettling enough to accompany Lewis' ire ("I'm going to torch it with you on the top"); elsewhere, a subdued mood suffuses uneasy lullabies with Newman's thoughtful, but often stark, lyrical fragments. "To the third rate butcher's dance-hall mix . . . I'll say goodbye," indeed. (The EP contains three mixes of "Manscape" and two non-LP tracks (one good, one so-so).)

Wire's first three albums have been reissued on CDs, all with extra tracks. Pink Flag adds "Options R," a non-LP B-side, while Chairs Missing has two non-LP Bs ("Go Ahead" and "Former Airline") plus the classic menacingly jaunty non-LP A-side, "Question of Degree." 154 has four otherwise unalbumized tracks: "Song 1," "Get Down 1 & 2," "Let's Panic Later" and "Small Electric Piece."

Drummer Robert Gotobed left the band following Manscape; the remaining three continued on as WIR. [jg]

See also Dome, A.C. Marias, Colin Newman.

WIRE TRAIN

In a Chamber (415-Columbia) 1983

Between Two Words (415-Columbia) 1985

Ten Women (415-Columbia) 1987 •

Wire Train (MCA) 1990 •

Like former 415 labelmates Translator, San Francisco's Wire Train plays exceptional, character-filled modern folk-pop, using strong songwriting as a basis. (The two groups also shared producer David Kahne, whose brilliant efforts contributed greatly to both's records.) Wire Train achieves its style with a full-blooded guitar attack, echoey vocals and strong, rushed drumming. In a Chamber has wonderful, memorable tracks like "Chamber of Hellos" and "I'll Do You"; lesser creations at least sound just as good. A great debut album.

Between Two Words, despite Kahne's absence and a version of Dylan's "God on Our Side" that unintentionally trivializes its earnest concerns, is equally memorable. Not all of the songs work, but those that do—"Last Perfect Thing," "Skills of Summer," "Love, Love"—exhibit folk-derived melodic beauty and an uneasy emotional perspective that is not easily ignored. The writing/singing/guitar-playing duo of Kevin Hunter and Kurt Herr doesn't display a lot of range or depth, but gives the group an unmistakable, invariably pleasing identity.

Herr was replaced prior to Ten Women and his absence from the record is immediately evident. While the crystalline pop production and Hunter's sandy voice give the record a familiar patina, the slower-paced songs are pretty but routine. Where the band once soared on rich guitar interplay, Wire Train here lacks character and conviction.

The sudden arrival of a new album in 1990 ended whatever-happened-to speculation as the same quartet, assisted by Pettymen Benmont Tench and Mike Campbell and others, returned with Wire Train. Hunter's Southwestern Dylan affectations predominate: at the low point, "Oh Me Oh My" fits an obnoxious vocal imitation into "Rainy Day Women"-style carousing and pointedly includes "Is it rolling, Bob?" However, "Simply Racing" is a Stonesy chugalug and the record's most striking song ("Should She Cry?," a catchy breath of pop air) owes no stylistic debt outside the band's own past. [i]

WISEBLOOD

See Foetus Inc.

BOB WISEMAN

See Blue Rodeo.

WITCH TRIALS

See Dead Kennedys.

JAH WOBBLE

The Legend Lives On... Jah Wobble in "Betrayal"

(nr/Virgin) 1980 (Blue Plate) 1990 •

V.I.E.P. EP (nr/Virgin) 1980

Jah Wobble's Bedroom Album (nr/Lago) 1983

Tradewinds (nr/Lago) 1986

DON LETTS, STRATETIME KEITH, STEEL LEG, JAH WOBBLE

Steel Leg v the Electric Dread EP (nr/Virgin) 1978

JAH WOBBLE, JAKI LIEBEZEIT AND HOLGER CZUKAY

How Much Are They EP (nr/Island) 1981

JAH WOBBLE + ANIMAL

A Long, Long Way EP (nr/Island) 1982

JAH WOBBLE—THE EDGE— HOLGER CZUKAY

Snake Charmer EP (Island) 1983

JAH WOBBLE & OLLIE MARLAND

Neon Moon (nr/Island) 1985

After falling out with John Lydon and Keith Levene, bassist Jah Wobble (John Wardle) left Public Image Ltd. and launched an on-again-off-again solo/collaborative career. He also played in a group called the Human Condition and did a brief stint as a London taxi driver.

Wobble's anti-musical playfulness on The Legend Lives On is matched only by his horrid vocals. But then again, that's the appeal: the return to the DIY, no-rules punk tradition. Wobble accentuates his reggae pretensions, fiddles with electronics and overdubbing and plays shadowy, threatening bass. If nothing else, Wobble has anti-style.

V.I.E.P., which sounds like outtakes from the album sessions, reprises the LP's "Blueberry Hill." Twice. "Sea Side Special" is notable for its professionalism and use of brass. But the EP is for completists only.

Far more indicative of Wobble's real talent is the four-song 12-inch made with Can-men Jaki Liebezeit and Holger Czukay in 1981. Manifesting a dour modern landscape, Wobble's bass buttresses the dark tunes with style and precision that balance his earlier solipsistic sloppiness. Freed from ego, Wobble teeters at last towards art.

Unlike previous Wobble projects, A Long, Long Way is sweetly pop-like, treading on Joy Division territory (with assistance from guitarist Dave "Animal" Maltby). Especially interesting is "Romany Trail," which mixes "Peter Gunn" jazz with modern sensibilities. Top-notch.

The Bedroom Album was recorded alone—you guessed it—in the master's chamber, with Animal providing the only outside contact. A cross between a legit solo studio job and the kind of one-man-band who plays on street corners, the LP finds Wobble building unstable and atmospheric polyrhythmic instrumentals over which he intones ponderous lyrics with only the barest glimpses of melody or meter. The lengthy record requires a lot of patience, but is not without undercurrents of charm or appeal.

In collaboration with producer Francois Kevorkian, Czukay, Liebezeit, Animal and U2's guitar star (among others—Wobble certainly appears to make friends easily), he pounds out far slicker dance-rock on Snake Charmer, but it's all for naught, as the record is overstuffed and overstuffed, mixing repetitive rhythms with extraneous sounds to achieve audible boredom.

Wobble's 1978 pre-PiL 12-inch with Keith Levene, filmmaker (and future Big Audio Dynamite member) Don Letts and someone called Steel Leg is a bizarre assemblage of dub reggae and noisome doom-funk that has Levene playing drums and guitar while Wobble adds bass, synth and vocals. Whew! [sg/i]

See also Public Image Ltd.

WOLFGANG PRESS

The Burden of Mules (nr/4AD) 1983

Scarecrow EP (nr/4AD) 1984

Water EP (nr/4AD) 1985

Sweatbox EP (nr/4AD) 1985

The Legendary Wolfgang Press & Other Tall Stories (nr/4AD) 1985 •

Standing Up Straight (nr/4AD) 1986 •

Big Sex EP (nr/4AD) 1987

Bird Wood Cage (4AD-Rough Trade) 1988 •

Kansas EP (4AD-Rough Trade) 1989

Ever-changing and always challenging, London's Wolfgang Press is one of the most enigmatic groups on a generally enigmatic label. Known better for their stylish Alberto Ricci record covers than their music, the trio comprises Michael Allen (vocals/bass) and Mark Cox (keyboards)—both of whom had been in Rema Rema with Adam Ant collaborator Marco Pirroni before transmigrating into a pre-Press quartet called Mass which released a 1980 single on 4AD—and Andrew Gray (drums).

The Burden of Mules is dark and cacophonous, an angry, intense slab of post-punk gloom that is best left to its own (de)VICES. Scarecrow, however, makes the most of the band's better attributes with spotless production by Cocteau Twin Robin Guthrie. Allen's almost-spoken, heavily accented vocals sputter through a mix of up-front bass, rhythm guitar, synthesizers and creative percussion. Some dreary moments remain, but a send-up of Otis Redding's "Respect" reflects the lightened mood.

Water continues the band's evolution, but in a totally different direction. Over minimalist backing, Allen's vocals turn baladeerish: Frank Sinatra sifted through Joy Division. A track called "My Way" is curiously reminiscent of Burt Bacharach.

Continuing to work with Guthrie, the Wolfgang Press sounds fully mature and more musically adept than ever on Sweatbox. The EP strengthens and confirms their fundamental approach: the deconstruction and reconstruction of pop conventions in their own image. Put through the Wolfgang Press breakdown process, Neil Young's "Heart of Gold" becomes "Heart of Stone," in effect creating an original. Sweatbox also establishes the group's mastery of moving instrumentals. The Legendary Wolfgang Press compiles the three EPs onto one disc, with some songs remixed and/or edited from their original form.

Musically, Standing Up Straight is as challenging and inventive as the band's other work, adding industrial and classical instrumentation to the creative arsenal. "Dig a Hole," "Hammer the Halo" and "Rotten Fodder" are the best the Wolfgang Press has to offer—dark and thoroughly uncompromising—on a record which is not for the easily intimidated. Also of interest is the enclosed lyric sheet, a multi-fold affair in which lyrics are presented as artistic design elements.

The Wolfgang Press continue to astound and delight on the Big Sex EP, four tracks that clearly demonstrate just what it is that makes this band so special. "The Wedding" is weighty and primal; "The Great Leveller" is desperate, insistent and the closest the Press will likely come to a real pop tune. The oppressive "That Heat" has wonderful blasts of distorted guitar throughout, "God's Number" is virtually all drums, with the novelty of female soul backing vocals. Daring music for daring times.

Bird Wood Cage maintains the trio's habit of inserting fascinating bits of business into superficially for-bidding songs. Allen's highly strung dramatic vocals (a gruffer Nick Cave, perhaps) and the measured tracks' plodding, trancey construction may discourage easy access to the Wolfgang Press' world, but the band's thickly laid atmosphere envelops all sorts of effective ingredients: female backing vocals on "King of Soul," wah-wah guitar on "Kansas," dub reggae effects on "Hang on Me (For Papa)." Making the most of understatement, the Wolfgang Press fills Bird Wood Cage with intrigue.

Mixing up geo-political concerns on the Cyrillic-titled Kansas EP, the Wolfgang Press begins "Assassination K./Kanserous" with a banjo picking out "Yellow Rose of Texas" and then proceeds into a pastiche of spoken-word tapes about JFK before opening into a remix of the Talking Headsy track (from Bird Wood Cage) for which it's named. The EP's two other songs pursue a more muscular sound than usual; "Twister" takes its cues from Suicide. [ag/tr]

WONDER STUFF

The Eight Legged Groove Machine (Polydor) 1988 ●
Hup (Polydor) 1989 ●

Arrogance and mean-spiritedness are not two traits you'd normally offer as key ingredients for a successful pop band. But then, most pop bands don't have half as many hooks as this Birmingham foursome. With its clever self-explanatory title and crisp production (by ex-Vibrator Pat Collier), The Eight Legged Groove Machine is a fine showcase for the Stuffies' memorable British punk-pop, which is stylistically not all that far removed from Collier's old band. The record's fourteen nuggets (each clocking in at under three minutes) offer ingratiating melodies and, on such tracks as "It's Yer Money I'm After, Baby," "Give, Give, Give Me More, More, More" and "Unbearable," some of the most comically selfish and snotty lyrics you're likely to encounter. The CD and cassette add four tracks, including the essential "Astley in the Noose," a death wish dedicated to one of the '80s most plastic pop-singing icons.

Again produced by Collier, Hup finds the Wonder Stuff getting serious and attempting to diversify stylistically, incorporating psychedelia ("Let's Be Other People"), acoustic folk ("Unfaithful"), bluegrass ("Golden Green"), even a spot-on PiL soundalike ("Good Night Though") into its ever-pissed-off repertoire. Although commendably ambitious, Hup lacks the peppy charm of the debut and contains some cloying filler.

When last heard from (on the 1990 "Circlesquare" single), the Stuffies were heading in another direction altogether, successfully embracing the fashionable Manchester trance-dance corps. Go figure. [db]

WOODENTOPS

Straight Eight Bushwaker EP (Hol. Megadisc) 1986
Well Well Well ... (Upside) 1986 ●
Giant (Rough Trade-Columbia) 1986 ●
Hypno-Beat (Upside) 1987 ●
Wooden Foot Cops on the Highway (Rough Trade-Columbia) 1988 ●

In this era of retro-rock, revivals and ripoffs, it's not easy to find truly innovative pop music. That's what makes this quintet from Peckham so special—they literally defy categorization. Led by the exuberant Rolo McGinty, the Woodentops employ only the barest of essentials—vocals, keyboards, acoustic guitars, bass and rudimentary drums.

The first two records chronicle a string of five brilliant singles. The Dutch EP collects six tracks. "Move Me," like many of the Woodentops' songs, builds to a manic crescendo before collapsing into a wall of sound; "Well Well Well" is held together with skittering drums and pulsating keyboard chords; "It Will Come" rushes along in a flurry of guitar, piano and good-natured mayhem. The Woodentops tend to throw caution to the wind on their B-sides, and the three here explore all sorts of new territory. Well Well Well adds two more B-sides (from 12-inch singles) and substitutes a longer version of "Well Well Well" that has incredible keyboard and drum breaks. (When that record was subsequently issued on CD, it was retitled The Unabridged Singles Collection.)

The Woodentops' long-awaited debut album proved to be more than worth the wait. Giant is a bright handful of pop gems hallmarked with the band's special sound. They've filled out musically with the addition of trumpet, marimba, strings and accordion, and the songs are more structured. But that in no way detracts from their originality. You're not likely to hear more innovative pop than "Hear Me James," "Love Affair with Everyday Livin'" or "Travelling Man." An incredible first album.

Recorded in Los Angeles at the end of 1986, Hypno-Beat draws its material from singles and Giant and reveals that the Woodentops play three times as fast onstage as they do in the studio. You'll work up a sweat just listening to this. The CD adds the contents of Straight Eight Bushwaker; the cassette also contains an extra pair of live recordings.

Wooden Foot Cops on the Highway finds the band suffering a bit from a lack of fresh ideas and the loss of keyboard player Alice Thompson. Some good songs appear (e.g., "In a Dream" and "What You Give Out"), but there is little distinction between this album and Giant. Some bands survive for years (even decades) by making the same album over and over; the Woodentops deserve a better fate. [ag]

WORKDOGS

See Gibson Bros.

WORLD DOMINATION ENTERPRISES

Let's Play Domination (Product Inc.-Caroline) 1988 •

Dub Domination (nr/Product Inc.) 1988

Love from Lead City (nr/Product Inc.) 1989

012

Let's Get Professional (nr/Flicknife) 1984

The disturbing noise/chaos level achieved by this angular Ladbroke Grove (London) trio—formed by singer/guitarist Keith Dobson after the dissolution of his previous band, 012—is indeed something marvelous. The astonishing high-pressure racket of Let's Play Domination's opening salvo ("Message for You People") may send you rushing to the turntable to see if your stylus is accidentally gouging a hole in the platter. Besides sturdily unsettling originals, the album—clearly a stiff-upper-lip cousin to Big Black, Birthday Party and other punishing pain-inflictors—includes a relatively straight rendition of L.L. Cool J's "I Can't Live Without My Radio" as well as deranged interpretations of Lipps, Inc.'s "Funkytown" and a U-Roy number. As Dobson layers on the scathing, slithery guitar and sings in a plain, serviceable voice, the rhythm section lurches and pounds in a tight phalanx; producer Dave Allen captures the entire meltdown with thrilling clarity.

Judging by their 12-inch singles, all of which contain alternate mixes, WDE is big on remixes, which makes the release of Dub Domination—eight album tracks given studio massages—no big surprise. Love from Lead City, packaged to look like a bootleg, with no information or credits, is a crude live record (with no hint of an audience's presence) that features spare but crushing renditions of such headbutts as "Funkytown," "Message for You People" and the political "Asbestos Lead Asbestos," a song originally from 012's album.

[i]

WORLD OF POOH

See Barbara Manning.

WORLD OF SKIN

See Swans.

WORLD PARTY

Private Revolution (Chrysalis) 1986 •

Goodbye Jumbo (Ensign-Chrysalis) 1990 •

For all intents and purposes, Wales' Karl Wallinger is World Party on Private Revolution, which he recorded at home after leaving the Waterboys. (World Party, the group, thus far seems to be only a touring band.) He sings, plays guitars, keyboards and uses samples to create a refreshingly unique musical backdrop that probably owes more to the psychedelic-era Beatles than any one other source, yet never actually sounds like them. The music, in fact, serves like a kind of free-flowing pop soundtrack to Wallinger's lyrics—a hybrid of '60s-hippie and '80s-new-age ideas about ecology and self-knowledge. (Though, thankfully, they're not quite as silly as that sounds.) Highlights include a terrific cover of Dylan's "All I Really Want to Do," and a cameo by Sinéad O'Connor. Leave your cynicism at the door and you may find yourself trading in your black leather jacket for love beads. In a word: groovy.

While Goodbye Jumbo doesn't have the seamless flow of Private Revolution, it does have a handful of great songs, especially the single "Way Down Now" and "Put the Message in the Box." You won't think of the Beatles so much here as you will the Stones and Van Morrison, particularly when Wallinger repeats lines over and over à la Vanbo on a bunch of the tunes. And who do you think of when you hear a title like "Sweet Soul Dream"? (Sinéad guests on that song, while Wire Train's Jeff Trott adds slide to three others.) [ds]

See also Waterboys.

BERNIE WORRELL

Funk of Ages (Gramavision) 1990 •

P-Funk keyboardist and composer Worrell's synthesizer basslines helped redefine modern funk, a fact that wasn't lost on the legions of stiff new wave white boys suddenly possessed by the need to get down. Hence, when David Byrne fell under that compulsion in the early '80, he enrolled Worrell in the extended Talking Heads family. Stints with the Golden Palominos followed, and Worrell even became a Pretender for one LP.

Funk of Ages finds him in a rare spotlight, jamming with Maceo Parker and Bootsy Collins, calling on the many friends he made during years of session work: Sly and Robbie, Keith Richards, Chris Spedding, Vernon Reid and Jerry Harrison are only part of the all-star cast. And because the man's a genius, the result sounds like an exuberant, no-holds-barred funk party rather than another tired supersession. At its best, the songwriting has real bite; at the least it carries a strong groove. Things falter a bit when Byrne, as affected as he's ever been, turns up. Other than that, Funk of Ages lives up to its title. As revolutionary as Worrell's work has been (and continues to be), the borderline-goofy, uniquely P-Funkitized party atmosphere that it evokes is something you don't hear much of these days. [gk]

WRECK

Wreck EP (Play It Again Sam USA) 1989
Soul Train (Play It Again Sam USA) 1990 •

This Chicago-based trio of Milwaukee natives (including Die Kreuzen vet Keith Brammer on bass) slams harsh guitar power into abrupt Minutemen-styled material on its first two records, creating a hectic rush of jagged electricity within sturdy song structures.

A lot less brutal than other current Steve Albini protégés, Wreck doesn't make much of a case for itself on the rather generic-sounding four-song 12-inch. With bracing covers of both the Fall (a great version of "Various Times") and the Sensational Alex Harvey Band (an okay rendition of "Ribs and Balls"), Soul Train covers more ground and demonstrates real growth potential. Shouter/guitarist Dean Schlabowske is a commanding frontman, but the lumbering rhythm section's struggle to find its rightful place in the songs occasionally frustrates his efforts. [i]

WRECKLESS ERIC

Wreckless Eric (nr/Stiff) 1978
The Wonderful World of Wreckless Eric (nr/Stiff) 1978
The Whole Wide World (Stiff) 1979
Big Smash! (Stiff-Epic) 1980
The Peel Sessions EP (nr/Strange Fruit) 1988
Le Beat Group Électrique (Fr. New Rose) 1989
At the Shop! EP (Fr. New Rose) 1990 •

CAPTAINS OF INDUSTRY

A Roomful of Monkeys (nr/Go! Discs) 1985

LEN BRIGHT COMBO

The Len Bright Combo Present the Len Bright Combo by the Len Bright Combo (nr/Empire) 1986
Combo Timal (nr/Ambassador) 1986

On the front of his first LP, the grinning "Wreckless" Eric Goulden wears a badge proclaiming "I'm a mess," and a drop of the needle on the disc confirms it. Led by producer Larry Wallis (himself an ex-Pink Fairy), a motley crew whose previous employers include Ronnie Lane, Marc Bolan and Ian Dury slosh together some mangy guitars, slurpy sax and cheesy organ to surround the strangled, semi-sodden vocals of this lovable scruffy runt from Brighton. All too often, though, catching the bits of perception and knowing desperation requires clearing the sonic mud, not to mention deciphering Eric's drawl.

All, that is, except on the brilliant "Whole Wide World," produced and mostly played by Nick Lowe. As if noticing that Lowe's well-defined pop sense seemed to bring out Eric's best, a series of producers then tried to clean up and dress up his sound. The next album's roster was only slightly less rag-tag (Hollywood Brats holdovers and ex-Man man Malcolm Morley), helmed by Pete Solley. This time, though, a balance was obtained between Eric's innate looseness and the clarity and sheer musicality needed to adequately present his tunes. As a result, The Wonderful World is a rollicking good time propelled by Eric's trademark guitar chug.

No hits were forthcoming, though, and Stiff apparently decided to clean Eric's act up further, as is evident from the new-material first half of the double set, Big

Smash! Fresh faces in the band (who also collaborated with him on songwriting) and decidedly more commercial-minded production unfortunately seemed to have sanded off all of the Wreckless edges (The stand-out tune, "Good Conversation," is one he wrote alone; it's also the nastiest.)

Clearly establishing his merits once and for all, the other half of Big Smash is an irreproachable distillation of the first two LPs and a batch of singles. That disc had previously been issued separately in the US as The Whole Wide World, indicating—even to those who might have otherwise dismissed him—Eric's surprising resonance, not to mention his squandered and/or squelched potential. (For collectors of odd discs, the first LP was also issued as a brown-vinyl 10-inch, with two songs fewer.)

Dropping the "Wreckless" and reverting to his given name, Goulden returned in 1985 as leader of Captains of Industry, a trio including ex-Blockhead bassist Norman Watt-Roy. The group's sole release, A Roomful of Monkeys (guest-starring Mickey Gallagher, another ex-Blockhead, whose roller-rink organ is actually the most prominent instrument on many tracks), makes it clear that his five-year absence did nothing to dull Eric's spirit or his talent. Considering that Goulden produced himself, it's a surprisingly disciplined effort, mixing the craftsmanship of Big Smash with the spontaneity of earlier efforts. With songs that are as pungent as ever (including the uncharacteristically serious reggae-tinged "Food Factory"), Eric sings them confidently (and in tune!). A resounding comeback by an estimable talent; why it wasn't greeted as such by the British public remains a mystery.

Noting that professionalism didn't get him anything but good marks, Eric went low-fi again, fronting the three-man Len Bright Combo (no one named Len Bright is involved; the other two members are ex-Milkshakes) on two wonderful albums, giving swell tunes like "You're Gonna Screw My Head Off" and "Someone Must've Nailed Us Together" cleanly played garage-raveup treatment that suits them as well as the pop arrangements on A Roomful of Monkeys.

Though Captains of Industry and the Len Bright Combo demonstrated that Eric had finally gained enough self-control to hone his raw talent into consistently satisfying music without putting himself at the mercy of unsympathetic producers, his subsequent releases make it clear that this was just a phase. Reverting to the Wreckless moniker, Goulden teamed with a French rhythm section to record Le Beat Group Électrique, a casually delivered set that—despite its title—is the most minimalist and least-rocking studio disc in his catalogue. Though it lacks the musical cohesion of the preceding group efforts, it's a charming little reminder that Eric can still sound like a mess when he's in the mood. The brief "Fuck by Fuck" could be interpreted as misogynistic, but it's more likely that Eric's just trying to be annoying.

The six-song At the Shop! is even more spare, with Eric and three barely audible French sidemen performing live at New Rose's record store in Paris. (Actually, the solo acoustic rendition of "Semaphore Signals," as well as the two similarly realized CD bonus tracks—"Depression (Version Francaise)" and "Boney Maronie"—were "found in the warehouse.") Eric's liner notes indicate that he's finished trying to tailor his music to suit mainstream recording standards. An enjoyable keepsake to be sure, but Goulden's sloppiness-for-its-own-sake ethos does not bode well for his artistic future [jg/hd]

WURZEL

See Motörhead.

ROBERT WYATT

The End of an Ear (Columbia) 1971 (nr/CBS) 1980
Rock Bottom (Virgin) 1974 (Blue Plate) 1990 ●
Ruth Is Stranger Than Richard (Virgin) 1975 (Blue Plate) 1990 ●
Rock Bottom/Ruth Is Stranger Than Richard (nr/Virgin) 1981
Robert Wyatt (It. Rough Trade) 1981
Nothing Can Stop Us (nr/Rough Trade) 1981 (Gramavision) 1986 ●
The Animals Film (nr/Rough Trade) 1982
Work in Progress EP (nr/Rough Trade) 1984
1982-1984 (Rough Trade) 1984
I'm a Believer EP (nr/Virgin) 1984
Old Rottenhat (Gramavision) 1985 ●
The Peel Sessions EP (nr/Strange Fruit) 1987
Compilation (Gramavision) 1990 ♠

MATCHING MOLE

Matching Mole (nr/CBS) 1972
Matching Mole's Little Red Record (Columbia) 1973

Having first come to prominence as founding drummer/vocalist with Canterbury's Soft Machine, Bristol-born Robert Wyatt is one of the English art-schools' most notable (and best-loved) musical alumni, retaining that genre's spirit of musical adventurousness without indulging in the bloated pretensions that side-tracked many of his contemporaries. In the unselfconscious experimentalism of his post-Softs work, and in the political commitment of his more recent material, Wyatt has served as an inspiration for a new generation of socially conscious British artists.

End of an Ear, Wyatt's first solo LP, was recorded right before he left Soft Machine and basically continues in that group's freewheeling avant-jazz spirit. Wordless scat-sung originals are bookended by two lengthy versions of Gil Evans' "Las Vegas Tango."

The four-man Matching Mole—the name is a phonetic adaptation of the French translation of "soft machine"—recorded two albums of meandering (and occasionally charming) pieces, mostly instrumentals. The spotty Matching Mole is mainly a Wyatt showcase; the more driving Little Red Record (produced by Robert Fripp) is a collective effort, but both are weighed down with the sort of aimless noodling that helped give progressive rock a bad name.

Following a crippling fall that left him permanently wheelchair-bound, Wyatt recorded Rock Bottom, produced by Pink Floyd's Nick Mason, and the self-produced Ruth Is Stranger Than Richard. Both records are idiosyncratic, mixing woozy experimentation ("Little Red Riding Hood Hit the Road," which appears in two utterly different versions on Rock Bot- tom, and Ruth's "Muddy Mouse," a collaboration with Fred Frith) with charmingly pastoral nursery rhymes ("Sea Song," "Alifib," both from Rock Bottom). Ruth is the better focused of the two, and includes the remarkable "Team Spirit," which hints at the political outlook that dominates Wyatt's later work. I'm a Believer and the live Peel Sessions also contain material from this period; both feature Wyatt's droll non-LP reading of the Monkees' Neil Diamond-penned classic.

Wyatt lay low for the remainder of the '70s, finally reemerging at the turn of the decade with a series of four audacious Rough Trade singles. Those eight sides (two of which are performed by artists other than Wyatt) are collected on the Italian Robert Wyatt, and form the basis of Nothing Can Stop Us. Though basically a compilation with only one original composition, Nothing Can Stop Us is a cohesive and incredibly moving statement, with Wyatt's fragile, plaintive vocals breathing new life (and political content) into material as diverse as Chic's "At Last I Am Free," the obscure American gospel tune "Stalin Wasn't Stallin'," the folk song "Caimanera" (aka "Guantanamo") and the disquieting lynch-mob protest "Strange Fruit" (most associated with Billie Holiday). Though Wyatt personally adheres to a fairly ruthless strain of Stalinism, you'd never know it from the compassion and empathy that radiate from every groove of this record.

Nothing Can Stop Us was subsequently re-released with the significant inclusion of the Elvis Costello/Clive Langer-penned "Shipbuilding" (produced by Costello, Langer and Alan Winstanley), as subtle and insightful an anti-war song as anyone's ever written. The album's US version, released in 1986, ditches the poet Peter Blackman's reading of his "Stalingrad" and adds "Shipbuilding," plus its British 12-inch B-sides (interpretations of Thelonious Monk's "Round Midnight" and Eubie Blake's "Memories of You") and cover art.

The Animals Film contains Wyatt's appropriately harsh instrumental score for a harrowing documentary chronicling institutionalized human cruelty. The four-song Work in Progress is similar in approach to Nothing Can Stop Us, with a reworking of Peter Gabriel's "Biko" and Spanish-language folk songs by Victor Jara and Pablo Milanés. The American 1982-1984 combines the contents of Work in Progress and the British "Shipbuilding" 12-inch.

The completely self-penned Old Rottenhat is a perceptive, beautifully performed and ultimately bleak view of ongoing political struggle, more specific than Nothing Can Stop Us but equally emotive. Though many of Wyatt's lyrics veer towards the doctrinaire, his singing is as quietly passionate as ever. (The 1990 Compilation is merely a CD/cassette pairing of Old Rottenhat and Nothing Can Stop Us.)

The Peel Sessions EP was recorded in September 1974 and contains "Soup Song," "Sea Song," "Alifib" and "I'm a Believer." [hd]

See also Everything but the Girl.

WYGALS

Honyocks in the Whithersoever (Rough Trade) 1989 ●

Though this New York combo has been around in one form or another since the mid-'80s, it took leader

Janet Wygal and her drummer brother Doug (both ex-Individuals) four years to release an album under the family name. By that time, ex-dB Gene Holder (who had produced both of the Individuals' releases), had joined as guitarist/producer, helping to refine the band's once-sprawling sound into a refreshingly nonformulaic brand of guitar-based art-pop that's aurally attractive but never sappy. On Honyocks in the Whithersoever, tracks like "Eat a Horse," "Creature Comforts" and "Slap Me Like a Wave" balance Janet's mischievous wordplay and offhandedly impassioned vocals with inventively layered melodies that even sound good backwards (as on the title track). A fine record by an under-recorded band. [hd]

See also Individuals.

PETE WYLIE

See Wah!.

STEVE WYNN

See Dream Syndicate.

X X X X X X X

X

- Los Angeles (Slash) 1980 •
- Wild Gift (Slash) 1981 •
- Under the Big Black Sun (Elektra) 1982 •
- More Fun in the New World (Elektra) 1983 •
- Ain't Love Grand (Elektra) 1985 •
- See How We Are (Elektra) 1987 •
- Live at the Whisky A Go-Go on the Fabulous Sunset Strip (Elektra) 1988 •

KNITTERS

- Poor Little Critter on the Road (Slash) 1985

EXENE CERVENKA + WANDA COLEMAN

- Twin Sisters (Freeway) 1985

EXENE CERVENKA

- Old Wives' Tales (Rhino) 1989 •
- Running Sacred (Rhino New Artists) 1990 •

JOHN DOE

- Meet John Doe (DGC) 1990 •

Named after the band's hometown, X's debut album is identifiable as a forerunner of hardcore; the simple, unrestrained energy often threatens to crush the "realistic" tunes ("Sex and Dying in High Society," "Nausea," etc.), but never does. Certainly, the elements that give X their majesty on later LPs are already present: Billy Zoom's vibrant rockabilly/Chuck Berry guitar licks, D.J. Bonebrake's thundering drums and arresting vocal harmonies by Exene Cervenka and bassist John Doe, strongly reminiscent of early Jefferson Airplane. Doors organist Ray Manzarek produced the first four albums; on Los Angeles, the band saluted him by covering "Soul Kitchen."

Wild Gift constitutes a great leap forward, bringing Los Angeles' action blur into sharp focus. Zoom's ingeniously simple guitar transcends its influences, and the Doe/Exene harmonies attain a knifelike sharpness. Also, their songs are frequently as incisive as their voices: "We're Desperate," "In This House That I Call Home" and "White Girl," a spooky ballad, ambitiously peer into unglamorous realities without either diminishing or inflating their subjects. Wild Gift was such a success as an independent label release that the band's jump to a big company (where greater success has ironically eluded them) was practically inevitable. (In 1988, the first two X albums were issued on a single Slash CD.)

Though Under the Big Black Sun primarily refines the techniques of Wild Gift, it's no disappointment. Bonebrake's drums just get harder and harder, while Doe and Cervenka continue to expand their prowess as singers and songwriters. "Motel Room in My Bed" revives the sleaze motif of earlier LPs; "The Have Nots" skillfully separates compassion from mawkishness.

The problematic More Fun in the New World is the work of a band filled with energy and ideas, but unsure how to apply them. As a result, this thoroughly respectable LP is too much like Big Black Sun to be fully satisfying. Sizzling tracks such as "Make the Music Go Bang" and "I Must Not Think Bad Thoughts" would have worked fine on that previous disc, which is a bad sign for a band accustomed to growing by leaps and bounds. In "True Love Pt. #2," X wonders about its own relationship to American mainstream music without arriving at a clear answer. After the LP, they attempted to make contact with Top 40 by covering "Wild Thing" and fell flat.

An album by the Knitters—a part-time, mostly acoustic band consisting of X (minus Billy Zoom), Blaster Dave Alvin and a stand-up bassist—proved to be a glimpse into the future when, in early '86, Zoom left X to form his own band and Alvin gave up the Blasters (at least temporarily) to replace him. Critter on the Road records a sincere but futile attempt to imitate several varieties of folk and country music, from traditional to swing. The material mixes cleverly cliché-laden originals (and an acoustified version of "The New World" for anyone who didn't realize what a weak song it is) with Merle Haggard and Leadbelly covers; Doe/Exene's wistful "Love Shack" is the record's standout.

Ain't Love Grand, the original lineup's final album together, is a hot (if styleless) rock'n'roll record that cuts the crap to bang out unprepossessing raveups like "Burning House of Love." On most songs, lead vocals are taken by Exene or Doe alone; the partial elimination of their harmonies is a distinct improvement, as is Michael Wagener's loud, gimmick-free production style. The biggest boner here, a misbegotten amateurish cover of the Small Faces' "All or Nothing," indicates that X—or at least some portion thereof—has never had a clue about rock music's heritage.

X rebounded from the loss of guitarist Billy Zoom with a vengeance on See How We Are. Dumping Wagener's metal flourishes for the less flashy approach of producer Alvin Clark, this polished platter cooks wickedly on desperate rockers like the lead-off "I'm Lost" then tugs at the heartstrings with "You," an old-fashioned love lament even non-fans should appreciate. The standout track, however, is "4th of July," penned by Dave Alvin. A wide-screen tale of terminal alienation that holds out little hope of redemption, "4th of July" matches the epic sweep of "Born to Run."

The two-record Live at the Whisky A Go Go makes a good case for the band onstage, showcasing pithy axework by Alvin's successor, Tony Gilkyson (ex-Lone Justice). A studio album of new material would have been more welcome, though. (Note that this is not the soundtrack of X's rarely seen feature film, The Unheard Music.) With that, X went on indefinite hiatus.

Cervenka's poetry gets an airing on one side of Twin Sisters, a record she shares with Wanda Coleman (who has released several spoken-word album on her own). An excess of pretense and a shortage of wit make the rocker's efforts pretty heavy sledding, with the most notable moments being "Peas and Beans" (which belittles synth bands) and three pieces penned by her late sister Mary.

After X retired, Exene made a record with Tony Gilkyson, who produced, co-wrote and played guitar and mandolin on Old Wives' Tales. Dominated by her strong vocals (harmonizing in familiar ways with Gilkyson and others), the tasteful and varied mixture of folk, country, recitation and sturdy rock isn't that great a stylistic leap from the essence of X ("He's Got a She" is, in fact, a carbon copy), although the lyrics aren't exactly what the group generally required ("He carved his initials in her uterus?").

Running Sacred, again imaginatively produced by Gilkyson with much the same support staff, spans a wider range, with more artistic ambition. There's a gentle acoustic guitar lullaby ("Clinic"), straight country-rock ("Will Jesus Wash the Bloodstains from Your Hands") and full-throttle electric rap-rock ("Real Estate," written by bassist Duke McVinnie). Not everything works, but the discovery of new ways to sing and new things to sing about vaults Cervenka into her artistic own, allowing her some distance from the dormant band. Passing the album's acid test, John Doe sings backup on "Missing Nature" without stirring up the faintest memory of their longtime partnership.

Before making his solo debut, Doe threw himself into a successful acting career, ably appearing in such films as Slamdance, Salvador, Roadhouse, Border Radio and Great Balls of Fire. It was a wise move, considering the abject failure of Meet John Doe. Attempting to make a looselimbbed countryish rock record without the off-key camouflage of Exene's voice or roaring punk noise, Doe (with producer Davitt Sigerson—who seems clueless here—and a host of supporters, including guitarist Richard Lloyd) winds up spinning his wheels on a bunch of handdog songs (mostly originals, but also one by John Hiatt and some old Cervenka lyrics Doe finished off) that don't suit his homely singing and undefined personality enough to be convincing.

At the end of 1990, to prove they hadn't actually broken up, X (with Tony Gilkyson on guitar) played four shows in Los Angeles. [jy/i]

See also Blasters, Divine Horsemen.

X

X-Aspirations (Aus. X) 1979 (Aus. Ultimate) 1990
At Home with You (Aus. Major) 1981
And More (Aus. White Label) 1989

Not LA's X nor the current Japanese X (heavy metal girls caught in an explosion at the makeup factory), this X operate(d) in Australia, inventing late-'80s NYC-style post-punk in the waning years of the '70s. X-Aspirations couples deep riff repetitive rhythms with scattershot guitar and anguished vocals for a "punk" LP unlike any other, appropriate for a band as distant and isolated from the media focus as one could conceivably get without leaving the planet. In later years, Feedtime made a point of acknowledging their debt to early X; the band's influence is still readily apparent in Australia's Red Eye and Aberrant stables. (The reissue is remixed and adds a song.)

At Home with You is a more approachable album, transforming the debut's belligerent punk into a sort of fringe rock, but still featuring the high-phlegm Killdozery vocals of Steve Lucus. And More, recorded following the '88 death of first-LP drummer Steve Cafeno and related fund-raising reunion shows with second-LP drummer Cathy Green, delivers a crowd-pleasing punch of punk aggro and attitude, including an updated but not-so-dissimilar skin-shredding blare culled from the first album. A milestone band, overlooked but hardly forgotten. [ab]

X CLAN

To the East, Blackwards (4th & B'way) 1990 •

Threatening but never delivering a heavyweight political message, this deeply Afrocentric Brooklyn group—a conceptual attempt to cross Marcus Garvey with George Clinton—parks entertainment on the back burner to make vague statements about history and culture with impressively crisp professorial diction. Evidently better able to express their esoteric views in interview format, X Clan couches its debut album in meaningless argot (calling their efforts "vanglorious" instead of rap, and referring to any dissenter as "sis-see"), repeatedly making reference to Africa without any clear point. Typical of the quartet's semi-hollow posturing, Professor X announces "Vanglorious: this is protected by the red, the black and the green" in a ponderous theatrical voice at least a dozen times throughout the record. That's a message. [i]

XMAL DEUTSCHLAND

Incubus Succubus EP (Ger. Zick Zack) 1982
Fetisch (nr/4AD) 1983 •
Tocsin (nr/4AD) 1984 •
The Peel Sessions EP (nr/Strange Fruit) 1986
Viva (nr/Phonogram) 1987 •

The dense, throbbing rock of this Hamburg quintet may be too strong for some; on "Incubus Succubus," the title track of a three-song 12-inch, semi-tonic vocalist Anja Huwe bellows and shrieks with dark drama while the band drones and pounds out an unbelievably heavy track behind her, a horror movie cross between Siouxsie and the Banshees and Hawkwind.

The lineup for Fetisch, recorded in England, includes Huwe and three other women (guitar, keyboards, drums) plus a male bassist. With a slightly toned-down attack, Xmal Deutschland's drone loses some of its allure, and a full album's worth of onrushing chaos and numbing noise is more tedious than gripping. The CD adds three songs from a subsequent 12-inch.

Also recorded in London, but this time with mainstream producer Mick Glossop, Tocsin tempers the band's ugly side with economy, variety and restraint. They're still loud as hell and do sound in spots like Hawkwind but, at this point, they're also at a nexus with Joy Division, using bleak noise to convey a variety of moods. With the subtlety and dynamics that were previously lacking, Tocsin reveals Xmal Deutschland to be cogent and invigorating

The Peel EP was recorded in April 1985 and contains four selections. [1]

See also This Mortal Coil.

X-RAY SPEX

Germ Free Adolescents (nr/EMI Int'l) 1978

POLY STYRENE

Translucence (nr/UA) 1980 (nr/Receiver) 1990 •

God's & Goddesses EP (nr/Awesome) 1986

One of the most exciting groups of its time, X-Ray Spex was at once an ideal and atypical punk band. While boasting as much raw aggression as any of its peers, X-Ray Spex used a distinctively different means of delivery—augmenting Jak Airport's obligatory buzzsaw guitar with Rudi Thompson's (Lora Logic's replacement) even-more-abrasive sax and giving center stage to Poly Styrene (Marion Elliot), a talented teenager who yowled witty lyrics with all the delicacy of a cat in heat.

X-Ray Spex's one LP collects some of the ace singles that made them such an early punk standout, although it doesn't contain their classic first outing, the wild "Oh Bondage, Up Yours!" Styrene's songs focus on the artificiality of modern life; hence such titles as "The Day the World Turned Day-Glo" and "Warrior in Woolworths." Whether the tune is a ballad or a crazed rocker, the band surges as if there were no tomorrow. And for them, there wasn't. A masterpiece!

Styrene always seemed one of punk's most dispossessed souls, so perhaps the solo album that followed the band's dissolution (which sent two members off to form Classix Nouveau) should be viewed as a last stab at finding some sense of place in musical terms. A feeling of alienation still prevails: Translucence is so smooth and coolly delivered that one could easily miss the dark side in the lyrics. Jazzy cocktail-hour backing combines with Styrene's childlike visions to make the music's effect most elusive.

Styrene subsequently left music completely to join a British Hare Krishna sect, but resurfaced commercially in early 1986 with a delightful, well-adjusted 12-inch EP. Jak Airport arranged two of the four originals comprising God's & Goddesses; the record's main musicians are Mick Sweeney and Paul Inder. The anti-cult "Trick of the Witch" has hauntingly echoed vocals and a driving rock beat; synthesized log drum and sitar give the jazzy mantra of "Paramatma" fascinating color. "Big Boy Big Toy" attacks the nuclear arms race with humor and urgency. Welcome back, Poly—please make more records! [jy/wk/i]

See also Essential Logic.

XTC

3D EP (nr/Virgin) 1977 + 1978

White Music (Virgin Int'l) 1978 (Virgin-Epic) 1982

(Virgin-Geffen) 1984 •

Go 2 (Virgin Int'l) 1978 (Virgin-Epic) 1982

(Virgin-Geffen) 1984 •

Drums and Wires (Virgin) 1979 (Virgin-Epic) 1982

(Virgin-Geffen) 1984 •

Generals and Majors EP (nr/Virgin) 1980

Black Sea (Virgin-RSO) 1980 (Virgin-Epic) 1982

(Virgin-Geffen) 1984 •

Towers of London EP (nr/Virgin) 1980

5 Senses EP (Can. Virgin) 1981

Senses Working Overtime EP (nr/Virgin) 1982 •

Ball and Chain EP (nr/Virgin) 1982

English Settlement (nr/Virgin) 1982 (Virgin-Epic) 1982

(Virgin-Geffen) 1984 •

Waxworks/Beeswax (nr/Virgin) 1982 (Virgin-Geffen) 1984

Mummer (nr/Virgin) 1983 (Virgin-Geffen) 1984 •

The Big Express (Virgin-Geffen) 1984 •

The Compact XTC—The Singles 1978–85 [CD] (nr/Virgin) 1985 •

Skylarking (Virgin-Geffen) 1986 •

Dear God EP (Virgin-Geffen) 1987 [CD] (nr/Virgin) 1988 •

King for a Day EP [tape] (nr/Virgin) 1988

Oranges & Lemons (Virgin-Geffen) 1989 •

The Mayor of Simpleton EP [CD] (nr/Virgin) 1989 •

Explode Together: The Dub Experiments 78-80 [CD] (nr/Virgin) 1990 •

Rag & Bone Buffet [CD] (nr/Virgin) 1990 (Virgin-Geffen) 1991 •

MR. PARTRIDGE

Take Away/The Lure of Salvage' (nr/Virgin) 1980

DUKES OF STRATOSPHEAR

25 O'Clock EP (nr/Virgin) 1985 •

Psonic Pspot (Virgin-Geffen) 1987 •

You're a Good Man Albert Brown EP (nr/Virgin) 1987

Chips from the Chocolate Fireball [CD] (nr/Virgin) 1987 (Geffen) 1988 •

XTC has never been easy to categorize. At first they seemed like one more high-spirited new wave band, gleefully trampling on rock conventions set the day before. On White Music, XTC delights in dissonance, unresolved melodic lines and playful lyrics; guitarist Andy Partridge's hiccupping vocals are matched by equally nervous music. Amid hyperactive material like "Radios in Motion," "This Is Pop" and "Spinning Top," only a version of Bob Dylan's "All Along the Watchtower" shows respect for the past. (Packaged in an appropriately stereographic sleeve, the 3D EP is a 12-inch of "Science Friction" and two other songs; the White Music CD appends all three tracks, as well as four early B-sides.)

The follow-up, Go 2, is even further out. The songs, mostly by Partridge, excoriate conformism and other hang-ups in kaleidoscopic imagery; the music is alternately herky-jerky and menacing. (If that sounds too coherent, a bonus 12-inch EP called Go+ pulverizes five of the album's tracks with retitled dub remixes.) Probably XTC's least-known record, Go 2 yielded no singles whatsoever, although the insidiously wonderful "Are You Receiving Me?," released the same month as the LP, was later added to its CD.

The band settled down on Drums and Wires, proving they could make commercial-sounding music without sacrificing their considerable intelligence. The departure of organist Barry Andrews—replaced by guitarist Dave Gregory—seemed to take some helium out of the arrangements. XTC's funhouse world on Drums and Wires is more accessible, but still booby-trapped:

"Making Plans for Nigel" (deleted from the Virgin-Epic US edition), "Real by Reel," "Life Begins at the Hop" (a spectacular single added to US editions of the album, both of which have different track sequences from the original LP), "Scissor Man," "Complicated Game." Released in 1991, the US CD puts back "Nigel" and "Day in Day Out" (the UK LP track initially deleted in favor of "Life Begins at the Hop") and appends two obscurities—"Chain of Command" and "Limelight"—from a 1979 single given away with early copies of the album.) As Mr. Partridge, a separately released "solo" album, Take Away/The Lure of Salvage, finds Andy playing more games with tracks from Drums and Wires. "This used to be some XTC records," the sleeve notes. "It is now a collection of tracks that have been electronically processed/shattered and layered with other sounds or lyrical pieces." (Explode Together combines this record with Go+ for a complete retrospective of XTC in dub.)

Black Sea refines Drums and Wires' approach. Heedless of fashion, XTC builds up the music with multiple strains, undanceable rhythms, intricate interplay and gloriously literate lyrics. The dazzling result is the band's finest achievement up to that point: an album that, like its songs ("Respectable Street," "Generals and Majors," "Towers of London"), unsentimentally employs the past to make new statements. (The CD appends three B-sides, all of them included on Beeswax.)

English Settlement continues in the same vein but succumbs to rococo excess. (Five songs were pruned from the original British two-record set to fit it onto one US disc, but the 1984 Geffen reissue returned it to two.) Partridge evidently feels compelled to match musical sophistication with like words; he unfortunately outdoes himself. His prolix lyrics on offbeat but straightforward topics (war, paranoia, even love) read better than they sing and, as recorded, must be read to be understood. English Settlement tilts like an over-frosted wedding cake. That it doesn't quite topple is a tribute to the band.

XTC's most winning material, much of it written by bassist Colin Moulding, invariably turns up on their EPs and 45s. 5 Senses gathers a few non-LP sides (including "Smokeless Zone" and "Wait Till Your Boat Goes Down") from 1980 and '81. But that EP was soon superseded by Waxworks—Some Singles 1977–1982, which cleverly assembles the band's 45s, almost all originally drawn from albums, on one superb LP. The accompanying second disc, Beeswax—Some B-Sides 1977–1982, collects their non-LP B-sides—not deathless music, but inventive as always and decidedly unpretentious. The advent of new technology a few years later yielded The Compact XTC, an eighteen-song CD-only singles compilation which picks up all of Waxworks and then continues, starting with "Great Fire" and running up through "Wake Up." (A B-sides and rarities collection—Rag & Bone Buffet—followed five years later.)

With drummer Terry Chambers' departure, XTC next found themselves in a precarious position with their British record label, which was reportedly hesitant to release another brilliant but uncommercial album. That hitch delayed the appearance of Mummer for quite some time. As far removed as it may be from the quirky pop that originally characterized XTC's music, it's a lovely record, resplendent in a quiet, rural sound and ethos. Co-existing with the invigorating whomp of "Great Fire" and the loud rock and disgusted lyrics of "Funk Pop a Roll," there's Partridge's rustic "Love on a Farmboy's Wages" and Moulding's lazy "Wonderland," offering a perfect summery escape from the pressures and excitement of rock. Mummer: Music for Picnics. (The CD has six bonus cuts—all Partridge songs—including two from the UK Dear God EP.)

Continuing on as a trio, The Big Express returned XTC to the world of urban reality, disgruntled songs about life in the big city, celebrating the alternative ("The Everyday Story of Smalltown") but, more surprisingly, again playing full-blast rock rather than bucolic lyricism. "All You Pretty Girls," incorporating a British folk idiom, is as catchy a number as they've ever done; and the record's overall sense of recharged enthusiasm is quite infectious.

Partridge's regrettable post-release sniping notwithstanding, XTC's collaboration with Todd Rundgren on Skylarking yielded an album as good as any in their catalogue. The songs are thoughtful, winsome, introspective and melodic; Rundgren's likeminded production (and sequencing) brings them out in a cavalcade that is resonant and memorable. Moulding's best numbers—"Grass," "The Meeting Place" and "Big Day"—address (respectively) sex al fresco, illicit romance and the dangers of marriage. Partridge, meanwhile, worries about making ends meet in "Earn Enough for Us" and space junk in "Another Satellite." Adult, provocative and plainly brilliant. (A pre-LP UK 12-inch of "Grass" b/w "Extrovert" and "Dear God" focused unexpected attention on Partridge's controversial song about religious skepticism. Those three numbers were then released as an American EP, adding "Earn Enough for Us." Finally, the album was withdrawn and reissued with "Dear God" replacing "Mermaid Smiled," as it does on the CD. The British Dear God EP, available only on CD, is entirely different from the American.)

With demerits for an unpleasant electro-drum sound and an overzealous arrangement or three, Sides 1 and 2 of Oranges & Lemons are very nearly Skylarking's equal. Unfortunately, it's a double album, and there isn't much in the second half (beyond "Pink Thing," a magical ode to a baby) to rave about. Producer Paul Fox helps the trio tip its sonic hat to the Beatles while giving full attention to the band's usual soaring melodies and inimitable lyrics. (Moulding wrote just three of the fifteen songs; while none is on a musical par with his best, the frank admission of immobilizing insecurity on "One of the Millions" carries an unnerving ring of sincerity.) Making another wonderful and lasting contribution to the XTC classics library, Partridge—in an obviously joyous mood—welcomes a child into the "Garden of Earthly Delights," reaffirms the old hippie faith in "The Loving" and dismisses intelligence as a romantic necessity in "The Mayor of Simpleton."

Some EPs: The Generals and Majors and Towers of London 12-inches each contain three non-LP tracks. Two of the three songs added to the Senses Working Overtime 12-inch (and subsequent 3-inch CD) appear on Beeswax; the leftover is Moulding's electronic instrumental, "Egyptian Solution (Homo Safari Series No. 3)." The Ball and Chain 12-inch has two B-sides that turn up on Beeswax, plus a Partridge remix of the full-length English Settlement's "Down in the Cockpit." King for a Day is a cassette single joining that Oranges & Lemons track with three oldies, including "Generals and Majors" and "Towers of London." The Mayor of Simpleton is a 3-inch CD of a second track from the 1989 LP joined by a pair of home demos and another tune.

Partnered with producer John Leckie, XTC undertook a pseudonymous side project in 1985 as the Dukes of Stratospher. The day-glo watches and peace symbols on the cover of the carefully appointed satirical 25 O'Clock mini-album match the six Rutlesque rewrites of '60s classics like "I Had Too Much to Dream Last Night." Unfortunately, the gaily psychedelic put-on is so clever and careful that it winds up less funny than notable for its accomplishment. The full-length Psonic Psonspot downplays the pose with a far lighter parodic touch—the most prominent touchstone is White Album-era Beatles—and basically amounts to a very casual XTC LP with an intuitive '60s feel rather than a conscious art context. By not striving for specific imitation and merely enjoying the romp, the Dukes have a better time, and so do listeners.

Although Psonic Psonspot was issued on its own CD, it was also paired with 25 O'Clock and released as the CD-only Chips from the Chocolate Fireball. Completists can also rest easy about the You're a Good Man EP, as it merely contains a pair of selections from each of the group's two records. [su/i]

See also Robert Fripp, Shriekback.

XYMOX

See Clan of Xymox.

Y Y Y Y Y Y Y

YACHTS

Yachts (Radar-Polydor) 1979

Yachts Without Radar (Radar-Polydor) 1980

Liverpool's Yachts were capable of alternating a scaled-down version of pomp-rock (faster, more cheaply tricked out, no instrumental exhibitionism) and '60s-influenced rock with leader Henry Priestman's cheesy organ sound. And that in the service of humorously melodramatic caricatures of the usual boy/girl lyric fodder: love by letter ("Box 202"), unfair romantic competition ("Yachting Type," "Semaphore Love," etc.). Despite sympathetic production by Richard Gottferrer, Yachts sounds a bit tinny, and the group was unable to equal their mini-classic Stiff debut single ("Suffice to Say"), though the potential to do so is evident.

Not being taken seriously because of funny lyrics may have taken its toll; on Without Radar, the jokes and even the previously solid songwriting sound as thin as Martin Rushent's uncharacteristically poor production. [jg]

See also Christians, It's Immaterial.

YAZOO (YAZ)

Upstairs at Eric's (Mute-Sire) 1982 •

You and Me Both (Mute-Sire) 1983 •

Yazoo (known as Yaz in the US) was one of England's most interesting synth-pop duets, mostly because of the sharp contrast provided by vocalist Alison Moyet's incredibly rich and soulful voice, a more powerful and emotive sound than one generally expected to hear paired with high-tech instrumentation in those days. Along with ex-Depeche Mode synthesist/songwriter Vince Clarke, Yazoo represented a stylistic breakthrough that proved influential in the development of electronic-based dance music.

Unfortunately, while Upstairs at Eric's is admirable for its experimentalism, it contains just one really striking song (the beautiful ballad, "Only You"), some moderately interesting quirky pop ("Too Pieces," "Bad Connection"), two solid dance numbers ("Don't Go" and "Situation") made tolerable by the band's talent and strengths and one truly awful piece of tape-looping ("I Before E Except After C").

You and Me Both, on the other hand, offers a better selection, from Moyet's defiant and atmospheric "Nobody's Diary" and funky "Sweet Thing" to Clarke's bouncy "Walk Away from Love." There are some serious low-points to be sure, but in general it's a more even and exciting album, further exploring the blend's possibilities.

Given the dynamic tension of the partnership, it was hardly surprising when Moyet and Clarke decided, after two albums, to go their separate ways: he to form the Assembly (later, Erasure) and she to a successful solo career. [ks/s]

See also Erasure, Alison Moyet.

YEAH YEAH NOH

Cottage Industry EP (nr/In Tape) 1984

Weakling Lines EP (nr/In Tape) 1984

Prick Up Your Ears EP (nr/In Tape) 1984

When I Am a Big Girl (nr/In Tape) 1985

Cutting the Heavenly Lawn of Greatness ... Last Rites for the God of Love (nr/In Tape) 1985

Temple of Convenience EP (nr/In Tape) 1985

Fun on the Lawn Lawn Lawn (nr/Vuggum) 1986

The Peel Sessions EP (nr/Strange Fruit) 1987

Like In Tape labelmates the Creepers, this Leicester quartet (later quintet) displays some Fall influence (albeit less harsh) and makes things easy for record buyers by combining several releases onto a single disc. When I Am a Big Girl reprises the first three EPs in their entirety and has such highlights as "Cottage Industry," "Prick Up Your Ears" and "Starling Pillowcase and Why" which, like the rest of the record's songs, are unpolished, raw pop gems with smartass lyrics. Cymbal-less drums and chunky bass lines form a foundation for modest guitar work and Derek Hammond's deadpan baritone. Great fun.

Cutting the Heavenly Lawn of Greatness adds some well-placed psychedelic embellishments and a little (but just a wee bit) more production to the homespun sound. Lyrics are sharp as ever: "Home-Ownersexual" is the clever tale of a bored, dissatisfied housewife; "Stealing in the Name of the Lord" decries religious hypocrisy. Some earlier tracks pop up again in new versions, and the LP also contains the title track from the Temple of Convenience EP. Sadly, Yeah Yeah Noh disbanded upon that release but left behind a catalogue of great records, permeated with real DIY spirit, warmth and humor.

Fun on the Lawn Lawn Lawn is a posthumous collection of various sessions for John Peel's radio program. (Yeah Yeah Noh were one of his faves. One session, from January 1986, was also released by Strange Fruit.) It includes versions of most of their best tracks ("Home-Ownersexual" is listed as "Another Side of Mrs. Quill") and a few songs that are otherwise unavailable. [dgs]

YELLO

Solid Pleasure (Ralph) 1980 (Mercury) 1988 •

Claro Que Si (Ralph) 1981 (Mercury) 1988 •

Bostich EP (Stiff) 1982

You Gotta Say Yes to Another Excess (Elektra) 1983
 (Mercury) 1988 ●
 Yello EP (Elektra) 1983
 Stella (Elektra) 1985 (Mercury) 1988 ●
 The New Mix in One Go: 80-'85 (nr/Mercury) 1986 ●
 One Second (Mercury) 1987 ●
 Flag (Mercury) 1988 ●

Switzerland's Yello (Boris Blank, singer/lyricist Dieter Meier and Carlos Peron—all non-musicians in the finest Brian Eno tradition) harnessed the synthesizer to become one of the most important and creative bands working in the medium.

Solid Pleasure is a record of their exploration of the studio and instruments, surging with discovery and innovation. On this LP, Yello are dark experimenters of the highest order, treading fearlessly through a perilous forest of electronics. The music is a confident cross-pollination of lighthearted pop and avant-garde. Inspired.

Claro Que Si continues Yello's adventurous innovation, but applies it to dance music with stunning results. Meier's vocals, though limited in range, slide blissfully against Blank's synthesizer and backing vocals and Peron's tape effects to create a pop/disco album full of evocative, warm tunes, evincing a dynamism rare in this sort of music. And they stay far away from pretensions, too.

Bostich presents new versions of songs from the albums, with an otherwise unavailable track, "She's Got a Gun," added to the US edition. Remakes aren't normally essential listening, but Yello proves they're one of the few bands capable of transfiguring old material rather than rehashing it, and with exquisite intelligence at that.

Signing to Elektra, Yello made You Gotta Say Yes to Another Excess, which contains some of their most accessible dance music, although it would be far from accurate to call Yello commercial or mainstream at this point. "I Love You" pushes a pulsing electro-beat and whispered vocals vaguely about driving, throwing in screeching tires to underscore the point. "No More Words" recites the title over herky-jerky rhythms and little else; "Great Mission" is a suave dramatic travelogue. The 23-minute EP that followed contains remixed, extended versions of three LP tracks plus "Bostich."

Revealing a slimmed-down Yello of just Meier and Blank, Stella adopts more of a Euro-disco sound, dropping the reliance on electronics and most of the weirdness to play it relatively straight. Meier's vocals have gone from wondrously strange to cloying; several guest musicians provide vocals, piano, drums and guitar, making this a most routine and non-intriguing release.

Meier and Blank split the chores on One Second simply: Boris composed and arranged the music, Dieter wrote and sings the lyrics. Guests include Shirley Bassey and ex-Associate Billy Mackenzie, who provided lyrics for two cuts and vocals for one. Continuing down the conservative path indicated on Stella, Yello pushes a reserved, suavely textured sound that is dance-oriented, but not overpowered by rhythm. Polite Latin accents on a few songs provide character; continental excursions and adult pop fill out the program. A pleasant, debonair waste of time. Structurally and stylistically, Stella is virtually a re-run of One Second (sans Bassey), and—with the notable exception of the bracing dramatics of "3rd of June"—equally enervating.

The New Mix in One Go is a two-record compilation that includes remixes, remakes of old songs and even some entirely new material. [sg/i]

YELLOW MAGIC ORCHESTRA

Yello Magic Orchestra (Jap. Alfa) 1978 (Horizon-A&M) 1979 ●

Solid State Survivor (Jap. Alfa) 1979 (nr/Alfa) 1981 ●

Public Pressure (Jap. Alfa) 1980 ●

X∞ Multiplies (Jap. Alfa) 1980 (nr/Alfa-A&M) 1980

X∞ Multiplies (A&M) 1980

BGM (A&M) 1981 ●

Technodelic (Alfa) 1981 ●

Service (Jap. Alfa) 1983

After Service (Jap. Alfa) 1983

Naughty Boys (Jap. Alfa) 1983 ●

Naughty Boys Instrumental (Hol. Pickup) 1985

Sealed (Jap. Alfa) 1985

For the technology-minded Japanese (who, after all, do have their own musical logic and traditions), the rock medium most suited to adaptation rather than bland mimicry has been electronic-oriented pop. By their third LP, YMO represented to Japanese kids a heterodoxy almost equivalent to the Sex Pistols and, in Japan at least, many times their commercial success.

None of the three members were musical neophytes at YMO's outset. While recording his first solo LP, session keyboardist Ryuichi Sakamoto met drummer Yukihiro Takahashi, who'd not only cut his own album but had been a member of the Sadistic Mika Band (Japan's well-known art-rock export of the early '70s who made three LPs for UK Harvest) and its offshoot, the Sadistics. The pair met bassist/producer Haruomi Hosono, a veteran of two historically important Japanese bands, while he was cutting his fourth solo LP. (He's done more since but, unlike his two bandmates, Hosono's solo records have never been released in England or America. The 1986 Video Game Music employs the electronic sounds of arcade games.)

Despite the pedigree, YMO's first LP is merely inane electro-disco, distinguished only by efforts at idling video-game blips and squonks into songs. Solid State Survivor (their second Japanese LP, issued intact but out of chronological sequence in the UK) is a qualitative leap forward: clever instrumentals and excellent electro-rock tunes with terse, sharp English lyrics by Chris Mossdell. Takahashi's flat, inflexible vocals are a mixed blessing—no silly histrionics, but an air of cool detachment that's, at least initially, off-putting.

X∞ Multiplies has two more fine tracks in the same vein, but the rest of the original Japanese half-hour 10-inch is given over to mostly unfunny comedy skits (and two humorous tries at Archie Bell and the Drells' "Tighten Up"). In the UK, the LP of the same name adds the aural vid-bits from the first LP, but the US release retains only the title and the two good cuts, the rest being the best part of Solid State Survivor. Public Pressure is a live album.

BGM and Technodelic are both mixed bags. On the plus side, they explore new (for YMO) stylistic areas—"Strawberry Fields" gone synth, Germanic bleep strutting, bleak Anglo synth-rap—but little on either is as distinctive or just plain entertaining as Takahashi's or Sakamoto's solo work. Hosono's production (the first six YMO LPs, as well as discs by Sandii and the Sunsetz, Sheena and the Rokkets and others) has clarity but lacks the snap and depth that would make these two records come alive.

Service is a frustrating record; it alternates YMO tracks with cuts just as long as the songs by the comedic (?) theater group S.E.T. As impenetrable as it is to those who don't speak Japanese, even those who do might be annoyed at the non-musical interruptions. It's doubly irksome because the songs are excellent. Wisely, Naughty Boys has equally good songs without the comedy. The melodies on both discs are much more accessible and consistently pleasing than any of the previous YMO LPs, with no noticeable shift in songwriting balance. (Beginning with Service, Peter Barakan, who's written lyrics for Takahashi's LPs, supplies them to YMO in place of Mosdell. Also, YMO produced these two albums as a group.)

After Service is a double live set, but the name has more to do with the order of its release than its content, drawing on previous records. Sealed is a four-disc boxed set. [jg]

See also Ryuichi Sakamoto, Yukihiro Takahashi

YELLOWMAN

- Mister Yellowman (Greensleeves) 1982 •
- Live at Sunsplash (nr/Sunsplash) 1982
- Zungguzungguguzungguzeng (Greensleeves) 1983 •
- King Yellowman (CBS) 1984 •
- Nobody Move Nobody Get Hurt (Greensleeves) 1984 •
- Galong Galong Galong (Greensleeves) 1985 •
- Going to the Chapel (Shanachie) 1986 •
- Rambo (Moving Target) 1986 •
- Yellow Like Cheese (RAS) 1987 •
- Don't Burn It Down (Shanachie) 1987 •
- Blueberry Hill (Rohit) 1987 •
- Yellowman Sings the Blues (Rohit) 1988 •
- Yellowman Rides Again (RAS) 1988 •
- One in a Million (Shanachie) 1989 •
- Party (RAS) 1991 •

YELLOWMAN AND FATHEAD

Bad Boy Skanking (Greensleeves) 1982

YELLOWMAN/CHARLIE CHAPLIN

The Negril Chill [tape] (ROIR) 1988 [CD] (Fr. Danceteria) 1990 ♪

YELLOWMAN AND GENERAL TREES

A Reggae Calypso Encounter (Rohit) 1987 •

Albino reggae toaster Yellowman (Winston Foster) parlayed his unusual looks and talent into overnight success. His music is versatile and engagingly comic in a dancehall style. Like his counterparts in American rap, he's often swaggering, boasting about his toasting and his luck with the ladies. Because his strut is goodnatured and backed up by fierce turntable work (his improv and rhythm are extraordinary), he's extremely convincing, and has become quite a sex symbol.

More than two dozen Yellowman albums flooded the market in the early '80s. Many are so-so live sets, collections of singles and outtakes, Jamaican-only releases, or team-ups with other DJs. The listing above contains only some of his most widely available LPs.

Mister Yellowman, the album that helped launch his international fame, remains among his best. Nearly every cut is strong, including "Mister Chin," "Two to Six Supermix" and the My Fair Lady-inspired "Yellowman Getting Married" (in the morning). While they often come close, none of his other records equal this consistency and easy versatility.

Zungguzungguguzungguzeng, for instance, isn't even in the same league. For one thing, it's misleading (if not mistitled): seven of ten cuts are actual duets with another DJ (Fathead). They make an okay team, but their rapport is mostly in a rub-a-dub style, and the record bogs down as a result. Best is the title tune, a solo toast to the music of Michigan and Smiley's "Diseases"; worst is "Who Can Make the Dance Ram," a reworking of Sammy Davis Jr.'s "Candy Man."

Admirably, CBS tried to encourage Yellowman's versatility when he signed with the label, but the resulting King Yellowman is another mixed success. Most of Side One is fine ("What Dat," for instance), but the flip is a mess. Yellowman meets Material for "Disco Reggae," tries to "Reggae Calypso" and finally covers Frankie Ford's pop hit "Sea Cruise." All of these fusion attempts go wildly astray.

Less contrived versatility is evident on his later Shanachie albums. Nobody Move is a bit spotty, but the strong cuts are really great. The title track, as well as "Strictly Mi Belly" and "Why You Bad So" are all cookers, guaranteed to make you rock and groove. Galong is also worth investigating, for it features an anti-Michael Jackson number called "Beat It"; "Reggae Win a Grammy," Yellowman's report on his trip to the awards ceremony; and "Skank Quadrille," a toast to Bunny Wailer's "Walk the Proud Land."

Going to the Chapel, on the other hand, lags a bit and is less consistent, although a variety of rhythms are featured and the title cut is a wacko cover of the Dixie Cups' "Chapel of Love." Track for track, Don't Burn It Down is stronger, full of energy and fire from first cut (the title song, a ganja anthem) to last (the consummately rude "Dry Head Adassa").

As the '80s progressed, so did Yellowman's label-hopping. Rambo, on a Celluloid subsidiary, is a noble experiment featuring Robert Lyn on piano, Sly Dunbar on drums and Robbie Shakespeare going heavy on the bass synthesizer. The backup is unusually high-tech for a Yellowman record, but he raps up a storm, pushing the music aggressively forward like the character commemorated in the title track. (There's another appropriate cut called "Computerize.") Yellow Like Cheese returns him to rootsy form: less dance-oriented and with sparser musical backup.

Despite rumors of ill-health, Yellowman has continued to churn out records. While Don't Burn It Down contains some of his typically lewd slack lyrics, there's some real fun and noteworthy selections that aren't dirty. The title track, for example, is an anthemic protest against the burning of ganja fields. He condemns violence against women on "Stop Beat Woman" and offers a political opinion about the South African situation in "Free Africa." He delivers his lyrics in a step-lively rock/rap mode geared to rile up his listeners, which he invariably does.

In typically nasty fashion, Rides Again contains "Want a Virgin," "AIDS" and "Girl You're Too Hot." Yet after such repellent doggerel, Yellowman can draw a card showing his politically conscious side with "Ease Up President Botha," or reveal his sensitivity with an ode to late reggae singers ("In Memory").

Recorded live in concert (1987) at the Negril Tree House in Jamaica, the Negril Chill is an actual dance-hall session between Mr. Yellow and conscious, roots-culture DJ Charlie Chaplin. It's an authentic slice of life, as the listener becomes part of and a witness to the casual banter between these two contrasting, yet equally talented DJs.

One in a Million (the material on which dates from 1982) contains two of his earliest hits, "Operation Eradication" and "Them a Mad Over Me." [bk/aw]

YOBS

See Boys.

YO LA TENGO

Ride the Tiger (Coyote-Twin/Tone) 1986

New Wave Hot Dogs (Coyote-Twin/Tone) 1987 •

President Yo La Tengo (Coyote) 1989 •

Fakebook (Bar/None) 1990 •

SCHRAMMS

Walk to Delphi (OKra) 1990 •

Led by Hoboken's Ira Kaplan (vocals/guitar) and Georgia Hubley (drums/vocals) plus whomever else they team up with, Yo La Tengo (named for the cry of the Spanish-speaking outfielder) nicely weds the underground noise-rock impulse and the fannish cover-band vibe. Rather than doing the eclectic dilettante bit, Kaplan, Hubley and company work their influences into a surprisingly cohesive and satisfying whole.

Ride the Tiger, produced by ex-Mission of Burma bassist Clint Conley, benefits from Dave Schramm's sterling guitarings which, like Kaplan's reedy (as in Lou) vocals, underline Yo La Tengo's vintage-Velvets connection. The band also covers Ray Davies' "Big Sky," but it's originals like "The Cone of Silence" and "The Forest Green" that make Ride the Tiger such a pleasure.

New Wave Hot Dogs suffers a bit from Schramm's absence, but it's more consistent than its predecessor, with distinctive originals ("House Fall Down," "Blocks from Groove St.") and a dead-ringer cover of Lou Reed's "It's Alright (The Way That You Live)."

Gene Holder produced and plays bass on the excellent President Yo La Tengo (contained on one CD with New Wave Hot Dogs), a strange and noisily electric hodgepodge (two songs were recorded live at CBGB; the material comprises YLT originals as well as an Antietam song and Bob Dylan's "I Threw It All Away") that somehow holds together. Kaplan's "The Evil That Men Do" appears twice: as a concise and twangy '60s guitar'n'organ instrumental and as ten mind-blowing minutes of onstage feedback fury.

Schramm and a standup bassist joined Hubley and Kaplan for Fakebook, a delightful low-key collection of (almost all) covers. While reaching across time and space to dredge up an eclectic stack of tuneful arcanities from the Kinks, Flying Burrito Brothers, John Cale, NRBQ, Cat Stevens and the Flamin' Groovies, the group also lends an interpretative ear to such lower-profile contemporaries as The Scene Is Now and Daniel Johnston. In a minor conceptual coup, Yo La even covers itself, re-recording a song each from the prior two albums. The simple but imaginative arrangements are ideal for Kaplan's gentle, amateurish singing; Hubley's harmonies likewise contribute to the friendly folks-at-home ambience.

The charming album by Dave Schramm's band—a quartet with Fakebook bassist Al Greller, ex-Human Switchboard drummer Ron Metz and a keyboard player—mixes literature and countryish folk-rock to illuminating effect. Besides being a deft and tasteful guitarist, the group's namesake is a winningly plain Dylanesque singer who makes the most of his modest vocal skills. That the Schramms can set Emily Dickinson and Charles Baudelaire poetry to jaunty original music (only on three songs—other than a Tom Paxton cover, the rest of the record is self-penned) and get away without seeming pretentious is only one reason to seek out Walk to Delphi. [hd/i]

NEIL YOUNG (AND CRAZY HORSE)

Neil Young (Reprise) 1968 •

Everybody Knows This Is Nowhere (Reprise) 1969 •

After the Gold Rush (Reprise) 1970 •

Harvest (Reprise) 1972 •

Time Fades Away (Reprise) 1973

On the Beach (Reprise) 1974

Tonight's the Night (Reprise) 1975 •

Zuma (Reprise) 1975 •

American Stars 'n Bars (Reprise) 1977

Decade (Reprise) 1977 •

Comes a Time (Reprise) 1978 •

Rust Never Sleeps (Reprise) 1979 •

Live Rust (Reprise) 1979 •

Hawks & Doves (Reprise) 1980

Re-ac-tor (Reprise) 1981

Trans (Geffen) 1982

Neil and the Shocking Pinks: Everybody's Rockin' (Geffen) 1983

Old Ways (Geffen) 1985

Landing on Water (Geffen) 1986 •

Life (Geffen) 1987 •

This Note's for You (Reprise) 1988 •

Freedom (Reprise) 1989 •

Ragged Glory (Reprise) 1990 •

Dirty rock'n'roller and hippie narcissist. Rockabilly hepcat and techno-troubadour. Folkie romantic and bluesy bad boy. Neil Young has been all of these things—and more—in the course of a solo career that's approaching the quarter-century mark. While his output during the '80s was particularly erratic, he's always placed art above commercial success or the need to accommodate fan expectations. Unpredictable and often infuriating, Young is never (well, hardly ever) boring, a state of grace few veteran musicians can claim. Holding to his lyrical axiom that it's better to burn out than fade away, Young is one of the only oldtimers to make real peace with punk-rockers half his age, finding rejuvenation in their fountain of wild youth. Indeed, Young's reckless path demonstrates far less self-conscious orthodoxy than many so-called alternative bands. And virtually alone among his aging peers, Young's intensity, his ability and inclination to throw off cascades of violent guitar fury, hasn't softened one iota.

The self-titled solo debut, released in the wake of Buffalo Springfield's demise, explores a style he hasn't tried since. Apart from "The Last Trip to Tulsa," an awkward, overlong acoustic epic, the album features dense, heavily produced pop tunes, swathed in layers of overdubs. Though "The Loner," "I've Been Waiting for You," etc. now seem a bit overdone, their emotional urgency comes through loud and clear.

Everybody Knows This Is Nowhere marked the first of many radical shifts, turning to the raw, driving rock many feel still suits him best. Backed by Crazy Horse, who display the ratty fervor of punk years before the fact, he yowls and whines with exhilarating abandon, cranking out jagged, overwrought guitar solos like his life depends on it. The catchy "Cinnamon Girl" makes a good single, but the extended melodramas—"Cowgirl in the Sand" and "Down by the River"—offer the biggest thrills.

Enjoying increased exposure after signing on with Crosby, Stills and Nash, Young achieved prominence as a solo artist on After the Gold Rush, a mixed-bag of noisy raveups (the infamous "Southern Man," which inspired Lynyrd Skynyrd's "Sweet Home Alabama"), brooding folk-pop ("Tell Me Why") and sappy ballads ("Birds"). Harvest temporarily sealed his fate as a mainstream favorite, thanks to the lightweight country-fied chart-topper, "Heart of Gold." The rest of the album ranges from a dreadful orchestral reverie ("A Man Needs a Maid") to a tortured electric lament ("Words"). Both LPs were later issued as a double-play cassette.

Obviously spooked by the tender trap of success, Young abandoned his perch at the top of the heap with Time Fades Away. A live album of all-new material, this sloppy, sometimes excruciatingly rough noise-fest has the primal directness of John Lennon's Plastic Ono Band. From the title track (his own "Subterranean Homesick Blues") to the aching ballad "Don't Be Denied," Young serves notice he will not grow old gracefully.

The restlessness continued with On the Beach. After the snappy leadoff track "Walk On," Young offers edgy, dispirited tales of social decay ("Revolution Blues"), music-biz cynicism ("For the Turnstiles") and other fun stuff. Often riveting, but a downer. Yet it's a barrel of laughs compared to Tonight's the Night, Young's most hellish album ever. Featuring guitarist Nils Lofgren and the Crazy Horse rhythm section of Ralph Molina and Billy Talbot, it's a chilling meditation on excess and death, recorded two years prior to its release. The ghostly title cut concerns the 1973 heroin death of a roadie; "Come on Baby Let's Go Downtown" (to score drugs), an older track, is sung from the grave by onetime Crazy Horse guitarist Danny Whitten, who overdosed in 1972. Young and crew sound drunk and exhausted throughout. Essential.

The gloom lifted with Zuma, a solid, floor-shaking return to gritty rock. Backed by Crazy Horse (now with Frank Sampedro on rhythm guitar), Young howls the down-home blues ("Don't Cry No Tears") and uncorks some of his most expressive guitar work since "Cowgirl in the Sand" ("Cortez the Killer"). Following a 1976 album with Stephen Stills, his concentration began to drift. There's a precious honkytonk feel to many of the tracks on American Stars 'n Bars (a collection of tracks recorded between '74 and '77 with various line-ups), although "Like a Hurricane" is a classic guitar showcase and the fascinating, barely-in-tune ballad "Will to Love" finds Neil likening himself to a fish swimming upstream.

The three-disc, two-CD Decade makes a persuasive case for Young as one of the most consistently adventurous artists in rock. Besides all the "hits," it includes a generous helping of strong previously unreleased stuff and presages the boxed-set explosion ten years later.

After pausing to tend his gentler side on Comes a Time, a largely forgettable outing with prominent harmony vocals from Nicolette Larson, Young got back in the groove with Rust Never Sleeps. Joined by Crazy Horse, he turns in some unusually strong ballads ("Thrasher," "Powderfinger") and rocks like the devil, especially on "Hey Hey, My My (Into the Black)," his enthusiastic response to punk. Live Rust is a career-spanning double live set that includes lethal versions of "Cortez the Killer," "Like a Hurricane" and "Tonight's the Night," pushed over the edge by Crazy Horse's blazing assault.

Hawks & Doves finds Young back on folk and country turf, offering a few incisive tunes amidst the throwaways. The jaunty title track looks askance at militarism and jingoism, a concern echoed in the acoustic "Captain Kennedy." On Re-ac-tor, Young and Crazy Horse reach down deep to get that big nasty electric noise. The material isn't consistent—nine minutes of the disposable "T-Bone" strains one's patience—but "Shots," "Southern Pacific" and others crackle with passion and hot licks.

Young then flipped out, and embarked on a series of genre exercises that seem more arbitrary than heartfelt. Trans presents Neil as electro-man, complete with synths, vocoders and songs about computers and future shock; the new version of his Buffalo Springfield classic "Mr. Soul" is particularly odd. Everybody's Rockin' salutes rockabilly with a lightweight, good-natured set of originals and oldies, including "Mystery Train" and "Bright Lights, Big City." Then he went back up the country for Old Ways, down-home silliness highlighted by a campy cover of "The Wayward Wind" and guest shots by Waylon Jennings and Willie Nelson. Landing on Water suggests he'd been listening to the Cars, adding synths and artificial rhythms to standard rock-band sounds. Ill-considered garish production spoils some decent tunes.

Just when it seemed he'd completely lost his marbles, Young reunited with Crazy Horse and made Life. While the LP doesn't have the slash-and-burn abandon of Zuma—overblown arrangements and production get in the way—"Mideast Vacation," "Cryin' Eyes" and others have a tough edge not glimpsed in years.

After one more stylistic detour—for a pointless set of big-band blues (co-billed with Bluenotes) on This Note's for You—Young settled back into his best-known grooves. Freedom has a spooky acoustic saga of social strife ("Crime in the City"), a harsh reinterpretation of "On Broadway," strung-out ballads and thundering electric commentary ("Rockin' in the Free World"), among other hearty tracks. Has the "real" Neil Young returned?

Moving from the topical to the personal, Ragged Glory offers additional encouragement. Crazy Horse thrash away like there's no tomorrow as Young pulls all sorts of exciting noises from his guitar on "Country Home," "Love to Burn" and others. Although widely regarded as his best in a blue moon, it isn't perfect. A few tracks don't work and the offhand sloppiness occasionally seems forced. But Ragged Glory does offer a bracing reminder that Neil Young can still shake the rafters better than most anyone else. Long may he rave.

The essentials: Everybody Knows This Is Nowhere, Time Fades Away, Tonight's the Night, Zuma, Decade, Rust Never Sleeps, Ragged Glory.

[jy]

PAUL YOUNG

No Parlez (Columbia) 1983 •

The Secret of Association (Columbia) 1985 •

Between Two Fires (Columbia) 1986 •

The 12" Tape EP [tape] (nr/CBS) 1986

Other Voices (Columbia) 1990 •

Q-TIPS

Q-Tips (nr/Chrysalis) 1980 (nr/MFP) 1986

From the ashes of London neo-sousters the Q-Tips emerged Paul Young, whose smoky voice, singing a mixture of classics and originals, quickly put him in the British, and later, American charts. The choice of songs on No Parlez ranges from the prudent ("Love of the Common People," "Wherever I Lay My Hat (That's My Home)," both of which are magnificent) to the surreal (Joy Division's "Love Will Tear Us Apart," which Young slowly mangles beyond recognition). A few of the new compositions are as well as well. The Royal Family (his band) and the Fabulous Wealthy Tarts (singers) supply sympathetic backing; Laurie Latham's wide-screen production is appropriately lush but never abandons the rock basis that anchored classic Motown records of the '60s. Young's first solo outing is promising: a solid pop album by an especially good singer.

The Secret of Association, Young's follow-up as a big star, shows a far more judicious selection process at work, resulting in an exquisite collection that mixes appropriate covers with originals he co-wrote. Items like "Bite the Hand That Feeds," "I'm Gonna Tear Your Playhouse Down" and especially Daryl Hall's "Everytime You Go Away" showcase Young's carefully controlled vocals and Latham's exceptionally subtle production. Each clearly articulated sound functions perfectly in the arrangements, resulting in seamless, emotionally resonant pop-soul creations.

Parting company with Latham, an increasingly self-confident Young co-wrote most of the songs and co-produced Between Two Fires with Hugh Padgham and keyboardist Ian Kewley. Although lacking the finely honed impact of The Secret of Association, a few tracks (e.g., "Wonderland," "A Certain Passion," "Some People") and the generally high level of appealing quality prove that—in this case, at least—it's possible to tamper with success and not upset the apple cart.

Between Two Fires wasn't a big commercial success in the US, so he reversed the formula for Other Voices. Instead of one production team, there are four different producers. Instead of Young co-writing all but two of the songs, he co-wrote three and used covers for the rest. The result is Young's most polished, least cohesive and, oddly, most experimental album, since the producers seem willing to try almost anything to get him a hit. While that mostly means smothering him in an adult-pop sheen or a wash of programmed rhythms, it also leaves the door open for a jazzy duet with Chaka Khan, a fast-rockin' stab at Free's "A Little Bit of Love" (he murders it) and a beautiful reading of the Chi-Lites' "Oh Girl"—the album's most basic and least-produced track—which became a hit. If any lesson was learned from all this, it should bode well for Young's next album. Forget the layers of extraneous production and let the guy sing.

The cassette-only EP contains 12-inch mixes of five singles, including "Wherever I Lay My Hat," "Love of the Common People" and "Everytime You Go Away." [i/ds]

ROB YOUNGER AND THE RIFLES

See New Christs.

YOUNG FRESH FELLOWS

The Fabulous Sounds of the Pacific Northwest (PopLlama Products) 1984 •

Topsy Turvy (PopLlama Products) 1985 •

The Men Who Loved Music (PopLlama Products-Frontier) 1987 •

Refreshments (PopLlama Products-Frontier) 1987 •

Totally Lost (Frontier) 1988 •

Beans and Tolerance (PopLlama Products-Frontier) 1989

This One's for the Ladies (Frontier) 1989 •

Includes a Helmet (nr/Utility) 1990 •

Electric Bird Digest (Frontier) 1991 •

MIGHTY SQUIRRELS/NEW AGE URBAN SQUIRRELS

Ernest Anyway and the Mighty Squirrels Sing the Hits of Johnny Kidd and the Pirates/Five Virgins (PopLlama Products) 1986

SQUIRRELS GROUP

What Gives? (PopLlama Products) 1990 •

JIMMY SILVA

Remnants of the Empty Set (PopLlama Products) 1986

JIMMY SILVA AND THE EMPTY SET

Fly Like a Dog (PopLlama Products) 1987

SCOTT MCCAUGHEY

My Chartreuse Opinion (PopLlama Products) 1989 [CD] (East Side Digital) 1989 •

From the back cover of Fabulous Sounds: "A collector's disc of the sounds that we in the Pacific Northwest live and play by—a high-hearted, medium-fi recording of such nostrums as the whistle of a ferryboat, the hoofbeats of the rodeo, the roar of racing hydroplanes and the musical beat of our symphonies and jazz." Nostrums? From the narrated grooves: mild frivolity like "Power Mowers Theme," "Teenage Dogs in Trouble" and "Rock and Roll Pest Control," played by an adaptable, skillful pop trio with folly in their minds and a tune in their hearts. Perfect.

Topsy Turvy only contains songs, but that's no hazard in light of such bright, well-played numbers as the traveloguish "Searchin' U.S.A." and "You've Got Your Head on Backwards," a "Tobacco Road"-styled beat raveup borrowed from the estimable Sonics. Armed with a winsome sense of nerdiness (check out the teen angst of "Hang Out Right") and a finely tuned grasp of Culture 101 ("The New John Agar"), the Seattle's four Fellows (bassist Jim Sangster's arrival allowed singer/bassist Scott McCaughey to switch to guitar) put a humorous spin on everything they touch here, but not in such a jokey way that they can't be taken seriously. Another delightful outing. (One ESD-label CD manages to contain the first two albums in their entirety.)

The characters assassinated by The Men Who Loved Music (entitled Chicago 19 on the spine; ask for it by name in your local record store) include an assortment of old tube stars (on "TV Dream"), a rueful tune about "Hank, Karen and Elvis" and the white-funking "Amy Grant." But there's nothing cruel about these iconic invocations—it's just the Fellows' way of saying "hey!" The self-deprecating quartet's best LP so far boasts winners in a number of mocking styles, e.g., the stomping "Get Outta My Cave" (a perfect song for the Troggs to cover), "I Got My Mojo Working (And I Thought You'd Like to Know)" and the blues-rocking "I Don't Let the Little Things Get Me Down." Despite their growing underground-band-makes-good coolness, they can still admit to selfconscious geekiness on the power-popping "When the Girls Get Here." (The 21-song Men Who Loved CD, with Henry Winkler's face on the disc, appends the previously unreleased "Happy Death Theme" and everything but the remixed version of the first LP's "Young Fresh Fellows Theme" from the subsequent Refreshments mini-album.)

Refreshments gathers up seven outtakes and rarities, including "Back Room of the Bar" (recorded for, but omitted from, Topsy Turvy), "Beer Money" (included on the Men Who Loved Music cassette), "Young Fresh Fellows Update Theme" (an obscure 1985 single) and the previously unissued "Broken Basket."

McCaughey's songs on Totally Lost give the Fellows the straightest, least inventively kooky things they've ever done. The LP is by no means bad, merely underwhelming. Despite flashes of familiar lyrical absurdity ("The Universal Trendsetter," "Take My Brain Away," "I'd Say That You Were Upset"), simplification, with a damaging air of haste, eliminates a lot of the band's ebullient personality in favor of guitar-rocking forthrightness. Some of the music preserves the ambitious cross-pollination ("Picky Piggy," "No Help at All," "Little Softy"), but Totally Lost as a whole is disappointingly serious and unimaginative. The CD substitutes a longer version of "Totally Lost Theme" and adds "You're Not Supposed to Laugh" and "World Tour '88."

Lead guitarist Chuck Carroll de-Fellowized himself after Totally Lost, leaving the "3 Young French Fellows 3" to cut a limited-edition official bootleg variously known as Beans and Tolerance or Simply Wonderful, Wonderfully Simple (thanks to the lack of a cover or label: the only identifying marks are cryptically scratched in the vinyl around the center hole). Recorded quickly with more enthusiasm than care, the twelve cavalier tunes—most in a gritty and/or psychedelic '60sish vein—add up to a joyous, rock'n'rolling studio party with massed backing vocals, one-take chaos, meandering guitar solos, bum notes and everything else that such great undertakings require.

Guitarist Kurt Bloch (also of the Fastbacks), the newest Fellow, rocks out like crazy and contributes three cool tunes to the loudly melodic This One's for the Ladies. Although the LP is a bit slow coming out of the gate, it picks up steam with kicky pop hooks, electric power and deft arrangements. A bare-bones version of Ray Davies' "Picture Book" stands out, as do such sturdy originals as "Middle Man of Time," "Miss Lonelyhearts," "The Family Gun," "Lost Track of Time" and the forlorn country corn of "Deep Down and Inbetween," on which Replacements guitarist Slim Dunlap guests.

Includes a Helmet, released on Billy Bragg's Utility label, is an eight-song retrospective—a sketchy but effective introduction that contains few of the songs mentioned above but is still worth hearing if you don't own all the records. (Collectors' alert: Helmet includes the otherwise unreleased "A Thing Like That.")

With Dennis Diken of the Smithereens pounding the skins (and members of the extended Fellows family pitching in), Scott McCaughey's lightweight solo record contains more evidence of his flip wit and bizarre imaginings than the band's recent LPs. (Not to mention a delightful version of the Dixie Cups' "People Say.") With unpredictable musical variety ("A Sobering Thought," for one especially weird example, shifts between film noir and Imagine-era Lennon, adding garden shears, a hammer and a wacky guitar solo to further confuse things), My Chartreuse Opinion offers moderate fun without guilt. (The CD adds four tracks by Jimmy Silva and two songs on which McCaughey is blandly backed by the Ben Vaughn Combo.)

Related (inbred?) projects: As the Mighty Squirrels, the Fellows back singer Rob ("Ernest Anyway") Morgan on a brilliant 1986 dual-concept album. One side covers pre-Beatles classics (intentionally overlooking the best-known "Shakin' All Over" and "Please Don't Touch") by Johnny Kidd and the Pirates. The flip, performed by a mixture of musicians dubbed the New Age Urban Squirrels, attacks representatives of the later '60s (e.g., "Hair" and "Spirit in the Sky"), which they devolve into cocktail lounge laxative sleaze.

The second Squirrels LP, a mad assortment of Fellows-speckled lineups, covers and recording circumstances, is total genius. For such an irreverent assault on pop music, What Gives? (some of it retrieved from obscure 45s and compilations) has great playing and production, excellent vocals by Morgan and enough revisionist imagination to cover a dozen such undertakings. After a rollicking rendition of a gospel standard, a spunky revamp of Gilbert O'Sullivan's doggy-do "Get Down," a chaotic monster-heavy assault on Bill Withers' "Lean on Me" (dissolving into Alice Cooper's "Eighteen"), a relatively straight version of Paul Revere and the Raiders' obnoxiously pushy "Let Me!" and the positively inspired (Wizard of) "Oz '90" medley, the handful of Squirrel originals merely ice this monumentally entertaining cake. The perfect antidote to all fifteen volumes of Have a Nice Day!

Bay Area singer/guitarist Jimmy Silva, a longtime associate who has written and recorded with the Fellows, gets the favor returned on his second album, Fly Like a Dog. McCaughey contributed to the songwriting; the entire band, alongside Dennis Diken, ex-Beau Brummels Sal Valentino and Declan Mulligan and others provide the instrumental backing for Silva's charging rock tunes. (Although the Fellows don't, Diken and Valentino also appear on Silva's first LP which is, nonetheless, memorable and unpretentious power pop.) Two tracks from each are graciously included on McCaughey's My Chartreuse Opinion CD. [1]

See also Fastbacks.

YOUNG GODS

The Young Gods (nr/Product Inc.) 1987 (Play It Again Sam) 1989 •

L'Eau Rouge—Red Water (Play It Again Sam) 1989 •

The Young Gods Play Kurt Weill (Play It Again Sam—Caroline) 1991 •

Few bands that can rock as hard as Switzerland's Young Gods are so crafty at sampling technology. Where most mediocre industrialists mix drum machines with real guitars, this trio (who took their name from a Swans song) utilizes an inhuman live drummer and a sampler that produces an incredible array of crunching guitar riffs and cybernetic keyboard tones. That Franz Treichler (the only constant God) sings almost exclusively in husky French is their next biggest asset, adding a palpably sensual and exotic edge to the electronic forays, while Roli Mosimann's stimulating production is so essential he's practically a fourth member.

After the excitement provoked by the thunderous 1986 single "Envoye!" (included on the CD of The Young Gods), the eponymous debut—an arid collection of martial beats—is a minor letdown. One tune, "Jimmy," has the same rush of exultant energy as "Envoye!" but an incongruous cover of Gary Glitter's "Did You Miss Me" doesn't aid the cause.

Everything comes into sharp focus on L'Eau Rouge, which offers a dense, enthralling mix of neo-metallic riff-driven chargers and subtly symphonic creations. From the opening carnival cabaret strains of "La Fille de la Mort" to the rampaging "Longue Route" and "L'Amourir" singles (the latter on the CD only), Treichler's gravely leer and existential dissertations fit this guitar-heavy material like a leather codpiece. And who could fail to appreciate the audacity of men titling an album and writing a song in honor of menstruation? [gef]

YOUNG MARBLE GIANTS

Colossal Youth (Rough Trade) 1980 •

Testcard EP (nr/Rough Trade) 1981

The Peel Sessions EP (nr/Strange Fruit) 1988

WEEKEND

La Variété (nr/Rough Trade) 1982 (Rough Trade) 1990 •

Live at Ronnie Scott's (nr/Rough Trade) 1983

GIST

Embrace the Herd (nr/Rough Trade) 1983

Cardiff's Young Marble Giants—singer Alison Statton and the Moxham brothers, Philip (bass) and Stuart (guitar, organ)—managed to stay together long enough to produce one oddball album before apathy got the upper hand. Using few overdubs, Colossal Youth recreates the mythical ambience of a beatnik coffeehouse. Statton's gentleness and the soft accompaniment contribute to a hushed mood that's either soporific or enchanting, depending on your point of view (or blood pressure). Minimalism never had such polite advocates before.

Following YMG, Statton joined Weekend, a trio with guitarists Simon Booth and Spike in which she sang and played bass; the session players on La Variété are uncredited. Well ahead of the mid-'80s pack, the group tried to concoct a jazz-pop genre that a larger range of musical modes than such a concept might suggest. La Variété offers a good outline of Weekend's intentions, as a song that starts out in YMG mode gets transformed into a full-blown samba, complete with horn section. While not all of Weekend's experiments here are similarly successful, the LP is unique and, for the most part, delightful. After Weekend, Booth went on to form and lead the longer-term and more mainstreamed Working Week. Statton returned to Wales and didn't really resurface until the late '80s, in partnership with Ian Devine.

The gist of the Gist is Stuart Moxham, although Embrace the Herd involves assistance by Phil on three tracks and contributions from other friends, including Statton. Embrace the Herd is a lovely little record that makes good, careful use of unfancy electronics as well as guitar in fragile pop songs and atmospheric (but not all that vague) instrumentals that benefit from Moxham's rare mix of roaming imagination and modest simplicity. [jy/gk/i]

See also Devine & Statton.

YOUNG MC

Stone Cold Rhymim' (Delicious Vinyl) 1989 •

Having made himself invaluable to Delicious Vinyl by cleaning up Tone-Lôc's too-funky lyrics on the chart-topping "Wild Thing" and co-writing "Funky Cold Medina," London-born University of Southern California economics grad Marvin Young helped himself to a hit with "Bust a Move," a goodnatured romantic tale with funny lyrics and a rhythm track built mainly on a bass line for effortless pop accessibility. Putting a more adult spin (except for the high-schooled "Principal's Office," another smash single) on the same kind of friendly middle-class raps that made stars of Jazzy Jeff and the Fresh Prince, Young MC smooths the hardness out of hip-hop and the colorful colloquialisms out of B-boy rhetoric. If Stone Cold Rhymim' too frequently succumbs to PG-rated blandness, Young instills this unchallenging platter with enough winning personality to make a good time. [i]

YOUTH & BEN WATKINS

The Empty Quarter (nr/Illuminated) 1984

BRILLIANT

Kiss the Lips of Life (Atlantic) 1986

BLUE PEARL

Blue Pearl (Big Life-PolyGram) 1990 ◊

Three years after opting out of Killing Joke, dreadlocked bassist Youth teamed up with former Hitmen vocalist Ben Watkins (now also versed in keyboards, drums and guitar) to record The Empty Quarter, the soundtrack to a play. Forceful and musically intelligent, with layers of disembodied sound lunging and pulsing in and out, it's a striking collection of dramatic, largely electronic instrumentals that bear some of Killing Joke's fury, mixed with subtlety and artsiness. Surprising.

Equally unexpected is the sound of the trio Youth subsequently formed with vocalist June Montana (ex-Dream Academy backing singer) and guitarist/keyboardist Jim Cauty (who played with Zodiac Mindwarp and was a leading album/poster designer in the '70s). The Stock-Aitken-Waterman team produced the dismal Kiss the Lips of Life, revealing the cynical Brilliant to be into high-tech dance-rock and neo-soul that could just as easily be by the Thompson Twins, Swing Out Sister or Bananarama. And what this bunch does to James Brown's "It's a Man's Man's Man's World" is sad.

After Cauty had gone on to fame and fortune as Bill Drummond's partner in KLF, Youth teamed up with unpleasantly deep-voiced American singer Durga McBroom, and produced, played on and programmed Blue Pearl, a muscular but mediocre dance record. [i]

See also Justified Ancients of Mu Mu, Killing Joke, Zodiac Mindwarp.

YOUTH OF TODAY

Can't Close My Eyes EP (Schism) 1985 (Caroline) 1988

Break Down the Walls (Wishing Well) 1986 (Revelation) 1988

We're Not in This Alone (Caroline) 1988

Youth of Today EP (Revelation) 1990

Before he began devoting his energies to the Hare Krishna parade, singer/lyricist Ray Cappo (aka Ray 2 Day) was a cult hero in New York's positive core and straight-edge punk communities. Playing with aggression and conviction, Youth of Today preached self-discipline, scene unity and standing up for one's beliefs, taking a hardline stance against the consumption of drugs, alcohol and meat.

The Youth crew's first release, Can't Close My Eyes, was a locally distributed 7-inch of rousing energy if little ingenuity. Each song consists of hyper-speed assaults broken by slow and heavy mosh sections that kick back into another bout of rage. Despite the monotonous ebb and flow, there's a certain inspirational value to lyrics like "Voice your opinion/Just don't sit still/Speak your mind/At your free will." The Caroline edition is a remixed 12-inch.

Break Down the Walls typifies New York straight-edge style, with chants, jetting momentum and self-awareness messages. But Cappo's indecipherable closed-throat rasp makes the LP hard to endure and its intentions hard to understand. The remixed 1988 reissue contains one added track.

Without sacrificing intensity, Cappo's voice is tame enough on We're Not in This Alone to blend with the music and have the lyrics come through loud and clear. The band's improved playing introduces dynamic realms that were unknown on previous efforts. Songs address animal rights, friendship and social justice.

Youth of Today splintered after that second album. Cappo joined the Krishnas (not exactly a band) and later fronted Shelter, a Krishna hardcore group; guitarist John Porcell formed Judge. The 1990 release is a posthumous three-song single of their last recordings, ironically some of their best material. [mg]

YOU'VE GOT FOETUS ON YOUR BREATH

See Foetus Inc.

YUNG WU

See Feelies.

Z Z Z Z Z Z Z

ZANTEES

Out for Kicks (Bomp!) 1980
 Rhythm Bound (Midnight) 1983
 The Zantees EP (Midnight) 1984

A-BONES

Tempo Tantrum EP (Ger. Exile) 1986
 Free Beer for Life! EP (Norton) 1988
 Life of Riley (Norton) 1991

The Zantees, a New York-based rockabilly combo named after an episode of Outer Limits, aren't overly serious about their music, which makes Out for Kicks delightfully irreverent. Singing and playing with a spirit money can't buy and synthesizers can't replicate, they easily make the oldies ("I Thought It Over," "Cruisin'," three others) their own; the originals ("Gas Up," "Blonde Bombshell," six others) sound like oldies. A futile gesture, perhaps, but a grand one. Poor recording quality adds atmosphere. (Bassist Rob Norris graduated to the Bongos.)

With one-take loose sound on Rhythm Bound, method singer Billy Miller barks out such ethnic 'billy originals as "Tic Tac Toe" and "Money to Burn." Drummer Miriam Linna (previously a charter member of the Cramps) also vocalizes on a couple: "I Need a Man" and "I'm Ready." The guitar-picking Statile brothers' proficient chromatic single-string playing provides a dual carburetor rhythm thrust.

The subsequent 12-inch combines two tracks from the second album with a pair of blazing live oldies (one sung each by Miller and Linna).

Besides publishing the luridly wonderful Kicks fanzine and running the Norton Records label (home of Hasil Adkins and countless Link Wray reissues), Miller and Linna currently lead the rocking A-Bones. Tempo Tantrum is a four-song 10-inch; Free Beer is a six-song 12-inch. [si/i]

FRANK ZAPPA AND THE MOTHERS

See Captain Beefheart and the Magic Band.

PETER ZAREMBA'S LOVE DELEGATION

See Flestones.

ZARKONS

See Alley Cats.

ZEITGEIST

Translate Slowly (DB) 1985

REIVERS

Saturday (DB-Capitol) 1987 •
 End of the Day (DB-Capitol) 1989 •
 Translate Slowly [CD] (DB) 1989 •
 Pop Beloved (DB) 1991 •

Out of Austin, Texas came Zeitgeist, two guys and two girls making moody, melodic and occasionally stunning folk-rock with a deep debt to the '60s—although there's plenty of modern angst and a rootsy feel more western than country. On Translate Slowly, John Croslin and Kim Longacre work up a Byrdsy guitar drone and evocative vocal interplay that either lulls with a tepid sonic wash ("Cowboys") or explodes with brooding fury ("Things Don't Change") and hot-breath passion ("Araby"). Croslin's dry-as-dust vocals mix equal measures of desire and distance, but Longacre's classically trained harmonies soar on a remake of Willie Nelson's "Blue Eyes Crying in the Rain."

Forced to abandon the Zeitgeist name by a Minneapolis percussion ensemble that had it first, the quartet chose an equally inappropriate new handle. (Capitol stickered the second LP with the band's former name. DB returned the favor by stickered copies of Translate Slowly with a wry mention of the new name but later switched the artwork and reissued it as a Reivers record, putting three bonus tracks on the CD.)

Both sides of the Don Dixon-produced Saturday begin with hard-edged Pylonesque syncopation, but otherwise the LP consists of unpretentious guitar pop suggesting 10,000 Maniacs with less idiosyncrasy. The band's personality hinges on appealing vocals; ironically, a nutty instrumental ("Karate Party") is one of the record's standouts. The ability to change gears from delicate melodicism ("Electra") to driving rock ("Wait for Time," "Secretariat") is a definite asset. (The CD adds a bonus track.)

End of the Day finds the Reivers moving into adulthood with grace and ease, dropping much of the early discs' otherworldly wispieness in favor of a more measured, down-to-earth feel. The approach is well-suited to Croslin's bittersweet songs, which reflect grown-up dilemmas ("It's About Time," "Cut Above") and irretrievable losses ("Star Telegram," "Discontent of Winter") with insight and empathy. The vocal interplay between Croslin and Longacre truly blossoms here, and Longacre shines on her solo showcases (including "Lazy Afternoon," a Broadway show tune originally performed by Barbra Streisand). There's also yet another nifty guitar instrumental, "Dude Man Hey."

[kh/i/hd]

ZERO BOYS

Vicious Circle (Nimrod) 1982 (Toxic Shock) 1988

DATURA SEEDS

Who Do You Want It to Be? (Toxic Shock) 1990

Vicious Circle is yet another example of how US hardcore seemed to peak coast-to-coast in '82. With attention focused on the well-established scenes, however, who would have expected an album this loaded with intensity, zeal, smarts, hooks and chops to come from Indianapolis? The young quartet is surprisingly tight, and recording quality is impeccable, zooming past like an amplified dragster. "Civilization's Dying" (with commentary on the then-recent shootings of John Lennon, Ronald Reagan and the Pope), "Dirty Alleys/Dirty Minds" and "Hightime" all zip by fast and hard (yet crystal clear), while others like "New Generation" and "Livin' in the 80's" are real "My Generation" calls to arms.

The Zero Boys petered out, reuniting from time to time to tour but not doing any further recording. Two members joined Toxic Reasons; singer/guitarist Paul Mahern emerged recently with another sharp hand, the power-poppy Datura Seeds. Recorded as a quartet, Who Do You Want It to Be? is a diverse and substantial LP with impressively tuneful songs and spunky delivery.

The reissue of Vicious Circle has six bonus cuts tacked on (and this is vinyl!), including three from The Master Tape, Vol 1 compilation. [jr]

ZONES

Under Influence (nr/Arista) 1979

This offshoot of Midge Ure's pre-Rich Kids Scottish pop outfit, Slik, had strong players, two of whom—guitarist Willy Gardner and keyboardist Billy McIsaac—wrote good songs and one of whom (Gardner) had an attractive if limited vocal style, like a young hybrid of Mick Ronson and Dave Edmunds. But what to do with it all? Pop? Hard stuff? Commercial new wave? Reggae-pop? The Zones try a little of everything on Under Influence without any forceful, unifying personality, despite passing nods to Mott and the Skids (which two Zones later joined). No bad cuts, but only one rises from enjoyable to exciting. [jg]

ZOVJET FRANCE

Hessian (nr/Red Rhino) 1982 •

Garista [tape] (nr/Red Rhino) 1982 ◊

Norsch (nr/Red Rhino) 1983 •

Mohnomishe (nr/Red Rhino) 1983 •

Eostre (nr/Red Rhino) 1984 •

Popular Soviet Songs and Youth Music [tape] (nr/Red Rhino) 1985

Gris (Ger. No Man's Land) 1985

Misfits, Loony Tunes and Squalid Criminals (nr/Red Rhino) 1986

Lohland [tape] (Hol. Staalplat) 1987

A Flock of Rotations (nr/Red Rhino) 1987

Shouting at the Ground (nr/Red Rhino) 1988 •

Look into Me (nr/Charm) 1990 •

Just an Illusion [CD] (Hol. Staalplat) 1990 •

One of the most idiosyncratic, original and reclusive groups in new music, Newcastle's Zoviet France issued most of its early records with bizarre handmade covers, using nontraditional materials in lieu of cardboard. (Even as the records have appeared on CD, the group maintains its fondness for odd packages: Just an Illusion comes in a balsa box.) As far as the music inside of the sleeves, Zoviet France uses textures and repetitive structures (delay boxes come in useful here) to hypnotize the listener, playing minimal percussion and lots of low-tech electronics.

Hessian, a 12-inch 45 in a screen-printed cloth bag, is enthusiastically primitive and abrasive, with percussion and feedback as well as silly chanting, hyperactive bongo playing and the shrill piping of flutes. Originally issued only on cassette, Garista lacks percussion, occasionally gets very silly indeed and is also very murky and industrial sounding. Besides being self-indulgent in parts, the recording quality is poor.

Norsch, a 12-inch 45 wrapped in embossed tinfoil, is the most powerful of Zoviet France's early recordings. Side One begins as screechy nightmare marching music punctuated by tape fragments of some militaristic speech, fading into a rumbly, ominous bad trip. Side Two starts with dreamy Arabian drones then goes pound-happy, with moaning and rudimentary synthesizer howls.

Mohnomishe and Eostre, both double-album sets (each available as a single CD), virtually abandon percussion in favor of dense atmospheres of echoey ambient electronics, conjuring up images of thick fog. Packed in masonite, the former (which evinces a growing Can influence) sets you on a coastal highway, propelled along by subtle sequencer action. As dogs bark and cars drone by, repeating blocks of sound—perhaps mangled guitar—come at you in hypnotic waves. Inside the plastic and tissue packaging, Eostre traps you on the docks as mammoth ships sail slowly by, clanking and rumbling through dense sheets of mist; whoever's singing on the deck sounds awfully weirded out. Great stuff.

In 1985, to catch up with an increasing backlog of material, the group issued a diverse and haphazard three-hour double-cassette, Popular Soviet Songs and Youth Music. The set contains some of the band's best material and some of its worst, sometimes right next to each other. The Zoviets followed that with the 10-inch Gris, their most carefully thought-out and best produced work yet. The side-long title track blends entrancing layers of repeating voices, synthesizers and guitar, while the other side is great electronic music, making effective use of a sequencer.

Misfits, Loony Tunes and Squalid Criminals is better recorded, finally achieving commercial quality standards. "They're Eating the Passengers" is probably the closest the group has come to a song, with tapes of hijackers played over attractive pulses, chimings (modified piano?) and restrained percussion. A Flock of Rotations is uneven, with some annoying tracks of feedback pinging through electronic delays.

Although the recording quality is poor, the second side of the Lohland cassette is spectacular, about 40 minutes of voices singing and howling through flangers, delays and chorus boxes.

Zoviet France reached new heights—in music, instrumental diversity and production polish—with Shouting at the Ground, a double album which includes "Shamany Influence," a very long piece that might be their finest effort. Nearly as impressive, Look into Me contains an even longer magnum opus (the 26-minute "Cair Camouflet"), a combination of industrial grinding, modified guitar and electronics. Other tracks apply electronics and tape loops with far more sophistication and impact than the earlier albums. Just an Illusion continues in the same vein, with longer mood pieces and shorter adaptations of Middle Eastern and Oriental music. [sl]

TAPPER ZUKIE

Man Ah Warrior (nr/Klik) 1974 (Mer) 1977

MPLA (Jam. Klik) 1976 (nr/Front Line) 1978

Tapper Roots (nr/Front Line) 1979

Peace in the Ghetto (nr/Front Line) 1979

In Dub (nr/Front Line) 1979

Black Man (nr/Mobiliser) 1979

Raggy Joey Boy (nr/Mobiliser) 1982

Earth Running (nr/Mobiliser) 1983

Ragamuffin (nr/World Enterprise) 1986

Though Tapper (Tappa) Zukie isn't active as a performer in the reggae mainstream, his toasting, which combines staunchly Rasta lyrics and heavy roots accompaniment, has always enjoyed an audience. His rock notoriety was boosted in the late '70s via an association with the Patti Smith Group; Man Ah Warrior was re-issued by Lenny Kaye on the Mer label. Cuts like "Simpleton Badness," "Viego" (the Jamaican sound system where he got his start) and "A Message to the Pork Eaters" fill the LP with dread, seasoned with irony and humor. Not to be missed.

MPLA is likewise classic and Tapper Roots is almost as good. Peace in the Ghetto, on the other hand, is lackluster and uninspired; despite the inclusion of the single "Phensic" (retitled "Dangerous Woman"), the rhythms are flabby, the toasting less interesting. Parting company with Virgin/Front Line, Zukie returned to Jamaica.

Black Man is sturdy, as is the first side of Earth Running, which features "The General," a tribute to the late General Echo. (Side Two, however, has two unconvincing disco cuts.) Raggy Joey Boy has more singing than toasting.

Since the mid-'80s, Zukie has been working mainly as a producer, helming Dennis Brown's "Death Before Dishonour" and Gregory Isaacs' "Hard Drugs," as well as U-Roy's Line Up and Come LP, one track of which ("It's About Time") actually features him. [bk/aw]

ZULUS

Down on the Floor (Slash) 1989 ●

Reuniting three members of Boston dance-novelty Human Sexual Response, this quartet dispenses with the jokes on its Bob Mould-produced debut. Unfortunately, it didn't also dispense with Larry Bangor, an insufferable singer with an unpleasant voice and a predilection for theatrical posturing. (Imagine Danny Elfman singing in Perry Farrell's stead, or the other way 'round.) Rich Gilbert's clever guitar moves range from loudly melodic rock to disjointed intricacy, but he only contributes to the album's pointless profusion of personalities. [i]

ZVUKI MU

Zvuki Mu (Opal-Warner Bros.) 1989 ●

This Russian band, produced in Moscow by Brian Eno, sparked Western comparisons to Talking Heads and Captain Beefheart. Maybe. But perhaps they were overwhelmed by Eno's enthusiasm for ambient music; Zvuki Mu is awfully enervating. Translations of the lyrics on the inner don't improve things, either: "300 minutes of pleasure with oneself" is admittedly an odd way of referring to masturbation (besides, this album is only 40 minutes, ho ho ho), but there's nothing compelling, nothing that cuts here. [jg]

SOURCES

For more information on non-mainstream music, the following publications—all available by subscription—are recommended, as are the two retail establishments at the end:

Option: This excellent and substantial bi-monthly covers a wide range of alternative musics, from underground to exotic. The articles are generally good, there's always plenty of reviews and the ads are well worth perusing. Sonic Options Network, 2345 Westwood Blvd. #2, Los Angeles CA 90064.

The Big Takeover: Jack Rabid's writing is the backbone of this stimulating and readable fanzine, which has extensive interviews with bands and a lot of provocative record and concert reviews. 249 Eldridge Street, New York NY 10002.

Flipside: Los Angeles' leading punkzine has been going for over a decade, and remains as unspoiled and enthusiastic now as it ever was. Lots of interviews and a great letter section covers the international scene in addition to California. Box 363, Whittier CA 90608.

Rockpool Newsletter: This bi-weekly trade publication has plenty in it for non-industry types. It's not a fun read, but contains dope on new releases and the state of the independent label scene. 83 Leonard Street, New York NY 10013; 212-219-0077.

CMJ New Music Report: This expensive weekly trade magazine oriented towards college radio reviews lots of new records in departments devoted to imports, hip-hop, reggae, worldbeat and metal. The business stuff is boring, but the coverage of new records is timely and knowledgeable. 245 Great Neck Road, Great Neck NY 11021.

Bucketfull of Brains: This amazing British fanzine approaches culty bands from the Saints to Thin White Rope to the Bevis Frond from a record fanatic's perspective. A great source of information with a strong stylistic axe to grind, this is the kind of magazine that will inspire you to buy lots of vinyl. 19 Adela Avenue, New Malden, Surrey KT3 6LF, England.

The Source: America really needs a serious hip-hop magazine, but this will have to do until one comes along. Not quite a trade magazine and not exactly a fanzine, this slick monthly has scene reports, news, features that are occasionally solid and stimulating and record reviews that never quite get around to saying anything. Not yet there, but worth watching. 594 Broadway, New York NY 10012.

Q: This English monthly is everything a rock magazine should be. Largely insulated from the hyper-trendy bullshit that makes the weeklies (Melody Maker, New Musical Express) so maddening, this thick glossy takes a more responsible attitude, waits to see what's worth covering and doesn't forget the past. Great features and endless reviews that could sometimes be better written. PO Box 500, Leicester LE99 0AA, England.

See Hear is a unique store that carries nothing but music books and magazines—from hip imports to tiny fanzines. They publish a catalogue and do sales by mail. 59 East 7th Street, New York NY 10003.

Midnight Records has an extremely cool store in New York but also publishes a big mail order catalogue for those in other environs. PO Box 390, Old Chelsea Station, New York NY 10011.

ABOUT THE EDITOR

Ira Robbins co-founded Trouser Press magazine in 1974 while completing an electrical engineering degree; he was Publisher and Editorial Director of the music monthly until it ceased to exist ten years and 96 issues later. He has edited and/or contributed to a number of books on rock music, and has written about music and video for countless publications large and small. Born in New York City where he resides with his wife, Regina, three cats—Erasmus, Katie and Bobo—and far too many records, Robbins has been a rock'n'roll fanatic ever since hearing Del Shannon's "Hats off to Larry" on the radio in 1961.

UNIVERSAL LIBRARY

112 647

UNIVERSAL
LIBRARY